"It was now Saturday evening, which I spent quietly with my host and his family in talking over old times. In the morning I rose early, for it seemed a sin to waste such hours as these. Standing on the northern stoop of the Keeler tavern, I looked upon the beautiful landscape bounded by the Redding and Danbury hills and saw the glorious march of morning over the scene. The weather was clear, and the serenity of the Sabbath was in the breath of nature; even the breezy morn soon subsided into stillness, as if the voice of God hallowed it. The birds seemed to know that He rested on this seventh day. As the sun came up the fluttering leaves sank into repose; no voice of lowing herd or baying hound broke over the hills. All was silent and motionless in the street, everything seemed to feel that solemn command, 'Remember the Sabbath day,'—save only a strapping Shanghai cook in Mr. Lewis' yard over the way, which strutted, crowed, and chased the hens like a very Mormon, evidently caring for none of these things.

"At nine o'clock the first bell rang. The first stroke told me that it was not the same to which my childish ear was accustomed. Upon inquiry, I learned that on a certain Fourth of July some ten years back it was rung so merrily as to be cracked! Had any one asked me who was likely to have done this, I should have said J . . . H . . . , and he indeed it was. With a good-will, however, quite characteristic of him, he censed it to be replaced by a new one, and, though its tone is deeper and even more melodious than the old one, I felt disappointed, and a shade of sadness came over my mind.

"On going into the meeting-house, I found it to be totally changed. The pulpit, instead of being at the west, was at the north, and the galleries had been transposed to suit this new arrangement. The Puritan pine odor of the pews had given way to white paint. The good old oaken floor was covered by Kidderminster carpets. The choir, instead of being distributed into four parts and placed on different sides of the gallery, was all packed together in a heap. Instead of Deacon Hawley for chorister, there was a young man who 'knew not Joseph,' and in lieu of a job-lapje to give the key, there was a melodeon to lead the choir. Instead of 'Mear,' 'Old Hundred,' 'Aylesbury,' 'Montgomery,' or 'New Durham,'—songs full of piety and pathos, and in which the whole congregation simultaneously joined,—they sang modern tunes whose name and measure I did not know. The performance was artistic and skillful, but it seemed to lack the motion of a hearty echo from the bosom of the assembly, as was the salutary custom among the fathers.

"The congregation was no less changed than the place itself, for, remember, I had not been in this building for five and forty years. The patriarchs of my boyhood—Deacon Olmstead, Deacon Benedict, Deacon Hawley, Granter Baldwin, Stephen Keeler, Nathan Smith—were not there, nor were their types in their places. A few gray-haired men I saw having dim and fleeting resemblances to these Anakim of my youthful imagination, but who they were I could not tell. I afterwards heard that most of them were the companions of my early days, now grown to manhood and bearing the impressions of their parentage ident with vestiges of their youth, thus at once exciting and baffling my curiosity. For the most part, however, the assembly was composed of a new generation. In several instances I felt a strange sort of embarrassment as to whether the person I saw was the boy grown up or the papa grown down. It produces a very odd confusion of ideas to realize in an old man before you the playmate of your childhood whom you had long forgotten for forty years, but who in that time has been trudging along in life at the same pace as yourself. At first everything looked belittled, degenerated in dimensions. The house seemed small, the galleries low, the pulpit mean. The people appeared Lilliputian. These impressions soon passed off, and I began to recognize a few persons around me. William Hawley is just as you would have expected,—his hair white as snow, his countenance mild, refined, cheerful, though marked with threescore and ten. Tral Hawley, though he has his residence in 'Fifth Avenue,' spends his summers here, and begins now to look like his father the deacon. I thought I discovered Gen. King in an erect and martial form in one of the pews, but it proved to be his son Joshua, who now occupies the family mansion and worthily stands at the head of the house. As I came out of church I was greeted with many hearty shakes of the hand, but in most cases I could with difficulty remember those who thus claimed recognition.

"The discourse was very clever and thoroughly orthodox, as it should be, for I found that the Confession and Covenant of 1750 were still in force, just as our father left them. Even the Eleventh Article stands as it was: 'You believe that there will be a resurrection of the dead, and a day of judgment, in which God will judge the world in righteousness by Jesus Christ: when the righteous shall be acquitted and received to eternal life, and the wicked shall be sentenced to everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.'

"I was, I confess, not a little shocked to hear the account the minister gave of the church-members, for he declared that they were full of evil thoughts, envy, jealousy, revenge, and all uncharitableness. He said he knew all about it, and he did testify that they were a great deal worse than the world in general believed or conceived them to be. Indeed, he affirmed that it took a real experimental Christian to understand how totally depraved they were. I was consoled at finding that this was not the settled minister, Mr. Clark, but a missionary accustomed to preach in certain lost places in that awful Babylon called New York. Perhaps the sermon was adapted to the people it was designed for, but it seemed ill suited to the latitude and longitude of such a quaint, primitive parish as Ridgefield, which is without an oyster-clar, a livery-stable, a grog-shop, a lawyer, a broker, a drunkard, or a profane swearer.

"This circumstance reminded me of an itinerant Bonapartes who in his migrations half a century ago through Western New York was requested to prepare a sermon to be preached at the execution of an Indian, who had been convicted of murder and was speedily to be hung. This he complied with, but the convict escaped, and the ceremony did not take place. The preacher, however, not liking to have a good thing lost, delivered it the next Sabbath to a pious congregation in the Western Reserve, where he chanced to be stating that it was composed for a hanging, but, as that did not take place, he would preach it now, presuming that it would be found appropriate to the occasion!

"In the afternoon we had a begging sermon from a young converted Jew, who undertook to prove that his tribe was the most interesting in the world and their conversion the first step towards the millennium. After the sermon they took up a contribution to aid him in getting an education, he also sold a little story-book of his conversion at twelve and a half cents a copy, for the benefit of his converted sister. I have no objection to Jews, converted or unconverted, but I must say that my reverence for the house of God is such that I do not like to hear there the clink of copper which generally prevails in a contribution-box. Even that of silver and gold has no melody for me in such a place. It always reminds me painfully of these vulgar pigeon-dealers who were so summarily and so properly scouted out of the Temple.

"The old dilapidated Episcopal church which you remember on the main street—a church not only without a Bishop, but without a congregation—has given place to a new edifice and state services, with a large and respectable body of worshippers. The Methodists, who were wont to assemble fifty years ago in Dr. Baker's kitchen, have put up a new house, white and bright and crowded every Sabbath with attentive listeners. This church numbers two hundred members, and is the largest in the place. Though in its origin it seemed to thrive upon the out-casts of society, its people are now as respectable as those of any other religious society in the town. No longer do they choose to worship in barns, school-houses, and by-places, no longer do they affect leanness, long faces, and loose, uncombed hair; no longer do they cherish bad grammar, low idioms, and the euphony of a nasal twang in their bed. Their place of worship is in good taste and good keeping; their dress is comely and in the fashion of the day. The preacher is a man of education, refinement, and dignity, and he and the Rev. Mr. Clark, our father's successor, exchange pulpits, and call each other Brother! Has not the good time come?

"On Monday morning I took a wide range over the town with Joshua King, who, by the way, is not only the successor, but in some things the repetition, of his father. He represents him in person, as I have already intimated, and has many of his qualities. He has remodelled the grounds around the old family mansion, amplifying and embellishing them with much judgment. The house itself is unchanged, except by paint and the introduction of certain articles of furniture and tasteful decorations,—testimonials of the proprietor's repeated visits to Europe. Here, being a bachelor, he has gathered some of his nieces, and here he receives the members of the King dynasty down to the third generation, all seeming to regard it as the Jerusalem of the family. The summer gathering is delightful, bringing hither the refinements of the best society of New York, Philadelphia, and other places. Here I spent some pleasant hours, meeting, of course, many of the neighbors, who came to see me with almost as much curiosity as if I had been the venerable Joyce Beth.

"In all parts of the town I was struck with the evidences of change—gentle, gradual, it is true, but still bespeaking the lapse of half a century. Along the main street the general outline of things is the same, but in detail all is transformed, or at least modified. Most of the old houses have disappeared, or have undergone such mutations as hardly to be recognized. New and more expensive edifices are scattered here and there. If you ask who are the proprietors, you will be told Dr. Perry, Joshua King, Nathan Smith, but they are not those whom we knew by these names; they are their sons, perhaps their grandsons. Master Stebbins' school-house is swept away, and even the pond across the road, the scene of many a school-day frolic, is evaporated. I am constantly struck with the general desecration which has passed over the place; many of the brooks which formed our winter skating- and sliding-places have vanished. I looked in vain for the pool back of Benson John Benedict's house, which I always imagined to be the scene of the ballad:

"What shall we have for dinner, Mrs. Bond?

There is beef in the ladder and ducks in the pond;

Dill, dill, dill, dill, dill,

Come here and be killed!"

Col. Bradley's house, that seemed once so awful and so exclusive, is now a dim, rickety, and tenanted edifice, for sale, with all its appurtenances, for twenty-five hundred dollars. Is it not strange to see this once proud tenement the subject of blight and decay, and that, too, in the midst of general prosperity? Nor is this all; it has just been the subject of a degrading hoax. I must tell you the story, for it will show you that the march of progress has invaded even Ridgefield.

"About three days since there appeared in the village a man claiming to be the son-in-law of George Law. In a mysterious manner he agreed to buy the Bradley estate. With equal mystery he contracted to purchase several other houses in the vicinity. It then leaked out that a grand speculation was on foot—there was to be a railroad through Ridgefield; the town was to be turned into a city, and a hotel resembling the Astor House was to take the place of the old dilapidated shell now upon the Bradley premises. An electric feeling soon ran through the village, speculation began to swell in the bosom of society. Under this impulse rocks rose, rivers doubted, hills mounted, valleys oscillated. This sober town, anchored in everlasting granite, having defied the shock of ages, now trembled in the hysterical balance of trade.

"Two days passed, and the bubble burst. The puff-ball was punctured; the sham son-in-law of George Law was discovered to be a lawless son of a pauper of Danbury. All his operations were, in fact, a hoax. At twelve o'clock on Saturday night he was seized and taken from his bed by an independent corps under Capt. Lynch. They tied him fast to a button-wood-tree in the main street, called the Liberty Pole.

"No man e'er felt the better draw

In good opinion of the law."

At all events, the prisoner deemed it a great incongruity to use an institution consecrated to the rights of man and the cause of freedom for the purpose of depriving him of the power to seek happiness in his own way; so about ten o'clock on Sunday morning, finding it unpleasant to be in this situation while the people went by, shaking their heads, on their way to church, he managed to get out his penknife, cut his cords, and make a bee-line for South Salem.

"Farther on, proceeding northward, I found that Dr. Baker's old house—its kitchen the cradle of Ridgefield Methodism—had departed, and two or three modern edifices were near its site. Master Stebbins' house, from its elevated position at the head of the street, seeming like the guardian genius of the place, still stands, venerable alike from its dim complexion, its antique form, and its historical remembrances. Its days may be set at a hundred years, and hence it is an antiquity in our brief chronology. It almost saw the birth of Ridgefield; it has probably looked down upon the building of every other edifice in the street.

It presided over the fight of 1777. Close by, Arnold's house was shot under him, and he, according to tradition, made a flying leap over a six-barrel gate and escaped. Near its threshold the British cannon was planted which sent a ball into the northeastern corner-post of Squire Keeler's tavern, and which, covered up by a sliding shingle, as a relic too precious for the open air, is still to be seen there.

"The old house I found enlaced in trees, some—primeval elms—spreading their wide branches protectingly over the roof, stoop, and foreground; others, sugar-maples, upright, symmetrical, and deeply verdant, as is the wont of these beautiful children of our American forest. Other trees—apples, pears, peaches, and plums, bending with fruit—occupied the orchard-grounds back of the house. The garden at the left seemed a jubilee of tomatoes, beets, squashes, onions, cucumbers, beans, and pumpkins. A vine of the latter had invaded a peach-tree and a huge oval pumpkin, deeply ribbed and now emerging from its bronze hue into a golden yellow, swung aloft as if to proclaim the victory. By the porch was a thick clambering grapevine, presenting its purple bunches almost to your mouth as you enter the door. I knocked, and Anne Stebbins, my former schoolmate, let me in. She was still a maiden, in strange contrast to the prolific and progressive state of all around. She did not know me, but when I told her how I once saw her climb through the opening in the school-house wall overhead, and suggested the blue-mixed hue of her stockings, she rallied and gave me a hearty welcome.

"You will no doubt in some degree comprehend the feelings with which I rambled over these scenes of our boyhood, and you will forgive, if you cannot approve, the length of this random epistle. I will trespass but little further upon your patience. I must repeat that the general aspect of the town, in respect to its roads, churches, houses, lands, all show a general progress in wealth, taste, and refinement. Nor is this advance in civilization merely external. William Hawley, a most competent judge, as he has been the leading merchant of the place for forty years, mentioned some striking evidences of this. At the beginning of this century most of the farmers were in debt and a large part of their lands were under mortgage; now not four farms in the place are thus encumbered. Then it was the custom for the men to spend a good deal of their time, and especially in winter, at the stores and taverns in tipping and small gambling; this practice has ceased. Drunkenness, profane swearing, Sabbath-breaking, noisy night-rows, which were common, are now almost wholly unknown. There are but two town papers, and these are not indigenes. Education is better, higher in its standard, and is nearly universal. Ideas of comfort in the modes of life are more elevated, the houses are improved, the furniture is more convenient and more abundant. That religion has not lost its hold on the conscience is evident from the fact that three flourishing churches exist; that the duties of patriotism are not forgotten is evinced by a universal attendance at the polls on election-days; at the same time, it is clear that religious and political discussions have lost their acerbity, thus leaving the feeling of good neighborhood more general and the tone of humanity in all things more exalted.

"Is there not encouragement, hope, in these things? for Ridgefield is not alone in this forward march of society. It is in the general tide of prosperity, economical, social, and moral, but an example of what has been going on all over New England,—perhaps over the whole country. We hear a great deal of the iniquities in the larger cities, but society even there is not worse than formerly—these places—their houses, streets, prisons, brothels—are exhausted as by an air-pump of all their doings, good and bad, and the soot-thing mass of details is doled out day after day by the penny press to appease the hunger and thirst of society for excitement. Thus what was once hidden is now thrown open, and seems multiplied and magnified by a dozen powerful lenses, each nuzzing the most of it and seeking to outdo all others in dressing up the show for the public taste. If you will make the comparison, you will see that now tipping over an omnibus or the foundering of a forty-boat takes up more space in a newspaper than did six murders or a dozen conflagrations fifty years ago. Then the world's doings could be dispatched in a weekly folio of four pages, with Pier type; now they require forty pages of Brevier every day. Our population is increased, doubled, quadrupled if you please, but the newspaper press has enlarged its functions a thousand fold. It costs more paper and print to determine whether a policeman of New York was born in England or the United States than are usually consumed in telling the story of the Revolutonary war. This institution—the Press—has, in fact, become a microscope and a mirror, seeing all, magnifying all, reflecting all, until at last it requires a steady brain to discover in its shifting and passing panorama the sober, simple truth. So far as the subject of which I am writing is concerned, I am satisfied that if our cities seem more corrupt than formerly, it is only in appearance and not in reality. If we hear more about the vices of so-city, it is because, in the first place, things are more exposed to the public view, and, in the next place, the moral standards are higher, and hence these evils are made the subject of louder and more noticeable comment. These obvious objections will solve whatever difficulty there may be in adopting my conclusions.

"But, whatever the fact may be as to our larger cities, it cannot be doubted that all over New England at least there has been a quiet but earnest and steady march of civilization, especially within the last forty years. The war of 1812 was disastrous to our part of the country,—disastrous, I firmly believe, to our whole country. In New England it checked the natural progress of society, it impoverished the people, it debased their manners, it corrupted their hearts. Let others vaunt the glory of war: I shall venture to say what I have seen and known. We have now had forty years of peace, and the happy advances I have noticed, bringing in roused light and comfort in at every door, rich or poor, to bless the inhabitants, are its legitimate fruits. The inherent tendency of our New England society is to improvement: give us peace, giving us tranquillity, and, with the blessing of God, we shall continue to advance.

"You will not suppose me to say that government can do nothing: the prosperity of which I speak is in a great measure imputable to the encouragement given, for a series of years, to our domestic industry. When farming absorbed society, a large part of the year was lost, or worse than lost, because tavern-haunting, tippling, and gambling were the chief resources of men in the dead and dreary winter months. Manufactures gave profitable occupation during this inclement period. Formerly the markets were remote, and we all know, from the records of universal history, that farmers, without the stimulus of ready markets, sink into indolence and indifference. The protection, the encouragement, the stimulating of any of our manufacturing and mechanical industry created home markets in every valley, along every stream, thus rousing the taste, energy, and ambition of the farmers within reach of those pervading influences. Ridgefield is not, strictly speaking, a manufacturing town, but the beneficent operation of the multiplying and diversifying of the occupations of society has reached this, as it has every other town and village in the State, actually transforming the condition of the people by increasing their wealth, multiplying their comforts, enlarging their minds, elevating their sentiments,—in short, increasing their happiness.

"The importance of the fact I state—the progress and improvement of the country towns—is plain, when we consider that here and not in the great cities—New York or Boston or Philadelphia—are the hope, strength, and glory of our nation. Here, in the smaller towns and villages, are indeed the majority of the people, and here there is a weight of sober thought, just judgment, and virtuous feeling that will serve as rudder and ballast to our country, whatever weather may betide.

"As I have so recently traveled through some of the finest and most renowned portions of the European continent, I find myself constantly comparing the towns and villages which I see here with these foreign lands. One thing is clear,—that there are in Continental Europe no such country towns and villages as those of New England and some other portions of this country. Not only the exterior, but the interior, is totally different. The villages there resemble the squalid suburbs of a city; the people are like their houses,—poor and subservient, narrow in intellect, feeling, and habits of thought. I know twenty towns in France having from two to ten thousand inhabitants where, if you except the prefects, mayors, notaries, and a few other persons in each place, there is scarcely a family that rises to the least independence of thought, or even a moderate elevation of character. All the power, all the thought, all the genius, all the expansion of intellect, are centered at Paris. The blood of the country is drawn to this seat and centre, leaving the limbs and members cold and pulseless as those of a corpse.

"How different is it in this country. The life, vigor, power, of these United States are diffused through a thousand veins and arteries over the whole people, every limb nourished, every member invigorated. New York, Philadelphia, and Boston do not give law to this country; that comes from the people, the majority of whom resemble those I have described at Ridgefield,—farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, merchants, independent in their circumstances and sober, religious, virtuous in their habits of thought and conduct. I make allowance for the sinister influence of vice, which abounds in some places; for the debasing effects of demagogism in our politicians; for the corruption of selfish and degrading interests cast into the general current of public feeling and opinion; I admit that these sometimes make the nation swerve for a time from the path of wisdom, but the wandering is neither wide nor long. The preponderating national mind is just and sound, and if danger comes it will manifest its power and avert it.

"But I must close this long letter, and with it bid adieu to my birthplace. Farewell to Ridgefield! Its soil is indeed stubborn, its climate severe, its creed rigid, yet where is the landscape more smiling, the sky more glorious, the earth more cheering? Where is society more kindly, neighborhood more equal, life more tranquil? Where is the sentiment of humanity higher, life more blest? Where else can you find two thousand country-people with the refinements of the city, their farms unmortgaged, their speech unblemished with oaths, their breath uncontaminated with alcohol, their poor-house without a single native pauper?

"Daniel Webster once said, jocosely, that New Hampshire is a good place to come from: it seems to me, in all sincerity, that Ridgefield is a good place to go to. Should I ever return there to end my days, this may be my epitaph:

"My faults forgotten, and my sins forgiven,
Let this, my tranquil birthplace, be my grave:
As in my youth I deem'd it nearest heaven,
So here I give to God the breath he gave.
"Yours ever, S. G. G."

SARAH BISHOP, THE HERMITESS.

"Three-quarters of a century ago," says Rev. Mr. Teller, "there was sometimes to be seen in the village a strange-appearing old woman, familiarly known as Sarah Bishop. Her whole appearance was to the last degree peculiar. Poorly clad, her form slightly bent, her face pale and careworn, her brow wrinkled and nearly hidden by long locks of gray hair, which were allowed to fall carelessly over it, her step quick and agile,—she would seem to glide rather than walk through the town street in quest of such articles of food as were absolutely indispensable to the sustenance of the body, or a few crumbs of that spiritual bread which is no less indispensable to the life of the soul. She is said to have reminded one more of a visitant from the spirit-world than of a being of actual flesh and blood.

"Her home—if home it could be called—was situated on one of the southeastern declivities of West Mountain, about four miles northwest from the village of Ridgefield, and just inside the town limits of Salem. It was formed in part by a mass of projecting rock, and in part by pieces of bark and limbs of trees thrown up by her own hands for a covering.

"No name could better apply to her than hermitess. She was no mere amateur recluse: she was actually shut off from all society. Her dwelling-place was one difficult to find, and her reticence covered alike all the incidents of her past life and her present thought. She repelled almost with sternness, rather than courted, the sympathy even of those of her own sex. She loved solitude; she did not feign a preference for it.

"The tradition concerning this singular woman is that during the Revolutionary war she lived with her parents on Long Island; but, her father's house having been at that time burned and she greatly wronged by a British officer, she left her home and wandered about till she discovered this lonely spot and the half-formed cave, from which she could not only overlook the Sound, but which on a clear day enabled her to feast her eyes upon the very hills and valleys which surrounded the home of her childhood.

"The first piece of poetry ever published by S. G.

Goodrich (Peter Parley) had this hermitess for its subject. It ran as follows:

- "For many a year the mountain hag
Was a theme of village wonder,
For she made her home in the dizzy crag
Where the eagle bore his plunder.
- "Up the beetling cliff she was seen at night
Like a ghost to glide away;
But she came again with the morning light
From the forest wild and gray.
- "Her face was wrinkled, and passionless seem'd
As her bosom, all blasted and dead,
And her colorless eye like an icicle gleamed,
Yet no sorrow or sympathy shed.
- "Her long snowy locks, as the winter drift,
On the wind were backward cast,
And her shiv'ring form glided by so swift
You had said 'twere a ghost that pass'd.
- "Her house was a cave in a giddy rock
That o'erhung a lonesome vale,
And 'twas deeply scared by the lightning-shock,
And swept by the vengeful gale.
- "As alone on the cliff she musingly sat
The fox at her fingers would snout;
The crow would sit on her snow-white pate,
And the rattlesnake coil in her lap.
- "The night-hawk look'd down with a welcome eye
As he stoop'd in his airy swing,
And the laughing eagle hover'd so nigh
As to fan her long locks with his wing.
- "But when Winter roll'd dark his sullen wave
From the west with gusty shock,
Old Sarah, deserted, crept cold to her cave,
And slept without bed in her rock.
- "No fire illumined her dismal den,
Yet a tatter'd Bible she read;
For she saw in the dark with a wizard ken,
And talk'd with the troubled dead.
- "And often she muttered a foreign name
With curses too fearful to tell,
And a tale of horror, of madness and shame,
She told to the walls of her cell."

"Mr. Goodrich further says of her ('Recollections of a Lifetime,' vol. i. p. 293):

"In my rambles among the mountains I have seen her passing through the forest or sitting silent as a statue upon the prostrate trunk of a tree, or perchance upon a stone or mound, scarcely to be distinguished from the inanimate objects—wood, earth, and rock—around her. She had a sense of propriety as to personal appearance, for when she visited the town she was decently though poorly clad; when alone in the wilderness she seemed little more than a squalid mass of rags. My excursions frequently brought me within the wild precincts of her solitary den. Several times I have paid a visit to the spot, and in two instances found her at home. A place more desolate in its general outline, more absolutely given up to the wilderness of nature, it is impossible to conceive. Her cave was a hollow in the rock about six feet square. Except a few rags and an old basin, it was without furniture, her bed being the floor of the cave and her pillow a projecting point of the rock. It was entered by a natural door about three feet wide and four feet high, and was closed in severe weather only by pieces of bark. At a distance of a few feet was a cleft, where she kept a supply of roots and nuts which she gathered, and the food that was given her. She was reputed to have a secret depository, where she kept a quantity of antique dresses, several of them of rich silks and apparently suited to fashionable life, though I think this was an exaggeration. At a little distance down the ledge there was a fine spring of water, in the vicinity of which she was often found in fair weather.

"There was no attempt, either in or around the spot, to bestow upon it an air of convenience or comfort. A small space of cleared ground was occupied by a few thriftless peach-trees, and in summer a patch of staving beans, cucumbers, and potatoes. Up two or three of the adjacent forest-trees there clambered luxuriant grapevines, highly productive in their season. With the exception of these feeble marks of cultivation, all was left ghastly and savage as nature made it. The trees, standing upon the top of the cliff and exposed to the shock of the tempest, were bent and stooping towards the valley, their limbs contorted and their roots clinging, as with an agonizing grasp, into the rifts of the rocks upon which they stood. Many of them were hoary with age and hollow with decay; others were stripped of their leaves by the blasts, and others still grooved and splintered by the lightning. The valley below, enriched with the decay of centuries and fed with moisture from the surrounding hills, was a wild paradise of towering oaks and other giants of the vegetable kingdom, with a rank undergrowth of tangled shrubs. In the distance, to the east, the gathered streams spread out into a beautiful expanse of water called Long Pond.

"A place at once so secluded and so wild was, of course, the chosen haunt of birds, beasts, and reptiles. The eagle built her nest and reared her young in the clefts of the rocks; foxes found shelter in the caverns, and serpents revelled alike in the dry hollows of the cliffs and the dank recesses of the valley. The hermitess had made companionship with these brute tenants of the wood. The birds had become so familiar with her that they seemed to heed her almost as little as if she had been a stone. The fox fearlessly pursued his hunt and his gambols in her presence. The rattlesnake hushed his monitory signal as he approached her. Such things, at least, were entertained by the popular belief. It was said, indeed, that she had domesticated a particular rattlesnake, and that he paid her daily visits. She was accustomed—so said the legend—to bring him milk from the villages, which he devoured with great relish.

"During the winter she was confined for several months to her cell. At that period she lived upon roots and nuts, which she had laid in for the season. She had no fire, and, deserted even by her brute companions, she was absolutely alone, save that she seemed to hold communion with the invisible world. She appeared to have no sense of solitude, no weariness at the slow lapse of days and months; night had no darkness, the tempest no terror, winter no desolation, for her. When spring returned she came down from her mountain a mere shadow, each year her form more bent, her limbs more thin and wasted, her hair more blanched, her eye more colorless."

"In the year 1810 this strange life ended, and ended in a manner sadly in keeping with all which had preceded it. One stormy night she left the house of a Mr. Wilson, living where Mr. Timothy Jones now lives, some two miles away, to return by a nearer route across the fields to her own wretched den. A few days after, much anxiety having been felt as to her condition, search was made for her. Not finding her in the cave, those in search started down across the fields towards the house at which she had been last seen. They had proceeded but a little way before they discovered her lifeless body literally wedged in between masses of rocks. She had never reached her home. The things which the kind neighbor had given her were with her. In attempting to climb the steep and rocky hillside she had missed her footing and perished.

"The neighbors and friends took up her body, and, having prepared for it the grave, buried it in the old burying-ground connected with the Episcopal church, North Salem. No stone marks the spot where her body rests, but the old cave, still to be seen in the mountain-side, will keep fresh and green her memory, while that of many who lived in affluence and died greatly lamented shall have perished."

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

THE Congregational Church was the first Christian organization of the town. Under date of October, 1712, the following act of General Assembly then convened at Hartford is recorded:

"Upon the petition of the Inhabitants of the Town of Ridgfield, requesting that the charges for the maintenance of the ministry in the said town of Ridgfield may be levied in equal proportion upon all the lands belonging to the several proprietors in the said Town,

"This Assembly order that all lands lying in the Township of Ridgfield be taxed in proportion for four years towards the settling and maintaining of the ministry in the said town of Ridgfield."

As early as 1713 the Rev. Thomas Hawley, of Northampton, had come to the young settlement as a preacher of the gospel. There were doubtless others who had preceded him as occasional supplies, but as the earliest records of the church were destroyed many years ago, the names of such and their terms of service are lost.

In the year 1714, General Assembly granted "unto the inhabitants of the Town of Ridgfield to embody into Church Estate and settle an orthodox minister among them."

Rev. Thomas Hawley was probably formally settled over the church as its pastor in the same year, and continued his labors among them until the time of his death, which occurred on the 8th of November, 1738, in the forty-ninth year of his age. Mr. Hawley was a graduate of Harvard College and the ancestor of the families of the same name, so well known in the town. He held for a number of years many of the important offices of the town, and gained a reputation for energy and ability, originating and directing many of the enterprises of the early settlers.

The year following the death of Mr. Hawley, Rev. Jonathan Ingersoll, a native of Stratford, Conn., was invited to settle in the gospel ministry. This invitation Mr. Ingersoll accepted, and was duly installed on the 8th of August, 1739. Previous to coming to Ridgfield he resided for some time in Newark, N. J., and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Jersey at Elizabethtown, Feb. 15, 1738.

At the meeting of the Western Association, Fairfield County, which installed Mr. Ingersoll, there were present the following ministers: Rev. Robert Sturgeon, Rev. Moses Dickinson, Rev. Ebenezer Wright, Rev. John Goodsell, Rev. Ephraim Bostwick, Rev. William Gaylord. Delegates: From Bedford, Capt. Jonathan Miller; Norwalk, John Copp, Esq.; Stamford, Abraham Davenport; Greenfield, Benjamin Banks; Wilton, Benjamin Hickox, Esq.; Green's Farms, Samuel Couch, Esq.

Rev. Mr. Goodsell offered the first prayer and gave the right hand of fellowship. Rev. Mr. Dickinson preached the sermon and offered the prayer of ordination. Rev. Mr. Sturgeon gave the charge, and Rev. Mr. Todd, who had been invited to sit with the council, offered the closing prayer.

Mr. Ingersoll was a graduate of Yale College, and a man of a fine mind and a good heart. He served the church with great faithfulness until his death, which occurred Oct. 2, 1778, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

In the year 1758, Mr. Ingersoll joined the colonial troops as chaplain, on Lake Champlain. He is said to have exerted an excellent influence in the army, and to have been highly respected by the soldiers.

Mr. Hawley and Mr. Ingersoll were buried in the Titicus Cemetery. The stones which mark their graves bear the following inscriptions:

"Here lyes buried
the body of y^e Rev.
Thomas Hawley
Pastor of y^e Church at Ridgfield
Nov. y^e 8, 1738
Aged 42 Years."

"In Memory

Jonathan Ingersoll, Pastor of y^e 1st Church in Ridgfield who Deceased Oct. 2, A. D.
1778 in y^e 65. Year of his Age, & 40th of his Ministry."

After the death of Mr. Ingersoll there seems to have been a vacancy of eight years, during which time the pulpit was in part supplied by Rev. Justice Mitchell, who, in January, 1783, was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church of New Canaan, and in part by Rev. Izrahiah Wetmore and Rev. — Everitt, as the following receipts will show:

"RIDGFIELD, Dec. 27, 1781.

"To BENJAMIN SMITH, Treasurer of the first Society in Ridgfield."

On the 6th of July, 1786, Rev. Samuel Goodrich, of Durham, of this State, was ordained and installed as pastor of the church. The services on this occasion are said to have been of unusual interest. The father of the newly-settled pastor preached the sermon and gave the charge, both to his son and to the church. The venerable appearance of the aged, gray-haired father was in striking contrast with the youthful and almost boyish appearance of the son. It was age and experience counseling youth and inexperience. It was a man of God who had borne the burden and heat of the day, and was ready to depart, casting his mantle upon the shoulders of another just entering upon the work.

Mr. Goodrich served the church as its pastor for upwards of twenty-five years. He was dismissed Jan. 22, 1811, at his own request, and on the 29th of May, 1811, he was installed at Worthington, a parish in the town of Berlin, in this State. He was the father of Samuel G. Goodrich, the renowned Peter Parley, whose sketch of Ridgefield, written in 1855, the reader will find elsewhere in this work. Mr. Goodrich also was the author of a manuscript history of the town, which was written and lodged in the library of the Athenæum at Hartford, in the year 1800, extracts from which we have also given.

The labors of Mr. Goodrich were eminently blessed, and the church during his ministry enjoyed many seasons of revival, and large additions were made to it. He was for several years a trustee of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, and a director of the Connecticut Bible Society, in both of which he manifested a warm interest. He died at Berlin, Conn., April 19, 1835, aged seventy-two years.

After the dismissal of Mr. Goodrich the church was again destitute of a settled pastor for several years. Rev. Jonathan Bartlett supplied the pulpit from 1811 to 1814, and was succeeded by Rev. John Noyes, who supplied from 1814 to 1817. During Mr. Bartlett's ministry he proposed to the society to raise a fund, the annual income of which should be appropriated for the support of the preaching of the gospel, and, as an encouragement to the undertaking, he generously gave to the society the sum of fifty dollars. As the result of this effort the permanent fund of the society at the present time is eight thousand dollars.

On the 2d of February, 1817, the church invited the Rev. Samuel M. Phelps to become their pastor, and Consociation was convened on the 20th day of March following for the purpose of his installation in June following, and Mr. Phelps was by them regularly installed as their minister, according to the usages and custom of said Presbytery. Mr. Phelps continued his labors here until the month of December, 1829, when he was by the members of the Presbytery aforesaid regularly dismissed, and his ministry in this place ceased.

The church, at a regular meeting held on the 31st day of March, 1831, with great unanimity rescinded their vote of secession passed Feb. 24, 1817, and became reunited to the Consociation of the Western District of Fairfield County, and on the same day they invited the Rev. Charles G. Selleck, of Darien, to become their pastor, and he was ordained and installed on the 25th day of May, 1831. Mr. Selleck's ministry continued until the 6th day of September, 1837. During it the church enjoyed three precious seasons of religious interest,—viz., in 1831, 1832, and 1833,—and as the fruits thereof about one hundred and eighty persons were added to the church. Mr. Selleck is still living. A few years since, at an advanced age, he removed to Florida and made for himself a home, where he still resides.

On the 18th of January, 1838, the church and society invited the Rev. Joseph Fuller to settle among them, and on the 27th of February following the Consociation met, and Mr. Fuller was regularly installed as their pastor. His ministry continued about four years, in which time the church enjoyed another season of revival, and about sixty persons united with it. On the 17th of May, 1842, by the united request of Mr. Fuller and the church, the Consociation met, and Mr. Fuller was dismissed from his pastoral charge.

After the dismissal of Mr. Fuller the church was without a settled pastor for seventeen months, during which time the pulpit was regularly supplied, and an interesting work of grace ensued, by which about twenty, mostly young persons, united themselves to the church by profession.

On the 18th of September, 1843, the church and society, each by unanimous votes, extended to the Rev. James A. Hawley a call to become their pastor, which call he accepted, and on the 25th of October following he was regularly installed as such. His connection as pastor continued until Nov. 5, 1849, when at his request he was dismissed by Consociation. During the years 1845 and 1848 the church enjoyed seasons of revival, and as the fruits thereof about forty persons were added to it.

Believing that the best interests of the church would be secured by having a settled pastor, the church and society, with marked unanimity, on the 6th of May, 1850, extended to the Rev. Clinton Clark a call to settle among them. The call was accepted, and Mr. Clark was duly installed June 5, 1850. His connection as pastor of this church continued nearly fourteen years, or until April 5, 1864, at which time he was dismissed, and soon after entered upon the duties of acting pastor of the Congregational Church of Middlebury, Conn. where he died Sept. 23, 1871.

During Mr. Clark's ministry in Ridgefield one hundred and fifteen persons united with the church, of whom seventy-six were by profession. In consideration of his long-continued services the church, by resolution, extended to him "our most grateful acknowledgment and heartfelt thanks for all his labors among us, and that it is with deep regret that we part with one who has so long and faithfully discharged his duty to us in all the ministerial relations."

Mr. Clark was a graduate of Amherst College. He was a man of sound mind and fervent piety. He is buried in the cemetery at Ridgefield, in the midst of the people whom he so faithfully served.

After the dismissal of Mr. Clark the pulpit was supplied by various clergymen until the fall of 1865, when the Rev. Samuel G. Coe, then recently dismissed from the First Congregational Church in Danbury, Conn., removed to Ridgefield as a place of residence. He was invited to supply the pulpit, and soon after received a unanimous call to settle. He, however, preferred to labor with them without being formally installed. His wishes in this respect were acceded to, and he continued to serve the church until the autumn of 1868, when failing health induced him to give up active pastoral work.

Mr. Coe was a graduate of Yale College, of Yale Law School, and of Yale Theological Seminary. He was a clear thinker and an earnest and eloquent preacher. He died on the 7th of December, 1869, universally lamented.

The Rev. Pliny S. Boyd was called by the church and society to settle. He accepted the call, and was installed May 11, 1869. Mr. Boyd was dismissed July 1, 1871, and soon after was settled over the congregational Church of Amesbury, Mass.

The church was supplied with regular preaching by various clergymen until Feb. 1, 1872, when the Rev. Daniel W. Teller was called to become the acting pastor of the church by unanimous vote. Three years later he was invited to be formally settled over the church, but preferred serving, as he had already done, as acting pastor. He is still serving the church in that capacity. The church at present has two hundred and twenty-five members,—males, eighty-three; females, one hundred and forty-two.

CHURCH EDIFICES.

The first house used for religious meetings by the Congregationalists was a small building standing nearly in front of the residence of Miss Mary Hawley. It was used also as a school-house and as a place at which to transact town business previous to the erection of the town-house.

On the 19th of December, 1723, the following vote was passed in town-meeting:

"Voted unanimously that a meeting house shall be built.
"Test. THOMAS HAWLEY,

"At the meeting above said, it was voted unanimously that the magnitude and proportion of the Meeting-house above said shall be thirty-four feet wide; on the ground forty feet long, and twenty-eight feet between the sill and the plate.

"Test. THOMAS HAWLEY,

This house stood immediately east of the present building or where the road now passes it.

In the year 1765 the building of the present house began for the first time to be seriously considered, as will appear from the following minutes:

The steeple at first erected above the church was observed, after a few years, to be leaning towards the main building. In the year 1815 the following call for a society's meeting was issued :

" Notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Presbyterian Society in the first Society in Ridgefield will be holden at the Meeting House on the 13th day of Oct at 1 O'clock in the P. M. for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of taking down the Steeple of said House and of making provision for necessary repairs.

The steeple was deemed unsafe and therefore taken down, and two years afterwards, in the year 1817, the present one was erected.

In the first attempt to set up the new steeple an accident occurred which was attended with great danger to all who were present. The posts were nearly in place, when the iron hook to which the pulleys were attached broke, and the whole framework fell to the ground. The only damage sustained was the breaking of one of the posts. This was spliced by iron bands, and the next day it was set up and secured.

The present church building was altered and repaired in 1833, when the whole inside work, including galleries and pulpit, was taken out and the interior so arranged as to present the appearance of an entirely new house.

The church, thus repaired, was renewedly dedicated to God in the month of June, 1834. The dedication sermon was preached by Rev. Joel Mann, from Hag-gai ii, 9: "The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of hosts; and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts."

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered on this occasion. The services were solemn, and were rendered peculiarly interesting by the presence of the venerable and Rev. Samuel Goodrich, the former beloved pastor of the church, who was provisionally present and assisted in the services.

In the summer of 1841 the exterior of the edifice was thoroughly repaired, and several important additions and alterations were made. Subsequently a new bell, a new pulpit and its surroundings, and an organ have added their attractions to this more than centenary building, still a work of strength and giving promise of a long future as a sanctuary of the Most High.

ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH.

The foundation of the Episcopal Church in Ridgefield was laid by the Rev. Samuel Johnson, of Stratford, the first clergyman of the church in Connecticut, who preached here occasionally for several years and was instrumental in bringing several families into the church. He began his services here about 1725. He was succeeded by the two brothers, Henry Caner, of Fairfield, and Richard Caner, of Norwalk; also by the Rev. John Beach, of Newtown, and Rev. James Wetmore, of Rye, who remained until about the year 1744.

In the year 1728 the Rev. Henry Caner reported several small parishes or missionary stations beyond the bounds of his proper care, one of which was Ridgefield, with twelve families.

The Rev. John Beach, missionary at Newtown, reported to the Society in London "that he often officiated and administered the sacraments in Ridgefield, distant from his residence about eighteen miles, where in 1735 there were nearly twenty families of very serious and religious people, who had a just esteem of the Church of England and desired to have the opportunity of worshiping God in that way."

The Rev. Joseph Lamson, assistant to the Rev. James Wetmore, of Rye, officiated at Ridgefield in 1714, in connection with Bedford and North Castle, until his removal to Fairfield, in 1747, where he still continued to serve the church in Ridgefield, as far as can be ascertained, until 1762. He was succeeded by the Rev. Richard S. Clark, of Salem, about 1764, who held services in connection with Salem and Ridgebury.

In the year 1768 the Rev. Epenetus Townsend took the charge of services in Ridgefield, in connection with Salem and Ridgebury, and so continued until 1776, when, after the Declaration of Independence, he left, and was appointed chaplain to one of the loyal battalions then stationed in New York, and in 1779 the battalion was ordered to Halifax, Nova Scotia. He embarked from New York, with his wife and five children, in one of the vessels. A severe storm arose soon after leaving New York, and the vessel in which he embarked was foundered in Boston Bay, and every soul on board perished.

All of the clergy of the church who ministered here previous to the American Revolution were missionaries of the "Society in England for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," and received annual stipend towards their maintenance. The Rev. Mr. Townsend, as well as other missionaries, received an annuity of twenty pounds sterling in addition to the tax raised among his people for his support.

As far as ascertained, an interval of about thirteen years passed by before the resumption of regular services by a clergyman of the church.

The following, among others, are from the records of the town of Ridgefield:

The Rev. David Perry was the first settled minister of the church after the Revolution, and entered upon his charge in September, 1789, having been ordained by Bishop Seabury, Sept. 22, 1789, to deacon's orders, and to priest's orders on the 16th of October following.

The following is copied from the church records:

"At a meeting of the First Episcopal Society holden at the Town House in Ridgefield by adjournment on the first Monday in August, 1789,
"Voted, That Doct. David Perry receive Holy Orders for this Society."

The first church edifice erected here for Episcopal worship was about 1740, upon a spot in the Town Street which was granted by the proprietors of the town at a meeting held Jan. 4, 1739, and was situated directly in front of what was called the Sturtevant lot, and bounded within three feet of said lot; the space granted was thirty-six feet north and south, and twenty-six feet east and west, its location being a little south of the present church lot.

The following article, in reference to the grant, is from the Ridgefield town records:

"Whereas, at a Proprietor's Meeting January 4th 1740, GED by a major vote, order and empower us the subscribers, to view and look a spot or place of ground that may be convenient and suitable to build and erect a Church or Meeting House, for those that are of the profession of the Church of England; and also to agree with, and confirm unto them the said spot or piece of land so agreed upon; in pursuance to, and by virtue of said vote, we have set out, and do agree with the said professors, that they shall have liberty of a certain spot of land in said Town Street, on the front of that home lot that was formerly John Sturtevant's deceased; the west sill bounded within three feet of the line or front of said lot, which said spot or piece of ground is to be in extent, thirty-six feet north and south; and east and west, twenty-six feet.

This building remained until after the Revolutionary war. During the war it was taken by a commissary of the American army as a building in which to deposit the public stores. In April, 1777, the building was set on fire by the British forces in their retreat from Danbury. Though not consumed, it was rendered unfit for use as a place of public worship.

In June, 1784, at a meeting of those friendly to the Church of England, it was deemed advisable to tear down the old building and build a new one.

The following is the notice for said meeting:

" To ALEXANDER RESSEGAIE, of Ridgefield in Fairfield County, Connecticut.
" By authority of the State of Connecticut; you are hereby required to notify and warn all the inhabitants living within the limits of the First Society in Ridgefield, that are professors of the Church of England, to meet and hold a Society meeting at the Church in said Society, on the 28th day of instant, June at 3 o'clock, after noon, at being the place of worship for said professors, for the purpose of choosing Society officers, repairing the church, hiring some person to perform Divine Service in said Episcopal Society, granting a tax for these purposes, and any other business proper for said meeting to do or act. By order of us—

" PHILIP B. BRADLEY,
" Justice of Peace.
" EBENEZER LOBBELL,
" DAVID PERRY,
" ALEXANDER RESSEGAIE,
" Principal Inhabitants."

" RIDGEFIELD, June 19, 1784."

The meeting was held according to notice, and it was voted not to repair the old church, to hire a person to perform divine service for four months, and to pay ten pounds by way of tax on the list of the year 1783 for the purpose of paying for this and other society charges.

At a meeting held on the 28th day of October, 1784, it was voted to pull down the old church and build a new one, forty feet long, thirty feet wide, and eighteen-feet posts, a little south of the old one, and on the ground formerly granted by the town for that purpose:

Voted, To pay a tax of one shilling on the pound on the list of the year 1784, by the first day of April, 1785, for the purpose of erecting a new church.

Voted, That Benjamin Hoyt, Ezekiel Wilson, Thaddeus Sturges, and Jonathan Whitlock be a committee to conduct the pulling down and disposing of the old church, and to manage and carry on the building of a new one."

In the mean time, Lieut. Benjamin Smith donated a piece of ground on which to erect a new church, the deed to which was executed in the year following, and bearing date Sept. 20, 1785. The plot thus deeded was on the northeast corner of his home-stead, adjoining the Town Street, and which now comprises the yard in front of the present church. The ground in size was seventy-three feet in length north and south, and forty-three feet wide east and west, and bounded east by the Town Street, north by Nathan Dauchy's land, and south and west by his own land. The conditions were that it should be forever appropriated to the use of said church.

At a meeting held at the house of Capt. Vivus Dauchy, on the 16th day of December, 1784, it was Voted, To reconsider the appointment of the Committee made at the meeting held on the 28th day of October; and that Benjamin Hoyt and Ezekiel Wilson constitute the Committee to carry on the building of said church.

Voted, That the said building shall stand at the north east corner of the Sturtevant lot so called, adjoining the Town Street, in the First Society in Ridgefield, on a piece of ground given by Benjamin Smith for that purpose.

Voted, That the church shall not exceed forty-two feet in length; and that the width and height be in proportion, according to the judgment of the Committee."

The church was subsequently erected on said land, and the size adopted was forty-four feet in length and thirty-two feet in width, the ends facing north and south, with a door on the south and east sides, but without a steeple. A gallery was placed in the south end of the church.

The project of building immediately following the Revolutionary war, when the effort in raising means was difficult from the impoverishment of the people generally in consequence of the war, it was not without struggles, financially and otherwise, that the process of rebuilding was carried forward, and that by slow degrees through a series of years, until it was finally accomplished, for the resources of the parish were limited.

The following are extracts from the parish record at that time:

" At a meeting of the First Episcopal Society in Ridgefield, holden at the house of Capt. VIVUS DAUCHY on the first day of Sept. 1785.

Voted, That Ebenezer Stebbins be a committee, in addition to Benjamin Hoyt, and Ezekiel Wilson, appointed at a former meeting, to manage the building of a Church.

Voted, Adverse, That all persons who have undertaken to get timber for a church, shall have it at the place appointed, by Thursday the 8th inst. September; or the Committee shall not be obliged to accept it in payment of taxes."

At a meeting of the society, held at the house of Capt. Vivus Dauchy, April 27, 1787:

Voted, That said Society shall pay a tax of two pence on the Pound on the List of 1786, into the Treasury of said Society by first day of October next, for the purpose of carrying on the building a Church.

Item, That any person who shall furnish good eighteen inch chest-nut stingle for the Church, shall be allowed one Pound, four shillings per thousand. That good whitewood inch Boards, shall be valued at six shillings per hundred feet, three quarter inch Oak Boards at five shillings and six pence per hundred foot.

Item, That the aforesaid articles shall be delivered at the church in said Ridgefield by the first day of June next; otherwise, the Committee shall not be obliged to take them in payment of taxes towards the building a church."

At a meeting held at the house of Capt. Vivus Dauchy, on the 31st day of September, 1787:

"Voted, That the Society shall pay a tax of four Pence on the Pound on the last of the year 1787, by the first day of April next.

"Voted, That Rye at three shillings and six pence per bushel; Corn at three shillings; Oats at one shilling and six pence; Buckwheat at two shillings per bushel; Flax at seven Pence per pound, shall be taken in payment of said tax."

The church was not comfortably furnished until the year 1791, and the entire ground-floor was not occupied with pews until some time after the church was used for divine service; and at a meeting held March 30, 1791, it was "Voted, That we will sell the lots for the pews in the church," and also "Voted, That they shall be sold at public vendue to the highest bidder." It was voted, also, "that the committee appointed to carry on the finishing of the church shall lay out the lots for the pews in the same, and advertise and sell them as before directed, when and at what time they think proper. Benjamin Hoyt and Joshua Burt were said committee."

At a meeting held April 17, 1794, a committee was appointed to superintend the building of a pulpit in the church.

At a meeting held April 17, 1799, it was "Voted, That the Society's Committee be directed to procure materials, and build the remaining pews in the church, and charge the same to the Society."

In the year 1819 the church was materially altered and improved, side galleries were built, and a steeple erected on the south end, in style and form the same as the one at the Congregational church. The door at the east side was closed, and in its place a square pew was built and occupied by Abijah Resseguie and others, he then being in manhood's prime, and, although nearly sixty years have rolled away, he still continues in a vigorous old age an honored citizen among us, and also continues to hold, as in years past, the office of one of the wardens of the church.

In the year 1820 an effort was made by the parish to obtain some remuneration for the damage done to the former church edifice during the Revolutionary war. The following is from the parish records:

At a meeting held on the 24th day of April, 1820, it was,

"Voted, That Mr. Jeremiah Mead be an agent for the purpose of preferring a petition in behalf of this parish to the Honorable General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, at their session in May next, praying for a remuneration of damages sustained in consequence of the injury done to the former church belonging to the parish, by being used as a storehouse for provisions by the Commissary, in the time of the Revolutionary War; and that said Agent be empowered and instructed to employ counsel to advocate said petition."

The application, however, proved unsuccessful, and no compensation was ever obtained to cover the loss sustained in consequence of the firing of the church by the British.

In the year 1828 a bell was procured of six hundred pounds' weight and placed in the tower of the church,—the first one owned by the parish.

The church edifice never having been consecrated, on the 12th day of November, 1831, the Right Rev. Bishop Brownell visited the parish and consecrated it by the name of St. Stephen's Church, and at the same time administered the rite of confirmation to fifty-two persons,—a large number for this parish. It was a year of great religious interest in the church, and sixty new communicants were added in the course of the year, under the successful ministry of the Rev. Charles J. Todd.

In the year 1832 the square pews in the centre of the church were removed, and "slips," or long pews, erected in their stead, the square pews on each side still remaining.

On the 29th day of January, 1841, a meeting was held and measures taken for the erection of a new church, provided a suitable site could be procured. A plot of ground directly in the rear of the church-lot was generously donated by Isaac Jones, the owner of the land adjoining, in size one hundred feet east and west, and eighty-two to eighty-six feet north and south, the deed bearing date Aug. 12, 1841. Mr. Jones had previously given a strip of ground ten feet wide at the south end of the old church-lot. The corner-stone of the present church was laid by the rector, the Rev. Warner Hoyt, in the presence of a number of the clergy and of the inhabitants, on the 12th day of August, 1841. The church was finished and consecrated by Bishop Brownell on the 20th day of September, 1842. The organ—the first one in possession of the parish—was placed in the church and first used at its consecration.

Thus was completed and consecrated the third church in this parish, a little over a century after the erection of the first church edifice. Its dimensions are forty feet in width and fifty-six feet in length, with a projection in front for a vestibule and stairway of five feet, and with the addition afterwards of a chancel of a depth of fifteen feet, making the entire present length of the church seventy-six feet.

Tablets were also placed in the walls of the church in commemoration of two venerable laymen of the parish,—one to Samuel Stebbins, Esq., the other to Nathan Dauchy, both firm and zealous supporters of the church in all its vicissitudes; the former a distinguished and useful citizen of the town as well as of the parish, for forty years the town clerk, and during a period of forty-six years the parish clerk and for over forty years the senior warden of the church.

In the month of August, 1851, the bell now in use, and weighing fifteen hundred and eight pounds, from the foundry of Menckly & Sons, of West Troy, N. Y., was placed in the tower of the church, the old one having been disposed of to a neighboring church in Georgetown.

In the year 1857 measures were taken for an extensive alteration and improvement in the church, the building of a chancel, alteration of the pews, and to be so arranged as to admit of a centre aisle, coloring and frescoing the walls, the procuring of a new organ from the manufactory of George Jardine, of New York, of a sweet tone and finish, all of which improvements were at an expense of about two thousand dollars. The church was reopened with appropriate services by the Right Rev. Bishop Williams, assisted by a number of the neighboring clergy, including former rectors of the parish.

In the summer of 1875 the organ was enlarged by the addition of several stops and one hundred and twenty-six new pipes, making the present number of sixteen stops and four hundred and fifty pipes, the addition nearly doubling its capacity.

The parish has a fund of a little over three thousand dollars, the income of which is devoted towards the support of the ministry.

The first efforts made towards the creation of a fund for the support of the ministry in the parish was in 1836, when Nathan Dauchy, Esq., of Troy, N. Y., a native of this town, made an offer for that purpose on condition that the parish would raise a like amount. In order to avail themselves of his generous offer, they used persevering exertions and raised the sum of twelve hundred dollars, to which he added a like amount. This, with later benefactions from other sources, increased the fund to its present amount,—three thousand and fifty dollars.

In the year 1869 a legacy was received by the bequest of the late Nancy Smith, of Norwalk, formerly of Ridgefield, of five hundred dollars, the income of which is to be used in aid of the poor of the parish.

It is also possessed of a convenient parsonage, built in 1853, with a glebe of four acres, in the central part of the village, of a valuation of about six thousand dollars.

The first building erected for a parsonage was in 1838, upon a piece of ground containing one acre, appropriated by the late Philip Bradley, in the northern part of the village street, and which, with improvements, is now the residence of Gould Rockwell. It was built by a stock company and occupied by the clergy until it was afterwards sold and the present one erected, more contiguous to the church.

The first wardens of the church of whom there is any existing record—that of 1788—were Benjamin Hoyt and Dr. David Perry. Dr. Perry was also the clerk and treasurer of the parish from the commencement of its permanent record in 1784 until his admission to holy orders in 1789. The present wardens of the church are Keeler, Dauchy, and Abijah Resseguie, who have served the church in that capacity for a series of years, Mr. Dauchy having served the church as a vestryman, parish clerk, and in his present office for nearly half a century. During a period of thirty-three years he has been a warden of the church.

The likeness of nearly all the rectors of the present century are placed on the walls in the vestry-room. On the left hand of the chancel is a memorial window to the Rev. Warner Hoyt, under whose zealous rectorship the present church was built, and who is the only one of its clergy thus far who has been removed by death while in charge of the duties of the parish.

Among the many persons not heretofore named, with two or three exceptions, as among the early and prominent supporters of the church who have passed away may be named the following: Caleb Lobbell, Vivus Dauchy, Jacob Resseguie, Ezekiel Wilson, John Jones, Ebenezer Stebbins, Hackaliah Burt, Eliphalet Brush, Nehemiah Sturges, Epenetus How, Jeremiah Smith, Jacob Dauchy, Benjamin Sherwood, Benjamin Smith, Jeremiah Mead, Daniel Jones, Timothy Jones, Isaac Olmsted, Thaddeus Olmsted, David Burr, Samuel B. Grumman, Czar Jones, John M. Smith, Philip Northrop, William Sherwood, Stephen Olmsted, Walter Dauchy, Chauncey Olmsted, William Crocker, and others. Of the above, Jacob Dauchy served as a warden of the church twenty-three years, and John M. Smith for a period of twenty-seven years.

The first instance in which the rite of confirmation was administered was in 1809, when Bishop Abraham Jarvis visited the parish and confirmed eighty-six persons, which, with those confirmed on subsequent episcopal visitations, makes the entire number of five hundred and ten persons confirmed in this church to the present time. The parish at the present time numbers eighty-five families, about two hundred and fifty baptized members, and one hundred and forty communicants.

The first year in the history of the parish in which it was enabled to avail itself of a resident clergyman with constant services was in 1837, under the rectorship of the Rev. Eli Wheeler, who remained until 1839, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Warner Hoyt, who entered upon the regular charge of the parish and was the first occupant of its first parsonage, just erected; and the parish has been favored with the undivided services of all succeeding clergymen to the present time.

The ministrations of all the preceding clergy, from the year 1789, when the Rev. David Perry assumed the charge of the parish, until the year 1837, were in connection with other parishes. The Rev. David Perry served the churches in Ridgefield and Danbury a portion of the time. His successors—the Rev. David Butler, the Rev. Elijah G. Plumb, and the Rev. Reuben Hubbard—each had charge of the three churches of Ridgefield, Danbury, and Redding, giving an equal time to each.

The Rev. Charles Smith, the Rev. Origen P. Holcomb, and the Rev. Charles J. Todd each had charge of the churches in Wilton and Ridgefield, residing in Wilton and devoting two-thirds of the time to Wilton and one-third to Ridgefield. The Rev. Jacob Lyman Clark took the charge of the church in Ridgefield in connection with that of New Canaan, ministering half the time in each until 1837 and residing in New Canaan, when he accepted a call to the church in Waterbury, Conn., which brings us to the period when constant services were secured to the parish, under the Rev. Eli Wheeler, as has been before mentioned.

The following are the inscriptions upon tablets in the church :

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The extensive religious revivals that preceded and followed the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church at the Christmas Conference held in Baltimore, Md., 1784, prepared and raised up young men who became evangelists and were sent by Rev. Francis Asbury, traveling bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to various parts of the United States.

As early as 1787 the Rev. Cornelius Cook preached in Ridgefield, and Ambrose Olmstead, Jr., received the following certificate :

"To whom it may concern: These certify that Ambrose Olmsted, Jr., is a constant attendant at public worship (as opportunity offers) with the people called Methodists, and that he contributes his due proportion toward maintaining said worship & ministry.

"Certified by me,
CORNELIUS COOK,
"Minister of the M. E. Church.

"Recorded Dec. 1st, 1787, by Benjamin Smith, Congregational Society's Clerk."

At the first Methodist Conference held in New York City, June, 1789, the Rev. Jesse Lee, from Virginia, was sent to the Stamford Circuit, in New England. His first sermon was preached in Norwalk, on the highway, June 17, 1789. He formed a two weeks' circuit, embracing Stamford, Norwalk, Fairfield, Stratford, Milford, Redding, Danbury, Ridgefield, and other intermediate places, and the name was changed to Fairfield Circuit. Mr. Lee preached his first sermon in Ridgefield, probably on the 26th of June, 1789, in a building known as the "Independent School-house," situated near Mr. P. C. Lounsbury's house, formerly owned by Nehemiah Perry, M.D.

On Thursday, Jan. 28, 1790, the first "class" was formed in Ridgefield, being the third in New England, and was composed of Ichabod Wheeler and wife and Daniel Keeler and wife, at Limestone, at the house of Ichabod Wheeler, near Taylor's Mill, which continued to be a preaching-place for some years.

On the 27th of February, 1790, Elder Jacob Brush and Revs. George Roberts and Daniel Smith came from Maryland to labor under direction of Mr. Lee, who extended his labors eastward to New Haven.

The early records of the society being lost, it is impossible to ascertain who were the early members of the Methodist Society in Ridgefield, but we find in the records of the Congregational Society that certificates similar to the one above quoted were issued by "Jesse Lee, Methodist preacher," to Jeremiah Olmstead, of Ridgebury, Oct. 17, 1789; also, April 1, 1790, by Rev. George Roberts, to Ichabod Wheeler; Dec. 24, 1790, by Rev. John Bloodgood, to Daniel Keeler;

* The above were missionaries of the "Society in England for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts" previous to the Revolutionary war, and officiated at Ridgefield in connection with other stations or at intervals.

March 30, 1797, to Stephen Mills, Powell Batterson, and Jonathan Stevens; March 27, 1798, John Mills; Dec. 10, 1804, Thaddeus Benedict; Dec. 10, 1804, Joseph Mead (3d); Nov. 5, 1805, Saml. Hoyt (2d); Dec. 7, 1805, Abijah Hyatt; March 31, 1806, Benjamin Bouton; Aug. 6, 1807, Martha Bouton; Nov. 23, 1807, Jabez M. Gilbert; March 23, 1808, Danl. Dean; Nov. 14, 1809, Amos Baker, M.D.

For several years there was no preaching upon the Sabbath by the "circuit-preachers," but this vacancy was most acceptably filled by the frequent and voluntary labors of Absalom Day, of Norwalk, Aaron Sanford and Hawley Sandford, of Redding, Rory Starr, of Danbury, "local (or lay) preachers," and James Coleman, "superannuated," of Ridgefield, whose name and labors have been handed down in grateful remembrance to the children of the fathers. "Classes" were formed in North Street in 1805, in the village in 1809, and from 1807 to 1826 the houses of Thomas Hyatt, Jabez M. Gilbert, and Amos Baker, M.D., were the regular preaching-places of the "Methodist itinerants."

In 1824 the first church edifice was erected, standing in the fork of the roads leading to the districts called North Street and Titicus, and the "circuit" appears under the name of "Redding and Bridgeport." Frequent revivals of religious interest had occurred, especially in the years 1816, 1822, and 1828. In 1831 a more extensive and powerful work was experienced, resulting in large additions to all the churches. Among the converts was Mr. William Crocker, who soon became a very acceptable and useful "local preacher."

The following is a list of the ministers sent by the New York Conference to the circuits embracing Ridgefield from the year 1790 to 1836, at which date Ridgefield became a station, with a resident minister.

In 1836, as above stated, Ridgefield was separated from other appointments and became a "station," having as its pastor Rev. Parmelee Chamberlain, who remained two years, and at the close of his labors reported a membership of one hundred and eighteen, "probationers" included.

In the year 1839 occurred the most extensive religious awakening in the history of the church, under the ministry of Rev. Thomas Sparks. The curiosity of the community to hear the "experience of a converted sailor"—Rev. George C. Bameroff—drew large audiences. But the relation of these "experiences" was accompanied by such spiritual power, and enforced by such vivid declaration of divine truth and the clear and logical arguments concerning the truths of the gospel, as presented by Rev. Paul R. Brown, that many who came through curiosity were deeply convinced of the truth, resulting in the conversion of large numbers and the increase of the membership of all the churches in the village.

The large accession to the Methodist Church and congregation made it necessary to provide a larger place of worship. Accordingly, in the year 1841, the house now standing on the corner of Main and Caatoonah Streets was erected, during the pastorate of Rev. Charles Chittenden. The humble beginnings of ninety years ago are represented to-day by a membership of nearly two hundred.

Nor has the influence of this church been confined to this vicinity alone. Other towns and the distant West have heard the gospel preached by the sons of those fathers and mothers. Revs. Stephen Remington, Thomas B. Rockwell, William Crocker, Albert Nash, Elias Gilbert, Alonzo B. Pulling, Miles N. Olmsted, and Frank W. Lockwood have been sent forth from her bosom as chosen ministers of God, while the plains of India have been hallowed by the self-sacrificing labors and early death of Mrs. S. Minerva Downey, daughter of Rev. Thomas B. Rockwell.

The following list of names is of those ministers who have been stationed in Ridgefield from 1836 to 1878: 1836-37, Rev. Parmelee Chamberlain; 1838-39, Rev. Thomas Sparks; 1840, Rev. Seymour Van Deusen; 1841-42, Rev. Charles Chittenden; 1843-44, Rev. Abram S. Francis; 1845-46, Rev. Charles Stearns; 1847-48, Rev. Sylvester S. Strong; 1849-50, Rev. Nathaniel Mead; 1851, Rev. The history of this church would not be complete without reference especially to one to whose tireless labors, consistent life, and godly example the church is indebted more than to any other person for its growth and influence in the community,—Jabez M. Gilbert. The "Methodist itinerant" came preaching a universal atonement, man's moral agency, a full, free, and perfect salvation from sin, the new birth, the knowledge of the "witness of the Spirit," the duty of holiness of life. These truths met the wants of his soul; he accepted them, hesitated not to join the little band of like faith, demonstrated by a long and consistent life the truth of the doctrine he professed, and died leaving a vacancy not soon to be filled. A man of firm convictions, strong will, stern integrity, deep and ardent sympathies, liberality equal to and often beyond his means, the church found in him a reliable leader, a wise counselor, a constant and liberal supporter, the poor a cheerful and open-hearted benefactor, and the community a recognized example of consistent piety.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The Congregational Church in Ridgebury was organized in the month of January, 1769. It was composed of eighteen members, "professing the doctrine and practicing the discipline agreed upon by the General Association of the Churches of Connecticut at their meeting in Saybrook, 1708."

It appears from the records that meetings for public worship were held as early as 1760, in what was called the "New Patent meeting-house," which was probably built as early as 1738, but there was no settled pastor until 1769, when a council of the associated pastors and elders of the Western District of Fairfield County—composed of Revs. Jonathan Ingersoll, Robert Silliman, Moses Mather, Samuel Sherwood, Seth Pomroy, Hezekiah Ripley, and Ebenezer Davenport, together with the following nine messengers: Mr. Joseph Bishom, of Stamford; Joseph Platt, Esq., Norwalk; Lieut. Nathan Olmsted, Ridgefield; Mr. Stephen Godfrey, Green's Farms; Capt. Elisha Albert, Greenfield; Lieut. Nehemiah Mead, Wilton; Theophilus Fitch, Esq., Canaan; Deacon Daniel Andrews, Norfield; Ensign Nathan Read, Middlesex—was convened and the church organized.

At the time of its organization the church consisted of the following eighteen members: Rev. Samuel Camp, Jabez Smith, Isaiah Birchard, James Northrop, John Rockwell, Daniel Coley, David Rockwell, Timothy Benedict, Samuel Keeler, Lemuel Abbott, Samuel St. John, John Joyce, Jonathan Osborn, Samuel Gates, James Sears, John Barber, Thomas Frost, and Thomas Wilson; and the Rev. Samuel Camp was ordained and installed as their first pastor.

Mr. Camp's salary was "seventy-five pounds lawful money annually." The society also voted to give him one hundred and fifty pounds for his settlement, to be paid in three equal annual instalments. Mr. Camp continued his labors with the church until 1804,—a period of over thirty-five years,—when he was regularly dismissed. He died in Ridgebury March 10, 1813.

After the dismissal of Mr. Camp the church was without a settled pastor until 1821, when Rev. Nathan Burton was installed as pastor. He continued until June, 1841,—a period of nearly twenty years. Mr. Burton was a member of the church in Ridgebury, and was chosen deacon in 1813. After serving in that capacity for eight years he resigned the office, in October, 1821, to become pastor of the church. He died in August, 1859, aged seventy-nine years.

Mr. Burton was succeeded by Rev. Zalmon B. Burr, of Westport, Conn. He was ordained and installed in June, 1843, and remained with the church seven years. After Mr. Burr the society engaged the services of Rev. Martin Dudley, who preached about a year.

The next settled pastor was Rev. Philo Canfield, of Buffalo City Presbytery. He commenced his labors in August, 1852, and was installed in September of the same year. Mr. Canfield continued his relations with the church until the spring of 1856, when the connection was dissolved. In August of the same year Rev. William W. Page was employed to preach for the society one year as a supply. From September, 1859, to September, 1861, Rev. E. S. Huntington, of Danbury, preached for the society. Mr. Huntington was succeeded by Rev. F. J. Jackson, who preached nearly a year.

At a special meeting of the church, convened for that purpose, December, 1862, a call was extended to Rev. John E. Elliott, of Barkhamsted, Conn. Mr. Elliott accepted the call, commenced his labors in February, 1863, and was ordained and installed in May following. He remained with the church but two years or thereabouts.

In the autumn of 1867, Rev. Augustus Alvord, of Bolton, Conn., commenced preaching for the church, and remained with them until August, 1871, four years, preaching as a stated supply, and in September of the same year (1871) Rev. William M. Parsons, of Brooklyn, N. Y., was invited to supply the pulpit. The invitation was accepted, and Mr. Parsons has continued his labors with the church until the present time.

Mr. Camp, the first pastor of the church, was a native of Salisbury, Conn. But little is known of the results of his labors. He left on record the names of thirty-five children of members of the church baptized by him from 1769 to 1799, none of whom are now living, so far as known. Mr. Burton also records the names of some twenty "children of believing parents" baptized by him. Of those baptized in infancy by Mr. Burton, but one is a member of the church at the present time or residing in Ridgebury, though several are known to be living elsewhere.

During the long interval between the dismissal of Mr. Camp and the settlement of Mr. Burton services were regularly held in the church, the pulpit being supplied by neighboring ministers or a sermon read by some person of the congregation appointed for that purpose; and from 1813 to 1817 a season of special religious interest was enjoyed, thirty-four members being added to the church by a public profession of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

The labors of Mr. Burton were highly appreciated by the church and eminently blessed of God. From 1821 to 1843, which covers the whole period of his ministry as pastor, one hundred and fourteen were added to the church, of whom "some remain unto this present, but the greater part are fallen asleep."

During the pastorate of Mr. Burr, 1843 to 1850, eight new members were added. From 1850 to the close of Mr. Canfield's pastoral relations with the church, in 1856, twenty were added. From 1856 to the present time the additions to the church have been "few and far between,"—only seventeen in the whole twenty-two years.

There have been nineteen deacons of the church since its organization in 1769, of whom but one, Deacon James E. Hayt, remains. In October, 1762, the Ecclesiastical Society of Ridgebury bought the land on which the church now stands of John Whitlock. The consideration was "the love and respect I have and do bear unto said Dissenting Society in Ridgebury."

Previous to this time, it is said, an old Congregational church of some kind stood on the hill about half a mile south of the present house of worship. This was probably the "New Patent meeting-house" before alluded to. But in August, 1768, the society voted to build a "church" forty-six feet long by thirty-six feet wide, to be "shingled with cedar shingles, and sided with chestnut or oak." It was further voted that "the new house shall stand facing the east, and be finished by the first day of July, 1769."

In February, 1784, it was voted "that we will do something towards making the meeting-house more comfortable and convenient," and in 1793 a committee was appointed to "mark out the meeting-house into pews and sell them, and to lay out the money that shall arise therefrom on the house." The congregation worshiped on rough wooden benches for twenty-four years before the pews were built, and listened to golden truths preached from a plain wooden pulpit. There were no stoves except such as the more elderly females brought with them on the Sabbath, and these were always replenished with fresh coals from the neighboring fireplaces during the intermission. The house was without plastered walls, but we never heard that any of the congregation complained of the cold. After the introduction of pews, the two—known as No. 5—on each side of the pulpit were reserved as "honorary pews," and the two—No. 11—"under the stairs" as "spare pews."

During the brief service of a Mr. Perkins, who supplied the pulpit for nearly a year after the dismissal of Mr. Camp, it was voted, in October, 1804, that "persons of other persuasions may come and hear Mr. Perkins preach."

At a meeting of the society held Nov. 30, 1818, it was voted "that the Society grant liberty to the town of Ridgefield to hold their Town-Meeting in the Meeting-House in said Ridgebury for one Meeting."

During the summer of 1816, and again in 1834, the society repaired the meeting-house built in 1768, very much improving its external appearance, and in 1838 they also thoroughly repaired the interior, entirely removing the wall, pews, and pulpit, supplying their places with new walls, convenient slips, and a desk of more modern style. They also closed the doors on the north and east, leaving but one entrance to the church.

In the spring of 1832 the society purchased ten acres of land, with the buildings standing thereon, for a parsonage, and Feb. 12, 1838, they sold the same to David Hamford, of Norwalk, Conn.

In the year 1844 the present pleasant and convenient parsonage-house was erected on a plot of ground four rods by twenty, presented to the society by Mr. David Hamford and the late Gamaliel N. Benedict, Esq.

The "old church," which had stood as a sort of moral lighthouse for more than eighty years, and which had been the spiritual birthplace of so many souls, was finally demolished, and a new house thirty by forty-six feet erected in its place, which was dedicated, with appropriate exercises, to Almighty God in 1851. It is well furnished, with a bell weighing nine hundred pounds, a melodeon, etc., and, though there is but a feeble remnant of the church left, yet the Word of God is faithfully preached every Sabbath and the ordinances of the gospel regularly administered.

Legacies have been left the society at different times, amounting in the aggregate to over seven thousand dollars, the income from which is appropriated to the support of the gospel and other current expenses of the church.

In former years the business of "hutting" and shoemaking was extensively carried on in Ridgebury, which gave employment to a large number of people, male and female. At the present time there is no manufactory of any kind in the place, and the Protestant population is somewhat diminished.

Located near the church is a beautiful cemetery, containing an acre or more of ground. A part of it was used for burial purposes years before the Revolutionary war, and contains the bones of some of its heroes. Within a few years it has been twice enlarged and inclosed by a neat and substantial iron fence. It is now one of the pleasantest rural cemeteries of its size in the State.

An old burial-ground belonging to the Episcopal Society was located on the south and east of their church edifice, on the hill three-quarters of a mile south of the present cemetery, a century and a half ago. In 1860 several of the old tombstones were standing. At the present time none of them remain.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

An Episcopal congregation existed in the society in the northern part of the town called Ridgebury in the early part of the last century, and services were held contemporary with those in Ridgefield. It appears from the printed reports of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel" that prior to 1731, and for some time afterwards, Ridgefield, Ridgebury, and the Oblong (Salem) were considered in some sense within the bounds of the parish or mission of Fairfield. The church appears to have been built about the middle of the last century, and was located in an elevated position of the place, on the open space or green about half a mile south of the present Congregational church. The exact date of its erection cannot now be ascertained.

In a letter of the church-wardens and vestrymen of Salem to the Venerable Society in London, dated Aug. 31, 1767, they thus state: "That we formerly united with the brethren of the Church at Ridgefield and Ridgebury, on the borders of the Connecticut Colony, and engaged the Rev. Mr. Clark to read Divine service and sermons to us on Sundays. Since Mr. Clark left us, by the advice of the Rev. Mr. Dibble (of Stamford), and the Rev. Mr. Leaming (of Norwalk), we have employed the worthy Mr. Epenetus Townsend, who hath for some time alternately read to us and the people of Ridgefield and Ridgebury, whose exemplary life, sober conversation, and devout performances of religious offices highly recommended him to our esteem; and as the poor people of Ridgefield and Ridgebury, by the concurrence of the Church Wardens and Vestry in this memorial, hope to be indulged in being included under his care, having formerly a conjunction with some of the neighboring places in the Province of New York, experienced the goodness and compassion of the 'Venerable Society' in appointing the Rev. Mr. Lamson to officiate among them, being many in number, having built a Church in each of those places, Ridgefield but eight, and Ridgebury but four miles from Salem, but at such a distance from Norwalk that they expect but very little service from the Rev. Mr. Leaming; whereupon we have unitedly sent our respective bonds to the Rev. Dr. Auchmuty, of New York, in trust, obliging ourselves to pay in each place, equal to £10 sterling per annum, in the whole amounting to £30 per annum for the time being; and we no longer expect the Society's favor than we shall continue to deserve it."

The Rev. Mr. Townsend accordingly went to England to receive holy orders, and returned in April, 1768. In a letter dated the 29th of September, 1768, he informed the society "that he arrived at his Mission on the 26th of May, 1768, and was kindly received. The church-wardens, also of Salem, in the name of the people belonging to the Mission, have returned thanks to the Society for Mr. Townsend's appointment. At Salem and Ridgefield there are one hundred and fifty church people, at Ridgefield eighty."

In a letter to the society, dated Sept. 29, 1769, he says, "I have constantly performed Divine service equally in my three Churches of Salem, Ridgefield, and Ridgebury; in each of which places people are zealous in their attendance on public worship; and I have the pleasure to observe that through the divine blessing on my labors each of those congregations is somewhat increased."

In the same letter he says, "I beg liberty to request a favor from the Society, which may perhaps be of considerable service to me; the professors of the Church in Conn. are taxed for the support of the Minister of the Church in the same proportion as the Congregationalists for the support of their minister. This tax is levied and collected by the Congregationalists, together with their own, and by them paid to such ministers of the Church as are appointed over them by the Society. Now Ridgefield and Ridgebury being in Conn. the Committee appointed for raising and paying the minister's rate at Ridgebury have been in some doubt whether I am entitled to the rates of the Church people there, because it is certain they were formerly under Mr. Leaming's care, and had no written appointment, or anything from under the Society's hand to convince them that the Society had now included them within this Mission. Should the Ven. Society mention Ridgefield and Ridgebury in an abstract, as parts of my Mission together with Salem; or should they in a letter to the Church Wardens and Vestry of Ridgefield and Ridgebury, or in some other method give assurance that Ridgefield and Ridgebury belong to my Mission, it must be of advantage to me, as it would remove all doubt whether I was by the laws of that Colony entitled to the Church people's rates in those places."

The society's abstracts for 1772 say "that Mr. Townsend, missionary at Salem, states his congregations to be increasing. Hath baptized sixty-two infants and two adults." In 1775 they say "that Mr. Townsend is constant in the performance of his duty in his own parishes, and preaches frequently in the parts adjacent. From Ladyday to Michaelmas he baptized twenty-one infants and one adult, and admitted two new communicants." The abstracts for 1776 add "that one letter from Mr. Townsend, of September 29, 1775, gives the account of his mission, in which he hath baptized thirty infants, buried seven, and married three couple in the preceding half year."

During the interval of the Revolutionary war there was a suspension of services in Ridgebury, as in the other stations, by the departure of the Rev. Mr. Townsend, in July, 1776, as stated in the account of St. Stephen's church. The last services held in Ridgebury of which there is any existing record was in 1779, where we find the following in the Ridgefield parish record:

"At a meeting of the First Episcopal Society in Ridgefield, holden at the Town House on the 22^d day of Sept. 1789, the following occurs among its doings:

"Resolved, That this Society shall pay a tax of two pence on the pound on the list of said Society by the first of March annually to David Perry, as long as he shall serve them in the office of a Minister.

"Resolved, That the Society will consent that said Perry shall go to Ridgebury one quarter of the time."

At a meeting of said society in the year following the above consent, according to the record, was withdrawn.

Thus, after the services of the church had been maintained with more or less frequency nearly half a century in Ridgebury, they appear to have been brought to a close, as far as any existing record remains. Removals and deaths wrought many changes in the congregation. Many of those remaining united with the Ridgefield church. Among its active supporters in the latter period of its history were Dr. John Andreas, the Sherwood families, Dr. Stephen Bennett, Nehemiah Sturges, Eliphalet Brush, and others. The two latter-named families united with the church in Ridgefield, and their constant attendance there is still in the recollection of many of its members.

The church edifice, which stood on the north side of the green, and was about the size of the first one erected in Ridgefield Parish, remained until about the year 1810, when, being much out of repair, it was taken down and its materials disposed of for other purposes, with the exception of a stone, still visible, supposed by many to have been one of the corner-stones. No vestige of its foundation now remains.

THE SCHOOLS.

The first reference to schools found in the town records is in the year 1721, when it was voted that "eight pounds shall be raised for y^e support of a school." The first school-house was erected prior to 1726, and stood in the church-green, near by the present site of the Congregational church. The date of erection of this pioneer house is unknown, but, as stated above, it was prior to 1726, for in that year it was voted to repair the school-house.

This house was occupied until 1743, when the school was removed to the town-house. In 1725 the town was released from paying taxes, "provided they draw no money out of the treasury for the school."

It is evident that various methods were resorted to in the early days for the maintenance of the schools. The following extract will prove of interest:

"At a sheep meeting held in Ridgefield, Dec. 21, 1744, it was voted by a majority that the money coming for the hire of the Sheep the last year shall be given as a bounty to help maintain the town School for ever, and when the money is gathered it shall be delivered to the committee that is appointed to take care of the bounty money given by the Government to support y^e school, And ordered by the above said vote to let out the said money as y^e money is that comes from the government, and to improve the use thereof to pay it towards y^e maintenance of said town school forever.

"Test TIMOTHY KEELER,
 "Clerk."

"This sheep-hire," says Rev. Mr. Teller, "is easily explained. Until about the year 1760 there were a considerable number of sheep in the town, owned by the town,—Mr. Goodrich says about two thousand,—which were kept by a shepherd in the summer months, and regularly twice in the week let to the highest bidder to lay in his plow-land during the night season, which method of enriching the land, it is stated, 'caused the worn land to produce excellent crops of wheat of the best quality.' The money thus obtained was that which was appropriated by the town for school purposes."

The following receipt appears on town records:

"Ridgefield, April 28th, 1743, then received of Capt. Richard Olmstead and Matthew Benedict, Committee of the Donation Money Given by the Government, y^e sum of 25*l*. 14*s*. and 6*d*. in order to pay the School Master. We say we received it, as Witness our hands,

"JOSEPH KEELER,
"JAMES BENEDICT,
 "School Committee."

In 1742 the town by a major vote released the people of the New Patent (Ridgebury) from paying any tax to the town school on condition that they should keep a school among themselves six months yearly.

At this time there was in the town but one school-house, and that was located nearly opposite Mr. Abner Gilbert's residence.

Rev. Samuel Goodrich says in his history of the town, written in 1800, that the schools of the town "are maintained 1st in part by the produce of the sales of lands in Litchfield County by the State and appropriated to the schools. 2nd. By the produce of an excise duty laid on Rum and Tea, but the act, proving unpopular, was never carried into general execution; the money paid in by this town was returned and appropriated for the benefit of schools. 3^d. By the 4th on the thousand, as it is called. 4th. By the produce of the sales of the western lands, and lastly, in case of deficiency, by a tax on the scholars."

Mr. Goodrich also says that the "wages given to masters is from 15 to 18 dollars per month, according to number of scholars and the ability of the teachers. There is taught in our schools Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, and Grammar, some Catechising, and a little manners. It has been remarked that since the visiting committee have attended to their duty our schools are under better regulation and our scholars make greater proficiency. There are a number of young people who have been taught in our schools who have gone into other parts and taught with applause. Board for children is from seventy-five cents to one dollar per week, and tuition from fifty cents to one dollar per quarter."

"At a Town-Meeting held in Ridgefield, March 18th, 1746, at y^e said meeting Serg^t James Northrup by a Major vote was chosen Moderator.

"The s^d meeting by their Major vote do agree and order that there shall be two women Schools be kept from y^e first of April next till y^e first of Octobr ensuing, y^e one of s^d Schools to be kept at y^e Town house and y^e other at y^e house that was built for that purpose, a little northward of Jonah Smith's.

"Test TIMOTHY KEELER,
 "Registr."

"Ridgefield, April y^e 13th, 1749, then Received of Capt. Richard Olmstead, Matthew Benedict, School Com^{tee} of y^e Donation money y^e sum of Twenty six Pounds twelve shillings money in order to pay for y^e keeping School or Schools in testimony here of we do set our hands

"SAM^l SMITH,

"At a Town Meeting held in Ridgefield by Adjournment from Decem^r y^e 18th to Decem^r y^e 21st. An 1753, Matthew Benedict being Moderator, it was Voted in s^d meeting that there shall be two Men Schools kept 3 Months between this time and y^e first of April next one of them at y^e Town house and y^e other at y^e School house near L^d Jonah Smith's. It was also voted in s^d meeting that there shall be three School Mistresses provided and put into Schools y^e first of April next and continue therein until y^e first of October next, one of them to be kept in y^e School house near L^d Jonah Smiths, one of them in y^e Town house, and one of them in or near Ben^{ts} Rockwells house.

"It was voted in s^d meeting that two Men Schools shall be kept by two masters in s^d houses or places where y^e above said men Schools are to be kept) from y^e first of October next till y^e next Annual Town Meeting."

In 1761 five schools were taught in the town,—one at the town-house, one at West Lane, one at Titicus, one at Limestone, and one at Florida.

Dec. 28, 1761, it was "Voted, That there be five Schools kept within the Limits of this Society for three months, viz., one at the house near John Northrops, Jr., one at the Town House, one at the house near Benj^s Stebbins, Jr., one at Limestone; and one near Platt's Mill, Provided there be a sufficient number of scholars at each school, to be Determined by the School Com^{tee} Capt. Daniel Bradley, Aaron Northrup, Tho^s Hawley, Theophilus Stebbins, and Obadiah Platt were Chosen a School Committee.

"Granted a Rate or Tax of three farthings upon the Pound to Defray the Charges of the Schools and Society, to be paid by the first Day of May next.

"John Smith Jr was Chosen a Collector to Collect the Society Rate and pay the same into the Hands of the Com^{tee} that has the charge of the School Bonds viz Sam Olmstead Esq Capt Richard Olmstead and Stephen Smith."

Dec. 22, 1762, it was

"Voted, That there shall be 25 Scholars to attend each School in the Society one Day with the other as long as the Schools are Continued."

On the 20th of December, 1763, at a meeting of the First Ecclesiastical Society, it was voted that the schools be continued the same as the previous year, with the additional clause:

"Liberty is allowed by the Major vote of the meeting to set up Six Schools in the Society at or near the places where they were kept last year and to be kept by Masters for three Months, and each School to draw an equal Share of the ten Shilling upon the thousand allowed by the Government for the use of Schools and the Interest upon the Donation, provided they are kept two months compleat."

On the 14th of December, 1767, it was voted in the said society meeting that the "Society be Divided into Districts for Schooling."

In 1773 it was voted at a society's meeting

"That schools may be kept in the same places, and under the same regulations as last year, with this addition, that each Committee man warn the people in the District where he resides to meet at Time and Place, and the major part of their votes shall Determine who shall be the master to keep their school, and the Committee shall be concluded thereby and hire the master. Said district shall by their major vote order him to hire; and also with this reserve that the district up at Tytchus have Liberty to keep their school at the house near to James Smith's, or at any other place said District shall agree upon."

"At a Town Meeting held April ye 10th 1780 voted "That the Proprietors of the Frame set up for a School House near ye Dwelling house of Jeremiah Wilson may have the privilege of appropriating the present Town house towards finishing said School House, provided the Proprietors of said School House fully vest the Town and the first Society with the privilege of holding all their necessary Town Proprietors, First Society and Freemens Meetings therein and that they (the proprietors of said School House) will finish and compleat said School House and make it Convenient by seating ye same."

The building above referred to was known as the Independent School-House.

"At a meeting of the Proprietors of the Independent School House holden at the House of Widow Clemence Smith on April ye 21st 1786 Silas Hull Moderator and Jacob Smith Junr Clerk protempore of said meeting, Voted "That the proprietors of ye said Independent School House will take and appropriate the now Town House, agreeably to the Vote of the Town Respecting said Town and School House and do wholly and fully Invest the Town with all the Privileges respecting said School House, which are Mentioned in the Town Vote respecting ye same."

This was an advanced school, and for nearly thirty years was taught by Mr. Samuel Stebbins.

At present there are fourteen districts, as follows: No. 1, Scotland; No. 2, Bennett's Farms; No. 3, Limestone; No. 4, Titicus; No. 5, West Mountain; No. 6, Centre; No. 7, West Lane; No. 8, Whipstick; No. 9, Flat Rock; No. 10, Branchville; No. 11, Florida; No. 12, Farmingville; No. 13, North Ridgebury; No. 14, South Ridgebury.

For present condition of schools, see General History.

BURIAL-PLACES.

The first ground set apart for a burial-place was situated immediately west of the present residence of William E. Benedict, and two stones are still to be seen,—one marking the grave of Sarah, wife of Richard Osborn, Esq., and the other that of Capt. Matthew Benedict. The former is the oldest in the town. The following extract is taken from the town records:

"At a Proprietors Meeting held in Ridgefield, Jan. ye 27th 1735-36, By their major vote, Timothy Keeler was chosen Proprietor's Clerk, or Register for ye year ensuing, and sworn according to Law before James Benedict, Justice of ye peace" Jan. ye 27th 1735-36.

"At ye Meeting above s^d the Proprietors by their Major Vote do grant and by their order do appoint for ye town's use a certain Spot or piece of land for their burying place or yard; s^d spot or parcell of Land Lying a little Southward of that lot or homestead that Milford Saml Smith bought of Drunkwaters, and Northward of ye Car-path or Rhode that comes over Titticus river."

This spot is the old portion of the present cemetery. The Ridgebury Cemetery was designated as a burial-place Dec. 17, 1743. The following was the vote of the town:

"The town by their major vote, do allow and order ye spot of land lying at ye North-east corner of Joseph Northrops home lot, in ye New Patent, shall be a burying place for ye people of ye New Patent to bury their dead therein."

CHANGE IN THE BOUNDARY.

In the year 1727 the people of Ridgefield became somewhat exercised over a proposed change in the boundary-line between this town and the State of New York. It was proposed by Connecticut to grant to New York sixty-two thousand acres along its north and south boundaries in exchange for Greenwich and portions of Stamford on the Sound. By this exchange the loss of territory would be so great as to materially weaken the township, and, May 13, 1727, a petition was presented to the General Assembly for the annexation to the town of a gusset of land lying northward, which was granted May 11, 1732.

THE RIDGEFIELD PRESS.

The idea of establishing a newspaper in Ridgefield was conceived by D. Crosby Baxter. The first issue appeared on Jan. 13, 1875, printed on a jobber five by seven in the chase, and was entitled Baxter's Monthly, with the motto, "Tall oaks from little acorns grow." On February 13th it was enlarged to eight by eleven; in March it was further enlarged to eleven by fifteen. In March, 1876, it was enlarged to a quarto sheet, twelve by seventeen, and continued in that form till Sept. 19, 1877, when it was printed on a single sheet, thirteen by twenty, and on the following month still further enlarged to its present size,—viz., twenty-two by thirty-one.

The subscription-list steadily increased from a round dozen on its initial issue until it has now attained a circulation of six hundred copies weekly, which reaches all the States, and with a limited foreign circulation. D. Crosby Baxter is the editor, with whom is associated Charles H. Jarvis, as local.

TOWN-HOUSES.

The first town-house was erected in 1743, at a cost of seventy-nine pounds seventeen shillings:

"The House, voted to be built for ye use of ye Town, is to be constructed in the manner following—viz—to be one Story high, 26 feet long, 18 feet wide, and a chimney at one end, quite across ye house—to be covered with good cedar shingles—3 feet long, if laid upon sawed lath—and if ye shingles be 18 inches or 2 feet—if laid on sawed boards—to be well closed with clapboards and door—two good floors,—to be well ceiled with white wood boards—with three Windows—one of the said windows to be on ye back side of ye house—20 in wide, and two feet long,—ye other two windows, each to have 3 feet and one half of glass—and the e-ement to run into ye wall—a good hearth—a well fastened bench raised within side of ye house—a good lock and key to ye door,—to be well underpinned—ye jaunts and ye top of ye chimney to be well painted—

"The above said house, Gamaliel Northrop hath made an offer to build ye same, according to ye description above mentioned—for 794 17s old tenure, and to be finished by ye first day of December next.—To being paid 500 by ye first of April next, and ye said Gamaliel Northrop do promise.—In witness my hand this 29 day of December, 1743.

"GAMALIEL NORTHROP.

"In presence of

"JOSEPH FOLIOT."

This house, says the Rev. Mr. Teller, in his "History of Ridgefield," 1878, "stood in the southwest corner of Mrs. Irad Hawley's yard, immediately in front of the Congregational lecture-room." In the following year it was removed to a point "south of the pound," which was probably south of Mrs. Nathan Smith's present residence."

This continued to be used both as a school-house and a town-house until 1776, when the old house was given to the proprietors of the Independent school-house to be used in finishing that house, "provided that the said Independent school-house shall be used for town and society meetings."

After the removal of the Independent school-house town-meetings were held in the churches until 1830, when the lower part of the Masonic Hall was made use of for that purpose. Meetings were held here until the erection of the present town-house, which

THE POUND.

The first pound probably stood on the church-green, near the first town-house.

Dec. 24, 1753, it was

"Voted, That there be a new Pound built in y^e lane northward of where David Scott lives—and to be 30 ft. in length and 25 feet in Breadth—and to consist or be built with 4 Sills, 1 Plates, and four new Posts, and eight Raices—all of good Sound White oak timber, hewn Square and well framed together and to be 5 feet between y^e sills and plates."

"Annual Town Meeting legally Warned and holden in Ridgefield on y^e 14th day of December A.D. 1795.

SAMUEL SYDNEY ST. JOHN.

Samuel Sydney St. John traces his descent from the original settler of that name, as shown in the genealogy of the family herewith appended.

His father, Thomas St. John of the seventh generation, married Anna Gray, daughter of Joseph and Lydia (Keeler) Gray, of Ridgebury. Sydney was the only child, and was born Sept. 6, 1806, at Ridgebury. His father removed to New York City when Sydney was twelve years old, remaining there ten years, during which time his son enjoyed the educational advantages of a large city, graduating at Columbia College in 1828. Sydney, soon after graduating, returned to Ridgebury and opened a store. Sept. 13, 1829, he was married to Lucy Amy, youngest daughter of Eliphalet and Eunice (Hull) Brush. Their children were Thomas Platt (deceased), John Watson (deceased), and Mary Anna. The last was married to Smith G. Hunt, and settled at Brewster's, N. Y., where he died, leaving two children, Sydney St. J. and Emeline Keeler Hunt.

In 1832, Mr. St. John removed to Ridgefield village, opening there a classical and commercial school. This school was well patronized by the citizens of Ridgefield and adjoining towns, receiving also many pupils from New York City, many of whom were prepared for Yale and other colleges.

In 1837, Mr. St. John was elected to the Senate from his district. In 1841 he accepted a position in the Mechanics' Society School, New York City, and in 1843 he was appointed principal of the Ward School No. 26, in the Fourth Ward, and intrusted with the care not only of the several departments of that school, but also with the general supervision of the other schools of the ward, comprising, in the aggregate, more than four thousand pupils. This position he held until he left New York, in 1859. He served as commissioner of schools in the Board of Education of the city of New York for the years 1848-49. For seventeen years he was vestryman in the Church of the Epiphany (Rev. Lot Jones), having been confirmed in this church in 1842. In 1859 he returned to his farm in Ridgebury. In 1864 he represented the town of Ridgefield in the Legislature.

In the death of his eldest and only surviving son, which occurred Oct. 13, 1865, Mr. St. John experienced a grievous loss. Thomas Platt St. John was a young man of more than ordinary promise. His death is thus noticed in an obituary: "Thomas Platt St. John graduated at Columbia College at the age of eighteen. His frank and genial nature and well-developed conversational powers made him an agreeable companion to all. Intending himself for the legal profession, on leaving college he entered the law school of New Haven, then under Judge Bissell, and continued there during two terms. Returning to New York, he completed his studies in the office of an eminent lawyer. It was about this time that he entered the arena of politics, and with an enthusiasm seldom found in one so young. At all the gatherings of his party he took a prominent part, advocating what he considered to be right with a fearlessness only equaled by his eloquence. In 1851, when at the age of twenty-one, he represented the Thirteenth Assembly District of the city of New York in the Legislature of that State, and was re-elected the following year. He was an able writer, and contributed frequently to the press in prose and verse, often surprising his immediate circle of friends by the variety and extent of his reading. He was a great admirer of Shakspeare, and would quote with remarkable accuracy voluminous portions of that celebrated author. Preferring the life of a farmer, he accompanied his father on his return to Ridgebury. The death of his wife, in February, 1864, was followed by deep despondency on his part, and a presentiment that he would not long survive her. This proved but too true." . . .

The families of Mr. and Mrs. St. John are true representatives of New England character. As private citizens, discharging their duties in such a manner as to entitle them to the respect of their fellows, and whenever called to positions of trust they have performed their duties with fidelity and integrity.

Thomas St. John was postmaster at Ridgebury from 1835 till his death; was for several years justice of the peace, and member of the Legislature from his town for the years 1832, '33. He died March 4, 1818.

Joseph Gray, a native of Redding, was one of the first to volunteer in the war of the Revolution. He accompanied Arnold in his perilous march through the wilderness, and was present at the execution of the boy deserter at Redding. His brother, Lieut. Nathaniel Gray, was killed in the battle of Ridgefield, April 23, 1777.

Eliphalet Brush was born in New Fairfield. He served in the Revolutionary war, and was the first to fire on the British at the burning of Danbury. His brother Thomas in this action had a bullet pass through the crown of his hat, without, however, injury to the owner. Capt. Brush was at the battle of Long Island, and on its retreat to New York his division encamped in Trinity churchyard. His old "long gun" is still kept in the family as a cherished relic. Capt. Brush was a representative from Ridgefield in the Legislature for 1800 and 1801. He died in 1817, at the age of more than ninety-seven.

Eunice Hull was the eldest daughter of Jedediah and Mary Chapman Hull. Lieut. Hull was at the assault on Quebec, and at the side of Montgomery when that hero fell. Mary Chapman was the daughter of Rev. Daniel Chapman, who was educated at Oxford. He was the son of Hon. Robert Chapman, who came from England with Lords Say, Seal, and Brook. A portrait of Mary Chapman, painted in 1743, is in possession of the family.

Saml. S. Johnson

W. W. BEERS.

Samuel Sydney St. John's earliest predilection was for the law. He was admitted to the bar while residing in New York, and, although never making any pretensions as a practitioner, yet his counsel is often solicited. His last employment at teaching has been to so far revive his classical studies as to enable him to prepare his grandson for Columbia College, where he is now a member of the sophomore class. Mr. St. John is passing the evening of his days in the supervision of his farm, and in the enjoyment of a library well supplied with the works of ancient and modern authors. His farm and its surroundings possess many places of historic interest. On the ridge first east of the Congregational church the French army under Rochambeau encamped while on its way to the decisive conflict at Yorktown; a little to the south stood the house once owned by Samuel Keeler, where Gen. Washington on two occasions spent a night when traveling between Peekskill and Hartford; the house in which he was born and now lives was fired into by the British under Tryon while on their hurried march from Danbury to Ridgefield.

Sept. 13, 1879, Mr. and Mrs. St. John celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage, on which occasion more than one hundred of their kindred were present.

DAVID H. VALDEN.

David H. Valden is of Holland descent, and was born in Ridgefield, June 15, 1828. His father came to the latter place when he was quite a young man and engaged with J. M. Gilbert as a journeyman tanner and currier, having learned the trade previously in Philadelphia.

He was married soon after to Mary, daughter of R. Stevens, of Ridgefield, and their children were Eliza (deceased); Sarah, now Mrs. Wm. Slosson, of New Canaan; Maria, now Mrs. John Robinson, of Danby, N. Y.; Anna, now Mrs. Levi Snyder, living in Michigan; and David H., subject of our sketch.

David H. Valden was taken when an infant by his grandmother, who lived in Tompkins Co., N. Y., and was kept by her until his ninth year, when he returned to Ridgefield. Early thrown upon his own resources, he developed an independence and self-reliance that have made him the man he is. At the age of eighteen he began the trade of his father, that of tanner and currier, and in 1857 he engaged in the business on his own account in that part of the town of Ridgefield called Titticus.

In 1852 he was married to Sarah A., youngest daughter of George and — (Slosson) Weed, of Darien, Conn. Their children—Charles H., Lewis L., and Minnie D.—are living.

In 1857, Mr. Valden purchased the Gilbert tannery at Titticus, together with the farm, water privilege, etc., afterwards buying the Samuel S. Olmstead place, on which he has erected his beautiful residence, a view of which is elsewhere shown in this work.

In 1877, Mr. Valden represented his town in the State Legislature. In politics he is Republican.

Mr. and Mrs. Valden, also their children, are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Ridgefield, to the support of which they liberally contribute.

WILLIAM W. BEERS.

William W. Beers was born in Ridgefield, Conn., Sept. 11, 1821. His father, Lewis Beers, followed farming in Ridgefield. He was married early in life to Rhoda, daughter of Samuel and Rhoda Gregory, of Wilton. William W. was their only son.

William W. Beers enjoyed the best educational advantages the country afforded, and at the age of seventeen began teaching in Ridgefield, teaching afterwards in Bethel and Hawleyville, following the profession for thirteen years.

In 1851 or 1852 he began his career as a merchant in Branchville, where he continued to reside till his death, which occurred very suddenly, Aug. 20, 1879. He began in a small way, at first keeping only lumber, to which he afterwards added coal, then hardware of all kinds, and later a general assortment of crockery.

Mr. Beers was married twice. His first wife was Paulina M. Edmunds, only daughter of Robert and Abbey (Darling) Edmunds, of Ridgefield, Conn. The issue of this marriage was twins, which were named Carrie G. (now Mrs. Lewis L. Valden) and Mary E. For his second wife he married Louisa, daughter of Benjamin and Charlotte (Birchard) Gilbert, of Wilton. Their children have been Louis G. and M. Louisa.

William W. Beers was the first postmaster, also the first station-agent on the Norwalk and Danbury Railroad in Branchville.

Mr. Beers' death cast a gloom over the whole community, of which he was a shining member. All felt that they had lost a valuable friend and the stricken family a loving father. Strictly upright in all his business transactions and rigidly honorable, he was at the same time kindly benevolent, always ready to help the poor and needy, and his door was always open to the worthy but destitute wanderer.

In matters relating to the church Mr. Beers was not active, but contributed liberally of his means to support the gospel. Said the one officiating at his funeral, "I have known the deceased only a year, but at times I have known him to be ardent in his feelings relating to Christianity."

The records also show that at this date James Potter was a physician in the town; David Gorham, merchant; John Hubbel, innkeeper; Thomas Hareton and Abel Wright, blacksmiths; Thomas King and Isaac Ingersoll, shoemakers; and Thatford Holmes, joiner.

PIONEERS.

Among the prominent pioneer families are mentioned the Giddings, Greeleys, Barnes (Squire Barnes was a large landholder), Graves, Gorhams, Hungerfords, Northrup, Lealers, Allens, Wanzers, Wakemans, Barlows.

PHYSICIANS.

Among the first physicians were Drs. Potter, Holmes, John Orton. Daniel W. Northrup practiced here about forty years. John N. Woodruff, M.D., succeeded Northrup, and is still in active practice. He studied his profession with Dr. Northrup and Dr. F. A. Kinch. He spent considerable time in Bellevue Hospital, New York; also attended lectures at Columbia College. In addition to the active practice of an arduous profession Dr. Woodruff is also town clerk and judge of Probate. Dr. Beach practiced here about a year, and removed. Dr. Henry L. Mallory is also a practicing physician here.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1751. The following is a list of ministers: Thomas Lewis, ordained 1744, dismissed 1746; Elijah Sill, ordained 1751, dismissed 1779; Oliver D. Cook, ordained 1792, dismissed 1793; Maltby Gelston, ordained 1797, died 1856; Judson B. Stoddard, colleague pastor, ordained 1845, dismissed 1854. For a number of years ministers were fixed for a year or two. Solomon J. Douglas was ordained October, 1863, and dismissed in 1867. April, 1868, Watson W. Torrey ordained, and dismissed before the year was up, on account of his health. James J. Hoyt was ordained in July, 1870, and dismissed 1874. Edward P. Herrick, ordained in February, 1876, is the present pastor. The following is a list of deacons: Ephraim Hubbell, 1797; Daniel Noble, William Burns, Benjamin Bennett, no date; James Potter, 1795; William Giddings, 1803; Jared C. Potter, 1813; William C. Potter, 1814; Daniel N. Giddings, 1814; Jared C. Potter, 1825; Levi Stuart, 1829 (died 1873); Edwin Hungerford, 1870 (died 1879); Hugh Gelston, 1848. Maltby G. Gelston, Theodore C. Rogers, and George C. Giddings were appointed in 1879.

"I have no means of knowing," says Rev. Hugh Gelston, "who the members were previous to the ordination of Rev. M. Gelston, April 26, 1797. At that time they were Deacon James Potter, Jedediah Graves, Joseph Giddings, William Giddings, and Thomas Kellogg, males; Alice Hubbell, Mary Towner, Abigail Potter, Ruth Graves, Deborah Barnes, Ruth Aekley, Mary Giddings, Mary Kellogg, Lydia Giddings, and Esther Wilcox, females. The present number of members is one hundred and thirty-nine.

"The first church was erected about 1770. The present church was erected in 1836.

"The number of members continued to increase from time to time until 1821, when a revival added thirty-two. There was a revival in 1831 which added forty-four, and there were added, in 1838, sixty-nine, and in 1841 there were one hundred and thirty-eight members."

UNION CHURCH.

The church now called the Union church of Sherman was built in about 1836 or 1837 by subscription. Time came when the old church building needed repairing, and some of the members insisted upon having it removed, while others desired it repaired on the same site. The fight became a bitter one, and many of those living remember the length to which the controversy was carried and the amusing incidents connected with the affair.

ST. POLYCARP'S CHURCH.

Dec. 22, 1866, an Episcopal Church was organized here under the name of St. Polycarp's Church, with the following members: John N. Woodruff, Charles Pepper, G. N. Woodruff, William B. Pepper, Royal W. Briggs, L. N. Blydenburgh, D. B. Mallory, and N. E. Northrup. The corner-stone of the edifice was laid, when some trouble arose, and the building was never completed. Services were held here by Rev. E. L. Townsend, the rector at Danbury. A Mr. Peck also held occasional services at this place.

There is also a Christian Church in the southern part of the town, but we have been unable to procure any data concerning it, although diligent inquiry has been made.

RECOLLECTIONS OF MORGAN STUART.

The following article is from the pen of Morgan Stuart, formerly a resident of this town, now residing in Milan, Ohio. It was prepared expressly for this work.

In the extreme northwestern corner of Fairfield County, in the State of Connecticut, is the town of Sherman. Its history commences in the year 1802. At that time the town of New Fairfield was divided, and the northern part was set off and formed the town of Sherman. The first town-meeting was held in 1803, when I suppose the town was organized.

It must be admitted that there is little about the natural features of the country that would attract the attention of a stranger. The land is rough and broken, made up largely of hill-side and valleys, the former so steep often as to make the cultivation of the soil difficult, and many other parts so stony as to require a large amount of labor and expense in their removal, as the long lines of stone wall show. The soil is generally fertile, and yields the farmer a fair return for his labor and toil. The land is well watered with brooks of clear running water, coming down the mountain slopes, and many a pretty waterfall may be seen on the steep rocky hillsides as the smaller streams make their way to the beautiful meadow-lands below. As will be supposed, it would require patient, untiring industry and economy to enable the owners of these lands to meet the expenses of the family and the education of the children.

This they were able to do, and in addition they were often able to lay by each year a small surplus for future use. In fact, there was seen a thrift and often an independence in means beyond what was enjoyed by others in more favored sections of the country. A small sum, as I stated, would be laid by each year, with which a few acres were added to the farm, or the money was put out at interest. I have seldom seen a people among whom more real comforts were enjoyed.

I need hardly say that the school and the church were among the prominent things in the minds of all good citizens in Connecticut. The people in this town were celebrated for their support of the common or district school, and every child, rich or poor, at suitable age, was gathered into the school-room.

The school-houses would not compare with those of the present day. They were not in the highest style of architecture or of much artistic beauty, and with few equipments like those of modern times. There was no claim to ornament, no cornice, no blinds, and the interior equally without attractions, and I might say without comfort. A monstrous fireplace built of rough stone at one end of the room, well filled with wood, really furnished all the heat that was needed; but it was unequally distributed; it was too hot on one side of the house and on the other too cold. "Please let me go to the fire" was often heard, and was often not an unreasonable request. Coarse oak-slab benches, without backs, in the centre of the room, and writing-tables around the outside, with the same kind of seats in front, with a plain board table for the teacher, constituted the main furniture of the school-room sixty or seventy years ago. With all these drawbacks, good instruction was given, and by earnest application of the pupils a good and substantial education was secured, preparing some for the more common business of life, and others for the higher schools and colleges, from which went out some of the highest talent seen in our learned professions.

These district schools received the attention of our best men, clergy and others. Our pastor, Mr. Gelston, made it his business to look after their interests, visiting all the schools in the township four times a year, noting the standing of each pupil at the beginning of the term, and the progress each had made at subsequent visits. These examinations were very critical, and were interspersed with remarks and suggestions of great practical value, as he had a taste decidedly in this direction. As he was about to leave he would invariably address the teacher in these words: "Are you ready for prayers, sir?" The reader will notice that he did not ask the teacher if it would be agreeable to him; he was not consulted on this point. The thought that an objection could be raised as to the propriety of such an exercise—or I might say whether the Bible should be read in the school—had not been thought of then. It was left for almost the close of this nineteenth century to start a doubt whether God should be acknowledged in the institutions for the instruction of our children and youth. The most profound attention and stillness prevailed as that minister addressed the throne of grace, invoking the blessing of Almighty God on the parents, the teacher, and the children. Who can doubt the salutary influence of such a man in all the schools in the town as four times a year he repeated such a visit?

It would not be possible to name all the families or persons who were prominent in the early history of this town, or who were so fifty or sixty years ago, which is about the date of these recollections. A few only can be mentioned. There were four brothers by the name of Allen,—Gideon, Samuel, John, and James,—who were more or less prominent in the building up and welfare of the church and society in its early history. Gideon, I believe, was the largest contributor to the society's fund for the support of the minister. I am informed that the communion service now in use by the Congregational Church was a gift from him a long time ago. James Allen was also a warm friend of the society, and contributed liberally to its support. The other two brothers, I believe, also gave in smaller sums for the support of religion.

Mr. David Northrop, who lived about two miles north of the centre of the town, deserves to be mentioned as one of the early settlers. He had six sons, all of whom became prominent business men, and worthy and useful citizens. Only two of them are now living. Mr. Thomas Northrop, who has long resided in Vermont, during the last year paid a visit to his native place, and walked all the way from Gaylordsville, four miles, although he is eighty-four years old. Mr. John O. Northrop only resides in Sherman, and is a worthy representative of the family. There are other families of the same name who are worthy of particular notice, but the scope of this article will not admit of it.

In the north part of the town were several families of the name of Giddings. There was Baldwin, Samuel, David, George, Daniel, Jonathan, and Andrus. They were all men of real worth, possessing all the substantial qualities that make good citizens in an eminent degree. I think all, or nearly all, were Christian men, and their families such as go to make up the best society. "They all died in like faith, having received the promises and embraced them."

There were also the names of Graves, Barnes, Hubbell, Briggs, Potter, Hungerford, and Stuart, worthy of honorable mention. The two last were very numerous, and acted an important part in the early history of the town, but upon whom I have not the time to dwell. Dr. John Orton, for a long time our principal physician and a man without reproach, should also be noticed. William Giddings, Esq., near the centre of the town, was one of our most intelligent citizens, with a numerous and highly respected family. They removed, in 1830, to the State of Michigan, where several of them filled places of importance and responsibility. One of these I shall have occasion to again mention in the course of this article.

Another name—a name above all others I have mentioned—must have a place in these reminiscences. Without the name of Gelston no history of Sherman fifty or sixty years since would be complete. His long life and works are so interwoven with all its best interests and prosperity that it is essential; in fact, it could not be omitted, and no one would wish to have it omitted. Back to my earliest recollections the Rev. Maltby Gelston was the worthy pastor of the Congregational Church, which was almost the only church at that time in the town. He was highly educated, refined in all his tastes, dignified in his deportment, polite in his manners, and, so far as I could see, perfect in his life and example. Those of us who were in early life felt towards him the highest respect,—I may say, a kind of veneration. He was not accustomed to use superfluous words, was precise in all he did or said, in conversation, in the pulpit, and everywhere. Every word was in its proper place and the best that could be used. No jesting or trifling was expected in his presence.

On one occasion a young man sought his advice in an important matter as to his future business for life. After stating his case with great care he said, "Now, Mr. Gelston, I want your caudid opinion." Mr. Gelston replied with some warmth, "Mr. Pickett, you will have my caudid opinion if you have any, sir." This was said in a tone of voice and manner that convinced Mr. Pickett that he had made a mistake. He was wise in counsel, and his opinion was often sought where important interests were involved, both in the church and in the common business of life. In ecclesiastical assemblies no one stood higher, and he was often appointed to preside in their meetings.

While Mr. Gelston was not an eloquent man in the general acceptance of that term, there was added to the words he spake the power of an example as near perfect as is ever seen; and it may be added that no congregation or church was better instructed in the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, or, when brought under conviction by the Spirit of God, had clearer views of their duties or what it meant to become a Christian and the responsibilities of a Christian life.

Those converted under his preaching less frequently fell away, but were firm in their Christian hope, and sustained well the profession they had made.

Two services were held in the church on the Sabbath,—one at 10.30 A.M. and the other in the afternoon, after an intermission of an hour. It may be of interest to some to know what the programme was at that early day, and I will describe it as it was on a single Sabbath. It was winter; snow several feet deep covered the ground; the mercury was nearly at zero. Many came from a distance. Sleighs drove up to the door, and the inmates entered the building; others arrived on foot. The room was cold, as there was no fire; stoves for churches had not been much thought of. The room was divided into square pews; on one side of each was the door for entrance, and on the other three sides there were seats with high, straight backs. Of course some of the audience sat with their backs to the speaker, which was quite awkward and unpleasant. I stated there was no fire in the room. This is not strictly true. The women's foot-stoves were the exception. These were filled with live coals when they left their homes, and were passed around to different ones in the pews; so a small degree of warmth was enjoyed.

The morning service was closed. Most of the people lived miles away. They went to the nearest houses to spend the hour, eat their lunch, replenish their stoves with fresh coals, and then return to the church for the second service. This was much like the forenoon, only at its close and after the benediction they seemed loath to leave. The minister then draws from the Bible a slip of paper, and reads as follows: "A marriage is intended between Mr. John Laurence, of New Preston, and Miss Mary Smith, of this place." With smiling faces they then left the church. This marriage notice, or publication, was required by the laws of the State at that early day.

There were dark periods in the history of that church while Mr. Gelston was its pastor. It was from the beginning small,—only twenty members. One after another had died; only a few had been added. Finally, the last deacon had been called away by death, and there seemed no one with which the vacancy could be filled. Just at this time a relative called to spend a Sabbath. It was communion that day. They gathered once more around the table to commemorate the dying love of the Redeemer. Our pastor, after he had broken the bread and poured the wine, left his seat and passed the elements with his own hand. After the close of the service the friend inquired with surprise, "Why, my dear brother, where were all your officers to-day?" He replied with deep emotion "I have none. God took from me some time since my last deacon. I trust to-day he is sitting down to the marriage-supper of the Lamb." "Why don't you appoint some, then?" He replied, "I have no material in the church suitable for the place."

In one of my visits to my venerable friend I sat down by his side and listened to this sad story of his discouragements in his early ministry. He said at times his way seemed hedged up and he was led to think he had mistaken his calling. But a brighter sun was to rise. A church whose foundations had been laid broad and deep through the faithful labors of this minister of Christ was to enjoy great blessings from its Head. Revivals of great power and interest were to be enjoyed, and the fruits of his labors were to appear in the glorious harvests gathered in. In the year 1831 fifty-five, and in 1838 sixty-one, were added to the church. Other revivals of less power were enjoyed in the year preceding and which followed these dates. Thus God blessed His faithful servant, and he enjoyed the fulfillment of the promise, "They that sow with tears shall reap with joy."

In December, 1856, in the ninety-first year of his age, the venerable pastor of the Congregational Church in Sherman entered into his rest. He laid off his armor and was called to go up higher,—to receive his crown. That decision which made him the pastor of that people in the year 1796 was fraught with important interests to them and him which eternity alone can unfold.

GREEN POND.

In the southeastern part of the town is a small body of water called by the above name. It is about three-fourths of a mile long and nearly half a mile wide, and forty feet deep,—as will be seen, of great depth for so small a body of water. A remarkable feature of it is its great elevation above the valley below: it must be more than one hundred feet, and on the spur of a mountain. There is little higher land around it, only a kind of rim of solid rock, confining its waters in their basin.

The question is and has long been, Whence its supply of water? In long dry seasons, from greater evaporation, its level is lowered somewhat, but not equal to other bodies of water. There don't seem to be higher land around enough to keep up the supply. Some years since I called the attention of Prof. St. Johns, then of Western Reserve College, to this subject. He said it was quite remarkable in this feature, and that he knew of but one other such body of water,—this one in Canada.

The opinion in early times was that it was fed by springs from below, which were not influenced by rains or drought. This pond is well stored with fish and has ever been a popular fishing-ground, and has late years been used for picnics as well.

There is an item of history connected with this pond which I will mention. It used to overflow its banks at the south end and pass below, watering the lands in that direction. At an early day, some seventy years ago, Mr. William Leach, a man of much enterprise, who resided in the valley on the west side, conceived the idea of blasting a tunnel through the rim of solid rock on the northwest end and drawing off the water to be used for mill purposes, three-fourths of a mile below. This was quite an expensive undertaking, but was accomplished. By means of a gate at the artificial outlet, which he could close or open as he pleased, or as he needed the supply at the mills, the water passed down the mountain side, and just above his mills he built an embankment or dam and formed a mill-pond. From this reservoir in a race he carried it to his mills at the bottom of the valley. It made a fine water-power. Three overshot wheels, one below the other, were used,—one for a carding-machine and two for his grist-mill. (Later there is also a saw-mill and cider-mill there now.)

This was a great convenience to all the surrounding country. But the farmers on the south side of the pond felt damaged in their interests, and brought a suit in court, on the ground that the water was turned out of its natural channel; and the court, with this view of the case, enjoined Mr. Leach from using the water. Under this decision the mills would be dry mills, and all the community around would be damaged. Mr. Leach didn't stop here. He got up a petition to the State Legislature, signed by great numbers of the people in the country around, setting forth that there was no other mill for many miles in that locality; that they raised their own grain, and depended on it for their bread; that it really was indispensable for their comfort and welfare. The case was referred to a very able committee, which, after a full investigation, reported in favor of the petitioner, and that Mr. Leach should have a perpetual grant to use those waters for the purposes named. The Legislature adopted the report, and for some seventy years Green Pond has sent out its waters, which have flowed down that mountain side, and the wheels of Leach's Mills have scarcely ceased their revolutions, and with advantages to the country around which can scarcely be estimated.

Mr. Leach plead his own case in the trials I have described before the courts and the committee, as I suppose. He died about twenty years ago, but those mills still bear testimony to his energy and perseverance; how he pressed forward his work under difficulties, and how his efforts were crowned with success. William Leach should be remembered as a public benefactor.

THE OLD FALLS.

One of the curiosities of the town was ever known by this name. I consider them worthy of a brief notice in this sketch. On one of my visits to my old home, several years ago, I visited this spot. It was a bright June morning. The laurels and honeysuckles were in full bloom. Clumps of them could be seen at a great distance by their bright and showy flowers, presenting attractions not easy to describe. We came suddenly and sooner to the place than I had anticipated. There they were, right before us, overshadowed by splendid laurels and hemlocks, and other deep shady trees, shutting out the rays of the sun, and forming a dark deep shade over our heads, the air as cool as a September day. For a more enthusiastic description of the scene than I can give I will copy an extract from a letter I received about that time from Hon. Marsh Giddings, of Michigan, on this subject, whose boyhood, like my own, had been spent near this spot. He says, "Sometimes I go back to my old town and home. A few years since myself, wife, and daughter paid a visit to The Great Falls in the mountain. Oh, it is a charmed spot! and it was almost impossible to get Frank away. The mountain ivy, ten or fifteen feet high, perfectly shaded the beautiful cascade, and the bubbling, tumbling, foaming waters shooting a few feet, then dashing against a central rock, then rippling along a quiet resting-place, underneath some shadowing rock, where the speckled trout hid himself away. I tell you that all the splendor of rock, hill, mountain, or prairie which I have been charmed with, never have I seen a single spot that so entirely entranced me as did that little spot, with all the memories it brought back to the soul."

These falls, as I am informed, attract more attention late years than formerly, and are much admired. Here the trailing arbutus, one of the earliest spring flowers, is found in abundance.

THE HOYT MURDER.

The crime for which Hoyt was hung was committed on the 23d of June, 1878. It was a bright Sunday morning, and Hoyt went to see his brother-in-law, Vanderburg Joyce, just over the line in Sherman. He asked Joyce to go fishing, and, being refused, he returned home. Before noon he got a butcher-knife and sharpened it, remarking to his wife that he was going over to Van's to butcher some of the people. He arrived there while the family were eating dinner. After talking to his father the old gentleman arose, and, as if Hoyt had been waiting for this, he immediately drew the knife and struck his father in the arm. Another lunge cut the clothing over the breast. At this moment he was seized, and the Joyces, brothers, caught the hand which held the knife. In the struggle they fell, Hoyt on top of his father. He reached up his left hand, took the knife from the right, and plunged it into his father's neck just under the ear. Then, as if suddenly imbued with a perfect savageness, he bore down on it with all his strength, giving it a twist at the same time. The keen blade passed around under the chin, severing the jugular vein and making a gash about four inches long. Then he drew the knife from the gaping wound, and made a lunge backward to hit his brother-in-law, who dodged and escaped. He was finally secured, and after an examination was committed to jail in Danbury for trial.

The cruel nature of the man was well known in Sherman. Conflicts with his family were of frequent occurrence. Once he shot his wife, and to this day she carries the lead in her person. He had threatened to kill his brother, George Hoyt. On his arrest some one remarked to him that it would go hard with him. He replied that it was a good job, well done, and that before he was hung two or three others would have to die. He was tried the last week in September, and at the first ballot the jury voted unanimously for a verdict of murder in the first degree. Judge Sanford pronounced the sentence, that he be hung on the 24th day of October, 1879. His case was immediately carried up to the Supreme Court of Errors, which granted him another trial. In March of 1879 he was again tried, and again convicted, and sentenced to be hung May 13, 1880, upon which day he was executed at Bridgeport.

JOHN O. NORTHRUP.

John O. Northrop is of English and Scotch descent. His grandfather, Thomas Northrop, when quite a young man, settled in the town of New Fairfield, now Sherman, Conn.

He married Joanna Leach, of the same town, by whom he had seven children,—namely: David, Thomas, Joanna, Amos, Abigail, Isaac, and Abraham. The first son, David, and father of him whose name heads this sketch, was born in Sherman in 1758. He became a prominent business man of his time, being extensively engaged in stock-dealing and farming. He held several local offices and was a liberal contributor to the church interests. He was twice married. His first wife was Rebecca, daughter of Nehemiah Beardsley, Esq. She was of Scotch descent. They had three daughters, Sally, Joanna, and Rebecca. She dying, he married her sister Salina, who bore him six sons, as follows: Nehemiah B., Thomas, David, Ezra G., Isaac, and John O., of whom Thomas and John O. only are now living (1880). John O. was born June 27, 1804, in the town of Sherman, on the old homestead of the Northrop family. His education was obtained at the district and select schools of his county.

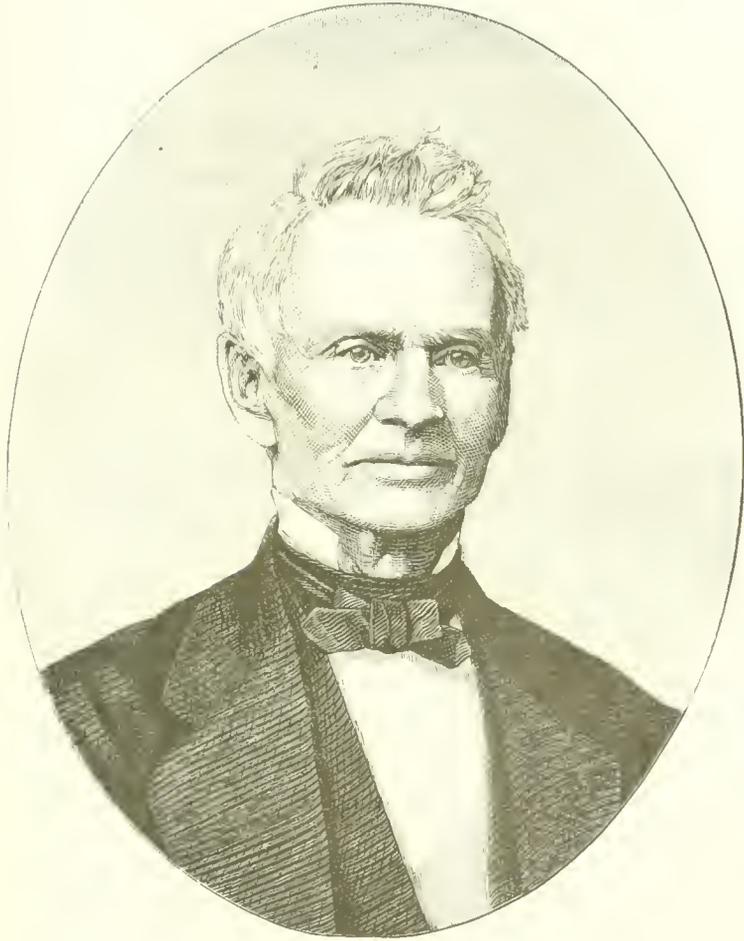

On Sept. 2, 1829, he married Charlotte Giddings, of Sherman, who died Dec. 7, 1869, leaving two children, Sarah Eunice and John Edward, and in 1870 he married Paulina, daughter of Deacon Hugh Gelston, of the same place. The daughter, Sarah Eunice, married the Rev. J. B. Stoddard. They are living in Cheshire, Conn., and have two children, Lillie N. and Edward J. The son, John Edward, has been twice married. His first wife was Cornelia Bostwick, who died March, 1870, leaving one daughter, Isabella Northrop. His second wife is Elizabeth Comstock, of Essex, Middlesex Co., Conn., where they are now residing, he being a member of Comstock & Cheeney's Ivory Manufacturing Company, of which he is secretary and treasurer.

Mr. John O. Northrop has followed the occupation of his father. He is a member of the Congregational Church, and has been clerk and treasurer of the same for more than thirty years.

In politics he is a Republican, though he has never sought office or taken a very active part in political affairs. He is modest and unassuming in manners, and one of the leading representative men of his town.

ALBERT BARNES.

Albert Barnes is of English descent. His grandfather was Stephen Barnes, of Lyme, Conn., who was born in 1731. He married Annie Phinney, by whom he had nine children,—namely, Andrew, Jefferson, Garrett, William, Morris, Tobiatha, Sally, Lybartus

John O Northrop

Albert Barnes

(or Lybartie), and Betsey, —all of whom are now deceased (1880). He was a commissary during the Revolutionary war, and after the declaration of peace was elected for several terms to the Legislature. He died in 1816. Andrew, his first son, and the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in 1773. He married Polly, daughter of Jonathan Giddings, of Sherman, Conn. They had seven children, as follows: Albert, Alfred, Samuel H., Loretta, Mary, Laura A., and Sarah. He moved to Milford, Conn., in 1827, where he died Jan. 3, 1858.

Albert, whose name heads this memoir, was born in the town of Sherman, Fairfield Co., Conn., on August 6, 1805. His education was acquired at the district schools of his town. His occupation has been stock-dealing and farming. In 1835 he married Catherine, daughter of Nathan and Irene (Downs) Gaylord. They have three sons, Andrew G., George A., and Hiram S.

Andrew G. was born Nov. 15, 1838. On Jan. 1, 1867, he married Harriet, daughter of Gregory Seeley, of Litchfield Co., Conn. They have one son, Albert S.

George A. was born in Sherman, Conn., March 4, 1841. Dec. 13, 1871, he married Emma L., daughter of Israel and Abby (Ferris) Haviland, of Sherman. In 1878 he was elected to the Legislature for the Assembly of '79. He has been a member of the Board of Education several terms, and since 1878 one of the selectmen of his town. He is now living on the old homestead and following the occupation of his father.

Hiram S. married, Jan. 30, 1878, at Lawrence, Kan., Miss Nettie, daughter of David D. and Eliza (Gardener) Hoag. They are now residing at Minneapolis, Kan.

Mr. Albert Barnes was an "Old-Line" Whig till the organization of the Republican party, since which time he has affiliated with that, and in 1852 and 1878 he represented his town in the Legislature. He has held the offices of selectman and justice of the peace for several terms.

THEODORE C. ROGERS.

Theodore C. Rogers is a descendant of Noah Rogers, who in 1673 married Elizabeth, daughter of Michael Taintor. They had six children. He died at Branford, Conn., in 1725.

His second son, Josiah, married Lydia, daughter of Thomas Goodsell, of East Haven, Conn., by whom he had six children, as follows: Lydia, Jonathan, Levi, Josiah, Jr., Thomas, and Mary. He was born in 1708, and died in 1783.

Josiah, Jr., married Martha, daughter of Edward Frisbie, of Branford. They had eleven children, of whom the Rev. Medad Rogers, the great-grandfather of the subject of this memoir, was the tenth. He was born at Branford, Conn., in 1750, and in 1777 graduated at Yale College. In 1787 he married Rachel, daughter of Gamaneil Baldwin, Esq., who bore him four children. The first, Amzi, died in infancy; the others were Flora, Louisa, and Amzi. He was a devout Christian, and labored faithfully in the ministry, in the town of New Fairfield, for nearly half a century. He died in 1824.

Theo C. Rogers

Amzi was born in New Fairfield in 1793. In 1814 he married Betsey, daughter of Samuel T. Barnum, of the same town, by whom he had seven children: David B., Samuel T., Theodore D., Ann E., Emily L., Harriet A., and Rachel L. He was a prominent and very popular man among his townsmen. He took a great interest in military affairs, and was colonel of the State militia for many years. He and his wife both lived to the age of eighty-six years. The children are now (1880) all living. He died May 21, 1880. His wife died June 5, 1880.

He is an active member of the Congregational Church, and holds the office of deacon of the same. He possesses some literary proclivities, and is an occasional contributor of local news items to the press.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

STAMFORD.

Geographical—Topographical—The First Settlement in 1640—Order under which Settlement was made—First Assignment of Lands—First Permanent Settlers—Pioneers from 1640 to 1775—First Grist-Mill—The Perfidy of the Dutch Traders—The Underhill Massacre—Stamford in 1645—Indian Deeds, etc.—Deed of 1645—Report to General Court of Deed of 1645—Agreement of Pomus and Onax, 1655—Agreement with Tophance and Penabay, 1667—The Stamford Patent.

This town lies in the southwestern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Westchester Co., N. Y.; on the east by New Canaan and Darien; on the south by Long Island Sound; and on the west by Greenwich.

The surface of the town is undulating, and the soil is a fertile gravelly loam. The same holds true today as written by Barber in 1836: "This is a pleasant and fertile township, rich in the resources of agricultural opulence, abounding in the means of subsistence, with the advantages of a ready and convenient market."

THE FIRST SETTLEMENT.

The first movement towards the settlement of this town was made in the early part of the year 1640 by a number of sturdy pioneers from Wethersfield, who, having become dissatisfied with certain rules and regulations governing that parish, decided to seek a peaceful retreat elsewhere, and under the leadership of Rev. Mr. Davenport, of honored memory, who had been their champion in the dissensions at Wethersfield, resolved to locate farther inland, and in the following year, leaving their old home, pursued their course westward, and settled where now is located the borough of Stamford, then in the New Haven jurisdiction.

The following is a copy of the order under which the settlement was made:

"Whereas, Andrew Ward and Robert Coe of Wethersfield were deputed by Wethersfield men the 30th of the 8th month, commonly called October, 1640, to treat at New Haven, about the plantation lately purchased by said town called Toquams, which being considered of it was agreed upon by the said court and justices aforesaid that they shall have the said plantation upon the terms following, first, that they shall repay unto the said town of New Haven all the charges which they have disbursed about it, which amounts to thirty-three pounds as appears by a note or schedule herunto annexed; secondly, that they reserve a fifth part of said plantation to be disposed of at the appointment of this court to such desirable persons as may be expected, or as God shall send hither, provided that if within one whole year such persons do not come to fill up those lots so reserved that then it shall be free for the said people to nominate and present to this court some persons of their own choice which may fill up some of those lots so reserved if this court approve of them; thirdly, that they join in all points with this plantation in the form of government here settled, according to agreement betwixt this court and Mr. Samuel Eaton about the plantation of Totokett. These articles being read together with Mr. Samuel Eaton's agreement in the hearing of the said parties or deputies, it was accepted by them and in witness thereof they subscribed their names to the articles in the face of the court."

It is evident that the dissatisfied body of persons from Wethersfield were thoroughly in earnest in the determination to make a settlement here, for the first records in the old town book show that each man who signed the compact to remove hither was to begin and prosecute the design of a plantation "under paine of forfeiture of 5 lb a man." As an interesting relic of that period the entire record, of which the above is an extract, is inserted.

"1640-41. A town bo(ok of the) freeholders of the towne (of Stamford as it) was afterwards called, but now Rippowam containyn (in)g the acts) and conclusions of the companie of Wethersfield men, to (begin a) removal thither this winter. And also their most matteriall acts and agreements, touchyn the place how they came by it, their rates and accounts, their divisions and graunts of land, and records of every man's land, and passages of land from one to another.

"First those men whose names are underwritten have bound themselves under the paine of forfeiture of 5 lb a man to goe or sende to Ripp(owan) so begin and psecute the designe of a plantation there by ye 16th of (f) may next, the rest, their families thither by ye last of november 12 months, viz. The following is a highly interesting record, showing, as it does, the first assignment of lands and the names of the first permanent settlers of Stamford:

"Also this is to be noted that in a full meeting of its company there was intending to come hither the same spring that we came, many of these twenty-eight men aforementioned and John Jisop were severally considered of, and what quantity of land was meet for every man determined of, the man under consideration absenting himself while his case was in hand, and so successively; and when he was called in again and demanded if so much gave him content, and so contentment and satisfaction was by every one of these men acknowledged; and they set down these numbers of acres of marsh and upland after the same proportion as followeth:

During the following season the little settlement was gladdened by the arrival of others anxious to rear their homes in these fertile lands, as the following records show:

"And in town meeting, Dec. 7, was there granted, besides house lots as other men had, Tho. Armitage, ten acres; Jo. Ogden, ten acres; Wm. Mayd, (Mead), five acres; with woodland as choicest as those above.

"Also to these men, besides, house lots as others, (John) Stevens, Tho. Pop, Tho. Hyoute, Hen. Akerly, Jo. Smith, senr., Jo. Smith, jun., (John) Rolckwell, Jam. Tyne, Dan. Scofield, & Jo. Coe, every of them two acres (home lot) and three acres woodland in the field now to be inclosed."

"(October 1642, in a general town meeting was given these, toll owing) these lots as other men, marsh & woodland, viz: () nine, Jo. Underhill, eight acres; to Robert Justice seven acres, () acres; Jo. Miller, five acres, to Jo. Finch, six acres; () five acres; & to every of them woodland after the same proportion, & to William Newman two acres marsh & three acres woodland.

"()ember 1642, was granted these men every man (a house lot &) land in the field to be inclosed, viz: Jo. Lum, Jam. Sw(ead), (), Symon Seiring, & to Jonas Weede a house and pasture land in the field to be inclosed. () Pierson, Jo. Towne & Wm. Graves have had every one (a house lot) & Tho. Sawson house lot and three acres in the field () and eight men are free holdrs as above."

EARLY SETTLERS.

Henry Ackley received Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, home-lot, and three acres of woodland. Savage makes him at New Haven in 1640. The colony records mention him there as rebuked for "building a cellar and selling it without leave" in April of that year.

Thomas Armitage received ten acres of land, December, 1641. According to Savage, he belonged to Lynn, Mass. He came from Bristol, England, in 1635, in the ship "James," with the Rev. Richard Mather and others, and removed in 1637 to Sandwich, Mass., whence he came to Stamford as above. In 1647 he appears on the list of Hempstead settlers.

Robert Bates came from Wethersfield with the first colony, and is on the list of the thirty who paid one hundred bushels of corn to the New Haven "friends," who had surveyed and transferred the territory to them. His lot in Wethersfield, which was thirty and a third rods in width, containing one hundred and eighty-two acres, was sold in 1641 to William Gibbons. His death is recorded, at Stamford, June 11, 1675. His will, probated Nov. 1, 1675, makes bequests to his son John, his daughter Mary Aumbler, and son-in-law John Cross. He bequeathed certain negroes, who are to be made free at forty years of age.

Francis Bell is on the list of the twenty-nine settlers who were assigned land in 1640, when he received seven acres. As his name does not appear on the Wethersfield records with the other Stamford settlers, it is probable he was still quite young. He became prominent here, and has been fully represented in every generation since in descendants both of his own and of other names. His wife Rebecca died here in 1684, and he Jan. 8, 1690. His son Jonathan was the first child born in the town, and his birth was in 1641. Mrs. Bell's clothes, of which the inventory is on record, Book 1, page 12, were by the husband's order divided equally between the two daughters, Rebecca Tuttle and Mary Hoyt. The inventory of Lieut. Francis Bell, dated January, 1689, is found on page 116, of first book of records, amounting to three hundred and seventeen pounds twelve shillings. His will, on record at Fairfield, dated 3, 24, 1689, makes bequests to his son Jonathan, grandson Jonathan, Mary Hoyt, granddaughter Hannah, and "granddaughter Rebecca, whom he had brought up," and to his daughter Tuttle's four sons, —Jonathan, Simon, William, and Nathaniel.

Samuel Clark came with the company from Wethersfield, and is on each of the first three lists made at the time of the settlement. He received seven acres of land. Savage supposes he was at Milford in 1669, thence removing to Hempstead, L. I.; that he married Hannah, daughter of Rev. Robert Fordham, and was living in New Haven in 1685.

John Coe, son of Robert, received, Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, house-lot, and three acres woodland. He was born in England, Norfolk Co., in 1622, and he came with his father to Watertown, thence to Wethersfield, and thence to Stamford.

Robert Coe was born in Norfolk Co., England, in 1596, and came in the "Francis" to Watertown, Mass., in 1634. He was admitted freeman at Boston, Sept. 3, 1634, and is enrolled among the settlers of Watertown the same year. He brought with him his wife Ann, aged thirty-three years, and three children: John, aged eight years; Robert, aged seven; and Benjamin, aged five. In 1635 he went to Wethersfield, where he remained until the settlement of Stamford. While here he represented the town in the General Court of New Haven. He was the deputy from the town to the General Court of Connecticut in 1656, and was sheriff of the county from 1669 to 1672.

Richard Crabb. —His name first appears on the roll of the general meeting of the freemen, at Hartford, for the election of magistrates, Jan. 16, 1639; and April 9, 1640, he is present as deputy, and must have been a man of some note. He came to Stamford with the company from Wethersfield, and is on the list of those who paid the hundred bushels of corn to the New Haven colony, and of those to whom the first assignment of land was made. He received ten acres. His land must have been assigned him west of the present limits of the town, as he is spoken of subsequently in the records as belonging to Greenwich.

Rev. Richard Denton came with his parishioners from Wethersfield. His name heads the first list of the new colony, and stands third on the list of those who paid for surveying the tract. He received fourteen acres, only two of the settlers exceeding him in the assignment of land.

Jeffrey Ferris, made freeman in Boston in 1635, came with the first settlers, is on the list of those who paid for the survey, and received ten acres at the first assignment of land. Savage says he was from Watertown, Mass., where he was made freeman, probably May 6, 1635, whence he came to Wethersfield. He sold his lot in Wethersfield, of forty-five acres, to John Deming. He came with the first colony from Wethersfield, and in 1656 is one of the eleven Greenwich men who petitioned to be accepted under the New Haven jurisdiction. His will, found on the Probate records at Fairfield, is dated Jan. 6, 1664. He wills to the four boys he brought up ten pounds sterling apiece if they live with any of his children until they are eighteen years old, the money then to be put out for them until they are twenty years of age. His will names also his wife Judy, son James, son Jonathan Lockwood, and Mary Lockwood, son Peter's three children, and son Joseph's two. Judy Bowers, his widow, receipts for her widow's portion, March 6, 1667. His marriage contract with his wife Susannah, widow of Robert Lockwood, of date May 28, 1661, pledges certain legacies to the children of Robert Lockwood, deceased, and mortgages his Greenwich lands and "housings." He died in 1666. The name Ferris is from Leicestershire, house of Feriers, from Henry, son of Gualchelm de Feriers, to whom William the Conqueror gave large grants of land in the three shires of Stafford, Derby, and Leicester.

Tradition invests the emigration of this family to this country with the hues of romantic adventure,—the ancestress, high born, following her plebeian lover out into this Western world, to share with him here the fortunes which English aristocracy would not allow there.

Daniel Finch, made freeman in Boston, 1631, and enrolled same year among Watertown settlers. In 1636, he was constable in Wethersfield, whence he came with the Stamford settlers, 1641, and is on each of the three first lists of the colony. He received nine acres in the first distribution of land. Savage supposes he was from Watertown, Mass., and that he came in the fleet with Governor Winthrop; that he was made freeman May 18, 1631; that he went to Wethersfield in 1635 or 1636, where he was constable in the latter year. He also makes him remove in 1653 to Fairfield, where he married, Dec. 25, 1657, Elizabeth, widow of John Thompson, and died March, 1667. His marriage agreement with Elizabeth Thompson is on the Probate records at Fairfield.

John Finch is assigned by the town in October, 1642, six acres, with marsh and upland, as the other men. He died here in 1657. He sold his house and home-lot in 1653 to Richard Ambler.

Robert Fisher was here early, if not with the first colony. He had land assigned him by the town, as appears from the testimony of Thomas Morchouse, March 17, 1649, in which he says that John Whitmore sold to his son John the land which was Robert Fisher's by gift of the town.

Robert Gildersleeve came with the first company from Wethersfield, and is on each of the first three lists of settlers. He received, in the first distribution of land, thirteen acres. While here he was a representative from the town in the General Court at New Haven.

William Graves received a house-lot in the distribution of November, 1642.

John Holly was here, as present records show, as early as 1647. William H. Holly, Esq., copied from the records several years ago the birth of John, son of John Holly, in October, 1642, which would suggest that the family may have been here even as early. He purchased land on the 26th of 12th month, 1647, of William Newman, and from that date his purchases of real estate are numerous. He was a noted man, and much in the public service. In 1679 he gave his house and lot to his son Samuel, and land to his son John, reserving to himself and wife half the fruit of the orchard. He also gave land at the same date to his son Increase. In his will, on record at Fairfield, his legatees are his wife Mary, and his children John, Samuel, Increase, Elisha, Jonathan, Elizabeth Turney, Bethia Weed, Hannah Hoyt, and Abigail.

Thomas Hoyt, or Hyatt, received three acres of woodland. This name was spelled very variously on the records,—Hoyette, Hyat, Hyot, Hioute, Hout, Hoyt, Hoight, Hyat, Hiat, Hoit, and Hoyte. Thomas "Hyat" died here in 1651. I suppose him and Simon to be the ancestors of the Stamford Hoyts. The inventory of his estate was rendered in court in 1662, amounting to £132 2s. 3d. The court gave to the widow her third, and made Cornelius Jones administrator, to divide the rest among the six children. The administrator was so well pleased with the ease as to take for his wife the widow Elizabeth, and their marriage is on record, 1. 8. 1657. The children are recorded as giving receipts to their father-in-law Cornelius Jones, as follows: Caleb, Dec. 23, 1661; Ruth, then become Mrs. John Wescot, Feb. 9, 1667; Rebecca, 13. 8. 1674, for twelve pounds eleven shillings seven pence; Thomas, 21. 8. 1674, a like sum; and Deborah gives similar receipts, 30. 9. 1669. These receipts are for their several portions of their father, Thomas "Hiat's" estate. John "Hiat," of "Younkers," N. Y., gives receipt, July 6, 1689, for twenty pounds, current pay, to the said Cornelius Jones, his father-in-law. After careful collation of names I am unable to distinguish among the settlers the two family names Hoyt and Hyatt. Within twenty-five years of the settlement I find these different ways of spelling the same name. On pages 113 and 114, Records No. 1, the estates of both Thomas Hyatt and Simon Hoyette are receipted for by the heirs of both. In these receipts we have the following different spellings: Hoyt, 1662; Hiat, 1669; Hoyte, 1661; and the promiscuous entry of these receipts for the two estates would seem to indicate that they belonged to the same family. Joshua, son of Simon, spells his name Hyot. When the name became settled in its two leading forms, Hoyt and Hyatt, as distinct family names, I hardly think the records will show.

Simon Hoyt was probably here with the first settlers. I take the liberty of entering his name in one of the places whose name has been effaced by time. He died here in 1657, and his name occurs quite often on the records of the town. The inventory of his estate is on record, dated Oct. 9, 1657, and amounting to two hundred and twenty-five pounds. After his death his widow Susanna, it appears, married a Bates. His children, as indicated by receipts given for their portions of their father's estate, were Joshua, Moses of Westchester, John, Samuel, Benjamin, Mrs. Samuel Finch, and Mrs. Samuel Firman. In the distribution of the estate of their mother, then Susanna Bates, Feb. 1, 1674, besides the above names, appeared also that of Thomas Lyon, who probably had married one of her daughters.

Robert Husted was one of the company who received land in October, 1642. He had come from Mount Wollaston, now Braintree, Mass. He is probably the father of that Robert Hustis who, according to Bolton's Westchester, went from Fairfield to Westchester in 1654. His will, dated July 8, 1652, makes bequests to his son Angel of all his lands in Greenwich, with housings; to his son Robert all his lands in Stamford, with cattle and housings; to his wife a maintenance and other bequests; and to his daughter Ann, ten pounds. In 1654 his widow, Elizabeth, by will makes bequests to her son Angel, of Greenwich; to Robert, of Stamford, and to her daughter Ann, the wife of Richard Hardy. In the will of Robert the name is Husted, and in that of the widow the name is written Hustis, and both are equally distinct, and that they refer to the same family is also as clear as the form of the name. The names of the children are also changed from Husted to Hustis, though in the second will the name is spelled both Hustes and Hustis.

Jeremy Jagger came with the first company from Wethersfield, and is on each of the first three lists of the colony. He received, in the first distribution of land, three acres.

John Jessup came with the first colony from Wethersfield, and is on each of the first three lists of the colony. He received, in the first distribution of lands, five acres. In 1664 he represented Westchester in the Connecticut Assembly. His name is spelled on our records, Geseppe, Gieseppe, Gesoppe, Gishop.

Richard Law came with the first settlers from Wethersfield, is on the second and third lists of the settlers, and received, at the first assignment of land, eleven acres. He married Margaret, daughter of Thomas and Frances Kilborn, of Wethersfield, who was born in 1612.

John Lum was here in 1642, and received a house-lot in the distribution of that date.

William Mayde (Mead) received, Dec. 7, 1641, five acres, house-lot, with woodland. The wife and son of William Mead died here in 1658.

John Miller received from the town, in October, 1642, five acres, house-lot, and marsh and upland, as the other men. This name is on Chapin's list of the Wethersfield colony, where he was in 1630. He died soon after coming to Stamford, in 1642, leaving three sons.

Matthew Mitchell came with the settlers from Wethersfield. His name stands next, on the first list of the colony, to the minister's, and heads both the next two lists. He paid about three times as much as any other of the settlers towards the survey of the land, and received twenty-eight acres in the first distribution of the land.

Thomas Morehouse is on the list of those who shared in the first distribution of land, and received seven acres. In 1649 he was here, as appears from his testimony in court. Savage makes him in Fairfield in 1653. His will and inventory are on the Fairfield records, Sept. 11, 1658. His wife Isabel is mentioned in the will, and children, Hannah, Samuel, and Thomas, the last of whom was to be paid his portion in four years; Mary in five years; and so each child one year later; and if any of them die before seventeen, their part to be divided, if unmarried.

William Newman hath assigned to him by the town, in October, 1642, two acres marsh and three acres woodland. In 1659 complaints having been made to the court in New Haven respecting the "sizes of shoes," the court, hearing that William Newman had an instrument which he had brought from England, which "was thought to be right to determine this question, did order that the said instrument should be procured and sent to New Haven, to be made a 'Standard,' which shall be the rule between buyer and seller, to which it is required that all sizes be conformed." Mr. Newman was evidently a man of note in the young colony, and once represented the town in the General Court.

John Northend came with the colony from Wethersfield, and is on each of the first three lists of the settlers. He received in the first distribution of the land eight acres.

John Ogden received, Dec. 7, 1641, ten acres, house-lot, with woodland, like the first company. In 1642 he agreed with Governor Kieft, of New York, to build a stone church for twenty-five hundred guilders. In 1644 he was a patentee of Hempstead L. I.

Richard Ogden, brother of the above, went to Fairfield, where he became a man of note.

— Pierson received, in the distribution of November, 1642, a house-lot. The Christian name is obliterated, but that of Henry is given to the Pearson who emigrated with Mr. Denton in 1644. A Jacob Pearson (Pierson) was landholder in 1661.

Thomas Pop received, Dec. 7, 1641, a house-lot, with woodland, the same as the first company. This name should probably be Pope, and he probably went soon after the colony settled here over to Hempstead.

James Pyne received, Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, house-lot, and woodland, the same as the first company. He went to Hempstead, L. I., and was accepted as freeman from that town of the Connecticut colony in 1664.

Thurston Raynor came with the first company from Wethersfield. His name on each of the first three lists stands next to Matthew Mitchell. In the first distribution of lands he received twenty acres. He sold his lot in Wethersfield, which contained three hundred and thirty acres, to Richard Treat. On reaching Stamford he was appointed to the New Haven court with senatorial honors. This distinction places him among the foremost of our pioneers. From Stamford he went to Southampton, L. I., where he was held in honor.

John Renoulds appears on the list of the settlers of Wethersfield, from which place he probably came with the first settlers of Stamford. His name is on the second and third lists of the colonists. He received, in the first allotment of land, eleven acres.

John Rockwell received, Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, home-lot, and woodland, as the first company.

Daniel Scofield received, Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, home-lot, and woodland, as the first company. He died in 1671. His children were Daniel, John, Richard, Joseph, Sarah, the wife of John Pettit, and Mary. His widow Mary became the third wife of Miles Merwin. The son Joseph suffered so much from hardships in King Philip's war as to lose his life in 1676, giving his estate to his brothers and sisters. His will, dated Sept. 4, 1664, gives to his wife one-third the estate, with use of the house for her lifetime; to his daughter Sarah, five pounds; and to her two children, five pounds; and to the other four children, Daniel, John, Joseph, and Mercy, the rest of the estate. His wife and two of the sons, Daniel and John, were made executors.

John Seaman came with the first company from Wethersfield. His name is on each of the first three lists of the colony, and he received in the first distribution of land three acres.

Simon Seiring appears on the records, in 1642, as landholder, where his name is spelled Cymon. He is reported on the list of those who went, in 1644, with Mr. Denton to Hempstead, L. I.

Samuel Sherman came with the first settlers from Wethersfield. His name appears on each of the first three lists of the new colony, and he received, in the first distribution of land, ten acres. He was assistant in the New Haven court in 1662, and his reappointment for the next two years. He was also sent to the General Court of Connecticut, after the union of the town colonies, in 1665. In his sale of house and land, in 1654, he is said to be "now living in Stratford." In leaving Stamford he probably took every member of his family, as the name does not subsequently occur on our records. The descendants of this pioneer of Stamford have numbered many very eminent men, among whom are John Sherman, the present Secretary of the Treasury, and Gen. Wm. T. Sherman.

Vincent Simkins came with the first company from Wethersfield.

George Slanson came probably from Sandwich, Mass., with Thomas Armitage, in 1642. He appears in our account of the first church of the town as a leading member, and he was also evidently a man of note in civil life. I suppose him to have been the representative from the town in 1670. He had three children, as appears from his will, dated Dec. 16, 1694,—Eleazer, John, and a daughter who married John Gould. He died Feb. 17, 1695. His son John married, in 1663, Sarah Tuttle, of New Haven, and had a son John born in 1664, and Jonathan in 1667. The wife of this John was killed Nov. 17, 1676, by her brother, Benjamin Tuttle, who was executed for it the following June. He then married a second wife, Elizabeth Benedict, and had a daughter Mary and a son Thomas. He died in 1706. He was doubtless the ancestor of the present Slason families in town.

Thomas Slawson in November or December, 1642, received a house-lot, and three acres "in the field," besides. Savage says he did not stay long in Stamford.

Henry Smith came with the first company from Wethersfield. His name is on each of the first three lists of the new colony, and in the first distribution of land he received three acres. Whence he came to Wethersfield is not known. He was promoted for freeman in 1670, and died in 1687. He had a son John, mentioned in his will, and a daughter Rebecca, who married, July 2, 1672, Edward Wilkinson, of Milford, and a daughter Hannah, who married a Lawrence.

John Smith, Sr., received, Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, house-lot, and woodland, the same as the first company. He and his son John went to Hempstead, L. I. John Smith, Jr., received, Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, house-lot, and woodland, as the first company. In 1675, John, Jr., in a deposition, gives his age at sixty years, and says that while in Stamford he was called Rock John Smith, for distinction.

John Stevens received, Dec. 7, 1641, two acres, house-lot, and a woodland, as the first company. The descendants of this pioneer have been quite numerous.

Samuel Swain, in September, 1642, is engaged to build at the common charge of the townsmen a mill, as appears from a record of that date, and his name occurs later in the records.

James Swead received a house-lot in the distribution of November, 1642.

John Towne received in the distribution of November, 1642, a house-lot.

Capt. John Underhill had assigned to him in October, 1642, house-lot, eight acres, and woodland, as the others. He was made a freeman in Boston in 1631.

Andrew Ward.—This name appears in the first record of the "Corte holden at Newtown, 26th April, 1635." He was one of the five worthies, who thus had in their hands the destinies of the new settlement at Newtown (Hartford), and so those of the State. The record states that he had been dismissed from the church of Watertown, Mass., on the 28th of May last, and he with his associates are authorized to renew the covenant. He continued a member of the court until September, 1639. At the session held October, 1639, he is nominated by the court to be presented for the vote of the county for magistrates in April next. In 1637 he is reported in the records of the General Court as collector of Wethersfield, and he doubtless came to Stamford with the Wethersfield settlers. His name is on each of the first three lists of the pioneers, and during his life here he was a prominent man. He was chosen magistrate for the colony in 1646 to represent it in the higher branch of the New Haven court. His will, still found on record in Fairfield, bears date June 8, 1659, and makes bequests to his wife Esther, son John, daughter Sarah, daughter Abigail, and his two youngest sons, Andrew and Samuel. It is stated also that his other children had received their portions. From this pioneer of the town have descended eminent names. Henry Ward Beecher gets his middle name from him, and his daughter Mary was grandmother of Vice-President Aaron Burr.

Jonas Weed came to Watertown in 1631, where he was made freeman, and thence to Stamford in 1642. He died here in 1676. His will, on record at Fairfield, dated Nov. 26, 1672, makes his legatees his wife Mary, and his children John, Daniel, and Jonas; Mary, wife of George Abbott; Dorcus, wife of James Wright; Samuel; John Rockwell for Elizabeth; Sarah; and Hannah, wife of Benjamin Hoyt. His administrators were his wife Mary, and his sons

Daniel and John. The widow died in 1690. His son John married Joanna, daughter of Richard "Westcoat." The son Jonas married, Nov. 6, 1670, Bethia, daughter of John Holly, and to him the father gave, in 1671, the house where he was then living. The descendants of this Jonas Weed have been very numerous here, and they have, also, always been among our prominent citizens.

Thomas Weeks went from Wethersfield to Hadley and returned to Wethersfield, from which place he probably came with the first company of settlers to Stamford. His name is on the second and third lists of the colonists, and he received, in the first distribution of land, six acres.

John Whitmore came with the first company of settlers from Wethersfield. His name is on the second and third lists of the colonists, and he received, in the first distribution of land, ten acres.

Jonas Wood, Sr., came with the first company of settlers from Wethersfield. His name is on each of the first three lists of the colonists, and he received, in the first distribution of land, eight acres. He was among the settlers of Springfield in 1636, from which place he went to Wethersfield. In 1648 he brings an action against Thomas Newton, of Fairfield, when he is reported as from Long Island. In 1654 he was in Southampton, L. I., as appears from an action against him in the court of magistrates at New Haven. In that action he is called Halifax Jonas by Richard Mills, of Stamford, in his testimony. In 1658, Jonas Wood (O) and Jonas Wood (H), both of Huntington, L. I., agents for the inhabitants of the same, desire to join with this colony (New Haven). In May, 1662, on the petition of Huntington, L. I., he is appointed by the General Court in Hartford the first townsman and custom-master. He became on Long Island a man of some prominence. His name heads the list of those to whom the town of Huntington was granted in 1666.

Jonas Wood, Jr., came with the first company of settlers from Wethersfield. His name is on the second and third lists of the colonists. He received, in the first distribution of land, seven acres.

Edmund Wood came with the first company of settlers from Wethersfield. His name is on each of the first three lists of the colonists. He received, in the first distribution of land, seven acres.

Jeremiah Wood came with the first company of settlers from Wethersfield. His name is on each of the first three lists of the new colony.

Francis Yates is on Chapin's list of the residents of Wethersfield, between 1634 and 1673. He went to Stamford, where he stayed until 1644, when he removed with Mr. Denton to Hempstead, L. I.

The healthful climate and fertility of the soil soon attracted other settlers, and not much time elapsed ere the little colony was rapidly being augmented by an enterprising class of people. The following is a list of those who came in between the years 1643 and the breaking out of the Revolution: Joseph Arnold, Richard Ayres, Sr., Samuel Baker, John Banks, John Beachgood, John Beldin, Matthew Bellamy, Samuel Blackley, Joseph Blackley, Josiah Blackman, William Blanchard, Israel Boardman, Richard Booloch, Ephraim Bostwick, Nathaniel Borden, Richard Bouton, Daniel Briggs, Samuel Brooker, Samuel Bryan, Richard Chester, Daniel Chichester, William Clements, John Cluggerstone, John Clock, Thomas Corey, Cary Conklin, James Crawford, Nathaniel Cross, Cornelius Curtiss, Francis Dan, Richard (Daniels) Daniel, John Davis, Rev. GRIST-MILL.

One of the greatest inconveniences usually met by the early settlers of any section is the want of mills for grinding grain. The pioneers of Stamford gave this matter their early attention, for as early as September, 1611, an order was passed for the erection of a mill at a common charge. It was promptly erected and "set agoing," but during the same year was sold to private parties.

THE PERFDY OF THE DUTCH TRADERS,—THE UNDERHILL MASSACRE.

The following concise statement of an affair which at one time wore a threatening aspect, endangering the very existence of the community, is from the pen of the late Rev. E. B. Huntington:

"Some of the Dutch traders had stripped an Indian, who had been tempted by them to drink too much, of a valuable dress of beaver skins. On recovering from his drunken fit, the insulted red man revenged himself by killing two Dutchmen, and fled to feast his memory with the great revenge among a distant tribe. He could not be found. The Dutch governor at New Amsterdam, Kieft, sought an opportunity to punish the Indians for the revengeful deed. The next winter the Mohawks fell upon two of the Hudson River tribes, and after killing their warriors scattered the remnant in utter destitution to find food and shelter from the piercing cold among the Dutch on the South. The time for a civilized revenge had now come; and at the instigation of Kieft, with the sanction of his counselors, more than a hundred of those helpless fugitives from their savage foe were sent from their quiet sleep on earth to the spirit world of their race by a blow from the Dutch soldiers so sudden that they could not even beg for life.

"Then Indian blood was stirred. Savage vengeance awoke. With almost electric despatch Indian warrior pledged to Indian warrior, and clan to clan, the direst vengeance on their foe. 'More than fifteen hundred warriors,' according to De Forest, rallied from the confederacy of eleven clans to constitute this avenging army. 'A fierce war blazed wherever a Dutch settlement was to be found; on Long Island and on Manhattan, along the Connecticut and along the Hudson.' From Manhattan to Stamford the coast was desolated, Dutch and English alike atoning to the inexorable spirit of Indian revenge for the injuries that had been heaped upon the Indian's race.

"Within hearing distance of the Stamford settlement* were three Dutch settlers who had excited the wrath of the restless and brave Mayano. He nobly met them, armed as they were, with his bow and arrows, and brought two of them to the ground. The third only saved himself by a well-directed blow which laid the fearless savage at his feet; and the daring of the fallen sachem had made the extermination of his tribe a necessity to the safety of the whites. A company of soldiers were immediately dispatched to capture them. At Greenwich they were directed by Capt. Patrick to the rendezvous of the maddened Indians, but on reaching it not a soul could be found. Proceeding on into the Stamford settlement they find Patrick with his own former comrade in arms, our Capt. John Underhill. They immediately suspect him of having given the Indians notice of their approach. They taunt him with the treachery.

"He who had led his trusty men so successfully against the bravest of the New England savages could not brook such insolence from Dutchmen, even though in arms. He contemptuously spat in the face of their leader and turned to walk away. A pistol-ball brought him to the ground in death, and the Dutchmen returned to the pursuit of their savage foe.

"Underhill, who had been no friend to the Dutch settlers, now sympathized with their mortal hatred of the Indian enemy. He had already signalized his bravery in the Pequod war. His was already a name of terror to Indians far and near; and to his presence our Stamford colony had doubtless owed their comparative exemption thus far from savage invasions. It was no time for him to rest inactive when his friends and neighbors were exposed every hour to some sudden and relentless massacre. He offered his services to the Dutch Governor, and was at once sent into the field. The troublesome Indians about Stamford were the first to feel his power. With one hundred and thirty men he started from New Amsterdam on a cold and cloudy morning in the February of 1644. They were able to land at Greenwich Point that evening in a furious storm. With the early dawn of the next morning the resolute captain was again on the march. All day did the sturdy Dutch soldiers, under their valiant leader, plod their toilsome way through the snow until, at eight in the evening, they had reached the vicinity of the hostile camp. Soon the clouds gave way, and a clear, bright moon, flashing from the snowy crystals, lighted their way to their horrid work. By a little after ten they filed round the southern spur of a ridge stretching towards the north-west, and the village, a triple range of wigwams, lay reposing before them, awaiting their attack. With marvelous celerity the captain circles the doomed village with his trusty men. Now spring upon them, as hounds unleashed upon their prey, the stalwart forms of more than a hundred warriors, all prepared for their death grapple with the foe. But neither their sudden rush, nor their wild war-cry, could intimidate their assailants. Coolly they are received, a tenth of them captured, and the rest impetuously hurled back. For a whole hour the unrelenting struggle went on. A hundred and thirty men wrestled in mortal strife with more than five hundred of the enemy, and when the doomed Indians were at length driven back within their lines of defense, one hundred and eighty of their fallen comrades were already still and stiffening in the blood-stained snow. Nor would they yet raise the flag of truce or cry for quarter. Each undaunted spirit, left beneath such shelter as his own or his neighbor's wigwam could give, continued the fight. This was the opportunity for which Underhill was prepared. He called for fire. Torches lighted the wigwams. Indian men, women, and children, issuing from their burning homes, were driven back to perish in the flames. Before the morning dawned more than five hundred who, the night before, had gone to their usual rest, were now sleeping their last sleep with the unconscious dead.

"By noon of the next day the victors had already reached Stamford on their way home, having in this signal chastisement of the Indians of this neighborhood secured the perpetual peace of the English settlements."

INDIAN DEEDS, ETC.—THE STAMFORD PATENT, 1685.

The following is a copy of the Indian deed which, in consideration of "twelve coats, twelve howes, twelve hatchets, twelve glasses, twelve knives, four kettles, and four fathom of white wampum," was conveyed, July 1, 1640, to Capt. Nathaniel Turner for the New Haven jurisdiction the lands at Stamford:

CHAPTER LXIX.

THE SOLDIERY OF STAMFORD—THE HEROES OF FOUR WARS.

The French and Indian Wars—List of Soldiers—Stamford in the Revolution—List of Revolutionary Soldiers—List of Stamford Loyalists—War of 1812—List of Volunteers.

THE record of Stamford's soldiery from the period of the French and Indian wars, in the second quarter of the eighteenth century, through the various conflicts which our country has passed, to the close of the great Rebellion, 1861-65, is one in which the citizens of this old town may justly feel a patriotic pride.

THE FRENCH AND INDIAN WARS.

From the town records of this period we find that Stamford was alive to the emergency, and in 1757 it was voted that if the "Lord of London shall send regulars into this town, the town will bear the charge of accommodating them with what shall be necessary for them."

In December, 1758, it was voted that Col. Hoyt, Mr. Abraham Davenport, and Ensign Holly be appointed a committee to supply His Majesty's regular forces, now quartered in this town, with firewood for their guard-room and hospital, and what bedding they should think proper to provide them with, to be paid for out of the town treasury." In October of the same year the government ordered paid to the town of Stamford the sum of three hundred and sixty-nine pounds and thirteen shillings and four pence halfpenny as compensation for keeping a part of Col. Frazer's Highland battalion the last winter.

The following record also appears :

"These may certify your Honors, that the Highland soldiers ordered to be quartered in the town of Stamford, arrived at said town, Nov. 30, 1757, and were quartered there until March 30, '58. The number of soldiers, officers included, was 200. There were also belonging to them, seventeen women and nine children. They were at the cost of the town provided with house-room, bedding, firewood, candles, &c., &c. Their officers insisted upon their being kept within a small compass, which exposed us to much more trouble and cost than otherwise would have been necessary.

"STAMFORD, April 28, 1758.

JONA HOYT,	} Committee to take care of the High- landers."
ABR. DAVENPORT,
JOS. HOLLY,

Among the Stamford citizens who participated in these wars were the following: Maj. David Waterbury, Peter Scofield, Reuben Scofield, Abijah Weed, Benjamin Webb, Charles Webb, Jonathan, Sylvanus, and Deliverance Slason, and Ebenezer and Walter Weed. The records in the State library also show that the following Stamford men were in these wars:

In 1754, Charles Knapp, ensign, was discharged and Joseph Husted chosen in his place. In November of this year Joseph Wood was chosen lieutenant of Capt. White's company.

In 1755, Company Fifth of Fourth Regiment was officered by Samuel Hanford, captain; Joseph Hoyt, lieutenant; and Isaiah Starr, second lieutenant, to go against Crown Point.

March 10, 1757, Col. Jonathan Hatt notifies Capt. David Waterbury that his ensign, John Waterbury, had asked for discharge from having fallen from his horse and broken his leg. Samuel Hutton was chosen in his place.

Jonathan Maltby was captain of Company Two, and on his resignation Ebenezer Weed was chosen captain; Ezra Smith, lieutenant; and Charles Knapp, ensign.

In the east part of the town the company called out in 1747 had for its officers Jonathan Bates, captain; Jonathan Selleck, lieutenant; and Thomas Hanford and Nathan Reed, ensigns.

In the first registry of births, marriages, and deaths is the following entry:

"Joseph Bishop, a Soldier, son of Joseph Bishop of Stamford, died with sickness at Lake George, Nov. 25, at night in the year 1755."

"Stephen Ambler, a soldier in the expedition at Lake George in 1754, son of Sergeant Stephen Ambler, died on his return at Sharon, Oct. 19, 1756."

"Ezra Hatt, of Stamford a soldier, died at Albany Dec. 28, 1756."

"Joseph Ferris, a Soldier from Stamford in the expedition towards Crown point in the year 1756, in his return from the expedition died with sickness at Southfield, on December ye 18, 1756."

THE REVOLUTION.

The following history of Stamford in the Revolution and incidents of that period are compiled from Huntington's historical work:

"At the commencement of the Revolutionary war Connecticut numbered but sixty-seven towns, and Stamford ranked in population the sixteenth. Her grand list was £34,078 8s., which evidenced a still higher rank in means than in population. The year 1775 found her represented in the State Assembly by David Waterbury and Charles Webb, both of whom had seen service in the old French war, and were therefore competent to advise in the present emergencies of the State; and, by an unusual stroke of good fortune, she was also honored in the Senate of the State by the first name among her civilians, the Hon. Abraham Davenport, who also had been active and influential during the long struggles of the French and Indian wars. The long-expected crisis had now come. Everything indicated war. Yet though there were many reasons why our townsmen would be likely to shrink from an earnest contest with the mother-country, they were not altogether unprepared for it. They had both the men and the means to begin and prosecute the struggle.

"At the head of our ministers, of which the town then counted only five, was that patriot and scholar, Dr. Noah Welles, who, since his sermon preached Dec. 19, 1765, to arouse the people over the great outrage attempted against them by the Stamp Act, had missed no opportunity of encouraging his townsmen to a manly resistance against all such oppression, and who, though called to lay down his useful life even at the beginning of the struggle, yet lived long enough to preach his annual thanksgiving sermon, Nov. 16, 1775. In that sermon, a manuscript copy of which is in my possession, he moved his people to a grateful commemoration of the goodness of their fathers' God, as shown them in 'frustrating the plans of our enemies,' especially in their attempts to secure the aid of the Canadians and Indians and negroes, in so signally preserving the lives of our exposed people, in granting the remarkable success attending our military enterprises at Lexington, Charleston, and more lately to the north, in which, though 'engaged with the best British troops,' he assures them we were 'yet never worsted,' and in inspiring the remarkable union and harmony through the colonies in the present struggle for liberty.

"Nor behind him, in his fervent patriotism, was that faithful coadjutor, Rev. Dr. Moses Mather, then the patriot minister of the Middlesex (Darien) Church, and so soon to test his patriotism amid the insulting jeers of the ruthless soldiery who were to drag him from his own consecrated sanctuary, and still more triumphantly amid the cruel hardships and threatened horrors of the execrable Provost prison to which he was doomed.

"At the head of our civilians stood the honorable

Abraham Davenport, a man of college education, long familiar with the public service in civil life, well grounded in such legal learning as enabled him, with no misgivings, to rely upon the essential justice of the Revolutionary cause, endowed, more than most men, with an instinctive reverence for what was right and an inflexible purpose to insist upon it, and, what was of scarcely less value to him for the part he was called to act, the inheritor of a large estate, and the father of an educated and now influential family, who thoroughly sympathized with him in his espousal of the patriot cause.

"Side by side with him, ready to the utmost of their means to sustain any measures which might promise to aid them in asserting the rights of the colonies against the unjust demands of the crown, stood the substantial citizens of the town,—the Hoyts, and Hollys, and Lockwoods, and Knapps, and Scofields, and Smiths, and Seelyes, and Warings, and Waterburys, and Webbs, and Weeds.

"Nor were we without military men for the emergency. There were the Waterburys, then known as senior and junior, the former long a colonel in the Continental service who had earned some reputation for good judgment and military ability in the field, and the latter soon to earn, by his personal fitness for it, the rank of general of brigade; and also the two Webbs, father and son, the one now a colonel, to test and prove his claim still more fully in several well-fought battles of the pending strife, and the other to pay the forfeit of his active and not unmeritorious service with his own imprisonment and death. Then there was the spirited Joseph Hoyt, the leader of our minute-men, who only needed to hear that patriot blood had been shed at Lexington to fly to our exposed metropolis for its defense, and who was so soon to become the fighting colonel of our fighting Seventh; and then our captains and lieutenants and ensigns, and, still more needed and helpful than they, our long list of resolute privates, honoring the name of all our principal Stamford families and cheerfully girding themselves for manliest defense of their homes. Thus with one brigadier, two or more colonels, a half-dozen captains, a full dozen lieutenants, with a number of commissaries and agents of the military power, sustained by a gallant band of the rank and file of the army for independence, Stamford, in spite of the special temptations to the opposite course, maintained her honor in that great struggle which made these British colonies forever free from the dictation and greed of an unscrupulous foreign power.

"An incident occurred in March, 1774, which might seem to forebode indecision and weakness among the patriots of the town. A special town-meeting had been called to appoint delegates to the convention to be held March 27th in Middletown. After the meeting was opened by the appointment of Col. Abraham Davenport moderator, it was voted 'that the town will appoint a committee to meet at Middletown on the last Wednesday in March, instant, there to consult proper measures to be pursued to evade the evils which the town apprehend they are in danger of concerning Susquehanna.'

"After this vote, which for aught that appears was unanimous, Capt. Fyler Dibble and Dr. John Wilson were appointed the committee. The meeting adjourned to meet again on the 14th of the following month to hear the report of the committee. At the appointed time the adjourned meeting was held. The town make an appropriation to cover the expenses of the committee, and vote that the petition recommended by the Middletown Convention should be signed by the town clerk, Samuel Jarvis, in the name of the town, and forwarded to the Assembly at its next session.

"This petition was a lengthy argument framed in the interests of the Pennsylvanians against the claims of Connecticut to the territory then held by her citizens and subject to her authority. The convention authorizing it was made up of delegates from only twenty-three of the sixty-three towns belonging to the State, and their action received but little sympathy from the mass of the people. Their petition was couched in terms indicating an excessive loyalty to the English government and a readiness to abide by almost any decision of the crown. Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, was later an avowed Tory. Capt. Dibble and Mr. Jarvis, of Stamford, also enrolled themselves among those loyal still to the king, and it would seem that the Stamford people in mass were by this action committed to the side of the crown against the Revolution, whose beginnings were already felt and seen.

"But a few months will show how erroneous such a conclusion would be. We shall find ample record to show that during that long struggle the great majority of our townsmen were heartily and self-sacrificingly for the war. Before the opening of hostilities on the eventful 19th of April, 1775, our citizens had expressed themselves unequivocally for the patriot cause. The insolence of the crown, exhibited in the arbitrary and tyrannical acts which disgraced the records of the English Parliament from the time Grenville, in 1763, accepted Jenkinson's Stamp Act as the legal process for collecting revenue in America, down to that most odious coercion act which closed the port of Boston, had most effectually schooled the great mass of American citizens to an earnest and impassioned resistance to any further demands of the English government. Henceforth not even the former concessions to the crown would be allowed; and the people of the several colonies needed only a few months of mutual interchange of opinions and purpose to be fully prepared for their irrevocable declaration of independence. To prepare the way for that declaration the voice of Stamford was not wanting. The Boston Port Bill had been passed, and great suffering was the result. Our patriot citizens felt that the insult and injury done to Boston was also intended for themselves and all who had ventured to question the right of the British Parliament to issue and enforce such demands; and they would not meanly shrink from an open espousal of the cause which had already brought down the vengeance of the crown upon their suffering brethren. Accordingly, they met on the 7th of October, 1774, in the town-house, which proving too small for the patriot band, they immediately adjourned to the meeting-house, when the following minute was promptly passed:

"The inhabitants of this town sensibly affected with the distress to which the town of Boston and province of Massachusetts Bay are subjected by several unconstitutional acts of the British parliament; . . . hoping to convince the people of this continent that notwithstanding our long silence we are by no means unwilling to join with our sister towns to assert our just rights and oppose every design of a corrupt ministry to enslave America, do declare that we acknowledge our subjection to the crown of Great Britain and all the constitutional powers thereto belonging as established in the illustrious house of Hanover; that it is our earnest desire that the same peaceable connexion should subsist between us and the mother country as had subsisted for a long time before the late unconstitutional measures adopted by the parliament of Great Britain; and we hope that some plan will be found out by the general congress to effect the reconciliation we wish for; yet we are determined by every lawful way to join with our sister colonies resolutely to defend our just rights: . . . that we are pleased that a congress of deputies from the colony is now met at Philadelphia, and relying upon the wisdom of that body we declare that we are ready to adopt such reasonable measures as shall by them be judged for the general good of the inhabitants of America."

"This action testifies to the heartiness with which our townsmen entered upon the great struggle against the encroachments of the mother-country. Before the opening of the war the people had been prepared for it. And when the news of the first battle at Lexington and Concord reached the town it was found ready with a prompt response. New York, then rapidly advancing in importance, was thought to be in especial danger from an invasion of the enemy. Joseph Hoyt, of Stamford, who had now for about twenty years been in military life, enlisted immediately a company of thirty men and started for the city. As no immediate danger was apprehended to the city, the company returned to Stamford and reported only eight days' service.

"The bill of service thus rendered would in these days be deemed a model for economy. I append it in full:

Whole pay for men's time	20	8	4
Cash expended by Capt. Hoyt on the march	3	12	0
Cash expended by Lieut. Webb	0	17	0
Cash expended by Lieut. Ezra Lockwood	0	6	9
A sleep with part of the company and 12 men belonging to Greenwich, under Capt. Hoyt, from New York to Stamford	2	11	9
Capt. Hoyt's horse hire	0	12	6
	28	8	4

"The Ezra Lockwood here reported as lieutenant is enrolled on the company list as a private. All of the names are found in our alphabetical list.

"But not thus easily were our townsmen to meet their obligations to the patriot cause. On returning, Capt. Hoyt commenced raising another company for the Continental service wherever needed. By the 6th of July he had organized a company of seventy-five men, who were reported ready for duty. The names would indicate that nearly all of them were Stamford men. This second company continued in the service until Dec. 24, 1775, and the entire cost of the service rendered by them was reported as one thousand one hundred and thirty-nine and a half pounds sterling.

"A third company was raised here early in the spring of 1776. In one of the pay-rolls of this company it is called the 'Company of Col. David Waterbury, in the regiment of forces of the United colonies under command of Col. David Waterbury.' On the list David Waterbury is enrolled as colonel and captain, and Sylvanus Brown as captain and lieutenant. The number of days' service is appended to the names, and this will indicate the company in the alphabetical list at the end of this chapter.

"In the summer of 1776 we were also represented in the service by a part, at least, of another company under Capt. Webb, who were stationed in New York City. How many other companies or parts of companies were raised in Stamford, we have no means of knowing. Our catalogue of Revolutionary men at the end of this chapter, will doubtless fail to report many who honored Stamford in the war. Every record, it is believed, which our town and State can now furnish has been carefully examined to complete it; and every local record has been sought for the purpose of reporting fully all engagements and skirmishes and every form of military movement here during the struggle.

The first list is found on a "muster-roll of a company of infantry under the command of David Waterbury, captain in the Thirty-seventh Regiment of the United States, commanded by Lieut.-Col. INDIANS.

ALTHOUGH Stamford was not the scene of any devastating Indian wars, it must not be supposed that the pioneers lived in perfect peace, with no fears distracting them of trouble from the red brother.

A humane policy was pursued with the Indians, and everything done that wise forethought and just judgment could suggest to cultivate their friendship, but, notwithstanding all their endeavors, the settlement was for a long time in an almost constant state of alarm from threatened attacks by roving marauders. Several murders were committed by the exasperated savages, who witnessed with intense hatred and feelings of revenge the encroachment of the pale-face upon their hunting-grounds, but no concentrated war was made upon the settlement.

In 1675, when Philip, the proud chief of the Wampanoags, sounded the war-whoop through the beautiful valley of the Connecticut, and Brookfield, Deerfield, Springfield, and other towns were successively plundered and destroyed by the enraged savages, the citizens of Stamford were alarmed lest, without warning, they too might meet the same fate. Under date of Dec. 29, 1673, the following letter was written from Stamford to the General Court convened at Boston:

"Wherefore, in expectation of the armies coming against this open declared enemy we have been hitherto silent, but by the long retard and no intelligence upon any prosecution, upon that account we are afraid (it) is laid aside, whereby we shall be much endangered if not cured, if your honors do not by some speedy means relieve us, for we are frontiers and most likely assaulted in the first place."

On the 19th of October it is rumored that the Stamford Indians are in arms, and the Governor warns the citizens to place themselves "in a fitting posture for all events."

That the citizens of Stamford apprehended danger is evidenced by the fact that at a meeting held in March, 1675, a committee consisting of Mr. Bell, Sr., John Green, Peter Ferris, John Bates, and Daniel Weed were chosen to superintend the erection of a fortification and stockade, and at the same meeting it was voted the stockading of the town shall be completed.

The town was, however, never attacked. The invasion of Philip ended in disaster to the gallant chieftain, and not many years elapsed after the close of the struggle ere this section settled down in a lasting peace with the Indians, and in 1695 the following vote was passed by the townsmen of Stamford, for the disposal of the fortification:

"18 Dec. 1695, per vote outery the town doth sell the fort wood about ye meeting-house to Stephen Clason for seventeen shillings and ninepence. The town by outery doth sell ye fort gates ye wheels of ye great guns and all ye wood belonging to ye guns it is now sold to Nathaniel Cross and Jonathan Holly for five shillings and sixpence."

EARLY RULES, REGULATIONS, AND RECORDS.

Oct. 19, 1641, the pioneers designated six of their number to administer the affairs of the little settlement "according to equity, peace, law, and convenience." These men were Mr. Denton, Mathew Mitchell, Andrew Ward, Thurston Reiner, and Richard Crab.

At a "general town-meeting" held in December, 1641, it was decided that the fields of the freeholders should be fenced. Each man's share of the labor of building the said fence was designated, and it must be completed "by the first day of April, 1642, and who-soever hath not completed his fence according to this order, by that time, forfeit () shillings for every rod. Ri. Gildersleeve and Ro. Bates were chosen to inspect the fence upon its completion, "under penalty of forfeiture of five shillings a man if they do not."

The necessity of having roads early claimed their attention, as the following record shows:

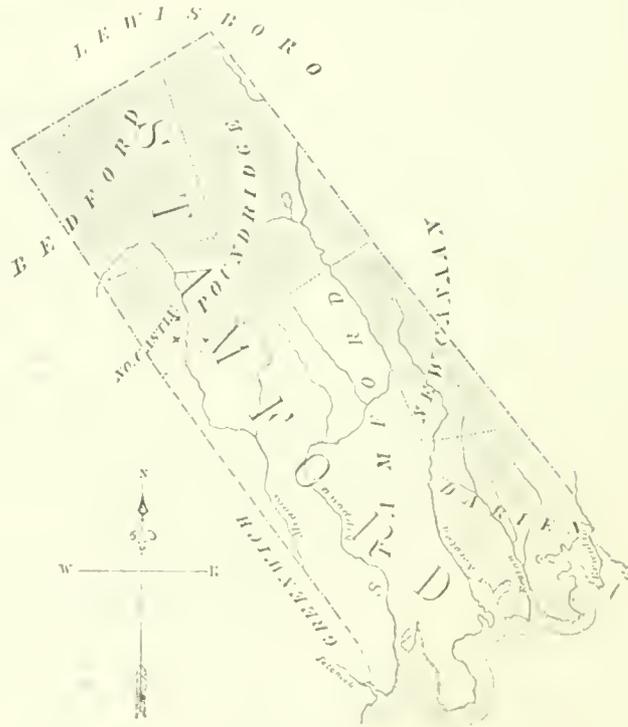

"It was ordered, That whereas every man may count [all as his] Right before his lott to the middle of the street to be his [but the trees he may] fall for his own use, if he like not to let them stand so [

[the ground and clear the way of them, and if do not f[all them and clear] the way of them, to forfeit for every tree not so fallen [] two shillings sixpence."

Under date of June 23, 1651, is the following: "Mikill Shaw being arraigned for working on ye Sabbath to break of ye Sabbath, he being subject of it acknowledging sin and was sorry for it. So is fined 2*d.* for ye work in which he engaged."

At a town-meeting held Dec. 15, 1719, it was "Voted, that the town agrees if an person shall kill any dog forty rods from his master's house, his master not being present, shall have two shillings, provided if he be killed between sunset and sunrise."

Entered this 28th of January, 1701-2, by Samuel Holly, recorder.

The following choice morecan, found in the New York colonial records of this date, will enable us to estimate the influence of Stamford in what has since become the metropolis of the continent. It bears date New York, Nov. 28, 1700, and was written by the "Earl of Bellmont," to the English Lords of Trade, his masters. It will give us a pretty clear idea of the Yankee enterprise of at least one of the Stamford boys of that day. The record will also reveal the natural results of the nearness of Stamford to the great metropolis of the country, indicating thus early in its history how strongly our business men are tempted towards the city.

STAMFORD IN 1700.

Stamford in 1700 was a prosperous settlement, and ranked among the leading provincial towns in the colony. It was the residence of many leading spirits in the various professions and in trade. As an evidence of the importance of the town, or rather of the enterprise of "Major Selleck," the following extract from a letter written to the English Lords of Trade by the Earl of Bellmont, under date Nov. 28, 1700, is given:

"Theres a town called Stamford, in Conn. Colony, on the border of this province, where one Major Selleck lives, who has a ware house close to the sea, that runs between the mainland and Nassau (Long Island). That man does us great mischief with his ware house, for he receives abundance of goods from our vessels, and the merchants afterwards take their opportunity of running them into this town. Major Selleck received at least £10,000 worth of treasure and East India goods, brought by one Clarke, of this town, from Kid's sloop, and lodged with Selleck."

The following sketch of Stamford as it appeared in 1800 is from the pen of Rev. E. B. Huntington:

"Connecticut, at this date, had more than quadrupled the number of her towns reported in 1700,— from 27 having increased to 118. But Stamford, meanwhile, had gone forward in population, from the little scattered community of 585 souls to the respectable township of 4465,— a growth nearly eight-fold in the century, and the growth in wealth had been even greater than in population; while the advance in facilities for travel, and in all the arts which minister to the social well-being of a community, had been still more rapid than in wealth.

"The territory had not yet suffered excision, though the citizens of the eastern part of the town were beginning to think of caring for themselves. The northern end of that portion had already concerted a plan for speedy secession. But we find the town exceedingly loth to surrender a single foot of the territory, or a single vote of the subjects that for more than a century they had ruled and cared for as inalienably their own. The citizens entered upon the contest with those portions of the town which asked permission to leave the old jurisdiction and set up for themselves under new auspices, and the struggle was long and earnest until the secession of a part of New Canaan, and the whole of Darien was finally carried.

"New York was not yet so accessible as to stimulate very noticeably the business longings and educate the business talents of our young men. The days of the old stage-coach had indeed been for years wearing themselves out in the humdrum style of those quiet and sober times, and Stamford was simply a well-to-do town, whose honest and industrious people were mainly content with such gains and show as they could win from the soil, or as they could coin from the sobered prosecution of their varied handicraft.

"In making up our estimate of the condition of the town at this date, let us first see who are occupying its varied offices of honor and trust. The list we shall report, without giving the offices assigned to the several names. Capt. Isaac Lockwood leads our citizens, evidently, as appears from the uniformity with which at this period he is called to preside in our public meetings, and with Nathan Weed, Jr., he also represents the town in the State Legislature. John Hoyt, Jr., is still, as for the last twenty-five years, the faithful clerk of the town, and his large, fair hand-writing will be easily legible as long as the accurate records shall be preserved. Following these names stand the long list of those who in one way and another were found worthy to serve the town of their nativity or adoption. The list is worthy of preservation. It reports to us the names of the fathers and grandfathers of the present citizens of the town, as they sought to do their duty here, sixty-eight years ago.

"LIST OF TOWN OFFICIALS FOR THE YEAR 1800.

"So many and such are the names recorded in 1800 to transact the business of the town.

"There were standing within the Stamford limits in 1800 six church edifices. In the oldest, the First Congregational, Rev. Daniel Smith, a young man, had just entered upon his long ministry, and both as preacher and teacher was laying good foundations for his work. The Episcopal congregation were still worshipping in their first church, standing on the rocks, southeast from their present church on Main Street. They were still in sorrow over the recent death of their first rector, Dr. Dibble, though hoping much from the opening ministry of Rev. Calvin White, who had come here to his aid in 1798. The Baptists were rejoicing in their new meeting-house, so upright and square, overlooking the mill-pond on River Street. The patriarch of their denomination, Ebenezer Ferris, was still with them, and with the Rev. Marmaduke Earl, in charge over the congregation at the Bangall church, was providing for the spiritual training of both branches of the denomination. Two or three Methodist preachers officiated within the limits of the township, though as yet no church edifice had been built for their worship, the private dwelling of Mr. Isaac Reed, their pioneer, still accommodating all who wished to attend their meetings at the centre of the town. In North Stamford, which by this time had outgrown the old title of Woodpecker Ridge, a good congregation were edified by the youthful ministry of their third pastor, Rev. Amzi Lewis. In Middlesex (Darien), the venerable Moses Mather, D.D., the same who for his revolutionary zeal was taken nineteen years before from his own pulpit and marched over the British lines into New York, was still doing good service in his ministerial work.

"Thus, instead of the simple church and its solitary pastor of 1700, the opening of this century gives us six church edifices with six settled pastors, and the gradual preparation for at least three other places of worship.

"Our schools were under the management of three ecclesiastical societies, and the whole territory had been divided into twenty-seven districts, and parts of three others, so as to bring the school within convenient distance of all parts of the town. In Parson Smith's house, still standing south of the Baptist church, and then the imperial mansion of the town, were thus early the rudiments of a town- and boarding-school, in which, for many years, many of the youth of the town and not a few from New York received the finish to their preparation for college or business. Another of these institutions was soon to be opened under the auspices of a son of the town, Frederick Scofield, who graduated in 1801, and began here his career as a teacher. The children of the centre of the town in District No. 1, which then extended from Mill River to the Noroton, were accommodated in that little square structure, with its slight cupola on its top, now standing across Bank Street from the Congregational church. The play-grounds for these children were all that triangle now inclosed by Main, Atlantic, and Bank Streets, the school-house being then the only building on the entire opening. Some of our oldest citizens of 1868 remember to have used those grounds for their mimic navies in summer, and their ringing skate-steel in winter. But that was before they were needed for the various business uses to which this last half century has wrested them.

"Let us look now at the business of the village, that part of the town now in the borough. We shall find here four little stores, in each of which we might have bought whatever the frugal habits of that day needed for use, of dry goods or groceries, not excepting even the 'good creature,' which then had not been voted contraband. These stores were standing, the first just east of where the Union House now stands, next to Smith Weed's house; the second, on the southwest corner of the lot where Mr. S. W. Smith's new brick block stands, and was in the hands of that early woman's rights practitioner, Mrs. Munday, where some of our oldest citizens now living bought their first stick of candy and took their first lessons in commercial life; the third, where our citizens Hurlbutt are now carrying on their tailoring business; and the fourth, on the corner of South Street, where Chas. Williams, Esq., now lives. Where the Rippowam Woolen Mills stand then stood the village grist-mill, which for one hundred and fifty-eight years had been maintained as the chief and most important business institution of the town. On the corner of Parson Smith's lot, about where our jeweler Weed has his handsome front, stood what was called a hat-shop, the age of factories not having yet dawned. The only other building used for business purposes, within the present borough limits, was the slaughter-house of the town, standing then where Dr. Trowbridge now lives, near the northwest corner of the old burying-lot. Of the seventy-seven families then residing on this territory, only one remains, in 1868, in actual occupancy of the same lot and residence, and that is our citizen Isaac Quintard. On all this territory there are no signs of an 'Algiers' or 'Dublin,' of canal or of railroad. Our thoroughfares were one street, east and west, nearly coinciding with our present Main Street; and one north and south, where Atlantic and Bedford Streets are now. Besides these, on this territory, was only a lane from the gate then standing on the corner southeast of St. John's Park, leading over to the cove and down to Shippan Point by the Indian Cave, which itself has disappeared in the progress of blasting; and what was then called west South Street, now South, from the bridge on Broad Street, down to the landing. Broad Street was opened eastward only to Atlantic Street. All other parts of the territory from Norwalk to Greenwich as well supplied with roads as the village itself, and since that date about one-half of the roads in the rest of the town have been opened. The business of the town was largely agricultural, the saw-mill, the grist-mill, and the tannery being the extent, as yet, of our other business enterprises. Darien, North Stamford, Long Ridge, and Bangall constituted four business centres, each of which was no mean rival to the enterprise of the village itself. The old burying-ground of the first pioneers still held sepulchral sway over the very ground where our main street now runs; and but for the new era of steam, soon to dawn, the Stamford of 1868 would but little exceed the sketch which indicates its growth in 1809."

TROUBLES OF THE SETTLERS UNDER THE NEW HAVEN JURISDICTION.

In consequence of the limited franchise allowed the inhabitants under the jurisdiction of the New Haven Colony, the little settlement was the scene of various internal dissensions, and only three years after the first settlement, in 1644, a no inconsiderable number seceded and removed to Long Island, preferring rather to live under the Dutch government than remain under the oppressive jurisdiction with which they had now become thoroughly acquainted, and as thoroughly dissatisfied.

This secession was keenly felt, for among the number were many of the leading spirits of the movement which resulted in the removal from Wethersfield. The following is the list: John Carman, Robert Coe, Richard Denton, father and son, Jeremy Wood, Benjamin Coe, Richard Gildersleeve, William Rayner, John Ogden, Jonas Wood, John Fordham, Thomas Armitage, Edmund Wood, Simon Seiring, Henry Pierson; John Coe, Robert Jackson, Thomas Sherman, Francis Yates, and John Ellison.

By the secession of those who felt themselves especially aggrieved under the New Haven government, it was hoped that all further disturbance would be averted. But such was not the case. No more lenient policy was adopted by the government, and finally, in 1653, a formal protest was forwarded from Stamford, in which complaint was made of their rates and against various other obnoxious measures. Subsequently the commissioners, as the record states, "caused the town to be called together, and being met they found them, for the most part, full of discontent with the present government they are under, pleading that they might have their free votes in the choice of civil officers; making objections against their rates; and propounded to have their charges of watching and warding the summer past, with some other work made about their meeting-house for their defense, borne by the jurisdiction; and that they might have twelve men sent them at the jurisdiction charge to lye there all winter for their defense."

THE GREENWICH TROUBLES.

In 1655, in consequence of what the Stamford settlers considered "indignities," which having been heaped upon them by the people of the neighboring territory of Greenwich, a complaint was made to the court against them and protection demanded.

"The grievances were such as could not be tolerated. The greedy Greenwichers had made use of the Stamford commons for pasturing their cattle; they were disorderly in their daily walk; they allowed both the English and Indians in drunkenness, and so brought on much mischief; they protected disorderly and vagrant children and servants who ran away from their proper guardians; and they had converted their town into a notorious Gretna Green for all sorts of clandestine and illegal marriages. To avoid these irregularities in future, the deputies ask that the men at Greenwich be required to unite under this jurisdiction."

An order was at once issued commanding the accused Greenwichers to submit to the authority of the New Haven government. A reply was sent which seems to have incensed the court, and an order was issued commissioning two Stamford deputies, Low and Bell, to proceed at once to Greenwich and "demand, in the name of the court, the number of their males from sixteen to sixty years of age, to be delivered with the other males of the jurisdiction to the commissioners the next year at Plymouth." The rebellious Greenwichers seem to have entertained belligerent erent feelings for some time, but finally, in 1657, the following declaration was presented to the court by Richard Law, John Waterbury, and George Slawson, at that time deputies of Stamford:

"At Greenwich ye 16th of October, 1656,

"Wee the inhabitants of Greenwich whose names are underwritten doo from this day forward freely yield ourselves, place and estate, to the government of Newhaven, subjecting ourselves to the order and dispose of that general court, both in respect of relation and government, promising to yield due subjection unto the lawful authority and wholesome lawes of the jurisdiction aforesaid, to witt of Newhaven, &c.

"Angell Husted,	Peter Ferris,
Lawance Turner,	Joseph Ferris,
John Austin,	Jonathan Reanolds,
Richard Crabb,	Hanc Peterson,
Thomas Steedwell,	Henry Nicholson,
Henry Accorley,	Jan, a Dutchman, commonly called Varllier."

The court then accepted the declaration and ordered that they "fall in with Stamford and be accepted a part thereof."

ECCLESIASTICAL TROUBLES.

Among the grievances which seemed to breed the most trouble, and which indeed caused the most intense hatred among various of the settlers towards the New Haven jurisdiction, was the limitation of the franchise to church members. Then, too, among the fundamental laws of the colony was that of allowing no one to "maintain or broach any dangerous error or heresy," which meant simply a forced allegiance to what may properly be called the "established church."

As the years rolled on and the settlement increased in numbers, the opposition to these tyrannical enactments increased with alarming force, until at length, in 1657, the following order was issued:

"It is ordered that no Quaker rantor or other heretic of that nature be suffered to come into, nor abide in the jurisdiction, and that if any rise up among ourselves, that they be speedily suppressed and secured for the better prevention of such dangerous errors; and in the following year an act was passed guarding the churches against "the cursed sect of heretics lately risen up in the world which are commonly called quakers."

THE FIRST HERETICAL OUTBREAK.—THE ENRAGED QUAKERS.

The alarm of the government at the innovations of the "cursed sect of heretics called Quakers" was not without just cause, for "while this latter enactment," says the Rev. Mr. Huntington, "was under discussion before the General Court, the heresy which it would punish was being secretly spread through the jurisdiction. It found its way into Stamford. Zealous disciples of the new faith sought to propagate their creed, and found some who were ready to entertain and embrace them. Members of the church became tainted with the subtle heresy, and still more who owed the church a spite were glad to find in the fiery apostles of this anti-church creed the heartiest sympathy and support.

"Nor did the zealous disciples of the new faith cease with merely publishing the new gospel. They were hotter still with zeal to mend the old; they went mad for reform. They renounced the old ministry and meetings and worship, and at once assailed and wished to supplant the civil government which sustained them. So officious were they that the church felt called upon, in self-defense, to enter an earnest protest; and the central government were obliged either to vacate or justify their authority.

"Daniel Scofield, then marshal for Stamford and vicinity, authorized by the Governor's writ, took a posse of his neighbors and started for the western side of the town, now Greenwich, to arrest one Thomas Marshall, who for some time had been insulting and outraging the majesty of the government. They found him at the house of Richard Crabb, who was also lying under charge of serious miscarriages.

"The arrest was made, but not without an attempt at interference by Mr. Crabb, and a torrent of abuse from his enraged wife. Both of these sympathizers, with the vagrant heretic, were put under arrest and bound over to the next court of magistrates, to be held in New Haven in May, 1658. At the appointed time Mr. Crabb and his accusers appeared in court. The witnesses against him were the party who had assisted in the arrest of Marshall, and also Mr. Bishop, pastor of the church in Stamford. The court informed him that he must now answer for his several miscarriages: for his many clamorous and reproachful speeches against the ministry, government, and officers; for neglecting the meetings of the Sabbath by himself and his wife, for whose offenses, as they were justified by himself, he must be responsible.

"William Oliver, one of the arresting party, testified that when they came to Mr. Crabb's to arrest Marshall and seize the Quaker books which were supposed to be in Mr. Crabb's possession, Madame Crabb retreated to another room and closed the door against them. Nor would she yield until the door had been forced open by violence.

"Then followed an exciting scene. The plucky woman who would not open the door of her castle now could not shut her mouth; nor could the utmost expostulations of her more placable husband, united with the utmost array of governmental authority before her, do it. Neither the one nor the other, nor both united, could intimidate the zealous defender of her personal rights. We may never recover the entire speech which that audience were required to hear. It had not been written, and there was no time for the stenographer to be called. It had no formal exordium, fashioned after the calm rules of rhetoric; there were probably but few of those well-rounded periods which give so much dignity to discourse, and the peroration was doubtless as abrupt and pithy as the rest.

"The door being opened the way was clear for her, and she used it, apparently, without help or hindrance, and we may be assured that she had no listless or sleepy auditors to the very end.

"Is this your fasting and praying?" breaks forth the impassioned woman, as she fastens her searching glance upon the marshal and his attendants. 'Do ye thus rob us and break into our houses? How can you Stamford men expect the blessing of God? Will He bear with your mean hypocrisy? You have taken away our lands without right. You have basely wronged us, and let me tell you what I see without your hireling priests' help: the vengeance of God Almighty will burst upon you. And when it comes your priest can't help you. He is as Baal's priest, and is no better than the rest of you. Ye are all the enemies of God and God's saints, and their blood shall be on your souls forever.'

"Fastening her sharp eye on Goodman Bell, the same who from the first had been a pillar in the Stamford church, and who had now come over with the marshal, hoping by his fraternal intercession to win back the estranged and now perverse hearts of his erring brother and sister, she continued her bitter invective: 'Thou arch-traitor and hypocrite, thou villainous liar, God's wrath is on you and shall burn hotter and hotter on your godless children. Out on you! poor priest-ridden fool!'

"Springing next upon John Waterbury, who had also accompanied the marshal to aid in the dispensation of justice, she administers to him a similar castigation. Then she tries the force of her cutting reproaches and sharp retorts upon the marshal, for selling himself to do the dirty work of the God-forsaken government at New Haven, and of the over-reaching and heaven-defying and priest-cursed crew in Stamford. Then she assailed George Slawson, that exemplary member of the church, a peacemaker, and one whom all delighted to honor, and poured upon him her heaviest abuse. He had hoped to quiet her irritability, and in his most winning way had most gently expostulated with her, reminding her of the former days in which she had walked joyfully and hopefully with God's people in Stamford, and in which she had counted the communion of saints there the most precious of all her earthly blessings. He ventured to express the hope that they might again welcome her to their fellowship in the old church, and that she might again listen there to the same gospel in which she had once testified her great interest. This was carrying his persuasion too far. It seemed to kindle her intensest ire. She was now for once put to it for words rapid enough or hot enough to express her rage. Every possibility of indignant resentment in her soul was taxed to its utmost. Scorn and rage and defiance seemed struggling together in her utterance for the mastery over each other, and they seem to have ended the attempt at her reconciliation. It was a settler to that well-meant parley in which her womanly temper rejoiced in securing the last word. 'Never, never, shall I or mine trouble your Stamford meeting more. I shall die first. My soul shall never be cast away to the devil so easily as that;' and, with uplifted hands, she invoked on their heads the most sudden and the direst vengeance which heaven could inflict. When she had exhausted herself in these rapid maledictions, she called for drink to revive her strength; and the ministers of the law could do no more than go through the ceremony of binding her, with her husband, over to the court.

"On the narration of the case before the court, as just stated, the Governor, Francis Newman, informed Mr. Crabb that these were notorious doings, not to be allowed. Mr. Crabb, for his wife, it appears, had not obeyed the summons to attend the court, attempted an apology. He could not manage his wife. He did not justify her evil way, but he would have the court understand her case. She was a well-bred English woman, a zealous professor of religion from her childhood, 'but when she is suddenly surprised she hath not power to restrain her passion.'

"To all this the worshipful Governor made answer: 'that what he had said did greatly aggravate her mis-carryings, for if she have been a great professor it was certain she had been an ill practiser, in which you have countenanced her and borne her up, which may be accounted yours, as having falne into evils of the like nature yourself, reviling Mr. Bishopp as a priest of Baal and ye members as liars, and yt Mr. Bishopp preached for filthy lucre.'

"Mr. Crabb vainly attempted to explain away or deny what abundant testimonies corroborated. Mr. Bishop, the pastor of the church, had been so sorely tried that he 'could not continue at Stamford unless some course be taken to remove and reform such grievances.' Mr. Bell felt that an end of all government had come if the ministers of justice were to be so opposed and insulted with impunity. The 'citizens of Stamford wished the court to preserve the peace among them, maintain the ordinances of religion and government, and encourage their minister.' To all which Mr. Crabb made no further plea. The court sentenced him to pay a fine of thirty pounds, and give bonds to the amount of one hundred pounds for his good behavior, and that he make public acknowledgments at Stamford to the satisfaction of Francis Bell and others whom he had abused. The remainder of the sentence is missing, and so we shall probably never know what disposition the court made of the sharp-tongued Madame Crabb who was really the chief offender in the case.

"No other case of conflict with the Quakers, which was deemed worthy a public prosecution, seems to have occurred in Stamford or its vicinity."

THE STAMFORD ADVOCATE.

NEARLY fifty-two years ago the first paper printed in Stamford saw the light. For nearly two centuries previously white men had occupied the ancient domains of the Rippowams, and the original handful of settlers from old Wethersfield had slowly increased, with comparatively few accessions from outside, until in 1829 between three and four thousand inhabitants were included in the then limits of Stamford. Though so near the commercial metropolis of New York, whose great stride in material progress was attracting the attention of the world, Stamford's associations and traditions made it as strictly a type of a New England Puritan village as could be found in the bosom of the old Bay State herself. But the day of modern progress was even then dawning, and the native shrewdness and sturdy virtues, which had been propagated on this soil, were beginning to be stirred by the pulses of a wider activity. Many of Stamford's energetic youth were longing to enter the business arena in the metropolis, and many sons of Stamford, who afterwards became wealthy and leading merchants, date the first beginning of their race for fortune at about the period of which we speak. Steamboat communication had begun to supplant the stage-coach and the packet-sloops in the passenger traffic to New York, and, with a closer association with the throbbing and busy city, Stamford itself began to wake from its Rip Van Winkle slumber, to be stirred by the first low wash of the waves of modern progress that were soon to become a tide of resistless force.

It was appropriately at a period like this that the local newspaper made its appearance. Mr. William Henry Holly was then, as he was for many years afterwards, one of the most familiar figures on the stage of village activity. He it was who first started the local newspaper, and who conducted it about fifteen years. Much of the space he devoted to the doings of Congress when in session, to national politics, and no inconsiderable portion was given to foreign news, which at that time was peculiarly interesting to Americans by the gallant struggle for Greek independence. Daniel Webster and Henry Clay were the big guns of American politics, and their doings and sayings filled a large space in the prints of the day. The Anti-Masonic excitement was in full blast in New York, and affected Connecticut, too, for more than once the village streets witnessed something approaching a riot when Anti-Masonic emissaries undertook to make public speeches. Stamford's rapid transit to New York was by stage to "Saw Pitts," otherwise Portchester, and thence by a crude steamer which plied between that hamlet and the city. The boat was run by one Cornelius Vanderbilt, whose name and fame as a steamboat manager and railroad king afterwards spread over both continents.

In 1830, when the Advocate was a year old, the borough government was organized, with Simeon Minor, father of ex-Governor William T. Minor, as first warden.

Following Mr. Holly's proprietorship came that of Mr. Edgar Hoyt, during whose editorial career the railroad was completed, introducing at once a new and powerful energy into village life, and opening the way for a large influx of population from outside. Mr. Hoyt held the editorial office about a dozen years, and was followed by Mr. William T. Campbell, who conducted the paper from 1860 to 1867. The paper has been in the hands of its present publishers, William W. Gillespie & Co., thirteen years, and during that period it has been enlarged three times, and its facilities have been increased in a more than corresponding degree. During the latter decade almost every modern improvement known to the "art preservative" has been added to the concern; a brick building of ample size, exclusively for the purposes of its business, has been erected near the post-office, and furnished with steam-power.

How well the paper is appreciated in the community may be judged from the score or more of congratulatory letters written by the leading citizens and professional men of the town on the occasion of its celebrating its semi-centennial, Aug. 29, 1879. All of these letters expressed in the most profuse language the warmest appreciation of the efforts of the present proprietors to furnish a paper worthy of the town, and in keeping with the "age in which we live."

The size of the paper at present is twenty-nine by forty-five, having thirty-six columns twenty-seven inches long. It is Republican in politics since the birth of that party, and is strenuous in its advocacy of liberty and justice to every citizen. For over fifty-one years it has been the most comprehensive and faithful historian of the village, borough, and town. The marriages and deaths, the triumphs, the disasters, the onward march of progress, the notable events of every kind are all to be found recorded in its pages. The names that appear in its early numbers in business advertisements, or as active in local affairs, are, most of them, now to be found on the memorial stones in our cemeteries. A journal so long and so closely identified with this community, and which has demonstrated its capacity to keep pace with the general progress, has surely strong claims upon public interest and support, and it is worthy of note, as showing the strong hold the Advocate has on the community with which it has grown up, that half a dozen attempts have been made to establish rival papers in the same community, but each attempt, save its present contemporary, met with signal failure.

Of late years the Stamford Advocate has become a familiar name in nearly every newspaper office of the country, its articles, paragraphs, metricals, etc., being frequently and widely copied.

The following lines were written by one of the editors and published in its semi-centennial number:

FIFTY YEARS OF AGE

Hail to the Advocate's half-hundred years,
Whose history on its pages bright appears!
Hail to the clustering memories of its youth,
Its sturdy age made vigorous by truth!

How oft in days gone by its voice was heard
Praising good deeds and chiding those who erred;
Ringing glad notes with every marriage-bell,
Voicing the public moan with every funeral knell;
Giving to honest worth its meed of praise,
Placing on victor's brows the wreath of bays;
Bobbly denouncing wrong in every form,
Maintaining right in sunshine and in storm;
Pointing the way where civic virtue lies,
Exposing fraud in every shrewd disguise;
Recording on its comprehensive page
Each act and actor on the local stage,
Impartially it notices as well
The boozey drunkard and the village belle;
The pulpit orator, whose piercing voice
Alarms the sinner, makes the saint rejoice;
The lawyer's eloquence, whose power can light
The shades of black and make it seem as white;
The doctor's triumphs over earthly ills
(But never mentions those he blindly kills);
The schoolboy's spoken piece, the gossip's hint,
Are both next morning in the local print
All things are there,—the little and the big,
The price of stocks, the weight of Jones's pig;
The coming circus, or the minstrel show,
The church fairs that for free pulls always go;
The politician, with his axe to grind,
Who, gaining office, drops you from his mind;
The angry man, who "wants to know, you know,
Who wrote that piece" that riles his temper so;
The "setter" in the village grocery-store,
Crammed with all modern and ancient lore,
Without whose wisdom how the world was run
Is one of the strangest things beneath the sun;
The man who, guilty of some flagrant sin,
Begs of the editor "not to put it in,"
The tortured husband, tired of household strife,
At last resolves to advertise his wife;
The patient mother of a wayward son
Seeking to hide the deeds his hands have done;
The happy father's self-approving joy,
Telling the world about his "twelve-pound boy,"
The farmer who has raised the biggest beet;
The man who wants to open a new street,
And for his scheme demands a warm defense,
To fill his pocket at the town's expense,
The man who thinks the town's rights should barter,
And bear the burden of a city charter,
And he, most patriotic of us all,
Who volunteers for legislative hall,
His only wish to serve the public ends,
But still he jabs the caucus with his friends.

These all have played their parts upon the stage
Whose footlight is the journalistic page,
That beams with equal glow upon the scene
Whether the acting noble is or mean.
Our fifty printed volumes sure must tell
If our own part was acted ill or well.

THE STAMFORD HERALD.

The Herald is the younger of the two newspapers in Stamford, having been established in 1875; but although second in point of years, it is not considered by any means the least in standing and influence. It attracted no little attention in its very first issue for the soundness and thoroughly practical character of its editorials, and its abundant, spicily-written local matter. Such was the favor with which it was received that its circulation increased with a rapidity not common to local papers, soon approximating that of its much older rival in the field, and now it claims—and Rowell's "Newspaper Directory" gives it—an average publication of as many copies per week as its competitor. Its neat typographical appearance and tasty make-up have elicited many favorable comments from its contemporaries, and they have given it the title of "model local newspaper." On special occasions the Herald has showed marked enterprise, employing stenographers at heavy cost when it was necessary for full and accurate reports. Large extra editions at such times have been circulated.

The Herald makes the claim of "aiming to represent thoroughly the beautiful little city where it is located," and of striving to advance in every possible way the interests of Stamford. The general opinion seems to be that the claim is well substantiated. One of its directory-heads is "City Government," there being given under it the list of borough officers. At first the words were thought to be an error, and the editor's attention was called to the matter. But he persisted in retaining the title, and has steadily advanced the idea that a town of the size and importance of Stamford—larger and possessed of greater wealth than some of the cities of the State, being the seventh on the "grand list"—should be a city in name as well as in fact. Finally, and chiefly through the influence of the Herald, a charter incorporating the "City of Stamford" was granted by the State Legislature in 1879. When the question of a city or no city was submitted to the people, however, mistaken but well-meaning "old fogyism" prevailed, and the measure was defeated for a time. As it was, congratulations to the new "city"—"the eleventh in the State"—began to pour in, Stamford receiving more attention from the press of Connecticut than it had in the previous twenty-five years of its history.

The harbor of Stamford had never received from time immemorial any aid from the United States government, although the commercial interests of the town and other Sound ports urgently required a lighthouse at its dangerous entrance and a deepening of the channel. Soon after the publication of the Herald was begun the editor took up the subject of harbor improvement, and so frequently was it brought to the attention of the people and the members of Congress from the Fourth District, and so persistently kept before them in the columns of the paper, that, as a result in great part of the Herald's efforts, an appropriation of seven thousand dollars was granted at the last session of Congress for a lighthouse off the harbor. Next spring (1881) it will be erected there.* A further appropriation for improving the channel, insuring navigation to ordinary vessels at any stage of the tide will be urged by the same paper when Congress again assembles.

Three years ago the question of prohibition of the liquor traffic—a traffic which had assumed alarming proportions in Stamford—was brought to the serious consideration of the people by the Rev. Dr. Buckley and other true-hearted men who had the public welfare at heart. The Herald at once threw the whole weight of its influence on the side of no license and the right, the side of law and order, and has battled unflinchingly for the cause ever since, making many friends by its course, as well as not a few enemies. Stamford for those three years has given a majority for prohibition at each election, and the power of rum has been seriously crippled.

In politics the Herald is conservative and independent, and its editor is not afraid to point out the faults of either party, and does not hesitate to commend in both what is worthy of commendation. Briefly, the Herald is on the side of the good and the right, in favor of progress, reform, and whatever will advance the interests of the people; it is a paper live and true, and well supported because worthy of support.

GEORGE BAKER.

George Baker, editor and proprietor of the Stamford Herald, is forty-three years old, and was born at Green's Farms, town of Fairfield, in this county. He passed the usual course of instruction in the public schools, and received a thorough academic education in one of the best seminaries in the State. When but seventeen years old he began to teach school, and, giving marked acceptance to parents and scholars, continued in this vocation until he was twenty-five, when he became a merchant in Southport and married Miss Emily Jones, of Poundridge, N. Y. Not very long thereafter Mr. Baker, with others, founded a paper which they named the Southport Chronicle. Mr. Baker became editor and continued to hold that position for two years, when the paper was sold to a stock company. Mr. Baker had previous to this time quite an extensive experience as newspaper correspondent, and was at home at once in the editor's chair. He learned the practical part of the printing business "at the case" and press, under able instruction, in the Chronicle and other offices. After disposing of the Chronicle, Mr. Baker soon removed to Federalsburg, Md., where he established the Maryland Courier. Under his proprietorship and able editing the Courier soon took a front place in the ranks of the Peninsular press. The health of his family became seriously affected by climatic influences, and after a few years' residence he found it necessary to bring them from Maryland to the health-giving air of the North. He chose Stamford as his residence, and the establishment of the Herald was the result.

Mr. Baker is a large man, of fine physique, pleasing address, unblemished moral character, and high social standing. As an editor he is courteous, but fearless in denouncing wrongs and rascalities of any kind. From this characteristic, his editorial career has not been free from personal attacks in cases where "the coat fitted" but too well. These, however, do not seem to have altered his course of conduct, but he has kept on in the even tenor of his way undisturbed. It is to be hoped that he may continue for many years in the profession where he can give his ripest years and fullest powers to the cause of improvement.

Mr. Baker's early religious training was in the Methodist Church, his father having been for many years a prominent official in that denomination. He was a member of that Church when he became a resident of Maryland, and united with it there. But the ideas prevalent among Methodists in the South being of rather too demonstrative a character, he withdrew from church fellowship and has not since renewed it.

In political matters he has always been conservative,—not so firmly wedded to one party that he would obey its behests if he believed its principles wrong. As a Union man he voted for Abraham Lincoln, and, with just as strong Union sentiments, he supported Greeley, Tilden, and Hancock. Political office he never craved, and his nearest approach to any real distinction of that kind was when a nomination (equivalent to an election) for first selectman of Fairfield was tendered him, when a young man,—a nomination which he declined on the ground that he was too young. During the war he attempted to recruit a company of volunteers and gain a commission as captain, but, securing only twenty men, that patriotic enterprise failed.

Mr. Baker rejoices in the pleasure which three promising daughters, two in young womanhood, afford. An only son, a bright and beautiful little boy, died in 1878, before he had gladdened the hearts of his parents quite one year.

STAMFORD BOROUGH.

The borough was incorporated in 1830. The petition was headed by David Holly, and the persons named in the act to call the first meeting were Charles Hawley, Simeon H. Minor, Theodore Davenport, and Seymour Jarvis.

The first officers were Simeon H. Minor, Warden; Seymour Jarvis, Clerk and Treasurer; Burgesses, John W. Leeds, William H. Holly, Charles Hawley, John S. Northrop, and David Hoyt; Street Commissioners, Isaac Quintard, Sr., Sands Adams, Fitch Rodgers, Smith Scott, and Peter Smith, Jr.; Agent, J. B. Ferris.

The following is a list of wardens from the organization of the borough to 1881: Simeon H. Minor, Charles Hawley, J. W. Leeds, William H. Holly, Sands Adams, Theodore Davenport, Ezra Scofield, Henry H. Waring, H. J. Sanford, George E. Waring, James H. Hoyt, Chauncey Ayres, Jonathan M. Hall, William T. Minor, Albert Seely, Charles Williams, George Elder, H. K. Skelding, William P. Jones, E. Gay, George L. Lownd, James H. Hoyt, William C. Hoyt, Robert Swartwout, from 1873 to 1881.

THE CITY OF STAMFORD.

The Legislature of 1879 granted to Stamford a city charter. The town was larger than either of two or three cities of the State, and being virtually a city in all but the name, progressive citizens desired to give it the title as well. But when the charter was submitted to a vote of the people, non-progressiveness carried the day and the measure was defeated for the time. The borough limits will soon be extended, however, and then, with an improved charter, the city movement will again be tried, and doubtless with success.

THE STAMFORD NATIONAL BANK.

The Stamford National Bank is a successor of the Stamford Bank, which was incorporated in 1834 with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, on the condition that the bank should pay five thousand dollars to the Wesleyan University at Middletown. There were three hundred and sixty-three subscribers to the stock, eighty-four of whom were residents of Stamford. In 1861 the capital stock was increased ninety thousand dollars. It was changed to the Stamford National Bank in 1865.

The presidents have been John W. Leeds, who held the office until his death, March 3, 1878, George H. Hoyt, and Charles A. Hawley, the present incumbent. The cashiers have been J. F. Henry, Edward Hill, S. K. Satterlee, Charles K. Rockwood, D. R. Satterlee, H. M. Humphrey, F. R. Leeds, Joseph L. Leeds, and George W. Glendenning.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

This institution was established in 1863, with a capital of two hundred thousand dollars. The first president was H. M. Humphrey, M.D. He was succeeded by Charles W. Brown, the present incumbent. The cashiers have been Charles W. Brown and A. R. Pinkington.

THE STAMFORD SAVINGS BANK.

This bank was organized July 21, 1851. The first president was Theodore Davenport. The present officers are George H. Hoyt, President; A. A. Holley, Secretary and Treasurer; and Charles A. Hawley, Vice-President.

The Citizens' Savings Bank was organized in 1869. The first officers were Wells R. Ritch, President; H. M. Humphrey, Vice-President; and William C. Hoyt, Secretary and Treasurer. The present officers are the same, except vice-president. Charles W. Brown is the present incumbent.

WOODLAND CEMETERY.

The Woodland Cemetery Association was organized in August, 1856, with the following persons: Charles Williams, President; William Skiddy, Treasurer; H. M. Humphrey, Secretary; George L. Brown, Wells R. Ritch, William Pitt, Henry Taff, J. B. Hoyt, Theo. Davenport, James L. Lockwood, Oliver Hoyt, and George A. Hoyt. The stock of the association was placed at twenty thousand dollars, which was subscribed by sixty citizens of the town.

The association purchased a tract of about forty acres of land at a point once called Rocky Neck but later the "Uplands," which was laid out by Mr. B. F. Hathaway. The cemetery was formally dedicated July 29, 1861; prayer by Rev. P. S. Evans, and reading of the Scriptures by Rev. William C. Hoyt. Rev. J. S. Dodge furnished an original hymn, which was sung. Rev. Mr. Weed, of the Methodist Church, and Rev. Mr. Francis, of the Universalist Church, made appropriate addresses. Rev. Mr. Mitchell, of the Episcopal Church, read a poem, and the Hon. William T. Minor made the presentation address. The services were closed by a prayer and benediction from Rev. Mr. Booth, of the Presbyterian Church. Woodland Cemetery has been enlarged and beautified, and art has vied with nature in rendering it one of the finest burial-places in the State.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The present organization of the fire department is as follows: Chief Engineer, Joseph Guiden; First Assistant Engineer, Byron H. Lockwood; Second Assistant Engineer, William D. Nolan.

The Rippowam Fire Company was chartered in 1845, on the petition of Sands Seeley, Lorenzo Mecker, and James H. Minor. In 1855 the company was allowed by special act to increase its number to sixty members.

Stamford Fire Engine Company, No. 2, was incorporated in 1854, with the following persons: Andrew Perry, Edwin Bishop, G. K. Riker, T. J. Daskam, George E. Scofield, Jesse A. Reed, J. N. Webb, Theo. Lockwood, William Lavender, Francis Dauchy, Theo. Hoyt, William W. Smith, C. F. Peck, Theo. Davenport, Jr., and Charles B. Finch, and such others as might unite with them, provided the number did not exceed forty.

Atlantic Hose Company, No. 1.—Foreman, John W. Fawcett; Assistant, Justus Barthel; Secretary, Theodore Halleck; Treasurer, James O'Neil. Number of members, twenty-seven.

Gulf Stream Engine Company.—Foreman, Richard Bolster; First Assistant, Michael J. McIntyre; Second Assistant, John J. Reilly. Number of members, sixty-nine.

MANUFACTURES.

Yale Lock-Manufacturing Company.—This business was established in 1851, in the city of Philadelphia, by the late Linus Yale, Jr. It was subsequently removed to Shelburne Falls, Mass., and in 1868 to Stamford. The present company was organized upon the removal of the business to Stamford. In the beginning of operations here about thirty persons were employed. The business rapidly increased, and in 1880 two hundred and fifty persons were employed. The main building was erected in 1868-69, and additions have since been made annually. The chief specialty of the establishment is fine locks, of which they make more than three hundred sizes and styles, adapted to almost every possible use. Their other specialties are bank-locks, decorative bronze house-trimmings, post-office equipments, and Weston's pulley-blocks and hoists.

They confine themselves to good work only, and make no inferior grades.

This company are sole manufacturers under the patents of the following patentees: Yale, Towne, Taylor, Stockwell, Keating, Felter, Shepardson, Leeds, Hermann, Field, Morris, Weston, Hull, Bird, Doyle, Binge, Little, Bramble, Beidler, Dotterer, Arnold, Sipp, and others. They are owners of over one hundred patents.

This is a representative institution, and reflects great credit upon its enterprising progenitors and those through whose influence it has been sustained and prospered.

The present officers of the company are as follows: President, Henry R. Towne; Treasurer, Franklin Underhill; Secretary, Schuyler Merritt; Superintendent, John H. Ames; Mechanical Engineer, T. A. Weston.

The H. W. Collender Company, Billiard-Table Manufacturers.—The factory of this company in Stamford is now the leading billiard-manufactory in the United States, if not in the world. It is one of the principal structures in Connecticut, occupies four acres of ground, is five stories in height, and being surmounted by two ornamental towers, resembles, as remarked by the Scientific American, "more a modern university than a manufactory." This factory employs two hundred hands, among them many artisans of known ability. Its labor-saving machines, devised by Mr. Collender for the construction of tables and other requisites of the game, exhibit great inventive genius, and are most perfectly adapted for their use. The basement contains the engines and heavy wood-working and slate-sawing machinery; on the first floor are the offices, packing-rooms, etc.; the second is devoted to the manufacture of the broad rails and cushions; the third is occupied by a variety of special machinery for lighter work; on the fourth floor are the assembling and fitting rooms; and on the fifth, the varnishing and polishing departments. The office of the company is at 788 Broadway, New York.

St. John, Hoyt & Co., Steam Planing- and Moulding-Mill, Lumber-Dealers, etc.—This business was commenced in 1853 by Richard Fox and John St. John. It continued under the firm-name of Fox & St. John until 1869, when it changed to St. John & Hoyt, and was conducted by this firm nine years. William H. Judd then became a partner, and it is now conducted under the firm-name of St. John, Hoyt & Co., John St. John, Harvey Hoyt, and William H. Judd. The old mill was located on Broad Street. They removed to their present location in 1877. The present buildings were erected for their special use, are furnished with all the modern improvements, and are complete in all their appointments.

E. L. Nicoll & Co., steam planing-mill and lumber-yard, is a flourishing institution, and in all respects a credit to the industrial interests of the town.

Among other manufactures are the Cove Mills,

Stillwater and Roxbury Rolling-Mills, Stamford Stove-Foundry, Phoenix Carriage-Factory, Harding Woolen-Mills, Long Ridge Stove-Factory, Union Brick and Drain-Pipe Works, Shirt-Factory, Medicine Laboratory, and Camphor- and Wax-Factory.

The Stamford Ship Canal was constructed by Joseph B. Hoyt and Joseph D. Warren. The work was commenced in 1868. It was a much needed improvement, and reflects great credit upon its enterprising progenitors.

RAILROAD.

"That was a new and exciting day for the quiet village when, in 1844, a special town-meeting was called to consider the petition of the Housatonic Railroad Company for a road from Bridgeport to Byram River, along the Long Island shore. The town came together May 7th, and after considering variously the strange proposal, agree, with a singular unanimity, in favor of the road, and instruct their representatives in the Assembly to favor it. But, as is the fate with most novel enterprises, this was doomed to delay; and the restive and ambitious citizens of the town had to wait four years more for the fulfillment of their desire. But the fulfillment came, and when, in 1848, the great thoroughfare between Boston and New York was opened, under date of December 19th of that year, we find in the Stamford Advocate, then edited by Edgar Hoyt, Esq., the following graphic note on the wonderful event of the first appearance of the iron horse:

"The citizens of the village, as well as the horses, cattle, etc., were nearly frightened out of their propriety on Wednesday afternoon last, at about five o'clock, by such a horrible scream as was never heard to issue from any other than a metallic throat. Animals of every description went cowering round the fields, snuffing at the air in their terror, and bipeds of every size, condition, and color set off at a full run for the railroad depot. In a few moments the course of the locomotion appeared in the shape of a locomotive, puffing off its steam and screaming with its so-called whistle at a terrible rate. Attached to the locomotive were a lumber- and a passenger-car, and the latter, we believe, is one of the most splendid descriptions now in use on any road in this country. . . . They have not yet commenced running regularly to this place, and it is not probable that they will do so until the road is finished to New York, which will probably be about the latter part of the present week or the first of next."

"By January 1st the road had been completed, and the year 1849 was inaugurated by what was deemed a great marvel, the actual transit of three trains, daily, the whole distance from New Haven to New York and back again. The trial trip had been made on Monday, December 25th, and a single passage in the account of that trip, from the pen of William H. Holly, Esq., who was one of the honored passengers of the occasion, is worth preserving in our history of the times:

"The train had to remain at Coscob Bridge some three hours for the last rails to be laid over it, and the delay gave ample opportunity to the surrounding people to come in and witness the wonderful feat. The general impression among them seemed to be that the first train that attempted to cross this elevated pass would also be the last. All sorts of old women's stories to frighten the children had been put in circulation regarding the safety of this bridge, and many a spectator expected to see our splendid locomotive, elegant car, and confiding attendants and passengers plunged into the deep below.

"Ten minutes before two o'clock p.m. Mr. Mason, chief engineer of the company, gave the word 'all ready.' Our primer was let loose. Every skeptic's heart rose to his mouth. Breathless anxiety pervaded the multitude on each shore. The train moved majestically along, and the next minute the western shore received its ponderous weight, and the welkin rang with the shouts of the congregated people."

"Probably no event in the history of Stamford has had more to do in shaping the future of the town than the opening of this great thoroughfare. Very soon after the road was built all fears of an unfavorable result upon the prosperity of the town were dissipated. We were soon seen to have been made a suburb of the great city. Our talent could find a much readier field for its use in the city, and the wealth and talent of the city a much more attractive home here. The sons of Stamford, who had previously been wont to go to the city to make their fortunes, could now return to invest and enjoy them here. Now, and hereafter, without changing their residence for a week, our sons can avail themselves of all the aid which the city can give.

"The following postscript in the Stamford Sentinel of June 6, 1836, may indicate how much we may have gained in time, at least, from this iron track:

"Just arrived, sloop 'Mary Flower,' Bell, nine days from New York, via Cow Bay, where she was detained by the inspector of the weather. Hands all well, but rather meagre in countenance for want of fresh provisions and ordinary exercise. Left New York where it formerly stood. Business brisk. Spoke two hundred vessels or more bound up, awaiting favorable weather."

NEW CANAAN AND STAMFORD RAILROAD.

"This new enterprise was chartered in 1867, with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, with the privilege of increasing it to two hundred thousand dollars. Its track was so far completed that an excursion train was run over it, July 4, 1868."

UNION LODGE, NO. 5, F. AND A. M.

The charter of Union Lodge bears date Nov. 18, 1763, and was issued by "Geo. Harrison, Esq., Provincial Grand Master of the Most Ancient and Honorable Society of Free and Accepted Masons in the province of New York." It authorizes Sylvanus Waterbury, "our worshipful and well beloved brother," "to form a lodge, to choose his wardens, and appoint other officers, with the consent of the brethren assembled in due form, to make Masons, as also to do all and every such acts and things appertaining to said office, as usually have and ought to be done by other Masters." He is to pay over to the Provincial Grand Lodge at New York, out of the first moneys he shall receive, three pounds and three shillings sterling, to be applied to the use of the Grand Charity. This lodge was designed for Stamford and Horseneck (Greenwich), and parts adjacent.

The records of the lodge from 1763 to 1780 are lost, the only name of the members for that period preserved being that in the charter, Sylvanus Waterbury.

EDUCATIONAL.

It is evident that the early settlers of Stamford not only manifested a decided interest in religious matters, but the education of the youth also received their earliest attention.

As early as Dec. 24, 1670, the following action was taken: "ye towne hath agreede to hier Mr. Bellemey for a scoole master for this yeare," and "ye towne doth grannt and agree to put down all peety scools yt are or may be kept in ye towne which may be prejudicial to ye general scoole. The towne hath grannted Mr. Mather Bellemey a house lot of about one acre & halfe & he is hereby engaged to bouild a habitable house upon it within two yeares, before he alienate it to any one, or els to throw it up to ye towne again."

On the 31st of the 11th month (January), 1670, it was voted in town-meeting "that Mr. Rider be admitted in to the town for a time of triall to keep school as a comite apointed for that end shall agree with him, and if after triall the town approve him and he like to stay they may after acomidate him according to their capacity as they se good. Mr. Seleck, Fra. Brown and Jonathan Bell are chose to treat, and, if they can, to agree with Mr. Rider to teach school in the towne."

On the 2d of the 2d month (April), 1671, the town grant to Mr. Rider "so much timber of the ould meeting house as may build him up a room to the school house of about ten or twelve foot square, and in case he doth remove it shall return to the town."

The following year it was "voted, the towne is not minded to hier Mr. Rider any more."

* By vote, the town indyne all the children that went to any other scoole this last yeare, except only such that went only to larn to knitt or sowe, shall pay their proper fines, fares to the scoole master."

In 1672 there was but one public school in the settlement, and that was held in a building which stood on the corner of Bank and Atlantic Streets.

In 1690 it was voted to build a new house. "The old school-house, which had been built of the remains of the old meeting-house, and must therefore have been a much nobler structure and of nicer finish than the old rude germ of riven logs and plank covering, which it had succeeded, was 'by outcry' sold to the same Steven Bishop who had once, at least, been its acknowledged master. It may show us the times, at least thus much, to report the value of the sale, 'twenty shillings and six-pence,' but we must also report that the town reserved for their own use 'ye dore hings and flores.' It ought, perhaps, also to be added that the school-house, now sold, had been quite recently improved by the addition of a stone chimney, a luxury which had doubtless been denied the home-warmed children in their home-made clothes, down to 1685.

† Ex-United States Senator.

"The progress of the town had now become such that the one school-house was thought to be too small for their accommodation, and the people at a distance from the centre were beginning to feel the need of schools nearer to their own homes. Little schools were held for a few weeks at a time in two or three localities distant from the centre. Temporary schools, also, sprung up to minister to some local want for some peculiar class of pupils, and it became a question what school or schools should receive the sanction or support of the public, at the public expense.

"In 1702 it was voted that 'Ye town doth say that they doth accept ye present scoole by ye parson (Samuel Holly, the town clerk) to teach to read English and to write and arithmetic—is a scoole according to lawe.' It is also voted that

"'Ye towne doth give liberty to ye people of ye east side of norwotton River, and ye people on ye west side of ye mill river, to hire a woman scoole on boath sides ye sd river; and that ye money collected in ye entry Rates shall be distributed to each scoole; yt is to say, to ye three scooles; one in ye middle of ye towne and ye other two above sd, according to ye heads in said scoole; and ye Rate to be paid by ye heads yt Goes to sd scoole.'"

There are several flourishing private schools, among which may be mentioned the Stamford English and Classical Boarding School of James Betts, which has been in existence over forty years; George B. Glendinning's school; the Misses Warren school for young children; Miss Aikens' Young Ladies Seminary, established in 1855; the school of H. U. King; and the Catholic school, which was organized in 1862, and is large and flourishing.

For present condition of schools, see General History.

FIRST CHURCH OF CHRIST IN STAMFORD.*

THE first known records of this church, distinct from the town records, were those begun by Mr. Welles, at his ordination, Dec. 31, 1746. He prepared the folio in which the records were to be kept, as if for a permanent depository of all the doings of the church in Stamford. Its title page, in large round hand, reads:

"Notitia Parochialis Stamfordiensis or Stanford Church records,
Begun Jan. 1st, A.D. 1747.

By Noah Welles, who under the conduct of divine providence was called to office by the church and society in said Stamford, and by ordination fixed in the work of the gospel ministry there. The day of my ordination and solemn investiture according to divine institution, by fasting and prayer with the imposition of the hands of the presbytery, the elders of the churches of Christ in the western association of Fairfield County; The Rev. Messrs. Noah Hobart, John Goodsel, Benjamin Strong, Jonathan Ingersol, and Moses Mather, was Dec. 31, 1746.

"The above list comprises probably all the resident members of this first church of Stamford in 1746.

"Dr. Welles continued here until his death, in 1776. Under his ministry there was a steady growth of the church.

"The three town notables of that day, Col. Jonathan Hoyt, Capt. Jonathan Maltby, and Mr. Abraham Davenport, were made a committee to 'manage that affair.' A few years later, 1762, the society add a hundred pounds of new metal to the bell, and have it run anew. The clock seems to have been a bill of expense and trouble to them, and it was soon removed.

"Another innovation was introduced in 1747. The society, probably out of regard to the wishes of their new pastor, voted to change the form of their service of song in the sanctuary; and this change took place, both in the First Church at the centre and in the new church in Middlesex parish, now Darien. The vote of the First Society in 1747 is: 'Per vote, the society agree to sing according to regular singing, called ye new way of singing, in ye public worship of God.' The vote in the Middlesex society was: 'Yt Mr. Jonathan Bell, or any other man agreed upon to sing or tune ye salm in his absence, in times of public worship, may tune it in ye old way or new, which sutes you best.'

"This change from the old to the new way of singing had been introduced in 1721. The eight or nine tunes brought over with the pioneers 'had become barbarously perverted,' and Rev. Thomas Walter, of Roxbury, Mass., composer in that year, published 'The Grounds and Rules of Music Explained; or, an Introduction to the Art of Singing by Note.' The treatise 'contained twenty-four tunes, harmonized in three parts.'

"In 1750 one other innovation seems to have completed the changes which were deemed of absolute need. After due deliberation, doubtless, 'the society agrees that Doctor Watteses avartion of ye psalms shall be introduced into ye prsbeterian congration.'

"Dr. Welles died in 1776, after the struggle of our Revolution had fairly begun; and the church was left without a pastor until its close.

"The last record in the fair handwriting of Dr. Welles bears date Dec. 8, 1775, and simply preserves the appointment of Stephen Bishop as deacon in the church.

"Several candidates, it would seem, officiated here after Dr. Welles' decease. The church has no record to show that they invited either of them to settle. The society, in 1780, make application to Rev. Mr. Kettletas to supply the pulpit, if possible; and from baptisms performed during this interval, he probably preached some months.

"The peculiar language employed in the records of the society of date March 24, 1777, would suggest that they were not prepared to settle any one as pastor. By 1781 they had evidently become tired of being without a settled minister, and formally voted to endeavor to settle one. They vote, also, to apply to Rev. Mr. Searl to accept the pastorate.

"In August, 1777, they unanimously vote to settle Rev. John Avery. They vote him a hundred pounds annually, for three years, in silver or gold, and to give him three hundred pounds also, in three equal payments, and after the third year to give him one hundred and twenty-five pounds annually.

"The Rev. John Avery was ordained Jan. 16, 1782, and the record is again resumed.

"Mr. Avery continued to preach here until September, 1791, in which month his death occurred. The last records made by his hand are of September 4th, in this year, the one enrolling Abraham Smith as member of the church, and the other witnessing the marriage of John Larkin and Elizabeth Hoyt.

"April 11, 1792, the society unanimously vote Mr. Coe a call to settle, on a salary of one hundred and fifty pounds; and the committee were to write to Mr. Coe and to the Presbytery of New York to inform them of the proceedings. The church, on the 13th of the same month, after listening to Mr. Coe, vote also, unanimously, to approve the call. The answer of Mr. Coe does not appear in the records of either the church or society. Daniel Smith was ordained pastor of the church June 13, 1793.

"A new house on the corner of Atlantic and Bank Streets was dedicated Sept. 23, 1858.

"The following is a list of ministers who have served this church from its organization: Richard Denton, 1641-44; John Bishop, 1644-94; John Davenport, 1694-1731; Ebenezer Wright, ordained in 1732, and died here in May, 1746; Noah Welles, D.D., ordained Dec. 31, 1746, and died here Dec. 31, 1776; Abraham Kettletas, preacher in 1780. He was licensed by Fairfield East Association in 1756; John Avery, ordained Jan. 16, 1782, and died here in September, 1791; Daniel Smith, ordained June 13, 1793, and died here, 1846; John W. Alvord, installed colleague with Mr. Smith, March 16, 1842, and dismissed Oct. 14, 1846; Isaac Jennings, installed Sept. 1, 1847, and dismissed April 28, 1853; James Hoyt, preacher from June, 1853, to January, 1855; Henry B. Elliot, installed Dec. 4, 1855, and dismissed July 6, 1858; Joseph Anderson was called Dec. 9, 1858, installed March 27, 1860, and dismissed Feb. 26, 1861; Leonard W. Bacon, pastor-elect from Nov. 17, 1861, until January, 1865; Richard B. Thurston, G. B. Wilcox, Samuel Scovel."

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, NORTH STAMFORD.

"This church was organized June 4, 1782, and consisted of twenty-two members, as follows:

"Benjamin Weed, Ebenezer Weed, Zebulon Husted, Amos Weed, Israel Weed, Joseph Ambler, John McCullum, Ebenezer Dean, Miles Weed, Reuben Scofield, Mercy Hoyt, Elizabeth Ambler, Abigail Weed, Kezia Dean, Mary McCullum, Mercy Hoyt, Jr., Prudence Weed, Sarah Seeley, Elizabeth Scofield, Rebecca Ayres, Rebecca Curtis, and Rebecca Beedle.

"Previously to this date the celebrated Dr. Samuel Hopkins, of Newport, R. I., who had left his parish when the British took possession of the town in 1776, and who had come to Stamford in 1778 to supply the pulpit of his deceased classmate, Dr. Welles, had been also supplying this pulpit for about a year and a half. He left in 1780, and the church was supplied with temporary preachers until March 23, 1784, when Solomon Wolcott was ordained first pastor. He continued to labor until his dismissal, June 21, 1785.

"The other ministers of this parish have been: John Shepperd, ordained June 27, 1787, and dismissed June 11, 1794; Amzi Lewis, installed June 17, 1795, and died here April 5, 1819; Henry Fuller, installed June 6, 1821, and dismissed Jan. 23, 1844; Nathaniel Pierson, preached here from April, 1844, to January, 1846; William H. Magie, from January, 1846, to January, 1849; William E. Catlin, from March, 1849, to March, 1850; F. E. M. Bachelor, for several months in 1850 and 1851; Livingston Willard, installed March, 1852, and dismissed in June, 1856; John White supplied the pulpit from May, 1857, to October, 1858; W. S. Clark, 1859-61; H. T. Ford, 1862; Roswell Smith, 1863-64; H. L. Teller, 1866-68; Josiah Peabody, 1868-73; R. H. Wilkin, 1874-75; Jesse Brush, 1876-80; R. J. Billings, 1880, present pastor. The church building was burned, and has since been rebuilt."

LONG RIDGE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

"About the year 1840 a union church was built on Long Ridge, which the Congregational portion of the community secured in 1842, when they organized a church and society. The names of the members of the church were Isaac Ayres, Jared Holly, Charles E. Smith, William E. Holly, Alfred Ayres, Ransford A. Ferris, Polly Holly, Harriet M. Holly, Sally Scofield, Harriet E. Ayres, Hannah R. Raymond, Mary W. Smith, Ann M. Holly, Lydia Ferris, Clarissa Smith, and Phebe Scofield.

Rev. Frederick H. Ayres was engaged to supply the pulpit, commencing his ministry Nov. 6, 1842, and preaching until 1853.

From that time meetings have been kept up for the most of the time, the church having enjoyed the labors of the following ministers, none of whom have been installed: Mr. Perry, Augustus B. Collins, John Smith, Ezra D. Kinney, Dennis Platt, — Timloe, — Gilbert, and S. C. Fessenden, present pastor."

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH.*

"The first services according to the rites of the Episcopal Church held in Stamford were conducted by Rev. Henry Caner in the winter of 1726-27.

"In 1738 a very earnest and lengthy plea was sent to the General Assembly of Connecticut, asking that the members of the Church of England in the State might be excused from paying for the support of the Congregational mode of worship. This plea has attached to it the signatures of 636 Episcopalians in nine towns. Fifty of these names are from Stamford and Greenwich. They are Gershom Lockwood, Samuel Mills, Caleb Knapp, John Lockwood, William King, Henry Jones, Benjamin Knapp, James Knapp, Joseph Knapp, Jeremy Peck, Hezekiah Lockwood, Jonathan Lockwood, Jonathan Austen, Thomas Johnson, Thomas Ballis, David Reynolds, John Avery, John Johnson, John —, James Wilson, Benjamin Young, Robert Arnold, John Burley, Nathaniel Hubbard, Peter Demill, John Finch, Benjamin Day, John Hicks, Mills Riggs, Israel Knapp, Charles Southerland, Richard Charlton, Samuel Morine, Isaac Quintard, Joseph Barton, Nathaniel Lockwood, John Kirkham, Nathaniel Worden, Thomas Roberts, and Abraham Rundal, Jr. The above list is preceded by this memorandum:

"Under the care of Rev. Mr. Wetmore. The subscribers belonging to Greenwich and Stamford to be annexed to the general address of the members and professors of the Church of England, in the colony of Connecticut, To the Honorable General Court, in May, 1738; which address having been communicated to us, the subscribers, we hereunto sign our names."

"In addition to the above-named address, these Stamford petitioners drew up a plea of their own, of more than three closely-written foolscap pages, urgently demanding at least a partial exemption from the tax imposed upon them to support a ministry which they could not approve. They asked that at least they might be allowed to join with those of their own church in a neighboring colony (Greenwich), and that they might use their tax for the support of the ministers of their own choice in that colony, 'provided, always, that the said minister's settled abode and residence be within five miles of this colony, and that by officiating alternately in each colony he performs divine service at least twelve times in the year in this colony.' In addition to the preceding names, this special petition has the following: Abraham Nichols, John Matthews, and Nathaniel Worden, Jr.

"The petition was negatived in both houses of the Legislature. In 1740 the Rev. James Wetmore was preaching in Stamford once in four weeks, and this seems to have been the only Episcopal service held at that time in the town.

"The following votes of the town give us our only knowledge of the progress made by the Episcopalians at this time. The first was under date of Dec. 2,

* Condensed from Huntington's History.

1742, and is in answer to an appeal made by the Episcopalians for a grant of land on which to build:

"The town agree to put in a committee to view the place by Mr. Eliphalet Holly's where the professors of the Church of England have petitioned for setting a church house, whether it may be granted without damage to the town, and to make return to the adjourned town meeting; and Ensign Jonathan Bell, Sergeant Nathaniel Weed, and Joseph Bishop to be the court for the purpose aforesaid."

"The result of the examination made by the committee appears under date of Dec. 10, 1742:

"The town agree to give the professors of the Church of England a piece of land, to set a church house upon, on the hill between the widow Holly's house and Nathan Stevens' house—the piece of land to be 45 feet long, east and west, and to be 35 feet wide, when the committee shall lay it out; the committee to be Ensign John Bell, Sergeant Nathaniel Weed, and Joseph Bishop."

"The lot granted, as above, to the Episcopalians was the southeast corner of the present lot held by St. John's Parish, in front of their parsonage. On this lot the first church was built. It was so far finished in March, 1747, that it could be used.

"Mr. Wetmore seems to have been succeeded by the Rev. Henry Caner, of Fairfield, who, with his brother Richard, of Norwalk, and a Mr. Miner, supplied the Episcopalians with what preaching or service they had down to the commencement of Mr. Ebenezer Dibble's long and successful ministry.

"In 1746 we find Mr. Caner, of Fairfield, bitterly lamenting the want of ministers for both Norwalk and Stamford. He reports both places as losing ground, for want of a more constant service than he can supply.

"Rev. Mr. Dibble was rector in 1748. In 1757 he reports his parish united and prosperous. He says: 'We have sundry accessions to the church since my last of the 29th of September.'

"John Lloyd, the same, doubtless, whose name appears as one of the vestry of the church in 1759, in consideration of £313 6s. 11d., received from St. George Talbot, Esq., of Barn Island, N. Y., makes over 'to the Venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts' two tracts of land, one of eighteen acres one rood and twenty-three rods, in Northfield, on the west side of Mill River; and the other of four acres, twenty-nine, at North Street, bounded south by North Street, west by Church of England parsonage, and east by highway. These lands, by the terms of the surrender, were 'to be and inure to the use of the missionary, for the time being, the rector or incumbent of St. John's Church, and his successors, as the globe lands of the Church of England in said Stamford.'

"Under the administration of Mr. Dibble and his successors the parish was greatly prospered. Their first house of worship answered for the use of the congregation until 1843, when the present church was built, where it now stands. This, in its turn, was soon found too small, and was enlarged in 1855 to its present dimensions. But even this enlargement was not found to answer the needs of the parish long, and May 14, 1860, they were called to lay the corner-stone of their new mission chapel, St. Andrew's, between Washington Avenue and Northfield Street. The only rectors of this period were Revs. Jonathan Judd and Ambrose S. Todd. From the summer of 1858, the labors of Dr. Todd having become too great for his failing strength, the parish employed an assistant, Rev. Walter Mitchell, then in deacon's orders, and who was ordained priest April 27, 1859.

"Dr. Todd continued in the rectorship of the parish until his death, June 22, 1861; and his assistant, Mr. Mitchell, was instituted rector Nov. 13, 1861. Under his rectorship the church was increasingly prosperous. He was assisted by Rev. F. W. Braithwaite. On the resignation of Mr. Mitchell, in 1866, Rev. William Tatlock entered on the rectorship, Aug. 30, 1866. He is assisted by the Rev. Joseph W. Hyde. The continued prosperity of the parish is evinced by the building of Emmanuel church at Shinoh in 1867, to meet the wants of the northeast part of the parish.

"The following is the list of the clergy who have officiated in this parish, as far as the records of the church and contemporaneous history have furnished their names: James Wetmore, 1735-41; Henry Caner, 1744-47; Ebenezer Dibble, D.D., 1747-97; Calvin White, 1798; J. H. Reynolds, S. Wheaton, and Ammi Rogers, the latter of whom was degraded from the ministry by Bishop Jarvis, in 1804; Jonathan Judd, instituted rector Oct. 10, 1810, and resigned in 1822; Bennet Glover; Ambrose Todd, D.D.; Walter Mitchell, instituted rector Nov. 13, 1861, and resigned Feb. 4, 1866; William Tatlock, instituted rector Aug. 30, 1866."

ST. ANDREW'S CHAPEL.

"The corner-stone of this chapel, between Washington Avenue and Northfield Street, was laid May 14, 1860, and the house was finished and consecrated May 8, 1861. The persons who have officiated at this chapel have been Thomas W. Pinnett, who in November, 1861, accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Staten Island, and Arthur Mason, Nathaniel E. Whiting, and F. Windsor Braithwaite, who was ordained deacon in St. Andrew's chapel June 17, 1862, and ordained priest June 17, 1865. About the same time St. Andrew's was organized into an independent parish, and Mr. Braithwaite was called to be rector, and is the present incumbent."

EMMANUEL CHURCH, SHINOH.

"The corner-stone of this church was laid June 29, 1867. This neat Gothic structure, of stone, was built by the Missionary and Benevolent Society of St. John's, as a chapel of the parish church. It stands on the New Hope road, about three miles from the village."

BAPTIST CHURCHES.

"The first item of information respecting the Baptists in this town is a statement made in 1769 by Ebenezer Ferris. He had united with the Congregational Church, here, with his wife, Abigail, Feb. 12, 1769, and by October 27th of the same year he had become so far convinced of the invalidity of his baptism as to seek immersion at the hands of Elder Gano, of New York City. His own statement of the change is as follows:

"Having been some time exercised in mind in disputes upon religious subjects, searching the Scriptures for understanding, and becoming convinced that the Baptists, in their practice, are agreeable to the order of the gospel, I made application to the Baptist Church in New York, under the pastoral care of Elder Gano. Desiring to unite with them in the privileges of the gospel, after being examined, they manifested their freedom. Was baptized Oct. 27, 1769, and received into church fellowship."

"From the same records we learn that Elder Gano, in April, 1770, preached here, and baptized Nathan Scofield and John Ferris, of Stanwich, the former having been a member of the Congregational Church from the settlement of Dr. Welles, in 1647. In June he came again, and baptized Nehemiah Brown and David Wilson, of Horseneck, and Moses Reynolds, of Stanwich.

"In the following March, 1770-71, the persons above named, as being baptized 'with Moses Fountain, a Baptist, who lately came to this place, having joined the church of New York, our number (seven) was by said church considered as a branch of the same, residing in Stamford; and to have the privilege of having ordinances of the gospel administered here by the Elder Gano, and to receive into church fellowship such persons as should be judged meet subjects by this branch and the elder."

"It was further provided that Mr. Gano should preach here once a month for six months; upon which the branch 'agreed to meet stately on Lord's day, for public worship, at the house of Moses Fountain. Begun first in April, 1771."

"The following persons were baptized during this year: Oliver Sherwood, of Horseneck; James Winchel, Elizabeth Davis, Hannah Ferris, Rebecca Reynolds, of Stanwich; Elizabeth Rowel, of Horseneck; Mindal Smith, of Bedford; William Brundage and Nathan Sutton, of Horseneck,—making the number, at the end of 1771, sixteen.

"In July of this year Ebenezer Ferris had been chosen deacon. The record states that of the above persons Mindal Smith had been previously baptized.

"Deacon Ferris purchased a piece of land in October, 1771, for a church site, for which he paid £4 10s., York money; and on this site the frame of the first Baptist church this side of New York was raised, June 11, 1772. The same frame stands on the same lot, in the Bangall district, to this day. It is the only surviving representative in town of the almost universal type of the 'Lord's house' which prevailed in New England a hundred and fifty years ago.

"On the 6th of November, 1773, those Baptists who were living in this vicinity were organized into a separate church, Elder Gano being present, and giving them 'the right hand of fellowship.' The list of the new church numbered twenty-one names. They are Ebenezer Ferris, Ezariah Winchel, Nathan Scofield, John Ferris, Nehemiah Brown, Sylvanus Reynolds, Gabriel Higgins, Joseph Webb, Jonathan Wheelpley, Moses Reynolds, John Higgins, Elizabeth Brown, Mindal Smith, Hannah Ferris, Rebecca Reynolds, Mary Reynolds, Elizabeth Davis, Mary Miller, Sarah Higgins, Esther Smith, and Hannah Tyler.

"The ministers who labored here for the next ten years were Elder Coles, 1773; Thomas Ustie, 1775; President Manning, of Providence, 1775; and Robert Morris. Mr. Morris had been licensed by the church to preach, in 1776, but he became loose in his doctrinal views, and in 1780 his license was withdrawn, and he was excommunicated. In October of this year, Elkanah Holmes, of Nine Partners, came here and took the charge. His family followed him the next spring, and he continued here until October, 1784. Mr. Ferris, who had well discharged the office of a deacon, was also thought worthy of the ministerial office, and accordingly, in October, 1783, he was licensed to preach, and on the 3d of the next July he was ordained formally to the work of the gospel ministry.

"Elder Ferris remained in charge of the Stamford Church for the rest of his life.

"The Baptists in the lower part of the town, becoming more numerous, demanded a place of worship nearer than the one on Fort Hill, and accordingly, on the 24th of June, 1790, they raised the second Baptist house of the town, on the lot on River Street, a few rods south of the bridge. This house—similar in form to that on Fort Hill—gave way, in 1856, to a neat church, and this, in 1869, on the completion of the present elegant house on the corner of Broad and Atlantic Streets, was converted into the block now overlooking our village pond.

"In 1791, Marmaduke Earl assisted Mr. Ferris.

"The old church on Fort Hill was finally, in 1806, transferred to the Long Ridge Baptists, and became the Second Baptist Church of Stamford.

"The ministers of this church who have officiated since Mr. Earl's co-pastorship with Mr. Ferris have been Frederick Smith, co-pastor, from August, 1807, to February, 1817; Greenleaf S. Webb, co-pastor, from June, 1816, to April, 1821; John Ellis, pastor, from December, 1822, to October, 1836; William Biddle, from October, 1836, to January, 1839; James M. Stickney, from April, 1839, to April, 1842; Addison Parker, from April, 1843, to April, 1845; Henry H. Rouse, from November, 1845, to April, 1848; James Hepburn; J. H. Parks, to the union of this and the Bethesda Church.

* Condensed from Huntington's History.

"In 1848, the Bethesda Baptist Church was organized, by sixty-two members from the First Church. They built on the corner of Atlantic and Cottage Streets, where they continued a separate organization until the two were happily reunited in 1858.

"On the organization of the Bethesda Church, in 1848, Mr. Rouse became the pastor of the new church, where he continued to officiate until January, 1857.

"Alanson H. Bliss succeeded him, and remained until the reunion of the two churches, in October, 1858.

"At the union of these two village churches, disposing of the two lots and church buildings which they owned, they purchased a lot on the corner of Broad and Atlantic Streets, and erected the elegant brick structure which now stands there. Its cornerstone was laid in August, 1859, and the house was dedicated.

"Its two pastors have been Philip S. Evans, installed in November, 1858, and resigned in 1865, and Edward Lathrop, D.D., who was installed Feb. 22, 1866.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

"There seems to have been no record of the early Methodist movement in this vicinity, and it is doubtful whether any was made for several years after this denomination began its labors here. The earliest records now existing are those begun in 1830 by Rev. Daniel De Vinne, who was then stationed here. He introduces his records with a historical sketch, from which I take the following statement:

"The first regular society of the Methodist Episcopal Church in this town was formed about the year 1788. What circumstance led our ministers to this place, who was the first preacher, or who formed the first class, cannot at present be ascertained. But it is most probable that it was the Rev. Samuel Q. Talbot or Peter Moriarty, who traveled on the New Rochelle Circuit. The next year, 1789, the Rev. Jesse Lee and Andrew Van Nostrand were appointed to Stamford Circuit. On their arrival at this place, they found kindred spirits, who had drunk at the same fountain with themselves,—Sister Elsie Scofield, who is now (1836) living, had been awakened by his ministry in this village, at the house of Mr. Gurnsey, some years previous to 1791, the time at which she joined the infant society in this place; Mrs. Martha Reed, who has been awakened by the ministry of the Rev. Freeborn Garretson, in Shelburn, Nova Scotia, settling in this village in 1790. Immediately on her arrival she attached herself to the class, which consisted of about twelve, over which one Enos Weed was placed as leader. The stated meetings were held at the house of a Mr. Lockwood, now owned by Mrs. Smith, near the present Methodist Episcopal church; and the preachers were entertained by Gen. Waterbury, near the harbor, whose wife and sister were members.

"Mr. Isaac Reed, who during the Revolutionary war had become a Christian, joined the church at the same time, with his wife, and invited the congregation and ministers to hold their public meetings in his house. In this place the ark of Methodism rested for nineteen years, and this excellent family subjected themselves, during all this time, to the inconvenience of accommodating, almost weekly, meetings, supporting the preachers and their horses, and also furnishing more than their quota of traveling expenses.

"After frequent petitions, the town, which was at that time under the influence of the Congregational order, granted to the "Famatics" a place—a mud-hole—on the commons on which to build a church. About 1813 the church was finished and dedicated, and six years after was cleared of debt."

"Such, probably, was the origin of this enterprising denomination of Christians in this village. Our town records show that the selectmen were empowered, Feb. 17, 1814, 'to give a lease for ninety-nine years to the trustees of the Methodist Society of a spot of ground near the dwelling-house of Fred. Hoyt, on the west side of the old burying-ground, for the purpose of erecting a meeting-house.' This must have been the 'mud-hole' referred to in the preceding statement. It was a little to the east of the present site of the Methodist church on the park, and the frame of that first church still stands on River Street, the second house from the corner of Park Place.

"The only names on the record of this church for thirty years are the following: Martha Reed, Elsy Scofield, Lanney Garnsey, Jonathan Brown, Ezra Garnsey, John Thompson, William Waterbury, Lois Waterbury, Hannah Brown, Richard Scofield, Hephzibah Scofield, Joseph Selleck, Phebe Selleck, Solomon Smith, Polly Smith, Isaac Wardwell, Jane Weeks, Mary Trowbridge, Joanna Augusta Devinne, Nancy H. Lockwood, James H. Trowbridge, Phebe Adams, Nancy Knapp, and Margaret Valentine.

"The second Methodist church built in the village was finished and dedicated Oct. 12, 1813. It stood northwest of the first house, where it was used by the society until 1859.

"The present Methodist church was dedicated Feb. 16, 1859.

"The following is a list of the ministers of this denomination, so far as we have been able to secure them: 1788, S. Q. Talbot and P. Moriarty; 1789, Jesse Lee and Andrew Van Nostrand; 1790, Freeborn Garretson; 1812, Samuel Luckey; 1813, Thomas Drummond and Benjamin Griffin; 1814, Phineas Rice and Benjamin Griffin; 1815, Coles Carpenter and Theodosius Clark; 1816, Theodosius Clark and Aaron Hunt; 1817, John Reynolds, two years; 1819, John M. Smith and Samuel D. Ferguson; 1820, Elisha P. Jacob and John M. Smith; 1821, John B. Matthias, two years; 1822, Eli Denniston, two years; 1823, Jarvis Z. Nichols; 1824, Nathaniel Porter and Noble W. Thomas, two years; 1825, Cyrus Foss; 1826, Elijah Woolsey, two years, and Luman Andrews; 1827, Samuel T. Fisher, two years; 1828, Daniel D. Vinne, two years; 1829, Edward Oldren; 1830, Samuel Corcoran and Daniel L. Wright, two years; 1831, Henry Hatfield, two years; 1832, John Lovejoy; 1833, E. Hibbard, Abraham S. Francis, and George Brown; 1834, Oliver V. Ammerman and Charles Stearns; 1835, Richard Seaman and Zachariah Davenport; 1836, A. S. Hill, two years, and D. B. Ostrander, Jr.; 1837, William Gothard, two years; 1838, Edward Oldren, two years; 1839, S. J. Stebbins, two years; 1840, John Tackerbury; 1842, George Brown; 1844, Peter C. Oakley; 1846, Aaron Rodgers; 1850, Friend W. Smith; 1852, Albert Nash; 1854, Samuel Smith; 1856, George Dmubar; 1858, Robert M. Hatfield, D.D.; 1860, L. S. Weed, D.D.; 1862, Thomas Birch, D.D.; HIGHRIDGE.

"From the historical sketch drawn up by Mr. De Vinne in 1830, we learn that this organization, then called the Dantown Church, is the oldest Methodist Church on the Stamford Circuit. We learn, also, that the Stamford Circuit is the oldest circuit in New England. It appears that one Henry Eames, who had been converted under Wesley's preaching in Ireland, came to this country and settled in the south part of Poundridge. He soon gathered about him a number 'of the sons of the gospel of his spiritual Father, and invited them to his house.' These became the nucleus of a church and society.

"Some time in the year 1787 the Rev. Samuel Q. Talbot, stationed on New Rochelle Circuit, came to these neglected parts, preached in several places, and formed several in a class, some of whom remain to this day (1830).

"The first house of worship built by this society stood just across the Stamford line, in Poundridge, where the church held their meetings until 1841, when the present chapel was built for them on Highridge. The only two names now on the records of the Dantown Church for the year 1787 are Samuel and Rubamah Dann. In 1797 these two are added; Sarah Selleck and Hannah Deforest; and in 1799 these four: John Slauson, Rhoda Slauson, Enoch Stevens, and Ruhamah Bishop.

"The Stamford Circuit was already organized before 1790, the year in which the three circuits of New Haven, Hartford, and Litchfield were established, and when, according to the "Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of Connecticut," there were but four Methodist ministers in New England. The ministers of this church have been the same as those who have officiated at Huntingridge and Poundridge. The present pastor is Rev. A. R. Goodenow.

LONG RIDGE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

"My account of this church is also taken from the records of the Stamford Circuit, as made out in 1830 by Mr. De Vinne: 'About the year 1809, Mrs. Phebe Mead moved into this neighborhood, and, finding no religious meetings, invited the Methodist ministers to come and preach at her house. The first who accepted the invitation and preached was Daniel Welply, a local preacher. Some time after him the Rev. Eben Smith occasionally visited the place and preached.

"When the Rev. John Reynolds was appointed to this circuit, he preached here some time steadily, although it was even to a single family. About the year 1819, when the Rev. John M. Smith traveled, the preaching was moved to the school-house, in which place it has continued ever since; that is, until 1830."

BANGALL CHAPEL.

This chapel was built before 1831."

HUNTING RIDGE.

"This chapel was built in 1850, the Rev. Walter W. Brewer having previously labored successfully for two years in gathering a congregation on the Ridge. Mr. Brewer subsequently made the Ridge his home, where he died, in 1868, much esteemed for his piety and usefulness, and among the ministers who have officiated since then have been Miles Olmstead, Joseph Heuton, John A. Silleck, Harvey Husted, T. D. Littlewood, William Crawford, William Ross, — Monson, — Maguire, and Rev. A. R. Goodenow."

UNIVERSALIST CHURCH, LONG RIDGE.

"For the following facts, respecting this society, I am indebted to Rev. Eber Francis, formerly of this town:

"During the Revolutionary war, Richard Sibley, a Universalist, came from Long Island and settled on Long Ridge; and, so far as is known, he was the first resident who openly avowed Universalist sentiments in the town. Solomon Glover, of Newtown, Conn., a few years later, came down occasionally and preached in the school-house on the Ridge. Mr. Ferris, Mr. Dykeman, Mr. Babbitt, and Thomas F. King were successively employed as preachers on the circuit to which Long Ridge belonged. This Mr. King was father of the late lamented lecturer and preacher, T. Starr King, of San Francisco. From the removal of Mr. King in 1825 to 1832 there was no stated preaching here. Rev. Shaler J. Hillyer was settled here at this date, preaching a part of the time.

"The formal organization of the society bears date April 27, 1833. Fourteen persons gave in their names to constitute the society.

"Of them the late Ebenezer Deau, Esq., was chosen moderator, and Smith R. Sibley clerk. The first committee were Geo. Lounsbury, William Todd, and Aaron Dean.

"In October, 1834, the present house of worship having been completed, it was formally 'dedicated to the worship of Almighty God,' with appropriate solemnities, the Rev. Dr. Sawyer, of New York, preaching on the occasion. For years this was the only house for public worship in that part of the town. Rev. J. C. Partridge is the present pastor."

SECOND UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY.

"For a number of years there had been irregular preaching here by ministers of the Universalist denomination, when in the spring of 1835 the Rev. F. Hitchcock accepted a call to settle here. He was succeeded by Rev. S. J. Hillyer, who also remained but a short time, and was succeeded by Rev. B. B. Hallock. The society was not organized until 1841, at which time thirteen persons subscribed the constitution. Its committee were William H. Potts, William E. Young, and James B. Scofield. In 1844 the society took steps towards building, having mainly depended upon the town-house for a place to worship. They purchased the corner lot on which their church now stands. The church was dedicated Feb. 5, 1846, during the ministry of Mr. Hallock. The following ministers have succeeded Mr. Hallock: J. J. Twiss, J. H. Moore, two years; C. H. Fay, two years; Asa Countryman, one year; Eben Francis, and J. Smith Dodge, Jr. Rev. M. Nash is present pastor."

CATHOLIC CHURCH.

"The first Catholic services in Stamford, of which we have any account, were held by Rev. John Smith, in September, 1842, in the house of P. H. Drew, in West Stamford. At that date there were but three Catholic families in the town. Services were held there monthly until 1846. Mr. Drew removing to the old 'Webb Place' on South Street, services were there held, first, by the Right Rev. Bishop Tyler. Here the meetings of this denomination were continued by several ministers until the church on Meadow street was built in 1851. Since then the Catholic population has increased very rapidly.

"The following priests have been stationed here: James Brady, Edward Coney, James Reynolds, James O'Neil, John Fagan, Michael Tierney, and William H. Rogers, H. T. Walsh, assistant.

"In 1869 the church commenced the erection of a church edifice, which is now in process of construction, and when completed will be one of the finest and most substantial in the State."

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF STAMFORD.

The first records of any movement towards organizing a Presbyterian Church in Stamford are found among the records of the Congregational Church. After the communion service of Jan. 2, 1853, in a church-meeting, the following members of the Congregational Church called for letters of dismission from the church, to constitute a Presbyterian Church about to be formed: Augustus R. Moen, Alexander Milne, George Ehler, James D. Hall, Luke Baker, Hiram Warner, James Robinson, John Holmes, Mrs. Sophia A. Moen, Miss Cornelia A. Moen, Hannah E. Elder, Mrs. Mary E. Hall, Mrs. Almira Baker, Mrs. Sophia Warner, Miss Elizabeth M. Warner, Mrs. Georgette A. Robinson, Mrs. Catharine Helmes.

Letters of dismission were voted to these members of the church, according to the rules of the church, Jan. 16, 1853. During the next few weeks similar letters were given to the following members of the Congregational Church: Wells R. Ritch, Mary Ann Sturges, Elizabeth Sturges, Mrs. Anzi Ayres, Miss Matilda Moen, Mrs. Sarah A. Ritch, Miss Sarah L. Ritch.

This church was organized Feb. 25, 1853, with twenty-six members. It has since then added about two hundred and fifty to its membership, and is one of the wealthiest of our churches. Its ministers have been J. L. Corning, installed April 19, 1853, and resigned Oct. 15, 1856. He is now settled in Poughkeepsie. R. R. Booth, D.D., installed March 4, 1857, and resigned in February, 1861, to accept the pastorate of the Mercer Street Presbyterian Church, in New York; James P. Leeds preached very acceptably one year; Dwight R. Bartlett, installed April 11, 1862, resigned in February, 1864; Samuel P. Halsey, installed March 8, 1865, and resigned Feb. 7, 1867; A. S. Twombly, installed April 30, 1868; — Van Slyke, Rich. P. H. Vail.

The church edifice was enlarged, remodeled, and repaired in 1877, and the seating capacity about doubled.

Mission Chapel.—This chapel of the First Presbyterian Church grew out of a movement organized in 1859 to supply a local want in the Wescott neighborhood. It is situated on the "Cove" road, and was built in 1868.

Union Chapel, at New Hope, was built in 1858, and was dedicated Jan. 27, 1859.

Union Chapel, turn of the river, was built and dedicated in 1860.

There is also an Episcopal chapel located at Spring Dale.

Near the close of the war he was attached to the schooner "Savannah," for instruction of volunteer officers, and stationed in New York Harbor. He was also assigned to the gunboat "Toga," of the Gulf Squadron.

ford it has been prominently identified with its interests.

Isaac Quintard was captain of the first company of militia in Stamford, organized in 1775. In 1738, Isaac Quintard was one who signed (with many others) an appeal to the General Assembly of Connecticut to deliver the members of the Episcopal Church from paying tithes to the Congregational Church.

Mr. Quintard married Mrs. Charissa (Hoyt) Shay. They have had five children,—George W., a leading business man of New York City; Charles Todd, Episcopal Bishop of Tennessee; Edward Augustus, a heavy coal operator; Mary C. (Mrs. Rufus Hoyt); and Virginia (Mrs. Augustus W. Payne, of New York City).

For many years he has occupied either the position of vestryman or warden of St. John's Episcopal Church, Stamford.

In early life Mr. Quintard was a Whig in politics, and on the organization of the Republican party became an unwavering supporter of its principles.

In all the relations of life Mr. Quintard has ever been an honest, refined, and unassuming gentleman. He has had for years the companionship of the better classes of this country and Europe, and can look back on an unusually long life without a wish to alter or erase one act inscribed on the tablet of memory, and has the satisfaction of knowing that his descendants are honored with the esteem and confidence of all who know them, and are occupying positions of exceptional trust, honor, and worth, and filling their places with marked ability.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ISAAC QUINTARD.

Isaac Quintard, son of Isaac and Hannah (Palmer) Quintard, was born in Stamford, Conn., May 15, 1794. He carries the name of the first pioneer of the family in Stamford. This Isaac Quintard, as his gravestone in the northeast corner of the Episcopal burying-ground testifies, was "born in Bristol, in Old England," and died in 1738, aged forty-two years. He came of French Huguenot ancestry, and the descent carries with it all of the firm integrity, devotion to principle, and chivalric bearing of its origin. The first appearance noted in the records of Stamford of the name is a sale of land from Robert Embree to Isaac Quintard, of New York City, merchant, under date of Oct. 1, 1708. The marriage of Isaac Quintard and Hannah Knapp was recorded in 1716. The chain of genealogy is through Peter, born in 1730, who married, in 1761, Elizabeth De Mille, and his son Isaac, whose third son, Isaac, is the one whose portrait is shown on another page. He now occupies the house where he was born, and is residing on land for years in possession of his family. Of the seventy-seven families residing in the limits of the borough in 1800, the only one in actual occupancy of the same lot and residence is that of Mr. Quintard.

WILLIAM H. DIBBLE.

William H. Dibble, son of Ezra and Charissa (Weed) Dibble, was born in Stamford, Jan. 4, 1811.

His paternal grandfather, Nehemiah, lived in Danbury, where also resided his two brothers, Daniel and Joseph. All were noted for longevity, Nehemiah dying aged about ninety, Daniel about ninety-five, and Joseph in his one hundred and first year. During the Revolution, Gen. Tryon, in command of British troops, visited Danbury and burned the entire village with the exception of Nehemiah's house, which he made his headquarters. This house was taken down about 1870, and many people came to secure pieces as relics of the olden time.

Ezra, son of Nehemiah, was born in Danbury, and, after learning the latter's trade there, came to Stamford and established a hat-manufactory, marrying, Dec. 25, 1808, Charissa, daughter of Benjamin Weed, of an old Stamford family. Her father was an officer in the Revolution, where he received three bullets, which he carried during life.

Mr. Dibble, in connection with his manufacturing, established three wholesale stores in Charleston, S. C., and Richmond and Norfolk, Va. In 1817 he retired from business, going back to Danbury. After ten years' residence there he again moved to Stamford, and bought the place where his son William now lives. He had by inheritance forty acres of land, lying immediately opposite his purchase, which Nehemiah had bought after the Revolution for one pound per acre. In 1827, when Mr. Dibble made this purchase, there was but one house between his residence and the village. Mr. Dibble died with sunstroke, aged seventy-six years, leaving two sons, William H. and Samuel Benjamin.

From the removal to Stamford, William H. was the real head of the family. His father knowing nothing of farming, William had to supervise everything, and from that time he has resided there as proprietor. About 1848, Mr. Dibble opened a select boarding-house for summer entertainment of the élite of New York City. He has conducted this since that time, entertaining sometimes as many as eighty guests at once. He has also engaged largely in fruit culture, and has now some twenty acres of choice varieties of large and small fruits. He has been very successful in business and extremely fortunate in dealing in stocks, and holds a high financial standing.

Mr. Dibble married, April 19, 1835, Ann Eliza, daughter of Alpheus Webber, of Kinderhook, N. Y. She died in 1839. They had one child, Harriet E., who lives with her father. June 26, 1849, he married Mary Ann, daughter of Philip and Aurelia (Booth) Walker, of Bridgeport. She was born Dec. 28, 1813. Their children attaining maturity are Mary Catharine (Mrs. Benjamin F. Mosher, of Greenwich; she died Aug. 9, 1869, leaving one daughter, Clara Dibble, who has been cared for by Mr. and Mrs. Dibble ever since) and Carrie Augusta, who died Aug. 5, 1876, aged twenty-three years.

Samuel B. Dibble was born Sept. 1, 1813. He went as a dry-goods dealer to New Jersey when only fifteen, and established in Rahway and Trenton. He lived there some years, married, and moved to New York, his wife's former home, and shortly afterwards, March, 1843, died, aged not quite forty years.

CAPT. BENJAMIN L. WAITE.

Benjamin St. Leger Waite, son of Capt. Isaac Waite and Elizabeth St. Leger, was born in Liverpool, England, the birthplace of his mother, about 1805.

His father was born in Portland, Maine, about 1774, and was for a long time commander of the favorite packet-ship "Anna Maria," running between New York and Liverpool. He was one of the oldest navigators engaged in the packet business, and even at that early day the foundation of the packet popularity, which grew to such a magnitude of prosperity, was strongly laid. He died at Westport, Conn., Feb. 14, 1849, much respected.

Capt. B. L. Waite was trained to the sea from infancy, crossing the Atlantic repeatedly while but a child. His education, begun in England, was finished in New York. His taste for a seaman's life became so marked that at the age of sixteen, having finished the study of navigation, his father sent him in a ship to China, that by the discipline of so long a voyage he might be the better fitted for his life-work. When only nineteen he was placed in command of the Liverpool packet-ship "Superior." In 1832 he was made captain of the "Pacific," in 1834 of the "Britannia," and in 1835 of the "England,"—all three of the once famous "Black Ball" line of Liverpool packets.

Capt. Waite very early acquired the reputation of a skillful and careful navigator, and the confidence reposed in him by owners and passengers was well justified. During his life he crossed the Atlantic more than one hundred and sixty times, and while captain of the "Black Ball" line conveyed over twelve hundred first-class passengers, yet never met with serious disaster, although he encountered some of the most severe storms, where promptitude, caution, and skill all were needed to save his ship. In the "England" he made some of the shortest passages ever accomplished by sailing-ships. Numerous and valuable testimonials from his passengers show how highly he was appreciated. These comprised many of the most distinguished persons crossing the ocean in his day, and his urbane and gentlemanly character and thorough seamanship alike won confidence and regard.

As a commander Capt. Waite was unsurpassed. When his quick, clear, full voice was heard from the deck every man was on the alert, and his sailors became so attached to him that they would wait weeks to re-ship with him. Resolute and without fear in the hour of danger, he had a large amount of tenderness and charity, and never soiled his manhood by a cruel act. He fully exemplified the truth that "the bravest are the tenderest," and none who knew him could breathe malice against him.

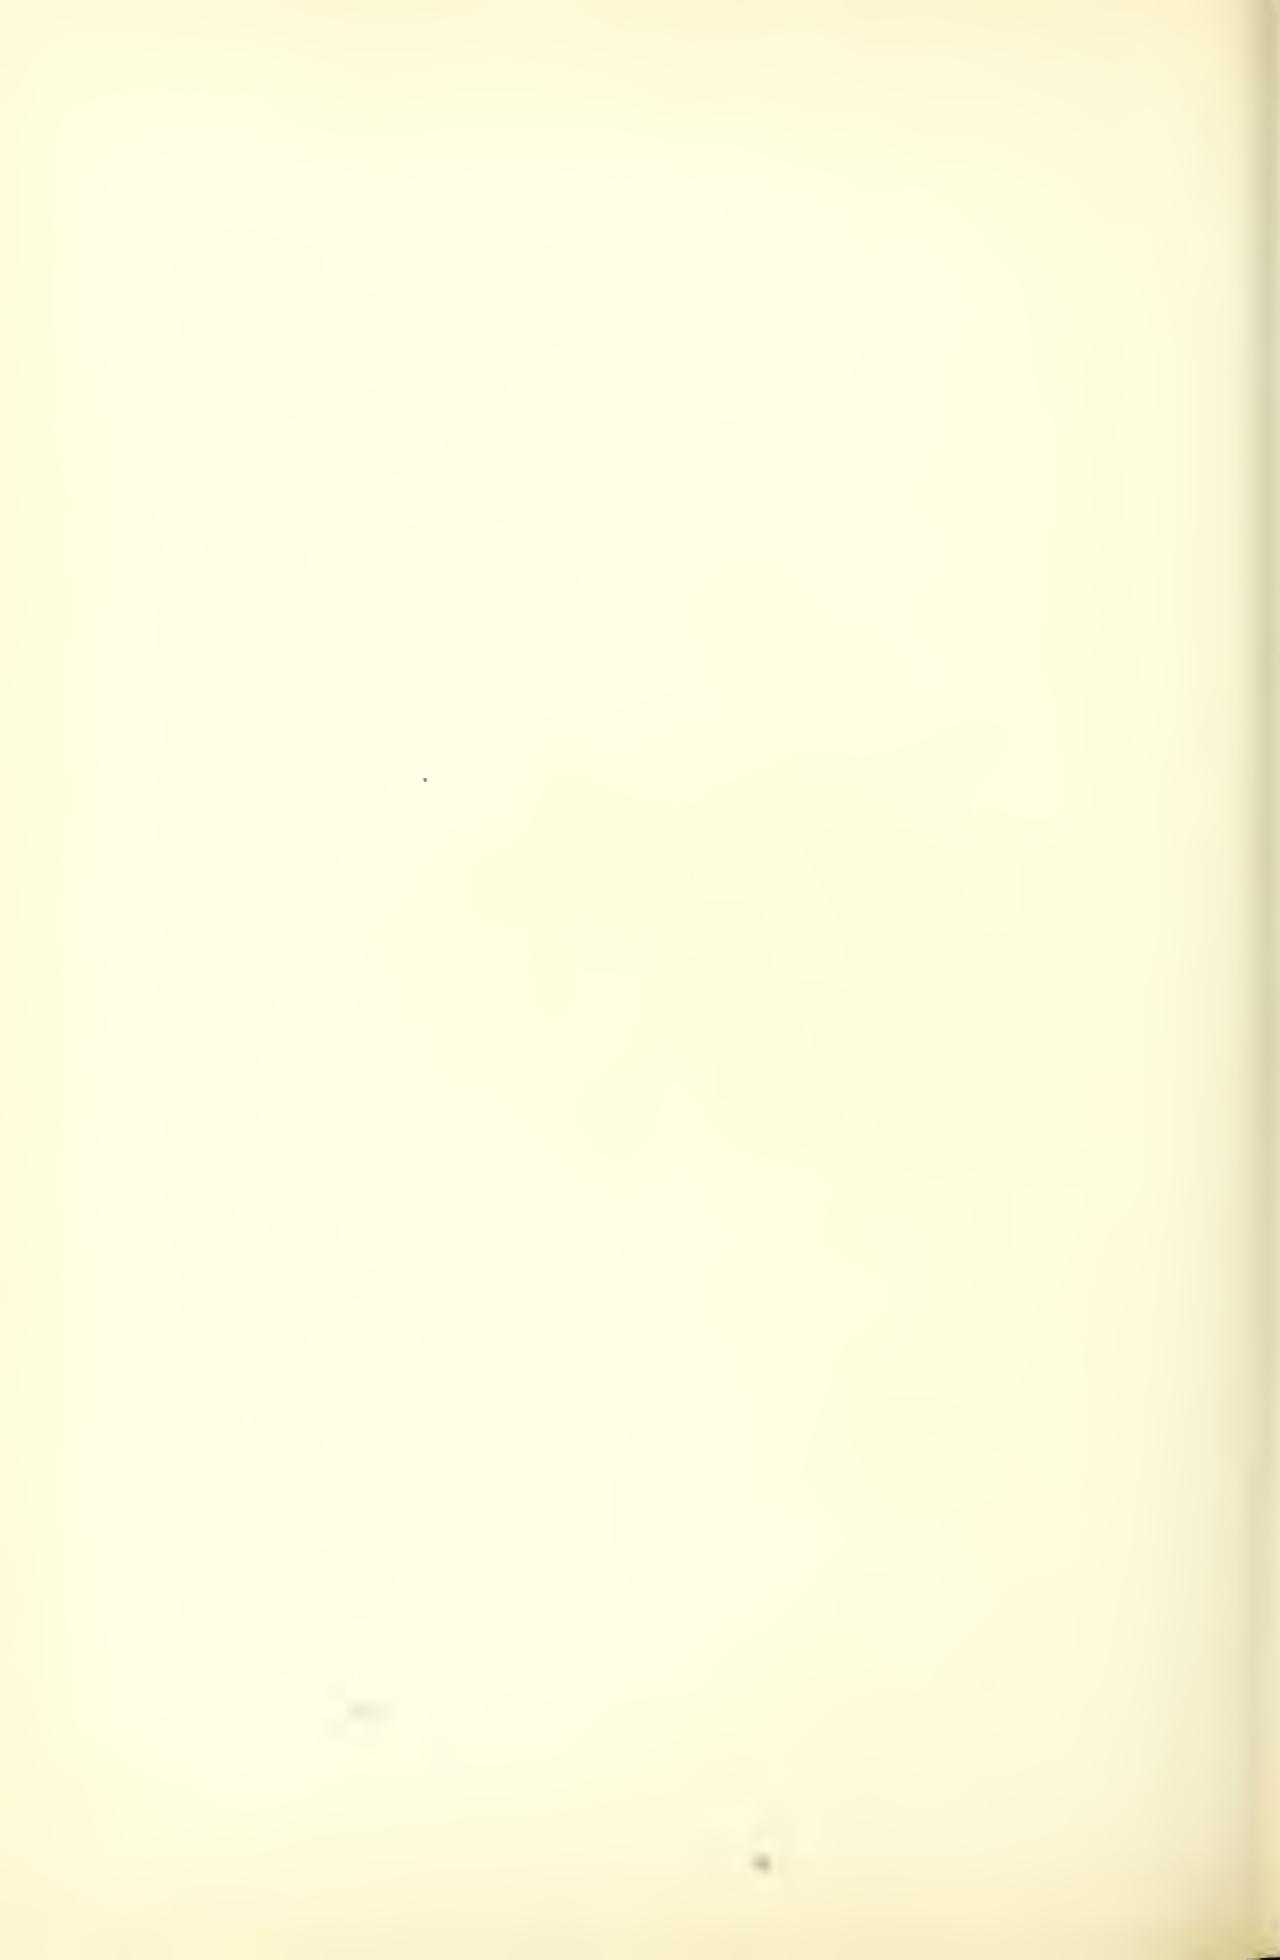

When steamships superseded packet-ships in transportation of first-class passengers, and the "Black Ball" line was devoted to steerage passengers only, Capt. Waite retired from work a veteran, although not forty years of age. He was requested and solicited to assume command of steamships, but he did not favor them, and at the close of his last voyage, in 1843, retired to his home in Westport, Conn. This was too far from the sea for one so long accustomed to its melody, and, selling his property there, he removed to Stamford, and for the last twenty years of his life resided at Sound View, where after an illness of more than two years he died, May 11, 1874.

Capt. Waite was married to Miss Eliza Hayes, of New York, Oct. 11, 1855. She died March 12, 1861. The captain subsequently married, June 17, 1863, Miss Margaret A. Flynn, of Kingston, N. Y., who still survives.

nials as better tributes to his worth than any words of ours.

New York Herald, May 12, 1874: "When sailing-ships were the only communication with Europe, he was known as one of the most intrepid as well as skillful and careful of navigators. Numerous stories of his feats while commanding the 'Black Ball' ship 'England' are still spun by old 'sea-dogs' with a readiness and zest that are in themselves good tributes to Capt. Waite's ability. The affectionate references made in them to the 'old man' apparently indicate a mariner of almost fabulous age, and yet Capt. Waite had but reached thirty-nine years."

New York Sunday Atlas: "The worthy commander of the 'England,' Capt. Benjamin Waite, is justly entitled to the cognomen 'The Prince of Captains.' In our foreign news we omitted to state that Capt. Waite had undoubtedly saved the lives of a ship's company, which he did by supplying them with provisions and a compass. This was done by means of his life-boat (one of the first constructed by Francis), and under circumstances when any other boat would undoubtedly have swamped, as it was blowing a gale and the sea was very high and breaking. We know this, that our old friend Waite felt more pleasure in relieving the wants of his distressed fellow-beings with his life-boat than he ever could experience by receiving silver plate for stuffing his passengers with champagne and canvas-back ducks."

S. M. News, February, 1841: "The gentlemanly character of Capt. Waite, added to his consummate skill in the management of his vessel, has always insured the respect and confidence of those who have been his passengers, and elicited frequent and valuable tokens of well-deserved compliment."

From a Liverpool paper: "The ship 'England' arrived yesterday in nineteen days from New York, a remarkably short passage. On Saturday the cabin passengers entertained Capt. Waite at the 'King's Arms,' and the chairman agreeably surprised him by presenting him, in the name of the company, with a beautifully chased, massive, and solid gold snuff-box, valued at sixty pounds, assuring him that it was only an acknowledgment of his skill as a seaman and his courteous deportment as a gentleman, of which they had had abundant evidence during the voyage. The box bears a suitable inscription, and is the eleventh testimonial of the sort that Capt. Waite has received from passengers."

From a New York paper: "The bell rang; Capt. Waite, 'a good fellow and true,' made his appearance. His ruddy and good-natured face, lighted up with a smile for every one, diffused a new feeling among the company. 'How is it,' thought we, 'that some men possess the faculty of making all around them happy and satisfied, while other people produce on the spectator a completely opposite result?' We looked at Capt. Waite intently to see if we could unravel the anomaly. There he was, with his straw hat bound with a yellow ribbon, moving among the passengers, taking off the names with the utmost good humor, and being introduced to the ladies who were going in his noble ship. He was affable, courteous, and kind, and all seemed at once to repose confidence in his skill and judgment as a seaman. His passengers looked up to him as a commander into whose hands they would willingly commit their safety. The same feelings came over us, and we could not tell why. There is a something in the face of a man that bespeaks his character more broadly than all your phrenological lore."

An autograph letter from the renowned Charles Kemble contained the following:—

"SHIP 'PACIFIC,' Sept. 1, 1832.

"Resolved,—That we return our grateful thanks to Capt. B. L. Waite for his urbane and gentlemanly conduct during our passage, and take pleasure in expressing our full confidence in his skill and care as a navigator."—CHARLES KEMBLE, FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE, and twenty others.

This was accompanied with an elegant silver pitcher, with an appropriate inscription. These are but a few of hundreds of testimonials that might be given.

ALFRED HOYT.

Alfred Hoyt was born in Stamford, Conn., Jan. 13, 1813. He was the only son of Silas and Charlotte (Smith) Hoyt. His family has for years been accounted one of Stamford's worthiest. Rev. Mr. Huntington says, in his "History of Stamford," of Mr. Hoyt's great-grandfather, "Abraham Hoyt, son of Benjamin, who was the son of Benjamin, who was the son of Simon, the pioneer, was born in Stamford in 1704. He was a man of solid and substantial worth, and was much in public life. He was also an active member of the Congregational Church. . . . His descendants are very numerous, and they have been as enterprising as they are numerous." Simon Hoyt, or Hait, was doubtless one of the earliest settlers in the town, dying here in 1657.

Silas Hoyt, grandfather of Alfred, was born March 2, 1738-39, and died in January, 1825. He served in the Revolution, was selectman and reared a large family, and built the house in which Alfred now resides. Alfred's father was born in the same place, Nov. 8, 1775. He died March 22, 1852. His wife was Charlotte, daughter of Stephen Smith, Esq., of Stamford. Alfred was educated in the private schools of Stamford. His home has always been where he now resides. Shortly after arriving at manhood his father relinquished to him the management of his business, which, in course of time, was also inherited by him. In 1838, Mr. Hoyt engaged in the West India trade in company with Capt. William Lockwood. This copartnership existed till 1845, when it was dissolved by the death of Capt. Lockwood, and Mr. Hoyt sold his interest. They first built the "Julia Ann," one hundred tons, and ran her to San Domingo, trading in pine-apples, etc. They succeeded the "Julia Ann" with the barque "Texidor," two hundred tons, and that by the "Henry Delafield." One of these vessels was wrecked, and, while another one was building, Capt. Lockwood died, and Mr. Hoyt severed his connection with commerce.

Mr. Hoyt has never sought public position, but has been willing to take a share of those duties and has held various local offices, and represented Stamford in the Legislature in 1864, 1865, and 1869. He is inspector of votes in the First National Bank of Stamford, and has been for years.

Mr. Hoyt believes that every citizen is interested in every election, and since he was of age has not failed to vote at a State or Presidential election. In politics he was an Old-Line Whig, but since the formation of the Republican party has voted and acted with that.

He is an attendant of the Congregational Church, and a liberal supporter of it.

Mr. Hoyt married, Nov. 4, 1868, Miss Emily Knowlton, daughter of Rev. Farnham Knowlton and Sarah (Ingersoll) Knowlton, of Greenwich. Mr. Knowlton graduated at Hamilton College, New York, in 1826, and for many years was an acceptable Baptist clergyman. Mrs. Hoyt was born in Stanwich, town of Greenwich. Her great-grandfather and his brother lived in Ashford, Conn. Both were officers in the American army of the Revolution. One was captain; the other, colonel. The latter was killed at the battle of Harlem Heights. The family has ever been patriotic and brave. Gen. N. B. Lyon, who fell in the late civil war, and whose death was so much regretted, was a cousin of her father.

ISAAC SELLECK.

Isaac Selleck, fourth and youngest son of Joseph and Phebe Selleck, was born in Stamford, Conn., where his parents were old residents, in 1807. His ancestors were Puritans, and his parents were brought up in the Congregational belief. In middle life they were converted to the Methodist faith, and were among the first to join the first Methodist Episcopal organization in the town of Stamford. Their house was for many years the home of the weary and worn itinerants of early Methodism, and they also entertained some of the most eminent preachers in the connection, among whom was Bishop Asbury, first bishop of the church. They lived many years honored and beloved, and died in the fullness of time, worthy members of the church of their choice.

Isaac Selleck was educated at the common schools of Stamford, and followed his father's avocation, a farmer, and all of his life occupied the old homestead, and, what is worthy of note, died in the same room where he was born, after sixty-seven years' residence in the same house.

Mr. Selleck married, Nov. 7, 1830, Phebe, daughter of Ebenezer and Phebe (Todd) Webb, also of an old Stamford family. She was born Aug. 15, 1808. For forty-four years this Christian couple lived happily together, when death canceled their bond of earthly union, leaving the partner of his youth and riper years to lay down the endearing appellation of wife and assume the lonely one of widow.

Mr. Selleck was a man of strong character, of slow and deliberate action, quiet and retiring in his nature, and only accepting positions of honor and as matters of Christian duty, and it was mostly in connection with his church that his greatest activity was shown. The inheritor of a comfortable estate, his industry and economy, supplemented by the care and prudence of his wife, placed him in circumstances where he was able to contribute largely to the church he loved. He was in politics an unswerving advocate of right, and on the organization of the Republican party became a member of it. From a personal sketch of the life and character of Mr. Selleck, prepared by Rev. H. F. Pease, a former pastor and friend of years' standing, we abstract the following:

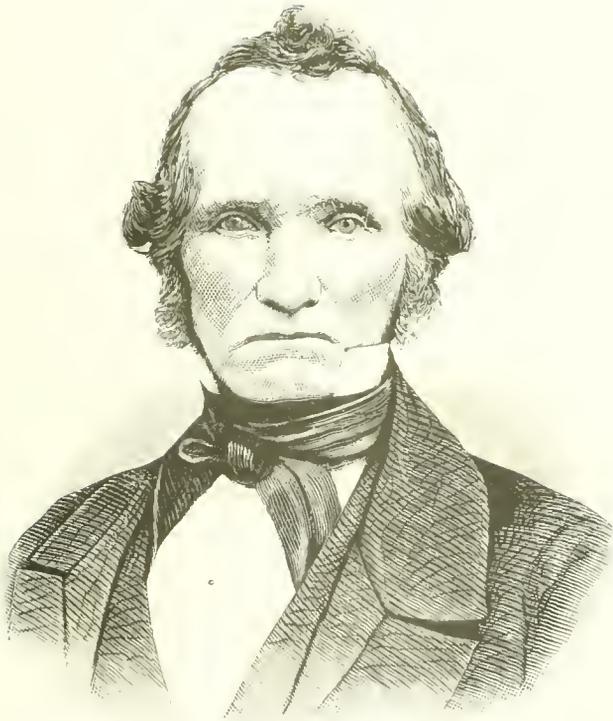

"At eighteen years of age Mr. Selleck was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in its days of feebleness in Stamford, and soon became to it an element of strength. He was early made an officer and for years was steward and trustee, discharging the duties with fidelity and acceptability. When appointed to Stamford charge, in 1847, I first met Brother Selleck, and found him one of the most regular attendants on Divine worship, and one of the most liberal supporters of the church. An appeal to save the church from a crushing debt was responded to in a most liberal manner, but by none with greater liberality than Mr. Selleck. The society to this day is largely indebted for its prosperity to that liberality in the days of its feebleness. Mr. Selleck's piety was not demonstrative. It had little of the noisy element in it, yet for principle, sincerity, constancy, and true God-fearing, not many at the present day excel it. It has been said that he was not progressive, did not keep up with improvements in this fast age of the world. In reply we would say no man should be progressive in the way some are, for their progress is away from policy, principle, and truth. Neither should all be progressive in the sense in which it is proper for others to be. Mr. Selleck's progress was not one always in the direction of the last popular wind, but rather that of the prophet Jeremiah: 'Stand ye in the ways, and see and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls.' That cannot be bad progress that brings to Christ, to rest, and to heaven. For sixty-seven years he was an epistle known and read of all men, and his neighbors and fellow-townsmen will bear witness that he was a man of the strictest veracity and most unbending integrity,—his word as good as his bond, neither needing legal process to enforce their obligation. His death was sudden, but who that knew him doubts that it was safe? that in his case sudden death was sudden glory?"

His death occurred Nov. 6, 1874. Mrs. Selleck, with her sister, still resides at the old home, maintaining the same Christian hospitality that was ever desired there, and waiting, patiently, the summons to join her husband in the "land beyond the river."

TIMOTHY REYNOLDS.

Timothy, son of Abel and Anna (Mead) Reynolds, was born March 23, 1802, in Roxbury, town of Stamford, Conn. He was of English ancestry and Puritan stock. His grandfather, Timothy, was captured by the Indians during the Indian wars previous to the Revolution. He was an officer before the Revolution, and held a colonial commission in that war, which has been preserved with great care by his descendants.

Abel Reynolds was born in Greenwich, and after marriage settled at Roxbury, where he lived many years as a farmer, dying much respected about 1800.

Timothy Reynolds was reared on the farm with his parents, and, with the other youth of that day, attended common schools winters and "worked on the farm" summers until he was about eighteen years old. Then he went to learn the carpenter's trade with an uncle, George Reynolds, in Stanwich, and remained with him until after he was twenty-one. Commencing business for himself, he worked at his trade until his love of home life and failing health caused him to cease that business and become a farmer. He married, Nov. 19, 1827, Prudence, daughter of Solomon and Susannah Smith. She was born in Stamford, April 6, 1804. Her family was one of the old-time families in this town, emigrating originally from England to Long Island, and from thence to Stamford.

Mr. Reynolds was a farmer, frank and outspoken, without anything favoring of fraud or deceit in his nature; never seeking official position, but often called upon to settle estates, which he did to the satisfaction of those interested. Quiet, loving home and its associations, he was a true friend, and honored and respected by all. He died Aug. 23, 1863.

He was an Old-Line Whig, and became a Republican on the organization of that party.

Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds were for years members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and always liberal supporters of the same. Since Mr. Reynolds' death Mrs. Reynolds has, among many gifts, contributed the sites of the Roxbury Methodist Episcopal church and its parsonage.

For thirty-six years this worthy couple walked together life's pathway, doing each duty well as it presented itself, and lending a helping hand to all good enterprises. Since her husband's decease Mrs.

Reynolds has resided at the old home, continuing the same life of well doing, and, with all the vivacity and cheerfulness of youth, patiently waiting the summons to follow her beloved husband to "the land beyond the river." Of them both it can be truly said, "They have done their work well."

NATHANIEL E. ADAMS.

The ancestry of Nathaniel E. Adams were not only men of repute in New England, but the line goes back and develops itself in many a page of history in "Merrie England." The full genealogy of the Adams family is now in course of preparation, and we will not trace the lineage farther than to John, grandfather of Nathaniel, who was a worthy citizen of Greenwich, Conn. His son John married Mary Hobby, and Nathaniel E., his son, was born in Greenwich, July 7, 1807.

Nathaniel passed his childhood on the old homestead with his parents, and was apprenticed at an early age to a carpenter in Stamford, to learn, as in those days expressed, the art and mystery of carpentering. He was an apt student, learned his trade thoroughly, and began business for himself before he was twenty-one, but, by engaging with a drunken partner, not only lost his hard-earned capital, but became indebted four hundred dollars to various persons. That was a larger amount than many times that sum would be now, for he was compelled to go to New York, where he obtained work from Locke & Coleman, on Scudder's Museum, but was forced to borrow money to provide for the necessities of his family, and it was two years before the last of the indebtedness was paid. He remained in New York ten years, then, returning to Stamford, he became a coal- and lumber-dealer, and commenced to deal in real estate by purchasing a lot of land and laying it out, in 1850, into lots, surveying new streets, and building and selling houses, so that where was a wild waste of almost valueless land is now a beautiful portion of the village of Stamford. Mr. Adams is emphatically a self-made man, and has invariably been the advocate of law, order, and improvement. He is of winning manners, of great and pleasing conversational powers, and possesses a remarkable faculty of applying poetical quotations to any subject under conversation. His memory is wonderful and his reading extensive. He has a large fund of humor, and is of a most cheerful temperament. In 1861, carrying letters of introduction to President Lincoln from ex-Gov. Minor, ex-Congressman Smith, and others, he went to Washington, had a long and pleasant interview with Mr. Lincoln, and finally leased a cotton plantation of sixteen hundred and fifty acres in Louisiana from the United States Government, and commenced raising cotton. His peculiar frankness and honesty won him at once the friendship of all, even the most bitter rebels, and his plantation was protected by the Confederate troops. The experiment promised to be a success, financially and otherwise, but through a defaulting partner and the ravages made on the growing crop by caterpillars he lost ten thousand dollars. After this disastrous termination of his venture, Mr. Adams returned to Stamford, and has ever since resided there, having, notwithstanding his loss, a very handsome competency. He is a member of the First Congregational Church of Stamford, and has been for more than forty years a deacon. With a strong love for children, he has been an ardent Sabbath-school worker, both as teacher and superintendent.

Mr. Adams cast his first vote, as a Democrat, for Simeon H. Minor for member of Legislature, and by it gave him his majority of one. Afterwards Mr. Adams became a Whig, then a Republican. He was for many years, and until disqualified by age, a magistrate, and by his decisions and actions in that capacity drew warm encomiums from the best citizens.

Mr. Adams married Sarah Ann Dixon, of an old Stamford family, March 23, 1829. She was born in New York, May 23, 1806. Their children were Charles W., James E. (deceased), Julia H. (who is the widow of Brevet Lieut.-Col. Alfred M. Powell, U.S.A.), James E. (deceased), John, Franklin.

JOHN CLASON.

In the early records of Stamford appears the name of Clason, Cloyson, Clawson,—all different spellings of the same name. At the assignment of land by lot, Dec. 26, 1699, there were sixty-nine lots drawn by seventy-five persons. Of these Stephen Clawson drew the first.

Among the soldiers of the Revolution were Nathaniel, Isaac, Samuel, and Stephen Clason.

From that day to the present has the Clason family been domiciled in Stamford, and now the historian records with pleasure the leading incidents in the life of one who may justly be called a representative man of the family.

John Clason, son of Benjamin and Nancy (Ayes) Clason, was born Sept. 8, 1825. The educational advantages of a farmer's son, in those days, were mostly comprised in the three months' winter term of school in the country school-house. Such, John received while he remained at home. He commenced the active duties of life, however, for himself at the age of fifteen, and, as he could afford it, supplemented, from time to time, his early education by instructions under John Lyell, A.M., a graduate of the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, with a view to civil engineering as a profession, for which he thoroughly prepared himself in the mathematical branches. In 1851 he entered the store of Alanson Studwell, at Stamford, as a clerk, and stayed one year. For about two years subsequently he was a teacher in the public schools.

About 1844, Mr. Clason purchased a farm, engaged in farming and dealing in native timber, and enjoying the reputation of being the most successful farmer (financially and otherwise) Stamford had ever produced, until about 1862, when he sold his farm, continuing, however, farming operations on a small place of twenty acres, which he has brought to a high standing in productiveness.

Mr. Clason has held all of the local offices connected with schools in the town, and was member of the Board of Education for four years, resigning his position when elected judge of Probate. He was elected member of Legislature from Stamford in 1851, and was the youngest member of that body. In 1854 he again represented his town in the Legislature, and from 1871 to 1875, five years, held the same position, a length of continued service, in that capacity, unprecedented in Stamford since the adoption of the Constitution in 1818. In 1855 he was elected assessor, and held that office twenty-five years. He was elected judge of Probate in 1876, and re-elected in 1878, and has rendered entire satisfaction in the performance of his judicial duties. He has held, also, various other town offices, such as justice, etc. He was for several years a director of Stamford Savings Bank, resigning that office, in accordance with the law of the statute, to become a director of Stamford National Bank. In politics Judge Clason was originally a Whig, afterwards a Republican. He is a generous supporter of all churches, societies, and enterprises that tend to elevate, improve, or educate mankind. In the Legislature, Mr. Clason was, emphatically, a working member, clear-headed and practical, and in committee work a patient and careful investigator, opposed to all "jobbery," and with judgment rarely at fault. Strictly honorable and upright, the repeated number of times his fellow-townsmen have called him to office evidence their appreciation of these qualities. He has never married.

WILLIAM W. SCOFIELD.

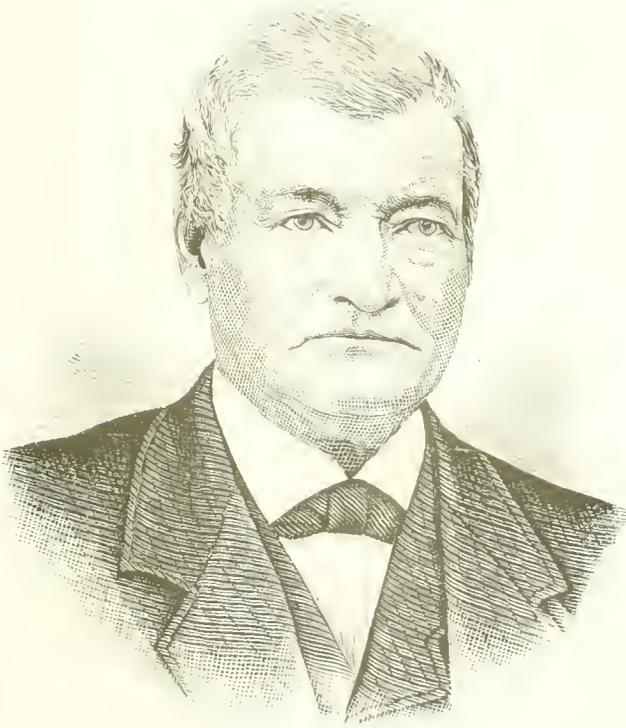

William Wallace Scofield was born in Stamford, Conn., March 2, 1825. His father was Amzi and his mother Polly Davenport Scofield.

The Scofield family is an old Stamford family. In the town records, under date of Dec. 7, 1641, mention is made of an award of a home-lot and wood-land to "Dan Scofield." From this hardy pioneer have proceeded many branches of this family, until at this writing the name is borne by more people in Stamford than any other.

The paternal great-grandfather of W. W. Scofield was Peter Scofield, and his grandfather was Warren. This grandfather married a daughter of Capt. Reuben Scofield, who was a captain of the town guards in the Revolution. Both Reuben and Peter were deacons in the Congregational Church, and both served in the French and Indian war under Gens. Abercrombie and Amherst. An incident will show the ready wit of Peter. The old man, then aged about ninety years, had been an active member of a militia troop. Some of the members of the company were going to honor him with a salute as they passed his house on their return from "trooping." Peter was sitting at the window, and when their pistols snapped, and they were going to ride away, he rushed to the door and shouted, "Hold on, boys. I will bring you a coal of fire." Peter was ninety-one or ninety-two years old when he died, and Reuben was ninety-three.

Warren had but one son, Amzi, who was born Sept. 26, 1794. He remained on the old homestead, and, like his associates, did much towards developing the resources of the country. In that era mammoth fire-places were the rule, and the gigantic "back-logs" used in them were drawn into place by a horse. He received a common-school education, stayed with his parents until he was about twenty-four, when he built a house on the farm, and married, Nov. 24, 1819, Polly A., daughter of Deodate and Abigail (Sanford) Davenport, old settlers of New Canaan. She was born June 19, 1796, and still is living, with mind active, looking years younger than many women not nearly as old. Mr. Scofield was his father's sole heir, and carried on the farm. He died Feb. 20, 1863. His surviving children are Amzi L., Cyrus, William W., Abigail, and Louisa.

William W. spent his early years on the old homestead, attaining a country boy's education at the common schools, working on the farm in summer, and attending winter term of school, never, in any year, receiving more than four months' instruction. He remained on the farm until the breaking out of the "California fever," in 1849, when he joined the number going to the new El Dorado. Arriving there, he went at once to the mountains and worked at mining for a year, returning to Connecticut after an absence of eighteen months. He had fair success, notwithstanding the evil effects of a severe attack of Panama fever, from which he did not fully recover during his stay in California. On his return home Mr. Scofield resumed farming, and remained with his parents until his marriage, which occurred Dec. 17, 1855. He married Louisiana C., daughter of John and Lucina (Robinson) Mead. Her father was a tailor, a native of England, and for many years imported goods from that country, crossing the Atlantic seventeen times in so doing. Mrs. Scofield was born Sept. 12, 1834. Their children are Isaac M., born March 8, 1859; Frank R., born May 29, 1861; Mary Louisa, born Nov. 5, 1863.

Since his marriage Mr. Scofield has resided on his farm, and has been ever a practical, progressive agriculturist, quick to see, and avail himself of, improvements in his avocation, and enjoys a high standing in the estimation of his fellow-townsmen, not only for his personal worth, but for the good culture and condition of his land, and he may justly be placed as an example for others. He has made this good farming pay, and so may others. He has held various offices in the gift of the people, has been on the board of relief, was selectman for six years, and under the consolidation was member of school committee for six years. In politics was an Old-Line Whig, but in 1858 was elected representative from Stamford to the State Legislature by the "Know-Nothings." Since the formation of the Republican party he has supported its candidates and principles.

SETH S. COOK.

Seth Smith Cook, son of Henry and Hetty (Smith) Cook, was born at Long Ridge, town of Stamford, Conn., Aug. 22, 1823. His maternal grandfather was Seth, and Mr. Cook being the first son in the family was given his grandfather's name. His maternal grandmother's maiden name was Prudence Waring. His paternal grandfather, William, came from England about 1785 and settled (probably) on Long Island, in the vicinity of New York. He reared a large family. His son Henry, father of Seth S. Cook, came to Stamford in 1819 and settled at Long Ridge, and engaged in cabinet-making and undertaking, which he followed for more than fifty years. He was a man diligent in his business, of a warm, social nature, and one of the original members of the Universalist Church of Long Ridge. He was a man esteemed for his probity and many good traits of character, and died at a good old age, much respected.

Seth was educated at the common schools, supplemented by one year's tuition at the Bedford Academy, leaving the academy at the age of about sixteen years, he commenced work with his father in the cabinet-shop. He learned the trade thoroughly, becoming a good workman, and continued with his father until he was twenty-one. The fall thereafter he taught a term of district school at High Ridge, then, returning home, he worked again at cabinet-work for eighteen months.

In 1845 he formed a partnership with Hickford Marshall, under the firm-name of Marshall & Cook, to manufacture agricultural machinery. This co-partnership lasted seven years, the latter part of the time being devoted almost exclusively to manufacturing chain-pumps. After the dissolution of this firm Mr. Cook went back home, and to the old cabinet-shop, where for two years he was busily employed.

In 1855 he entered into partnership with F. B. Scofield, with firm-title of Scofield & Cook, for the purpose of keeping a country store and the making of shoes. This latter branch was at first a secondary matter, but in the lapse of time has grown to large proportions, and has proved to be the great business of this part of the town, paying out much money and giving employment to quite a number of persons. The firm Scofield & Cook existed three years, and then Mr. Charles H. Lounsbury was admitted as partner. This changed the firm to Scofield, Cook & Co. In the spring of 1866, Mr. Cook sold his interest to his partners, and they continued the business as Lounsbury & Scofield for one year, Mr. Cook during that time representing Stamford in the State Legislature.

In the fall of 1866, Mr. Cook erected the manufactory used by the firm Cook & Lounsbury. This firm was formed in 1867, the members being Mr. Cook and Charles H. Lounsbury. From that time to the present Mr. Cook has not only been identified with the business, but given it his close personal attention. Under the shrewd management, diligence, and active efforts of the two partners, the demand for their goods has rapidly increased, and their manufactory is to-day occupying a place among the prominent manufacturing interests of Stamford.

Mr. Cook has, besides being representative, been assessor, and often pressed to accept positions of public trust, but with these exceptions, he has steadily refused them, preferring to attend to his own business rather than that of others.

Mr. Cook was one of the three men in Stamford who had the moral courage to vote for Martin Van Buren as Free Soil candidate for President, and to the same convictions that actuated him then he has steadfastly adhered. He never could see how one workingman should try to "lord it" over another, whatever the color of his skin. With these sentiments he has naturally affiliated with Republicanism since it was a political power, and was by that party elected representative. In 1872 he followed his old leader, Horace Greeley, and voted for him for President, returning to his old bearings after the death of Mr. Greeley.

Mr. Cook was one of the incorporators of the Citizens' Savings Bank of Stamford, and has been one of its directors since that time. He is also a director in the First National Bank of New Canaan, Conn.

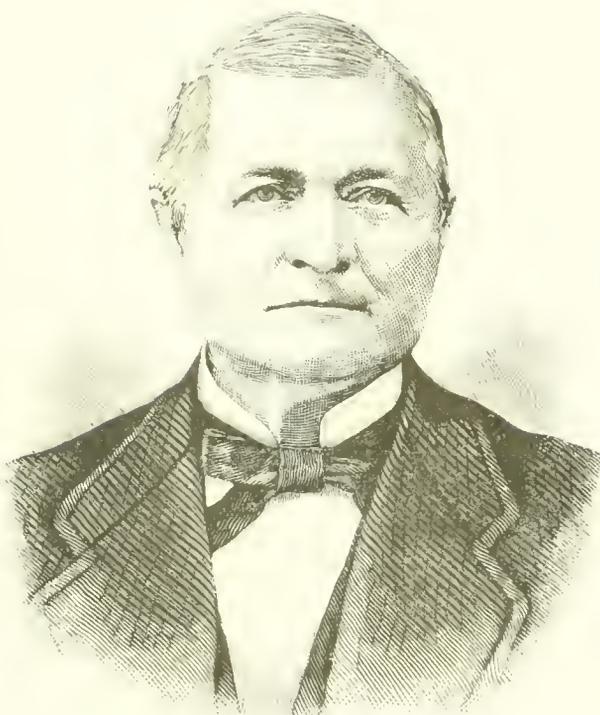

He is a member and a most liberal supporter of the Universalist Church, and has been clerk of the one at Long Ridge ever since he was twenty-one years old.

Sept. 29, 1851, he married Mary L., daughter of George and Louisa (Scofield) Lounsbury. Their children are Nettie L., who married Benjamin M., son of Rev. F. H. Ayres, of Long Ridge, and Mary W., aged now eight years.

CAPTAIN DAVID WATERBURY.

One of the oldest as well as most honorable of Stamford families is the Waterbury family. Probably none has exercised more influence on its history. John Waterbury came to Stamford soon after the settlement, had land recorded to him in 1659, and died in 1658. From him sprang the numerous families now resident here. The lineage is traced in Huntington's "History of Stamford," and we will only state that David Waterbury, Jr., grandfather of the one of whom we write, did excellent service in the French and Indian wars, attaining the rank of major. He was representing the town in the Assembly at the commencement of the Revolution, and did good service for the colonial cause. (Rev. Mr. Huntington heads his list of the military men of that time thus: "There were the Waterburys, then known as senior and junior, the former long a colonel in the Continental service, who had earned some reputation for good judgment and military ability in the field, and the latter, soon to earn, by his personal fitness for it, the rank of a general of brigade.") He was born in Stamford, Feb. 12, 1722. Probably no other citizen of Stamford reached so high a position or did so much service for the United Colonies as he. He was in the confidence and enjoyed the friendship and high esteem of the leaders of the Revolution, and great complaint was made of his conduct to Tories. He seems to have given them no mercy. He was promoted from a colonelcy, with which he entered the war, to brigadier-general in June, 1776; was captured by the English, but soon exchanged. He was a gallant soldier, an able officer, and a brave man. After returning to Stamford he was selectman and representative. He died June 29, 1801, leaving one son, Capt. William Waterbury, fourth, who was born Oct. 10, 1765, and died Jan. 10, 1842. He was long in public business, and showed the family trait of resistance to oppression in his persistent refusal to pay the annual tax for the Congregational society, expending money as freely to establish freedom from the church as he had freely given his services to establish freedom from British tyranny. He married Mrs. Sally Jessup, daughter of Philip Lockwood, of Greenwich, and his eldest son, David, was born in Stamford, April 17, 1819. This was the present Capt. David Waterbury. He remained with his parents, and had such common-school advantages as the place and times afforded, until he was about fifteen, when he shipped as a sailor, at twelve dollars per month, on a market-boat trading weekly between Stamford and New York. He passed through the various grades of first hand, etc., rising steadily, until, before his twentieth birthday, he was captain of the "Rival," a sloop of about fifty tons. Capt. Waterbury continued in that business until 1852, when, in company with Edmund Lockwood and Lewis Waterbury, he purchased the steamer "William W. Frazier." The company ran her as a daily passenger- and freight-boat between Stamford and New York, Capt. Lockwood commanding her, Capt. Waterbury being superintendent, agent, etc., with office at Stamford. In 1859 the "Frazier" was superseded by the "Ella," which the same company built. The "Ella" was run on this route until 1862, when they sold her to the United States Government, and Capt. Lockwood retired from business. The two remaining of the firm, with Oliver Scofield, built the "Stamford," and in 1863 placed her on the same route as the

"Ella." The next year they sold the "Stamford," and then a stock company built the ship "Ann," of about five hundred tons, and in 1865 placed her on the same route. She continued running here until May, 1870, when she was burned at the wharf at Stamford, together with the storehouse and other property of the company, the entire loss being about seventy thousand dollars, only one-half covered by insurance.

Capt. Waterbury then commenced dealing in coal and wood, and has continued in that till the present. After a lapse of three years he became interested in the steamboat business again, and is still connected therewith.

Capt. Waterbury married, Jan. 23, 1842, Sarah M., daughter of John Selleck, of Stamford. Their surviving children are Wm. T., now captain of steamer "Meta," running between Stamford and New York; John S., an engineer residing in Stamford; Mary E., who married Edwin S. Webb, of Brooklyn; Sarah M.; Charles F., engaged with his father in the coal business; and Lottie A. Mrs. Waterbury died Sept. 26, 1867. April 29, 1875, Capt. Waterbury married Mrs. Josephine E. Colby, sister of the first Mrs. Waterbury. Her parents, John and Charlotte (Mead) Selleck, were life-long residents of Stamford. Mr. Selleck was born on the old Selleck homestead, and lived within half a mile of there all his life.

The life of Captain Waterbury presents a good example of what a poor boy, aided by honesty, integrity, and hard work, may accomplish for himself; and he stands to-day, with the confidence and regard of his fellow-townsmen, a successful business man, his word as good as his bond, and neither ever repudiated.

Democratic in politics, he has preferred holding fast to the good old ways rather than going into brilliant but rash speculations. He has never taken an active part in politics, always voting quietly, as he thought best, and for the best man, irrespective of party, in local matters. Broad and liberal in his religious views, he for years has been a member of the Universalist Church.

RICHMOND FOX.

Richmond Fox was born at Newfield, town of Stamford, Conn. He was the son of Richard and Clara (Seofield) Fox. His childhood and youth were passed in Stamford, acquiring a common-school education and learning the carpenter's trade. Soon after his twenty-first birthday Mr. Fox went to the Southern States to take charge of a manufacturing establishment, and for five years was absent from Stamford. Returning after that length of time, he worked at carpentering in Stamford for two years, going then to Fairfield, and, after a short space of time, to Bridgeport, where he remained long enough—six months—to become acquainted with Miss Mary E. Blakeman, whom he married Dec. 24, 1843. She was born in Woodbury, Litchfield Co., Conn., Nov. 2, 1824, and was daughter of David and Sarah (Hammond) Blakeman. From the time of their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Fox were residents of Stamford, moving, in the spring of 1844, to the place on Strawberry Hill where at the present writing Mrs. Fox is resident.

After a few years' business as contractor and builder, Mr. Fox engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber with Mr. John St. John, under the firm-name of Fox & St. John. This proved a successful financial enterprise, and the partnership continued until the death of Mr. Fox, which occurred Nov. 15, 1857.

Mr. Fox was of genial disposition, positive, blunt, and straightforward in business, social and large-hearted in all the relations of life, liberal in relieving suffering, of winning personal magnetism and strong home love. He was an attendant of the Methodist Episcopal Church (of which Mrs. Fox has been a faithful and consistent member since 1833), and a liberal contributor to its support. In person large and handsome, a stranger would at once be attracted to him, and an acquaintance would soon ripen into a finer friendship as the result of the candor and integrity of his outspoken nature.

In politics Mr. Fox was an unyielding supporter of the principles enunciated by Thomas Jefferson, and he, with Andrew Jackson, believed that in Democracy alone rested the glorious mission of preserving the integrity of our Union, and giving "the greatest good to the greatest number" of all our citizens.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Fox are Mary (Mrs. Charles C. Chadwick), now living at Detroit, Mich.; Franklin, George, Emma (deceased), Charles, and Sarah Frances (Mrs. Nathan Murbough).

WILLIAM H. TROWBRIDGE, M.D.

William H. Trowbridge was born in Danbury, Conn., Feb. 2, 1822. His parents both came of good old English stock, his father, James H. Trowbridge, dating back through six generations direct to Thomas, whose three sons, Thomas, James, and William, came to America in 1634, and his mother, Mary (Banks) Trowbridge, reaching through the Hoyt family back to England also.

When William H. was two years old his parents moved to Stamford, where his father engaged in the manufacture of hats, which he followed until the death of his wife, when he returned to that portion of Danbury now called Bethel. William received his early education in district and private schools, and even in childhood developed a fondness for medicine, but kept his preference secret, feeling that his parents were not in such a financial condition as to properly help him in pursuit of his studies. When about seventeen he desired to engage as teacher in a district school, but, yielding to his parent's wishes, he entered as apprentice to a tailor in Bethel, then Danbury, and served faithfully until he was twenty-two years old, preferring always, however, the cutting of clothes to sewing them up. During these years his books were not forgotten, but through his labors and the attraction of youthful society, with its rides and parties, the idea of surgery was ever before him, and while here an accident brought this proclivity into prominence. An old man, in an attempt at self-destruction, cut his throat, and, in a village like Bethel, everybody knew of it and thronged to see, among the number was William, then eighteen years old. The physician was, on his arrival, engaged in dressing the gaping wound in the old man's throat, with the aid of such help as could be obtained from the inexperienced and faint-hearted crowd. William was at once drawn, instinctively, to patient and physician. Seeing his interest, the doctor said, "Young man, you are not pale; take hold of this and help me, and let these chicken-hearts go away." The youth did such good service, holding the lips of the wound, handling dressings, etc., so well, that the physician, Dr. Hanford Bennett, said, "Boy, you'll be a surgeon some day, and no one can help it."

Finishing (prematurely) his trade, William went to Stamford, married Miss Sylvia Peck, and soon moved to Orange Co., N. Y., and after two years spent in that State returned to Stamford and engaged as teacher in the district school, where his early school-days were spent. He succeeded, gained reputation, and soon taught higher grades of school, all of the time studying medicine diligently from 5 A.M. till school-time, summer and winter, and laboring with all his might in the school-room to provide for his family and attend medical lectures. Teaching and studying alternately, he attended one course at Yale, two courses at New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, and graduated at Yale Medical College. After spending one year in the office with Dr. George Lewis, in New York, he opened an office in Stamford, where, excepting his army life, he has enjoyed a thriving practice. In the late war of the Rebellion, Dr. Trowbridge was first engaged as surgeon of the Twenty-third Regiment Connecticut Volunteers. To this work he was impelled by a sense of duty, and left a lucrative and fast increasing practice solely to do good. His regiment proceeded to New Orleans with Gen. Banks, and on arriving there Dr. Trowbridge sought the medical director of that department, and told him he came there for work, and if he was needed anywhere he would be on hand. As a result, during his stay in the department there was not a battle fought in which he was not called upon to give service. After the battle of La Foye Crossing he was called, without assistance, to attend to more than two hundred wounded Confederate prisoners. Their injuries ranged from flesh wounds to broken skulls and shattered limbs. He commenced his work at four o'clock Sunday afternoon, and worked incessantly, without sitting down to eat, or sleeping, until Tuesday at midnight. The day thereafter he was left in the rebels' hands with the wounded, but by them kept in the same place and service. This captivity lasted six weeks. Soon after he accompanied his regiment to Connecticut, and with it was mustered out of service on expiration of term of enlistment. He was soon selected as surgeon of board of enrollment in the Fourth District of Connecticut, and placed on duty at Bridgeport. He attended so well to the duties that he held that position till the close of the war, when he was again honorably discharged, and returned to his home in Stamford. He resumed his professional practice, and from that time has been identified with the town, his practice and reputation for skill increasing yearly. Four of his children have attained maturity. The oldest, a teacher, is married and father of four children, yet Dr. Trowbridge remains young, and alert and active as of yore. His talents are those of solidity rather than brilliancy. He is not blatant, nor freely expressive of his knowledge, but well posted in his profession. He is not a boaster, and despises one as much as an intriguer or trickster, and is always on good terms with his brethren. He especially excels in surgery and midwifery. In both his skill is from natural aptitude. His army experience has largely aided his skill as a surgeon, while that of midwifery has grown upon him, through the exceptionally large practice given him by his gentleness and kindness of manner, aided by an untiring patience and a coolness that never flurries to hinder his success or make nervous his patient. In this department he stands at the head of his profession in this section. For many years he has numbered more than one hundred obstetric cases per annum, having in one year one hundred and forty-four, out of a total, in the town, of three hundred and fifty-four.

CHAUNCEY AYRES, M.D.

The ancestor of the Ayres family in this country was a Dr. Ayres, who was a surgeon in the British army. He came to America with his regiment during the Revolutionary war. After its close he resigned his commission and permanently located here. He had a number of sons, one of whom settled in Stamford. The first of the name recorded in Stamford was Richard Ayres. He was a married man, and his son Ebenezer, born in 1716 and married in 1739, had a son Reuben, born in 1741. Reuben was the father of Jonathan, who married Deborah Seefeld. They had nine children. Among these was Frederick, born in 1782. He married Rebecca Seymour, and of their numerous family of children Dr. Chauncey Ayres was oldest.

Chauncey Ayres, M.D., was born in New Canaan, Conn., Aug. 8, 1808. He graduated in medicine at Yale College in 1831; first opened an office in Greenwich, and afterwards in New York, and was one of the surgeons in the New York Cholera Hospital in 1832. He was for a time attached to the United States Coast Survey as a surgeon. In 1834 he settled permanently in Stamford, where he soon acquired a good practice, and where he has since been a resident. His first wife was daughter of Dr. Percival, of Darien. Their children were a son, now chief engineer United States Navy, and three daughters. The second wife was Julia A. Simpson, of Brooklyn, N. Y. They have had three children. Dr. Ayres is still in active practice, and is the oldest practicing physician, save one, in Fairfield County. Dr. Ayres has been located in Stamford for forty-six years, and of all who were practicing in the county in 1834, the year he located here, all are dead but Dr. Ayres and Dr. Mead, of Greenwich.

Dr. Ayres has enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the community through a very long professional life, has been called to fill various positions of honor and trust, and to-day, among the many aspirants for the popular good-will, none carry with them a greater portion than Dr. Ayres, and no professional man, for years, will have the broad circle of friends and the extensive practice which he possesses.

CHARLES C. LOCKWOOD.

Charles C. Lockwood, son of Ebenezer and Polly Lockwood, was born Aug. 26, 1823, in Stamford, Conn. His father was a farmer and stock-dealer. He also was born in Stamford. Mrs. Lockwood died when Charles was three years old. After remaining with his father till he was about twelve years of age, Charles went to Olean, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., with a cousin, Dr. Andrew Mead, and attended school two years. Returning to his father's home in Stamford, after a short attendance at school, he shipped as a common sailor on a vessel leaving New York. Following the sea two years, he returned to Stamford and taught district school for two years, and then engaged in the cattle trade with his father, buying cattle in Chicago, and other points in the West and New York State, and shipping them to various points in the Eastern States. After two years' connection with his father, he engaged in the business on his own account.

In 1858, while shipping cattle from Chicago, Mr. Lockwood was injured on the New York Central Railroad, from which injuries he has never fully recovered. He was going along the track, at night, looking for the number of a car containing some of his cattle, when he fell into a road running under the track, and, among other injuries, received such a shock to his nervous system that his eyes never have had proper sight since. As soon as he could attend to business he instituted a suit for damages against the railroad. This suit lasted fourteen years, going from court to court, and from district to district, until

Mr. Lockwood received a decision from the United States Supreme Court awarding him fifteen thousand dollars damages. This decision settled a question never before adjudicated, that the release signed by drovers to obtain transportation on a railroad does not exonerate the company from damages for injuries arising from their own neglect. To successfully combat such a gigantic corporation, and carry on a case for so many years, required a will, an energy, and a persistency which shows Mr. Lockwood to be a person of no ordinary calibre. Men eminent in the law have said that there was not one other man in America who would have done this.

Since that decision was given Mr. Lockwood has lived on the old farm, near his place of birth, and is considered a live, progressive farmer, and, with his intelligent family, is making what may well be termed a typical New England home. Dec. 30, 1851, he married Eliza A., daughter of Elder E. S. Raymond, a Baptist clergyman of Westchester Co., N. Y. She died Jan. 17, 1856. Their only child, Charles Stanley, is also dead. April 11, 1861, he married Anna Rosselle, daughter of Nicholas and Elizabeth Rosselle, of Lewis Co., N. Y. Their daughter Clara was born May 23, 1870. Mr. Lockwood was an old Henry Clay Whig, casting his first Presidential vote for that statesman. Since the formation of the Republican party he has acted and voted with it.

THEODORE J. DASKAM.

Theodore J. Daskam was born in Stamford, Conn., March 3, 1833. His grandfather, Capt. William Daskam, served under La Fayette in the Revolution, and received his discharge direct from Washington. He commanded a company in the war of 1812, and for his services received a pension. His family consisted of thirteen children, of whom Benjamin J., father of Theodore, was youngest.

His birthplace was in that portion of Stamford since set off as the town of Darien, and he was born in January, 1810, and married Mary Ingraham, also a native of Stamford. They had seven children. Mr. Daskam first learned the carpenter's trade, but not liking it went to Brooklyn, N. Y., and as a clerk familiarized himself with mercantile pursuits. Returning to Stamford, he engaged in trade, and is to-day one of the oldest merchants here, having been in active business for forty consecutive years, for thirty years occupying the premises where he is now located. He has been for years one of Stamford's representative men, enjoying the confidence of his fellow-townsmen; has worthily filled all of the various local offices and represented his town in the State Legislature.

Mr. Daskam was the eldest of his father's family, and from his early youth assisted his father in his business, becoming chief manager, while his father attended to the purchase of goods in New York. An ardent believer in the principles of the Republican party, he has ever been active in their support, and it is a token of the esteem and confidence with which that party held him, and the value they placed on his services, that he received one of the first appointments of President Lincoln. He was appointed postmaster of Stamford by commission dating April 17, 1861. This position he has held by commissions successively from Lincoln (1861-65), Johnson (1866), Grant (1870-74), Hayes (1878), and is now one of the oldest of these officials in the United States, three others only dating back their appointment (approximatively) to the same time. He was United States Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue for nearly ten years, and, by request of the tax-payers of Stamford, was appointed Assistant Assessor of Internal Revenue. He held this office about three years, as long as there was a necessity for it. During this period Mr. Daskam was holding three Federal offices, and thus had three distinct franking privileges.

In 1864 he was engaged in the insurance business, and he now represents some of the best companies in fire insurance, and the "Mutual Life" of New York City.

He was one of the incorporators of the Gulf Steam Engine Company, No. 2, of Stamford. He was foreman of it for many years, and is now an active member. The only time he has been off the rolls of this company was while acting as chief engineer of Stamford, which office he held for several years.

He cast his first vote for William T. Minor, who was the Native American, or "Know-Nothing," candidate for Governor. Since the Republican party was in existence he has supported its candidates, voting for John C. Fremont for President in 1856.

He has for years held membership in Union Lodge, No. 5, F. and A. M.; was Senior Warden in 1858, Master in 1860, and Treasurer from 1861 to 1864. For about twenty years he has been a member of Ripowam Lodge, No. 24, I. O. O. F., and is a director in Stamford Savings Bank.

Mr. Daskam is a man of thorough business qualities, possessed of energy and force of character, and at the same time has winning social qualities and a large number of personal friends. He is always awake and active in anything tending to advance, elevate, or improve the interests of Stamford.

Mr. Daskam was married Dec. 6, 1864, to Sarah Remer, daughter of Edward T. and Sarah (Remer) Stanley, of New Haven, Conn. Their only child, Walter Duryee, was born Sept. 18, 1865.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

STRATFORD.

Geographical—Topographical—The Indians—The Indian Purchase—Settlement of the Town—Home-Lots and their Owners—Ecclesiastical Troubles—Detailed Account of the Schisms which Resulted in the Settlement of Woodbury—View of Ancient Stratford.

This town lies in the southeast part of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Huntington and Trumbull; on the east by the Housatonic River, which separates it from the town of Milford, in New Haven County; on the south by Long Island Sound; and on the west by the towns of Bridgeport and Trumbull. The town is generally level and remarkably free from stone when compared with many other towns in the county, and along the river and harbor the land is rich and very fertile.

THE INDIANS.

It is evident that this section was from a remote period a favorite resort for various Indian tribes, attracted hither no doubt by the abundance of shell and other fish. From time to time various relics of Indian occupancy have been unearthed, such as pestles, stone hatchets, arrow-heads, etc., and vast deposits of bleached shells may still be found marking their favorite haunts.

Upon the advent of the white settler the natives were numerous, but seemed to constitute no distinct tribe, and were not of a warlike disposition. These Indians belonged to Pagusets, whose dominion extended to Derby, but were commonly styled Pequonnocks.

THE INDIAN PURCHASE.

The first purchase of the Indians was made in 1639, and included an area of ten miles square. Upon the execution of this sale the Indians retired to their two reservations, one at Golden Hill, Bridgeport, and the other at Coram, on the borders of Huntington.

SETTLEMENT OF THE TOWN.

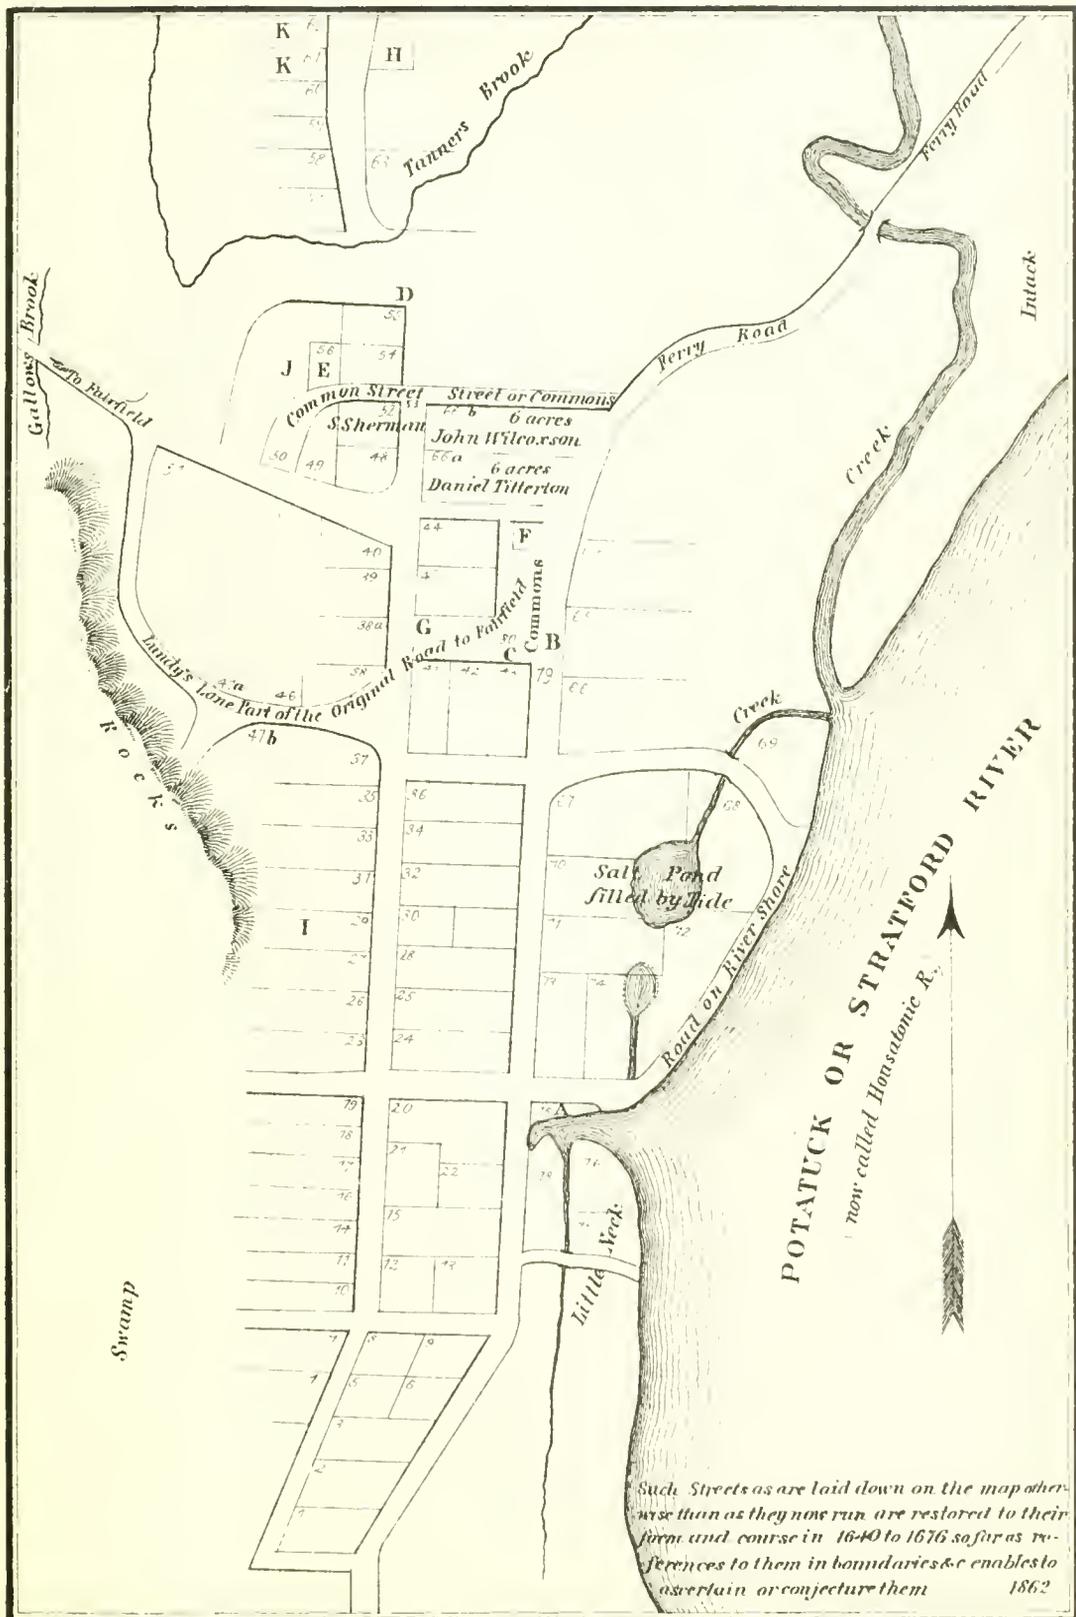

As stated above, the first purchase of lands was made in 1639, and in that year also the permanent settlement of the town was effected. The original proprietors were seventeen in number, but their names have not come to us. Neither did they all settle here. A number simply "entered their rights" and sold.

The favorable location, abundance of fish, and fertility of the meadows, however, soon attracted the attention of others, and within ten years from the first planting of the settlement it numbered a list of forty-one names.

The following is a list of the early settlers, as they appear on the land-records, between the years 1654 and about 1668. The numbers refer to the accompanying map of ancient Stratford.

THE FIRST SETTLEMENT.

The first settlement was made at a place now known as Sandy Hollow, an arm of the Sound or creek, which penetrates a short distance from the Housatonic River, the ancient name of which was Potatuck.

ECCLESIASTICAL TROUBLES.

From the settlement of the little town until 1665 nothing occurred to mar its peace and prosperity. In that year, however, a religious dissension arose which finally resulted in the secession of a large and respectable number of the church and the colonization of Woodbury.

The history of this schism is condensed from Cothurn's "History of Ancient Woodbury?"

"The first ministers in the colony being dead, and a new generation coming on the stage of action, alterations in respect to church membership, baptism, and the mode of church discipline were imperiously demanded. Great dissensions on these subjects accordingly arose in the churches at Hartford, Windsor, Wethersfield, and other places, and continued in various parts of the colony from 1656 to about 1670. The discord not only affected all the churches, but it 'insinuated itself into all the affairs of societies, towns, and the whole commonwealth.'

"About 1664, while these contentions were going on at Hartford and other places, the people at Stratford fell into the same unhappy divisions and controversies in regard to the same subjects. During the administrations of Mr. Blackman,* their first pastor, the church and town enjoyed great peace, and conducted their ecclesiastical affairs with exemplary harmony. About 1663, being far advanced in years, he became very infirm and unable to perform his ministerial labors. The church, therefore, applied to Mr. Israel Chauncey, son of President Charles Chauncey, of Cambridge, to make them a visit and preach among them. A majority of the church chose him for their pastor, and in 1665 he was ordained in the independent mode. But a large and respectable part of the church and town were opposed to his ordination. It was therefore agreed that if, after hearing Mr. Chauncey a certain time, they should continue to be dissatisfied with his ministry, they should have liberty to call and settle another minister, and have the same privileges in the meeting-house as the other party. Accordingly, after hearing Mr. Chauncey the time agreed upon, and continuing to be dissatisfied with his ministrations, they invited Mr. Zachariah Walker to preach to them, and finally chose him for their pastor. Both ministers performed public worship in the same house. Mr. Chauncey performed his services at the usual hours, and Mr. Walker was allowed two hours in the middle of the day. But, after some time, it so happened that one day Mr. Walker continued his services longer than usual. Mr. Chauncey and his people, finding that Mr. Walker's exercises were not finished, retired to a private house, and there held their afternoon devotions. They were, however, so much displeased that the next day they went over to Fairfield and made a complaint to Maj. Gold, one of the magistrates, against Mr. Walker. The major, upon hearing the case, advised pacific measures, and that Mr. Walker should be allowed three hours for the time of his public exercises.

In May, 1669, these disputes came before the General Court, by petition of the parties, and "Upon the petition of the church of Stratford, this court doth declare that whereas ye church have settled Mr. Chauncey their officer and doe desire that they may peaceably enjoy the full improvement of their minister and administrations without hindrerance or disturbance, the court grants their petition therein, onely the court seriously aduiseth both parties to choose some indifferent persons of piety and learning to compose their differences and sett an agreement among them, and that till October Court there may be liberty for Mr. Walker to preach onces in the day, as they have hitherto done by their agreement, the church allowing him full three howers between the church two meetings for the same.†

"Notwithstanding this advice of the General Court, all attempts at a reconciliation were unsuccessful. The parties became more fixed in their opposition to each other, and their feelings and conduct more and more unbrotherly. At length Mr. Chauncey and the majority excluded Mr. Walker and his hearers from the meeting-house, and they convened and worshiped in a private dwelling. They were expelled in the face of the recommendation of the court in October, 1669, advising them that

"This Court therefore recommend it to the Church of Stratford that Mr. Walker have liberty the one parte of the Sabbath, whether parte Mr. Chauncey will, and that they would hold communion together in preaching & prayer. But in case Mr. Chauncey and the Brethren wth him will not agree to that, it shall not be offensive to this Court if Mr. Walker and his Company doe meet distinctly elsewhere; provided each of them provide well for the comfortable supply of their ministers.‡

"The principal cause of difference was in regard to church membership, baptism, and the discipline of church members. What the precise nature of the controversy was could not be distinctly understood by the most learned and pious even of that day. It was the same as that which existed at Hartford, Wethersfield, and other places. One would say, at this distance of time, that the question to be decided was, whether the 'Half-way Covenant Practice' should be introduced into the church or not. Upon this question there was the most grave difference of opinion among the best and most distinguished men in New England. By this plan a person of good moral character might own or renew the covenant of baptism, confessing the same creed as members of churches in full communion, and affirming his intention of becoming truly pious in heart and in life, and have the privilege of presenting himself and children for baptism. Nor did the privilege stop here: he might also present for baptism his grandchildren, children bound to him as apprentices, and even his slaves, by giving a pledge for their religious education. Persons thus owning the covenant were considered church members to all intents and purposes, except that they might not come to the communion table. For conduct unbecoming church members they could be and were dealt with and punished in the same manner as members in full communion. In this way a church could never run down in point of numbers, so long as unconverted persons enough to keep it up were willing to own the covenant of baptism. Abundant proof of the foregoing statements is found in the first book of ministerial records of the Second Church of Stratford, now the First Church of Woodbury, happily in a fine state of preservation. Consequent upon this practice baptisms followed close upon births; very many instances may be found upon these records where the child was but from one to eight days old at the time of the ceremony. If the child appeared to be in danger of "non-continuance," it was baptized on the day of its birth. The children of ministers, deacons, and other leading men in the church were generally less than a week old when presented for baptism. Young persons did not usually own the covenant till they became parents, and wished baptism for their children.

* Trumbull's Hist. of Conn.

"Previous to 1650 great watchfulness had been exercised to admit only such as gave visible evidence of piety. The choice of pastors, also, had been confined exclusively to the church, and nearly all the honor and offices of the colony had been distributed to professors of religion, who in the New Haven colony were the only ones possessed of the right of suffrage in meetings of a political character. In the colony of Connecticut, not only these, but also other orderly individuals, having a certain amount of property, were entitled to the privilege of being admitted freemen. During the lives of the early fathers little trouble had arisen on these points, nearly all the first emigrants being professors of religion. But this generation had passed away and a new one had succeeded, many of whom, on account of their not belonging to the church, were excluded from their proper influence in community. Most of them had been baptized, and, by virtue of this, it was claimed that they might own their own covenant, have their children baptized, and thus perpetuate the church. All New England became interested in this controversy, and in 1657 the matter in dispute was referred to a council of the principal ministers, who met at Boston and declared,—

"That it was the duty of those come to years of discretion, baptized in infancy, to own the covenant; that it is the duty of the church to call them to this; that if they refuse, or are scandalous in any other way, they may be censured by the church. If they understand the grounds of religion, are not scandalous, and solemnly own the covenant, giving up themselves and their children to the Lord, baptism may not be denied to their children."

"In consequence of this decision many owned their covenant, and presented their children for baptism, but did not unite with the church in the celebration of the supper nor in most other duties of members in full communion. Hence it was termed the half-way covenant. In process of time the privilege here mentioned was enlarged in some of the churches. Many churches in Connecticut never adopted this practice, and towards the end of the eighteenth century it was generally abandoned throughout New England.

"The first church at Stratford would not adopt this practice, although a large and influential part of its members were in favor of it, together with a majority of the town, who were not church members. Rev.

Mr. Chauncy, who was not in favor of the practice, was settled over the church in Stratford in 1665, though there was strong opposition to him on this and other accounts. The efforts of the dissenting party to settle their difficulties seem to have been sincere. Their communications to their brethren were couched in respectful and brotherly terms, and their arguments were not easily refuted. In fact, little pains seem to have been taken by the church proper during the whole controversy to answer the reasoning of the dissatisfied party, but it seemed rather to throw itself back on its dignity, with an intention of allowing the malcontents to take their own course. The latter were in the majority in the town-meetings, and John Minor, one of their leaders, was town clerk during the whole time of the controversy, and for several years after, with the exception of a year.

"The controversy opened with a letter to Mr. Chauncy from eight of the dissatisfied party. It was a respectful and kind letter, offering to forget past grievances and soliciting a union with the rest of the church in a truly fraternal and Christian feeling, but received no attention, either from Mr. Chauncy, or the remainder of the church, who were of his way of thinking. Accordingly on the 9th of the following month, the dissentients addressed them another letter in the same spirit, still further making known their wishes, and mildly reproaching them for their want of courtesy and kindness.

"By this letter their desire to be reconciled to the church was so great, that they were willing to be again examined in regard to their 'faith and knowledge,' that the church might be convinced that their peculiar views had not, in any manner, undermined their religious principles, or purity of character. More than two months elapsed before any answer was vouchsafed them.

"Then they received a rather short and crispy reply to letters as humble and inoffensive as the two former had been. The 'Church' begins with calling the dissenters 'neighbors,' and ends with characterizing them as 'the men.' They assume a very lofty and somewhat arrogant tone; sufficiently so, one would think, to have prevented further efforts towards an accommodation of their differences. This was undoubtedly written by Mr. Chauncy, the former letters having been addressed to him, and it is probable that the remainder of the papers on the side of the church were written by him.

"Although by this communication they had been flatly refused admittance to the church, even on a satisfactory examination, yet they persevered in their efforts to accomplish the desired end. It is to be recollected that Stratford belonged to the Connecticut colony, and consequently had other freemen besides the members of the church. The freemen joined with the dissentients in their efforts. It is to be further noted that Mr. Chauncy had been settled by a majority of the members of the church alone, the other freemen of the town having no voice in the matter. As by the laws of the colony they were obliged to pay taxes for his support equally with the church members, they wished a voice in the selection of the minister. The dissenting part of the church, together with the other freemen of the town, as we have seen, constituted a majority in the meetings of the freemen. So that, although the church could choose and settle a minister, it took a majority of the voters of the town to provide for his support. Failing, as individuals and members of his church, to effect an arrangement with Mr. Chauncy, they held a town-meeting and passed a vote embracing the conditions under which they would contribute to his support.

"It does not appear that Mr. Chauncy made any reply to this proposition, contained in said vote, though, as the matter had now assumed a serious aspect, it was doubtless discussed during the next few months with much frequency by the two parties. Efforts were also made by the minority of the church, together with others of the town, to procure another minister for themselves, probably with the tacit consent of the other party; and it would seem that they applied to Mr. Peter Bulkley to preach to them. It does not appear, however, that they were successful in obtaining him. But later in the year the two parties were able to agree that each party should have its own minister, and also agreed upon a division of the land sequestered for the use of the ministry between the two ministers.

"At the October session of the General Court in 1667 this action of the parties was approved and established, on motion of Ens. Joseph Judson.

"Early in the year 1668 the minority engaged Rev. Zachariah Walker, of Jamaica, L. I., to perform pastoral labors among them. Having obtained a minister, they perceived they had no house of their own to worship in. They had contributed equally with Mr. Chauncy's party towards the construction of the meeting-house occupied by the first church, and the first idea that occurred to them was that they might agree with the other party to allow Mr. Walker to preach one part of each Sabbath in the meeting-house, and Mr. Chauncy the other part, thus joining the two congregations. They accordingly made known their proposition to Mr. Chauncy's party, to which they received two elaborate answers, in better spirit than former communications, and in which the plain word 'neighbors' had been exchanged for 'loving neighbors.'

"In this letter it was proposed that the meetings be united. But this evidently was not the best way of obtaining the end desired. Although their differences might not be 'fundamental,' as admitted in this communication, yet their opinions being so diverse in regard to church membership, they could hardly have been much 'edified' in being obliged to listen to the defense of what they did not believe. It would be not unlike the mingling of the worship of the various religious denominations of the present day. While the ministers might have confined themselves to points upon which all agreed, they would be in danger of treading, at times, on forbidden ground.

"It seems that Mr. Walker's party was becoming somewhat incensed at the disposition shown by the other party. A question of veracity is raised between them, and we begin to see how really good men, as the individuals composing both these parties undoubtedly were, may forget themselves and do things unworthy of their position and character. Some of the men of these two parties were among the leading men in the colony, and none were more frequently appointed by the General Court to act on committees for composing similar differences elsewhere than they. At the close of the communication they gave notice of their intention of occupying their joint property, the meeting-house, on the next Sabbath. This design was not carried into execution, but the matter was compromised by allowing Mr. Walker two hours in which to hold his services in the meeting-house on the Sabbath, in the middle of the day, between the two services of Mr. Chauncy, till the meeting of the General Court in May, 1669.

"Their principal difficulty continued to be in regard to the manner in which they should 'enjoy the meeting-house.' Without reflecting upon the matter, one might say that the simplest way of arranging the difficulty would have been to have built another church. But it is to be borne in mind that the country was new and the inhabitants poor. It was a great undertaking to erect a suitable building, and heavy taxes for years were necessary to be laid to complete it.

"The first church petitioned the General Court to take the case into consideration, and do something.

"The court took the case into consideration, as desired, confirmed their choice of Mr. Chauncy, advised both parties to choose 'some indifferent persons of piety and learning to compose their differences,' and gave Mr. Walker liberty to occupy the church three hours each Sabbath, in the middle of the day, between Mr. Chauncy's two services, till the October session. Previous to this session several attempts were made by the parties to carry out the advice of the court to submit their differences to arbitration, and several extended and learned communications passed between them. They, however, resulted in no definite action, as they could not agree upon the points to be submitted to the arbitrators.

"At the October session the matter was again before the court, which passed a resolution advising the first church to comply with the desire of Mr. Walker's party, to have union services, allowing Mr. Walker to preach one part of each Sabbath. Some communications passed between the parties in relation to this advice, but the first church, instead of granting them this privilege, which they had so long sought, excluded them from the house entirely. After suffering this indignity they only addressed a letter to the first church, complaining of the injustice done them, and proposed to divide the town into two parts, that they might go and live by themselves and have no more dissension. They further inform them that they shall ask the same of the General Court.

"They did apply to the General Court at its session in October, making the same proposal, and a committee consisting of Captain Nathan Gold, Mr. James Bishop, Mr. Thomas Fitch, and Mr. John Holly was appointed "To viewe the said lands desired, and to meet some time in November next to consider of the adonsayd motion, and to labour to worke a compliance between those two parties in Stratford, and if their endeavours prove unsuccessfull then they are desired and ordered to make returne to the Court in May next what they judge expedient to be attended in the case."

"Nothing was effected by this committee, nor did they even report to the General Court, as directed. There is no record of any other action in the matter, on the part of the authorities of the colony, till May, 1672, when, as we have seen, on the advice of Gov. Winthrop, Mr. Walker and his church were allowed to found a new town at Pomperaug.

"For two years after Mr. Walker was called to preach to the dissenting party in Stratford he had done so without ordination. Amid the other difficulties under which they labored, they had found no opportunity to accomplish this desirable point. But now, being taunted by the first church on account of their disorganized state, being excluded the meeting-house, and there being no longer any hope of arrangement with the other party, they took the necessary steps to 'embody in church estate.'

"At the ordination of Mr. Walker his church consisted of twenty male members. This number was as large as that of the other churches at their organization up to this date, with the exception of those in four or five of the larger towns. Seven more were added a few days after, and four males and six females were also added previous to the removal to Woodbury, in 1672. More than one-third of these were members by the half-way covenant system, yet it is seen that they subscribed and publicly owned the same covenant as those in full communion. This practice went on, and this identical covenant was owned, during the ministry of Mr. Walker and that of the Rev. Mr. Stoddard, the second minister, till the ordination of Rev. Noah Benedict, the third minister, in 1760, ninety years from the first gathering of the church, when it was abolished.

"In 1672, by permission of the General Court, the second church of Stratford made preparations for removing to Pomperaug, and early the next year a majority of its members emigrated thither. Mr. Walker ministered to his church in both places till June 27, 1678, when he took up his abode permanently in Woodbury. The settlers had now become so numerous that it was no longer problematical that the settlement would be permanent. After the troubles in Stratford were settled by colonizing the new town, and the angry feelings that had been aroused had subsided, both Mr. Chauncey, who was an able and learned man, and Mr. Walker became sensible that their conduct towards each other during the long controversy had not at all times been brotherly, and after some time made concessions to each other, became perfectly reconciled, and conducted themselves towards each other with commendable affection. The two churches were also on the most friendly terms, and Mr. Chauncey, in 1702, after the death of Mr. Walker, assisted at the ordination of Mr. Stoddard, his successor in the ministry."

VIEW OF ANCIENT STRATFORD.

"The primitive settlers of Stratford were of respectable origin, though in humble circumstances as to the luxuries and many of the conveniences of life. The very causes and conditions of the Puritan exodus to New England insured among the first-comers good character and, to a remarkable extent, more than ordinary respectability of social position. Their plain and even scanty household equipment in their new homes, their want of money, and other usual accessories of gentility are readily explained without disparagement of their previous standing. In that day of comparative rudeness in the furniture and appliances even of aristocratic life, little might be expected in the dwellings or the style of younger or collateral branches of ancient and dignified families. Besides, the stress under which our fathers came out of England subjected them to much sacrifice and loss. Their chief men shared with the rest in privations. Deputy Governor Dudley himself, in March, 1631, writes, 'Having yet no table nor other room to write in than by the fire-side, upon my knee, in this sharp winter,' etc. Necessity compelled every one to acquire such aptness as he might in all manual labor, for which the help of a skilled mechanic could not readily be obtained or afforded. But however narrow or humble the lot of the first planters, they belonged for the most part to the better classes of English society. 'Actual examination' (says Hollister, 'Hist. Conn.')

'shows that more than four-fifths of the early landed proprietors of Hartford, Wethersfield, and Windsor belonged to families that had arms granted them in Great Britain.' This fact applies also to the settlers in Stratford, several of whom were of very ancient and honorable lineage in the motherland.

"The great simplicity of manners and superior regard for heavenly above secular distinctions among our ancestors induced much neglect of ancestral titular pretensions, the very tradition of which in many cases had expired, until revived by antiquarian researches or the usually vain attempt to secure properties lying in the family name unclaimed in England.

"A single fact deserves note in judging the ressources of Stratford planters, as compared with those at New Haven, Hartford, and elsewhere. While in these latter places the people were convened for worship, and on other public occasions, by drum or horn, or the blowing of a shell, Stratford enjoyed from the beginning a church-bell. Whether it were a special boon, or is indicative of superior means, cannot be determined.

"The earliest houses, besides their smallness and cheap construction, must have been very bare of comfort and attraction. When Deputy Governor Dudley, of Massachusetts, already named, built a house for himself in 1632, and was censured of some for wainscoting it in time of such impoverishment and need, he showed that this alleged extravagance consisted merely of 'clapboards nailed to the wall, in form of wainscot.'

"The ordinary dwellings were log huts, which gave place after some years to frame houses, larger indeed, yet, by our present standard, generally very humble and poor.

"Glass and nails were expensive, imported luxuries, if indeed the former could be afforded. Hence the windows were small and few. Aged people were living not long ago who remembered when nails were at two shillings per pound. In 1674, 1000 shingle-nails were inventoried at 13 shillings sterling. The price of a house in 1664 is £20; another, in 1674, £22. The inventories of estates from 1650 to 1674, on Stratford records, disclose no glassware, only one carpet, one silver spoon, no chinaware, nor any crockery, excepting two shillings' worth of earthenware. The common utensils were of pewter, iron, or wood. For money values barter was substituted, and the General Court regulated for this purpose the commercial worth of corn, peas, wheat, beef, pork, cider, etc. Wampum was likewise legalized as money. It was neatly made, the white of the core of the periwinkle and the black of muscle-shell, each strung in parcels, the white at six for a penny and the black at three for a penny. The strings represented respectively, in white wampum, one penny, three pence, twelve pence, and five shillings; and, in black, two pence, six pence, two shillings and sixpence, and ten shillings.

"In 1660 summer wheat was current at 4s. 6d. per bushel; winter wheat, 5s.; peas, 3s. 6d.; Indian corn, 3s. In 1678 a mill was sold for £140, payable in pork, wheat, rye, Indian corn, beef, and '£40 in good and well-conditioned winter cider, made in October.'

"In 1707 a house and lot in Main Street, with 24 acres of land the house-lot being that now Thomas Stratton's, were given by Samuel Hawley, Jr., for a negro man.

"Salaries were paid in produce. The first instance of payment in money to the minister here was in 1714, when Rev. Timothy Cutler, then pastor in Stratford, was allowed for his stipend of £140 (produce pay) £93 6s. 8d. in paper money of the colony, a difference in favor of the paper bills of 33½ per cent. Lands were for a long time extremely cheap. Their value in Stratford was not less than in the other thriving towns, yet in 1665 they are appraised: village lots, 25s. per acre; unimproved lands, 12d. per acre.

"Contributions for benevolent objects, which were not unknown from the earliest times, were paid in produce. In 1654, at the instance of the Rev. Mr. Shepard, of Cambridge, funds were collected in the colonies for the indigent students. These collections were repeated from time to time. In 1646, Stratford gave £6 14s., for which it is credited on the books of Harvard College. The produce thus donated was shipped to Boston, and the granary building, used as a receptacle for such collections, is said to have given name to the 'Granary Burial-Ground, as it is still termed, in Tremont Street, near Park Street Church, Boston.'"—Swan.

STRATFORD (Continued).

Gen. David Wooster—Stratford in 1781—Olden Time Accounts—Slavery—Old Fishing Place—Incident of 1812—The Stratford Post-Office.

STRATFORD responded promptly to the patriot call, and of her gallant sons who risked their lives in that arduous struggle conspicuously stands the name of the intrepid Wooster, who fell on that fatal day at Ridgefield.

"Daniel Wooster, the martyr to American liberty, was born in Stratford, Conn., March 2, 1710-11 (old style), and was the youngest of six children. He was educated in the Puritan principles of New England, and after he came to manhood entered Yale College, where he graduated in 1738, in the twenty-eighth year of his age."

In Peters' "General History of Connecticut," published in London in 1781, the following reference is made to Stratford: "Stratford lies on the west bank of the Osootonic River, having the sea or Sound on the south. There are three streets running north and south, and two east and west. The best is one mile long. On the centre square stands a meeting-house with steeple and bell, and a church with steeple, bell, clock, and organ. It is a beautiful place, and from the water has an appearance not inferior to Canterbury. The people are said to be the most polite of any in the colony."

OLDEN TIME ACCOUNTS, Etc.

FISHING-PLACE.

"Know all Men By these Pressee that we, Silas Hubbard, Pluncas Blackman, James Lillingston, and Saml. Curtis Southworth, all of Stratford, Did on the Second Day of June, 1790, go and Clear a fishing place in the Main Channel on the Easterly flat, then Running the pint of Compass, Bringing the Old Red Rocks S^e Called to Bar West Northwest, thence Running East, till it Brings quibous Neck pint in a South Line."

Oyster-planting was commenced in this town in 1844, and has been followed somewhat extensively since. The cultivation of clams is of more recent date.

Wm. A. Lewis's oyster-bed is situated on Sea View Avenue, West Stratford, fronting Bridgeport harbor and Long Island Sound. His beds extend a mile or more easterly from his residence inside the beach, and what is known as Marsh Creek. Also a bed of oysters and clams in front of his residence, and also a bed of oysters in the harbor. It is claimed that the oysters and clams grown in this vicinity are unsurpassed.

INCIDENT OF THE WAR OF 1812.

"The only military engagement which ever took place within town limits occurred in the war of 1812. There had been for some time rumors that the British were preparing to devastate the coasts of Connecticut, and when one of the enemy's men-of-war anchored off Stratford lighthouse, a thrill of terror ran through the entire town. The authorities met, and it was decided to take instant measures for safety, to post a militia guard near the point, which should keep watch for the invaders, detect their manœuvres, and oppose them if they attempted to land. A sergeant and sixteen men were selected for this dangerous task. 'Not a drum was heard' as the armed company, with great caution and secrecy, proceeded to their post, every man sworn to do his duty. The shades of night never descended more heavily than upon this band of devoted patriots, who felt that not only the destinies of Stratford depended upon their bravery, but the fate of their wives and children as well. The night was black, a driving wind tore the clouds overhead, and the breakers roared against the light-house rocks. Strange sounds were heard, which awoke the direct consternation among the watchers. Unaccountable gleams were seen overhead. Inspired by a belief that the enemy might be at hand, the sergeant valiantly crept along the sands, climbed a low slope, stretched himself flat on the ground, and waited. For a time all was still; then all at once he saw clearly that something moved. It moved again, and yet again! There could be no doubt but what the British were upon them. 'Scatter, men! SCATTER!' he cried frantically at the top of his voice, and his men, faithful to the least word of their commander, scattered. As daylight gradually made the situation visible, the valiant warriors crawled out of their various hiding-places and looked each other in the face. The British man-of-war was nowhere to be seen; all that remained to show what the dangers of their midnight encounter had been were the three mullein-stalks which the sergeant had seen waving in the wind. The comrades swore a sacred oath, and declared they would keep it with an equal mind, that the story of the night's adventure should never be told; and with that veil drawn over the secret the conquering heroes returned home to their breakfasts. Two hours afterwards, as the sergeant was chopping wood in his door-yard, one of his neighbors who had not served on military duty, looked over the fence and said, with a grim smile, 'Scatter, men! Scatter!' The story was too good to keep."—Mrs. Kirk.

THE STRATFORD POST-OFFICE.

It is evident that rotation in office—at least, so far as postmaster was concerned—was not a fundamental principle underlying the government of Stratford, for David Brooks officiated in that capacity half a century!

"If I could but summon up the old postmaster, David Brooks," says Mrs. Kirk, "as a witness of the good feeling that kept him in office half a century, secure in the affection of friend and adversary, we should see that Presidential elections might be robbed of half their terrors. Is there anywhere now in the land such a post-office as he kept in a little store, where the sunniest and pleasantest corner was provided with cushioned seats for the comfort of the venerable men who 'most did congregate' to meet the arriving post-bag? This generation knows nothing of the pleasurable excitement of having a mail come in. There are nimble fingers and miraculous methods nowadays, and papers and letters are whisked into boxes which show one at a glance what is in store. No such convenient and undignified proceedings were possible when Mr. Brooks was in power. From the moment his trembling old hands grasped the bag and slowly inserted the key until a litter of letters and papers from East and West and North and South was spread on the counter before him, he gradually swelled with importance and solemnity. His was no careless guardianship; marvelous precautions would he take lest the letters should get into wrong hands when they left his own; in fact, from the fierceness of his look and attitude, one might have supposed that he regarded the claimant of a letter as an intruder on his own rights. Gathering the packets into his hand and expanding his lungs to their fullest, he would begin (often interrupting himself by truerulent observations on bad ink and bad writing) to read off the names, peering at each superscription through his heavy-bowed spectacles, holding the missive first at arm's length, then directly under his nose. The happy recipient, on hearing his name called, would shout 'Here!' when the old postmaster, after indignantly surveying the aspirant from head to foot, evidently longing to pronounce him an impostor, would make a reluctant surrender."

CHAPTER LXXVI.

WITCHCRAFT AND KNOCKINGS—ROMANCE AND TRADITION.

Connecticut Witchcraft—Goodwife Basset, of Stratford—Her Trial—Her Execution—The Stratford Knockings—The Stirling-Folsome Marriage—The Blue Laws.

STRATFORD WITCHCRAFT.

THE following account of the execution of the first person for witchcraft in New England, and also of "Goodwife Basset" of this town, are extracts from a manuscript article by Maj. William B. Hincks, of Bridgeport, on Connecticut witchcraft:

"The charge so often brought against Massachusetts in debate upon the floor of Congress and elsewhere, of being the only State that persecuted the Quakers and put to death unfortunate persons charged with witchcraft, is only partially borne out by facts; Connecticut coming in for her share of responsibility in regard to the latter class. It must also be said for Massachusetts that if guilty of the blood of the victims of her witchcraft excitement, she has in part at least expiated the crime by building their sepulchres; and their tragic history has been so often and so graphically related by her historians and poets that there are few persons indeed who have never heard of the fortitude of Giles Corey or the heroism of Rebecca Nurse and her fellow-sufferers. The case has been otherwise with Connecticut. Although in the early days of the colony twelve or more persons accused of witchcraft were tried for their lives, five of whom suffered capital punishment, the names of the victims have barely escaped oblivion; no historian has moralized over their fate, and the facts relating to them are almost unknown, except to the few whose antiquarian tastes have led them to make a careful study of the early history of the Commonwealth.

"Respecting the first victim, a maid-servant named Mary Johnson, who lived at Windsor or Wethersfield, but few particulars can now be obtained, and her case is of special interest only from the fact that her execution, which took place in the early part of the year 1649, was the first instance in which human life was sacrificed for alleged practice of witchcraft in New England.

"Upon her trial she confessed her guilt and owned that she had long been attended by a familiar spirit who helped her about her household duties, but at length prompted her to commit atrocious crimes, among them child-murder. It is not stated whether she carried out these suggestions, but it would not be strange if the crime for which she suffered death was really infanticide instead of intercourse with the invisible world. In her confession, which is preserved by Mather, she says that her first acquaintance with the Evil One came through 'discontent with her situation' (a state of mind not uncommon among her class at the present day, but not always, it is to be hoped, productive of such tragical consequences) and a habit she had of carelessly 'wishing the devil to take this and that,' which ended in his taking possession of her. While in prison her demeanor was exemplary. She seemed penitent under the ministrations of Rev. Samuel Stone, then minister of the church in Hartford, and when finally led forth to the gallows, we are informed that 'she dy'd in a frame extremely to the satisfaction of them that were spectators of it.'

"Two years later, in May, 1651, occurred the trial of Goodwife Basset, of Stratford. Reference is made to the proceedings in the case of this woman, whose previous history it is now impossible to ascertain, in the colonial records of both Connecticut and New Haven, and from the former it seems clear that her trial was conducted before Governor Haynes and several other magistrates, who came down from Hartford for the purpose. In the latter a confession made by the accused is spoken of. An ancient and apparently trustworthy tradition places the site of the gibbet on which she was hung at the first crossing south of the present railroad depot, in Stratford, and it is believed that that great thoroughfare of commerce, the New York and New Haven Railroad, crosses her grave.

"The tradition further states that while on the way to the gallows her fortitude gave way, and bursting from the procession in which, according to the custom of the time, were magistrates, ministers, and all the dignitaries of the neighborhood, the unfortunate woman threw herself upon a rock by the roadside, clutching it so desperately, that when at length forcibly detached, bloody marks, like finger-prints, were seen upon it. A large quartz stone, streaked upon its face with hornblende, was long shown in Stratford in support of this story, but has lately ceased to be one of the marvels of that quiet village, having been broken up and its fragments built into a cellar wall."

THE "STRATFORD KNOCKINGS."

The following sketch of what is known as the Stratford Knockings, which began in 1850, is from the pen of Mrs. Ellen Olney Kirk:

"One is tempted to believe that the spirit of Goody Basset, hanged in 1651 for divers witchlike arts, was never fairly laid, and now, after an unquiet term of one hundred and ninety-nine years, returned to walk the earth. Or it may be that the dust of those early settlers, over whose graves the lofty trees of Elm Street were planted and now extend their leafy aisles, rose for a sort of earthly judgment-day and took possession of the nearest habitation. Evil-minded or angry spirits they must have been who ransacked, pounded, knocked, and almost overturned the quiet, decorous house known in later years as the Stratford Institute. During the early period of this unearthly possession the entire village was convulsed with excitement and lost its character for sobriety; crowds poured hither by every train; editors, reporters, spiritualists, skeptics explored, watched, investigated and interrogated, and gave an unwelcome publicity to the scandalous details. The single village hackman thrived amidst the universal decline and fall of Stratford; so many were the visitors that he was obliged to set up a huge yellow omnibus, which traversed the streets night and day with a sign in huge capitals which made the village disgrace only too legible: 'Mysterious Stratford Knockings.'

"The 'knockings' began in the house of Dr. A. Phelps, who had resided in the place, with his wife and children, for two or three years. The day was Sunday. When Dr. Phelps' family returned from church they found their door hung with crape, and on entering the house saw signs of strange disturbance during their absence, while in one of the rooms was discovered a figure laid out and shrouded for the grave. From this moment the house was taken possession of by the 'spirits' or some other unseen agencies, that continued to run riot for the ensuing eight months or more. Every trick, device, horror, absurdity, impertinence ever pressed into the service of ghost, hobgoblin, witch, or modern 'spirit' was now turned against the peace and respectability of this unfortunate family. There were rappings—not merely rappings, but thumpings, and thumpings, too, as if a giant's strength were behind them; there were marvelous noises, with reverberations like thunder up and down the staircases and along the halls; there were apparitions, strange figures in strange places; there were messages from the unseen land of the spirits, not only spelled out in hard knocks and vibrations on headboards of beds, on ceilings, doors, and floors, but written out fairly on slips of paper, which floated down from the invisible like the leaves of the Cumaean Sibyl: the very vegetables from the cellar on being pared and sliced were found to be written over with indelible characters. There were apparently whole legions of spirits hard at work, as if all the tormented souls from one of Dante's lowest circles had been delivered from their pain to communicate certain tidings to all who entered Dr. Phelps' house, then, finding no interpreter, grew angry and waged war upon the unbelievers who rejected them. Their ammunition showed a dearth of all suitable spiritual artillery: flat-irons, large junk ink-bottles, scuttles of coals, pokers, bricks, and even toilet-brushes, were the weapons made use of; scissors too, since one of the daily performances was cutting into ribbons the clothes of the son and heir of the house.

"These things may seem incredible, but they were not done in a corner, and the eyes of all men were turned to see what would be the end of it. The unhappy master of the house courted investigation, and for four months everything was investigated and the most widely-differing conclusions were reached. Elm Street—haughty, exclusive, aristocratic Elm Street—echoed to the tread of hundreds who came to find some clue to the strange 'Stratford knockings.' First of all was Parson Weed, started out of his study-chair by the tidings of these doings of the Evil One in the very midst of the faithful, still wearing his gown and slippers, his luminous eyes bent on space as he strode indignantly forward, eager to encounter and vanquish the adversary. Other divines followed him, but all the light of their orthodoxy could not illuminate the darkness of these manifestations. Some of those who came to suggest an easy remedy for cheap and obvious impostures remained mute, deciding that there might be things in heaven and earth not reached by their little foot-measure of philosophy. Strange things were enacted before clear-sighted and reasonable men, two of whom, sitting alone in a room with two doors,—one opening into the hall and the other into a clothespress,—heard knockings on the inside of the closet-door, which on opening they found to proceed from vacancy; as soon as the door was again closed the knockings proceeded, not only with a loud noise, but so vigorously that the very panels shook under their eyes. Sitting before the fire, they beheld the ornaments on the mantel-piece spring from their places to alight unbroken on the floor; bricks started out of thin air and were hurled across the room; pokers jumped up of their own accord and went crashing through the windows; on lifting a lighted candle they saw the flame expand to four times its usual circumference, circle round the wick, then shrink and hang blue and tremulous above, and finally resume its feeble flicker. These sights, and a thousand others as unusual, are related by the most credible witnesses among outsiders. The family themselves were compelled to endure personal demonstrations of ghosts or hobgoblins, who when clasped in the arms of flesh and blood vanished, leaving nothing behind save sheets from the domestic linen-chest.

"Life in Stratford was not an amusement to the worthy Dr. Phelps. Surrounded apparently by a band of hostile forces which threatened flesh and blood, haunted, waylaid, and pursued by spectres, girt about by a sea of mystery which separated him from his fellow-creatures, and, worse than all, forced to have his misfortunes become a show, a coarse stimulus for sensationalists, he saw no resource but to flee from his troubles, and he accordingly left the place. The spirits went with him, or back to their forgotten God's Acre, or into the witch's unmarked burial-place. There are those who still shake their heads over the Stratford knockings, maintaining that they were never in any degree explained, while others find them as easy of solution as the jokes in a last year's almanac."

THE STIRLING-FOLSOME MARRIAGE.

The romance of the Stirling-Folsome marriage, or how Sir John Stirling wooed and won pretty Abby Folsome, the blacksmith's daughter, is so well corroborated by history in some of its details that many antiquarians are disposed to accept the whole of it.

Briefly it is as follows: During the Revolution, Gen. Silliman was captured by the British, and in retaliation an expedition was planned from Stratford, with John Folsome, the blacksmith, as leader, for the capture of Judge Jones, a royalist, living on Long Island. The expedition was successful, and Judge Jones was brought to Stratford, and while here met pretty Abby Folsome, whose beauty made such an impression upon him that at a dinner subsequently given him in New York in honor of his return he proposed the "health of the fairest American rebel," meaning Miss Abby Folsome.

Some time after Cornwallis' surrender, Judge Jones and Sir John Stirling, during a tour along the coast, visited Stratford, and while here Miss Abby came under the gaze of Sir John. The beauty and grace of the Stratford belle caused the peer of the realm of Great Britain to indefinitely postpone his departure from the little village, and the result was that not many weeks elapsed ere the quiet little town was thrown into a great excitement by the announcement that Sir John Stirling had married Abby Folsome and had sailed for England, leaving her behind. Many there were who were ready to say that he would never return; in fact, he never did, but he sent his secretary for her in a vessel richly prepared for her comfort. In Burke's Peerage is the following memorandum:

"Sir John Stirling married Miss Folsome, of Stratford, in North America, by whom he had a numerous family. The title is borne to-day by the grand-nephew of Sir John Stirling."

TRADITIONARY.

The following incident concerning the settlement of Mr. Birdsey, one of the earliest inhabitants, is taken from Mrs. Ellen Olney Kirk's article, entitled "Stratford on the Sound," published in Lippincott's Magazine, July, 1879:

"Mr. Birdsey removed here from Milford in 1649, and tradition lends a sort of romance to his heira. Milford was renowned for its orthodoxy, and the 'Blue Laws,' both written and unwritten, were rigidly enforced. One of these insisted that no man should kiss his wife on Sunday. Mr. Birdsey, having been caught offending in this particular, was, on Monday, sentenced to a number of lashes. He escaped from the town officers, however, ran to the river, swam it, and, once on the Stratford shore, shook his fists in his pursuers' faces. His wife followed him, as in duty bound, and his children increased and his grand-children multiplied until now the Birdsey pedigree is the central stem of all Stratford genealogies."

CHURCHES, LODGES, SCHOOLS.

The Congregational Church—Christ Church—Methodist Episcopal Church—Summerfield Church—Trinity Memorial Chapel—St. John's Lodge, No. 8, F and A, M.—Oroonoke Lodge, No. 90, I. O. of O. F.—The Stratford Academy—Present Condition of the Schools.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

"THE precise date of the organization of the first church of Christ in Stratford, and the names of the original members, cannot be ascertained. All business relative to the settlement, support, and dismissal of ministers, and to the building and repairing of meetings-houses, was transacted in town-meeting until the year 1721, and no regular town record prior to 1650 exists.

"Nor does any record of the church prior to 1675 now exist. The settlement of the town began in 1639, and took definite form as a plantation in 1640. In all probability the church was organized as early as this, for the Rev. Adam Blakeman, its first pastor, was then in the town, as his presence is certified by an order of the General Court, dated June, 1640, directing him and others to settle the boundary-line between Stratford and Fairfield.

"The church was certainly in existence in 1644, as in that year the General Court appointed William Judson and John Hurd, 'members of the Stratford Church,' to collect the contributions for indigent students at Cambridge College.

"The Rev. Adam Blakeman, the first pastor, was born in Staffordshire, England, A.D. 1599, and was matriculated at Christ's College, Oxford, May 28, 1617. He was a preacher for some years in Leicestershire and Derbyshire, and in 1638 came to New England. He was one of the original company of settlers in Stratford in 1639-40, and was minister of the church until his death, Sept. 7, 1665.

"The Rev. Israel Chauncey was a native of Massachusetts, and the son of the Rev. Charles Chauncey, president of Harvard College. He was born at Scituate, Mass., 1644, graduated at Harvard College in 1661, was chosen assistant to Mr. Blakeman in the ministry, and upon Mr. Blakeman's death was called in June, 1666, to the pastoral charge. He was chosen rector or president of the college Nov. 11, 1701, but the honor he declined. He died March 4, 1703.

"Upon Mr. Chauncey's settlement an active opposition developed itself, which culminated in the division of the church.

"After Mr. Chauncey's death the church and town, in April, 1703, chose Capt. Judson and the two deacons to supply the pulpit, and to obtain help of the elders of the County to keep a day of fasting and prayer for God's direction in seeking a minister. For six years the church was without a settled pastor.

"Rev. Timothy Cutler, D.D.—A call was extended to Dr. Cutler, Sept. 16, 1709, and in or near the December of that year he was ordained. He was born in Charlestown, Mass., June 1, 1681, and graduated at Harvard College in 1701. In 1719 he was chosen President of Yale College. In 1722, professing a preference for the Church of England, and renouncing his connection with the churches of the colony, he was requested to resign his position as President of the college. Soon after he was settled over Christ's Church in Boston. He died Aug. 17, 1765.

"In 1719 a call was extended to Rev. Samuel Russell (grad. Yale Col. 1712), but as there was a large minority in opposition to him he did not settle, though for three years he supplied the pulpit and had the pastoral care of the church. In November, 1721, for the first time in the settlement of the town, the town as such, ceased to determine, by vote, the affairs of the Congregational parish. This change arose from the introduction of an Episcopal Church, which, although it had been in embryo for some years previous, took permanent form now through accessions derived from the controversy with Mr. Russel.

"Rev. Hezekiah Gold.—In February, 1722, a call was extended to Rev. Hezekiah Gold. He was ordained on the first Wednesday in June, 1722.

"Mr. Gold was dismissed July 3, 1752. He died in 1761.

"The church remained without a pastor two years.

"Rev. Izraiah Wetmore was the son of Hezekiah Wetmore, of Middletown, was born in 1728; was graduated at Yale, 1748, and was ordained pastor over this church, May 16, 1753. He resigned his charge in 1780. The church was pastorless for over four years.

"Rev. Stephen William Stebbins, the next pastor, was born in East Long Meadow, Mass., June 26, 1758, and was graduated at Yale College, 1781. He was ordained pastor of this church, July 7, 1784. He was dismissed August, 1813.

"Rev. Matthew R. Dutton was born in Watertown, Conn., June 3, 1783, was graduated at Yale College, 1808, and was ordained in Stratford, Sept. 20, 1814. Mr. Dutton continued pastor, universally esteemed and beloved, until the autumn of 1821, when he accepted the appointment of 'Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy' in Yale College. He died July 17, 1825.

"Rev. Joshua Leavitt, D.D., was born in Heath, Franklin Co., Mass., Sept. 8, 1794, and was graduated at Yale College, September, 1814. He was ordained over the church in February, 1825, and was dismissed in 1828.

"Rev. Thomas Robbins was born in Norfolk, Conn., Aug. 11, 1777, entered Yale College in 1792. He graduated at Williams College in August, 1796. In September following he took the same degree, B.A., in his former class at Yale. In 1803 he was ordained missionary of the Home Missionary Society to the northern part of Ohio, where he labored until impaired health obliged him to return. In February, 1830, he was installed pastor over this church, and on September 9th, the following year, he was dismissed.

"Rev. Frederick W. Chapman was born in Canfield, Trumbull Co., Ohio, Nov. 17, 1806; was graduated at Yale College in 1828; was ordained and installed pastor of this church Sept. 5, 1832, and was dismissed April 16, 1839.

"Rev. William Boughton Weed was born in New Canaan, March 22, 1811, and was graduated at Yale College, 1830. He was ordained at Stratford Dec. 4, 1830. He died Dec. 3, 1869.

"Rev. Joseph R. Page was born in New Brunswick, N. J., and was installed pastor of this church Feb. 11, 1857. In October, 1858, he was dismissed.

"Rev. Benjamin L. Swan was born in Medford, Mass., July 31, 1813; received the honorary degree of A.M. from Yale in 1844. In September, 1858, he accepted the invitation of this church and was installed October, 1858, and was dismissed in 1863.

"Rev. Lewis Charpiot was installed pastor of this church May 25, 1861, and was dismissed April 12, 1866.

"Rev. William K. Hall was installed Oct. 24, 1866.

"Rev. Frank S. Fitch was ordained June 17, 1873; pastoral relations ceased Oct. 31, 1878.

"Rev. Samuel Howard Dana was installed March 12, 1879, and is the present (June, 1880) incumbent.

"Elders.—But one ruling elder seems ever to have held office in this church; he was Philip Groves, who died in 1676. He was deputy to the General Court for the town of Stratford as early as 1652. In 1654 he was chosen 'assistant,' and as such 'was empowered to marry persons.'

"Deacons.—The earliest named officers of this class on record are John Birdseye and John Wilcoxson; the former is referred to as Deacon in 1678, and the latter in 1679, but neither of them could have been the first incumbents after the organization of the church, as Mr. Birdseye was born in 1641 and died in 1698, and as Mr. Wilcoxson was born in 1634 and died in 1690.

"3. Thomas Wells is mentioned as a deacon in 1707; died in 1721.

"4. Robert Walker is next named as a deacon in 1722; died in 1743.

"5. John Thompson is also mentioned as a deacon in 1722; died in 1765.

"6. Job Peck is also styled 'Deacon' on his gravestone, though no record of his appointment is extant; died in 1782.

"7. Elnathan Wheeler, appointed in 1751, died 1761.

"8. Isaiah Brown, appointed in 1755, died 1793.

"9. John Judson, appointed in 1773, died —.

"10. Ebenezer Coe, appointed in 1784, died 1820.

"11. Nathan McEwen, appointed in 1791, died 1810.

"12. Samuel U'ford, appointed in 1801, died 1821.

"13. Agur Curtis, appointed in 1801, died 1838.

"14. Philo Curtis, appointed in —, died 1852.

"15. Agur Curtis, appointed in —, died 1868.

"16. David P. Judson, appointed in 1837.

"17. Agur T. Curtis, appointed in 1858.

"18. Lewis Beers, appointed in 1858.

"19. Charles C. Wells, appointed in 1867.

"20. Samuel T. Houghton, appointed in 1877.

"21. Samuel E. Curtis, appointed in 1877."

MEETING HOUSES.

"The first house for public worship was erected near what is now called 'Sandy Hollow.' This fact in reference to it is of interest, and deserves to be remembered. It possessed a bell, with which the people were summoned to worship. How it came to be thus favored is not known, for it was the only church in all the colonies where the people were not called together by 'drum, the blowing of shell or horn.' In 1681 this house was removed and its materials sold at auction.

"The second house for public worship was built on Watch-House (now Academy) Hill. In 1689 this house was, by vote, fortified for the security of the women and children against any attack that might be made by the Indians.

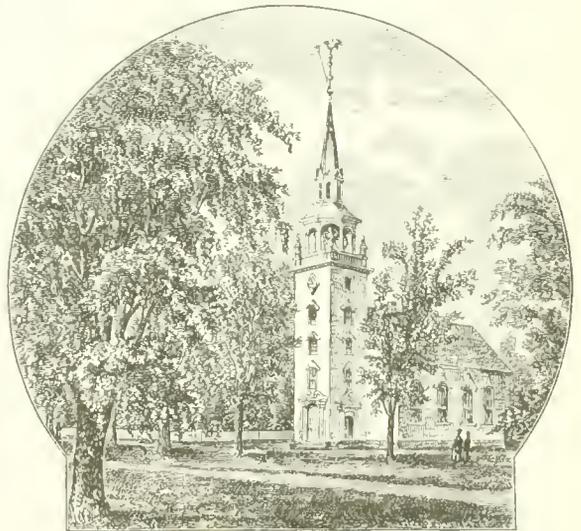

"The third house for public worship was built in 1743, and stood where the academy now stands until 1785, when it was destroyed by lightning.

"The fourth house for public worship was built in 1786. It occupied the site of the present house.

"The fifth and present house for worship was dedicated on the 27th October, 1859."

CHRIST CHURCH.

The first services in the State of Connecticut according to the rights and ordinances of the Protestant Episcopal Church were held in this town in 1706, and here the first Episcopal church in the State was erected in 1723.

FIRST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN CONNECTICUT.

The following account of the organization of this church is from Trumbull's "History of Connecticut: "

"During the term of about seventy years from the settlement of Connecticut, the Congregational had been the only mode of worship in the colony. But the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, in 1704, fixed the Rev. Mr. Muirson as a missionary at Rye. Some of the people at Stratford had been educated in the Church of England mode of worship and administering of the ordinances, and others were not pleased with the rigid doctrines and discipline of the New England churches, and they made an earnest application to Mr. Muirson to make a visit at Stratford and preach and baptize among them.

"About the year 1706, upon their invitation, he came to Stratford, accompanied with Col. Heathcote, a gentleman zealously engaged in promoting the Episcopal Church.

"The ministers and people in that and the adjacent towns, it seems, were alarmed at his coming, and took pains to prevent their neighbors and families from hearing him. However, the novelty of the affair, and other circumstances, brought together a considerable assembly, and Mr. Muirson baptized five and twenty persons, principally adults.

"This was the first step towards introducing the church worship in the colony. In April, 1707, he made another visit to Stratford. Col. Heathcote was pleased to honor him with his company, as he had done before. He preached at this time at Fairfield, as well as Stratford, and in both towns baptized a number of children and adult persons. Both the magistrates and ministers opposed the introduction of Episcopacy, and advised the people not to attend the preaching of the church missionaries; but the opposition only increased the zeal of the church people. Mr. Muirson after this made several journeys to Connecticut and itinerated among the people. But there was no missionary from the society fixed in Connecticut until the year 1722, when Mr. Pigot was appointed missionary at Stratford. The churchmen at first in that town consisted of about fifteen families, among whom were a few husbandmen, but much the greater number were tradesmen who had been born in England and came and settled there. Some of their neighbors joined them, so that Mr. Pigot had twenty communicants and about one hundred and fifty hearers. In 1723, Christ Church in Stratford was founded, and the Rev. Mr. Johnson, afterwards Dr. Johnson, was appointed to succeed Mr. Pigot."

"From 1723," says Mrs. Kirk, "Christ Church of Stratford has a clear record and an important history. At that time Mr. Samuel Johnson, having returned from England, where he had spent a year and taken holy orders, was settled as pastor, and until 1754, when he became president of King's (now Columbia) College in New York, he gave all his powerful abilities to the advancement of the parish. During his long pastorate there were some lively breezes of doctrinal and social differences between the rival religious bodies.

"In 1743 the second Christ church was erected on the village green at the foot of Meeting-House Hill, where it stood until 1858. It was to this church that Dr. Peters admiringly alluded, and on the top of its steeple was a proud and dominant cock, which has to this day faced the tempest. The bell was given by Dr. Johnson, and the glass for its many windows by another well-wisher, who, however, when he came to pay the bill, is said to have expressed some regrets for his over-lavish generosity, declaring with irritation that the church must all have been made of glass. The organ was the first instrument of its kind used in a place of public worship in Connecticut, and was purchased in 1756 by thirty-three persons, who 'bound themselves to Mr. Gilbert Dobleis, of Boston, merchant, in the aggregate sum of sixty pounds sterling, to be paid within six years in six equal payments of ten pounds sterling per annum, without demand of interest.'

"The Revolution brought fresh causes of difference between the churches. The Episcopal ministers, whose strength lay in traditional authority, naturally took the side of England. Having prayed so long for 'our excellent King George,' they found it almost impossible to leave off such supplications. One of them uttered this prayer by inadvertence after the war began; then, seeing a threatening movement in his congregation, he corrected himself, shouting frantically, 'O Lord, I mean George Washington!' In Stratford church the old prayers were cut short by an arbitrary patriot, who had no notion of uttering 'Amen' to such heresies. 'My grandfather,' so Capt. Pulaski Benjamin has told me, 'went to church the Sunday after the battle of Lexington, and when Mr. Kneeland (the clergyman) read out the prayer for the royal family, he stood up in his pew and declared that no such prayers must be uttered in Stratford, that the name of George III. was the name of the worst enemy of every one in the colony. Mr. Kneeland rose from his knees, shut his prayer-book, raised his hand and pronounced the benediction, and the church was closed until the end of the war.'"

The first church edifice was opened for worship Dec. 25, 1723. It was located in the present church burying-ground, and was in size forty-five and one-half feet in length, thirty and one-half feet wide, and twenty-two feet between joints.

The church, as mentioned above, was erected in 1743, and was opened for worship July 8, 1744. It was sixty feet long, forty-five feet and six inches wide, twenty-four feet high to the roof, with a spire one hundred and twenty feet high.

The present church edifice was dedicated July 29, 1858, with a spire ornamented by the venerable cock which had veered on the steeple-top of the ancient church.

Dr. Johnson was succeeded as rector of this church by Mr. Winslow, then Mr. Kneeland, who was succeeded by Mr. Sayre. The next rector was Rev. Ashbel Baldwin, who commenced his labors in 1792 and remained until 1832.

The rectors since Rev. Mr. Baldwin have been George C. Shepherd, Edwin W. Wiltbank, Alfred A. Miller, John Morgan, Joseph Scott, John A. Paddock, John Stearns, Daniel C. Weston, Charles H. Strong, D. L. Lounsbury, and Arthur Sloan, the present incumbent.

The following is the inscription on Dr. Johnson's monument in the Episcopal burying-ground:

"M. S. Samuëlis Johnson, D.D.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

From the best information I am able to obtain it appears that the first sermon preached by a Methodist in the village of Stratford, Conn., was by Jesse Lee, a noted evangelist, who passed through this place on his way to New Haven, and stopping at Stratford preached in the town-house on the 4th day of July, A.D. 1789. The first Methodist class was organized here on the 19th day of May, 1790, by Jesse Lee, consisting of the following-named persons: John Smith, John Peck, Margaret Plumb and her sister, Amy Plumb, four in all. Bishop Asbury passed this place on June 7, 1791, preached in the town-house, and met the class which, organized only a little over one year before, had now increased its numbers to twenty members. Much opposition was aroused among the people against this then new sect, and from this period to 1810, when the first house of worship was erected, the preaching was had in private houses. The residences of Capt. John Peck and Elnathan Wheeler are named as places where they usually met. No record can be found of the exact date when the first Methodist church was erected, nor of the name or number of the first officers and members. By reference to the Conference records I find that in 1810, the year the first church was built, Nathan Emery and John Russell were preachers on the Stratford Circuit, and preached alternately in the village of Stratford, and Joseph Crawford presiding elder; in 1811, Aaron Hunt, Oliver Sykes, and J. Reynolds were preachers, and William Anson presiding elder; 1812, Seth Crowell, Gilbert Lyon, and S. Beach, preachers, and Elijah Hawley presiding elder; 1813, E. Washburn, Jas. Coleman, preachers, and N. Bangs presiding elder. The following were preachers from 1814 to 1879, inclusive: 1814, E. Wolsey and H. Ames; 1815, E. Hibbard and B. English; 1816, R. Harris and — Dickerson; 1817, R. Harris and E. Canfield; 1818, S. Bushnell and A. Pierce; 1819, B. Northrop and D. Miller; 1820, Bela Smith and D. Miller; 1821, Bela Smith and James Coleman; 1822, Laban Clark and Eli Barnett; 1823, Laban Clark and John Nixon; 1824, E. Denniston and William Pease; 1825, E. Denniston and Julius Field; 1826, S. D. Ferguson and V. Buck; 1827, E. Barnett and V. Buck; 1828–29, John Lovejoy and J. H. Romer; 1830–31, H. Bartlett and C. Sherman; 1832, S. Martindale and L. C. Cheney; 1833, J. P. Youngs and J. Tackaberry; 1834, R. Gilbert; 1835, D. Miller; 1836, D. Miller; 1837, C. W. Turner; 1838, Clark Fuller (Mr. Fuller left during this year, and Asahel Bronson, a local preacher, was appointed to fill the vacancy for the year); 1839–40, Abram S. Francis (during his pastorate the present church edifice was erected); 1841–42, Paul R. Brown (under his labors the church was favored with a very precious revival, and a number who have since become prominent members were converted); 1843–44, Daniel Smith, whose labors were also greatly blessed in the building up of believers; 1845–46, Harvey Husted; 1847, — Frost; 1848–49, C. Kelsey; 1850–51, Morris Hill; 1852–53, Jacob Shaw; 1854, G. C. Creevy; 1855–56, L. D. Nickerson; 1857–58, William T. Hill; 1859–60, S. A. Seaman; 1861–62, J. W. Simpson; 1863–65, Bennett T. Abbott; 1866–67, T. D. Littlewood; 1868–70, Joseph Smith; 1871–73, Joseph Vinton; 1874–76, A. V. R. Abbott; 1877–79, Benjamin Pillsbury. This completes the list of preachers up to this Conference year, which commenced April 1, 1880, when the Rev. S. A. Seaman, who served this charge in the years 1859–60, was appointed here, and is now preacher in charge of this station.

The present number of church members is 185; Sunday-school scholars, 137; teachers and officers, 23; volumes in Sunday-school library, 413; value of church edifice and land, $60,000; value of church parsonage and land, $2000.

Board of Trustees.—Wilbur A. Smith, President; H. A. Sutton, Secretary and Treasurer; Henry M. Blakeslee, Otis B. Curtis, Lewis Curtis.

Board of Stewards.—E. I. Peck, President, and Acting Secretary and Treasurer; W. French, H. A. Sutton, O. Bouton, James Meachen.

SUMMERFIELD CHURCH.

About the 1st of January, 1871, the following persons met in a room on Barnum Street, West Stratford, and established a mission: Rev. W. W. Bowditch, pastor of Washington Park Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. George A. Parkington, George W. Bacon, Solomon Batchelor, W. W. Stannard, and a number of others. Rev. George A. Parkington, then a local preacher, but since a member of the New York East Conference, was selected to preach in the mission. He preached his first sermon Jan. 15, 1871, Jan. 29, 1871, a Sabbath-school was organized; Wesley W. Botsford, Superintendent; Frank N. Cox, Secretary and Treasurer; David Clark, Librarian. The school began with thirty members. In due time a class and regular prayer-meeting were established. Solomon Batchelor was the class-leader. As the mission prospered they began to talk of building a church. A committee was appointed for this purpose and a site purchased. A lady by the name of Susan Hubbell sent for the committee and headed the subscription with five hundred dollars. The committee were George W. Bacon, Solomon Batchelor, Calvin Hall, I. Hurd, and L. B. Vaill. George A. Parkington joined the Conference in April, 1872, and was sent to the Summerfield Church, as this was the name selected for the new church.

On the 30th of the same month the building committee met to adopt a plan for the building, and George W. Bacon gave five hundred dollars, and other subscriptions were received. Solomon Batchelor, Isaac Hurd, P. T. Barnum, and Frances Ford each gave one hundred dollars. May 5, 1872, the first members were received by letter: Gilead T. Andrews, Maria Andrews, Solomon Batchelor, Joanna Batchelor, George H. Batchelor, Flavia A. Batchelor, Wesley H. Botsford, Alice M. Botsford, Wallace M. Botsford, Romeo Botsford, Edith A. TRINITY MEMORIAL CHURCH, WEST STRATFORD.

On the 20th of September, 1871, the first of a series of Wednesday evening services was held in West Stratford, at the house of Silas Scofield, Esq., Revere Place, by the Rev. Sylvester Clarke, rector of Trinity Church, Bridgeport. On the following Sunday, September 24th, a Sunday-school was begun in the common school-house of the same (Newfield) district. The corner-stone of a chapel was laid by Rt. Rev. Bishop Williams, of Connecticut, on Wednesday, Nov. 29, 1871. The building, after being inclosed, waited through the winter before it was plastered. The first service in it was the celebration of the holy communion on Sunday morning (Whit-sunday), May 19, 1872. The chapel is in memory of the Rev. Gurdon Saltonstall Coit, D.D., rector for nearly thirty years of St. John's Church, Bridgeport, who died in Southport, Conn., Nov. 10, 1869.

This parish is a mission of Trinity Church, Bridgeport. It contains thirty families, twenty-five communicants, and nearly a hundred Sunday-school scholars, and has a record of great usefulness.

NEWFIELD METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

On the second Sunday of May, 1871, D. W. Currier and Theodore Courtright called on the neighbors of the Newfield School District, and gave out that they would open a Sunday-school on the following Sunday afternoon in the barn of Niram Hawley. On the Sunday named two children—ages, six and eight years, names, Charles and ——— Jelletfe—came to Sunday-school; on the following Sunday there were fifteen present. Theodore Courtright was elected superintendent. The school increased in numbers and interest until the barn became too small, and they moved to larger quarters in a store owned by John French. In the mean time a society was formed and a Sunday-school organized, called a Union Sunday-school, formed Sunday, Sept. 21, 1871. This school was commenced in the district school-house with twenty-six scholars, and continued until the completion of a chapel, which was erected and ready for use on the 3d of March, 1872.

Much self-denial and labor was necessary in order to complete the work. The land on which the building rests was leased to the association for the nominal sum of one dollar per year by Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Kingman, they having bought the ground for this purpose, paying therefor eight hundred dollars. The two schools were growing, and it was decided among the officers of the two schools that whichever society became the strongest, or the first to grow into sufficient strength, to organize an efficient church, and Aug. 18, 1872, both schools united, and the whole was turned over to Rev. A. C. Eggleston, pastor of the Washington Park Methodist Episcopal Church, who had charge of the Newfield District, under the New York East Conference. At the joint meeting of said schools Theodore Courtright was chosen superintendent, and has held said position up to the present time.

The Newfield Methodist Episcopal Society thus called assumed all the debts of the church and land and paid all the bills, and bought the land of Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Kingman for the sum of thirteen hundred and twenty-eight dollars. The following spring, 1873, they applied to New York East Conference for a preacher, and the Rev. R. S. Eldridge was sent, who labored faithfully and earnestly, and many souls were added to the church. The next pastor was the Rev. E. A. Blake, who served one year.

Since that time the church has had no regular pastor, but has various supplies from other churches. The Sunday-school has been continued, and has steadily grown in interest and numbers.

ST. JOHN'S LODGE, NO. 8, F. AND A. M.

The following history of St. John's Lodge is kindly furnished by Mr. Nathan Wells, being extracts from a historical address delivered at the centennial anniversary of the lodge in 1866, by Rev. C. H. W. Stocking:

"The original charter of St. John's Lodge, Stratford, was granted by the R. W. George Harrison, Provincial Grand Master of the then Colony of New York, bearing the date of April 22, 1766. On the 7th of May following, a meeting preliminary to the formal opening of the lodge was held, and Monday, the 12th of May, designated as the day for organizing.

"On the appointed evening, there were present Joseph Clark, W. M.; James Dunn, S. W.; John Harpin, J. W., pro tem., and 'visitant' Brother Lemuel Brooks. The lodge having been opened in due form and clothed with all their Honours, after having dedicated the same to the Holy St. John, they proceeded to raise the following Brethren to the Sublime Degree of Master Mason, to wit: Brother Henry Van Dyck, Brother Ephraim Peet, Brother Abijah Beach, Brother William McIntosh.'

"On the 15th of the same month the four new brethren were appointed to the subordinate offices. Henry Van Dyck, S. W.; Ephraim Peet, J. W.; Abijah Beach, Treas.; James Dunn, Sec.

"The element of discipline early entered into the workings of the lodge. Refusal to obey the Master's gavel was punished by a fine of two shillings, to be paid immediately, or suffer expulsion. Obscenity paid a fine of one shilling; talking, one shilling; profanity, two shillings. Initiation fees were £3 to the box and three shillings to the Tyler.

"Twelve successive times Samuel Benjamin represented the lodge at the annual communication of the Grand Lodge, walking the distance with glad though weary feet, that so his candlestick should not be removed. Matthias Nichols and Benjamin Fairchild and Rev. Ashbel Baldwin appear as frequently representing their lodge at the grand communications in honest discharge of their Masonic obligations.

"This lodge worked under its old colonial charter as St. John's, No. 1, until Oct. 9, 1792. It then came in under another charter from the newly-formed Grand Lodge of the State—as St. John's, No. 8. The Nicholls, the Benjamins, the Fairchilds, the Johnsons, and others whom we might mention, appear among their fellows as zealous craftsmen who knew their work and wrought it well.

"The following are the names of the Past Masters of this lodge, with their terms of office: 1766-68, Joseph Clarke; 1768-69, Henry Van Dyke; 1769-70, Joseph Clarke; 1770-73, Stiles Lewis; 1773-79, Joseph Clarke; 1779-80, Stiles Lewis; 1780-84, John Thatcher; 1784-86, Peter Nicoll; 1786-88, Matthias Nicoll; 1788-90, John Thatcher; 1790-95, J. THE STRATFORD ACADEMY.

The Stratford Academy was founded in 1805, and in the following year received its charter from the Legislature of Connecticut. It soon won and has since uniformly maintained a high stand as an English and classical school, making little display of superficial knowledge and partially learned accomplishments, but furnishing a solid basis of education, and from year to year sending its pupils to take the highest rank in the best colleges in our land, and to fill places of honor and trust in the largest cities. Never has its reputation as an institution of learning been higher or better sustained than during the quarter of a century which has elapsed since, in 1847, Mr. Frederick Sedgewick, A.M., entered upon the duties and responsibilities of its management. He resigned as principal of the institution in 1872, and has since conducted a select school. Mr. Sedgewick has been, and still is, a very successful teacher, and during the years he officiated as principal of the academy more than one thousand pupils received instruction at that institution.

The Stratford Institute, Mrs. E. E. Clark, Principal, is a flourishing school and justly merits its present popularity.

There have been about thirty new houses added to the borough during the past three years.

The Rogers and Brittin Silver Company, located in this town, has a capital of $50,000, with an authorized capital of $250,000. F. D. Rogers is President, F. W. Brittin, Vice-President, S. T. Rogers, Secretary, and E. L. Brittin, Treasurer. This company manufactures the finest quality of nickel silver "flat ware," spoons, forks, ladles, etc., plated and in the metal. It is a new industry for this section, and justly merits its present success.

STRATFORD OF TO-DAY.

"The village has never been stirred by those uneasy activities which overturn other New England towns, or if an impulse so little akin to its habits and traditions has been felt, it was sure to result in disintegration, and Stratford has cast off its unruly suburbs, with their enterprises and industries and ambitions. Our Stratford has known no bustles, no excitements, no competitions; no coarse stimulus has intruded into its life. The motto of the place and the expression of its repose has been from the beginning, 'Surtout point de zèle.'"

"Hence one feels more than one sees in the old town. Its wide grass-bordered streets,—almost lawns in themselves,—its immemorial elms, which arch above the silent walks, its glimpses of the wide majestic river, the harbor and Sound, with the blue shores of Long Island on the far horizon,—all have as many suggestions to the mind and the imagination as to the senses, and the happiness one gains in the place has its roots in the finest perceptions. Main Street, canopied by a leafy dome of elms, runs the entire length of the town; after passing the 'Upper Green' it becomes no longer a village street, but a picturesque country road, wending through wooded nooks and along the banks of the Housatonic into the shadows and silence of the forests. Thus on the north Stratford merges its genuine characteristics in New England hill and river scenery, but on the south stretches a lazy length to listen to the murmur of the sea. Below the Neck are the broad salt meadows, scarcely above the sea line, leveling away to the horizons, through which wind creeks, the water level with the banks at high tide, while at the ebb the sides are left perpendicular, black, and bare. Here grows the salt-grass, dry, stiff, glistening, drowned twice a day by the sea and scorched by the suns, until the farmers cut it and carry it home in great thrifty-looking loads, which creep, a monotonous procession, through the quiet streets under the long shadows toward sunset on September days. Then the meadows, green before, take on mellow autumn tints—warm browns, russet, orange, crimson—and, traversed by wandering shadows on autumn days, these wide monotonous spaces have a beauty and a poetry of their own.

"The chief streets of the village were originally laid out sixteen rods wide. Each generation has encroached a little on the broad stretches of greenward, but they still remain of wonderful width, and, played over by the shadows and the sunshine which flickers through the branches of the lofty trees, give an impression of illimitable distances and massive repose. Stratford set out to be a city, and was carefully surveyed and laid out in squares; and it is a melancholy thought that instead of fulfilling its destiny, a city it might have become except for the lucky accident that its harbor was neither so broad nor so deep as that of Bridgeport, which lies a few miles westward. As a city it might have been surpassed by others, and the distinction of the strange, soft charm which now wins the eye and fixes the place in the heart would have been lost.

"The Housatonic River widens at its outlet and makes a beautiful bay, which is called 'the harbor.' The river deserves more than a passing word. Until its waters near the sea they flow through a picturesque, mountainous region, which contains some of the most charming scenery of New England. But by the time it begins to feel the languid pulse of the tide it spreads its waters, washing banks rich in all pastoral beauties, and seeming no longer a river, but an arm of the sea. The apparent breadth of the bay is diminished by the low-lying sedge banks of Well's Island, and to the east Milford Beach runs down its long white taper fingers, fringed with glistening shoals. Then open the far horizons of the Sound, spreading into distances of deep pure color except in the farthest verges, where Long Island shows, or the illimitable waste merges into pale, misty opal tints.

"Whatever commerce once came into Stratford harbor has almost passed away, and except for a few sloops and schooners discharging cargoes of coal, and an occasional obstreperous steam-tug, it is now less devoted to the larger maritime enterprises than to pleasure-parties and amateur fishermen. Yachts and sail-boats, clean-cut sharpys, and catamarans suggesting phantoms of a wreck, chase each other up and down the bay on a summer's day, cross and re-cross, tacking, jibing, careening from morning till night. Then in the oyster-season a brisk traffic is carried on, and the waters are covered with a flotilla of odd-looking craft buying up loads of baby oysters for bedding."—Mrs. Kirk.

TRUMBULL.

Geographical—Topographical—List of Pioneers—Early Physicians—First Marriages—First Births—Schools—The Revolution—War of 1812—
 The Revolution of 1809—The Whipping-Post—Post-offices—The Birthplace of Professor Benjamin Silliman.

THE town of Trumbull is located in the southeastern part of the county, and is bounded as follows:
 On the north by Monroe; on the east by Huntington and Stratford; on the south by Stratford and Bridgeport; and on the west by Easton.

The surface of this town is diversified with hills and valleys, and the soil is generally fertile and productive.

As will be seen by reference to a following chapter in the history of this town, Trumbull originally comprised a portion of the old town of Stratford, and the first settlements were doubtless made soon after the settlement of the mother-town.

THE PIONEERS.

The following is a list of early settlers who were here as early as 1731: Nathan Hawley, David Booth, Thos. Peet, Elijah Nickolls, David Calhoun, William
 Hawley, Ephraim Booth, Daniel Beach, Josiah Beach,
 Thos. White, Oliver Hawley, Stephen Mallory, Amos Elmer, Abraham Nickolls, Thos. Lake, John Fairchild, Edward Lake, David Lake, John Nickolls, James Peet, John Sunderland, John Sherwood, Daniel
 Sherwood, Israel Beach, and Ebenezer Hurd.

Other early settlers were James Beech, A. Salmon,
 Elijah Turney, Isaac Harris, Samuel B. Edwards,

Michael Seeley, Joseph Wheeler, Salmon Mallett, Minor Higby, Eli Nichols, Robt. Mallett, Stephen A. Gregory, John Giles, Thaddens Bennett, Eli Plumb, John Nichols, Jr., Benj. Reech, Jonathan Nichols, Philo Peet, Silas Harris, Elijah E. Curtis, James Beardslee, Jr., Reuben P. Seeley, Solomon Peet, David Fairchild, Z. Thorp, Gurlon Sterling, Thomas Stratton, Samuel Clark, Elijah Harris, Josiah Northrop, John B. Hous.

At an election for members of Congress, held in April, 1800, one hundred and sixty-seven votes were cast.

In the early history of the town it was ordered that whoever desired to become a resident must subscribe the freeman's oath, as it was called, and under date of April 2, 1792, "the following gentlemen were admitted freemen by taking the oath: Abijah Curtis, Sherman Edwards, Elijah Beech, Peter Summers, Andrew Lewis, Eli Edwards, Nehemiah K. Edwards, Abijah Edwards, Abijah U'foot, David Mallett, Jr., Jos. Mallett, Jr., David Edwards, Jr., Thos. Ward, Abraham Middlehawk, Seth Mallett, Elijah Beech, Jr., Amos Osborn, Zachariah Mallett, Lewis Edwards, Joseph Gregory, and Abijah Peet. Recorded by Eliakim Beech, Clerk."

In the following September the following gentlemen were admitted freemen by taking the freeman's oath: Z. Fairweather, Robt. Middlebrook, Nathaniel Beech, Jr., Andrew Curtis, Jos. Hawley, Hezekiah Curtis, Jr., Nathan N. Peet, Elnathan Turney, John Peter, John Cogesball, Ephraim Peter, David Sherman, Nathaniel Beech (3d), John R. Gregory, Z. Mallett, Jr.

In 1799 the following were admitted as freemen: John Nichols, Wooster Hurnston, Elijah Booth, Samuel Haine, Eli Burton, Benjamin Turney, Joseph Hamblin, Joseph Burton, Jr., David Peet, Thomas Hawley, Abijah Hawley, David Middlebrook, Gideon Peet, Jr., Ephraim Middlebrook, Daniel Hawley, Thaddens Jimmings, Joseph Sterling, Lewis Fairchild, Jr., Daniel Wakke, Alford Beech, Sillie Summers, Nehemiah Fairchild, Levi Summers, David Sherwood, Robert Dashum, Jonathan Tongue, Jr., Eli Starr, Ira Summers, Daniel Barel, Silas Beardslee, Isaac Paliehar, Daniel Turney, Joseph Wetmore, Eli Tongue, Eben Beach, Philo Beers, Thomas Daskam, F. Sherwood, James Downs, Silas Beach, Burr Silliman, Abel S. Beach, Hezekiah Nichols, Thomas Peet, Nathan N. Walker, Joseph E. Mallett, and Abraham Brinsmade.

EARLY PHYSICIANS.

One of the earliest physicians, and probably the first in the town, was Stephen Middlebrook, father of Dr. Elijah Middlebrook. The latter, famous as the publisher of "Middlebrook Almanac," was in active practice here about half a century.

Among other physicians are mentioned the names of Daniel Beard, Isaac Jennings, Daniel U'ford, and George Dyer. There is but one physician now resident of the town, Dr. Seth Hill, at Tashua.

FIRST MARRIAGES.

The following is a list of a few of the first marriages, as kept by Rev. Mr. Miner, who was pastor of the church in 1731: Jeremiah Johnson and Zipporah Mallory, Ebenezer Hurd and Abigail Hubbell, Jos. Lake and Deborah Jackson, James Phippenne and Hannah Smith, Isaac Jackson and Rachel Nickolls, Samuel Shelton and Abigail Nickolls, John Middlebrook and Eunice Bostwick, Israel Munger and May Brinsmead, Andrew Booth and Sarah Patterson.

FIRST BIRTHS.

The following is a record of the first births in this town, and in 1731: Lois Hawley, Esther Miner, Ann Booth, Nathan Peet, Jonathan Nickolls, James Calhoun, Charity Booth, Elijah Beach, Ann Beach, Sarah White, Ichabod Hawley, Ogden Mallory, Ann Elmer, Abram Nickolls, and Lucy Lake.

The old parish record of North Stratford (Trumbull) shows that "Peggy, negro servant of Ensign William Peet, was baptized June 27, 1731."

SCHOOLS.

The first merchant in town was Stephen Middlebrook, who kept where John Beardsley now lives. Eliakim Beach kept a store at Trumbull, and Robert Nichols was in trade at Nichol's Farms.

THE REVOLUTION.

The following is a copy of an interesting Revolutionary document now in the possession of L. N. Middlebrook, Esq., of Bridgeport:

"North Stratford, † March 11th, 1778.

"The following is an exact account of the donations of the parish of North Stratford to the Continental soldiers in the southern army, Valley Ford, belonging to this place sent down by Lieut. WAR OF 1812.

Although none of the citizens of this town were engaged in the battles of the war of 1812, still they held themselves ready to respond to their country's call, and many whose names we are unable now to obtain joined a military organization then stationed at New London.

At the close of the war, when the treaty of Ghent was announced, it created a wild enthusiasm in this vicinity. A very enthusiastic celebration was held at Trumbull church, and a pole was raised amid the rejoicing of the people. Old inhabitants still refer to this celebration with patriotic pride. It is evident that the people of Trumbull were alive to the issues of the day, for under date March 15, 1809, they express themselves in the following trenchant manner concerning the "measures pursued by the general government." David Beard-lee was chairman of the meeting, and Abijah Ufford and Noah Plumb reported the following resolutions:

"At the present momentous and alarming crisis, when the black clouds of invasion and insurrection darken our political horizon, it becomes the indisputable duty of every good citizen to rally round the altar of Freedom reared by the valor of our fathers and defend it against the savage insolence of foreign despots and the nefarious cabals of domestic traitors.

"While by the unparalleled oppressive edicts of the belligerents of Europe our rights are wantonly violated, our national honor insulted, and our commerce insulted, we cannot conceal our astonishment or repress our indignation of those among us who have the effrontery to advocate the inglorious, degrading maxim that power is right, while they are reviling an administration breathing a spirit of amity, peace, and good-will to all nations, and bending to preserve and perpetuate those rights and privileges which the blood of their fathers calls upon them from the ground to support. Still we trust there is yet remaining in the people of this highly-favored country sufficient valor, virtue, and patriotism to maintain and support the Constitution of the United States and the laws proceeding therefrom against all the Joabs which infest our land. Viewing such support as the link of our safety and the bulwarks of liberty, we do therefore

"Resolved, That we are unalterably attached to the Constitution of the United States, viewing it to combine all the principal requisites for preserving our independence and promoting our national prosperity; that until gratitude ceases to have a place in our hearts, or we forget suitably to appreciate wisdom, virtue, and patriotism, such as were the peculiar inheritance of the illustrious Washington, we will ever frown indignantly upon the first dawning of any attempt to alienate one portion of the country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together its various parts."

It was also

"Resolved, We view with mingled emotions of pity and contempt the dastardly, pitiful means which have been employed by many under the semblance of attachment to our rights and dissatisfaction with the Embargo and their laws, while their real object is to bring the administration into contempt," etc.

It was also

"Resolved, That we approve of the late acts and doings of Congress."

The last of the series of resolutions was one commendatory of Thomas Jefferson, "late President of the United States." They resolve "that he is entitled to the most grateful thanks and fullest confidence not only of this meeting, but of every legitimate son of Columbus, etc." The resolution was fittingly closed with the following words: "We avail ourselves with avidity of the opportunity to express our sentiments of merit so exalted, and tender our sincere prayers that the evening of his days may be as serene and happy as his former life has been glorious and useful."

THE WHIPPING-POST.

This relic of by-gone barbarity, as it has often been styled, stood near the Congregational church. Mrs. B. B. Plumb remembers when one James Read, familiarly known as "Jim" Read, was publicly whipped at this old post for stealing sheep of Robert Mallett. He was arrested by Silas Haines, who administered the lashes according to law!

POST-OFFICES.

The post-office at Trumbull was established in an early day, and the earliest postmaster now remembered by the oldest inhabitant was Elihu Beach. He was succeeded by B. B. Plumb. Mr. Beach was appointed a second time, succeeding Mr. Plumb. He was succeeded by Mr. J. D. Brinsmade, who was followed by the present incumbent, W. S. Wheeler.

The first postmaster at Long Hill was Miles Beardsley. He was succeeded by E. B. Middlebrook, Miles Beardsley, and Edward Platt, the present incumbent.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF PROF. BENJAMIN SILLIMAN.*

The old highway which leads northward through the little village of White Plains, or Trumbull Centre, as it is more often called, turns off to the right a little distance before you reach the Trumbull church, and across the headwaters of the Pequonoc; then, as it turns north again to lead you on up the hills to the village of Daniel's Farms, you are confronted by a large gable-roofed house. It is situated upon the left of the road and, standing upon a natural elevation, overlooks to the south the quiet village as it lies stretched out down the valley. Across the stream, to the right and upon an equal elevation, stands the Trumbull church (Congregational), whose historic society in its record of one century and a half have borne the names of "Society at Unity," "Society at North Stratford," and "Trumbull Church."

The old house is of peculiar interest. Although it was built long before the Revolution, it stands upon its foundation with a firmness that commands veneration, and is suggestive of the firm and resolute resolve of our ancestors to build a home for future generations, not only with implements of peace, but, if necessary, with implements of war. There are many historical associations connected with the old house, which, by the way, has within a few years been purchased by the town of Trumbull, and is now used as a town-hall.

Among other of these associations is the fact that at one time John Hancock held a mortgage thereon. During the Revolution it was often a place of refuge, and many a time during the coast ravages of the British did the families of the colonists seek shelter beneath the same roof which now covers Trumbull's colonial mansion.

In this house, Aug. 9, 1779, "Benjamin Silliman, the most eminent of American teachers of natural science, was born. The home of the family, from which his father (Brig.-Gen. Selleck Silliman) had lately been carried away as a prisoner by a party of British soldiers, and from which his mother, to escape the perils of war, was now a voluntary exile, was situated in the town of Fairfield, at the distance of a few miles from the place of his birth."

Professor Silliman, in the very last years of his life, wrote a biographical sketch of his father, and in it we find the following description of the event of his mother's flight: "My mother had secured an asylum in the house of Mr. Eliakim Beach at North Stratford, now Trumbull, and had made all necessary arrangements for her own removal and that of a part of her family. A British fleet and army which had paid a hostile visit to New Haven between July 4th and 7th, sailed from New Haven on the eve of the 7th, and on the morning of the 8th disembarked at Kinsey Point, on the beach at Fairfield. My mother and family, from the top of our house, witnessed the disembarkation of these troops, and that was the signal of their own retreat to North Stratford, a distance of seven or eight miles, where, with several members of her family, she was comfortably established and kindly treated.

"In their progress on their pilgrim journey (on horse-back) the cannon began to roar, and the little boy, Gold Sellick, amused with the sound that brought sorrow to many hearts, at every report cried, 'bang! bang!'"

"To our ears," writes my mother, "these were doleful sounds," and she adds: "Oh the horrors of that dreadful night! At the distance of seven miles we could see the light of the devouring flames by which the town was laid in ashes. It was a sleepless night of doubtful expectations."

"My mother's cheerful courage contributed to sustain her; and I ought to be (I trust I am) grateful to my noble mother, and to my gracious God, that the midnight surprise, the horror of ruffians armed for aggression, and the loss of her husband, as perhaps she might fear, by the hands of assassins, had not prevented my life or entailed upon it physical, mental, or moral infirmities. Hope and comfort returned to my mother with the assurance of my father's safety, and with the restoration of correspondence, although restricted to open letters and to the surveillance and jealousy of war."

Upon the records of the Trumbull Church (vol. i. p. 111) is the following record: "Benjamin, son of Brig.-Gen. Gold Sylliek Sylliman and his wife. Born August the 9th, and baptized Sept. 12th. The general then being a prisoner on Long Island, his lady fleeing from the conflagration of Fairfield and took refuge in this society."

CIVIL HISTORY.

THE territory embraced within the bounds of the present town of Trumbull composed a portion of the town of Stratford until 1797. On the "second Thursday of Oct., A.D. 1797," it was incorporated by the General Assembly convened at New Haven. It was formerly known and referred to as the "society of North Stratford."

The act of incorporation directed that the first "Freeman's Meeting shall be holden at the meeting-house in said Trumbull, and the first Town meeting in said town of Trumbull shall be holden on the 20th day of November, 1797, and Jabez H. Tomlinson, Esq., of said Stratford, shall be the Moderator of said first Town meeting, and said town shall have and enjoy at said meeting in said town of Trumbull the same powers and authority and proceed in the same manner in transacting their business as the other towns in this State."

THE FIRST TOWN-MEETING.

In accordance with the above the first town-meeting was held at the "meeting house" Nov. 20, 1797, with Jabez H. Tomlinson as moderator, when the following officers were chosen: Selectmen, James Nichols, Jabez Beech, Jr., Judson Curtis, Jr.; Clerk, Eliakim Beech; Treasurer, Dr. Stephen Middlebrooks; Constables, Stephen Bardslee, David Seeley, Jr., David Booth, Jr.; Surveyors of Highways, Everard Curtis, Elijah Beech, Joseph P. Nichols, Daniel Burton, James Beers, Albert Edwards, Daniel Gregory, Nathan H. Nichols, and Daniel Peck; Listers, Ebenezer Wheeler, Daniel Brinsmade, James K. Edwards; Fence-Viewers, Zachariah Curtis and David Beardsley, Sr.; State Collector, Stephen Bardslee; Town Collector, Ebenezer Wheeler; Leather Sealer, David Seeley; Grand Jurors, John Coe, John Middlebrooks; Tithingman, Elijah Sterling; Haywards, Ephraim Booth, Thomas Ward; Chimney-Viewer, Joseph P. At a "Freemen's meeting legally warned and convened at the meeting house, Dec. 1, 1797, the following votes were taken according to law to stand in nomination of election as representatives of the People of this State in the present Congress of the United States: Jabez H. Tomlinson, 31; John Davenport, 31; Isaac Mills, 27; Simeon Baldwin, 24; Stephen Middlebrok, 15; Sylvester Gilbert, 16; Lewis

In 1797 it was voted "that we tax our silver four cents on a dollar, and that Ebenezer Wheeler be appointed to collect that tax."

At a meeting held in October, 1799, the citizens voted to oppose "there having a Turnpike road threw Trumbull from Newfield to New-Milford."

They also voted "that this meeting will send and remonstrate at the General Assembly against there being a Turnpike road, and that James Bardslee be our agent to act in behalf of the town."

It was also voted that he be "Impowered to Employ Counsel if Needed." The people were evidently in earnest in the matter, as a committee was appointed to draw a remonstrance, and empowered to "summon witnesses before the General Court in order to make proof if necessary."

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AND SOCIETY.†

There was a church gathered and settled at Unity, then a district of Stratford (now Trumbull), Nov. 18, 1730, composed of thirty-eight members, of whom about two-thirds had been members of the Stratford Church, and the same day was ordained the Rev. Richardson Miner as pastor. He ultimately adopted Episcopal views, and was dismissed March 21, 1744, by the Council of Consociation. He soon afterwards went to England for orders, and died there at Salisbury. Unhappy dissensions followed in the church and society, the name of which was changed about this time from Unity to North Stratford.

The Association, the General Assembly of the colony, and two neighboring Associations sought to advise, but the church became so broken that it was gathered anew by the Council at the settlement of the next pastor, Rev. James Beebe.

Thus organized, it was one of the churches of the Standing Order of those early times, one of the "privileged class" of the "Established churches,"—a condition abnormal to pure Congregationalism; hence it was driven to the device of adopting the "Half-way Covenant." This was done in order to extend the ballot to the unregenerate, many of whom were very worthy citizens, but denied the exercise of the elective franchise while out of the membership of the church. The records show quite a list of those who under this plan "renewed their Baptismal Covenant, but at same time do not see it their duty, under their present circumstances, to approach the Table of the Lord."

Meanwhile the principles of civil and religious liberty were at work, producing a new state of affairs.

At legal meetings of the society for a period of about ten years, from 1787 to 1797, petitions are repeatedly sent, and an agent to act as attorney appointed to appear before the General Assembly, at Hartford, and plead for "Town Privileges to be granted to the Society," and "if so obtained that the business of the Town shall be done at or near the Meeting-House in said Parish." At a society's meeting in 1794 it was voted, "That they claim the Privilege of nominating Town Officers in this Parish, and would proceed to nominate them as they always had Done."

But the principles of civil and religious liberty were bearing their fruit, and men began to claim and the law to allow the right of worshiping when and where each one pleased. "Certificates" now appear of those who renounce their connection with this church of the Standing Order, which declare their intention of being taxed for the benefit of some other church with which they connect themselves, and where they worship. Some of these "certificates" exhibit considerable of the spirit of freedom in worship: as, for instance, one A. B., announcing himself to withdraw from this to a Baptist Church, continues: "Henceforth I consider myself enabled with such control of property as to give what I please and when I please to the support of the same, according to the laws of God and not of man. As witness this my hand."

In 1797 the first town-meeting was held in Trumbull, and a more healthy relation began to appear between Church and State.

In the spring of 1814 a petition was prepared in behalf of the church to the General Assembly, held at Hartford, praying "that they may be incorporated into an Ecclesiastical Society." Deacon Judson Curtis and Capt. David Beardslee were appointed a committee to draw up the petition, and Amos H. Wheeler, agent to present it. This request was promptly granted. As a part of the resolution of the General Assembly, "said church and their successors" were declared to be "an ecclesiastical body, corporate and politic, forever, by the name of the Church of Christ in Trumbull."

For a long period at these legal meetings of the society school committees are annually appointed for the several districts, and the school money is apportioned.

With reference to church government the church has ever held fast to the Congregational polity—the authority of the local church being final. Thus about the beginning of the pre-ent century, when the churches got a tinge of Presbyterianism, though the name was taken more than the form, the Trumbull Church joined the Consociation of Fairfield County, but with this understanding: "We are all willing to consociate for advice and counsel in all matters ecclesiastical, but cannot and will not join in that arbitrary claim to juridical authority . . . compelling all parties to abide by such a juridical consociation."

When, in 1736, the Consociation of Fairfield County was divided into eastern and western, by the dividing line of the two associations, the Trumbull Church became a member of the Fairfield East Consociation. In 1827 the Council declared the "Saybrook platform their platform, and that they had no other." This church held to that construction of Consociation which made it rather a "Stated Council," than a "Presbytery." Both pastor and delegate protested against a decision of joint Council of the two Consociations, held at Danby, January, 1764, against one Mr. White, as "unreasonably severe."

In 1748, the Association of which Mr. Beebe was a member declared against the forming of a general Consociation, to serve as the highest ecclesiastical judicature in the colony. In 1772, Mr. Beebe, with two other divines, were requested to appear and say why they had neglected attending meetings of the Association and of the Council. They came, and replied that it was on account of the judicial power which the Saybrook platform gives to Councils of the consociated churches. By yielding a liberal construction to the platform, these two pastors were pacified. The views held and position taken by both church and pastor in their early history, as to church government, and in their spirit of independence toward the mother country, are to-day matters of just pride.

The Church of Christ in Trumbull, like many of the churches in the State, has a trust fund. In the year 1767, Thomas Sanford, of Stratford, Conn., bequeathed the church his "real estate," consisting of a house, barn, and land, situated in Long Hill, and valued at about three thousand dollars. Other individuals have left smaller sums at times to the church and society, so that the present fund consists of a good parsonage and two thousand dollars at interest. The church and society have made it a rule ever to keep free from debt.

HOUSES OF WORSHIP.

The first building for public worship was erected at the foot of White Plains Street, south of the burial-ground there, and was occupied only during the ministry of Richardson Miner. It was a plain, unpretending structure, and would pass more for a barn in these days than for a house of worship. A second meeting-house followed at the beginning of the ministry of Rev. James Beebe. This was built at the head of White Plains Street, on the ground where the present church edifice stands. A mile below on this street is a rocky eminence which marks the foot of a mountain-range running north through the State, and this cliff is called "Pulpit Rock;" so named—tradition says—from religious service being held there a few Sundays while there was no house of worship, the minister preaching from it to the people below.

The second house of worship was larger than the first. It was a square building, with doors opening within (no vestibule) on three sides. A wide centre aisle led from the double doors at the south entrance, and two side aisles from the single doors on the east and west. There were high seats in the corners, above and below, for negroes, who once were slaves. A "sounding-board" projected over the pulpit. In later years a steeple was built, outside, on the southeast corner; and at the same time, just before the structure was pulled down, a bell was purchased and mounted. It was that now in use. The present meeting-house was built in 1842. The steeple was raised to its present form in 1848. The church was enlarged and improved, and occupied as we now have it, Jan. 1, 1874.

PASTORATES.

Rev. James Beebe came to North Stratford (now Trumbull), Conn., and was ordained over the church and society, May 6, 1747. He was married, July 13, 1749, to Ruth Curtis, of Stratford. Five daughters and two sons were the fruit of this marriage. The first son bore the father's name. Mary, the second daughter of Mr. Beebe, was the mother of the venerable man still living in the parish,—Deacon Abi Brinsmade, who has reached the ripe age of eighty-seven years in good possession of his faculties. Mr. Beebe died in the ministry over this church. As a testimonial of the love his parishioners bore him, one evidence is seen in a vote taken at a society's meeting, held April 10, 1794: Voted, "That the Society's Committee procure a pair of grave-stones for the Rev'd Mr. James Beebe, Deceased; and set them up." He was buried in the grave-yard at the foot of White Plains Street, near the situation of the first house of worship. A tablet marks the grave, on which is the inscription:

"This monument was erected by the church and society of North Stratford, out of regard to the memory of Rev. James Beebe, A.M., who departed this life Sept. 8, 1785, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He was ordained to the work of the ministry over said church and society, May 6, 1747, and continued therein faithful as a pastor for thirty-eight years."

Beside him lie the remains of his faithful wife, with a stone at her grave. She died Jan. 29, 1818, aged ninety-five years.

Mr. Beebe's pastorate was the longest of any in the history of the church. If we call his the first, as from the defection of Mr. Miner and the reorganization of the church which followed, we prefer to,—Mr. Beebe does so himself at times on the record,—then the first and the last pastorate of its servants in the ministry are the longest, the former being thirty-eight, and the latter sixteen years. Rev. Mr. Beebe lived a short distance east of the present parsonage, on the north side of the White Plains road, on what is now an open field, where two old cellars may be seen; over one stood his dwelling, and over the other and smaller one was the hut of his slaves, "Nero" and "Pegg." They called them "servants," and in time they were virtually free. Less than one hundred years ago slavery existed in Connecticut.

Mr. Beebe's ministry here covered the Revolutionary period. He caught the spirit of the fathers and left his pulpit for three months and served in the war of independence. He took an active part in the capture of Ticonderoga. His son David was a captain in the colonial army, and did good service. During Mr. Beebe's absence the society hired Rev. Joseph Barker as preacher. On his return, in after payment of his salary, Mr. Beebe takes "continental money," the nominal sum being much larger than its true value: as in the war of the Rebellion, there was a difference between gold and paper currency. Thus where in 1777 he receives eighty pounds lawful (meaning English) money for the year, in 1781 he is paid four hundred and eighty pounds "continental money in full and to his satisfaction," for a year's salary. The church and its pastor were both filled with the Revolutionary spirit. At a society's meeting in 1779, while the seven years' war of the Revolution was in progress, it was voted: "That the society's committee have full power to release all rates that stand against the soldiers in continental service, that belong to this parish, who have enlisted during the war." This spirit of the patriot crops forth at times in the items which Mr. Beebe puts on record. A person whose name stands foremost in science and high in literature was born in this parish under singular circumstances. Mr. Beebe puts it thus on his record: "Benjamin, son of Brig.-Gen. Gold Selleck Silliman and his wife, born Aug. the 8th, and baptized Sept. the 12th; the general then being a prisoner on Long Island, his lady fleeing from the conflagration of Fairfield, and took refuge in this society."

He makes a record, too, of the death of one "Peleg Sunderland, who lost his life at that memorable event, when Tryon, with a band of British butchers and murderous Tories, burned the town of Fairfield."

A humorous incident in Parson Beebe's life in those stirring times is as follows: "He had collected a public meeting at his house one evening to awaken enthusiasm in the war. While he was addressing the people the report of guns at a distance was heard, and fires were seen as if the British were coming. The reverend gentleman was keen as well as patriotic, and suspecting a trick sent a body of men round by a back road, cut off the retreat of this scouting party, and captured them: when, lo! it was some of the young men of the town, who had burnt heaps of cornstalks and fired their guns to play a joke on the folks at the meeting and test their patriotism."

Sarah, a daughter of Mr. Beebe, was baptized by a clergyman from Ridgefield while her father was at the war.

The Church of Christ here, at its reorganization, May, 1747, starts with a membership of seventy-five persons, the name of Rev. James Beebe heading the list. There are added up to the time of his decease one hundred and sixty-seven persons, making the total two hundred and forty-two who had united with the church. A list of deaths being wanted in the records, we know not how many of these had died. Mr. Beebe kept a good account of infant baptisms; most all being of this class, scarcely any adults. The custom of baptizing infant children was universal through the colonies. Every person born was almost sure to be baptized in about eight days from birth, after the plan, as to time, of the Jewish rite of circumcision.

Among the baptisms occur the names of slaves. This in the minister's own household: "Dinah, a negro servant of Rev. James Beebe, born Oct. 17, 1775, and baptized the 29th inst." Also, "Peter, a negro boy, servant of Rev. James Beebe, born October, 1779, and baptized July the 17th." The first name, and none other, are given of these servants or slaves, with the households to which they belong. The names of slaves occur in baptisms, admission to the church, marriages, and burials.

Rev. Izrahiah Wetmore was installed Oct. 13, 1785, and died here Aug. 3, 1798. His pastorate extends over a period of about thirteen years. He baptized seventy-four persons, most all being cases of infant baptism; he added seventy souls to the church, and joined twenty-six couples in marriage.

Rev. John Giles was installed May 10, 1802, and was dismissed Sept. 21, 1802.

For a few years, about this date, owing to the "injurious tendency of the political dissensions" of the times and "the necessity of union among Christians," the state of religion was brought very low in the churches; many pulpits of this Consociation were without regular pastors for intervals of from one to nine years. The Association, at a meeting held in 1805, lamented that, among other churches, the Trumbull church should be "vacant for three years." However, there were temporary supplies: Rev. Josiah Hawes and Rev. Samuel Monson preached here for months.

Rev. Daniel C. Banks was ordained Aug. 12, 1807, remained over the church five years and a half, and was dismissed Feb. 2, 1813. He lived in a dwelling-house, now gone, which stood on a lot next below the present parsonage. He baptized twenty-five persons, received twelve to the church, joined nine couples in marriage, and attended forty-two funerals.

Rev. Reuben Taylor was installed Sept. 18, 1817, and was dismissed Feb. 12, 1824, having served in a pastorate of six years and four months. Mr. Taylor lived in an old dwelling near and east of that now occupied by B. B. Plumb, Esq. He went from Trumbull to New Connecticut, in the State of Ohio, and died there. The church enjoyed a "revival of religion" under Mr. Taylor's preaching, and as the fruit of it thirty-eight persons were added to the membership. During his pastorate he baptized seventy persons, forty-six members were added to the church, nineteen couples were married, and there were one hundred and two burials.

Rev. James Kant was ordained Nov. 9, 1825, and was dismissed Nov. 11, 1835. He was a native of Scotland. At the close of his ten years' ministry he married Mrs. Naomi Wheeler. He lived on Long Hill Street, at the south corner of the first road below the Episcopal church, and died there Sept. 10, 1849, and was buried in the cemetery near by. A stone marks his grave. Mr. Kant baptized thirty-five infants and four adults, received into the church fifty-three persons, married seventy-seven couples, and recorded one hundred and ninety-nine deaths.

Rev. Watson Warren was stated preacher from June, 1838, to June, 1839.

Rev. Wm. T. Bacon was ordained Dec. 28, 1842, and was dismissed May 28, 1844, his pastorate being one year and five months. He served again, as stated preacher, for one year, from Sept. 1, 1853.

Rev. John S. Whittlesey was ordained Oct. 2, 1844, and was dismissed Nov. 29, 1849. Mr. Whittlesey was a native of New Britain, Conn. He enjoyed a prosperous ministry here, passing through two precious revival seasons in the years 1845 and 1849. During his five years' pastorate over the church eighty persons were added to its membership. His baptisms are twenty-six adults and thirty-six infants. His marriages are thirty-nine, and burials one hundred and seventeen. Mr. Whittlesey went from Trumbull to Bethel, Conn.; from there he went West and served as a missionary. During the war for the Union he became an army chaplain, contracted disease in camp, returned to the State of Iowa, and died there.

Rev. Daniel M. Elwood was ordained Feb. 20, 1850, and was dismissed June 11, 1853. He was born at Norwalk, Conn. At the close of his pastorate in Trumbull he went to Woodstock, Conn., and afterwards to Woodbridge, of this State, where he became a practicing physician. He has since resumed preaching as a clergyman in the Episcopal denomination.

Rev. Ralph Smith was stated preacher for one year, from Dec. 1, 1854, to Dec. 1, 1855.

Rev. Stephen A. Gofor was stated preacher from June 1, 1856, to June 1, 1858. He is still living at a ripe old age in the town of Hartlyme, Conn.

Rev. Benjamin Swallow came from England to this country, and on his arrival served in Trumbull as stated preacher for one year and four months, beginning his work December 1, 1858. Leaving the ministry, he has for a number of years been serving as a clerk in the government employ at Washington, D. C.

Rev. Louis E. Charpiot was stated preacher from Jan. 1, 1862, to May 8, 1864. Mr. Charpiot came from France to the United States. On leaving Trumbull he was settled at Stratford, Conn. His present whereabouts is not known. Mr. Charpiot baptized seven adults and nineteen infants. Twenty-five persons were added to the church. He married five couples, and records twenty-four deaths.

Rev. Nathan T. Merwin, the present pastor, is a native of Milford, Conn., and is the son of David Merwin. He was born June 8, 1836; graduated at Yale College in the class of 1861; completed the regular three years' course of study in the Yale Divinity School in 1864. At a meeting of the Fairfield East Association, held in Stratford, Conn., May 26, 1863, he was examined and licensed to preach the gospel. In the autumn of 1864 he was engaged to supply the Congregational Church of Trumbull for six months; then, receiving a call to settle over the church and society, he was ordained pastor of the same June 6, 1865, by the Fairfield East Consociation. He was married, Nov. 1, 1864, to Miss Martha L. Parsons, of Milford, daughter of Samuel Parsons, and has two children,—Florence Loveland, born Nov. 3, 1865, and Nathala Parsons, born July 5, 1867, both of whom are living.

During his pastorate, now of sixteen years, he has baptized thirty-three infants and forty-five adults; has joined sixty-two couples in marriage; received one hundred and forty-four persons to the church, and attended one hundred and forty funerals.

There have been four "revivals of religion" in Mr. Merwin's ministry,—the first in the winter of 1866; the next in the summer of 1868; the third in the winter of 1872, and the last in the winter of 1876 and 1877. During two of these revivals evangelists assisted; the first and last were under the labor of the church and pastor. Meanwhile the membership of the church has steadily increased under the regular ministrations of the word.

In 1861 the membership was one hundred and twenty-four. In the fall of 1860 a manual was published, the first in the history of the church. The list of names was corrected, some being dropped, and, as then revised, the members numbered one hundred and fifty-seven. The present membership is eighty-four males and one hundred females. Total, one hundred and eighty-four.

At the beginning of the ministry of Rev. N. T. Merwin the church edifice was renovated inside. Again, in the latter part of the year 1869, the building was lengthened, a pulpit recess also added, and the interior greatly beautified, at an expense of over three thousand dollars. The present meeting-house thus improved was rededicated Jan. 1, 1871. Rev. J. G. Davenport, of Bridgeport, preached the sermon, and the pastor of the church made the dedicatory prayer.

About this time a beautiful silver communion-service was presented to the church, "In Memoriam of Mrs. Isabella R. Tait." The same year the articles of faith and covenant were revised for the third time; also a covenant for infant baptism was adopted by the church. In the revision there has been no change in doctrine, only a condensation of expression of the same gospel truth. The dates of revision are 1747, 1831, and 1869.

At certain intervals since the year 1800 the totality of church membership has been published; of late years it is done annually. In the year 1833 the membership of the church was 100; in 1846, 132; in 1859, 117; in 1864, 124; January, 1880, 184. The Sabbath-school enrolls 140 persons. Wesley B. Coen is the superintendent. There are 120 families in the parish.

Two ministers have been raised up,—Rev. Daniel Brinsmade, in the early history of the church, and Rev. David H. Gould, since 1800. These men joined the church, the former at fifteen years of age, and the latter at fourteen. It was unusual to receive persons so young to full membership; a note is made of this fact at the time, in the records, as being worthy of special mention. The result seems to justify a practice, now more general than in other days, of receiving persons earlier in life into the church.

A marked change has come over the public mind in regard to the rite of baptism. Most all instances of baptism in the church's early history were in infancy; now as many or more adults are baptized than infants.

During Mr. Taylor's ministry the records begin to show a list of persons who die in the parish, and there is given opposite each name the disease or cause which produced death. This custom obtains with pastors of the church down to the year 1861, Mr. Swallow's record being the last of the kind; after that the name, date of death, and age only are given.

The ordained pastorates are the longest, the inference being that it is profitable to call a young man, or novitiate, into the ministry.

This Congregational Church once had the watch and care of all the families composing the town of Trumbull. For over half a century no other church organization existed here. Let her name be as widely venerated; let the events of the past hallow her memory. The good she has done in preserving order, and in disseminating gospel truth, only eternity can reveal. The work has been deep and far-reaching. To the great head of the church be all the praise. Amen!

TRINITY CHURCH.

The records of Trinity parish detail the following history of the formation of the society and the building of the church which is now standing:

TRUMBULL, Nov. 5, 1817.

"After being duly notified of a meeting at the house of James R. Curtis, for the purpose of forming a society to erect a house for the public worship of Almighty God according to the doctrines and usages of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, accordingly, on the 5th of Nov. 1817, the meeting was held, and Wm. L. Parker in the chair.

"The meeting was called to order and a motion made and seconded that we form ourselves into an ecclesiastical society according to the statute law of the State of Connecticut. The motion was adopted, and the following form was drawn up and signed.

TRUMBULL, Nov. 9, 1817.

"We, the undersigned inhabitants of the town of Trumbull, Fairfield Co., Conn., do this day associate together and form ourselves into an ecclesiastical society, to be known as the Protestant Episcopal Society of Trumbull, at Nichols' Farms, in conformity to the statute laws of this State,—David Curtis, Prosper Nichols, Charles C. Booth, John C. Beardsley, Lewis B. Curtis, James B. Curtis, William L. Parker, John H. Pardee, George E. Peet, Charles N. Fairchild, Benjamin F. Lockwood.

"After which the following business was transacted: John H. Pardee appointed moderator, and the following officers appointed: Lewis B. Curtis, Clerk; John C. Beardsley, John H. Pardee, Lewis B. Curtis, Building Committee.

TRUMBULL, Dec. 1, 1817.

"An adjourned meeting of the members of the Episcopal Society was held at the house of Prosper Nichols, and William L. Parker was appointed chairman.

"The meeting was called to order and a unanimous vote taken in favor of building the church on the land of James B. Curtis."

At a meeting held Jan. 1, 1818, the amount proposed for building was seventeen hundred dollars, and the building committee empowered to contract with Messrs. Hotchkiss, Clark & Co. to erect the building.

At a meeting held Sept. 30, 1818, for the purpose of electing church officers, the following elections were made: Senior Warden, Prosper Nichols; Junior Warden, Charles E. Booth; Vestrymen, David Curtis, Lewis B. Curtis, John H. Pardee, John C. Beardsley, Andrew Clark, James R. Curtis, George E. Peet; Clerk, L. B. Curtis; Treasurer, David Curtis.

A meeting was held at the house of David Curtis, March 8, 1856, and at this meeting Prosper Nichols was appointed committee to give the Rev. Collins L. Potter a call to preach in Trinity church one year, one-half the time. It was also voted at this meeting to pay the salary of one hundred and fifty dollars, to be paid quarterly. At this meeting George T. Lewis was clerk pro tem. May 30, 1857, it was ordered to have a tea-party, in order to raise twenty-five dollars in addition, to enable the society to pay Mr. Potter one hundred and seventy-five dollars.

The rectors of Trinity parish have been the Rev. I. N. Marvin,—who held services in the parish for some time before a regular rector was called,—the Rev. Collins L. Potter, the Rev. Luther Gregory, the Rev. Charles H. W. Stocking, the Rev. Charles Husband, the Rev. J. H. H. D-Mille, the Rev. Dexter S. Lounsbury, the Rev. George P. Torrence.

The parish has always been poor and small, and in order to maintain preaching it has found it necessary to unite with other parishes. It united with Huntington during the rectorship of Mr. Gregory, and with Ansonia during Mr. Stocking's rectorship, which was the most flourishing period of the history of the parish. Mr. Lounsbury united not only the parish at Nichols' Farms in his labors, but held services in Trinity church (Baptist), as assistant in the Coit Memorial chapel in West Stratford, and in the Church of Nativity, North Bridgeport. He was an earnest worker, and was held high in the love and esteem of his people. He had resigned his rectorship of Trinity parish and accepted a call to Christ's Church, Stratford, only a few months previous to his distressing death, which was caused by a pistol-ball from the hand of his wife, who shot him while he was sleeping. She was declared to be insane.

During the rectorship of the Rev. Charles Husband, the Rev. J. H. H. De Mille, and of the present rector, Rev. George P. Torrence, the parish has united with Grace Church, Long Hill.

The parish is healthy financially, having during 1879 and 1880 repaired the church, at a cost of six hundred dollars, and is entirely out of debt.

The first school-house in Trinity was built at the foot of the hill on the road to White Plains, east of the house of Mr. Brinsmade. The second stood on the highway, above the house of Sidney Nichols, Esq. This burned down about twenty-five years ago, two years after which the present one was built.

GRACE CHURCH.

Grace Church parish, Long Hill, was originally a part of Christ Church parish (Tashua), Trumbull, and was separated from the mother-parish in 1846. The separation was due to a misunderstanding between the members living in these two districts with regard to their respective pecuniary rights and obligations, and to a feeling upon the part of Grace Church or Chapel division that a separation was the only means of restoring harmony and good feeling. At the annual meeting of Christ Church, Trumbull, held Easter Monday, 1846, resolutions were adopted looking towards a partial separation and defining said rights and obligations, but they were rescinded at a subsequent meeting, held in Grace church or chapel, by those living in that neighborhood, as being opposed to the best interests of that portion of the parish; and this action was followed by the organization of a separate parish, to be called Grace Church, Long Hill, Trumbull, at a meeting held on the afternoon of June 5, 1846, in Grace church or chapel. At this meeting, the action of which was ratified by a subsequent one held June 23d of same year, the following officers were elected: Elijah Middlebrook, David Beach, Wardens; Lee Wooden, Stephen H. Burroughs, Orlando Walker, Ebenezer Wheeler, Vestrymen; Stephen Middlebrook, Clerk; Lucius B. Burroughs, Treasurer; Elijah Middlebrook, Delegate to Convention; L. B. Burroughs, Collector; S. H. Burroughs, Librarian.

This action was followed by a formal application for admission into union with the Convention of the Diocese of Connecticut, which received favorable hearing and was granted. It was presented before Convention June 9, 1846, and was signed by Abel Hawley, David Beach, Jno. Burroughs, Elijah Middlebrook, John M. Wheeler, Stephen Middlebrook, Sherman French (2d), Roswell Sealey, Ebenezer Wheeler, Walker Wheeler, Lee Wooden, L. B. Burroughs, Gideon Mallett, Zalmon Hall, S. H. Burroughs, E. B. Middlebrook, Edward Platt, Robt. T. Middlebrook.

In addition to the above named, the following named asked on June 11, 1846, that their names be stricken from records of Christ Church, Tashua, Trumbull, having united with the parish of Christ Church, Long Hill, Trumbull: Abel Hawley, Jr., E. B. Middlebrook, Elijah Middlebrook, Jr., George W. Knapp, David Y. Beach, Nichols Sherman.

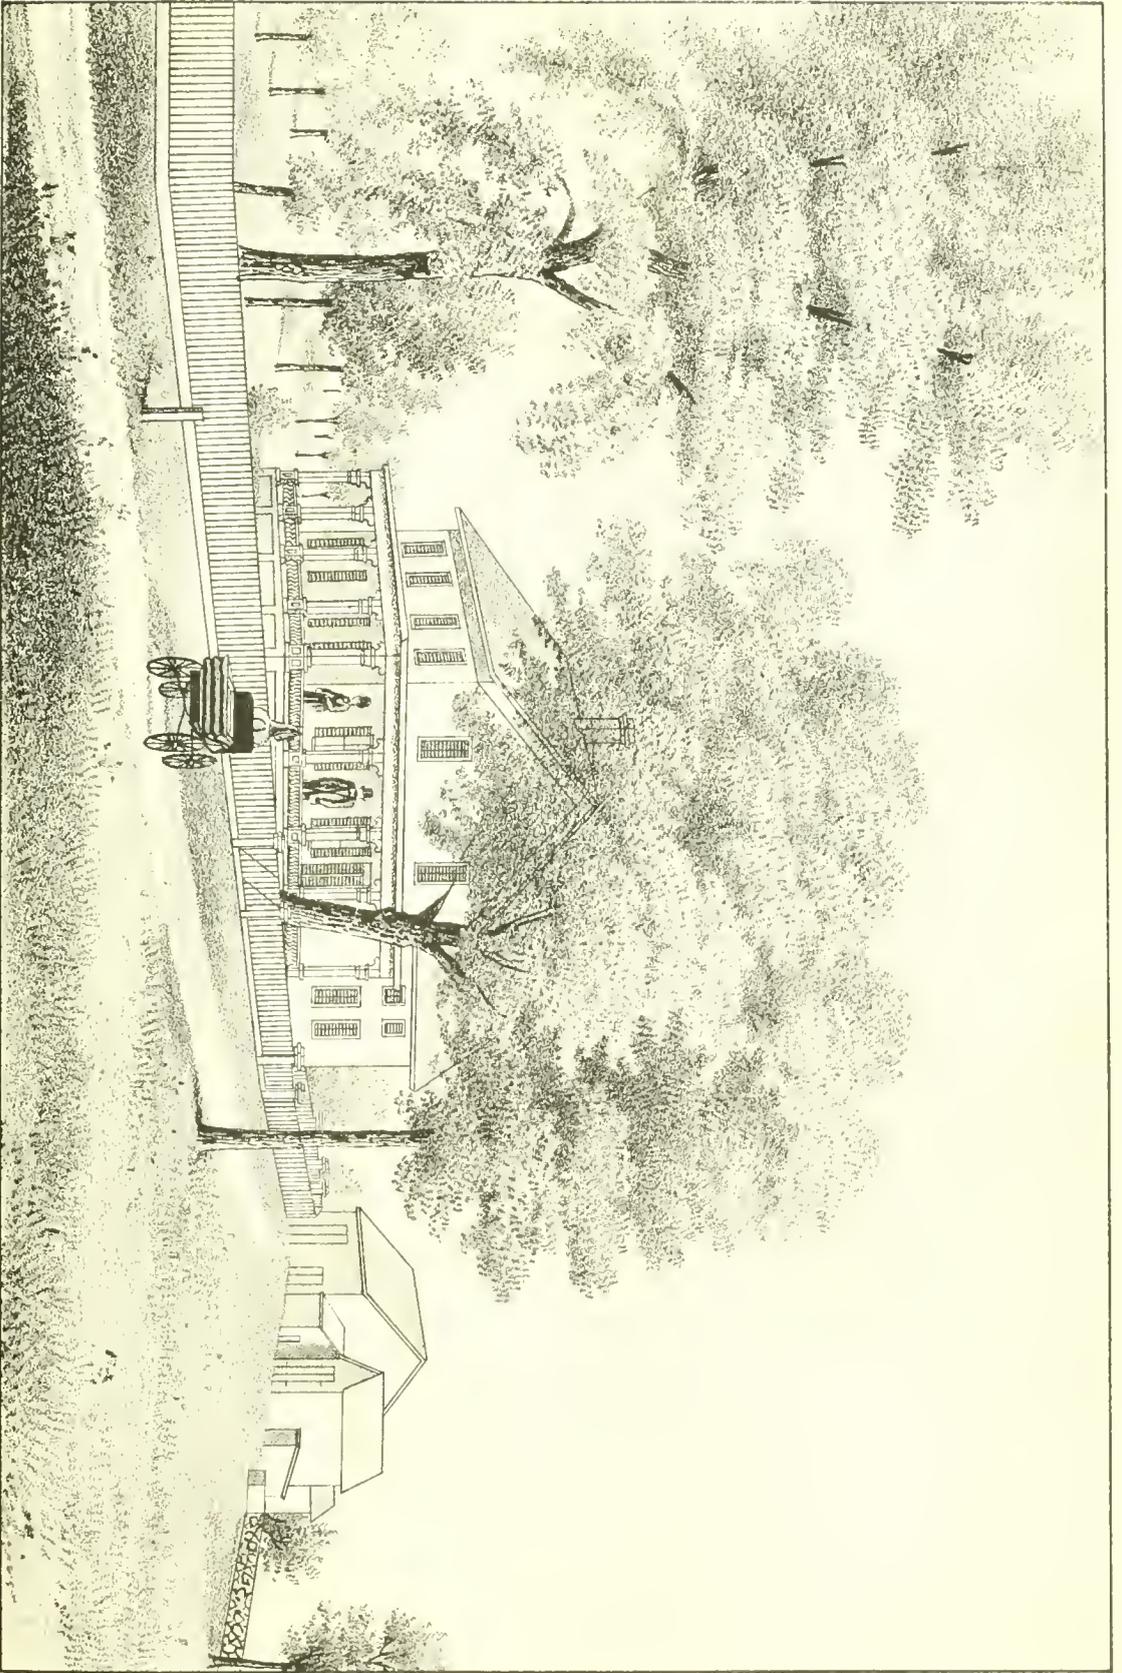

At the meeting held June 23, 1880, to which reference has been made, the parish voted to invite Rev. Wm. W. Bronson, then in charge of Christ Church, Tashua, to officiate upon each alternate Sunday in Grace church, Long Hill. He was therefore the first rector of that parish.

The present church building was erected as a chapel of Christ Church (Tashua), Trumbull, under its present name, Grace Church. The corner-stone was laid in 1836, the first service was held in it Sunday, Jan. 1, 1849, and the building was consecrated by Rt. Rev. T. C. Brownell, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Connecticut, June 18, 1840.

The rectors have been as follows: July, 1846, to October, 1847, Rev. William White Bronson; April, 1848, to March, 1851, Rev. Henry V. Gardner; March, 1851, one year, 1852, Rev. Enoch Huntington; January, 1853, to December, 1853, Rev. D. W. C. Loop; April, 1854, to February, 1856, Rev. William L. Bostwick; January, 1857, to August, 1858, Rev. William Townsend Early; March, 1859, to March, 1861, Rev. D. P. Sanford; April, 1865, to January, 1868, Rev. William Warland; April, 1868, to April, 1870, Rev. Charles Husband; June, 1870, to May, 1874, Rev. John Henry Hobart De Mille; September, 1874, to October, 1878, Rev. Abner P. Brush; Rev. George Paul Torrence, the present rector, entered upon his rectorship June, 1879.

The present officers are: Wardens, Walker Wheeler and Lucius B. Burroughs, who died June 12, 1880, after serving as junior warden for more than twenty years; Vestrymen, Ebenezer Wheeler, Stephen H. Burroughs, Marcus O. Wheeler, David S. Walker, Hobart R. Wheeler; Treasurer and Collector, David S. Walker; Delegate to Convention, Marcus O. Wheeler; Substitute, Stephen H. Burroughs; Chorister, John H. Beach. The present number of families is forty-five; of communicants, eighty-one.

A movement is now (October, 1880) on foot to build a new church edifice on the site of the present one.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL SOCIETY OF NICHOLS' FARMS.*

The Nichols' Farms class, connected with the Methodist Episcopal Society, Stratford, had for several years entertained a desire that a meeting-house might be erected in their midst. The first overt act in that direction was made in the latter part of the year 1847. At this time Mr. J. H. Frost, preacher in charge of the Stratford society, appointed a board of trustees for the Nichols' Farms class, as follows, — viz., George Nichols, William Ganderson Nichols, Ira Curtis, David Nichols, E. F. Andrews, James K. Nichols, and Elliott P. Curtis.

The funds for building were raised by subscription. The building committee were Samuel E. Hurd, George Nichols, and William Ganderson Nichols.

In the year 1848, December 12th, the house, being completed, was dedicated to the service of God; C. Pitman, D.D., of New York, performing the dedicatory services. His text was the sixth verse of the One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Psalm. Mr. T. H. Oakley, a local preacher, was appointed to take charge of the society. He was followed by Mr. Monson Seeley, who is declared, in the records, as being "strong in the faith, giving glory to God."

He was succeeded by Mr. O. Sykes and Mr. Lewis Penfield. The latter supplied the pulpit, volunteering to do so half of the time provided the debt was removed, twenty dollars of which he would contribute. In 1849, Mr. S. P. Perry, a local preacher, took the place of Mr. Sykes. He was much liked by the people, and the society increased rapidly under his charge, a class being formed at Booth's Hill.

He was followed by Mr. Worth, Mr. G. Waterbury, Mr. P. Chamberlain, and Mr. G. Hubbell. In 1857, Mr. Samuel C. Keeler was appointed by the presiding elders. During his administration the house was struck by lightning and somewhat shattered. In repairing the building it was thought best to enlarge, which was done. Mr. David Osborn, Mr. John L. Peck, to whom the society is indebted for the record of its history, Mr. Robert S. Mathison, Mr. Thomas R. Laine, Mr. A. B. Pulling, Mr. D. S. Stevens, Mr. H. Scofield, Mr. William T. Gilbert, and the present preacher, William H. Stebbins, have been appointed as successors in the pulpit.

The society, though still in debt, is in a healthy condition, for which much is due to the present class-leader, Mr. William G. Nichols, who was one of the original trustees, which position he still holds.

He is an earnest and conscientious worker, most faithful to the society and its cause in all his acts. By his munificence and zeal, it is safe to say that he is most devotedly fulfilling his trusteeship, and laying up for himself a good foundation against the time to come.

CHRIST'S CHURCH, TASHUA.

There began in 1718 a new era in the history of the Episcopal Church in this country. A large donation of books had been made to Yale College by friends in England. Among these were the works of the most eminent Episcopal divines, many of them treating with the greatest ability of episcopacy, and of other distinctive doctrines of the church. These were eagerly read by the officers and students of the college. The result was that the president of the institution, Dr. Cutler, and two of the tutors, Messrs. Johnson and Brown, declared for episcopacy, and soon after departed for England to take orders. Mr. Johnson returned and settled as pastor of the Episcopal Church in Stratford in 1723.

Within the limits of that town there were then included the present towns of Stratford, Huntington, Monroe, Trumbull, and Bridgeport. A second parish, in the ancient limits of the town, was founded at Ripton, now Huntington, where St. Paul's parish was organized in 1746.

From that time till 1748 the Rev. Mr. Johnson officiated in St. Paul's four Sundays in the year, while his son, a lawyer, read service for them at other times. Their neighbors, however, of the old standing order, ridiculed them for having, as they phrased it, "a lawyer for their priest," so that St. Paul's parish was led in 1748 to petition the English "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts" to send them a clergyman. This was done in the course of a few years. In the mean time they built a church, and a clergyman of the Province of New York, in a letter to the society in England, speaks of having spent a Sunday there in 1749; that he preached and administered the sacrament in their new church; that the congregation numbered about three hundred, and that the number of communicants was about sixty. This shows a large degree of prosperity for the time the parish had been in existence, and is a good index of the faithfulness of the venerable Johnson, who was laboring alone in this section of the country, in the face of the most bitter and hostile opposition.

The exact date is not known when a missionary was appointed to take charge of Ripton, but the Rev. Christopher Newton must have been sent there by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel soon after 1750. His stipend was twenty pounds, in addition to the support the people could give him.

A letter from him to the Venerable Society, dated at Ripton, June 25, 1760, contains the earliest records extant of his work. It is an account of the founding of the parish at Tashua. In it he says he had baptized twenty-five children, had preached and baptized not only on the Sabbath but during the week, and says, "I have reason to think it has had a good effect on a number of families about eight or ten miles from Ripton, to whom I have often preached, and of late they have been more ready to hear than formerly, and seem to be religiously disposed and sensible of the importance of attending public worship. They have accordingly built a church 36 feet long and 26 feet wide, and in about six weeks so far finished it that we meet in it for public worship. A large congregation attended, it was supposed upwards of three hundred people." This was the first beginning of what is now known as Christ's Church, Tashua.

Tradition tells us that this house of worship was seated with rough slab benches, such as were common in country school-houses fifty years ago. It was probably never plastered, for twenty-seven years later a committee was appointed to consider upon the matter; but as measures were taken for the erection of a new church in a year or two after their appointment, the original church probably remained, so long as it stood, in the same unplastered condition in which it was when the first service was held in it.

The church stood within the present church-yard, near the north gate. The first grave was dug in the church-yard in 1763, six years after the erection of the church. The gravestone, of black slate, to the memory of Mrs. Eleanor Marrow, is still to be seen. It probably stood directly in the rear of the church.

Mr. Newton, in the same letter, in giving the reasons which led him to labor in Tashua, and which led to the erection of the first parish church, says, "These people live at a great distance from any public worship, and many of them are so poor that they have not horses to carry their families to worship if they would, and others, it seems by their conduct, choose to spend the Sabbath in hunting and unnecessary visits, and are not only dilatory in religious matters, but in secular affairs. Many live but little above the Indian, and are destitute of the comforts of life. This terrible condition of the people influenced some persons of ample means to build a church at Tashua. One gentleman, for years an Episcopalian, declared that he felt it to be his duty to expend a part of his estate in providing what, with the Divine blessing, would prevent the people from becoming heathens. These people," he adds, "have since attended worship, and seem very highly to prize the worship of the church, and have desired me to take the care of them, and I have preached to them every fourth Sunday."

The missionary asked of the society in England an additional allowance for the labor and expense of coming hither from Ripton every fourth Sunday. They granted him ten pounds per annum. This was probably continued to the close of the year 1782, or twenty-two years, making the sum of two hundred and twenty pounds, or about eleven hundred dollars, which was bestowed upon the parish in its infancy by its Christian brethren on the other side of the Atlantic. Of the Rev. Mr. Newton, Dr. Johnson, then rector of Stratford, writes in the highest terms as laborious and worthy.

Any one who has read the "Connecticut History" of Dr. Trumbull, who was a distinguished member of the Congregational Church, or the "standing order," as it was called, could but see that Mr. Newton did not overstate the case when he gave such a melancholy view of the condition of Tashua before the building of the church. There were other places where it was even worse.

The first Episcopal clergy were men of ardent zeal, who labored in season and out of season to gather the neglected and scattered sheep. They preached in school-houses and private houses, visiting from house to house, going wherever they could get a hearing. They catechized the children, distributed tracts, prayer-books, Bibles, and other religious books, all of which were supplied in considerable quantities by the society in England, very few being printed in this country at that time.

Their earnest work for the good of their fellow-men was rewarded with immediate and abundant success. As early as 1760 there were thirty Episcopal churches and fourteen clergymen, three of these churches and two of the clergy being within the ancient limits of the town of Stratford.

In 1762 the Rev. Mr. Newton writes to the Venerable Society in England that "he has reason to bless God that seriousness, peace, and charity appear to prevail in his parishes; that he has at North Stratford and Stratfield about thirty communicants and about one hundred at Ripton; that he had baptized in the last half-year twenty-one children."

The little missionary station at Stratfield, which is here spoken of as containing, together with Tashua, then called North Stratford, thirty communicants, has now grown into the present parish of St. John's, Bridgeport, and its daughter churches; while the North Stratford parish embraced the ground now covered by the Tashua and Long Hill parishes, and by part of that at Monroe, no parish having been formed there till 1800. There are now on the same ground at the very least two hundred and twenty-five or two hundred and fifty communicants, while the thirty communicants of Stratfield and North Stratford have grown to, in 1880, not far from fourteen hundred. Such a growth may well cause us to thank God and take courage.

July, 1762, the members of Tashua parish sent to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel a letter of thanks for their gift of a folio Bible and prayer-book for the use of the church, and also for small Bibles and prayer-books and catechisms, and for the frequent and very acceptable ministrations of Mr. Newton, who, notwithstanding the distance of eight miles on a bad road, and the excessive cold in winter and heat in summer, has been very constant for several years in administering the Lord's Supper to them once in two months, and performing divine service once in four Sundays, and in catechising and instructing their children.

The large Bible and prayer-book, the former of which was printed in London in 1750, and the latter in 1760, are still kept in the church, though they have given place to more modern editions.

In 1766 the Rev. Mr. Newton writes as follows to the Venerable Society in England: "My parishes increase gradually notwithstanding the perils of the times, and many young persons have come to our communion. I have baptized during the past year forty-one." "Perilous times," to which he refers, were the result of the "Stamp Act" and other measures of the British government. The country was even then convulsed with the preliminary throes of the American struggle for liberty. As the attachment of the Episcopal clergy and people to the old country was generally strong before the war broke out, from the fact that they were under God mainly indebted to Christian friends there for their support of the gospel here, they felt more than most others the stress of those times which tried men's souls.

Although there are no reports extant of Mr. Newton of a later date than 1766, yet he survived the Revolution, and continued to serve this parish and Ripton till 1785, for in the parish accounts there is a record of a committee appointed to settle with the heirs of the Rev. Mr. Newton for services rendered up to that year. That committee was appointed in 1787, so that Mr. Newton must have died in or before that year.

The Rev. Abraham L. Clarke, who was ordained by Bishop Seabury in 1786, became the minister of the parish at Tashua soon after Mr. Newton's decease.

In October, 1787, a committee was appointed by the parish to secure his services one-third part of the time, and the next year it was voted to settle Mr. Clark one-third part of the time for life. In 1788, December 1st, it was also voted to build a new church by subscription, and on Christmas day, in the same year, Capt. Abel Hall, Nathan Summers, and David Mallett were appointed to oversee and carry on the building of the new church; and that Amos Van Nostrand proportion the house, not to exceed fifty feet in length, and thirty-four in breadth, and twenty-four in height. Also to be twenty-four windows in said church, of six-by-eight glass, thirty panes in each window, exclusive of the arch.

The next spring the parish appointed a committee to exchange with the selectmen of Stratford a piece of land belonging to the proprietors of the church for a certain piece on the north side of the highway for the purpose of erecting the church thereon. This was probably the ground upon which the church was built, and there the church remained until the present edifice was erected. The same year it was voted to call the parish Trinity Church, and by that name it was known in the records for many years.

In June, 1790, the church was so far advanced that by vote of the parish the pew spots were sold at public vendue, the buyers being obligated to pay the prices bid, and to build the pews in one year from the time of purchase. The pews were to be in uniform style, as they were in the North Fairfield meeting-house. The purchase money was applied towards the expense of building the church. The pew spots were all sold except two for three hundred and ten dollars and sixty-six cents.

These square pews were sixteen in number, being the wall pews all round the building, except the portions occupied by the doors, gallery, stairs, and chancel. The chancel was on the north side, and there was a door in the opposite side and one also at both the east and west ends. In the body of the church there were long, open seats free to all. A tower and spire were built at the west entrance in 1823. The names of the original purchasers of pew spots were Henry Beardsley, Josiah Sanford, Isaac Wakeley, Zechariah Mallett, Nathan Summers, Andrew Lyon, William Prince, George Chambers, Zechariah Beach, Joseph Mallett, John Edwards, Capt. Abel Hall, William Osborne, and Agur Edwards. A number of the pews soon changed hands,—some before the church was completed, which was probably in 1790, for there is a record of the appointment of a key-keeper in February of that year.

The church was consecrated by Bishop Seabury, June 5, 1795.

The Rev. Mr. Clarke continued to supply this church in connection with Ripton till 1792, when he accepted a call to St. John's Church, Providence, R. I. From the position he occupied, he would seem to have been a man of mark in his day.

In 1792 there was held the first convention of this diocese of which we have any printed records, and Tashua parish was represented by Capt. Abel Hall.

On the 1st of April, 1793, Tashua joined with Christ's Church, Stratford, in settling Rev. Ashiel Baldwin, who officiated in Tashua every third Sunday for many years. He was ordained by Bishop Seabury, in 1785, at the first Episcopal ordination ever held in America. He was a man of small stature, but of quick action, both of mind and body, fine talents, and powerful voice. In his prime he was very popular as a preacher and orator, often being called upon to preach and speak before public bodies on important occasions. He was prominent both in diocesan and general conventions. No man was perhaps more instrumental than he since the Revolution in laying the foundations of the church in this diocese. He continued to officiate in Tashua in connection with Stratford till 1815, and at intervals when the parish became vacant by the removal of other clergymen till 1828, though his connection with Stratford ceased in 1824. He afterwards served other parishes in this diocese till 1832, when he became unable to perform active duties. He died at Rochester, N. Y., in 1846, aged eighty-nine years, full of years and of honors.

In 1817, Rev. Joseph D. Welton was called to supply this parish one-half the time in connection with the old church in Weston. He continued to officiate till 1819. Mr. Welton removed to Waterbury, and his health giving way, he was not again a settled parish minister, but officiated occasionally and taught school as his strength permitted. He died at Waterbury in 1825, aged forty-two years. He was said by those who knew him to have combined the virtue and grace which adorn the Christian character, and was ardently devoted to the duties of his sacred office.

From 1819 to 1823, Tashua was again supplied a part of the time by Mr. Baldwin. In the latter year it was supplied a portion of the time in connection with St. John's, Bridgeport, by Rev. Henry R. Judah; in 1824, by Rev. Beardsley Northrop; in 1825, for six months, by Rev. E. J. Ives.

After another period supplied in part by Mr. Baldwin, Rev. Rodney Rossiter, in 1829, was settled in Tashua in connection with St. Peter's Church, Monroe, supplying each one-half the time till 1834. Mr. Rossiter was a man of great amiability of character and uprightness and purity in his walk and conversation. He continued to supply the parish of Monroe till his death, in November, 1846.

In 1837, Rev. D. G. Tomlinson was called to Tashua, and officiated three-fourths of the time for two years, giving the other fourth to the church in Weston. From that time till he resigned Tashua he devoted to it his entire services. He resigned in 1843. The chancel-window is a memorial of his earnest zeal and devoted labors for the good of the parish.

The Rev. William W. Bronson served the cure from July, 1843, to November, 1847, when he accepted a call to St. James' Church, Danbury. His removal was universally regretted. In the following spring Rev. Henry V. Gardner succeeded him, serving Tashua and Grace Church, Long Hill, for one year.

During the rectorship of Mr. Tomlinson the erection of the church at Long Hill was accomplished. It was commenced in 1836, and completed in 1839. It was built as a chapel of Christ's church, Tashua, and the whole continued to be one parish till the rectorship of Rev. Mr. Bronson.

In June, 1846, there was held a meeting of the parish of Christ's Church, at which it was resolved to divide the parish. The Long Hill portion immediately organized under the name of Grace Church, and was admitted into union with the Convention the same month.

During the rectorship of the Rev. Mr. Bronson the erection of the present church building, the third which has stood here, was accomplished. It was begun in 1846, and consecrated on the 28th day of May the year following. The first church, erected in 1760, stood thirty years, or till 1790; the second stood fifty-six years; the present one has stood thirty-four years.

seats, erected by the generosity of two or three for the benefit of a destitute neighborhood, has given place to a beautiful temple completely furnished, erected by the free-will offerings of a whole congregation whom God has prospered. At the first service in the church of 1760 a single struggling missionary carried on his services unaided and uncheered by a single brother in the ministry, with no chief pastor on the continent to consecrate the edifice to the Most High, or to ordain to the holy ministry, or to bless with the laying on of hands those who would confirm their Christian vows. When the present building was consecrated, in 1847, sixteen clergymen were present; a bishop, one of a goodly number whom God has raised up in this Western land, set it apart to the worship of Almighty God. He set apart at the same time one to the holy order of the priesthood, and a goodly number kneeling before the altar were confirmed by him in their Christian profession. Truly the Lord has kept good to this humble branch of His planting the promise, "Lo, I am with you always."

In 1849, Rev. John W. Hoffman was called to Tashua for the whole time. On his resignation he was succeeded in the following year by the Rev. J. G. Downing, who served the whole time till the beginning of the year 1852. After a vacancy of nine months Rev. De Witt C. Loop served the parish, in connection with Long Hill, the greater portion of 1853. After another vacancy of several months the Rev. W. L. Bostwick served the united cure nearly two years, resigning February, 1856. On the 1st of the ensuing January, Rev. William T. Early took charge till July, 1858. After an interregnum of seven months the Rev. D. P. Sanford took charge, March 20, 1859. He was absent from the parish from Sept. 20, 1862, to April 1, 1863, as chaplain of Twentieth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers in United States service, his place in Tashua being supplied by the Rev. William H. Williams. Mr. Sanford's connection was terminated by his resignation on Easter Monday, 1864, after a rectorship of little more than five years.

He was succeeded by the Rev. William Warland in 1865, who served the parishes at Tashua and Long Hill till late in the fall of 1867, when he resigned.

The Rev. C. C. Adams became rector of the parish in February, 1869, giving it his whole time. The present rectory had been purchased by the parish, so that the rector now has a home within the limits of the parish after it had existed a little more than one hundred years.

On his resignation the Rev. Wm. J. Pigott became rector, Oct. 15, 1870. He resigned in 1872, and was followed in 1874 by the Rev. A. P. Brush, who served the united cures of Tashua and Long Hill till late in the fall of 1878. The church, after being thoroughly repaired and beautified, was reopened by the bishop on May 18, 1874.

The present rector, William H. Bulkeley, took charge of the parish June 13, 1880, serving it in connection with Christ's church, Easton.

Capt. Abel Mallett, for many years a very influential member of the parish, at his death, in the fall of 1877, left a small fund, the income of which was to make good his place in meeting the ordinary expenses of the parish.

Present officers: Rector, William Howard Bulkley; Wardens, Charles Osborne, Aaron B. Mallett; Vestrymen, Stephen G. Nichols, Morse D. Mallett, William A. Mallett, Dr. Seth Hill, Benjamin H. French, S. Mallett Sanford, Joseph A. Tredwell; Clerk, Joseph A. Tredwell; Chorister, William A. Mallett; Librarian, George D. Mallett; Superintendent Sunday-school, the rector.

Present number of communicants, ninety.

NICHOLS' FARMS.

The village of Nichols' Farms, or Old Farms, as it is often called, is situated in the town of Trumbull, on the eastern of the three or four ridges which transverse the town from the north to the south, dividing it into as many tracts or districts. Its early history is so connected with that of Stratford, of which Trumbull previous to the year 1798 formed a part, that it will be necessary to a certain degree to give some detail of the history concerning the property of the first settlers of Stratford, from whom most of the people of Old Farms are descendants. There were men among the first settlers of Stratford who while they lived in the settlement, still were extensive landowners. Their land or farms comprised large tracts into which their town had been divided.

Upon their death this land was divided among their children as shares of the parent's estate, which, being settled upon, of course soon scattered a sparse population over the town. During these early times, in order to increase the facility of reaching these farms, roads were laid out extending all through the town. The road running from Stratford north through Nichols' Farms was laid out at the generous width of eight rods. It was on this road that most of the settlers built their new homes,—not, as a general thing, of logs, but, being sons of "well-to-do" men, were started in life with a substantial frame house, with its back roof sloping almost to the ground in true colonial style.

During the first fifty years the locality of Nichols' Farms was known by the general name of Stratford. As the people were taxed by the Presbyterian Society in Stratford, they attended "meeting" there until the year 1730, when a "meeting-house" was built nearer home. Then the name "Society at Unity" was applied to the locality.

In the year 1744, owing to a division of the people of the society, thus rendering the name "Unity" inappropriate, it was changed, and was known as the Society at North Stratford until the incorporation of the town of Trumbull in 1798, when it took the name of the town.

The difficulty arose from the fact of the conversion of their pastor, the Rev. Richardson Minor, to a belief in the doctrines of the Church of England. He resigned his charge over the society, but not before dissensions of so serious a character had arisen that about one-half of the society left the faith. After his resignation he went to England, where he was ordained, but on his return home was taken sick and died at sea.

The name of Nichols' Farms undoubtedly arose from the fact of its being there that the portion owned by Francis Nichols or his immediate descendants lay,—not so much, probably, in consequence of the quality or quantity of the land as it was that they were the earliest to convert the wilderness into a farm.

The settlement of the village is not new by any means, for there were clearings made over two hundred years ago. Tradition says that the first clearing was made by a man whose name it has failed to transmit, near where the toll-gate at Mishega Hill now is. Here he planted his rye and built a house, but died ere his crop had ripened. There is also a tradition that there was a clearing on the knoll below the house of Charles B. Nichols at a very early period, and, too, that the only way to reach Stratford at that early time was from this spot, by the way of a forest-path leading towards the Ousatonic River, and so circuitously to Stratford. Others claim that here stood the wigwam of an old Indian named Uncle Bill, and that the pile of clam-shells which may yet be seen upon turning the soil are resultant of his appetite for sea food, and that the meadow is still designated as "Uncle Bill's lot" from the fact of his having lived there.

Perhaps as late as 1700 nearly the whole region was thickly covered with forest. A tradition has been handed down that a sick stranger was found by Mr. Joseph Nichols and taken to his home to be cared for, that he died, and was buried on a lonely knoll in the woods some distance back of the house. Fifty years ago, when Mr. Gauderson Nichols was digging the well back of his house, he found the bones of a white man, which had been buried about four feet from the surface in a horizontal position, which were undoubtedly the remains of the first white man who died and was buried in the forest then covering the region where now is the beautiful village of Nichols' Farms.

The Indians have left but few remains of their life here save numerous arrow-heads which are upturned by the plow. Also other relics of the stone age of America have been found in the vicinity. There was found, however, about forty years ago, on the land of the Hon. F. P. Ambler, a never-failing spring of most excellent water. The spring had evidently existed in the condition in which it was found for a great many years. It was, when uncovered, regularly stoned up like a well, having large flat stones laid below, forming a platform over the outlet of surplus water. The spring when found was artfully concealed beneath large stones having trees and deposits of ages thereupon. It was discovered by tracing back the stream of ice-cold water running from what seemed a passage under the rocks. It had evidently been hidden in this manner by Indians, who, having concealed it from other tribes or from the whites, never returned to it again. Its existence was not known to descendants of the Golden Hill Indians who still live in the vicinity. The pond lying northwest of the village, bearing the homely name of "Old Saw-Mill Pond," was originally a natural lake. It was near this lake that an old Indian named Mishea lived. Perchance it were—

"Mitche Manito the mighty,
He the dreadful spirit of evil."

It was from Mishea originated "Mishea Hill," the name given to an extensive tract of land lying northwest of the village.

The ancestor of the Nichols family in this country was Francis Nichols. He came from England, and is first heard of in 1637. He was a soap-boiler by occupation and lived in Stratford, about half a mile below the Episcopal church. He died in the year 1650, at which time his estate inventoried at £29 6s. He had three sons,—Calib, Isaac, and John.

Calib married, in the year 1645, Annie, daughter of Andrew Ward, of Fairfield. At the settlement of Woodbury in 1672, Calib went with the colony. He had five children, and died in the year 1690. His eighth child, Abraham, was born Jan. 19, 1662. The records do not show that he went to Woodbury to settle with his father, and it is not probable that he did.

He married Rachel, daughter of Daniel Kellogg, Dec. 3, 1684. He was the father of eight children, of whom Joseph was the oldest.

Joseph Nichols was born Sept. 21, 1665, and married Mary Curtis, Dec. 26, 1704. He was without doubt the first man of the name who lived in Unity. He was a large landowner. His territory lay on the east side of the highway, extending from the corner at Mr. George Peet's as far north as the territory owned by Jabez Curtis, and ran back to the Bear Swamp road.

He was a man of considerable prominence, was a member of the militia in the year 1720. In the year 1726 we find him as lieutenant, and later as captain. He built his house on the east side of the highway, only a few feet north of the residence of Alexander Cook, Esq.

He died in the year 1742, at the age of fifty-seven, and was buried in the cemetery back of the residence of John Booth, Esq.

He had ten children. Andrew, the fourth child, was born in the year 1724, and married Abiah, daughter of Noah Parab, Dec. 23, 1748. He died in the year 1808, and was buried in the graveyard back of the residence of Samuel Edwards, Esq. He had nine children,—Isaac, Robert, Hezekiah, John, Silas, whose descendants live in "White Plain;" Martha married Lewis Fairchild; Mary married Nathan Nichols, of Booth's Hill; Abia married Philip Nichols, of Botsford Depot; and Sarah, who married Isaac Booth, of Stratford. The first four remained in the village, and from them have descended families who now reside here bearing the name.

Among the first ones to settle in the vicinity of Nichols' Farm were three men bearing the name of Curtis. As far as research is concerned, they have not been found to be related.

There was one, Hezekiah Curtis, whose family has become extinct. He was an extensive landowner; his territory extended from that taken up by Israel Beach, not only south for quite a distance, but north, including the whole of the De Forrest farm, now owned by Horace Lyon, Esq. He lived in a house which stood opposite that of Mr. Lyon. The old well is still there.

He had four children,—Hezekiah, Ezra, Abel, and a daughter, who was the mother of Deacon Ezra De Forrest. His son, Deacon Hezekiah, built a house a little south of where the barn of Mr. William Wakeley now stands, and here too the well alone marks the locality. His wife's name was Thompson. They left no descendants. Ezra and Abel were bachelors, and left their property to their nephew, Deacon Ezra De Forrest.

The Curtis family living at the lower end of the village descend from Mitchel Curtis. He was born in 1729, and died Aug. 16, 1808. He married Phebe, daughter of Deacon Thomas Peet, Jan. 10, 1753, and built a house on the ground where now stands the residence of his great-grandson, Lewis Curtis, Esq. He had five children,—viz., Zachariah, Daniel Mitchel, Mary Anne, Phebe, and Isaac.

His son Zachariah built a house which stood south of Trinity church, where the residence of George H. Houston now stands. He married Verona Edwards Dec. 28, 1775; had two children,—James and Elijah. James married Nancy Peet, and left a large family, who were zealous workers in the establishment and maintenance of Trinity parish.

Daniel Mitchel was born Jan. 4, 1755, married, and had ten children,—viz., Burr, Ira, David, Alvin, Eli, Daniel, Hepsie, Mary, Huldah, and Lucy.

The family living at the north end of the village bearing the same name descend from the widow Elizabeth Curtis, who is found in Stratford in the year —.

This family trace their ancestry through the line descending from her son William.

Jabez Curtis was the first one of this family to settle in the Society of Unity. He, unlike nearly all others in the settlement, was a zealous member of the Church of England. He belonged to the loyal party and fought in the Revolution under the British flag, for which act he suffered the indignity of having his property confiscated. It was repurchased by his sons, however. His house stood a few rods north of the junction of the Misheva Hill road and the Huntington turnpike. A house which was torn down a few years ago, and which was at least calculation one hundred and twenty-five years old, was undoubtedly built by him. Andrew, his son, was born, lived, and died in this house. He had three children,—Thomas, who went to Woodbury, Andrew, and Evard. Andrew married Eunice, daughter of Joseph Lake, and had six children,—viz., Joseph, Hull, Elisha, Nathaniel, Moranda, and Sheldon. Evard lived across the street from Andrew, and had three children,—Cherry, Charles, and Anson.

The Fairchilds, who are one of our most prominent families of Trumbull, descend from Mr. Thomas Fairchild, who was one of the original proprietors in the settlement of Stratford. He was a man of considerable prominence, and was the first magistrate of the town.

Mr. Fairchild had two wives; the first was a daughter of Robert Seabrook, Esq., and died during the early days of the colony. She bore him several children.

In the year 1662, and about three years after the death of his wife, he returned to England and married Catharine Craig, of London.

It is through the descendants of this second marriage that we trace the Trumbull line of ancestry. Daniel Fairchild was the first one of the family who lived in the society of Unity. He was born in 1729, and married Hepsibah Lewis, of Old Mill, Dec. 6, 1743, by whom he had nine children. His second wife was of the Middlebrook family of Long Hill.

He built a house nearly on the site where now stands the house of Miss Mariah Nichols. It was here that his children were born, who were Timothy, Lewis, Daniel, Nehemiah, Sarah, Melitable, Benjamin, Abel, and Sarah. He died in 1807, aged eighty-seven years. Of his nine children, three—viz., Timothy, Lewis, and Daniel—settled in the vicinity.

Timothy Fairchild was born July 30, 1714. He married Johannah, daughter of Samuel Ufford, June 26, 1766. He built on the site where now stands the house of John B. Nichols, Esq. He had six children,—viz., Nehemiah, David, Eli, Aaron, Johannah, and Hepsie. Hepsie married Eli, son of Daniel Mitchel Curtis.

Lewis Fairchild was born March 14, 1746, and married Mary, daughter of Samuel Ufford, Sept. 22, 1768. He built a house at Misheva Hill, a short distance below the saw-mill now owned by David Plumb. They had five children,—viz., Lewis, Polly, Reuben, Eben, and Isaac. His oldest son, Coll. Lewis, who married Pattie, daughter of Andrew Nichols, July 10, 1774, was the father of Daniel and Plumb Fairchild, the proprietors of the extensive paper-mills at Lakeville, and Reuben was the father of Charles N. Fairchild, Esq., of the Farms.

The ancestor of the Plumb family was from England, and settled in Milford in 1639. His name was Robert. The records do not place him on the list of "free planters," not being in church fellowship, which was a requisite qualification in the view of the colonists before a person could be admitted a "free planter."

Noah Plumb came to Unity Society about 1700, and married, Oct. 2, 1714, Abigail Curtis. He built a house on the west side of the highway, below where the house of David Plumb stands. This house was without doubt the finest and most substantial built in the settlement. It had gable roofs. In the front of the house were antique window-frames. The sashes were of lead, which framed in diamond-shaped panes, and the whole was quite English in its appearance. The records do not show that he had more than one child. This one he named Noah, who, with his wife Abiah, lived in his father's house and had five children,—viz., Abiah, Phebe, Susannah, David, and Joseph. David married Mary Beach, Dec. 29, 1770, from whom descended the late Beach Plumb and the Hon. D. W. Plumb, of Shelton. He built a house which has long since been torn down. It stood a short distance below the house of Ezer W. Plumb. Joseph Plumb married Sibil Edwards, May 29, 1777. He lived below his father's residence. He had three children,—Elliott, who was father of Oliver E. Plumb, Eli, the father of Birsey B., and Almon Plumb, of Trumbull Centre. The third child was Pixley.

The Peets are one of the oldest families. They descend from Deacon Thomas Peet, who was admitted into the Society at Unity in 1731. Abijah Peet married Bethiah, daughter of Samuel Ufford, in June, 1771. His home stood at the foot of the garden of Mr. George Peet (grandson). The names of four of his children were, 1st, Hepsie, who married Sheldon Peirson (children were William and Sheldon); 2d, Nancy, married James Curtis (children Elbert, Ellen, Maria, Harriett); 3d, Johannah, married Robert Nichols; 4th, Isaiah (children George, Susan, and Charles).

Samuel Ufford lived in the village with his wife, Anne, in the year 1739, when their first child was born. He had seven children, viz., 1st, Daniel, married Mary Berse; 2d, John, married Anon Nichols; 3d, Mary, married Lewis Fairchild; 4th, Bethiah, married Abijah Peet; 5th, Jane, married Richard Salmous; 6th, Ebenezer (Judge Eben), married Nancy Peet; 7th, Johannah, married Timothy Fairchild.

The Hawley family descend from the Joseph Hawley who was one of the original settlers in Stratford, where we find them as early as 1649. The first one of the family which we find in Unity was Robert Hawley. His wife's name was Annie Beach, to whom he was married March 15, 1750. He built a house opposite the residence of Lewis Curtis, just below an old barn that is still standing. He had eight children, of whom Robert, Elikim, and Josiah settled in the village. Josiah lived in the old home. Elikim built the house now standing below the residence of Elliot Curtis, Esq. This house is without doubt the oldest house in the village. His descendants went to "White Plains." Robert Hawley built an old house which stood where the residence of Sheldon P. Peirson now stands. His children were Abijah, Beach, Anna, and Elam.

One of the first houses in Nichols' Farms was built by Ephraim Booth. It stood upon the site now occupied by the house of Samuel Edwards, Esq. He was a deacon in the Society of Unity. He had a son, also named Ephraim, who married Sarah Fairchild, Dec. 18, 1739. By this wife he had three children,—viz., Charity, Rachel, and Ann. His wife Sarah died, and he married again, Nov. 14, 1751, Phebe Fairchild. He was admitted to the Society at Unity, Aug. 26, 1753. By his wife Phebe he had three children. These were Sarah, Phebe, and Hannah. Soon after the death of Mr. Ephraim Booth, Jr., the homestead was sold to Mr. Eli Edwards. Mr. Eli Edwards came from Chestnut Hill. He built the house owned by the late Charles Curtis, and was a man of considerable property and prominence. His son Samuel is still living, and is held very high in the respect of all who know him. His only child is the wife of Horace Fairchild, Esq.

John Beardsley lived in the settlement before the Revolution. He was a chairmaker, as well were his two sons, James and Andrew. He lived in a house which stood in the lot opposite the house of Mrs. Shelton Nichols. His son James built on the property known as the Peck place, since bought by the late James D. Alvord, Esq. The Rev. John L. Peck lived for several years in the house now standing on the old site. In the same house the late Dr. Starkweather, a learned and highly-respected physician, lived and practiced medicine for several years.

Andrew Beardsley married Mary, daughter of Daniel Mitchell Curtis, and had the following children: Nelson, Curtis, Amelia (who married Abija M. Nichols), and Mary. Curtis is still living in the village. He is a carpenter, and built most of the houses now standing in the village.

Previous to the war of the Revolution we find that Chauncy Beardsley, with his wife, Huldah Hawley, lived on the "cross-road" just above the "Red House" belonging to Charles Fairchild, Esq. The well which belonged to the house is there yet, and is over forty feet deep.

Chauncy Beardsley was a Tory, and engaged with the British in the Revolution. He left at home his wife with eight young children, who led a struggling existence during the war.

Aunt Huldah, as every one called her, was a woman of wonderful nerve and constitution. She survived her husband for many years, as well did she all the acquaintances of her middle life, and died at the advanced age of one hundred and two years.

She took pleasure in talking of the exciting times of the Revolution, and related the event of two companies of French soldiers encamping a whole winter during the war on what is known as "Mountain Hill," a high rocky bluff in the central part of the village, which commands a view of about seventy miles of the Sound and island. She would relate with fire in her eye of how the "hired rebels" would compel her to cook and sometimes furnish provisions for them, through fear that they would kill her if she did not comply with their requests.

The mammoth oak which is still standing on the brow of the hill is said to have been cut off where it now branches out at that time. French coins have since been found near the site of their camp.

Their son Lewis married Laura Gillett. The widow and two daughters alone represent this family of Beardsley in the village.

Israel Beach when quite a young man came from Stratford, where his ancestors settled, and cleared up the Bear Swamp farm. He built a house in what is well known as the "old house-lot," about six rods from the present street fence, and near the southern fence of the lot. In the year 1731 he married Hannah Burritt, of Stratford, and had six children,—viz., Phebe, Nathaniel, Mary, Israel, Hannah, and Eben. He was a soldier in the French war in Canada. A powder-horn carried by him through the French war is still in the possession of his descendants. He died at the advanced age of eighty-six, and was buried in the old Congregational burying-ground in Stratford.

His three sons each built houses near by. Nathaniel built about quarter of a mile above. During the Revolution, when Stratford was threatened to be burned, quite a number of the Whig friends of Mr. Beach brought their household goods and valuables from Stratford in the night-time, and for safe keeping stored them in this house, which, by the way, is still standing.

One day, while the present subject of our writing was at work on his farm, his little dog found a bear, and by furious barking drew his attention to the fact. Mr. Beach went home, procured his gun, and returning to the spot shot him. He proved to be a fine specimen of black bear, and was the last killed in the vicinity. From the above-narrated occurrence the farm and locality has since been called "Bear Swamp." Mr. Nathaniel Beach was killed by a load of wood which was turned over upon him.

Israel, Jr., built a short distance south of the house of his brother Nathaniel, and Eben built in the same, with and nearly in front of where his father's house stood. The family have become separated, and the descendants of Nathaniel alone remain, whose son and grandson, each bearing the same name, have since tilled part of the land cleared by their ancestor.

Some few years before the Revolution three brothers by the name of Blagg arrived in Stratford from England. They had quite a sum of money between them, which for safe keeping was intrusted to one of the three, who in turn absconded, leaving the others destitute. The town through pity gave them all the land lying on the east side of the Bear Swamp and Huntington road inclosed between the Beaver Dam Brook and the one now known as Hurd's Brook. For drawing the deed one of them, who was a shoemaker, made a pair of shoes as compensation to the magistrate. Samuel and Elisha were the names of the two brothers left. Samuel built a house where the house of William Wakeley now stands, and Elisha built just above and about opposite of the road to Isinglass. Only one of them had issue, and, they being daughters, the name became extinct.

The Hon. Franklin P. Ambler was a descendant of Richard Ambler, who was born in Somersetshire, England, in the year 1611. He came to this country in 1639, landing at Weymouth, Mass., and in 1666 he came to Stamford, Conn. Here, with his son Abraham and several others, he united in the purchase of the town of Bedford from the Indians. He died in the year 1699, aged eighty-eight years.

Franklin P. Ambler was born in Danbury, June 3, 1797, and was of good colonial blood on both sides of the house. His father, Squire Ambler, was the second child of John Ambler and Huldah Fairchild. His mother was Elizabeth, daughter of Ebenezer Pickett and Elizabeth Abbott. Squire Ambler was born and spent his early boyhood in those times during which the wrongs imposed by England grew more and more oppressive, and at the age of fourteen, instead of learning a trade of peace, he learned a trade of war. At that early age he enlisted in the Continental army at Danbury, under Capt. Osborn, as an artificer. During that terrible winter at Valley Forge his exceptional fortitude and unswerving fidelity did not escape the observing eye of Washington, who in the spring of 1778 promoted him to his special guard. Thus this hardy and patriotic man served not only through those dark days at Valley Forge, and at the stormy crossing of the Delaware, but until the end of the war, when he was still with his commander at Yorktown, at the surrender of Cornwallis. His sword, which he carried through the whole war, is a heavy blade encased in an iron sheath. It was forged by N. Starr, who was a country blacksmith in Danbury. It is still in the possession of his descendants.

The early life of Franklin P. Ambler was one of poverty and hardship, through which he struggled with undaunted courage. At the age of fourteen he was bound out to Mr. Hull, in Danbury, as an apprentice in the saddle-tree trade, where he remained until his time was out, when he went to New York as an employee in the tree-factory of Benjamin Stiles. Later, he came to Derby, Conn., where he was employed in the factory of Mr. Chatfield. Here he met Eliza, daughter of Jerrod Bartholem (now Bartholomew) and Mary Wooster, whom he married, March 15, 1819, and in Derby his oldest child, Charles, was born.

In the year 1822 he came to Trumbull, where he was employed as general superintendent in the factories of Messrs. Reuben and Eben Fairchild. He lived in a house owned by Eli Edwards, which is still standing back of the residence of Sheldon Curtis.

In the year 1825 he entered into the business with R. and E. Fairchild and Mr. Isaiah Peet, under the name of Fairchild, Peet & Co. In the year 1844 he bought out the concern and conducted business in partnership with his three sons, under the firm-name of F. P. Ambler & Sons. He bought land lying about and north of what is known as "Mountain Hill," and built the present factories, having since enlarged them as the business increased. He purchased of Philo Lord the house now owned and occupied by his grandson, Richard C. Ambler. This house he enlarged and remodeled, and here he made his home. To him home was a sacred spot. His wife, who was a person endowed with the very embodiment of nobleness of character, was fully capable of making it so. His children married and had houses of their own,—all within a stone's throw; but still home was yet at the father's, and his greatest joy was to gather them around his board. His faithful companion passed away March 20, 1853. He married again, Emily S. Ambler, widow of Joel Ambler, of Danbury, a woman of most excellent qualities and well suited to fill the vacant place. She still survives him.

Franklin P. Ambler had during his boyhood little opportunities for education, but was always an enthusiastic reader; remarkable for an exceedingly retentive memory, he soon acquired a knowledge difficult to be competed with. To this he constantly made additions until in middle and later life he was able to converse, with equal intelligence, with those of far greater opportunities.

I can no better describe the opinion in which he was held by the public than to quote, in part, an article that appeared in the columns of the Bridgeport Farmer at the time of his death, which occurred Aug. 1, 1873:

" . . . Mr. Ambler was everywhere known as a man of the strictest integrity, whose word was as good as his bond." In many respects he was a remarkable man. Gifted with a powerful and retentive memory, he seldom forgot anything of importance that he read, and, always from his youth up an industrious reader, his mind was stored with a fund of facts, anecdote, and historical information from which he would at pleasure draw to enliven, strengthen, and adorn his naturally easy conversation. He had accumulated a solid and valuable library, and his peculiar qualities of mind made his books almost literally reproduced in him. In early life his attention was particularly called to the Bible and the consideration of religious subjects, and to the study of these he gave the closest attention until he arrived at a conclusion that satisfied his own mind and conscience, a result which led him to espouse the earnest and conscientious belief that the Bible is the inspired word of God, and that it teaches the doctrine of universal salvation. Conscientious and firm in his convictions, having thoroughly studied the subject, perfectly familiar with the Bible, he was, without exception, the ablest lay conversationalist we ever knew, and no one could meet him in an argument without discomfiture, unless they were thoroughly masters of their subject.

"Mr. Ambler was always a sound and consistent Democrat of the Jeffersonian school, and always took a deep and intelligent interest in public affairs. He had frequently to fill local offices in his town, had represented it in the Legislature, and about 1862 was elected to the State Senate, in all which positions he discharged his duties with unswerving fidelity, and with honor to himself. He was made a Mason more than fifty years ago, and was a consistent member of the order until his decease. A singular circumstance may be mentioned in this connection, the like of which has never occurred in the annals of the institution. Some ten years ago the writer of these lines, then a presiding officer of Jerusalem Chapter, No. 13, R. A. M., of this city (Bridgeport), officiated at the exaltation at one time of the deceased and two of his sons, George B. and Franklin P., Jr. All three, the father and sons, are now dead, and each one has been buried on Sunday by the Masonic fraternity." . . .

It may not be out of place to speak here of his family, which consisted of Charles, George B., Mary E., and Franklin P., Jr. They were all very dear to him, and he was justly proud of them for they held positions in public respect. They were notorious for their strong mind and firm belief in the democratic principles of government. All three of the sons represented their town in the Assembly, and also at different times filled offices of trust both in party and town.

In speaking of them one cannot but associate them together, for it was together, the father and the three sons, that every one meant when they spoke of the "Amblers."

But their characteristics were different. Charles, the only one living, alone displays the persistent application and thoroughness of the father. In Franklin P. Ambler, Jr., we found the hearty "free and easy" good will to all, but at the same time a fierce and decisive opinion. United with a wonderful eloquence was his inherited and equally wonderful memory. Imposing in figure and powerful in thought, he would hold an audience as if it were spell-bound for hours at a time. But his bright and promising career was cut short in the spring of life. He died May 25, 1865, aged forty years. In George B. Ambler there was the same persistency which is the characteristic of the father. He was a fine business man, and as an accountant could not be excelled. He was remarkable in ingenuity; the results of his skill and taste are still in the possession of his family and are exhibited with pride. He came to an untimely end by being thrown from his carriage while riding on State Street, Bridgeport. He died the same day, June 24, 1871.

The distance from England rendered the importation of household utensils, cloths, and other necessaries of life very expensive; hence, necessity being the mother of invention, the colonists began to manufacture for themselves. The spinning-wheel and loom were articles of absolute necessity in every house, and one of the chief accomplishments of the farmer's wife and daughter was the manufacture of "homespun," it being the custom of the housewife to spin and weave all the cloth used in the family. But the busy wheel has long been laid away, as well as has been the faithful hands which plied it, and with the wheel the large, cheerful "fireplace," with its benches at each end and its "back-log," which was drawn into the house by oxen, have all passed away; they are all pushed into disuse by the rapid strides of invention. Then the shoemaker, like "Dick Whitting," carried his kit from house to house, making the family boots and shoes out of the leather furnished by the family. The village shoemaker and tanner, for several years succeeding the Revolution, was "Squire David Seeley." Seeley bought an old house standing on the present site of the home of David Plumb. He bought the property at auction, it being confiscated from David Peet, who was a Tory in the war. The vats where the "Squire" tanned the hides were by the roadside at Mishea Hill Brook. Squire Seeley was the first man in the village who took a newspaper, and at his house the neighbors were accustomed to assemble to hear the news.

The first saw-mill in the locality stood near the dam of what has since been known as Old Saw-Mill Pond. It was built and owned by Daniel Fairchild, who was an early settler in the village.

The village chairmaker was John Beardsley. His shop stood near his house, in the field opposite the house of Mrs. Shelton Nichols. His son James, in later years, for some time carried on quite an extensive business at the trade in his shop, which stood below his house, opposite the residence of David Nichols, Esq. Here he employed several workmen, besides apprentices; among the latter were Hull and Eliel, sons of Andrew Curtis. James Beardsley afterwards went to Newark, N. J., with Eli Edwards, and established the first saddle-tree factory in that city.

Sixty years ago the manufacturing of combs was quite an industry in the village.

The saddle-tree business, like the mammoth oak, had a small origin. Eben Fairchild, a son of Lewis, was born Nov. 10, 1784. He learned the cabinet-maker's trade, and was a very ingenious man. While living at Misha Hill he took an old saddle to pieces and set himself at work making another like it; succeeding in this, he made a dozen and carried them "across lots on his back" to his brother Eli, who was a blacksmith living in Isinglass, and they together "ironed" them. Then, in spite of the jeers of his neighbors, who called them "devil-trees," he went with them by stage to New York, where he found a ready market. He returned home with his money, and, making more, disposed of them in the same manner.

Later, he took Isaiah Peet—Mr. Peet, as every one called him—into partnership with him. They built a shop opposite the house of Sidney Nichols, Esq. Still later they changed the firm-name to that of Fairchild, Peet & Co. F. P. Ambler, of Danbury, then a young man and a practical tree-maker, came into the firm at that time. In the year 1844, F. P. Ambler bought out the business, and with his three sons carried on the business under the name of F. P. Ambler & Sons. From this time until the end of the war the business constantly increased. The firm built the present extensive factories, introduced steam-power, and have sent their goods all over the world. During the Franco-Prussian war they filled large orders for the French government. Have made large orders for Peru and other South American states, including Brazil. In all its dealings the firm was known as one of the strictest in integrity, honor, and candor. Previous to the war the chief business of the firm was with parties in the Southern States, which trade was entirely destroyed by the war, during which, however, they took large government contracts, employing about six hundred men.

With the exception of Charles, the members of the firm have since died, but the business is still carried on by Charles Ambler, under the name of F. P. Ambler's Son. After leaving the firm of Fairchild, Peet & Co., Mr. Peet built a shop which stood opposite the residence of Mrs. Margaret M. Smith, and carried on the business of manufacturing "stub-joints," but soon discontinued it. The shop has since been removed to the corner below, and was converted into a store by Mr. Carlos Blackman.

Carriage-building has been another of the village manufacturing interests. The firm of Nichols, Peck & Co. for several years carried on a large business in their extensive factories, and at one time largely supplied the Australian market. The business is at present conducted by David and Carlos Nichols.

Andrew Clark for several years had quite an extensive carriage-manufactory. The buildings were situated on a small lot just north of the house of Wm.

Beers. Mr. Clark built the residence now owned by Mrs. G. B. Ambler, and lived there for several years.

The mercantile interests of the village have never advanced farther than the "country-store." The first one was kept by Robert Nichols, the father of the late Prosper Nichols, Esq., and grandfather of Lucius C. Nichols. The building stood near his house, on what is known as the cross-road, on the estate of Prosper Nichols.

For many years Ira Nichols, Esq., son of Robert, stood behind his counter and sold goods in a store which was attached to the east end of the brick carriage-factory of Nichols, Peck & Co.

A store has been kept for some forty years on the same stand by Oliver E. Plumb, Esq. This and the one kept by Henry B. Curtis, Esq., are the only ones in the village at the present time.

In the fall of 1865 the old shop which Mr. Peet erected for a stub-joint factory was purchased and moved to the corner above Trinity church by Carlos Blackman, Esq. In October of that year a store was opened in this building by Messrs. Samuel A. Patterson and Carlos Blackman, under the name of Blackman & Patterson. The firm did a large business for two years, when they sold out to Messrs. A. B. Fairchild and H. B. Curtis, who transacted business under the firm-name of Fairchild & Curtis. About a year after, Mr. Fairchild sold out to Mr. Curtis, who continued business at the old stand until the fall of 1870, at which time Mr. Blackman sold the premises to William H. Payne, who remodeled the building to its present condition and continued the business for about five years, when he moved to Bridgeport, having exchanged the property with the late Monson Evitts. At this time Mr. Henry B. Curtis returned from the store of Mrs. Shelton Nichols, whither he moved at the transfer to Mr. Payne, and has since continued to transact business at the old stand.

PARLOR ROCK.

Up the Housatonic Railroad about eight miles from Bridgeport, between the old towns of Long Hill and Stepney, this spot of beauty lies embowered between verdant woodland hills. Through it runs a lovely streamlet, winding, now falling over the steep stone walls of the dam, and soon after recovering from the foam and eddy and whirl spreading out into its former glossy smoothness, and then passing under a suspension-bridge and down a wild, rocky, precipitous gorge, rumbling and roaring and passing off out of sight, a foamy, heaving current, into a wild cove far below. Down at the foot of this second cataract rises the steep, bold, overhanging mass of solid rock at the base of which, close by the boiling, rocky-bedded current of the streamlet, lies a large, oblong, flat surface of rock, which is Parlor Rock, and a more romantic, picturesque, cool, and lovely sylvan retreat it would be difficult to name in Connecticut. This is but a fraction of the attractions. The grove flanks the stream and its cascades, and is a shady bower thickly studded with tall hemlocks, shady and picturesque. In the grove are croquet-grounds, swings, etc. On the mossy brink of the stream lie fancy boats awaiting the pleasure of whoever would row about, a means of access to many a rural retreat and pretty bower.

Wander where you will, nature has many charming secrets and romantic situations to disclose. Huge bowlders, venerable, lichen-covered, and gray, stand like aged guardians, grim and massive, at many a point along the paths. It was three years ago that the Housatonic Railroad Company purchased this pretty spot and converted it to its present use, since which time it has been constantly improved, and many thousands of people of Fairfield and Litchfield Counties have spent some day there fraught with pleasure and enjoyment. The Berkshire region in the old Bay State, which it penetrates, well deserves the name it has been given of "The Switzerland of America." The landscapes are exceedingly beautiful, and the eye is constantly surprised and delighted with ever-varying romantic and picturesque views, scenes which have enlisted the muse of a Bryant and inspired the pen of many a writer.

THE FAIRCHILD FAMILY.

In England the name of Fairchild is of ancient origin. On the family crest there are three crescents, which signify three prisoners taken in the Holy Land, and three birds, martlets, indicating three pilgrimages to the Holy Land by some one by the name of Fairchild, or Fairbairn, as it is in Scotland, whence the family is said originally to have passed into England. The pilgrimages and captives, of course, refer back to the Crusaders.

Thomas Fairchild, the first of the name in this country, came from England and settled in Stratford, Fairfield Co., the year 1639. Was a representative man of his day; is said by Barber and by Hollister to have been the first magistrate in the town.

Joseph Fairchild, the eldest son of Thomas Fairchild by his second wife, was born 1664 and died 1713. He was a farmer, owned lands in Stratford and in the town of Durham; he married Johanna, daughter of Deacon Timothy Wilcoxson. His son, Timothy Fairchild, was born in Stratford, 1687. He married Sarah Humphrey, Nov. 15, 1715.

Daniel Fairchild was the son of Timothy Fairchild, born in Stratford, 1720. He married Hepzibah Lewis. They had a family of nine children. He was a man of more than ordinary education, being for many years a teacher. He was assistant commissary during the Revolutionary war, also held various other offices of trust and responsibility. Daniel Fairchild's second son was Lewis Fairchild, first, born March 14, 1746, in what was then called North Stratford, now Trumbull (Nichols' Farms); married Mary Ulford; was a farmer, and took an active part during the Revolutionary war. He died in 1817. Col. Lewis Fairchild, son of Lewis Fairchild, was the eldest of a family of six. He was born July, 1774; married Martha Nichols, daughter of Andrew Nichols. After this union were born the following: Bryant (deceased), Betsey (deceased), Daniel, Plumb N., Le Grand (deceased), Sarah A., Celina A., Julia A. (deceased). He was a farmer by occupation. During the year 1826 he entered into the business of manufacturing paper with his brothers, Reuben and Eben. They built the mill and were in partnership some ten years, when he retired from the business of paper-making, and was succeeded by his sons, Daniel and Plumb N. Mr. Fairchild died in 1850, aged seventy-six years.

Daniel Fairchild, son of Col. Lewis Fairchild, was born in Trumbull, Dec. 20, 1807. He remained on the farm until he was twenty, when he entered the paper-mill of his father, and in 1836 he entered the firm of Lewis Fairchild & Bros., which was changed to E. Fairchild & Co., and the firm continued under that title until 1847, when he and his brother Plumb N. bought out the remaining members of the firm, and it was then known as D. & P. N. Fairchild. Since 1861, Horace L., son of Daniel, has been identified with the firm, which is now known as D. & P. N. Fairchild & Co. This firm is one of the oldest in the county. It is extensively known for honorable dealings with all, and enterprise in carrying on business.

In politics Daniel Fairchild is a Republican. He has represented his town in the State Legislature, and has held the office of selectman and other town offices. He married Ann Eliza, daughter of Horace Hungerford, Sept. 11, 1833. They have had four children, three of whom are living.

Plumb Nichols Fairchild, son of Col. Lewis Fairchild, was born in Trumbull, Nov. 12, 1809. He remained on the farm until he was eighteen, during which time he acquired a common-school education. At eighteen he became interested in the paper business, and in 1836 was admitted to the firm, who, together with his brother Daniel, succeeded their father in the business. Mr. Fairchild still retains an interest in the business, but has retired from the active duties of the manufacturing, and devotes his time in part to his farm. He also holds the position of director of the Bridgeport National Bank, where he has been identified for twelve years. In politics he is a Republican, has been a member of the State Legislature, magistrate of the town, etc. He married, May, 1856, Jennett H., daughter of Charles F. Lewis, of Bridgeport.

EBEN FAIRCHILD.

Eben Fairchild was the youngest son of Lewis Fairchild, of Trumbull, Conn., and was born November, 1784, and died Sept. 13, 1865, aged eighty years, nine months, and seven days. He only had the advantages of a common-school education, and was then apprenticed to a cabinet firm in Danbury, Conn., to learn that trade, but on account of ill health did not continue long, but returned to Trumbull and joined his brother Reuben in the manufacture of saddle-trees, at the village of Nichols' Farms. The business was very successful. The principal markets were New York, Philadelphia, Hartford, and Bridgeport. May 30, 1817, they purchased the store and dock property at or near the foot of Wall Street, in the then borough of Bridgeport, and opened a store and ran in connection therewith packets to New York, Boston, and other places, doing a coasting business. At the commencement of the store business Eben moved to Bridgeport and had charge of the store and business there. Reuben continued in charge of the business at Nichols' Farms.

About the year 1818 they commenced the manufacturing of saddles in Bridgeport, taking Hanford Lyon and Lemuel Coleman into the firm, under the firm-name of Fairchild, Lyon & Co., with a branch house at Charleston, S. C.

This firm continued the business about nine years, when the Fairchilds (on account of being extensively engaged in other manufacturing enterprises) withdrew from the firm.

About the year 1826 they turned their attention to the manufacture of paper at Trumbull, associating their brother Lewis with them, under the firm-name of L. Fairchild & Bros. Eben then returned to Trumbull and lived near the paper-mill, and continued in the business about twenty years, or until 1847, when he disposed of his interest to his nephews, D. and P. N. Fairchild, who are still connected with the business. Eben married Betsey A. Nichols; they had no children. He moved to Bridgeport in 1847, purchasing the property corner of Main and Franklin Streets, where he lived a retired life until his death.

REUBEN FAIRCHILD.

Reuben Fairchild was the second son of Lewis Fairchild, of Trumbull, and brother of Lewis and Eben. He was born in 1782 and died Oct. 4, 1855, aged seventy-three years. His education was limited to the advantages of a common school. When a young man he was apprenticed to a cabinet firm and learned that trade, and soon after commenced the manufacture of saddle-trees, at Nichols' Farms, Trumbull, Conn., where he resided during his life. The business was very prosperous, and, taking his brother Eben in company with him, under the firm-name of R. & E. Fairchild, they soon had a very large business, with a demand for all they could produce. They continued in the business together until 1817, when Eben moved to Bridgeport and took charge of the business there.

Reuben became interested in the paper-manufacturing with his brothers, Lewis and Eben, in 1826, and continued with them for several years.

About the year 1836, Reuben commenced the manufacture of carriages, at what was then known as the stone factory, in Bridgeport, Conn., associating with him Messrs. Haight, Hurd, and Keeler, under the firm-name of Haight, Fairchild & Co. They continued until 1840, when Reuben withdrew from the business. From that time until his death he made farming his chief occupation. He married Anna Hawley. Of this union were born the following children,—viz., Caroline, Elizabeth, Mary Ann, Starr (deceased), Lewis (deceased), and Charles N.

Charles Nichols Fairchild was born in Trumbull, Oct. 27, 1818. He was educated at the Nichols' Farms district school. He learned the trade of carriage-manufacturing in Bridgeport, and afterwards engaged in the manufacture at Nichols' Farms, but soon withdrew, and has since followed the occupation of a practical farmer. He has held many important town offices and represented the town in the State Legislature. In politics he is a Democrat. He married for his first wife Louisa Beach, daughter of Alfred Beach, of Trumbull Centre. Of this union they had two sons, Henry Charles and Alfred Beach, who are living and doing business in the city of Bridgeport, Conn. Aug. 13, 1845, Mrs. Charles Fairchild died, aged twenty-four years. He was then married to Mary B., daughter of S. O. Banks, of Easton, Conn. They have two children, Laura Frances and Erwin Starr, who are now living at Nichols' Farms.

LE GRAND GREGORY BEERS.

Le Grand Gregory Beers was born in Long Hill, in the town of Trumbull, Dec. 12, 1819, and traces back his paternal ancestry nearly four hundred years. His lineal ancestor first in America was Anthony Beers, who came from England in 1635 and settled in Watertown, Mass., and subsequently removed to Roxbury, Mass., and later to Fairfield, Conn. Barnabas Beers, son of Anthony, was born in Roxbury, Mass., in 1658, and while a boy removed with his father to Fairfield, Conn. Elnathan Beers, son of Barnabas, married Anna Beach, then living in the part of Stratford now included in Trumbull, and removed to that place early in the last century. Peter Beers, son of Elnathan, and great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in Trumbull, as was also his grandfather James Beers, and his father Philo Beers. His mother, Charita Gregory, was daughter of Daniel Gregory, a substantial farmer formerly residing in Trumbull.

Mr. Beers was educated at the district school in Long Hill, the Easton Academy, and Beardley's select school in Monroe, Conn. During his whole life, with the exception of one year, he has lived on his ancestral homestead in Trumbull. He was bred a farmer and has mostly followed that occupation, but was engaged in teaching a portion of the time for some fifteen years.

In 1845 he was married to Hepsa A. Edwards, daughter of Levi Edwards, for many years a merchant and prominent resident of Stepney, in the town of Monroe. He has three daughters and two sons,—Adaline Louisa, who is married to Theodore W. Beach, of Bridgeport, Frances Helena, Sarah Eliza, Rollin Edwards, and Fred. Louis.

Mr. Beers has during the greater part of his life been prominently identified with the public affairs of his town, and has taken an active part in local transactions and controversies and held many public offices. He was a member of the board of school visitors for thirty consecutive years, and several years acting visitor. He has been justice of the peace for twenty-two consecutive years, and during that time has tried most of the justice court cases brought in his town. He has, at different times been constable, selectman, assessor of taxes, registrar of births, marriages, and deaths, registrar of voters, and auditor of town accounts. He represented his town in the State Legislature in 1861, and the Tenth Senatorial District in 1870. He was appointed county commissioner by the Legislature in the spring session of 1876, and held the office three years. He has been intrusted with the settlement of many estates in the capacity of administrator, executor, and assignee, and has frequently performed the duties of appraiser, distributor, arbitrator, and conservator.

Mr. Beers has for many years taken an active part in politics, and has often been delegate to the different political conventions of his party, and has several times presided over the congressional, senatorial, and Probate conventions. His time is now occupied with attention to his farm, and to such public business as is intrusted to him. During his memory Long Hill has grown from a few scattered unpainted houses to a pleasant country village, with some fifty neat residences, with handsome surroundings, two churches, stores, and several flourishing manufactories.

MILES BEARDSLEY.

Miles Beardsley, son of Stephen and Catharine Beardsley, was born on the place where he now resides in the town of Trumbull, Fairfield Co., Conn., Jan. 18, 1810.

Stephen Beardsley, son of David Beardsley, was born in Trumbull, March 20, 1763; married, March 2, 1791, Catharine Beardsley, who was born March 2, 1770, in the town of Monroe.

They had five sons, four of whom lived to adult age,—namely, Samuel, Stephen M. Hall, who died at the age of fourteen years, Sheldon, and Miles, all of whom are deceased except Miles. He was a carpenter and joiner in early life; afterwards he became a farmer. In politics he was a Democrat, and as such was elected to the Legislature and served there a number of terms, was a magistrate for a number of years, and settled several estates.

Mr. and Mrs. Beardsley were members of the Congregational Church, and he was deacon of the same. He died Feb. 8, 1849, aged eighty-six years, and his wife died July 22, 1850, aged eighty years.

Miles Beardsley worked on his father's farm until he was seventeen years of age, when he commenced life as a merchant at the same place where he is still doing business.

At the age of twenty-one he opened a public-house, which he carried on in connection with the store until the completion of the Housatonic Railroad, which materially changed travel. He still owns the old homestead, with its one hundred acres.

He was postmaster for a long time, succeeding his father and brother Samuel. He has been a director of the City National Bank of Bridgeport since its organization, and was elected to the Legislature in 1848. In politics he is a Democrat.

He is a regular attendant and liberal supporter of the Congregational Church.

He married Eloisa, daughter of John Nichols, of Trumbull, Jan. 18, 1832. She was born Nov. 18, 1809, in Trumbull. They have three children,—viz., Marriette C., who married James C. Johnson, of Monroe; Elliot M.; and Susan E., who married Marcus O. Wheeler, of Trumbull. Mrs. Beardsley died Sept. 18, 1867.

The Beardsley family is probably one of the oldest in the county, some of the name being among the first colonists, and many of the family have held the highest positions of honor and trust in the county. Mr. Beardsley has been very successful in all his business relations, is a good neighbor, and a kind friend.

ELLIOT MILES BEARDSLEY.

Elliot Miles Beardsley, son of Miles and Eloisa Beardsley, was born in Trumbull, Conn., Sept. 26, 1838. He attended the common school until he was twelve years of age, when he went to a select school, then to the State Normal school at New Britain, where he acquired an academic education. Commenced teaching at seventeen years of age, which he followed until he was twenty-one, having taught in Savannah, Ga., one year, since which he has been engaged in farming, and in rendering assistance in his father's store.

He married, June 3, 1863, Mary S. Beardsley, daughter of Ezra Beardsley. She was born July 16, 1841.

In politics he is a Democrat. He represented his town in the State Legislature in 1879, and was on the Committee of Cities and Boroughs. He has been school inspector for four years of the town of Trumbull. He has often been a delegate to town and county conventions, chairman of the town committee of the Democratic party for several years past, and still holds the same position.

His wife is a member of the Episcopal Church, and he is a regular attendant of the same.

DAVID SHELTON EDWARDS,

MEDICAL DIRECTOR, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The late Surgeon David Shelton Edwards, the subject of this sketch, sprung from a sturdy English-American stock which has given many notable men to this county, was the son of Hezekiah Edwards, of Trumbull, Conn., and was born at Chestnut Hill, Trumbull (near Bridgeport), June 22, 1794.

In early life he evinced a taste for the pursuit of knowledge. He graduated at Yale College in 1814 and entered upon the study of medicine, and after completing the required course and practicing for a short time in New Haven he solicited for and received an appointment in the United States navy as surgeon's mate (the title of this grade was afterwards changed to assistant-surgeon), July 30, 1818. His first service was in the "Alert" (18), but he was soon transferred to the frigate "Congress" (44), Capt. John D. Henley, and served in her during a cruise in the China seas. While the ship was at Manilla that port was visited by the Asiatic cholera, then to Europeans a new disease, and the young surgeon gained a vast amount of knowledge in its treatment, which enabled him to afterwards benefit his own countrymen when the dread scourge visited New York in 1832.

In 1822 he was attached to the schooner "Grampus" (12), this vessel being one of a squadron fitted out under the command of Com. David D. Porter for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies. In a fight with the pirates, which took place off the coast of Cuba, in which five piratical vessels were captured or destroyed, Dr. Edwards was severely wounded. He was temporarily attached to the steamer "Fulton" in 1823, and in September of the same year joined the "Eric" (18), and went to the Mediterranean. In 1824 he acted as surgeon of the schooner "Nonsuch" (2), and in 1825 was granted a leave of absence, which was the first after seven years' continuous service.

May 5, 1825, he was appointed to the rank of surgeon, and in 1826 was ordered to the "Boston" (18), and in her made a cruise of nearly four years on the Brazilian and African stations.

In 1830 he was attached to the rendezvous at New York, and it was during this time that the Asiatic cholera made its appearance. In 1832, at the request of the leading citizens, he was appointed to take charge of the cholera hospital at that city, being absolutely the only physician in the country who had actual experience in the treatment of that disease. It is not too much to say that the services and skill of Dr. Edwards were a priceless boon to citizens of New York and adjoining cities.

In 1834 he was attached to the naval hospital at Pensacola, Fla., and in 1835 to the "Talmouth" (18), and afterwards, in 1836, to the "St. Louis" (20), when, in June, 1837, he became, through the death of Surgeon Leonard Osborne, fleet-surgeon of the West India squadron, and joined the flag-ship "Constellation" (36), Com. Alexander J. Dallas.

In 1839 he was attached to the navy-yard, Washington, and in 1841 to the steamer "Fulton" (4), employed at New York on experimental gun service.

In 1843 he was placed on waiting orders for a short time, and then ordered to the "North Carolina" (74); waiting orders in 1846, and in 1847 was ordered to duty with the marine battalion, then under orders to Mexico, and entered on the most important and brilliant service of his life, forming, as he did, a member of that glorious army which Gen. Scott led to the capture of the City of Mexico.

In 1847 he became the medical director of the brigade commanded by Gen. Franklin Pierce, and contracted a friendship with the future President of the United States which lasted through life.

He participated in the siege and capture of Vera Cruz, in the engagements of Santa Fé, National Bridge, Tres Rios, and in August, 1847, at Pueblo, he was appointed medical director of the division of Gen. Quitman, ten thousand strong, en route for the City of Mexico. He participated in the battles of Contreras, Chapultepec, and the City of Mexico. He was in charge of the general hospital of San Agostino, and acted as inspector of the sick and wounded previous to their return to the United States.

In 1848 he was stationed at the marine rendezvous, New York, and in 1849-50 served as fleet-surgeon of the West India squadron on board the "Raritan," Com. Foxhall A. Parker, Sr. From 1851 to 1854 he was employed on duty at the rendezvous, New York, and from 1854 to 1857 he was attached to the navy-yard, Washington.

In 1857 he joined the steam-frigate "Merrimac" (40), commanded by Com. Long, as fleet-surgeon of the Pacific squadron. While in Valparaiso he was taken ill with a disease which undoubtedly shortened his life.

During his illness he was several times at the point of death, and he was sent back to the United States as an invalid, and we find him in 1860 on leave of absence.

During the great Rebellion, Dr. Edwards, though sixty-seven years of age and technically retired in consequence of his age and long years of service for his country, yet served from 1861 to 1864 as surgeon of the naval rendezvous at New Bedford, Mass., from whence went hundreds of noble men to fight the battles of the country under Farragut, Porter, and others. In 1865 we find him on active duty on the "Rhode Island," at Mobile.

In 1869 he was president of the Board of Medical Examiners and member of the Naval Retiring Board, and continued on that board until the spring of 1873, when by law all retired officers were excluded from active duty except in time of war. On the 3d of March, 1871, he had attained the relative rank of commodore on the retired list, after a total service of fifty-four years and five months.

On March 18, 1874, he died at his residence, Chestnut Hill, town of Trumbull.

Dr. Edwards, to speak briefly, was one of the most distinguished medical officers the United States navy ever bore on its rolls, and his record was an unexceptionably noble one,—a long career of faithful service to his country and to humanity. Whether in the rush and din of battle or in the deadly quiet of the cholera hospital, he evinced at all times courage in action and skill and devotion to duty. In private life his career was no less honorable, pure, and blameless; in his daily walks charitable beyond measure, devoted to his friends and beloved by all; simple-hearted and devoted to his religious faith, a long career of usefulness was finally ended by a Christian man's death.

Dr. Edwards was descended from a race of extraordinary longevity. His father lived to the age of ninety-four, and his grandfather, David Edwards, to the age of ninety-six, while his mother was ninety-two when she died, and her father was ninety-six.

The Edwards family traces its descent from Rhoecrik the Great, King of Wales, and the family arms are gules á chevron between three roses argent. Crest, lion's head raised ermines between two palm-branches proper, with this motto, in Welsh: "Hob, dduw, Heb, ddim, duw, allgu," or, in English, "Everything with God, nothing without God."

JOHN E. SUMMERS.

But very little is known of the early history of this family of Summers. They are undoubtedly of English origin, and settled somewhere in the New England States at a very early day.

John E. Summers is the son of Anson Summers and Abby G. Smith, and grandson of Capt. Elijah Summers, who was engaged for a number of years as captain of a vessel running between Black Rock and Boston, and who died at the age of twenty-nine. He was born in Bridgeport, Conn., Sept. 4, 1827. His father was a small farmer, and often worked out by the day. His father died in 1836, at the early age of thirty-eight, leaving a wife, who still survives him, and three sons, Elijah F., John E., and George M.

John E. was early thrown on his own resources. He remained at home on the farm until he was seventeen years of age, when he began to learn the boot and shoe trade, which he followed till he was twenty-one. In March, 1849, he went to California by the way of Cape Horn, and remained some three years; while there he was successfully engaged in mining.

In 1853 he returned home, and was engaged for the following twelve years in the manufacture of paper with Messrs D. & P. N. Fairchild and D. B. Hinman. During this time he bought a farm, which he sold in due time, and purchased in 1866 his present beautiful farm-house, which he has greatly improved since he owned it. It contains some one hundred acres of choice land, which is in good state of cultivation. In politics he has been a life-long Democrat.

He married Henrietta, daughter of Elisha Neal, of Woodbridge, Conn., Feb. 12, 1857. They have two daughters,—viz., Ida G. and Bertha.

ANDREW TAIT.

THE GOLDEN WEDDING IN TRUMBULL.

The green fields, smiling meadows, waving woods, and good people of Old Trumbull have experienced a genuine sensation, and one the memory of which will linger long with those who immediately participated in its scenes. On Friday, the 14th of June, 1872, occurred the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Tait, at Tait's Mills, about three-quarters of a mile above Trumbull church. A full carload of friends and relatives left Bridgeport by the 10.15 A.M. train on the Housatonic road, and, by the kindness of the conductor, were put off at the mills instead of at Trumbull church, thereby saving a considerable distance. From the railroad to the family mansion was a romantic walk through a beautiful wood, over the picturesque rustic bridge which spans the Pequonnoek River below the dam, past the mill, and up a gentle declivity. The Tait mansion, built on the good old plan of "more for comfort than for show," is a model of a commodious and pleasant Connecticut homestead, and stands on an elevated knoll surrounded by the broad acres of a fine farm, with an ample yard in front, shaded by beautiful and wide-spreading maples. Here the Bridgeport delegation found a large number of friends and relatives already arrived, and here they greeted Mr. Andrew Tait and his wife, who had on this day completed the full half-century of wedded happiness.

Mr. Tait was born in Scotland, six miles south of Edinburgh, Jan. 27, 1799, was a paper-maker by trade, and served his full time as an apprentice at that employment. Thinking to better himself in America, and having a liking for republican institutions, in August, 1820, he emigrated to America, going to Morris Co., N. J., where he worked a year at his trade, going thence to Hartford, New Haven, and other places, till finally, in 1827, he came to Trumbull, where he superintended the building of the well-known paper-mill of the Messrs. Fairchild, and where he remained in the employ of that firm a number of years. While in the vicinity of Hartford he found himself in a situation to send home to Scotland for his sweetheart, who was Miss Bella Ronaldson, and who crossed the ocean alone to marry him, making the difficult and tedious passage in six weeks and four days. Immediately after her arriving in this country the then young couple were married, June 14, 1822. After leaving the employ of the Messrs. Fairchild, Mr. Tait commenced business for himself in a small way, marbling paper for bookbinders' use, and finally, in 1836, came to his present location and commenced the building now known as Tait's Mills, where some of the best straw-board known to the trade is still manufactured under the supervision of Mr. Andrew Tait and his son Mr. William Tait. His business career has been marked by industry, frugality, and the integrity of an upright Christian man, and he has been prospered even as was Abdel Hassan:

"And his life of peaceful labor,
In its pure and simple ways,
For all loss fourfold returned him,
And a mighty length of days.

"Seventy years of faith and patience
Gave him Wisdom's mural crown;
Sons and daughters brought him honor
With his riches and renown."

Although Mr. Tait was seventy-three and his wife seventy-two, yet so hale and hearty did the old couple appear as they received the congratulations of their numerous descendants that it was no great stretch of the imagination to expect that they would yet keep their diamond wedding in the same family mansion where they were then receiving the congratulations of their children and their children's children, "even to the third and fourth generation."

The following is the record of Mr. and Mrs. Tait's immediate family: The oldest child was Nancy, now Mrs. Plumb Hoyt, of New York; the next was William Tait, now in the paper-board business with his father at "the mills;" next, Mary E. (Mrs. J. M. Prindle, of Bridgeport); next, Dr. John Tait, of Meriden, Conn.; next, Bella (died in 1851); and last, Fannie, now at home.

In spite of the protestations of Mr. Tait that he did not want any presents, a large number of valuable and useful articles found their way into the house and were collected on a table in one of the parlors, making a very handsome display.

His wife died May 22, 1875. Mr. and Mrs. Tait have been members of the Congregational Church for a great many years. Mr. Tait is a Republican in politics.

WILLIAM TAIT.

William Tait, son of Andrew Tait, and grandson of Andrew Tait, was born in East Hartford, Conn., on the 29th of May, 1824. His advantages for an education were confined to the common school winters, and working with his father in the paper-mill during the summers at marbling paper. This continued until he was twenty-one years of age, when he worked one year for seventy-five dollars and board. The summer he was twenty-two he spent in Iowa, returning in the fall sick. After his return he began business with his father marbling paper, which he continued until 1849, when he went to California and there engaged in mining till 1851, when he returned and went into business marbling paper with his father, under the firm-name of A. Tait & Son. This they continued until 1856, when they commenced the manufacture of straw-board paper which is said to command the very highest price in the market.

He married Grace Camp, daughter of Isaac Camp and Elizabeth Clark, May 31, 1848. Their children are William F., Isabella R., Andrew (2), and Elizabeth C.

In politics he is a Republican. He was a soldier in Company D, Twenty-third Regiment, Connecticut Volunteers, under Gen. Banks. He was mustered out of service Sept. 3, 1864.

Mr. and Mrs. Tait are members of the Congregational Church.

Their son, William F. Tait, was born Oct. 27, 1852, in Trumbull. He received an academic education. He married Mary E. Latten, daughter of Lyman and Lovisa Latten, June 3, 1875, by whom he has one daughter, Mary E.

Mr. Tait has been educated in the business followed by his father and grandfather, and in the year 1875, upon the retiring of his grandfather, Andrew Tait, from the business, he became a partner with his father, under the firm-name of Tait & Son. He is a Republican in politics, and a member of the Congregational Church.

GEORGE DYER, M.D.

The subject of this sketch was born in Windham, Conn., August, 1802. He was a son of Benjamin Dyer, a druggist in Windham, and grandson of Eliphalet Dyer (Y. C., 1749), a member of Congress from Connecticut, and afterwards chief justice of the State.

He began the study of medicine with Dr. Chester Hunt, of Windham, and after taking his degree established himself in practice in Greenfield Hill, Conn., but, not finding a good opening there, removed about 1832 to the town of Trumbull, Fairfield Co., Conn, where he continued in active practice for forty years. As a physician he took a high rank among the leading physicians in the county, and is highly spoken of as a man by his neighbors. He was attacked about five years before his death with softening of the brain, and gradually failed in mental and physical strength. He was deeply interested in everything that had for its object the improvement of his community.

He took an interest in local politics, and once represented the town of Trumbull in the State Legislature. On the 12th of June, 1866, he married Lucinda L., daughter of Philo Booth and Anna Beach.

He died May 8, 1878, leaving his wife, who now, (1880) survives him. She was born on the farm where she now resides, Feb. 4, 1814.

FREDERICK S. STERLING.

Among the early pioneers of this county is to be found the Sterling family. Very little is known of their early history. The first of whom we have any knowledge was Sylvanus Sterling, who died Jan. 6, 1781, aged forty years. His wife Ester died July 16, 1811, aged seventy-four years. They had six children,—viz., Eunice, Elijah, Philip, Nathaniel, Gordon, and Jesse, all of whom were born in the town of Trumbull.

Elijah Sterling was born in 1766, and died June 16, 1844. His wife Anna was born in 1767, and died Sept. 19, 1851. Their children were as follows,—viz., Nancy, Sylvanus, Elam, Starr, Lucetta, Sherwood, and Betsey Ann.

Elam Sterling was born in the town of Trumbull, Conn., in 1791, and died July 22, 1861. He married Susan, daughter of Frederick and Hannah (Edwards) Hunt, Sept. 6, 1829. Elam Sterling was for many years engaged in the coasting business, which he carried on between Boston and New York and the intermediate points. Later in life he was a farmer. He was town clerk of Trumbull for several years and a member of the Congregational Church.

Mrs. Sterling was born Dec. 6, 1801, and still retains very much of the vigor of youth. She too is a member of the Congregational Church.

Frederick S., son of Elam Sterling, was born in Trumbull, Fairfield Co., Conn., Oct. 12, 1830. His advantages for an education were such as the common schools of his day afforded. He remained at home until he was seventeen years of age, when he began to learn the coach-making business, which he followed four years, when he commenced working on the Housatonic Railroad as fireman; and after nine months he ran an engine one year on the same road, then was engaged for a short time on the Naugatuck Railroad, and two years on the New York Central, running from Albany to Utica. In 1856 he returned home, since which time he has been engaged in farming. On the 27th of March, 1855, he married Anna M. Duckels, by whom he has one daughter, Anna Lucetta. Mrs. Sterling was born in England, March 5, 1834, and came to America with her parents in 1836 and settled in New York City. Mr. Sterling is a Democrat in politics, and one of the representative men of his town. He has been assessor, magistrate, and selectman, besides holding other minor offices.

Albert S Coan

THE subject of this notice is of German extraction, and was born in Bridgewater, Litchfield Co., Conn., Aug. 11, 1803. It is related that a great many years ago a wealthy German by the name of Coan left Germany in company with two of his sons, who were small boys. On their way to this country Mr. Coan was murdered, his body thrown overboard, and all his money stolen. One of the boys went South, and nothing has been heard of him or of any of his descendants; the other boy lived with a man on Long Island by the name of Mulford. In due time he married and had a family of children, one of whom he named Mulford Coan, which has since continued to be a family name. Albert S. Coan is a lineal descendant of the fifth or sixth generation from the above son named Mulford.

His father, Sylvanus Coan, youngest son of Mulford Coan, was born in Killingsworth, Conn. He was a cooper and farmer. He married for his second wife Lucy A. Munger. Of this union four children were born, two of whom are now (1880) living.

About 1813 he settled in Oswego Co., State of New York, where he continued to reside until his death. He was magistrate of his town for several years, and a prominent member of the Baptist Church. He died at the age of eighty years, May 27, 1859.

Mulford Coan was born in Killingsworth, Conn., in 1739. Settled in Woodbury when his son Sylvanus was eighteen years of age. He died April 28, 1821.

Albert S. Coan remained at home until he was ten years of age, when he was put out to a man by the name of Mathew Logan, where he continued to reside, working on the farm, until he was eighteen years of age. His advantages for an education were very limited indeed, but by that indomitable energy that has always characterized him through life he has obtained a good practical education. He continued to work on the farm until he was twenty years of age, when he commenced to learn the boot and shoe trade, which he followed twelve years during the winters, and working on the farm summers. He then worked a farm on shares for some six years, after which he purchased one in Woodbury, Litchfield Co., Conn., and remained there until he came to Trumbull, Fairfield Co., in 1815, when he settled on the farm where he now resides. He married Sarah Ann Thomas, Dec. 6, 1824. She was born March 19, 1803, and died May 29, 1839.

Of this union there were the following children, —viz., William W. (deceased); Henry F.; Sarah A.; and Albert M. (deceased).

He married for his second wife Abby B. Burgess, Jan. 1, 1840. She was born May 10, 1809, in Morris, Litchfield Co., Conn. They have one son, Wesley B., born March 21, 1842, in Litchfield, Conn.

Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Coan are members of the Congregational Church of Trumbull Centre. Mr. Coan has always been a life-long Democrat of the Jeffersonian school. He has been assessor of his town, delegate to town and county conventions, and member of the State Legislature in 1868. His sons Henry F. and Albert M. were soldiers in Company D, Twenty-third Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, under Gen. Banks.

SAMUEL SEELEY.

The first Samuel Seeley that we know of was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and was killed at the battle of Ridgefield, Conn., during that memorable struggle. His wife was Sarah Silliman, and to them were born the following children,—viz., Jesse, Abijah, Jeremiah, Catherine, Daniel, and Samuel, all born in the town of Easton, Conn.

Daniel Seeley was born Oct. 14, 1773; married Ruth Silliman, of Easton, March 31, 1803. Their children were Julia, Eliza, Emily, Samuel, and Marietta. Daniel was a school-teacher when a young man, and later in life was a farmer. In politics a Whig. He was a magistrate for several years, and during that time settled several estates. He was a member of the State Legislature one term. He died May 14, 1852, and his wife died Feb. 22, 1845. Eliza married Timothy W. Godfrey, of Wilton. Samuel was born Sept. 2, 1814; married Josephine, daughter of Timothy W. Godfrey, May 20, 1856. He was a teacher and farmer. In politics a Republican. He died Nov. 23, 1874. His children are as follows,—viz., Ida L., Effie M., Charles B., Mary S., Samuel G., and Dasie J.

Emily was born Oct. 22, 1807, in Trumbull, and has always resided on the home farm. To her is due the credit of inserting this brief sketch and the portrait of her honored brother Samuel. Marietta married Francis Austin, and resides in Suffield, Mass.

until 1874, when he turned his attention to the dairy business, selling his milk in the city of Bridgeport. In 1879 he erected on his farm a most excellent wind-mill, which not only pumps all the water needed for his stock, but also grinds all the feed he can use. He is a Democrat in politics. Mr. and Mrs. Mallett are members of the Episcopal Church. Mr. Mallett has been twice married, first to Lucy C., daughter of John Foster, Oct. 6, 1856. Of this union he has one daughter, Carrie C. His wife died April 13, 1861, and he married, for his second wife, Sarah E., daughter of Philo Wooster, March 16, 1864. They have one son, Robert C., who is at home with his parents.

AARON SHERWOOD.

Aaron Sherwood, son of Gershom Sherwood and grandson of Daniel Sherwood, was born in the town of Redding, Fairfield Co., Conn., on the 8th of March, 1817. His father was a native of Easton, Conn., where he engaged in farming. He married Laura Darling and had four children, of whom Aaron was the eldest. In politics he was a Whig and Republican. He held various offices of trust, among which we mention those of selectman, magistrate, and member of the Assembly. He settled in Yates Co., N. Y., a few years before his death, which occurred in his eighty-third year. His father, Daniel, lived and died in Easton, Fairfield Co., Conn. Aaron Sherwood remained at home until he was forty years of age, when he went to Chicago, Ill., and was there successfully engaged in the commission business three years; thence he went to Niles, Mich., and engaged in the distilling business four years, sold his interest, and returned to Fairfield County, and located in the town of Bridgeport, on the place now owned by G. F. Gilman. In the fall of 1877 he purchased his present beautiful home, situated in the town of Trumbull, on the Newtown turnpike, about five and a half miles from Bridgeport. It contains some twenty-six acres of good land, and the buildings with the surroundings are the most attractive of any in the town, a view of which may be seen elsewhere in this work. He is a Republican in politics. He married Jane A., daughter of Nash Couch, of Redding, Feb. 28, 1848. She was born in Redding, July 13, 1816. They have two children, viz., Mary J. and William H.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

WESTON.

Geographical—Topographical—Surface—Soil—The Pioneers—Congregational Church—Church Discipline—Military Academy—Civil History—First Town-Meeting—Representatives from 1788 to 1880—Military Record.

THE town of Weston lies south of the centre of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Redding; on the east by Easton and Fairfield; on the south by Westport and Fairfield; and on the west by Wilton. It has an irregular surface, and is strictly an agricultural town. The soil is fertile.

The town was early settled by pioneers from Fairfield, of which town it formed a part. The following were here (including Easton) as early as 1787: Nathan Wheeler, Samuel Wakeman, Abel Hull, John Sherwood, David Coley, Jr., Nathan Wheeler, Benjamin Dean, William Prince, Josiah G. Leavitt, Benjamin Dean, Ephraim French, Albert Lockwood, Squire Adams, John S. Andrews, Joseph Banks, Nehemiah Cable, Zebulon Fanton, Christopher Godfrey, Seeley Squire, Daniel Adams, Jr., Jonathan Bradley, Seth Price, Abel Hull, Lloyd Wakeman, Robert Harris, Samuel Wakeman, Thomas S. Collyer, Thankfull Platt, Nath. Seeley, Benjamin Dean, Samuel Thorp, David Silliman, David Bradley, Thaddeus Gilbert, Hezekiah Banks, Ebenezer Bixby, Nathaniel Hubbell.

Among the old families of Weston are the Godfreys, Coleys, Andrews, Wakemans, Rowlands, Bulkleys, and Sturges. The first Godfrey immigrated to Fairfield between 1660 and 1670. Probably before 1700 Daniel Godfrey married a daughter of Robert Silliman and settled in the Fairfield Northwest parish. They had several children; one son bore the name of both families, Silliman Godfrey, who is the direct ancestor of all those of that name in that section. He married Mary Goodsell. They were the parents of several children, one of whom, Silliman, Jr., was a pillar and active support in the Norfield Church, in which he was deacon and chorister.

The Coleys are numerous. They also are in Westport, so that not far from the boundary-line between that town and Weston a part of the town is called Coleyville. Among the leading ones are David and Lewis Coley; they own large, commodious farm-houses built after the style of architecture of the period, and own good farms. On one of them is the field where Weston was accustomed to assemble its men to obey the laws regulating the militia, which met the first Monday in May to drill, from which the old custom originated.

"First Monday in May,— Training-day."

The original towns had a parade-ground, denominated "the green," which has been reserved to the public ever since; but the town of Weston, contemporary with others of later organizations, had not that necessity, therefore they resorted to private grounds.

Weston was originally a large township. In another town was severed from it and called Easton, therefore there seems to be some confusion in tracing families and property. Many of the dead are recorded on that account in Weston, but on looking for them to-day, one must go in many cases to Easton; the same fact applies to property. The graveyard of Weston lies not far from this parade-ground, and contains the bodies of some of the staunchest of the Puritan fathers, men of "cast-iron principles," who were fervent in piety and patriotism. Of the descendants of Job Perry, in Weston, are Miah Perry, who represented the town in the State Legislature of 1876, and Sally, wife of Joseph R. Andrews.

Weston being an inland town, with a very limited transient foreign population, it has not had occasion to notice the inroads of communism, socialism, party intrigues, illegal government appropriations, and the inroads of the Church inconsistent with the Constitution of the land, therefore it holds to the faith, integrity, and politics of its ancestors, and is, in consequence, Democratic.

As a natural curiosity, Weston has the Devil's Den, — a name given to a wooded valley in which is a stone with the imprint of a foot too large for modern men. Tradition says that when the devil was wont to walk about the earth in human form he stepped on this clay, then in a plastic state, so that the indentation was complete. In time this clay hardened into stone, which gave rise to various theories. This den is of much resort, especially in the huckleberry season, this being a ground prolific with that fruit. The scenery from here to the Sound is extremely romantic, especially over the old Forge road.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The first meeting of the society of Norfield was held June 23, 1757. This must have been soon after the parish was set off as an ecclesiastical society, for it is said that it was legally warned by a writ given out by Robert Walker, Esq., justice of the peace for the county of Fairfield.

A vote was passed May 10, 1758, to build a meeting-house thirty by forty feet. It appears that before the building was raised application was made to the County Court for a committee to fix the stakes, which was accordingly done. The house was raised and covered by Dec. 7, 1758. A pulpit and pews and body-seats were erected, but nothing was done to the galleries and the house was never plastered.

Dec. 6, 1784, it was voted to build a new meeting-house when a committee appointed by the County Court should make the location, and the materials of the old house, so far as might answer the purpose, were to be wrought into the new one. Accordingly, the old house was taken down and the frame set up in the centre of the society and newly covered. The old doors, pews, and seats were replaced, the galleries were then finished, and the house plastered and painted.

July 4, 1757, it was voted to give Mr. Samuel Sherwood, of Fairfield, a call to settle with them, which call he accepted, and was ordained Aug. 17, 1757.

The church was organized with twelve male members, and soon nineteen more males and females were added to the church from neighboring churches. "Lieut. David Andrews and Ensign David Coley were chosen to the office of deacon and accepted."

These two worthy men served as long as their age permitted. They served through the ministry of Mr. Sherwood and a great part of Rev. Mr. Noyes'. Mr. Sherwood died May 25, 1783, aged fifty-three. He was succeeded by Rev. John Noyes, who served until May, 1837.

The following is the list of pastors from their time to the present: 1837-40, Rev. George Hull; 1842-43, Rev. Mark Weed; 1844-48, Rev. Lewis Pennel; 1851-72, Rev. Zalmon B. Burr; 1873-74, Rev. Joseph Nelson; 1875-79, Rev. E. H. Lubkert.

The church has no pastor at present. The church edifice was erected in 1830, and dedicated April 13, 1831.

The deacons since those mentioned above have been J. Platt, John Crossman, Ward Nichols, David L. Coley, and Hiram Seofield.

The church has a fund of $900. Donators: Daniel S. Godfrey, $400; John S. Andrews, $500. Present membership: Males, 27; females, 48.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

"COMPLAINT AGAINST DAVID B. GODFREY.

"To the moderator of the Church of Christ in Norfield, and to the said church, comes Jeremiah Rowland, a member of said church, and informs said moderator and church that David B. Godfrey, who is also a member of this church, has been guilty of the sin of intemperance, by which he has broken the laws of Christ and brought dishonor on the Christian profession, which has evidently been seen by several members of said church and others. Your complaint further says that private steps have been taken for convincing and reclaiming said David B. Godfrey, but he refuses to hearken; therefore, as in duty bound, he now tells it to the church, that his offending brother may be proceeded with according to the rules of the gospel. Dated in Norfield, this 5th day of August, 1823.

"JEREMIAH ROWLAND."

"The above was exhibited to the church on the Sabbath following, and a meeting of the church was appointed to be held on the 11th day of August instant to attend to the case. A copy of the complaint was sent to the delinquent and a citation to him to appear before the church to answer to it.

"The church met at the meeting-house, according to appointment, on the 11th day of August, 1823, for the purpose of attending to the above complaint. The meeting was opened with prayer by the moderator. The complaint was then read. After the reading of the complaint witnesses were called to prove the fact alleged in it. The accused did not appear. Hannah Lockwood, a member of the church, being called to testify in the case, declared that on Saturday, the 11th day of June last, she saw said Godfrey pass her house evidently in a state of intoxication, as appeared by his reeling on his horse. Sarah Bunnel was then called to testify in the case, and declared

GERSHOM W. BRADLEY.

GERSHOM W. BRADLEY was born March 3, 1804, in Fairfield, Conn. His father was Wakeman Bradley; his mother was Catharine Andrews.

His father was a manufacturer of edge-tools. He gave his son the common-school advantages of a rural district. Being the oldest son of a large family of children, he had to contribute his help for the family's support, dividing his time between the farm and the shop.

In 1812, the year of the war, his father established his axe and edge-tool factory at Weston. It was during this war that this neighborhood was visited by the British troops, and much public and private property destroyed, among others that of Mr. Bradley's relatives.

Beginning in a moderate way in making tools by hand, Mr. Bradley at this early day, by producing goods of superior merit, established a prosperous industry. In 1834, Mr. Gershom Bradley started a factory in the same line his father had begun at his present location in Weston.

As Mr. Bradley advanced in years his sons have entered into active assistance, and Miles, his eldest son, when the factory was destroyed by freshet in 1854, rebuilt and remodeled the works and put fresh life into the business, his father gradually resigning the care of affairs to him.

His other two sons, De Witt C. and Gershom W., are both engaged in the Bradley shops learning the details of the manufacture, and fitting themselves to perpetuate the good reputation which has always characterized the tools of this establishment.

In 1827, Mr. Bradley married Lydia Merwin, of Weston, by whom he had three sons,—Miles, George, and De Witt. Mrs. Bradley died in 1851. In 1853, Mr. Bradley married his second wife. Her maiden name was Mary J. Goodsell, of Westport, daughter of Silas B. Goodsell, of that town. She died in 1872. By this marriage five children were born, three of whom are now living,—viz., Gershom W., Eliza Jane, and Catharine A.

Mr. Bradley has been too modest a man to accept offices; he has had full occupation with his business.

He is an attendant of the Methodist church at Westport. Brought up a Democrat, but, after voting for Jackson on the occasion of his first candidacy, he left the Democratic party, and has since been a Whig and Republican.

He is well known as a kind neighbor, an industrious, frugal, and honest man. The war interrupted his business and involved heavy loss, but by energy and good management, aided by the superior business abilities of his son Miles, he has won success.

G. W. Bradley

that some time since said Godfrey, in passing by her house, fell from his horse, and that she and her daughter helped him on his horse again, and that his fall was evidently the effect of intoxication, and that he intimated as much by saying, 'You know my falling. I am not fit to do any business to-night.' That this was on a Saturday evening. Mrs. Lockwood was again called, and testified that her son Samuel told her that he and others were passing by and saw Mrs. Bunnel and her daughter help said Godfrey on his horse, and that this was the same afternoon, towards evening, that she saw him pass her house in the situation before mentioned. On hearing the evidence the church voted that the charge was supported.

"Voted, that the following written admonition be sent to said Godfrey by Brother Silliman Godfrey, Jr.:

"To David B. Godfrey, a member of the Church of Christ in Norfield: This church has this day taken into serious consideration a complaint exhibited against you for the sin of intemperance. We have heard testimony in support of the charge which we consider as ample proof that you are verily guilty, as alleged in the complaint. It gives us pain that you have walked so disorderly, and that you have so wounded Christ and your own soul. Earnestly desiring that you may be recovered out of the snare of Satan, and that you may yet do honor to the Christian profession by newness of life, we affectionately exhort you, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to consider how you have violated your covenant engagements, by which you are bound to live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world, how you have wounded your own precious soul, provoked God, and dishonored the Christian name. And we do now earnestly beseech you, and in the name of Christ exhort and charge you, as you will have to answer for yourself at the bar of God, that you delay not unfeignedly to repent of your sin, that you humble yourself before God and man, and that you henceforth walk in newness of life. This admonition is not given you out of any ill-will to your person (as the Lord knoweth), but in love to your soul and in obedience to Christ Jesus, who has made it our duty to watch over one another, and to maintain the discipline of the church according to the rules of the gospel. We do it that you may be recovered from the error of your way, and be reconciled to God and to His Church, that you may not be cut off from the communion of the Church here, nor be excluded from the Church triumphant above. Signed, in behalf of the church,

"JOHN NOYES, Moderator."

"NORFIELD, Aug. 14, 1823."

"Voted, That the church meet a fortnight from this day, at time and place as before, further to attend to the important subject under consideration. The church met according to adjournment. The delinquent not appearing, nor having made any communication to the church, the church, in the exercise of Christian forbearance and with the hope of still gaining their brother, adjourned further proceedings against him until Thursday of next week, when they voted to meet again at the meeting-house at three o'clock P.M., and expressed their desire that Mr. Noyes should have further conversation with the delinquent with a view to reclaim him. Met according to adjournment.

"The delinquent appeared and submitted a form of confession which he was willing to make the next Lord's Day before the church and congregation, and to which he had affixed his name; and the church voted to accept of it on condition of its being made and to restore him to their charity. Accordingly, on the next Lord's Day, the following confession was publicly read and assented to by the undersigned:

"I, David B. Godfrey, do humbly acknowledge, before God and this assembly, that I have been guilty of the sin of intemperance, whereby I have offended God and this church, dishonored the Christian name, and wounded my own soul; and I do now declare my hearty sorrow for this my sin and humbly ask the pardoning mercy of God and the forgiveness of my Christian friends, together with their prayers for me that I may be enabled to walk circumspectly and inoffensively for the future, which I will endeavor to do by Divine grace assisting me.

"Signed, DAVID B. GODFREY."

"The above and foregoing are a true record of the doings of the church in the case of David B. Godfrey.

"Test, JOHN NOYES, Moderator."

"Wherefore the moderator declared, in virtue of a foregoing vote relative to their acceptance of the foregoing confession, in words following: 'This church then forgives you so far as your offense relates to them, and cheerfully restore you to their charity and fellowship in the gospel, and may you have forgiveness of God and be kept by His power through faith unto salvation.'

EMANUEL CHURCH.

"At a meeting of the Episcopal Society of Weston, legally warned and held at the Episcopal church in said Weston on the 22d day of March, A.D. 1845, Wolsey Nichols, chairman, and Edmond O. Sturges, clerk, voted that Eli T. Winton and others be admitted members of this society, — viz., Walter S. Mecker, Levi O. Banks, Aaron D. Banks, Thomas B. Trowbridge, Edmond O. Sturges, Whitmore Nichols, Zalmon Sturges, Curtis Wood, William Wheeler, Alson Robertson, Samuel M. Banks, Sylvester Quintard, Henry Bulkley, Jesse Crossman, James Brown (2d), Henry Brown, Moses Banks, Thomas Banks, Porter Wheeler, Wm. P. Welch, Benjamin Banks, Wolsey Nichols, Jeremiah R. Nichols, Wm. H. Lyon, Ebenezer S. Cole, Alban Brown, Hezekiah F. Gould, and others by certificate (names not given)."

Walter Treadwell, Hanford Nichols, and Orlando

Perry were voted as vestrymen; Hanford Nichols and Walter Treadwell wardens.

Walter Treadwell and Orlando Perry were appointed a committee to take charge of all funds of the society. The first meetings of the parish were held at the house of Hanford Nichols.

The people of Lyon's Plains for some time worshipped at Easton, the academy being used for that purpose. When they at last decided to build a church edifice, disputes arose about its location. Mr. Hanford Nichols and Walter Treadwell gave the land, and Mr. Nichols and others commenced building the church. A dispute arose about subscriptions for building and locating the church, suits at law had been commenced, and the matter was finally settled amicably by being left to arbitration. Joshua B. Ferris, Cyrus H. Beardsley, and Henry Dutton were chosen arbitrators. The records further state:

"At a meeting of the Episcopal Society of Weston, legally warned and held at the dwelling-house of Hanford Nichols, in said Weston, on the 25th day of April, A.D. 1845, voted Wolsey Nichols moderator. Voted that we recognize and receive as the property of the Episcopal Society of Weston the subscriptions to build a new church edifice between the houses of Charles Scofield and Thomas Banks. Voted that we consider it expedient and proper to build a new church in this society. Voted that we recognize the land already subscribed and given by Hanford Nichols and Walter Treadwell, and fix the location of our said church thereon. Voted that we recognize and assume the building of the church edifice already begun by Hanford Nichols, Walter Treadwell, and others, together with all the debts and credits, liabilities and responsibilities pertaining thereto."

A committee of five were appointed to take charge of the money and building,—viz., Walter Treadwell, Edmond O. Sturges, Hanford Nichols, Charles Crofut, and Levi Banks.

"At a meeting of the Episcopal Society of Weston, held at the dwelling-house of Hanford Nichols, April 13, A.D. 1846, the following officers were chosen:

Walter Treadwell, Moderator; Moses Treadwell, Clerk; Hanford Nichols and Walter Treadwell, Wardens; Charles Crofut, Whitmore Nichols, Jeremiah R. Nichols, Vestrymen; Wolsey Nichols, Treasurer. Moses Nichols was chosen a delegate to attend the general convention of the State. Voted that we instruct our wardens and vestrymen to give Rev. David G. Tomlinson a call to the ministerial charge of our parish. June 3, 1848, this society purchased a burying-ground. This burying-ground was afterwards donated to the society by Hanford Nichols. At this date (by meeting warned) the society voted that this parish having been without a proper church name, being called generally in parish notices the Episcopal Society of Weston, and in the journals of Convention 'Church Weston,' we therefore request of the Convention that this parish may be named and known as Emanuel Church, Weston, and that our minister or delegate present this request to the Convention at its coming session in New Haven." In 1864, Rev. Mr. Tomlinson resigned on account of ill health. Mr. Ebenezer Lane had volunteered his services as "lay reader," assisting Mr. Tomlinson for some years. The society voted him thanks each year.

May, 1865, Rev. John Marvin was called to be rector of the parish. May 9, 1867, the parish received a donation or bequest from Hanford Nichols, Esq., of three thousand five hundred dollars.

"May 7, 1871, voted that we accept the resignation of Rev. Mr. Marvin as rector of this parish.

"J. R. NICHOLS, Clerk."

Jan. 1, 1872, Rev. J. N. Walton was called to be rector, and resigned in 1878.

Rev. A. N. Lewis, of Westport, has officiated for the parish during the past year.

The following are the present officers: J. R. Nichols, Clerk; Moses D. Treadwell, J. R. Nichols, Wardens; Alban B. Sherwood, H. A. Ogden, Charles Adams, W. Lobdell, L. M. Sherwood, Vestrymen; A. B. Sherwood, Treasurer; C. A. Adams, Delegate; M. D. Treadwell, Sexton.

THE MILITARY ACADEMY, WESTON.

This school has been conducted many years under various plans and persons. Mr. Matthew Bulkeley had the management of it for a considerable period, when he resigned, and his son-in-law, A. A. Jarvis, assumed control, becoming principal and proprietor. He kept a corps of teachers, who under his management attained an enviable celebrity. Being a military school and not closing during the summer attracted the attention of numerous families from the large cities, especially New York and Brooklyn. Mr. Jarvis spared nothing to advance his students in knowledge or social qualities, often having receptions for their benefit, even inviting the Governor of the State (Connecticut) to witness the military parade of his cadets, and to add lustre to the occasion.

CIVIL HISTORY.

The town of Weston was incorporated in October, 1777. It was "Resolved by this assembly that all the inhabitants who live within the limits of the parish of North Fairfield, in the county of Fairfield, and all the inhabitants who live in that part of the parish of Norfield which lie in the township of Norfield, in said county, be and they hereby are incorporate into a distinct, separate town by the name of Weston."

THE FIRST TOWN-MEETING.

The first meeting of the inhabitants was held Nov. 14, 1787, with Samuel Wakeman moderator, and Nathan Wheeler town clerk. At this meeting the following officers were chosen: Moderator, Samuel Wakeman; Town Clerk, Nathan Wheeler; Selectmen, Abel Hull, John Sherwood, David Coley, Jr.,

Henry A Ogden

HENRY AUGUSTUS OGDEN was born in Westport, Conn., Sept. 28, 1831. His father, J. H. Ogden, an old citizen of Westport, is now living and engaged in farming. His mother was Abby G. Sherwood of the same town.

His early life was spent on the farm; he had the advantages of the district schools and the academy at Green's Farms. While quite young he taught in the district schools of the town, teaching in winter and farming in summer, with a year's experience in a country store. At the age of twenty-eight he took the position of book-keeper at G. W. Bradley's Edge-Tool Manufactory, situated in Weston, Conn. With the interests of this long-established manufactory he has been identified for over twenty years, sometimes representing it through Connecticut and Western Massachusetts, and at others in managing its finances; this is his present position, as he is its sole manager. These works have been established nearly fifty years. Their founder was the son of an axe-maker, and conducted the business four miles above. When the works were destroyed by an ice gorge some years ago they were reconstructed by Miles Bradley, and the business resumed under his oversight in association with Mr. Ogden.

Their business felt the depression of the war, and required most judicious and prudent management to avoid disaster. The situation of the Bradley Edge-Tool Manufactory is very picturesque, removed from the great routes of travel, in a rural district having excellent water-power.

Mr. M. Bradley died some three years since, when Mr. Ogden became manager. For the excellence of their wares they have obtained an enviable reputation. They have given employment to from eighty to one hundred men, though the present number is less, and these works are the most important manufacturing interest in the town.

Mr. Ogden was married in 1860 to Abigail J. Coley, daughter of Lonson Coley, of Westport. The Coley family, from which Mr. Ogden is descended on his mother's side, is one of the oldest families in Connecticut. He has no living children, his only son dying in infancy.

Mr. Ogden has been on the school committee of his town, and has always sympathized with the interests of educational and religious matters. He is a member of the Congregational Church at Green's Farms.

He affiliates with the Republican party, and is highly esteemed as a reliable business man and a good citizen.

Nathan Wheeler, Samuel Wakeman, Benjamin Dean, and William Prime; Treasurer, Samuel Wakeman; Constables, Josiah G. Leavitt and Benjamin Dean; Surveyors of Highways, Ephraim French, Alfred Lockwood, Squire Adams, John S. Andrews, Joseph Banks, Nehemiah Cable, Zebulon Fenton, Christopher Godfrey, Seeley Spier, Daniel Andrews, Jr., Jonathan Bradley, Seth Price, Abel Hull, Lloyd Wakeman, Robert Harris, Samuel Wakeman, and T. L. Collyer; Keykeepers, Thankful Platt, Nathaniel Seeley, Benjamin Dean, and John L. Andrews.

It was voted that the warnings for town-meetings shall be put up, one on a birch-tree near Henry Summers', one on the post in the society of North Fairfield, and one on the post in the society of Norfield.

It is evident that the government of Weston was started on an economical basis, and that the good people of the town, way back in 1787, were not at all disposed to bestow upon their public servants any remuneration except the "sincere thanks of the town," as the following shows, which was voted at the first town-meeting: "WHEREAS, it often happens that large sums arise against towns for the services of the several town officers appointed by said towns, which to prevent we, the inhabitants of the town of Weston, in town-meeting assembled, do vote that we will for the year ensuing transact and perform all our town business, which by law or reason is or ought to be required of us, for which the town must pay, without any fee or reward, and whoever shall be chosen to any town office in this town (grand jury men and tithingmen excepted) are hereby notified that he is to expect or receive no other reward for his services only the sincere thanks of the town, and if any person so chosen is not willing to serve as above described, they must make their objections to this meeting, and shall thereupon be excused."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

DAVID D. COLEY.

David D. Coley was born Oct. 30, 1811, in Weston, Conn. His father was Eliphalet Coley, of the same town, and as far as is known was descended from the early settlers of this county. His mother was Priscilla Bradley, another old family name in Fairfield County.

His youth was sickly; he did not until near his eighteenth year have ordinary good health; he had, besides the advantages of the district school, the instructions of Hawley Olmstead, a noted teacher of Wilton. When young Coley's health became established he found employment on his father's farm, and chose farming as his pursuit.

He married, in 1824, Mary E. Andrews, daughter of John Andrews, of Weston. Her mother was Mary Andrews. Mr. Coley worked at the home-farm some three years after his marriage. In 1840 or 1841 he bought and removed to the farm on which he now resides, in the town of Weston; the place is situated on the high ground in the southerly part of the town, and commands an extensive view of the county south, including a view of Long Island Sound, and the island itself across the Sound. This farm of good natural soil has been well cultivated and industriously farmed, and yielded a competency to its owner.

Mr. Coley has been a selectman of the town for many years, and during the entire civil war discharged the duty of this onerous office; it became their duty to secure the soldiers to fill the quota of the town; this was successfully accomplished to the satisfaction of the townspeople.

D. D. COLEY.

Mr. Coley has for three years represented his town in the Legislature of the State; has sympathized with the Democratic party all his life; is a strong Union man, and was a supporter of the Union in the late war.

Mr. Coley has had three sons, John B., James L., and Alphonso B., the last named alone surviving. John B. died at the age of twenty-four years; James L. died at twenty-nine years. Alphonso recuperated his health by a trip to California, which entirely restored him.

Mrs. Coley died in 1872. For forty-eight years she was a faithful companion and an affectionate mother; she was a farmer's daughter, and became a help-mate to her industrious husband. Her monument is pointed out in the cemetery as one of its principal and most beautiful adornments. Mr. Coley for a man of his age is vigorous and strong. He is respected and trusted by his fellow-townsmen, and has before him the prospect of a comfortable old age, surrounded by all the comforts of life.

THE town of Westport lies in the southern part of the county, and is bounded on the north by Wilton and Weston; on the east by Fairfield; on the south by Long Island Sound; and on the west by Norwalk.

THE PIONEERS.

The first settlement was made by Thomas Newton, Daniel Frost, Henry Gray, John Green, and Francis Andrews, who erected their log huts in the neighborhood of the present Green's Farms railroad depot. The ability, character, and disposition of Thomas Newton and his four contemporaries can only be conjectured from some of their acts and doings, which frequently brought some of them before the General Court and became matters of record. From a perusal of these records it is seen that Thomas Newton was an enterprising, go-ahead man, with a strong propensity for traffic and trade in anything that promised gain. His settlement in Maximus was not to clear forest and raise wheat, but in some way to make a speculation. He was unfortunate in the many suits at law he had in the General Court for the time he was in this section of the country. At the October session, 1646, in a suit against him by Mr. Whitney, "the jury find for the plaintiff the Bill 5*l* 10*s*, 2*d*. damages and cost of court," and at the same court Edward Hopkins plaintiff and Thomas Newton defendant, "The jury find for the plaintiff; the defendant is to pay 1*l* 1*s* 1*d*., according to the Bill and 10*s*. damages and costs." Again, in June, 1647, he was "Bound in a recognizance of 160*l* to the court to save the court and such debtors harmless from any damage that shall be recovered in the court, of Seppegeer his debts in reference to an action commenced against Samuel Smith." Again, in 1648, in a suit of Jonas Wood against Thomas Newton, "The jury find, for the plaintiff that the defendant shall discharge or cause to be discharged the bond that the plaintiff, and his friends lye under at the Monatoes, which was to answer the defendants engagement there; and to pay unto him 30*l* besides, and costs."

Again he was bound in a recognizance of £200, with John Green and Henry Gray as his security, to answer, truly perform, and discharge the verdict of the jury in the action between "Jonas Wood, plaintiff and himself defendant at or before the 1st day of February next." Various other suits appear to have been tried, some resulting in his favor, but generally against him, and among others a "fine of five pounds for selling one Philip White wine from his vessel when said White had enough already." He owned a vessel and probably traded with the Dutch at New Amsterdam (New York) and other places where profit could be made, and was independent of Custom House regulations.

The care of his vessel and his voyages very likely occupied most of his time until 1650, when, upon the information of one Goody Johnson, a woman in Fairfield, Newton was arrested and committed to jail, but, before trial, broke out and escaped with his vessel to New Amsterdam, and never returned to Maximus thereafter. The second in the list of first settlers was Daniel Frost, an altogether different character from Thomas Newton. He was a son of William Frost. From the will of William Frost, made in January, 1664, I infer that he, William, left England several years before the settlement of Fairfield, bringing with him his two sons, Daniel and Abraham, and daughters Elizabeth (wife of John Gray), Lydia (wife of Henry Gray), and Rebecca and Sarah Frost, unmarried, and from the bequest in his will was a man of considerable means for the time, as in addition to the disposal of his estate here to his children and grandchildren he bequeaths to a daughter named Mary Rylic and her children all his goods and land left in Old England, and "ten pounds in good money towards building a meeting-house in Uncowa, one-half when the house is half done and the other half when it is completed." No mention of his wife is made in the wills, from which it might be supposed he was a widower, but in Fairfield records is found a bond of two hundred pounds obligating the said Daniel to pay his mother ten pounds annually, and other provisions for her support during life. The land upon which Daniel settled was east of the residence of Mr. Phipps. The point of land known as Frost's Point was some of it. He was doubtless a quite peaceable, respectable man. Of the forty-four freemen of Fairfield entitled to vote in town-meetings in October, 1669, Daniel Frost was one.

Henry Gray, the third on the list of first settlers, was between thirty and forty years of age at the commencement of the settlement. His wife was a daughter of William Frost, and had at least a family of three sons—Jacob, Henry and William—when they sat down at Bankside or Maximus. In early life he appears to have been an active, influential, and popular man, and represented the town of Uncowa in 1643 in the General Court, but two years after the General Court passed a judgment upon him in the words following, to wit: "Henry Gray, for his many misdemeanors, is adjudged to be imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and to be fined ten pounds." What the misdemeanors were, or how many, we are left to conjecture. The court record of the time, except in this case, uniformly gives the name and nature of the offense for which the punishment was inflicted. From this time forward, for near twenty years, he seems to have had a vexatious life, as in nearly every court his name appears as plaintiff or defendant, and at a session of the General Court, in May, 1859, he was "fined twenty shillings for abusing the court." His principal opponent in law was the Jonas Wood of Long Island with whom Thomas Newton had many conflicts. These continuous lawsuits, as might be supposed, wasted his estate, and at his death, in 1672, the General Court, upon the petition of Maj. Nathan Gold and Mr. William Hill, empowered the administrators "to sell the said Gray's farm at Maximus as the most prudent course to save any estate for the children of said Gray." The Maximus farm was in the neighborhood of the land now owned by Mr. Phipps, and he had other land in Compo. He and his brother John, who also married a daughter of William Frost, were the progenitors of all the Grays in this section, branches of whom may be found in most of the States.

The name of John Green, the fourth on the list, is occasionally met on the first volume of records of the town of Fairfield, but nowhere in the town or colony record is found anything to his disparagement. In 1672 he was appointed by the General Court one of a committee of three "to view the township of Rye (then under the jurisdiction of Connecticut), and consider what highways may be necessary and requisite for the use of the town and colony." He must have lived to an advanced age, for I find in 1699 an instrument recorded by which he manumits and grants freedom to his negro man Harry, upon condition that said Harry shall choose some good man to live with, and serve two years, and get twenty pounds to pay the board and education of a grandson. This instrument was signed with a cross. The old man had probably become too paralyzed to write his name. He had a son, John Green, Jr., who settled in Stamford, and was one of the eight freemen, and was also constable of that town in 1669.

The parish of Green's Farms is supposed to have derived its name from John Green, who, in his day, was perhaps the largest and best farmer in the settlement.

The last of the list of first settlers was Francis Andrews. He was undoubtedly a quiet, peaceable man, as his name is not to be found in the court records. The land upon which he settled was for three or four generations in the Andrews family. The Andrews of Westport and Redding are his descendants. How long after the first settlement before additions were made cannot now be ascertained. It is supposed that Simon Couch, by purchase or otherwise, succeeded in the possession of the land of Thomas Newton. The dispute about the west line of the town of Fairfield, the uncertainty of the title to the lands improved, and the war with the Narragansett Indians, probably tended to caution new settlers against setting down and making improvements where the risk of disturbance was so great, and it is doubtful whether more than three or four families were added before 1665.

The territory of the Compo District was debatable ground between Fairfield and Norwalk until 1686, and no settlements upon it were made before 1790. Among the first settlers were Henry Gray, Jr., John Shaw, Peter Disbrough, or Disbrow, as now spelt, and — Bennett. At the building of the new school-house, 1801, there was but one Gray living in the district. The Shaw family had all left, but there were many of the Bennetts, Disbrows, and Allens. In 1750 the traveled road from Norwalk was to a ferry crossing Saugatuck River a little below the present railroad bridge, called Disbrough's Ferry. The fare at this ferry was for man, horse, and load, twopence halfpenny; for led-horse, one penny; for footman, penny halfpenny; for ox or other neat kine, threepence halfpenny; for sheep, hog, or goat, halfpenny.

The exact period of the first settlement at Green's Farms cannot be told, probably between 1680 and 1690, and among the first, if not the first, was John Hyde, the great-grandfather of the present John S. and Edward Hyde. In the division of the land above the Long Lots highway, Humphrey Hyde and his son John had set out to them a lot forty rods one foot and a half inch in width, and, as these lots ran back ten miles, it follows that the old man and his son had a farm of eight hundred and two acres of land, in addition to outlays of land made before that time. Sixty years ago more than one-half of this lot was in the name of the original proprietors. Between the highway passing the dwelling-house of Burr Meeker and the highway east there was laid out, in the original division, nine lots to nine men. The whole width was one hundred and ninety-two rods, and the whole area three thousand eight hundred and forty acres.

The following were also living in this district in

Other early settlers were Nathan Adams, grandfather of the late Jabez Adams, Samuel Platt, Thos. Taylor, John Taylor, Seth Taylor, Gamaliel A. Taylor, Samuel Pearsall, and son John S.

Of the first settlers in Cross Highway District but little is known. Few of them had money; they had houses to build and farms to clear. Necessity drove them to hard labor, and they had little time and perhaps less inclination to make records of passing events. Among the most prominent were John Hyde, great-grandson of Humphrey Hyde, who was the largest landholder, and, at his death, the most wealthy man, of Green's Farms. He resided where the widow of the late Seth W. Meeker now lives, and he died without issue about 1798.

John Goodsell, great-grandfather of the present John Goodsell, grocer, was killed at the burning of Fairfield by the British, July 8, 1779. He was, with a few militia-men, on the high ground above the town, firing upon the enemy, when he received a ball in one of his legs, breaking the bone. A charge upon the militia put them to flight, but Goodsell could not flee, and when the Hessians came up to him, in answer to his plea for quarter one thrust his bayonet into his mouth, another into his bowels.

Ephraim Burr, father of Silas Burr, lived in a house where now resides the widow of the late Morris Ketchum. Nearly all of Ketchum's farm was Silas Burr's. Silas Burr died about 1814.

Phineas Chapman, father of Phineas, Jr., and grandfather of Charles, lived in the house where the family of the late Charles Chapman now reside.

Maj. Albert Chapman, a distinguished Revolutionary soldier, lived in the house now owned by the widow of David Bothwell. There were also two families of Meekers and one of Ogdens.

At what period the North District had its first settlers cannot now be certainly ascertained. No settlements were made above the Front of Lots highway before the Long Lots, as they are called, were laid out. There is no evidence of any settlement before 1700, about which time some three or four families settled in Cross highway, and, within three or four years after, five or six families in the North District. Of the first settlers were John Coley, the progenitor of all the Coleys of that district, who had a small house on the south of Adam's mill. Nathan Morehouse built a house a little west of John Gray's barn, succeeded by his son, Jabez Morehouse, who, in September, 1738, married Sarah, daughter of Joseph Ogden. Jabez was a blacksmith, and occupied the old place, working at his trade near fifty years. Joseph Ogden built a grain- and saw-mill on the bank of Aspetuck River, which came afterwards into the possession of his son Humphrey. This mill stood until 1801, when it was demolished. It was the first grist-mill built within the limits of Westport. Joseph Gorham, about 1730, built the old house afterwards occupied by his son Shubal to the time of his death, about 1806. It stood until 1817. In 1778 the occupant of this house, Shubal Gorham, received two long, well-written letters, purporting to have been written from heaven by his deceased father, which produced much excitement in the vicinity, and was the subject of Consoaiation occasionally for fifty years afterwards. Copies may yet be found. Jeremiah Sturges built a house where now stands the house of H. M. Coley. There was also a large family by the name of Beers, and another of the name of Guyre.

THE PIONEER SCHOOLS.

In about 1740 the first school-house was built, which stood until 1790, when a new one was erected. The style or dimensions of the first are not known, but if it was not equal to the second, it was no great credit to the first settlers. The second stood upon the highway, about half-way between the present houses occupied by Mrs. Goodsell and her son, Heman B., and Eliphalet Gray. It was about twenty feet square, with eight-feet posts, a chimney built of stone and clay in the northeast corner, no ceiling or chamber-floor, a door in the southwest corner opening into the room, a fifteen-light window of seven-by-nine glass in each square, not plastered for more than twenty years after it was built. I think it was in 1818 when the old chimney was taken down, the house plastered, a box-tove procured, and other improvements made. As few boys were in school in the summer season over eight or nine years of age, it might well be said their education was obtained under difficulties. In 1841 a new and much better house was built and more centrally located. If we go back in the history of this district to 1800, there were within its limits twenty-three dwelling-houses, with an enumeration of over fifty children between the ages of four and sixteen years. Up to that time, and for some years after, spelling, reading, writing, and arithmetic only were taught in the district school, and it was not before 1812 that teachers were required to pass an examination in English grammar. The first teacher that introduced the study of grammar into the North District school was a young man from Simsbury, by the name of Oliver Cromwell Phelps. In the winter of 1802-3, after considerable talk with the parents, and much urging, he succeeded in obtaining two, and by sending to New Haven procured two copies of Noah Webster's grammar, and the strange study was commenced. Phelps taught the school two winters, but made no additions to his grammar class. For three years following the school was taught by one Joseph Lockwood, with no grammar class, indeed, the teachers knew nothing about it. The winter terms of 1806 and 1807 were by Jeremiah Rowland, who had a class in grammar of four or five, and Lindley Murray's grammar was introduced, and something in the way of geography and history was commenced. Noah Webster's "Elements of Universal Knowledge" served for reading and study. The two following winters Charles Lockwood was the teacher, with some further advancement in the exercises, but it was not before 1829 that an atlas with a geography was found in any common school. The wages of school-teachers were, for males, for the winter terms, from nine to twelve dollars per month, and board around with the proprietors according to the number of scholars attending, and for females, in the summer, four to six dollars per month, the month to be not less than four weeks, and five and a half days of not less than six hours to the week per day.

Among the early settlers of our town frequent controversies arose regarding the location of their school-houses and the character and qualifications of the teachers. As late as 1796, at a school-society meeting, it was voted that the society be divided into four districts. The divisions were made by a line from Greenfield west, passing the house of David Burr and the house of Benjamin Allen to Saugatuck River, and by a line from Weston boundary south, including the house of Silas Burr, east of the house of Gideon Couch, to the sea, to be designated as the northeast, northwest, southeast, and southwest districts. This division, however, appears not to have been satisfactory, as, at an adjourned meeting of the school society, held the 17th of November, 1798, it was voted that Cross highway be set off as a new district, from Greenfield line west, to include Phineas Chapman, and south, to include Daniel Brotherton, David Beers, and David Sherwood, Jr., and appointed John Ogden school committee. The spring following, 1799, they built a school-house. It stood directly opposite the house where Henry Monroe now lives. It might be supposed that land at that period was not so valuable as to prevent the purchase of a few rods for the first school-house; yet the house was set upon the highway, and there stood thirty-six years. It was for the time a comfortable house, about the size of the North District house, mentioned above. Among the early school-teachers, although at a much later date than the above, are the names of Swords, Hanford, Bennett, Jennings, and, particularly in 1811 and 1812, Stephen Olmstead, a very good teacher.

REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENTS. THE GALLANT SEVENTEEN.

Although Westport did not share the fate of Norwalk and Fairfield, still the town suffered severely, and here, in what is now Compo Street, was spilled the first British blood on the memorable march of the red-coats to Danbury, in April, 1777.

On the afternoon of the 25th of April, 1777, a fleet of vessels were seen coming up the Sound. It was supposed their destination was farther eastward until they were seen rounding the eastern end of the reef off Caukeen Island just at night. Alarm-guns were fired, and early in the evening a few men of the militia company of Weston met at a tavern kept by Ebenezer Ogden, in Cross highway. When their services might be required they knew not. In the course of the night they learned that the regulars were coming up the street and would soon be in sight. The number of the militia at the time, about half-past twelve A.M., had increased to seventeen, but without an officer of any grade, and no one of their number had ever been in battle. In front of where is now the mansion of Mrs. H. A. Birdsall was a well-erected stone wall, and from behind this wall they agreed to make a stand and give the British at least one shot. Each man loaded his gun with ball, and those who had them buck-shot in addition, and took their places, first selecting one of their number to give the word fire. They expected the fire would cause a momentary halt of the enemy and a return fire, protection from which was the fence, behind which they were to drop as soon as they had fired, and after receiving the return fire each man was to take care of himself. When the head of the army reached a little elevation in the highway, nearly in front of the house occupied by the late Capt. Elwood, and at not more than sixteen rods' distance, the word fire was given, and the seventeen discharged their well-aimed muskets. The effect was one killed and a major and two or three others wounded. The killed and wounded were put into an ox-cart, belonging to a Mr. Bennett, and sent down to the shipping. As expected, the army halted and returned the fire. To use the expression of the narrator, "The bullets rattled against the fence like hail against a glass window. As soon they had received the enemy's fire each man ran, taking his own way. I ran up north and crossed the highway where it branches, about forty rods above where we fired, into a field east of the road, and had gone some forty rods or so when, knowing nothing of flank guard to an army, as I had nearly reached the top of a hill I discovered a company of about sixty men within not more than twenty rods of me. I turned and ran down the hill. I heard the word halt behind me, which I disregarded, and the whole company fired at but over-shot me. Fortunately, a little to my right was a thick alder-swamp, into which, without any fear of wet feet, I dove, until near the centre I crawled into a thick bush of alders and lay low. The red-coats came down to the swamp, turned to the left, and went along. I kept my place until I was sure the army had passed, then went home."

The following is taken from the Westporter, under date April 29, 1876:

"About four o'clock in the afternoon of the 25th of April, 1777, a fleet of twenty-six sail, containing from two thousand to two thousand five hundred British troops, commanded by Gen. Tryon, came to anchor at the mouth of the Saugatuck River, and the troops were landed on Compo Beach, from whence they commenced their march on Danbury. The yeomanry of the neighborhood had assembled to resist them, but a few cannon-shot made them give way, and the troops marched up Compo Street, galled by a scattering fire from behind stone fences. At the head of Compo Street, where the Alden House now stands, there stood a barn, in front of which was a stone fence, behind which lay eighteen patriots, who, as the advance of the enemy were in the vicinity of where Mr. James Quigg's house now stands, discharged their eighteen pieces in the faces of the foe, and ran across the lots in different directions.

"But the foe were in a patriotic neighborhood. Gen. Silliman, of the Connecticut militia, who resided in Fairfield, sent out expresses, and the country was soon aroused. Gen. Arnold, who was at New Haven, hearing of the British inroad, mounted his horse, and, accompanied by Gen. Wooster and Lieut. Oswald, of the artillery, with three field-pieces, hastened to join Gen. Silliman. As they spurred forward, every farm-house sent out its warrior. In the mean while the enemy, marching all night, reached Danbury at two o'clock in the afternoon of the 26th, which place they pillaged and then burned. Meanwhile the patriots were gathering. Gen. Silliman had advanced at the head of five hundred. Gens. Wooster and Arnold joined him, making in all six hundred men. Retarded by a heavy rain, they reached Bethel near midnight, where they halted to take a little repose and put their arms in order, rendered almost unserviceable by the rain. Gen. Wooster took command, and at dawn detached Arnold, with four hundred men, to push across the country and take post at Ridgefield, by which the British must pass, while he, with the two hundred, remained to hang on and harass them in flank and rear. As soon as the British had passed his position, Wooster attacked the rear guard with great spirit and effect; sharp skirmishing continued until within two miles of Ridgefield, where, as the veteran was cheering on his men, a musket-ball brought him down from his horse and finished his gallant career. Upon this his men retreated in disorder. The delay his attack had occasioned the enemy had given Arnold time to throw up a kind of breastwork across the north end of Ridgefield Street, where he took his stand with his little force, now increased to about five hundred men. At about eleven o'clock the enemy advanced in column. They were kept at bay for a time, and received several volleys of shot from the barricades, until it was out-flanked, when Arnold ordered a retreat. Tryon entrenched for the night in Ridgefield. The next morning, after having fired four houses, he continued his march for the ships.

"Arnold was again in the field, and posted himself on the enemy's route at Old Hill, near where Mrs. Brinkerhoff's house now stands. When the enemy came in sight of Arnold's position they changed their route, and, guided by a Tory named John Bennett, made for a ford of the Saugatuck River, near where Kelly's mill now stands. Arnold hastened to cross the King Street bridge and take them in the flank, but they were too quick for him, as they had gained the rocks in front of where Lees' mattress-factory now stands, and placed their cannon so as to rake the bridge, which position they held until their main body were well on the way towards their ships. Finding themselves hard pressed, the enemy pushed for Compo Hill (where the residence of S. M. Burnham now stands), arriving in the evening without a round of ammunition in their cartridge-boxes, but, being within cannon-shot of the ships, the Americans ceased the pursuit. The enemy were then reinforced by marines from the ships, who attacked the fatigued patriots, killing a large number, and then effected their embarkation. The exact number of Americans killed is unknown, but twenty-two bodies are known to have been buried in one grave on the beach, and afterwards three more bodies were discovered in a house near the Furman place. During the engagement a young man was killed whose grave-stone can still be seen in the old cemetery at Green's Farms, with the following inscription:

"Lieut. Samuel Ebner, son to Col. Samuel Ebner, of Sharon,
was killed at Fairfield fighting for the Liberty of his Country, April 28th. 1777,
in the 25th year of his age.
"Our youthful Hero, bold in arms,
His country's cause his bosom warms
To save her rights, fond to engage,
And guard her from a Tyrant's rage,
Plies to ye field of Blood and Death,
And gloriously resigns his Breath."

HIGHWAYS.

About the first move made by the business men of this town to open new highways was in 1809,—a direct highway opened from that part of Weston then usually called North Fairfield (now Easton). From Job Pery's mill, down the valley of Aspetuck River to Jonathan Coley's mill, and thence, in a straight line, to a point on the first cross-highway, near the present residence of James Snibert, would measure less than five miles, and would make a very level road, while the then traveled highway between the same points measured more than seven miles, and was very hilly. The proposed route was the present highway through Ketcham's Plains. As the town boundaries then were, one-fourth of a mile would be in Norwalk, about two and one-fourth miles in Weston, and the remainder in Fairfield. A highway so obviously necessary for public travel and convenience, we now think, should have met with no opposition. Yet a petition to the County Court in 1812 to lay it out met with the united opposition of the whole three towns and was defeated. The next move was to open the upper part of the proposed new highway, from the second cross-highway, a little east of Jonathan Coley's mill, to intersect the highway from Redding Ridge to Fairfield, north of Perry's mill. This would be about one and five-eighths miles in Fairfield and one and three-eighths miles in Weston, and for this purpose a petition was brought to the County Court in 1815. This petition met with little opposition from Weston, but with the most determined opposition from Fairfield. Southport was alarmed at the idea of Saugatuck being brought, by this new highway, nearer to North Fairfield, Redding Ridge, and Newtown than to their place. The court, however, granted the prayer of the petitioners, and appointed a committee to lay out the highway and assess the damages to the land-owners. There was no assessment of benefits in those days, or the benefits would have been found to greatly exceed the damages. The committee laid out the highway and made their report in 1816. The report was met by remonstrances against its acceptance, and all other means which the ingenuity of lawyers could invent, but unsuccessfully. Weston made their part of the road, but Fairfield did nothing. The court finally appointed Squire Adams a suitable person to make said new highway. Adams made the road. Fairfield refused to pay the bill. Questions were raised about the legality of the proceedings. The matter went to the Superior Court, and from that to the Court of Errors, but in the end Fairfield was defeated. It was not till 1820, however, that Adams got his money. In obtaining this improvement in the means of communication with North Fairfield, the eastern part of Redding, and Newtown, much time and money were spent by its projectors, all of whom are now dead. The most prominent and active were Ebenezer Jesup, Samuel B. Sherwood, Eliphalet Swift, Stephen Morehouse, Thomas F. Rowland, Lewis Raymond, Dan Taylor, and Seymour Taylor. "For many years after," says the late Squire Gray, "the people of Fairfield seemed to owe this highway a special spite, and would make no repairs upon it except upon complaint from the State's attorney. Down to the time Westport was incorporated as a town, in 1835, I do not remember ever attending a town-meeting in Fairfield without hearing some hard things spoken of this 'infamous Saugatuck road,' as it was termed. It appeared to be a studied subject of one of the selectmen, Robert Wilson, to make a harangue on the iniquity of that infamous Saugatuck road."

EARLY MERCHANTS.

Tradition says that the first store in the village of Westport was near the west end of the old or upper bridge.

The first store on the west side of the river stood upon the dock, where the small house occupied for the last twenty years by John Allen stands. In 1798 it was occupied by Joel Scribner, and in 1801 sold by Scribner to James Hurlbutt. About 1804 it came into the hands of Henry Haydock, of New York, was sold by Haydock to Daniel Nash, and by Nash to Lewis Raymond, who was its occupant until 1815, during a large part of which time a market-boat was run from it. It was then sold to Taylor Hurlbutt, used as a store down to 1830, and demolished about 1850.

An early merchant in Westport was Ebenezer Jesup, who kept in the old "red store," on premises now owned by a grandson. John S. Pearsall was a prominent merchant from 1785 to 1805. Gershom Bradley and Levi T. Downs were also early merchants.

INNS.

One of the early taverns was kept by the father of the late Esquire Disbrow during Revolutionary times in the old Hezekiah Wakeman place, recently torn down, and upon the site of which now stands the Memorial church. Gen. Washington and staff stopped here on their way to Boston. When here the general's supper consisted of a plain bowl of bread and milk. Often, when passing through this place, Gen. Washington stopped with Col. Marvin, an officer in the Continental army, who lived about a mile west of the village, on premises now owned by David M. Martin. The road leading by this house, over the old bridge above the village and by the Disbrow tavern, was the traveled route between New York and Boston, and was called the king's highway.

EARLY REGULATIONS.—THE WHIPPING-POST.— SLAVES, Etc.

In the early days the laws were very severe. For very small crimes or offenses people were fined or taken to the whipping-post. Many were fined for a breach of the Sabbath, such as riding out for pleasure, sporting, fishing, etc., while others were warned out of town for conduct unbecoming good citizens.

The old whipping-post stood on the green near Green's Farms church, and was used until within a few years for a sign-post. It has now rotted away.

Slaves were owned in town, but were seldom sold at auction made at these times, but repeated instances were known of their being sold at private sale or traded off, as cattle are in these days. The slaves, however, generally remained in families where they were born.

EARLY CUSTOMS.

The wardrobe of a lady in the early days, as now, was of considerable consequence, and if she had a good stock of linens, woolens, and home-made stockings she was almost an heiress. The ladies, therefore, were very anxious to display these powerful attractions to the greatest advantage, and the best rooms in the house were always hung round with abundance of homespun, the manufacture and the property of the females. Saturday night was religiously observed. Marriages were not solemnized on Friday or Saturday, as Friday was an unlucky and hangman's day, and Saturday evenings were devoted to religious preparation for the Sabbath.

Balls and parties were common, including spinning-, husking-, apple-parings-, and quilting-parties.

The men wore the powdered hair as queues, and the ladies decorated their heads with high horn or shell combs, wore short dresses of home-made woollen cloth and linsey-woolsey aprons, and no one bothered their heads with bustles, hoops, or waterfalls.

PHYSICIANS.

The first physician in this town was Joseph Chapman, who lived in the Poplar Plain District. A contemporary of Dr. Chapman was Ebenezer Jesup, of Green's Farms, father of the late Maj. Ebenezer Jesup and of Edward Jesup, who were many years ago successful merchants in Westport.

The first physician who located in Westport was a Dr. Porter, in 1799 or '80. He however remained but a short time.

The first permanent physician was David Richmond, of honored memory. He was born and educated in Vermont, and commenced practice in New Canaan in 1801, in the following year removed to this place, and soon acquired an extensive practice, principally in the towns of Norwalk, Fairfield, Wilton, and Weston.

Dr. Tolcott Banks was an early practitioner, and partner with Dr. Richmond. Dr. George Blackman married a daughter of Dr. Richmond, and was during a long period a successful practitioner. Drs. Burr and Jancy were also in practice here. The present physicians are Frederick Powers and George B. Bouton.

Among the lawyers who have practiced here are mentioned the names of Samuel B. Sherwood, Eliphalet Swift, James C. Loomis, Samuel Chamberlain, Theodore Kellogg, M. L. Mason, M. W. Wilson, Wesley Lyon, William K. Soley, James R. Jesup, E. M. Lees, Albert Relyea, Joseph G. Hyatt.

MANUFACTURING.

Sixty years ago nearly every house in village or country was a manufactory, and nearly every woman, old or young, an operative. He was a poor farmer who did not raise flax sufficient to make all the linen goods required for the use of his family, and a poor man, farmer, mechanic, or laborer, who was not the owner of sheep. In clear, dry weather in February or early March you would hardly pass a farmer's barn without seeing a man hard at work on a coarse-looking instrument, called a crackle, breaking flax, to separate the wood part from the fibre, and another man twirling a wheel with five arms to chaw the flax from what was called the shives. In the house you would see, in one corner of a wide, old-fashioned fireplace, a young lady sitting at what was called a double wheel spinning thread; in the other corner an elderly lady, with two ears in her hands, preparing the tow hatched from the flax for a different kind of wheel, called a greit wheel, exercise upon which was not unfrequently prescribed by old physicians as conducive to the health of young girls. By the 1st of June, the spinning of flax and tow being completed, came the spinning of wool, which was continued most of the balance of the year. In about every fourth or fifth house, in a small room or chamber, fitted up for the purpose, would be found a loom with a young lady weaving thread or woollen yarn. In this way, and from these domestic manufactories, nearly all the cloths for wearing apparel of both males and females, as well as bedclothing and many other purposes, were obtained. And so far from employments of this nature being thought mean or vulgar, a young woman could have no better recommendation for matrimony than the great number of pairs of sheets, pillow-cases, blankets, etc., she could show of her own spinning and weaving.

In 1805 the first carding-machine (probably in the country) was set up in a small building by one Josh Scribner, which caused quite an excitement for miles around. It was a great curiosity, and people came for many miles around to see it. It would do the work of twenty women and make better rolls, and was indeed considered wonderful. A few years after, another machine, for spinning wool, was introduced, called the spinning-jenny. Dr. Richmond, John Taylor, and some others patronized the invention, but it never paid.

Cotton-manufacturing in Westport was due to the war with Great Britain of 1812-15, and to Dr. David Richmond, who was a manufacturing enthusiast. By great exertion he succeeded in forming a company in 1814 which obtained from the Legislature an act of incorporation by the name of Saugatuck Manufacturing Company, the shares to be one hundred dollars each, and capital not to exceed two hundred thousand dollars. Under this charter about seventy-five thousand dollars were subscribed, and the stone mill erected, machinery procured, and business commenced under the supervision of Lewis Raymond, Esq., early in 1815,—a most unfortunate time, as the war terminated in February of that year. During the war every description of manufactured goods were enormously high; cotton goods that now sell at ten cents a yard were worth in September, 1814, more than one dollar. Had the war continued two or three years longer the enterprise would probably have been successful, but immediately on the proclamation of peace the large stock of goods in England, manufactured for the American market, which had greatly accumulated during the war, were rushed into our country to be sold at any price, with the two-fold object of getting rid of old stocks and breaking down American manufacturing. The Saugatuck Company attempted to stem the adverse current, but soon got in debt. The discouraged stockholders refused to pay installments, and in 1818, at the meeting of the stockholders, it was voted to sell the whole property of the company at auction, and it was knocked down at a sum little exceeding four thousand dollars, about enough to pay its indebtedness, leaving nothing for the poor stockholders. The purchasers were a few of the stockholders, who had agreed to form a new company, of whom the largest in interest were Ebenezer Jesup, David Richmond, Moses Judah, and E. Cornell, who were with others, by act of the Legislature, incorporated under the name of the Richmondville Manufacturing Company in 1819. The manufactory was burned March 16, 1879.

A new company was formed in 1828, of which the prominent stockholders were Eben Jesup, William H. Jesup, Samuel Avery, Hezekiah Allen, Lewis Raymond, Edward M. Morgan, and others. They obtained an act of incorporation in 1829, under the name of The Branch Manufacturing Company, capital not to exceed two hundred thousand dollars. The capital subscribed and actually paid in was only forty thousand dollars. This company purchased the old mills and water-privilege of Samuel Coley, and erected the building now Kelley's mill, and put into it the requisite machinery for spinning and weaving cotton goods. An Englishman named Showercross was some way concerned in the business. Work commenced in the mill, under the general superintendence of William H. Jesup, in the fall of 1829, and for two or three years was supposed to be doing moderately well, although few and small dividends were made. The Compromise Bill, as it was called, passed by Congress in 1833 to quiet Southern nullification, dampened the spirit of manufacturing, and told heavily upon small establishments like the Branch. The stock ran down. Instead of stopping and waiting for more favorable times, the mill was kept running, latterly under the management of Capt. H. Allen, but early in 1841 a crisis was reached. The property had been some time mortgaged for several thousand dollars to Jesup Wakeman, of Southport. The stockholders refused to pay the installment required to pay the debts, and Wakeman petitioned for foreclosure of his mortgage. In February, 1841, the whole property, mill, houses, water-privilege, machinery, and about twelve acres of land, was sold to Capt. Allen for the sum of five thousand dollars. Capt. Allen continued operations at the mill to near the time of his death, in 1850. The property was subsequently sold to William Wood for twenty-one hundred dollars, subject to a balance of Wakeman's mortgage. Wood sold the machinery out of the mill, and the mill for the purpose it is now used.

William and John Wood, about 1847, erected a mill for making cotton wadding, at a considerable cost, which would probably have paid well had not the fire-fend claimed it.

Taking the business of cotton-manufacturing in Westport, from its commencement in 1815 to 1850, it is evident the losses will vastly exceed the gain. Whatever benefit the public derived from it, the stockholders suffered.

COMMERCIAL.

From the early settlement of Connecticut to a time not very remote Fairfield County was the largest grain-growing county in the State, and the towns of Fairfield, Norwalk, Wilton, Weston, and Redding the best in the county. Seventy-five or eighty years ago, of every one hundred of the male population not less than eighty-five were farmers. The principal, almost the entire, source from which money was obtained was the products of the soil. The men of that period were not eight-hour men, but sunrise-to-sunset men,—robust, hard-laboring, industrious fellows, obtaining from the earth annually large quantities of rye, corn, oats, flax-seed, etc., beyond what was required for home consumption, for which a market was sought, and wherever was a convenient place for lading and unlading vessels, a store or stores were erected. Saugatuck River being navigable farther up from the Sound than any other in Fairfield County, its head of navigable water (notwithstanding the unfavorable surface) was selected as a suitable place for commencing business; here, according to tradition, the first store was built near the upper bridge, and the second a little below where now stands Tom Miller's barber-shop. What the amount of exports were at the beginning of the present century can only be conjectured, but from my recollection of the numbers of vessels employed, and the show of loaded teams from the country, not less than one hundred thousand bushels of grain, corn, rye, and oats, and considerable quantities of flax-seed, dressed flax, butter, etc., were annually shipped from here, the rye mostly to Boston, Providence, and other Eastern ports. A great deal of the corn raised at that period was kiln-dried, ground, and put up in hogsheads of eight hundred pounds each for the West Indian market. Nearly every mill within five miles of the shore had a kiln for that purpose. Quite a business also was carried on with the West Indies. The brig "Atlantic" was built by E. & D. Coley, for Beattie & Raymond and some others, for this trade, and continued in it until lost coming from Turk's Island, laden with salt. A large sloop called the "Sally," built by Capt. Stephen Thorpe, was also in this trade, and occasionally some other vessels.

The market-boat business commenced in 1806. Rowland & Barlow and Capt. Samuel Pearsal built a vessel for that purpose called the "Pedler." She was to make weekly trips to and from New York, carrying any articles of produce or materials that might offer, and sell the same on a commission, usually of eight per cent., or a penny on a shilling, and for the accommodation of passengers had a better than usual fitted-up cabin: price of passage, fifty cents. The business was found to pay, and in 1814, L. T. & S. E. Downs bought a sloop called the "Diana" for the same business, and built a new vessel, the "Intrepid," in 1815, and in 1817, G. Bradley & Co. built the "Iris" for like trade. Before the Housatonic Railroad was opened there was considerable freight from New Milford and Newtown, and—until the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad—much of the freight of Danbury and Bethel. If we could go back, say to 1825 or 1830, and step on board of one of those boats as it was about to leave, in the month of April or May, we should see in the hold one hundred to two hundred bushels of oats, ten to twenty bags of rye flour, one hundred to one hundred and fifty tubs of butter (averaging about twelve pounds each), five to ten barrels of eggs, fifty or more boxes of hats, boxes of combs, boxes of axes, and any quantity of bundles of unknown contents. On deck we should see five to ten calves, and in the cabin or on the quarter-deck ten to fifteen passengers. On her return we should find bales of mackerel, barrels of logwood and other articles for the hatters, two or three thousand Rio Grande (or perhaps city) green horns for the comb-makers, and not infrequently several hogsheads of rum, pipes of brandy, and barrels of gin for the grocers, a few barrels of wheat flour, dry-goods boxes, molasses, sugar, etc.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

IN the town of Westport, Green's Farms seems to be the oldest parish and settlement. The Indian name was Machamux, which in time was corrupted from the original and improved into Maximus. The people near the centre of Fairfield called this west settlement the Farms at Bankside. Afterwards a public-spirited man in this settlement, named John Green, was honored by its being called Green's Farms, which was recognized as such in 1832; it was generally spoken of as the Fairfield West parish till after the Revolution.

This settlement was begun in 1648, when it was agreed that Thomas Newton, Henry Gray, and John Green shall have liberty to sit down and inhabit at Machamux.* Daniel Frost and Francis Andrews were added to the three, which were the proprietors of the settlement for twenty years. Their lands and residences were near the shore, extending from the place of the late Mr. Phipps westward, and when they died were buried on Mosquito Hill. Daniel Frost lived east on a point of land which took its name from him, Frost Point. Of the settlers, Newton fled to the Dutch owing to some misdemeanor on his part. Gray has representatives to-day in Westport, as is indicated by Miss Gray's popular school. Francis Andrews was represented by Daniel Andrews and the sons of Ebenezer Andrews, late of Chicago, who lie under massive monuments in the lower cemetery. John Green has not a representative, though he was mentioned last in 1728. John Green, Jr., lived in Stamford, which may account for it.

In 1711 there were eighty-eight persons in Compo, and in Maximus one hundred and eighty-two,—in all two hundred and seventy persons,—who had to travel from two and a half to eight miles to attend church, which must be done on foot, horse-back, or in ox-carts.

Parish privileges were granted May, 1711; the records begin at this date. Rev. Daniel Chapman was the first pastor, with a salary of seventy pounds, although the church was not organized till four years later. In 1713 it was voted that a house should be built for the minister, forty-two feet long, twenty feet wide, two stories high, and a cellar under one end, two chamber chimneys; for covering, shingles four and a half feet, and to be set on six acres of land. This house stood on Mr. Bedford's land, near the old well.

The church was organized in 1711 with seven members: Thomas Nash, John Andrews, Samuel Couch, Henry Gray, Joshua Jennings, (said to be spelled on the church record "Goshshew Jimins"), Jonathan Squire, and Joseph Lockwood. The way churches were then organized in Connecticut was to choose from their number seven prominent individuals, who were called the seven pillars. These seven entered into covenant and formed the church; then the rest united with them on profession of faith.

Rev. Daniel Chapman, the first pastor, was the son of Deacon Nathaniel Chapman, of Saybrook, and grandson of Robert Chapman, one of the first settlers of that town. He was born 1689; graduated from Yale College, 1707. He married Grissel Lovel, or Lovewell, of the island of Cape Breton. He inherited several tracts of land in Saybrook, and fifteen hundred acres in Hebron. Little is known of him as a preacher. He was pastor here twenty-six years. He was dismissed in 1741, having near that time been "overtaken with too much drink."

It was then a discourtesy to refuse to partake from the deacons which always stood on the sideboard, so his case is no wonderment. He died in Green's Farms soon after this. He had seven children, one of whom, Phineas, married Sarah Ketchum and settled in the parish. He was taken prisoner at his own house while loading his goods into an ox-cart to escape with his family from the British. His treatment while a prisoner resulted in his death. He was a captain in the Revolutionary war. He died at his home in 1782. He also had two sons, Maj. Albert and Lieut. James Chapman, who were officers in the same war. Their descendants are yet in this town, and are scattered through the country, and are spoken of as the "big guns" of the nation.

In 1736 the house (church) was too inadequate,

* By Mrs. Kate E. Perry.

In 1738 a new one was raised, but was not finished till several years later. The members had pew spots assigned them according to their rank in society; each had to build his own pew.

Rev. Daniel Buckingham, born in Milford, 1713, graduated at Yale College, 1735, succeeded Mr. Chapman in 1742. His salary was five hundred pounds. At this time there was a great depreciation in money, but as that decreased they increased his salary. In 1756 the parish was divided by petition of the northern part, and was called the Fairfield Northwest parish,—now Norfield, in Weston. In 1756 five men of this parish died in the army in the French-and-Indian war. They were Abel Fountain, David Hendricks, Jethro Morehouse, Phineas Squire, and Thomas Sherwood.

The Sherwoods are numerous now in this section. An uncommon occurrence was noted among them this fall (1880), when three triplet brothers, Francis, Frederic, and Franklin Sherwood, gave a party to celebrate their seventieth birthday. Seventy-five people were present, and were arranged at three tables, one of each brothers doing the honors to the guests at his table.

Rev. Mr. Buckingham (a name cherished in the State, and to which Governor Buckingham added lustre) died in 1766. Rev. Hezekiah Ripley, the third minister, succeeded Mr. Buckingham in 1767, and occupied the pulpit here for more than fifty years. Mr. Ripley was born in Windham, Conn., in 1743. His grandfather was one of the early settlers of Massachusetts, and his grandmother was the daughter of the famous Governor Bradford, of Plymouth. He graduated at Yale College in 1763.

The most memorable period in the history of the parish during his ministry was the time of the Revolutionary war, as it was continually liable to destruction while the British had possession of Long Island. The parish was invaded by them twice, and probably would the third time, had not one of the farmers, who had a terrible voice, used it so effectually as to cause them to desist and return to their boats. It was towards night, when he was out for his cattle, and, seeing the move of the British, he began to give command, as if he had his forces near. The British, hearing him and fearing they might be overcome, yielded to the successful strategy, and Compo and the Farms were saved that time.

On July 8, 1779, after Tryon's forces left Fairfield ruined, they fired every dwelling in the lower part of the parish for more than a mile. One or two houses were saved, where the flames were extinguished. They burnt the church and the buildings, clothing, furniture, and provisions of the following persons: Rev. Hezekiah Ripley, Nathan Godfrey, Grummond Morehouse, Dr. Ebenezer Jessup, Simon Couch, Widow Eunice Morehouse, Ebenezer Morehouse, George Ratterson, John Davis, Abraham Andrews, Widow Sarah Andrews, Jessup Wakeman, Gideon Morehouse, and Moses Kent. The last named occupied the home of the late Francis L. Hedenberg, but his house must have been elsewhere in the parish. His wife was Mary Wakeman, who lived a little north of the house of the late Burr Jennings,—probably the Wakeman house, now standing, which has considerable local celebrity, and is without doubt the oldest house in Westport. A copy of one of the early issues of the New York Herald was recently found there, and forwarded to the New York Herald office. It was a happy circumstance at the office; they immediately reproduced it and scattered it over the world again. The house in Saugatuck of Moses Kent is in good repair; it was modernized several years ago, and here Mr. Hedenberg married Mary Burr Thorp, March, 1826, and in 1876 they held their golden wedding. Their son, Gould Burr Hedenberg, and his wife, Mary (Wood) Hedenberg, held their silver wedding simultaneously in the same house. F. L. Hedenberg was a native of Newark, N. J., and his mother* was active against the Hessians.

The church being burnt, worship was held several years in private houses. The first year they agreed to meet in the house of Daniel Burr, the grandfather of Daniel Burr, who lived in the old house near Mr. William Burr. The third church of this parish was built between 1783 and 1789. Deacon Thomas Nash, who occupied the first house at the west, with its piazzas and banisters fronting the south, with its noble elms in front (later the home of Mr. Daniel Burr), gave the land, and seemed to be filled with the spirit of progress characteristic of his father and grandfather. He was a man of indomitable will, and, having some difficulty with the society, he left and joined the Episcopal Church.

For this third church application was made to the Legislature for assistance, which was only granted in giving them their proportion of the five hundred thousand acres of fir lands, lying in the wilderness of Ohio, granted by the State to compensate those who had suffered from the war. A tax of ninepence on the pound was levied, the fir lands sold, the parsonage and school funds borrowed, the society pledging to pay the interest annually; the principal has never been heard of since.

Rev. Mr. Ripley was chaplain in the Continental army, attending to his parish simultaneously. In the Revolution he lost his house, furniture, and a portion of his library. During public service alarming tidings were frequently received, therefore persons were stationed at such points to give warning of

* Charles Hedenberg was a native of Sweden, who adopted the United Colonies for his home, as he married Jane Vanast, of New York City. He fell over the sea. By diligence and industry he became captain, and finally owner, of the ship. He died at sea, May 11, 1768, leaving a widow and two sons, from whom have descended all there are in the United States bearing that name. One of these, Charles, was honored with a document, presented in 1787, by James Duane, Esq., Mayor of New York City, called the "Freedom of the City." This paper fell to his son, F. L. Hedenberg, who preserved it with great care.

he approach of the enemy. In 1790 he was chosen a member of the corporation of Yale College, which he continued twenty-seven years, resigning it on account of the infirmities of old age. He and Dr. Timothy Dwight were warm friends. Their intercourse was frequent and most endearing. The degree of D.D. was conferred on Mr. Ripley by the College of New Jersey in 1802. During the years 1815 and 1816 thirty-eight persons united with the church. He married Dolly Brintnall, of New Haven, in 1765, and their union existed over sixty-six years. She died August, 1831; he died December the same year. They had four children, one of whom, William Brintnall, graduated from Yale in 1786, became minister in Lebanon, Conn., and died in 1822. He was chosen fellow of Yale, 1817.

Dr. Hezekiah Ripley was a man of commanding presence, and in his conference with Washington on his way to Boston, on public matters, it would be difficult for the painter to find a finer subject than these two patriots communing on the interests of the country. The doctor accompanied Washington to Stratford Ferry.

Dr. Ripley is the subject of a fine article in "Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit," and was contributed by Rev. Thomas F. Davies, in 1819. Four of Dr. Ripley's great-grandsons bore arms in the late civil war, one of whom lost an arm in the second battle of Bull Run.

The fourth pastor of this church was Rev. afterwards Dr.—Edward Hooker, a descendant of Rev. Thomas Hooker, first pastor in Hartford. His father was the Rev. Asahel Hooker, who was settled in Goshen, afterwards in Norwich, Conn. His mother was Phebe Edwards, of Stockbridge, Mass., descended from President Edwards, of Princeton College. He graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., 1814, completed his theological studies at Andover, Mass., in 1817, and was ordained in Green's Farms, August, 1821. He married Faith Trumbull Huntington, a descendant of Rev. John Robinson, the celebrated Puritan. His was an honored and successful ministry seven years, when he resigned, and was dismissed in 1829. He had charge for twelve years of a church in Bennington, Vt., from the years 1832 to 1844, when he accepted the professorship of Sacred Rhetoric and Ecclesiastical History in the Theological Seminary at East Windsor, Conn., which he filled until 1848, when he became pastor in South Windsor in 1849, and continued until 1856, when he accepted a call to Fairhaven, Vt., which he continued till 1862, when, in his declining years, a respected and honored father in the ministry, he went to reside with his son, a pastor in Nashua, N. H.

The fifth pastor was Rev. Thomas F. Davies, who was born in Redding, Conn., 1793. His father was Thomas Davies, a physician in that town. He was fitted by Rev. Dr. Ely, of Huntington (then Ripton), for Yale College, from which he graduated in 1813, having entered in 1809. He taught school a year or two, pursuing his theological studies under Dr. Dwight. He settled in Huntington in 1817 to preach, but ill health compelled him to accept the invitation to remove to New Haven, in 1819, and become editor of the Christian Spectator, a prominent religious periodical. This he continued several years, but ill health here necessitated his removal to Redding. His health sufficiently restored, he accepted a call to Green's Farms, where he labored ten years, when he, from ill health, was forced to retire again, when he removed to New Haven to superintend the education of his sons. He afterwards resided in Redding, then with his son-in-law, Deacon E. B. Adams, in Green's Farms, where he died Feb. 16, 1865. He left three children, one of them a distinguished Episcopal clergyman. Mr. Davies was a man of superior ability and qualifications. He was genial, social, and polished.

The sixth pastor was Rev. Daniel C. Curtis, a native of Meriden, Conn. He graduated from Yale in 1836, and was ordained and installed in Green's Farms in 1840, and was installed pastor in Brookfield, where he labored fifteen years. In 1855 he was settled in Fort Atkinson, Wis., afterwards was pastor in Fort Howard, of the same State. After he left Green's Farms, Rev. Lewis Pennel was stated supply for a year. He is now (1880) at Green's Farms, superannuated, yet attends various meetings in the Councils, reviving histories of former days.

Rev. Giles M. Porter was the seventh pastor. His father was Rev. Dr. Porter, of Farmington, Conn. He graduated from Yale in 1836; he was licensed by the New London Association to preach in 1841, and was ordained and installed pastor in Green's Farms in 1844. His faithful discharge closed here by his dismissal in 1850. He was pastor in Unionville, Conn., from 1852 till 1856. After that he had a charge in Garnaville, Iowa, where he was laboring in 1865.

The eighth pastor was the Rev. Charles Bentley, a graduate of Amherst College in 1824; was ordained and installed pastor in Middle Haddam, 1826, and dismissed, 1833. He was settled in Granby till 1839; from there he went to Harwenton, where he was exceedingly successful. He left here in 1850, where he was a faithful pastor till 1859. He was laboring in the ministry in Wellington, Conn., in 1865.

Rev. R. S. Eggleston succeeded Mr. Bentley as stated supply for two years. He was an honored and successful pastor in Knowlsville, N. Y., in 1865.

The ninth pastor is the Rev. B. J. Relyea, who was installed pastor in Green's Farms, Dec. 4, 1861, and has been a beloved and efficient pastor there up to date (1880).

On Oct. 26, 1865, his parish held the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formation of the church in Green's Farms. He gave an elaborate history of Green's Farms, which was deservedly popular. The present structure is the fourth church which has been used by this congregation, and this has been remodeled and rededicated in Mr. Relyea's day.

At the anniversary Edward J. Taylor called the meeting to order. The late Hon. James C. Loomis, of Bridgeport, was president of the day. Rev. Nathaniel Hewit, D.D., Maj.-Gen. Couch, the late Dr. William B. Nash, and Hezekiah W. Ripley, Esq., were vice-presidents. Daniel Burr was chief marshal. Among the speakers of the day were Hon. James C. Loomis, Rev. Mr. McLean, of Fairfield, David Ripley, grandson of the late Dr. Ripley, Dr. Noyes, of New Canaan, Rev. Dr. Hewit, of Bridgeport, Maj.-Gen. Couch, Prof. William B. Clark, of Yale, Rev. William J. Jennings, Rev. Mr. Elwood, and Rev. Enoch Burr.

The whole was a fine affair at the termination of so successful a parish for one hundred and fifty years.

Mr. Relyea has a son, Albert Relyea, a lawyer, who has represented Westport in the Legislature.

When Fairfield ceded the portion extending from Saseo to Saugatuck River to Westport she lost the parish of Green's Farms and three burial-grounds, besides a valuable tract of farms and an enviable, aristocratic, independent community. The burying-ground reputed to be the oldest is on Mosquito Hill, west of Phipp's Beach. It contains no stones with inscriptions, the ground being used at the period previous to the age of tombstones. The lower Green's Farms ground and the Pequonnoek ground, now in Bridgeport, lately ceded to it by Fairfield, contains Fairfield's people for the next period. This old Green's Farms ground is a curiosity; most of the stones are low, of granite, and completely moss-covered. In 1701, Capt. Thomas Nash came here from New Haven. He, with others, had to go several miles to church, probably walking that distance, which was too much for the captain, so he, in common with six others, started the Green's Farms church about 1715, which was called Fairfield West parish, and he was made deacon in it. The tombstone over him in the lower ground mentions his being "deacon of the Fairfield West parish." He accumulated a large property. His son, Thomas Nash (2d), succeeded him as deacon in the same church. His son, Thomas Nash (3d), also succeeded him as deacon in the church, and was an efficient officer in the Revolution, capturing several prisoners, and saving portions of the town from devastation. He married Mary, daughter of William Burr, of Stratfield. She died about one hundred years ago, aged thirty-four. Some of her china is yet among her descendants in Westport and Fairfield, which proves china makes good heirlooms, being imperishable by time, moth, or rust. This Thomas Nash (3d) was at one time reputed to be the wealthiest man in Connecticut. He had one tract of land containing over one thousand acres. He and Capt. Simon Couch purchased a large tract in Redding.

He owned a hundred sheep, which were grazing near Campo when the British landed when they crossed the country to burn Danbury. His wife sent one of the slaves, of whom they had several, down to bring a sheep for dinner. The British then had landed; they yelled at the slave, frightening him so that he dropped the sheep and ran. The British took the whole flock. When the new church was to be built, Thomas Nash (3d) gave the site to the society. A burial-ground is located near by, to the eastward.

Of the descendants of Thomas Nash and Mary Burr, they number about four hundred. Of the first Nash settler in this country, there were between three and four thousand up to 1851. The family were undispersed here for more than one hundred years. Thomas Nash (3d), the Revolutionary hero, was father to the late Dr. William B. Nash, who died in Bridgeport, 1872, almost a nonagenarian. Some of Capt. Nash's grandchildren, great-grandchildren, and great-great-grandchildren—the seventh generation from the founder of this church—are regular worshippers there. One of the fifth generation, Mary Burr Hedenberg, is the owner of the home of the father of Chancellor Kent, in Campo. This Chancellor Kent was the Blackstone of America, and is responsible for the rule for computing partial payments in Connecticut. His home was purchased by Stephen Thorp, who was a sufferer from the Fairfield conflagration, in 1779. His son, Capt. Burr Thorp, married Rebecca Nash. They had several children; the eldest, Eleanor, married Stephen Bennett, of Greenfield. They both died, aged more than four-score, in Brooklyn, during the last decade; the next, Mary Burr, married Francis S. Hedenberg, of Swedish origin, the only family, except his brother's, of that name in the United States. At his death, in 1876, he was a stove-dealer and inventor. He put up the first base-burner (stove below, register above) in this country. About forty-four years ago he bought out the heirs to this Kent estate, and there he spent his later years; he formerly had an extensive business in New York City.

His widow, hale and hearty, born 1800, attends unassisted to the domestic duties of the family. Another sister, Sarah, married Capt. Charles Allen, of Westport. He is a descendant of another old Fairfield family. Some of their grandchildren are scattered in Bridgeport, Black Rock, and Westport. The youngest of the Thorp daughters married E. A. Williams, a shoe-dealer in Westport. He has now retired from business, and they reside with their daughter, Charlotte, wife of Wesley Lyon, Esq., a lawyer, brother of F. S. Lyon, editor of Norwalk Connecticut Republican, and descendants of the Lyon colonial house, in Fairfield.

To continue with the Nashes. They have scattered from the old plantation, owing to the reverse of fortune with Capt. Thomas (3d). He invested largely in Continental currency, which, when repudiated, impoverished many. He met with various other losses, so that he was greatly reduced, and his children had to set out for themselves.

There are descendants of the name in the town, but they are more associated with the presses. One had a newspaper-press in Westport; another a cider-press, with other mills, on the stream west of Westport village. Thomas Nash (3d) had a daughter, Charity, who married, first, Samuel Cable, who died at sea while on a journey for his health. They had three children, one of whom, absenting himself from his family twenty years, was an American "Enoch Arden." His family reside in Mystic, Conn. Another son was drowned in Saugatuck River. The daughter was burned to death, her clothes taking fire in her mother's absence, and, the servant being so flustered, the child ran till she was fatally injured. Charity married, second, Capt. Thomas Saunders, of a Norwalk family. They are of long standing in this country. The house of this family was not burned by the British, in Norwalk, in the general conflagration, as the wife was sick in bed; so the building was not fired. One of this family, Stephen Saunders, preached several years, and died in his parish, at South Salem, N. Y., and is always spoken of very respectfully and tenderly. Thomas Saunders married, first, a Blatchley, from Long Island, and had four children. One, Capt. Thomas, owned quite a tract of land not far from the depot in Norwalk. He died in the present decade aged over eighty. A sister is the widow of David Faucher, deacon of the Congregational Church of Lansingburg. Capt. Thomas and his wife, Charity, occupied the place opposite the Kent grounds. They have been greatly improved by the various owners, of whom were Barretts and Cockrofts. Capt. Thomas Saunders, in his later years, started a business which now is a source of great revenue, but was not considered respectable in his day,—the placing of sea-food—oysters, clams, scallops, and crabs—in the market and finding safe for them. After he died the place was disposed of, but, owing to some illegal proceedings on the part of the agent, a good title has never been given.

Owing to the size of the Saugatuck River the lowest fordable place on the king's highway from New York to Boston was two and a half miles from its mouth, which made it trying to parties living on opposite banks, who had to go five miles to reach a point but a few rods away. If the railroad had not been built, a foot-bridge being on one side, the people might possibly have accomplished the building of a carriage-bridge in much less time than one hundred years, although the scenes were ludicrous that occurred for want of means of transit. The parties along the banks had boats, but often when needed they were on directly opposite shores. Strangers often were vexed to find some extra weary miles must be taken to accomplish a few rods, therefore amusement, adventure, and romance were the order of the day. Harriet Saunders, a brave maiden, rowed a boat across the waters when rough with a couple of boards, to accommodate a young man. He so admired her pluck he sought her acquaintance, and in time bore her away to his home in a neighboring State.

The Thorps have had a name known long in town in common with other towns.

William, the ancestor of the first Thorp, lived in New Haven in 1647. Of his children we record of Nathan, Eliphalet, John, Samuel, and Eleanor, whose baptisms were recorded between 1640 and 1648. Samuel Thorp appears to have been the ancestor of the line in the next generation, whose children, Abigail, Samuel, David, Gershom, Anna, Jeremiah were recorded from 1709 to 1721. David was the father of Stephen, who lost his house in the Fairfield conflagration. Eliphalet, whose family record is in Capt. John Gould's family from 1761 to 1776.

Stephen Thorp purchased the home belonging to Moss Kent (written sometimes Moses), the Chancellor James Kent's father. Stephen Thorp's son, Burr, tore down the old house, and built on the same site the present building about 1790. His seven children were born here between the years 1792 and 1809.

Capt. Burr Thorp brought here his bride, Rebecca Nash, Jan. 16, 1791. The same night word came to him that he must board his vessel immediately to save his property. He had a deck-load of horses to be taken to the West Indies. For some cause some of them jumped overboard. In a few hours the ship started for its destination, and he was absent many weeks from his bride. Such was the way the honeymoon was spent in those days,—“business first, pleasure afterwards.” Capt. Burr Thorp was a wide-awake maritime man, full of business and adventure, so much so that it was an accepted saying, “Capt. Thorp would go to sea in a tea-kettle.” On a trip South with his father he, with another young man, were washed overboard. After a long and unsuccessful search his father gave them up for lost, and proceeded up the James River. Having opportunity, he sent tidings home of the loss of his son, and had prayers offered in church for his safety. These young men, being good swimmers, had reached the shore, but the ship's officers received no intimation of their safety. They subsisted the best they could, but kept watch for the boat to return with its freight exchanged.

Capt. Thorp on his way back saw some men on shore waving to him to stop, and at last heard the voice which he would have thought was his son's had he not supposed he was drowned. He sent out a boat, and to his great joy found both men safe.

Capt. Burr Thorp followed the sea forty years. As he was once coming from England he perceived a large sea-monster near. With the spirit of adventure, after the custom of the time, he brought out his harpoon, which he threw with such force he fell overboard into the sea, but he held on to the rope. Boats were let down and search was made for him, but, being unsuccessful, all on board, both crew and passengers, lamented sorely the loss of the captain. One man on board persisted in walking the deck and watching for him. At last he was rewarded by seeing something shine on the water like a glass bottle. Soon it appeared like a man's head. The boat was lowered again and went to the rescue.

* Letters were sent them asking for information, which never came.

It proved to be the captain, who met with the loss of one boat. The animal was also captured. At the time of the accident the ship was going at eleven knots an hour.

Capt. Burr Thorp had a son Henry, who was also captain. He had a new sailing-vessel out on her first trip, on a Southern voyage. It was captured by the English in 1812. They boarded her, took off all the men and provisions, but left the captain on board and towed him off one night. He thought at one time he would cut loose from the moorings, but then, having no men nor provisions on board, such a course would be only death to him. A long night of anxiety followed. In the morning he made known to his captors, by the usual signs, that he was a Mason, so they spared his life, and set him on shore at Norfolk, Va., after having burnt his vessel to the water's edge. He walked from there to New York, begging his way along, but his exposure was such he contracted a malarial disease which ended his days, Aug. 13, 1818.

Green's Farms has contributed nobly to the world in furnishing it with representative men and women who are worthy of honor through the land. Between thirty and forty of her sons have been graduates of college, mostly of Yale. Several have occupied pulpits of no mean degree, and has furnished one theologian, through his maternal ancestry, of notoriety,—Moses Stuart, of Andover. Professors' chairs have been filled; the American bar has been enriched; Congress has been witness to the ability of her sons; Denmark knew of this country through a plenipotentiary from Green's Farms. The bench, the medical profession, the mercantile world, the high seas, and the civil service have been well represented here. Green's Farms' daughters have blessed mankind as being among the honorable and useful women of the land, adding their brilliancy and virtues to the lot of a Governor, missionary, ministers, and other professionals. A large history could be written of Green's Farms alone, but enough is given to show it is worthy of a separate chapter.

In 1831 measures were taken to organize and build a church in the village of Saugatuck (which was incorporated in May, 1835, into Westport). METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The construction of the present church was commenced in the year 1851. Rev. Z. Davenport, now living at Saugatuck, Conn., was at that time the preacher in charge. Services were held in the old Universalist church for about two years, and until the Methodist Episcopal church was completed.

The first board of trustees were Edward Farrell, F. C. Foote, Allen Renoud, B. V. Russell, and S. W. Mecker. The first board of stewards were F. C. Foote, G. Lloyd, S. Geurnsey, Aaron Bennett. The first class-leaders were F. C. Foote, George Lloyd,

The record of membership was at this time kept mostly by class-leaders, whose books show a membership of forty, and the number has increased until in 1880 there are one hundred and fourteen.

The original members were mostly persons who had in former years belonged to the same denomination and had worshiped at a church about two miles north of Westport village, at Poplar Plains.

The first Methodist sermon preached within the limits of this town was at Poplar Plain, in 1790, by Jesse Lee, in a house standing a few rods west of the now old church. Some few years after this regular preaching services were held in a ball-room of a tavern near by, and until the meeting-house was built, about the year 1817, slabs upon legs being used for about forty years before the room was regularly seated. The old church is still standing, and is occasionally used upon some funeral occasion, the members having mostly died, the others having joined with some other Methodist society.

The trustees of the present Westport Methodist Episcopal Church are D. A. Salmon, J. Goodsell (3d), A. Bennett, J. B. Goodsell, J. Raymond, H. B. Coley, Isaac Allen, William H. Wells, Levi Coley. The stewards are William H. Allen, Sylv. Harris, W. M. Harris, William E. Nash, F. M. Raymond, J. B. Mills, J. Goodsell, H. Lyon, and A. W. Bradley. Ministers and date of apportionment: 1850-51, Z. Davenport; 1852-53, F. A. Craft; 1854-55, L. P. Perry; 1856-57, C. B. Ford; 1858-59, H. D. Latham; 1860-61, A. B. Pulling; 1862-63, D. Nash; 1864, George Hollis; 1865-67, Joseph Vinton; 1868-69, T. SAUGATUCK METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This church was built in 1852 by Morris Ketchum, Sidney G. Miller, Horace Staples, Francis Burrett, and others. It was dedicated the same year, and presented to the society free of debt. Rev. Dr. Thomas E. Bond, of New York, then editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, assisted by Dr. Asa Hill, of Norwalk, conducted the dedication service. Rev. Z. Davenport supplied the pulpit for a period of four years, after which it was placed under the pastoral charge of Westport Church. Several years ago it separated from Westport charge, and has been supplied from Conference by the following ministers: Revs. Miles N. Olmstead, D. L. Lounsbury, R. S. Eldredge, A. B. Sanford, W. Robertson, and David Osborn (present pastor). The trustees are William H. Allen, George B. Smith, George Hale, Frank Godfrey, Joseph Warnock, and C. O. Jelliff.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY.

The following-named gentlemen—viz., R. H. Winslow, J. Morse, D. J. Townsend, N. Cleveland, M. L. Mason, J. E. Perring, James Gardner, E. M.

Lees, J. R. Nichols, E. S. Downs, J. F. Bulkley, Samuel Gorham (2d), and J. C. Cotter—assembled, April 11, 1860, at the residence of John Cleaveland for the purpose of organizing a second Episcopal society in the town of Westport. Nehemiah Cleaveland was chosen moderator, and M. L. Mason clerk. It was voted to organize such society, and that the name of same be “The Church of the Holy Trinity.” The following officers were then chosen by ballot: Wardens, Nehemiah Cleaveland, Myron L. Mason; Vestrymen, R. H. Winslow, Francis Burritt, E. S. Downs, John Cleaveland, D. J. Townsend, William Wood; Treasurer, R. H. Winslow; Clerk, James R. Nichols.

At a special meeting held April 24, 1860, it was voted to extend a call to Rev. John Purves (who at that time was rector of Christ Church in this place) to become their rector, and on the 26th of the same month he accepted. The society then rented for present use the building on Main Street formerly occupied as a Universalist meeting-house. In May of that year the society purchased the property corner of East Church Street and Myrtle Avenue, known as the “Wakeman Lot,” for the sum of two thousand dollars. R. H. Winslow, Francis Burritt, and Daniel J. Townsend were appointed a committee, with power to build a stone church edifice and chapel upon the “Wakeman Lot,” and to complete and furnish the same upon such plan, and in such mode and manner in all respects, as they may deem proper or expedient. The committee were also instructed to make all contracts necessary in order to carry into effect and fully to exercise the power delegated to them. In February, 1861, the society met with a great loss in the decease of Mr. Richard H. Winslow, and in the following April the decease of Mr. Francis Burritt. The church edifice which had been commenced by Mr. Winslow was after his death finished by his widow, Mary Fitch Winslow, who tendered its use to the society of the “Holy Trinity.” In January, 1862, a deep-seated dissatisfaction existed between the rector and some of the members of the society, whereupon he was requested to resign, but declined to do so, and the society decided not to open the new church edifice until they should be relieved of the services of Rev. Mr. Purves, which did not occur until Feb. 18, 1862. About this time the name of the society was changed to “The Memorial Church of the Holy Trinity.”

In October, 1862, Rev. William H. Benjamin became rector of the parish, and filled that position until the spring of 1864, when he tendered his resignation, which was accepted. The society had no stated clergyman again until Jan. 1, 1865, when the Rev. John Eaton Smith became rector, and filled that position acceptably, until, owing to failing health, he was obliged to resign, which he did, June, 1870. His decease occurred in September of the same year. The Rev. Lawrence S. Stevens became rector in October, 1870, and continued as such until April, 1875, and the Rev. A. N. Lewis accepted July 1, 1875, and is rector at the present time. The officers at present are as follows: Wardens, William L. Coley, George Jelliffe; Vestrymen, A. S. Hurlbutt, H. B. Gilbert, Lewis Bradley, A. T. Burr, E. S. Downes, W. S. Rogers, William E. Sturges; Treasurer, A. T. Burr; Clerk, John S. Jones; Organist, Frederick D. Marvin; Sexton, Joseph Spicer.

The site on which Memorial church is built was the “Wakeman Place,” formerly an old inn. Gen. Washington passed a night at this inn in September, 1789, while returning from Hartford, where he had been to meet Count Rochambeau. During the demolition of the ancient edifice there was found among the débris a French crown-piece of an early date in the eighteenth century, in excellent preservation.

CHRIST CHURCH.

A number of Episcopalians having met at the dwelling-house of William Nash, in Saugatuck, on the 11th day of March, 1833, to take into consideration the propriety of building an Episcopal house of public worship, to be located on the west side of the Saugatuck River, which being duly considered, it was deemed necessary that said house be built, and that a meeting be holden on the 18th inst. to draw up a subscription for building the church, which subscription to be binding provided the sum of two thousand dollars shall be subscribed.

At a meeting holden at the school-house, May 13, Taylor Hurlbutt was chosen chairman and Robert Raymond clerk.

Voted, That Taylor Hurlbutt be appointed treasurer to receive the amount subscribed for building the church.

Voted, That Taylor Hurlbutt, Daniel Nash, Jabez Adams, Isaac Adams, Dennis Nash, Edwin Wheeler, William Nash, Noah Nash, and Philo W. Jones be appointed a committee to contract for building the church, the plan and size of the building to be left to the committee, which, together with the proposals for building, be laid before this meeting for approval.

At a meeting held at the residence of Philo W. Jones, June 17, 1833, it was voted to accept the deed of land on which the church was built, from Taylor Hurlbutt, for the sum of four hundred dollars.

The corner-stone of the church was laid May 9, 1834, Bishop Brownell officiating, assisted by Rev. Jackson Kemper, of Norwalk. The names of the building committee, together with a Bible, prayer-book, and a copy of the Churchman, a paper printed in New York, were deposited in the stone.

The society was legally organized Oct. 28, 1835, at a meeting held in the room over the store of Jesse Bradley & Co., by the election of the following officers: Wardens, Daniel Nash and Taylor Hurlbutt; Vestrymen, Lewis Raymond, Dennis Nash, Keeler Nash, Gould Jelliff, Lewis Partrick, Edward H. Nash, and William Nash; Treasurer, Edward H. Nash; Choristers, Uriah Taylor and Edward H. Nash; Sexton, Philo W. Jones. The edifice was consecrated on the 2d of November, 1835.

At the annual meeting, held April, 1850, in consequence of Lewis Raymond's health not being very good, and at his request, it was thought best to choose an assistant warden, and Philo W. Jones was elected as such officer, which position he held to the time of his death, in July, 1876. Mr. Nash died in 1865, when Mr. Jones was elected senior warden and Edward H. Nash junior warden.

The following clergymen have filled the position of rector of the parish: Revs. Jackson Kemper, Edward Ingersoll, Billiard Bryant, Edward C. Bull, William H. Frisbie, John Purves, John R. Williams,—the latter of whom, elected July 8, 1860, is the present rector.

The present officers are as follows: Senior Warden, Edward H. Nash; Junior Warden, Andrew C. Nash; Vestrymen, Alfred Taylor, Oscar I. Jones, Charles L. Wilson, H. E. Sherwood, William H. Marvin, George S. Adams, Peter Bulkley, George B. Bouton, Edward A. Nash, Lewis B. Bradley; Clerk, Edward A. Nash; Organist, Edward A. Nash; Treasurer, George S. Adams; Sexton, John W. Gorham.

THE UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

This church, now obsolete, was organized in about 1834 or 1835, and among the first members were Alva Gray, Burr Keeler, Daniel Andrews, Platt Pensal, Wm. Burwell, Davis Taylor, John Baker, David Hubbard, Geo. L. Cable, S. H. Keeler. The first officers of the church were Alva Gray, Burr Keeler, and Daniel Andrews, Committee; Geo. L. Cable, Clerk; S. H. Keeler, Treasurer. Soon after the organization of the church a house of worship was erected. Among the ministers who served this church were Wm. A. Stickney, Fortree Hitchcock, D. H. Plumb, Chas. Bailey, and others. The society finally waned, and in 1870 the church building was sold to H. H. Belden, and converted into a dwelling.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

During the year 1832 a small hand-engine was purchased by a number of citizens of the village of Saugatuck (now the town of Westport). The machine was probably at that time considered of great value at a fire, but at this late day would not attract much attention except for its oddity. In the month of May in that year the General Assembly of the State granted a charter to Robert Raymond, Geo. W. Comstock, Wm. S. Comstock, and Edwin Bennett, and such others as they may associate with them, to be known as the "Saugatuck Fire Company," and on the 9th of July, at a meeting held at the store of G. W. & W. S. Comstock, the following officers were elected: President, Robert Raymond, who was also chosen Secretary and Treasurer; First Foreman, Seth Sears; Second Foreman, Elnathan Wheeler; Third Foreman, Robert Raymond; Chief Engineer, W. S. Comstock.

Upon the roll of members we find the following names: Seth Sears, Elnathan Wheeler, Robt. Raymond, W. S. Comstock, Wm. Bennett, Edson Bradley, Fredk. Dannel, David S. Hubbell, Ezra Smith, James Douglass, Chas. Fox, Gould Gregory, Horace Staples, Ward Nichols, Wm. Platt, F. A. Wheeler, N. H. Price, S. Gray, Walter Nichols, John B. Adams, Hez. B. Lord, Harvey Sanderson, Henry Beers, John Baker, G. W. Comstock, Wm. Bradley, George Fairehild, E. W. Banks, Jas. Gilbert, J. O. Lurk, B. V. Russell, F. Akin, Barzilla Brown, Jesse Bradley, Henry Bulkley, Lewis Bradley, G. N. Banks, Thos. Riley, Ezra Brown, Edwin Tibills, Woolsey Bradley, Wm. L. Beers, Wm. Wells, A. S. Hurlbutt, D. W. Bradley, A. Houghtaling, E. S. Downes, George Platt.

The last record we find of this company is in 1844, at which time the members were assessed the sum of six and a quarter cents!

In 1858 the "Saugatuck Fire-Engine" was dug out of the filth and dirt from under the barn of B. V. Russell, cleaned and put in order, repainted, and named "The Union." A company was formed, with the following officers: Foreman, John S. Jones; Assistant Foreman, Edwin E. Warner; Treasurer, Elijah S. Downes; Secretary, Oscar I. Jones. The company never made but one appearance in public with "The Union," on account of its uselessness.

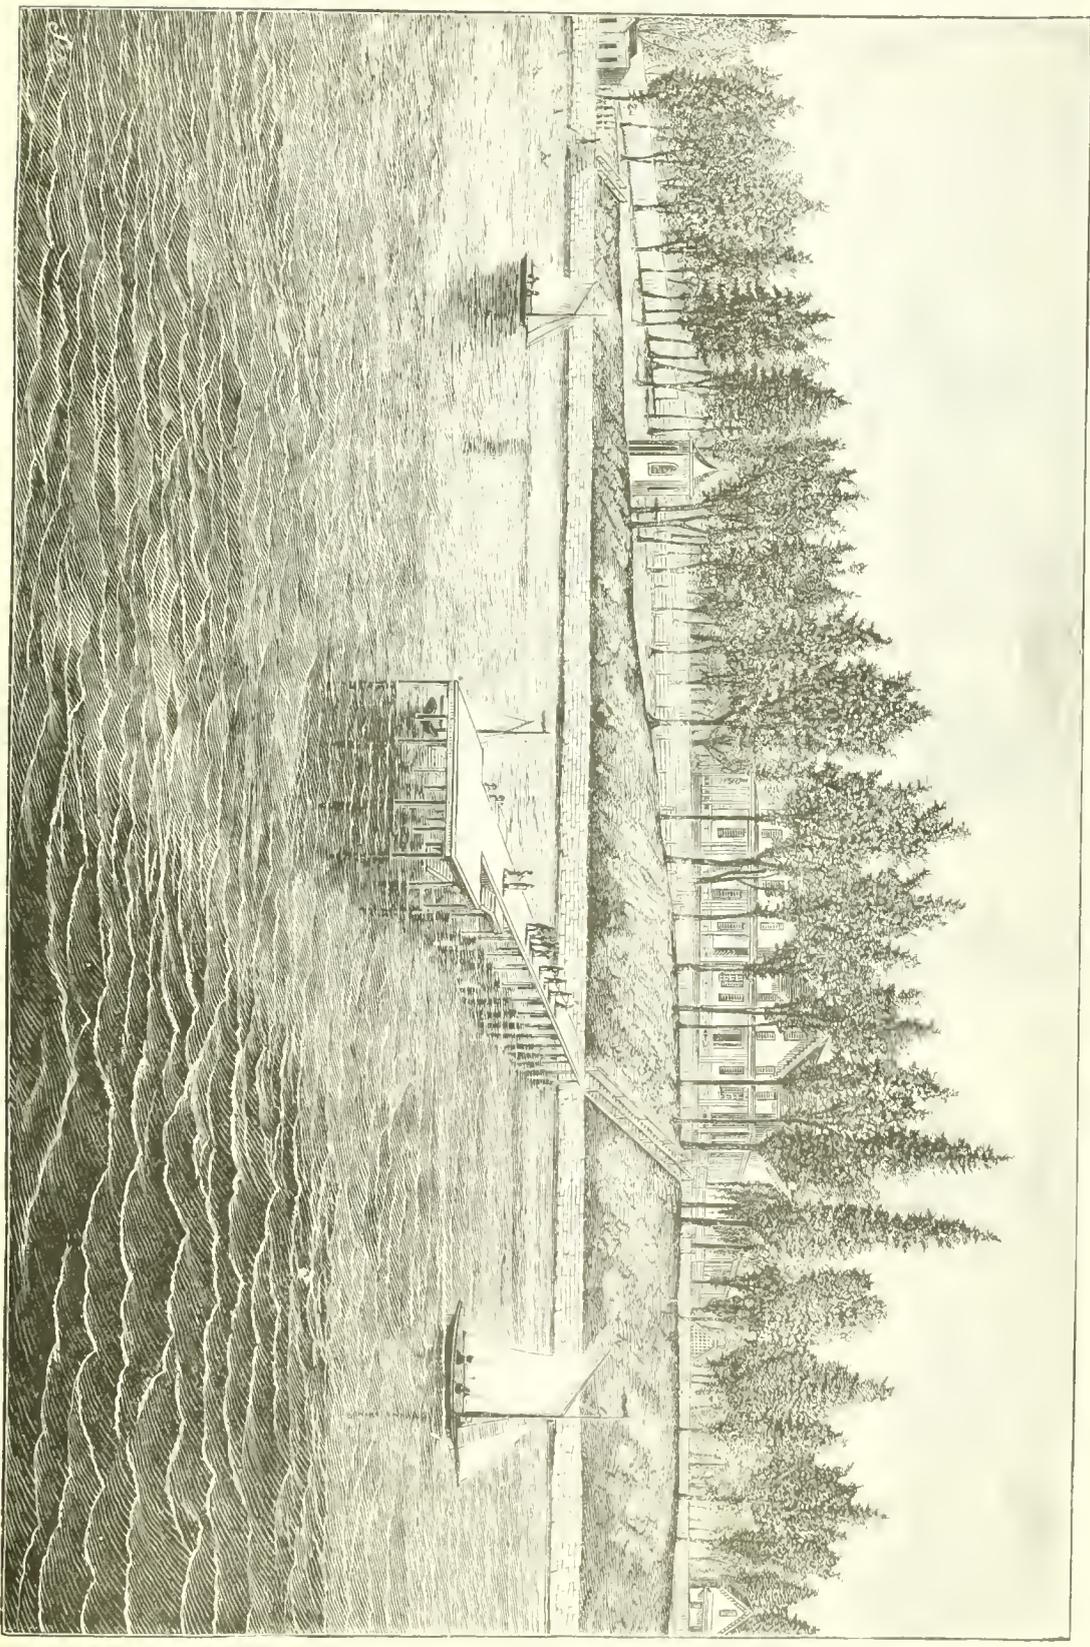

In June of the same year a subscription-paper with the following heading was circulated:

"We, the undersigned, do agree to pay to Myron L. Mason the sums annexed to our respective names, for the purpose of procuring a fire-engine and suitable apparatus for this village.

"Dated Westport, June 3, 1858."

To this paper was subscribed the sum of four hundred and twenty dollars and fifty cents.

Numerous committees were appointed from time to time to purchase an engine, but without success during that year. At one time Messrs. M. L. Mason and O. I. Jones visited Stamford and, as they supposed, bought "Hunneman" engine, but before it could be put on board of the cars one of the owners decided that he would not sell, and the committee came home only to be laughed at.

RESIDENCE OF MRS. J. L. PHIPPS, GREEN'S FARMS, FAIRFIELD CO., CONN.

On another occasion Sullivan Moulton and J. S. Jones were sent to Ansonia, where they made a bargain for an engine which was to be delivered in Westport in a week, but the following day a letter was received stating that one of the owners would not consent to the sale,—consequently that caused another laugh.

In January, 1859, a meeting was held (by the subscribers of the paper to purchase an engine) in Betts' Hall to consider the expediency of withdrawing their subscriptions.

E. M. Lees, Esq., was chosen chairman and H. H. Belden secretary. At which time it was voted,—

"That we, the subscribers, do not think it expedient to pay back the money collected, or any which may hereafter be collected, until we have found to a certainty that an engine cannot be purchased suitable for this place with the money subscribed, or until such time as we, the subscribers, think best.

"Voted. That a committee of five be appointed to purchase an engine, and that the following gentlemen be said committee: Jonas H. Phelps, William Wood, E. S. Downes, John S. Jones, Charles H. Taylor."

During the month of February the committee learned that the city of Waterbury had two hand-engines which they wished to dispose of. Messrs. Taylor and Phelps therefore visited Waterbury, examined the engines, and obtained the prices. About a week later the rest of the committee, viz., Wood, Jones, and Downes, went to Waterbury and purchased Phenix Engine, No. 1, for the sum of three hundred dollars, and they at the same time bought two hundred feet of hemp hose, for which they paid one hundred dollars.

The machine arrived in Westport on the 11th day of March, 1859, and was taken to Lee's factory, where it was overhauled and put in working order. The engine was of the piano style, manufactured by Van Ness & Co., of New York. At a meeting of "Union" Engine Company, held in Betts' Hall, April 11, 1859, it was voted to reorganize under the name of "Compo Engine Company, No. 2," and the following officers were elected: Foreman, John S. Jones; Assistant Foreman, Edwin E. Warner; Treasurer, Elijah S. Downes; Secretary, Oscar I. Jones.

At this time, the company having no house, the engine was stored in different barns about the village. The first service the company ever saw was at the burning of Wakeman's candle-factory, on West Avenue, on the night of May 28, 1859, at which time the machine was kept in constant operation for over four hours, thereby saving the entire lumber-yard of Staples & Adams and a number of adjoining buildings.

At the May session of the Assembly of the State a charter was granted to John S. Jones, Edwin E. Warner, Elijah S. Downes, Oscar I. Jones, and Myron L. Mason, and such other persons as shall associate themselves with the above, not exceeding sixty in the whole, to be known as the "Compo Fire-Engine Company, No. 2." In January, 1860, a committee, consisting of E. E. Warner, J. S. Jones, and R. D. Cable, was appointed to build an engine-house, and that as soon as a suitable site could be obtained the foreman was to call the company together to put up the building. Accordingly, in the following month, the company were summoned by the foreman to appear on the following Monday morning, at two o'clock, with lighted lanterns. The frame of the building had already been got out and loaded on trucks and carts, which the company proceeded to drag to the place selected by the committee, which was near the shore, in front of the residence of Henry Jesup (now owned by James R. Jesup, his son), which ground the committee thought belonged to the town. As the sun rose in the eastern sky the frame was all up and the roof-boards were being rapidly put in position, when a messenger from Mr. Jesup (who was confined to his house) appeared on the ground and informed Foreman Jones that he must stop at once; but the company did not feel inclined to obey, but kept steadily at work.

At ten o'clock, M. L. Mason, Esq., who was an attorney-at-law, and counsel for Mr. Jesup, and also a member of the engine company, informed the foreman that he would have him arrested if he did not desist; was told to arrest if he thought proper. At this time nearly all the citizens of the village were centred around the disputed property, the majority of whom sided with the company, claiming that the property did not belong to Mr. Jesup. At about two p.m. Lawyer Mason arrived from Norwalk, armed with an injunction issued by Judge Butler of that place. After a long time an officer was found who served the paper on the company, who immediately adjourned to their hall, and decided to not leave the building on that ground if another site could be obtained. In about an hour Capt. John F. Bulkley informed the company that he would give them two years' rent of ground if they would move it to his property on Main Street, which offer they at once accepted, and immediately procured four pairs of wheels, placing a pair of each under each corner of the building, when they were informed by the officer of the law that the building must not be moved; but the company "could not see it in that light," and with four yoke of oxen and fifty-five laddies on the drag-ropes, when the foreman gave the order "to set her ahead," the building began to move up Main Street amid the deafening cheers of the multitude, and at six o'clock the same evening the building stood where it has stood ever since. The company never heard any more of the injunction. The present officers of the company are: Foreman, John S. Jones;

Assistant Foreman, John W. Gault; Secretary, Lewis B. Bradley; Treasurer, Elijah S. Downes; Chairman, George F. Thorpe; Foreman of Hose, Joseph Mills; Librarian, John W. Perry; Assistant Librarian, Robert Gault.

In February, 1874, Vigilant Engine Company, No. 3, was organized with the following officers: Foreman, Frederick Sherwood; Assistant Foreman, Oscar I. Jones; Secretary, Charles Harris; Treasurer, F. Dwight Fanton; Chairman, George H. Taylor.

During the same month an engine (which was built in Baltimore, Md., in 1858, and afterwards sold to parties in New York City) was purchased by Messrs. H. Staples, E. H. Nash, A. C. Nash, A. Lockwood, T. R. Lees, Frederick Morehouse, E. W. Taylor, J. E. Lees, and others, of this place, and put in possession of Vigilant Engine Company, No. 3, the present officers of which are: Foreman, Edward Wheeler; Assistant Foreman, N. S. Kirk; Secretary, Joseph T. Hull; Treasurer, H. E. Sherwood; Chairman, O. I. Jones; Foreman of Hose, James Hart.

The engine-house is located on the opposite side of the river from Compo Engine.

In March, 1874, Ambrose S. Hurlbutt, Esq., purchased a hook-and-ladder truck from a company in Norwalk, which was received in Westport, March 19th, by "Compo" and "Vigilant" Engine Companies, who, after parading the various streets of the village, delivered the truck over to the "Pioneer" Hook-and-Ladder Company, No. 1, which had been organized with the following officers: President, C. B. Lyon; Foreman, Frederick Kemper; First Assistant, Elbert Wheeler; Second Assistant, Frank M. Bulkley; Secretary, Charles B. Guyer; Treasurer, C. H. Kemper, Jr.

The truck-house is located on Main Street, adjoining the house of Compo Engine.

CEMETERIES.

The oldest cemetery in the town is at Green's Farms. There is one also near the residence of G. S. Adams; one in connection with Christ Church; one called "Evergreen Cemetery," belonging to the Congregational Church.

The only incorporated cemetery is "Willow Brook," located a short distance north of the village.

POST-OFFICE.

The following is a list of the postmasters of Westport since the incorporation of the town in 1835:

In 1827 the quarterly return of the Westport postmaster to the general post-office, of newspapers and pamphlets received, showed the receipt to be one daily, eight semi-weekly, and twenty-one weekly papers, three-monthly publications, and one quarterly. The daily paper was the New York Mercantile Advertiser; the semi-weekly, three copies of the National Intelligencer, of Washington City, and five of the New York Spectator; the twenty-one weeklies were about one-half of a religious character, and were published in different places; two of the three monthly pamphlets were the African Repository, published at Washington, in and of the Colonization Society, and one the Ladies' Repository; the quarterly was an English publication. A post-riider probably distributed some sixty to seventy weekly papers at the houses of the inhabitants. If the number be seventy, then the whole number of papers for the year, by mail and post, would be five thousand and eighty-four, and probably the pamphlets would make about twelve hundred pages, and we have the whole newspaper and pamphlet reading-matter of the town at that time.

"The abstract of the lists of taxable property in the town of Westport," says the late Alva Gray, "returned by the assessors for 1871, shows under the head of pleasure wagons and carriages the sum of twenty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-five dollars, which is probably not more than one-third of the actual value of this description of property. What the value of carriages and wagons might have been in 1809 I have no means of knowing, but believe it could not have exceeded three thousand dollars. Eight old-fashioned gigs, of the value of one hundred and fifty dollars each, comprised the sum total of taxable carriages. One-horse wagons were hardly known; a two-horse coach was a curiosity, only in the reach of some aristocrat of great wealth. I remember one only, that of old Isaac Bronson, of Greenfield, and when at a brigade training on Coley's Plains, I think in that year, Bronson's coach, driven by special permission within the lines, attracted as much attention as the soldiers. The first one-horse wagon I can recollect was owned by Capt. Ebenezer Coley about 1806 or 1807, made by Ephraim Sanford, of Reading, then the only wagon-maker in this section. Capt. Coley was a very large man, weighing probably two hundred and fifty pounds, and as he grew old, had his wagon made for his special use,—low and wide, the seat on rollers, so that he could with ease be rolled in and out by his negro men, of whom he had four or five. This description of vehicles did not get into general use before about 1830. There was little travel except on horseback before that time. A stage-coach, carrying the mail and a few passengers, passed daily through our village, and a passage to New York could be had for three dollars, leaving here about five o'clock P.M., and reaching the city about the same hour in the morning."

INCIDENT.

Westport has had many enterprising inhabitants, one of whom deserves special notice. About the year 1832, Mr. Daniel Platt, a very energetic man, carrying on the carriage business in this place at that time, determined on building a barn complete in one day. Mr. Stephen Nash, a man of like energy (who is now living, and over eighty years of age), was selected as the carpenter. Mr. Nash took the plan, and after surveying its dimensions promised to take the job in hand and have it completed at the required time. He was told to select his men and be ready such a day. The barn was to be 26 by 36 feet. The timber, lumber, shingle, nails, and ten gallons "Old Jamaica" were on hand. Mr. Nash engaged the services of nine carpenters, and sixteen farmers, who knew what work was, and on the day appointed were all on hand, and the work commenced. The frame was hewed, mortised, and put up; sided, roof shingled, two pair large doors and five small ones made, hinges, hooks, and staples made, put on, and doors hung; gutters and leaders put up, and the barn painted throughout, the floors laid, six shocks of rye threshed out, the grain cleaned up and taken to mill, the flour returned, and Mrs. Platt had biscuit for tea made of the same, enough to accommodate all present. Time consumed, ten hours. The barn is in good condition and still standing on the premises of Mr. F. B. Morehouse, on West Avenue.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. RICHARD HENRY WINSLOW.

Hon. Richard Henry Winslow, son of Richard and Mary Corning Winslow, was born in Albany, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1806, and was a direct descendant of Kenelin Winslow, one of the "Mayflower" pilgrims in 1620.

His schoolboy days were spent in Albany; on leaving school, at the age of sixteen, he commenced his business career with R. J. Knowlson, who was at that time one of the leading business men of that city; from there he removed to Canandaigua, N. Y., and entered the service of Deacon Thomas Beals, who was then one of the prominent merchants of Central New York.

In 1825 he left Canandaigua, and went to join his uncle, Leonard Corning, in South America, who at that time and for many years afterwards was American consul at Maranhão, Brazil. Here he was placed in charge of important interests in connection with the consulate and his uncle's affairs; among other duties made a voyage to France as supercargo, returning to Brazil within twelve months, after a successful accomplishment of the objects of the voyage.

In consequence of ill effects of the climate upon his health he returned to New York in 1828, and not long after entered into copartnership with Mr. M. C. Morgan, in the general produce commission business, under the firm of Morgan & Winslow; this connection continued until 1832, when a copartnership was formed with Mr. Tilley Allen, in the stock and money exchange business, in Wall Street. Mr. Allen remained in the firm but a year or two, Mr. Winslow continuing the business on his own account for a year or more, when he associated himself with J. Newton Perkins, under the firm of Winslow & Perkins. From thenceforth the business was greatly extended, embracing banking, the negotiating of State stock, mortgage bonds for the construction of railroads, this house being the pioneer in introducing to the public in this country railway mortgages with bonds based thereon, the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railway securities being the first of this class that were placed upon the American market. The remarkable success of that negotiation was soon followed by other like issues, and gave such position and prominence to the firm as made it the leading negotiator of many subsequent transactions of like character.

On Mr. Winslow's retirement from the stock exchange a pair of silver pitchers were presented to him on which was the following inscription: "Presented by the New York Stock and Exchange Board to their Vice-President, Richard Henry Winslow, Esq., Nov. 6, 1839." About the year 1848, Mr. Perkins retired from the firm, and was immediately succeeded by Mr. J. F. D. Lanier, of Indiana, where he had become prominent in the management of banking and State finances; the firm then became Winslow & Lanier. Shortly afterwards two younger brothers of Mr. Winslow were added to the firm, and the name changed to Winslow, Lanier & Co., and, while the membership of the house has in the mean time undergone several changes, the firm-name remains unaltered up to this day, and takes rank among the foremost banking-houses of the country.

In 1859, Mr. Winslow's health being seriously impaired by his intense devotion to the business that had become greatly extended, retired to his beautiful country home at Westport, Conn., to reap the fruits of no ordinary business career that had extended through a period of nearly forty years.

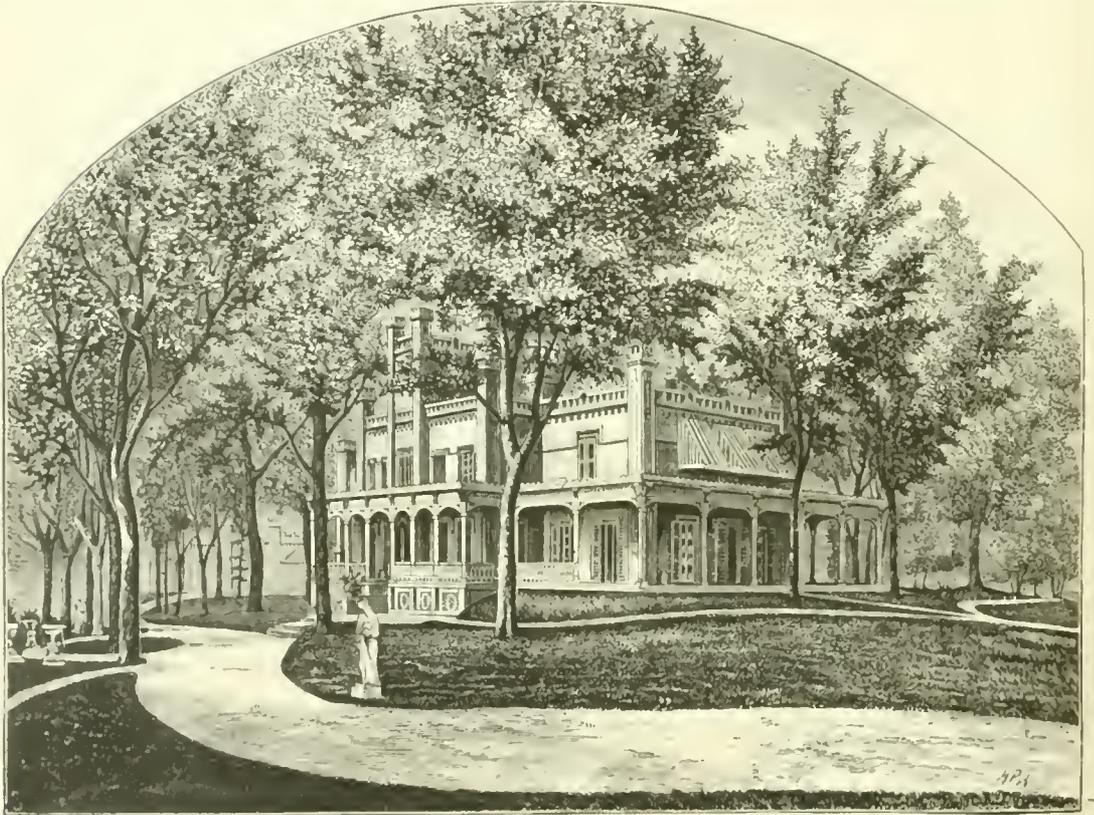

In 1858, Mr. Winslow was a member of the General Assembly, House of Representatives, and in the year 1859 he was a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor. In the year 1860 (April), Mr. Winslow was State Senator, Tenth Senatorial (Bridgeport) District; served his term with acceptance, securing the friendship of the late Governor Seymour and other leading citizens of the State, who remember him with feelings of singular attachment. In 1829 he married Miss Robertson, of New York, by whom he had three daughters who survive him, and two sons who died in infancy.

In 1854 he contracted a second marriage, with Miss Mary E. Fitch, of Norwich, Conn., who survives him in the enjoyment of an ample fortune bequeathed to her at his death. Mr. Winslow died at Westport, Fairfield Co., Conn., Feb. 14, 1861. Mr. Winslow in his intercourse with the men of his time, in the varied relations in active life, impressed himself with being a gentleman of marked characteristics, which made him sought for by all who appreciate character and administrative ability.

In conversation illumined by extended reading and knowledge of the world he was singularly interesting, in sagacity clear, as well as positive in his views. In the conception of measures he was far-reaching, and bold in their execution; in the power of winning others to aid in carrying out his plans he had few equals and no superiors. He was affectionate by nature, unshaken in his attachments and confidences, faithful in his friendships, and large in his benefactions; while those who knew him as brother, husband, and friend will never cease to love and cherish his memory.

"HOKANUM,"

RESIDENCE OF THE LATE MORRIS KETCHUM, WESTPORT, CONN.

MORRIS KETCHUM.

Morris Ketchum, whose home at "Hokanum," in the town of Westport, Conn., has for many years been known as one of the most attractive and elegant country-seats, was born in Waterford, Saratoga Co., N. Y., in the year 1796. His father, Amos Ketchum, was descended from one of the earliest settlers of the county.

At an early age young Ketchum came to Westport to attend school; he here formed the acquaintance of the ladies who subsequently became his first and second wives; they were sisters, daughters of Mr. Silas Burr. At the age of sixteen he commenced his business studies in New York City; two years later he visited Savannah, Ga., where he established business as a cotton broker, making himself thoroughly acquainted with the grading of cotton, and the manner of handling it from the field to its delivery into the manufacturer's hands. His success was immediate; he soon obtained the confidence and patronage which justified his opening a commission house in New York, in association with his father. The sagacity and business ability thus early exhibited naturally attracted attention. Mr. Ketchum was offered a partnership with Mr. Rogers, famous as the builder of locomotive-engines, at Paterson, N. J. The firm-style was Rogers, Ketchum & Grosvenor. In the distribution of duties and functions Mr. Ketchum became the financier of this prosperous firm, and in his transactions with the railroad magnates of the entire continent gave abundant evidence that in the world of finance he had found his legitimate sphere of action. The firm described above entered the banking business in addition to manufacturing. On Mr. Grosvenor retiring from it the style was changed to Ketchum, Rogers & Bement, later its style became Ketchum, Howe & Co., and finally Morris Ketchum, Son & Co. These partnerships covered nearly forty years of Mr. Ketchum's eventful life, and many very important enterprises were undertaken and carried to successful completion under their auspices.

At a day when many deemed the scheme impractical Mr. Ketchum gave a hearty support to the building of the New York and New Haven Railroad, and it is safe to say no man contributed more than he to its successful establishment.

Of the Illinois Central Railroad he was one of the earliest projectors, aiding in securing its wonderful land grant and finding a market for its bonds. To rightly estimate the magnitude of this work it should be considered not in the light of to-day, but of that early time in the history of railroads in the West; but few men had the sagacity to anticipate the resources of the country now tributary to that important railway. Mr. Ketchum not only appreciated its prospective importance, but he inspired confidence in others in a remarkable manner.

Confidence is said to be a plant of slow growth. How had Mr. Ketchum acquired it? This legitimate inquiry regarding him may be answered in two ways: First, his judgment was sound; always based on thorough knowledge of all attainable facts in the case, a comprehensive mind qualified him to grasp a financial scheme with clearness. He was a courageous man, and a man of honor; he asked no one to follow where he would not lead. Again, he was one of the very few men who had foreseen the commercial panic of 1837; he not only predicted it, but, against entreaty and protestation, withdrew his capital from his then sanguine partners, and prepared himself to outride the financial storm in safety. The period from 1837 to 1842 found him in a position to take advantage of this foresight, and gave him the unbounded confidence of business circles; these years of ruin to many were years of prosperity to him.

When Hon. S. P. Chase, then Secretary of the United States Treasury, found himself face to face with the gigantic financial problems of our civil war, he found in Morris Ketchum a tower of strength, a man of undoubted patriotism, combined with financial experience, tact, and resource. He was the trusted adviser of the government during the darkest hours of its peril; when doubt and distrust prevailed he courageously met the exigency; took personally large amounts of the bonds first issued, inspiring confidence by his prompt action. He gave Mr. Chase such counsel in critical junctures as to have called from that official the heartiest acknowledgments.

In 1864 a quarrel between the directors of the Fourth National Bank of New York threatened to ruin the institution and force it into liquidation, Mr. Ketchum was selected as a compromise president; by his shrewd and careful management the bank was brought safely through its troubles. He resigned the presidency of the bank in July, 1865, and in the summer of that year, owing to the failure of his old firm, he was obliged to retire from business. Great sympathy was felt for Mr. Ketchum in this misfortune, but he made an honorable settlement with his creditors, and by his indomitable pluck and energy again acquired a comfortable fortune.

Mr. Ketchum passed many years of his eventful life at his home in Westport. He had acquired by marriage an estate containing about one hundred acres of wild rolling land, situated about a mile north of the village, and forming a part of what was known as Burr's Plains; to this estate he had added by purchase from time to time, until at present it contains over five hundred acres. By large expenditure of hand of the master: their groupings are after the most approved taste in landscape gardening; the drives through the estate (which are open to the public) are most delightful. As might be expected, the best breeds of cattle and domestic animals have been found at "Hokanum;" their breeding and raising have made them familiar to the farmers of the neighborhood, and secured one result of their introduction, —viz., the elevation of public taste in stock-breeding.

money, under skillful direction, this once uninviting property has been converted into a magnificent domain. By thorough drainage, improved methods of agriculture, and tasteful adornment, Mr. Ketchum has set an example that must ever have a beneficial influence. Thousands of trees were placed by the ciates he is remembered as the true and generous friend, as the public-spirited supporter of all projects to elevate and strengthen the cause of religion, education, and civil order, as a devoted husband and father, a just administrator of affairs, a peace-maker, a friend of merit, a generous patron, a man of pure morals and great integrity. His manner was quiet and reticent; a close observer always, not only of men, but of nature, his love of children and animals was remarkable. He possessed a firmness that often assumed the aspect of sternness, and even coldness; this aspect might be seen when in the battle of the giants he marched with close-set lips and firm step direct to the object of his ambition, but in the walks of domestic life no one feared to approach him, for his gentleness won confidence and love.

Mr. Ketchum had profound reverence for the Christian religion; he was a constant attendant and supporter of public divine worship. While residing at Westport, his family attended the Congregational church. In New York City their connection was with the Presbyterian Church of which the late Rev. Dr. W. Adams was pastor. Not only was he liberal to the denomination of his adoption, but when called on by the friends of other churches, both Protestant and Catholic, to aid in building houses of worship, he contributed generously.

Many of his tenants and domestic servants were of the Catholic faith; it gave Mr. Ketchum pleasure to secure for them the privileges of worship in the church of their choice; furthermore, he recognized the conservative influence of religious instruction upon the whole community, and as a friend of civil order he responded to these calls for aid.

In politics Mr. Ketchum was in early life a Whig, a personal friend and admirer of Daniel Webster; in later years he was in full sympathy with the cause of the Union and the Republican party.

Mr. Ketchum married for his third wife (who survives him) the daughter of Judge Silvanus Miller, of New York City, a man of ripe scholarship and eminent legal ability.

Of Mr. Ketchum's living children there are five sons and two daughters. Mr. Ketchum died Jan. 1, 1880, at his home in New York City. He had enjoyed uninterrupted health for a long term of life,—at eighty was vigorous and active. His death was the result of paralysis. A list of the pall-bearers indicates the class of men who were proud to be named as his intimate friends. They were John J. Cisco, Junius S. Morgan, William E. Dodge, Dr. Willard Parker, P. C. Calhoun, B. B. Sherman, W. W. Phelps, Horace Staples, Theodore A. Neal, President Jenkins, of the Bank of America, Dr. J. H. Janeway, and Gouverneur Morris.

The accompanying views are of the residence and grounds at "Hokanum."

DANIEL NASH.

In the records of the early Connecticut colonies is often found the name of Nash. Micajah Nash, paternal grandfather of the second Daniel, married, in Norwalk, Mary Scribner, in 1744, and had three sons, —Jesse, Daniel, and Samuel. This Daniel, born Dec. 2, 1747, resided at Patchogue, L. I., at the time of the birth of his son Daniel, whose history we are writing. This occurred May 12, 1770, and when the lad had attained the age of fourteen his father, Daniel, Sr., moved to Westport. This was in 1784. The elder Daniel purchased some land and a mill, which latter he put in care of the young lad, and which he faithfully attended for fifty years. This mill is still standing, and is now one hundred and five years old. In 1809 the father and son unitedly built the house now owned and occupied by Edward H. Nash, and resided together all the life-time of the father. He, Daniel, Sr., died Sept. 6, 1824. The education of the young Daniel was derived from the primitive schools of that day, where the young student graduated oftener with knowledge of the axe and scythe than with that of books. His was a life of toil, unwearying labor, and a continual battle with the forces of nature. It would be strange if the life thus developed would not early know the value of a dollar thus acquired, and cherish it as an article not lightly won. In early life he showed the true business man by putting his money, whenever any came into his possession, at interest, and keeping it there. With all his tact in acquiring and retaining money he was very liberal where his conscience approved, and was noted for the interest he took in church matters, and the great liberality with which he supported its institutions. When the Episcopal Church in Norwalk (to which his father at one time contributed two hundred dollars) was organizing a "church fund," Mr. Nash gave at one time five hundred dollars for that purpose, and without his hearty and exceedingly liberal financial support no song of praise would have cheered the place where now stands Christ church in Westport. He and his sons Edward and Andrew have, far beyond others, not only built, but sustained it. Mr. Nash was, as is shown above, an Episcopalian, and member of the building committee, and also warden of Christ Church.

This was built in 1835, and named by Bishop Kemper,—dear to all Episcopalians. Mr. Nash was first a Whig, afterwards a Republican. During the Rebellion a gentleman sent word to him not to invest in United States government bonds. As quick as a flash he turned and said, "What would you have,—Confederate?" Mr. Nash was noted for his skill and love of telling stories. He neither desired nor held political offices. He was quick, positive, and independent in his nature, and had a fine sense of right and wrong. Tenacious of his rights, he wanted all his own, but never an unjustly-acquired dollar. His word was as sacred as his bond, and neither were ever repudiated.

Mr. Nash married, Oct. 9, 1809, Rebecca, daughter of Jonathan Camp, of Norwalk. Their children were Edward H., Andrew C., Julia Ann (Mrs. J. W. Wood), Hannah (Mrs. Ezra Morgan).

Mr. Nash was over ninety years of age at the breaking out of the Southern Rebellion, and left the entire control of his money to his son Edward. By his judicious investment in United States bonds—gold-bearing—thousands of dollars were added to the estate.

Mr. Nash died Aug. 2, 1865, at the place so long his home, at the advanced age of ninety-five years.

Edward H., his son, married Abigail Gorham, Oct. 9, 1836. She died Jan. 16, 1861. For his second wife he married Margaret N. Williams, Sept. 16, 1861. She died Oct. 18, 1871. Their children are Adelaide, Lloyd, Louisa, and Fanny. For his third wife Edward married Mrs. Mary E. Tuttle, daughter of Lewis Patrick, April 17, 1872.

Andrew C. Nash married Eliza A. Adams, Jan. 18, 1835. Their children are Mary Frances (Mrs. Dr. Bouton), Daniel C., Edward A., Andrew S., Celestia A., Eliza A., and Amelia R. Mrs. Andrew Nash died Nov. 12, 1876.

DR. GEORGE B. BOUTON.

In the old town records of Norwalk is recorded, "John Bowten of Norwake, tooke to wiffe Abigall, dau. of Math. Marvin, sen'r. of the same, January the 1st, 1656." Thus among the earliest settlers of Fairfield County were the ancestors of Dr. Bouton.

John Bouton was a French Huguenot, but at what time his immigration occurred is unknown. From the marriage above given came five children, the eldest, John, born Sept. 30, 1659. This John had two sons, Jakin and Joseph. Jakin was twice married, and, by his second wife, had two sons, Esaias and Moses, and many daughters. Esaias Bouton was great-grandfather to Dr. Bouton, and married Phebe Byxbee, May 30, 1753. Stephen, their fourth child, born July 1, 1760, married Hannah, daughter of Jonathan Camp, May 26, 1792. Their children were Hannah, Stephen, and Josiah. Stephen was born March 18, 1797. He married, May 5, 1823, Harriette, daughter of Beriah Bradley, of New Haven, Conn. She was born Dec. 30, 1801. Mr. Bouton accompanied his father as a lad to Troy, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., and after arriving at maturity became senior member of the grain-dealing and forwarding firm of S. & J. Bouton. He was an active member of the Episcopal Church, and, as the building of Christ church was then going on, he became largely interested—financially—in it, and, by indorsing for the rector, was rendered bankrupt. He then engaged in the grocery trade, and after conducting it a few years moved to New Haven, where he died, shortly after, on Feb. 10, 1855. His wife, surviving him, lived till October, 1870. Of their four children, only two—George B. and Grace Bradley (who married William C., son of ex-Mayor Peck, of New Haven)—survive.

George Beriah Bouton was born in Troy, N. Y., April 27, 1828. When about nine years old, he was placed at the boarding-school of the Episcopal Institute, in charge of the rector of Christ Church, previously alluded to, and through whose fraudulent actions his father was ruined. (It might be well for the moral to add, en passant, that, for these and subsequent actions the rector was deposed from the ministry.) Here George remained three or four years until his father's failure, when our young student went into the hardware store of an uncle, Edward Bradley, as clerk. Performing his duty well, he remained in that store three years, then accompanied Mr. Bradley to New York City, and took a position in the large establishment of Edward Corning & Co., which he occupied for four years. (A singular circumstance in the life of this uncle, Edward Bradley, is the fact, that after thirty years of mercantile life, he studied divinity, and was ordained a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, his ordination sermon being preached by his son.) When Stephen Bouton removed to New Haven, George accompanied him, and began to study medicine under Dr. Charles Hooker, professor of anatomy in Yale College. In January, 1856, he graduated at Yale, and in March of the same year at New York Medical College. Preferring a metropolitan life, Dr. Bouton located in New York City. He had, even before graduating, received the appointment of examining physician and deputy coroner, and at once entered upon the duties. He held that position for three successive terms of three years each, except an interval of nearly a year, which was spent as surgeon to Gen. Walker's troops in Nicaragua, where he was located at St. George's and Rivas.

In 1865, Dr. Bouton, tiring of the incessant labor of his city duties, removed to Westport, Conn., where he now resides. He did not cease his labors, having been in constant and very active practice since living at Westport. By his great vitality he has been enabled to perform double the work of one man, and yet keep his health. In his profession Dr. Bouton takes a high stand. As evidence of his skill, we will adduce the fact that, on one occasion, in New York City, he successfully invalidated a will, involving over two hundred thousand dollars, by his examination of a body, and introducing for the first time in legal annals, portions of the body which had been buried nine months, to illustrate testimony in a civil suit. For this Dr. Bouton received a fee of three thousand dollars. He is now medical examiner of several life insurance companies, and is a member of Fairfield County Medical Society and Connecticut Medical Society.

In 1861, April 28, Dr. Bouton married Mary Frances, daughter of Andrew C. Nash, of Westport, of an old and prominent family. She was born Feb. 26, 1837.

Dr. Bouton is both a Freemason and Odd-Fellow. Is a member of Wooster Lodge, No. 79, F. and A. M., New Haven, Conn., also of Franklin Chapter, No. 2, Harmony Council, No. 8, and New Haven Commandery, No. 2. Has been Senior Deacon and secretary of lodge and secretary of chapter. He was delegate to the Grand Lodge of I. O. O. F. in 1853 from Harmony Lodge, No. 5, of New Haven, and was the youngest member of that body. He still belongs to Harmony Lodge, and is a member of Sassaicus Encampment, No. 1, New Haven. Both Dr. Bouton and wife are Episcopalians, and the doctor has been vestryman in Christ Church, Westport, for fifteen years.

Personally, Dr. Bouton is social and pleasant, is a strong friend, and held in high esteem by a large circle of acquaintance. Politically, he is unswervingly a Democrat.

Industry, public spirit, truthfulness, and faithfulness to every duty mark the course of Dr. Bouton, and he is acknowledged to be to-day one of Westport's most valued citizens, always enlisted in everything tending to elevate, educate, or improve mankind.

JOHN WARREN TAYLOR.

John Warren Taylor was born in Norwalk, April 8, 1810. He was son of Seth and Abigail (Warren) Taylor. The old town records of Norwalk preserve the following concerning his ancestry: "March 4, 1713.—The Town by a major vote grants liberty to John Taylor to erect a small house for his family's convenience on y^e Sabbath, on such part of y^e town's land near y^e meeting-house as y^e selectmen shall allow or find convenient." "John Taylor, Junr., took to wife Sarah Lockwood, daughter of Mr. Daniel Lockwood, late of Norwalk, dec'd, and was married to her Nov. 6, 1723." "She died Jan. 21, 1724-25." "The s'd John Taylor, Jun'r., took to wife Hannah, daughter of Lt. James Stewart, of Norwalk, and was married to her Jan. 19, 1726-27." To them were born John, James, Hannah, Eli, Seth, Bette, Asher. This Seth, the grandfather of John Warren, was born March 30, 1735, and married Martha Gaylord, daughter of Rev. William Gaylord, of Wilton, March 7, 1765. Seth, Jr., was their third child and oldest son. His birth occurred Feb. 4, 1771. His brothers and sisters were Rufus Gaylord, Wm. Roswell, Louisa, Eliza M., Sylvester G. By a subsequent marriage were born Rufus G. and Mary M. Their mother's name was Rebecca Hurlburt. John Warren attended public schools until he was fifteen, and Norwalk Academy for three years subsequently. Then he commenced teaching district school in East Norwalk, and continued that profession in different places till 1832. He engaged at that time in the dry-goods trade in Saugatuck, now Westport, and this he carried on two years. Selling that interest, in 1834 he purchased a small stock of drugs of Dr. Nash, and, adding largely to the purchase, he also joined a department of books and one of very extensive variety goods. In this business he continued until his death.

Mr. Taylor married, March 20, 1832, Mary J., daughter of Uriah Hoyt, Esq., of Norwalk. She was born in Norwalk, Oct. 29, 1812. Their surviving children are Henry F. (who married Mary E. Clark, of Stamford, Conn., where he now resides, connected with The Churchman publishing office) and Hiram D., who married Lizzie J. Provost, of Stamford, and is now resident partner, at Baltimore, Md., of the New York house of Dudley & Co.

Mr. Taylor was brought up in the Congregational Church, and, although never a member, for more than half a century mingled with the people without a blemish on his moral character, and possessed of the respect, esteem, confidence of all. Quiet and undemonstrative, he filled well and fully every station in life, cherished as a friend, trusted as an official, beloved as a husband and father, and never could be found a tongue to breathe malice against him. For more than thirty-seven consecutive years he held the position of town clerk, a fact which shows his personal popularity and worth. During the administration of President Taylor, John Warren was appointed postmaster at Westport, which position he filled until a change of politics demanded his removal. He was an Old-Line Whig. After the formation of the Republican party he acted and voted with it. He died Dec. 29, 1876, regretted by all.

BURR JENNINGS.

Burr Jennings, son of Burr and Mercy (Morehouse) Jennings, was born Nov. 2, 1794, at Green's Farms, in the town of Fairfield, Conn., on the homestead in possession of his ancestors from the foundation of the Fairfield settlement. His great-grandfather was Joshua Jennings, and his grandfather's name was also Joshua. He married Hester, half-sister to the distinguished Aaron Burr. Both Joshua, Sr., and Joshua, Jr., were prominent citizens of Fairfield, large land-owners, and highly esteemed by their contemporaries.

Burr Jennings, Sr., was a quiet, undemonstrative person, saying but little, but that to the point. He never aspired to political office, was conservative in thought, but positive in his nature, rarely changing an opinion once formed. He was a member of the Congregational Church, and died in June, 1844, aged seventy-seven. Of his family of six daughters and two sons, Burr, Jr., was second child and first son.

Burr Jennings, Jr., received such advantages of education as existed in the country schools of that early day, when no such royal road led to learning as does to-day, and a few winter months, interspersed with much labor, was all that could be given to education. Remaining with his parents until his majority, he continued residing with them, engaged in farming, until he was twenty-six years old, when, Nov. 19, 1820, he married his cousin, Caroline, daughter of Caroline and Joshua Jennings. She was born at Green's Farms, July 2, 1801. And now follows something which the youth of 1889 would do well to consider. For two years Mr. Jennings continued living with his parents, and Mrs. Jennings with hers, until Mr. Jennings had built a comfortable home on the lot of land received from his father, and in their own house, which was to be for so many years their home, and where Mrs. Jennings still resides in the fullness of years, they commenced their housekeeping.

For over fifty years Mr. and Mrs. Jennings enjoyed each other's society, wrought together in the varying labors of life, and endured the same sufferings, for all was not pleasure in their life. Their golden wedding was celebrated Nov. 19, 1870, when both were hale and hearty, the central figures of a happy gathering of kinsmen and friends. Mr. and Mrs. Jennings were attendants, and for years members, of the Congregational Church. Their children were Caroline Burr (deceased, who married Edmund A. Peffers), Mary Morehouse (deceased), Abby Taylor (deceased), Julia Maria (Mrs. Isaac T. Banks, of New Haven), Augusta (Mrs. Edward S. Spring, now residing with her mother), Albert Burr (deceased), and George Franklin (deceased).

Mr. Jennings died Sept. 24, 1872. By his economy, thrift, and industry he added much to his patrimony, and left to his descendants a fine inheritance and the better legacy of an unspotted name.

FRANCIS BULKLEY.

Francis Bulkley was born in Fairfield, Conn., Jan. 30, 1786. His ancestors were of the primitive settlers in this town, and of English origin, coming to this county from Hartford and Colchester. His parents were Abram and Jane (Burr) Bulkley. The father of Abram was Peter, a tanner and manufacturer of shoes. His father was Gershom.

Abram was a soldier in the Revolution, after that engaged in privateering, and, when the war ended, went to farming on the family homestead, building for himself, previous to or about 1800, the house now occupied by Joel B. Bulkley. He died in 1837, about eighty-seven years of age. He was an active person of much sociality, an ardent Episcopalian, and one of the founders of Trinity Church.

Francis had a common-school education, carried on farming until his majority, and married Sarah B., daughter of Samuel and Mary (Bradley) Morehouse, in 1814. He built the house so long his home in 1818, and resided there until his death, which occurred Sept. 17, 1868. Mrs. Bulkley died Dec. 22, 1833. Their children were John Francis, Esther, Peter, Maria (deceased), Gershom, Mary Jane, Sarah Burr (Mrs. John H. Wood), and Abram. Of these, Gershom, Esther, and Mary Jane live in the old home.

Mr. Bulkley was a member of the Society of Trinity Church (Episcopal), and at one time was vestryman. He was in politics a Democrat, was a quiet man, never seeking office or meddling with office-seekers, but preferred the society of the home circle to any other. The early death of Mrs. Bulkley left a more than usual responsibility upon him, and his tender care endeavored to supply to some extent a mother's place unto his children. He was a great reader, keeping himself well posted on all matters transpiring in the world. He was careful and conservative, not prone to wander into speculations in religion, politics, or business.

Mr. Bulkley was a contributor to all objects calculated to benefit mankind, filled well the station he occupied, enjoyed the confidence of his neighbors, and during his life none who knew him could say he was ever actuated by malice, but always desirous of doing good, and, as a result, had many strong and estimable friends. He was temperate, industrious, and economical, and left his children the inheritance of an unblemished reputation and a fair share of this world's goods.

ELI COUCH.

Eli Couch, son of Gideon and Eleanor (Wakeman) Couch, was born at Green's Farms, Fairfield Co., Conn., Sept. 21, 1797. He spent his early days with his parents on the farm, and receiving his education in the public and private schools of Westport. After his father's death he carried on farming on the quarter share of the old homestead which was his by inheritance. On this he built a house, and took to wife, Jan. 7, 1826, Matilda, daughter of Burr and Mercy (Morehouse) Jennings. He was a typical farmer, never seeking or holding political office, and voting the Democratic ticket with regularity as the best means of preserving the simplicity of the early days of our country. Both Mr. and Mrs. Couch were members of the Presbyterian Church, and for more than fifty years this worthy couple walked the Christian pathway, doing good quietly and without parade to all, and never could be found one who did not acknowledge that their Christian profession was supplemented by Christian practice, and both were honored and respected. Mr. Couch was honest, industrious, economical, and, in his family relations, a loving husband and tender parent. He left at his death a comfortable fortune in land and otherwise to his widow and surviving children. They are Elizabeth (Mrs. Horace Smith), William Henry, and John W. His death occurred April 1, 1876. His widow survives him at the advanced age of eighty years.

Of such citizens as Mr. Couch is composed the element upon which depends the preservation of the American republic, and the plain, common-sense New England farmer, going forth in all things actuated by principle and duty, is the bearer of the highest good to his State and nation.

WILTON.

The First Settlement—Organization of the Parish—List of Early Settlers—The Revolutionary War—The British March through the Town—Firing of a Building—Securing Valuables—Last of Sabers—Slavery—The Lease of a Slave—Ear-Marks—Price of Produce in 1777—The Silver-Mine—Statue of George III.

WILTON lies on the west border of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Ridgefield, Reading, and Weston; on the east by Reading and Weston; on the south by Westport and Norwalk; and on the west by New Canaan and Westchester County, in New York.

The exact date of the first settlement in this town cannot be definitely ascertained, but it was doubtless as early as 1701, as immigrations inland from the sea-towns were made at that time. Although there may have been an occasional rude hut within the bounds of the present town at this early date, the settlement was of but little consequence until about the time of the organization of the parish of Wilton, in 1725.

ORGANIZATION OF THE PARISH.

The first reference to the organization of the parish of Wilton appears on the records of the town of Norwalk, under date Dec. 7, 1725.

It was voted that "The town, by a major vote, signifies their willingness that the inhabitants of Kent, Belden's Hill, and Chestnut Hill, and so upwards, become a parish by themselves, if the General Court shall see meet so to establish them."

A petition was presented to the General Court in May, 1726, for the organization of the parish, signed by the following persons: Joseph Elmer, Joseph Jump, Daniel Abbott, Joseph Carle, Nathan Olmsted, Stephen Buckingham, John Stuart, Benjamin Hickok, John Keeler, Mathew St. John, Daniel Keeler, John St. John, David Betts, Samuel Betts, Jr., Stephen Betts, Nathaniel Slavson, John Wood, Jr., Jonathan Wood, Jr., Nathan Betts, Daniel Trowbridge, Richard Bouton, Obadiah Wood, Thomas Bouton, James Trowbridge, Jonathan Sturdevant, Ralph Keeler, Jachin Gregory, John Dunning, Nathaniel Ketchum, John Taylor, and William Parker.

The above list of signers of the petition for the organization of the parish doubtless composed the whole, or at least a greater portion, of the adult male inhabitants residing within the present boundaries of the town at that time.

LIST OF EARLY SETTLERS.

The following is a list of the early settlers who were here Feb. 14, 1732:

Nathan Green and wife Abigail.

THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

Aside from other afflictions of the war, Wilton suffered from actual invasion when the British passed through on the occasion of the burning of Danbury, in April, 1777. On their return, hungry and weary with marching and fighting, they entered many houses for food. As they came down the Ridgefield road, they fired a ball into the house of Deacon Daniel Gregory, in which were his wife and children. The eldest, Abigail,—afterwards the wife of Moses Gregory,—when above eighty years of age, was accustomed to tell how an officer came in, with his sword drawn, attended by soldiers. He assured them of safety if they would furnish food. The British set fire to the house near the Episcopal church now occupied by Mr. Sherman Fitch; but, before they were out of sight, a woman went with a pail of water from the next house north (which has lately fallen down, but was for many years occupied by Maj. Samuel Belden and extinguished the flames. As people heard of the approach of the British they hastily removed their silver spoons and such valuable property as they could. From houses on the Belden's Hill road furniture was carried to Huckleberry Hill, as it was supposed the British might take that street; but learning, as it would seem, that soldiers were gathering at Norwalk, the enemy took the Westport road, and finding Westport already occupied by several hundred Americans, they turned east, crossed the Saugatuck River about three miles above the bridge, marched to Compo, and got on shipboard that night. It was their last attempt to go far from the shore in Connecticut. But the Wilton people suffered afterwards in the burning of Norwalk, though their houses and their lives were spared.

The following persons were in the army a part or the whole of the period 1780-1783: Capt. Samuel Comstock (afterwards major), Lieut. Samuel Deforest, Ensign (in 1782 lieutenant), Matthew Gregory, Seth Hubbell, Samuel Nichols, Jesse Olmstead, Ambrose Barns, John Johnson, John Williams, Jonathan Jackson, Elijah Betts, and, in 1782, Lieut. Salmon Hubbell and Uriah Mead. Elijah Taylor is elsewhere mentioned as ensign. A warning is also found written and signed by Samuel Comstock, captain Ninth Regiment, calling his company together for inspection the 17th of October, 1776. Washington was at that time at White Plains, after the retreat from Long Island. He had called most of the Connecticut troops to his aid. As Lieut. Gregory was in the action at White Plains, the 28th of October, it is probable that Capt. Comstock marched thither with his company directly after the 17th. Maj. Comstock represented Norwalk in the Legislature, October, 1800, and Wilton in eight sessions, between October, 1803, and May, 1809. In his will he gave to the church, for its communion service, a silver tankard which had for generations been an heirloom in the family. He was born 1739, the son of Deacon Nathan Comstock, and, as is supposed, in the house so long occupied by Edward Comstock. He died Dec. 1, 1824, in his eighty-sixth year. He enlisted July 10, 1775, and was commissioned captain, July 10, 1776. He and his company shared in the sufferings of Valley Forge, in the battle of Monmouth, and the capture of Cornwallis. His wife was Mercy Mead, daughter of Theophilus Mead. Lieut. Matthew Gregory, the son of Ezra and grandson of Deacon Matthew Gregory, was with Maj. Comstock in the places just mentioned, and was also in the fight at Ridgefield, April 27, 1777. His death occurred in his ninety-first year, June 4, 1818, at Albany, N. Y., where he had resided forty years or more. His first wife, Mary, daughter of Hezekiah Deforest, died in 1796.

Capt. Azar Belden, who was an early settler in this town, was also in the Revolution. He held a captain's commission in the train of artillery and served with distinction. He was at the battle of Bunker Hill, and with Gen. Washington when he evacuated New York, and with Gen. Wooster when he fell at Ridgefield, and continued in active service during the war.

SLAVERY.

Upon the old town-book, under date of Jan. 5, 1811, appears the following: "These may certify that, at the request of Samuel Middlebrook, the Civil Authority and Select Men hereunto subscribing have examined into the case of Phebe, a slave of said Middlebrook, and find that she is within the age limited by Law to be emancipated, and that she is of a sound Constitution and of good health, and that it is likely that she will be able to maintain herself, and also said Phebe, having manifested to us her desire to be made free, We do hereby witness that we see no cause why the said Samuel Middlebrook may not Lawfully emancipate and set free his said slave, Phebe, and Liberty is accordingly hereby granted to the said Samuel Middlebrook to emancipate and set free his slave, Phebe, according to a statute Law of this State in such case made and provided.

THE LEASE OF A SLAVE.

Under date Jan. 24, 1824, appears the following record:

“Justice of Peace.

“Received to record Jan. 24, 1824, and recorded per Samuel Belden.”

In the records of births in the town-book appears the following of slaves belonging to William Belden: Catherine, born Feb. 4, 1802; Grace, March 6, 1807; Richard, Aug. 27, 1809; John, March 6, 1812.

EAR-MARKS.

The following are specimens of ear-marks used in the early days to distinguish cattle, etc.:

Silas St. John's mark was “halfpenny and nick under side the near ear.”

Samuel Belden's mark was “nick under side each ear.”

A. Gregory's mark was “slit under near ear.”

Nathan Hanford's was “halfpenny under near ear, and nick under off ear.”

Daniel Gregory's mark was “two halfpennies under side the off ear.”

The early records show that the patent-right vender was abroad in the land, as under date of April 5, 1803, appears a sale of a patent right for churning to Daniel Betts, Sr., from Joel Johns. The inventor was Isaac Baker.

PRICE OF PRODUCE, IN 1777.

At a meeting of the society of Wilton, held Nov. 26, 1777, it was “voted to give Rev. Isaac Lewis one hundred pounds lawful money for his services in the ministry for the year past, and one half to be paid in produce: wheat at four shillings and sixpence; rye at three shillings; corn at two shillings and sixpence; oats at one shilling and sixpence per bushel; pork at twenty-five shillings per hundred; beef at twenty shillings per hundred; sheep's wool at two shillings per pound; flax at nineteen shillings per pound; leather shoes at six shillings per pair; turnips at one shilling per bushel,” and three shillings a load was allowed for good wood.

SILVER-MINE.

A silver-mine is located in the northern part of this town, near the residence of the late Charles Sturges, about an eighth of a mile east of the old Danbury turnpike. It appears that it was originally divided into shares and worked a short time before the Revolutionary war, and that the manager or overseer, after having sent away all the ore that had been dug, under pretense of having it examined, suddenly left “between two days,” leaving the shareholders minus the amount of their subscriptions, and also their share of “the rocks.” After it was known for a certainty that the superintendent did not intend to return and resume work, the stockholders began to look around to see if there was not some property left that could be made available towards paying them for money invested and labor rendered. Tradition says that all the property to be found consisted of an old negro slave and a pair of oxen, which were sold for the benefit of the creditors. It is also said that many persons in comfortable circumstances, who had subscribed liberally towards working the mine, were by this operation considerably reduced in circumstances.

The following “Indenture” is copied from the town records of Norwalk, and gives the contract for working the mine and the names of the parties engaged:

“This Indenture made this seventeenth day of May, 1765, between Alexander Rossique, of Norwalk, in the County of Fairfield and Colony of Connecticut of the one part, and Samuel Betts, Nathan Hubbard, Matthew Mead, Matthew Merwine, James Olmsted, Jr., Silas Olmsted, Joseph Rockwell, Jr., Jesse Ogden, all of Norwalk, and Matthew Fountain, of Bedford, in Westchester County and province of New York of the other part, Witnesseth that the said Alexander Rossique as well in Consideration of the Costs and Charges which the sd Samuel Betts, Nathan Hubbard, Matthew Mead, Matthew Merwine, James Olmsted, Jr., Silas Olmsted, Joseph Rockwell, Jr., and Jesse Ogden, and Matthew Fountain, most necessarily expend in and about the undertaking Adventure and works hereafter mentioned, and in Consideration of Reservation & Covenants hereafter mentioned” contained by and on the parts of the sd Samuel Betts, Nathan Hubbard, Matthew Mead, Matthew Merwine, James Olmsted, Jr., Silas Olmsted, Joseph Rockwell, Jr., Jesse Ogden, and Matthew Fountain, their heirs, Executors, Administrators, and assigns, free Liberty, Innocence, and authority in time to time, and at all or any time or times During the Term hereafter mentioned to Dig, Search, work for, and raise all such Lead Ore or Copper Ore, Tin Ore, and all other Ore and Minerals whatsoever which can or shall, or may be found, Dugget, gotten up, or raised as well as from or out of all or any

"Rec'd to Record May 21, 1755, and Recorded by Mr. Sam^l Gruman, "Register."

It is at present owned by heirs of John Hurlbutt (deceased). This mine was formerly owned by Capt. Azar Belden, a large landowner, who first introduced merino sheep into this section of the State. He was a man also of some military renown. Soon after the Revolutionary war some Englishmen called on Mr. Belden with a view of working the mine. They introduced their business by asking him the state of his mine. The old gentleman, not understanding them fully, flew into a rage. "The state of my mind!" says he. "What impertinence!" Such a question, as he understood it, from such a source was more than he could brook. The scenes of the Revolution flashed across his mind. He had held a captain's commission in the train of artillery, and served with distinction during eight long years of bloody conflict; was at the battle of Bunker Hill, assisted in drawing the chain across the Hudson, was with Gen. Washington when he evacuated New York, and with Gen. Wooster when he fell mortally wounded on the plains of Ridgefield by a well-aimed ball from British musketry, and for them to inquire the state of his mind was to him a downright insult. The gentlemen, seeing the captain had wholly misunderstood them, and intending no harm, soon explained by stating they had called to see him relative to a silver-mine which they learned he had on his farm, and would like to arrange with him for working it.

The mistake was happily gotten over, and he went with them to the mine. Everything was soon arranged between the parties. They put up their machinery, which was a common windlass worked by hand, and soon commenced business in a small way, digging to a depth of about one hundred and fifty feet. They built a small shanty in the woods near by where they lived, and where, during the night-time, they coined a considerable amount of bullion. They kept their silver hid from the vigilance of officers and sightseers. After having worked the mine some time they suddenly absconded, taking their treasure and about five barrels of ore with them.

Nothing further was done in regard to this mine until a few years ago, when a party from New York came up and had it reopened, it having been filled up to near the surface. They carried off specimens of the ore, but have never returned to resume work.

STATUE OF KING GEORGE III.

Mr. Hollister, in his "History of Connecticut," has the following note in relation to this statue, purporting to be in the handwriting of the last Governor Wolcott:

"N. B.—An equestrian statue of George the Third of Great Britain was erected in the city of New York, on Bowling Green, at the lower end of Broadway; most of the materials were lead, but richly gilded to resemble gold. At the beginning of the Revolution this statue was overthrown. Lead being then scarce and dear, the statue was broken in pieces and transported to Litchfield as a place of safety. The ladies of this village converted the lead into cartridges, of which the preceding is an account. O. W."

The account referred to is a list of the names of those who made the cartridges and the number made by each.

Mr. Hollister adds: "Forty-two thousand and eighty-eight bullets in times when lead was dear, and not easily to be had at any price, made no insignificant accession to the resources of the Continental army. They were carefully distributed and faithfully expended. Some of them were committed to the keeping of Col. Wigglesworth, others must have aided Putnam in defending the Highlands, a part of them may have gone with Maj. Seymour to Saratoga, and it is certain that fifty of them were used to welcome the king's provincial Governor when he paid his first and last visit to Danbury.

"On the 21st of August, 1770, this statue was erected, attended with much festivity, and destroyed on the night of the 11th of July by the 'Sons of Liberty.' The next morning nothing but the pedestal was left."

Tradition says that the lead of the statue was taken to Norwalk on a sloop and distributed from there about the country. It is certain that it did not all go to Litchfield. About fifty years ago several small pieces of it were found in the cellar of an old house in the town of Wilton, formerly occupied by "Aunt Nabby Sloan," by the workmen engaged in tearing it down. About the same time Mr. William Comstock, while digging a ditch near the Episcopal church in that town, dug up about one hundred and twenty-five pounds of it. This was a portion of the saddle. Mr. Peter S. Coley, who now resides in a house erected near the site formerly occupied by the old Sloan house, while plowing in the old door-yard, plowed up what he supposed to be the root of a tree, but, upon close examination, proved to be the tail of the horse, with the exception of a few inches. The work must have been elaborate, for upon cleaning this piece the marks representing the hair showed very plainly. Digging in this place deeper brought to light three other pieces of the statue, the whole weighing about three hundred pounds. Mr. Coley disposed of the lead to the New York Historical Society, who had previously obtained the pedestal of a gentleman in New Jersey who was utilizing it for a door-step.

Congregational Church—St. Matthew's Church—Zion Hill Church—Other Churches.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

THE meeting which resulted in the organization of the Congregational Church of Wilton was held June 5, 1751, and was organized June 20th following. There were thirty-one petitioners to the General Assembly in Hartford that the parish might be constituted.

June 7th the society elected Richard Bouton clerk, and voted unanimously to call Rev. Robert Sturgeon to officiate in the work of the ministry among them, and fixed his salary at "ninety pounds, paramount or equivalent to good bills of credit of the Colony of Connecticut, or other good bills of credit passing current at the respective times of payment," and "a full supply of firewood for his family's use," . . . "to be brought to his habitation from time to time as is needed." Five acres of land were also granted for a "house-lot."

Mr. Sturgeon had not been long in this country, and probably reached Wilton in April, as his salary commenced the 14th of that month. He was of Scotch, or probably of Scotch-Irish, descent.

The site chosen for the first meeting-house was on the south side of the upper road leading from Kent to Belden's Hill, near the present railroad-track. This was then near the geographical centre of the population. The 30th of September the society voted "that they would have their meeting-house rectified by laying the floor, and by plastering the walls, and by making comfortable seats to set in." John Keeler and John St. John were appointed to get this work done. Deacon Hickok, Richard Bouton, John Dunning, John Stuart, and Matthew St. John were appointed "to search out and agree for a convenient piece of land for an house-lot" for the pastor. Matthew St. John was appointed a committee on meeting-house expenses.

The work of finishing the meeting-house made good progress. On the 30th of November, in accordance with the custom of those days, the society voted "to seat it," and appointed a committee of three to "seat it by list and age, according to the best of their judgment." But in some form the plan was continued more than half a century longer. The order of seating nearly one hundred years ago has been preserved. Seven years later, in 1733, it was voted that John St. John should sit with Deacon Elmer "so long as he sets ye tune."

On the 20th of December the society "voted that every man shall bring unto the Reverend Mr. Sturgeon a load of wood within fourteen days," and that any man who failed should forfeit three shillings.

After a time dissatisfaction with the "life and conversation" of Mr. Sturgeon so increased that the church consulted the Association, which met at Rip-ton (now Huntington), in November, 1731, and was advised to call a council. This was agreed to in December. By committee an understanding with Mr. Sturgeon was reached; but to complete the arrangement the society's meeting adjourned to the last day of December, "at ye sun one hour high at night."

There is no record of the dismissal of Mr. Sturgeon, but as the society held a meeting in April, 1732, to adopt measures to obtain a minister, we may infer that the pastorate of Mr. Sturgeon ended the first of that month.

The society, April 11, 1732, chose Deacons Trowbridge and Hickok and Jonathan Elmer a committee "to advise with ye Reverend ministers where to go for a minister, and empowered them to go or send for a minister at the cost of the Society."

They soon found Mr. William Gaylord, a graduate of Yale College in 1730, a licentiate of Hartford North Association, who was born Nov. 29, 1709. August 29th the society voted to call Mr. Gaylord to settle in the work of the gospel ministry. It was also agreed to buy the house and land of Mr. Sturgeon. Joseph Birchard, Capt. Ketchum, and Matthew St. John were appointed to carry out the vote. The church was unanimous in calling Mr. Gaylord, which he accepted.

Dec. 25, 1736, it was voted to build a new meeting-house, forty-six feet long, thirty-five feet wide, with twenty feet posts, to be placed on what in the record is called "Sharp Hill," but which for above half a century has now been known as "the old burying-ground." Nov. 18, 1737, it was voted to build a house forty-eight by thirty-five feet and twenty-two feet posts; and also to raise by taxes one hundred pounds for building-purposes. Of the land needed for the site, John Marvin, Sr., gave eight rods square; and seventeen years later (1755) Richard Dunning sold above half an acre for a burial-place for fifty pounds, old tenor. It was not till 1743 that the seats were in readiness to receive persons, in the order designated by the committee, and not till 1747 that the vote was passed by which the galleries should be finished and be made of good white wood and white-oak boards, with one seat round the front, and one tier of pews round the house.

Mr. Gaylord died Jan. 2, 1767, aged fifty-seven years, having been pastor of the church nearly thirty-four years.

After the death of Mr. Gaylord, the society called Mr. Samuel Mills, who declined.

In July the society called Mr. Isaac Lewis, who was ordained in the following October. He was dismissed June 1, 1786. In 1777 his salary was made one hundred pounds lawful money, one-half to be paid in provisions, the prices of which were fixed and low. For example: Wheat was to be seventy-five cents a bushel; beef, two dollars and a half a hundred; leather shoes, one dollar a pair. But the next year, while the salary was the same, wheat was one dollar and sixty-seven cents per bushel; rye had increased twenty per cent.; pork, twenty per cent.; beef was to be two cents per pound in the autumn and three cents per pound in the winter. In 1782 it was voted that the salary be one hundred pounds lawful money, to be paid in silver or gold. During these later years the financial difficulties of the country were so great that it became necessary for the towns to assume the support, at least in part, of their own soldiers in the Continental army. Accounts kept by Abijah Betts are still in the possession of the Betts family.

A new church edifice was erected A. D. 1790. The pulpit and seats of the old house were transferred to the new, and were used thirteen years, when new ones were substituted, which remained till 1844. It was entered by two doors, between which, directly in front of the pulpit, was a shelf or narrow table that was transformed into the communion-table by raising a leaf attached by hinges to the inner edge. This, when in position, was supported by an iron rod. The table and leaf were stained to imitate mahogany. The slips in the body of the house had a door at each end, as there were three aisles. The ceiling was arched. The galleries on each side, supported by four large pillars, were high, as was also the pulpit, which had its lofty, conical, but well-proportioned and ornamented sounding-board firmly supported by two pillars that rose from the rear of the pulpit. The box of the pulpit was reached by a flight of stairs with balusters on either side, but when reached could with difficulty accommodate two persons. The pew of the pastor adjoined the great pew on the east side.

This building was formally dedicated to Almighty God in December, 1790. The sermon was preached by Rev. Timothy Dwight, D.D., forever illustrious as the president of Yale College for nearly twenty-two years, from 1795 to 1817.

Nov. 18, 1793, the society, by a unanimous vote, invited to the pastorate Mr. Aaron Woodward, at "a yearly salary of one hundred pounds lawful money, twenty cords of good wood, and the use of one hundred and fifty pounds until a parsonage shall be purchased." Mr. Woodward accepted the call, and was ordained pastor the 8th of January, 1794. The ordination sermon was preached by Rev. Benjamin Trumbull, D.D., pastor in North Haven sixty years, from 1760 to 1820, and distinguished as the author of a valuable history of Connecticut.

Rev. John J. Carle, a native of New Jersey, a graduate of Queen's, now Rutgers, College in 1789, who received the degree of A.M. from Princeton in 1792, was the next pastor.

Mr. Carle was installed June 3, 1801, and three years later he asked a dismissal.

During the pastorate of Mr. Carle the parish of Wilton was, A.D. 1802, incorporated by the Legislature into a town. On the 1st of July of that year members of St. Paul's parish in Norwalk, residing in Wilton, formed an ecclesiastical society for the Protestant Episcopal Church known as St. Matthew's.

It is worthy of note in this connection as illustrating the liberality of the Congregationalists towards other denominations that, in 1758, James Truesdale was, by vote, "excused from paying a rate to the minister in case he get a certificate from the Baptist Society." In January, 1761, it was voted to abate the minister's rate to Mr. Whelpley "so long as he attends the Baptist meeting and no longer." In 1772 this ecclesiastical society began yearly to appoint a special collector to take the minister's rate from those living in the bounds of this society who belonged to St. Paul's parish, and pay it to the rector thereof, in the same manner as the others collected and paid over to their own pastor the rates of other inhabitants. How rigidly the tax was collected may be inferred from one example. Dec. 1, 1780, Clapp Raymond, justice of the peace, notifies Abijah Betts that he is appointed collector of the society tax for the support of the ministry, or, in default of payment, to levy on the goods of the delinquents, or, in default of goods, to take their bodies to the jail in New Haven.

The next pastor was Samuel Fisher, who was installed Dec. 3, 1805, and was dismissed July, 5, 1809. Mr. Fisher was born in Sunderland, Mass., the 3d of June, 1777.

Oct. 17, 1810, Rev. Sylvanus Haight was installed. Mr. Haight was born at Fishkill, N. Y., July, 22, 1776.

When Mr. Haight was ordained there were few buildings of any kind near the meeting-house, except the one nearest to it on the east, recently occupied by Mr. Moses Betts. There was no house on the road towards Kent till one reached that now occupied by Mr. John Betts, near the river. The house of Deacon Daniel Gregory on the hill, west, now occupied by his grandson, William D. Gregory, Esq., was the only one near this house except the one across the bridge on the north, now the residence of Deacon Edward Olmstead. There was here no parsonage, no town-house, conference-room, or horse-sheds. If in remote parts of the town dwellings have decreased, there has been growth in this neighborhood.

In December, 1831, Rev. Samuel Merwin, a native of Milford, a graduate of Yale in 1802, took a dismission from the North Church in New Haven, of which he had been pastor nearly twenty-seven years, and to which, during his ministry, eight hundred and fifty persons were added. He accepted a call to this church, and on the 23d of February, 1832 (ninety-nine years after the ordination of Mr. Gaylord), was installed its pastor. He was dismissed Sept. 25, 1838.

On the 22d of February, 1839, Rev. John Smith was installed the ninth pastor of this church. Mr. Smith was a graduate of Yale College in 1821. He was born in Wethersfield, Conn., Sept. 2, 1796, the son of James and Sarah (Hammer) Smith.

In 1818, Mr. Smith asked a dismission. Action in calling Consociation was delayed several months. He was dismissed in June. On the 26th of July, 1848, he was installed pastor in Kingston, N. H., where he remained till early in the year 1855. Removing to Stamford, Conn., he preached about two years (1856-58) in Long Ridge and occasionally elsewhere. He continued to reside in Stamford with his sons, who were successful merchants in New York, till his death, from pneumonia, the 20th of February, 1874, in his seventy-eighth year.

Mr. Smith was succeeded by Rev. Gordon Hall, D.D., who was ordained pastor Oct. 25, 1848.

The pastorate continued till the 4th of May, 1852, when he was dismissed that he might accept a call to the Edwards Church, Northampton, Mass., over which he was installed a month later, June 2, 1852.

July 6, 1853, the next pastor, Thomas Scott Bradley, was ordained. Mr. Bradley was born at Lee, Mass., the eldest son of Eli Bradley, April 15, 1825. He was a popular preacher, affable in conversation and fond of practical matters; but the condition of his health did not encourage protracted application in the study, and in 1857 he was dismissed at his own request.

The successor of Mr. Bradley was Charles Bassett Ball, who was ordained the 20th of January, 1858. Mr. Ball was a townsman of Mr. Bradley, having been born in Lee, Mass., the 9th of July, 1825. He was the son of Isaac and Lydia Ball, and graduated at Williams in the class of 1846.

The next pastor was Rev. Samuel R. Dimock, who was installed Dec. 7, 1859. Mr. Dimock was a native of Coventry, Tolland Co., Conn., born May 28, 1822, nurtured in Mansfield, a graduate with honor of Yale in the class of 1847.

The successor of Mr. Dimock in the pastoral office was the Rev. Wheelock Nye Harvey, of Massachusetts stock, a native of Jamestown, Chautanqua Co., N. Y., born April 15, 1825, the son of Charles R. and Olive (Willard) Harvey, a graduate of the New York University in 1844.

The fifteenth pastor of this church, Rev. Samuel J. M. Merwin, was a graduate of Yale in the class of 1839, ordained pastor of the church in Southport, Dec. 18, 1844, and was dismissed, at his own request, May 3, 1859. After a season of rest he was installed over the church at South Hadley Falls, Mass., Dec. 1, 1860. The call to this church, as successor to his father and brother, was accepted in 1868, and he was installed by the Consociation the 26th of October the same year, and is the present pastor.

LIST OF DEACONS.

The first three deacons were Benjamin Hickok, Jonathan Elmer, and James Trowbridge. These were probably original members of the church, since they were a part of the committee appointed by the society to make arrangements for the settlement of Mr. Sturgeon.

Deacon Hickok is supposed to have left a son, Benjamin, who united with the church by the half-way covenant, with his wife, March 27, 1763, who was the father of Esther, the wife of Deacon Daniel Gregory, and lived to an advanced age.

The house of the son, perhaps of the father, stood near the spot occupied by the building now used for the academy, and was torn down early in this century. "Benjamin Hickok, Esq.," who died the 17th of November, 1745, aged fifty-nine years, was probably the deacon.

Deacon Jonathan Elmer was chosen, before the church had a pastor, to read the Psalms. As few had psalm-books, we may understand that he read only one or two lines at a time, so that all who could might sing the words. This was called "lining," and sometimes "deaconing," the hymn. There was an Eliakim Elmer who lived near the bridge on the Ridgefield road in 1738, but Deacon Elmer's name does not occur after 1746. Jonathan Elmer, probably a son of the deacon, united with the church in June, 1742.

Of Deacon James Trowbridge there is no information, and the name early disappears from the church records. In New Canaan the name remains.

Deacon Matthew Gregory was born in 1680. The place of his birth is not known. Some of his grandchildren believed that he came from England. He is supposed to have been in Wilton as early as 1718.* He had two sons, Ezra and Matthew, the latter known also as Ensign Matthew, who was the father of Deacon Daniel Gregory. He died in 1777, at the age of ninety-seven years, the year following the death of his son Ezra. His wife Hannah had died ten years earlier. His son Matthew died Oct. 30, 1756, aged forty-five years. A well-worn path through the fields west of his house signified to his children his daily habit of secret communing with God.

Deacon James Keeler is not identified, except Feb. 18, 1759, James Keeler and wife were received to the church on the half-way covenant. When they became communicants is not stated.

Deacon James Olmstead is believed to have been the son of Samuel Olmstead. He had a son James, who had a son Aaron, who was the father of Hawley Olmstead, LL.D. His name, with that of Mary his wife, occurs on the church records as admitted by the half-way covenant, Feb. 22, 1756. In 1776 he is called Deacon Olmstead. On a stone of gray marble in the old burying-ground we read that he died March 17, 1777, aged sixty-eight years.

Deacon Nathan Comstock is first mentioned as deacon Dec. 15, 1766. Among those married by Mr. Gaylord are (March 7, 1738-39) Nathan Comstock and Bethiah Strong. In 1740 he united with the church. Maj. Samuel Comstock and Strong Comstock, the father of Samuel, Edward, William, and Nathan, were his children. His residence was probably the house in which his grandchildren, Edward and Polly Comstock, lived, a little west of the road from Belden's Hill to Ridgefield, near its junction with the Ridgefield road.

Deacon Nathan Hubbell.—In May, 1747, there came by letter from Greenfield three men with their wives and the wife of a fourth who was a son of one of the three. One of these couples was Nathan Hubbell and Martha his wife. Eight years later, Dec. 2, 1755, Mrs. Hubbell, the wife of Nathan, died, aged fifty-three years; and Feb. 6, 1761, Nathan Hubbell died, aged sixty-one years. Three years later, June 17, 1764, Capt. Nathan Hubbell was received to the church. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is easy to believe that he was the son of the aforementioned Nathan Hubbell. He became Deacon Hubbell Aug. 23, 1786, and had a son who bore his name, who spent his life in Wilton, and died here Feb. 2, 1847, in his eighty-fourth year, leaving two sons, one of whom, Rev. Stephen Hubbell, was then nearly seventeen years in the ministry. The older son, Wakeman, was yet to be deacon. Deacon Hubbell was evidently an active, reliable, influential man. But tradition has preserved little of his services. The house in which he, his children, and theirs lived in Pimpewaug for above a hundred years has just been sold.

Some yet living remember Deacon Daniel Gregory, who was chosen deacon Oct. 7, 1794, and at once inducted into office. His relation to Deacon Matthew Gregory has already been mentioned. He was the grandfather of William D. Gregory. In the place of an older one, he built the house on the hill west of this house of worship, in which the latter lives.† He died April 18, 1821, at the age of seventy-eight. He united with the church Aug. 5, 1764, so that he was a member fifty-seven years and a deacon twenty-seven. His wife, Esther Hickok, supposed to be the granddaughter of Deacon Benjamin Hickok, was a fitting helper in every good work, and died May 13, 1822, at the age of seventy-seven years. Deacon Gregory believed in covenant mercies, and a granddaughter gratefully remembered, many years after, his frequent prayer for his "children and his children's children unto the third and fourth generation." He was a thrifty farmer, given to hospitality.

Deacon Jesse St. John was a soldier of the Revolution, and a member of one of the two "forlorn hopes" of twenty men each which volunteered to lead the attack in that desperate but brilliant surprise and capture of Stony Point, on the night of July 16, 1779, by Gen. Anthony Wayne. Deacon St.

* His letter to the church was brought from Norwalk, 1740. His house was a few rods north of that built about 1740 for his son Ezra in which his grandson Moses lived, and his great-granddaughter, Miss Clara M. Gregory, now resides.

† His children were Atigoll, Elijah, Giles, Clark, Daniel, and Sherman.

John was not tall, but strongly built, capable of enduring much fatigue,—a man of few words and resolute in purpose. As late as 1841 he would walk from his home, west of the lower part of Belden's Hill, two and a half miles, to attend a preparatory lecture in a hot day in summer. Soon after that time he removed to Brooklyn, E. D. (N. Y.), to spend the remainder of his life with his son, Thomas St. John. His death occurred about 1846. His wife was Anna Weed, to whom he was married Sept. 28, 1790. She died the 18th of March, 1829, aged seventy-three years.

Deacon John Chapman was born in that part of Fairfield which is now in Westport in March, 1759. He married Susannah Fitch, daughter of James Fitch, of Norwalk, and about 1790 removed to Chestnut Hill, where he lived in the house now occupied by his son-in-law, Mr. Asahel Dudley, till his death, April 13, 1816. Mrs. Chapman was born Dec. 24, 1756, and died March 14, 1833. They had four children,—Anna H. (Mrs. Dudley), James Fitch, John, and Clark M. One who knew him well says: "Deacon Chapman was erect, six feet two inches in height, muscular and broad shouldered, of commanding presence, even tempered but very resolute, energetic and industrious. Decided in his opinions, he was yet gentle in his family, who loved and venerated him. An excellent singer, he was regularly in his place in the choir on Sunday. After a hard day's work he would go to Norwalk on business, and on his way home, forgetful of time, spend several hours at the house of some friend in singing. Fond of home, of a retiring disposition, he seldom took the lead unless evidently called by duty. His Christian character was marked and consistent."

His son, John Chapman, inherited his father's love for music, and led the choir fifty years ago. Both he and James F. were much respected. They went into business in New York, and died there, the latter at the age of fifty-five years, Sept. 29, 1847. Tradition says the house in which Deacon Chapman lived was built about 1745. It was used early in the Revolution as a storehouse for some Norwalk goods. At the time of the burning of Danbury a scouting party entered it and destroyed many of the goods.

Deacon Matthew Marvin, the sixth in descent from that Matthew Marvin who, coming to this country in 1635,* in the ship "Increase," Robert Lea, master, settled at Hartford; the fifth in descent from that Matthew Marvin who, at the age of eight years, came with his father from England, and at the age of twenty-four came, one of the first settlers, to Norwalk; was the son of that Matthew Marvin who, about 1760, came from Norwalk and built the house in Pimpewaug in which the son Matthew was born and died, and in which Deacon Charles Marvin now lives. He fitted for college with his pastor (Mr. Lewis), graduated at Yale in 1785, went into business at Hudson, N. Y., returned to Wilton at the death of his father (1791), and for twenty-five years engaged with remarkable success in mercantile affairs, and for the remainder of his life was active in public and especially in church and society matters; the honored citizen, the trusted counselor, the faithful deacon till his death, which occurred, in the eighty-second year of his age,† on the 5th of June, 1842, less than a month after the great ingathering following the revival of that year, into which he had entered with the activity of a younger man. Deacon Marvin, or "Esquire Marvin," as he was more frequently called, was tall, well-proportioned, dignified and courteous in manner, active, clear-headed, and resolute, by natural gifts, by education, and the possession of property well fitted to exercise an extraordinary and salutary influence in the parish and town.

Deacon Zadok Raymond, son of Clapp Raymond, born about 1764, united with the church in 1811, and lived in Kent, in the house now for many years occupied by Charles Comstock, but in his later life in the first house on the road leading to Hurlbutt Street, formerly occupied by his brother, Asahel Raymond, where he died April 12, 1841, at the age of seventy-seven. He was a man humble, devout, and beloved, much interested in benevolent work. The pastor of this church may remember when, on a bright summer's morning in 1832, two boys, who went on an errand to Deacon Raymond's, waited without until he had ended worship in the family and with the men who had come to work in the hayfield. He evidently believed that the hired laborer might enjoy and be benefited by such service. He loved good men, and his house was often open for Sunday five o'clock and other neighborhood prayer-meetings.

Deacon Jonathan Middlebrook was the son of Michael Middlebrook, who came to Wilton from Fairfield, and, by the half-way covenant, united with the church, June 1, 1766. Jonathan Middlebrook united with the church during the ministry of Mr. Woodward. The date of his election to the office of deacon is not found.

His liberal gift to the fund of the society has already been noticed. He gave also the land for the burying-yard on the hill. He was by occupation a farmer. He died (without children) Jan. 20, 1832, at the age of seventy-seven years. His residence was on the Ridgefield road, east side, next to the Davenport place.

Deacon Lewis H. St. John united with this church in 1816, was chosen deacon in 1841, and ordained the 17th of October of that year.

He was a quiet, earnest, spiritually-minded man, a little above the average height, with a soft, pleasant voice, and gained the respect and good will of the people. His residence was in Nod. He was by trade a cooper, and tilled the land.

* Dr. N. Bouton's Hist. Desc. at Norwalk, 1851, p. 71.

† He was baptized Jan. 11, 1761.

Deacon St. John died Aug. 10, 1867, aged seventy-four years.

Deacon James Betts was born in Wilton. His father, David Betts, died while he was yet a boy. By great energy and self-denial he secured an education at the academy, attended lectures in New Haven, and early began to teach. Some time after Mr. Hawley Olmstead had removed to New Haven, Mr. Betts rented his former residence, and brought to it his family school for boys. In 1844 he built a commodious house in Stamford, where he yet remains. His school has been remarkably prosperous. One son, William J., graduated at Yale, 1870, and another, Alsop Lockwood, a member of the class of 1872, died in college. Deacon Betts was received to the church in 1825, was elected and ordained deacon in 1841. In Stamford, for thirty-two years, he has well represented this church and its influence upon its children.

Deacon Giles Gregory was born the 7th of October, 1806, and died Feb. 20, 1859. He was the youngest son of Moses and Abigail Gregory, the great-grandson, on his father's side, of Deacon Matthew Gregory; on his mother's side, the grandson of Deacon Daniel Gregory. He was thus descended by each parent from one of the elder deacons,—Deacon Matthew Gregory and Deacon Benjamin Hickok. He was educated at the academy, taught school many years, and after his father's death, in 1837, engaged actively as a farmer. He confessed Christ May, 1842, was ordained deacon the 2d of November, 1849, and was active in church, society, and town affairs. His readiness to render pecuniary or personal aid to the poor or those in distress was hearty and efficient. His prayers indicated unfeigned humility; his life testified to the genuineness of his faith. His early death, which occurred Feb. 19, 1859, from typhoid fever, was lamented by many. He resided with his sisters in the house built by or for his grandfather, Ezra Gregory, about 1740, but was never married.

Deacon Wakeman Hubbell, the son of Nathan and Sarah Hubbell, was born in Wilton. He was firm, conscientious, and earnest to a high degree. He was elected to the office of deacon on the 8th of February, 1860, and ordained the 19th of March following by his old pastor, Rev. Sylvanus Haight. Of his character and work I will speak in another connection.

The present deacons are Charles Marvin, who was ordained Oct. 17, 1841; Benajah Gilbert, ordained March 19, 1860; Edward Olmstead, ordained May 1, 1870; and Robert T. B. Easton, ordained May 1, 1870.

ST. MATTHEW'S CHURCH.

St. Matthew's parish was organized in the year 1802. Previous to that time members of the Episcopal Church residing in Wilton seem to have belonged to the parish of St. Paul's Church, Norwalk. It appears that in the year 1802 application was made to the justice of the peace to warn a meeting of the members of the church in Wilton, for the purpose of choosing officers and transacting other business. The meeting was held on July 1, 1802, at a school-house in the district called Pimpewaug, in the northern part of the town. At this meeting David Lambert was made clerk, Daniel Church and Samuel Belden were chosen wardens, and David Belden, Stephen Keeler, J. James, and William Starling were chosen vestrymen. From that time Wilton became an independent parish. At a meeting held in December following a vote was taken to build a church. In the year 1804 we find a committee existing to superintend the building of the church, but it does not appear from the records of the parish that the building was entirely completed till the year 1818. It was consecrated by Bishop Hobart on Aug. 11, 1819. This continued to be a place of public worship for forty-five years, until in 1863 it was sold and removed, to be supplanted by the present church, now standing just north of the site of the old edifice. It is on record that, in the year 1810, David Belden was appointed agent for the society to prefer a petition to the General Assembly for the grant of a lottery to raise one thousand dollars to be applied to the finishing of the church, and he was to "use his prudence therein."

Between the years 1802 and 1816 the Rev. Henry Whitlock and the Rev. Dr. Bethel Judd, who were rectors of St. Paul's Church, Norwalk, officiated about one-fourth of their time in Wilton. The first settled minister was the Rev. Reuben Sherwood, who assumed the charge in January, 1816, at which time there were about forty families in the parish. The following is the oldest list on record of members of the Episcopal Church in Wilton: James Arnold, Samuel Belden, David Belden, Daniel Betts, Jr., Stephen Britts, Isaac Britts, Samuel Belden, Jr., William Belden, Sherman Betts, John Cannon, Daniel Church, Daniel Church, Jr., Fitch Church, James W. Church, James Davis, Lemah Edwards, George Elwood, Samuel Fitch, Samuel Fitch, Jr., Zach. Whitman Fitch, John Gilbert, Theoph. B. Handford, Nathan Handford, Nathaniel Hendrick, Abraham Hurlburt, Job Hodges, Jabez Handford, Molly Handford, Peter James, Jenny James, William James, Seth Keeler, Stephen Keeler, John Keeler, Elijah Keeler, David Lambert, William Long, John Morgan, James Morgan, Zadmon Morgan, Ezekiel Morgan, Jeremiah Morgan, Samuel Marvin, Nathan Marvin, Sarah Marvin, Joel Morgan, Joseph Morgan, Sarah Marvin, Lucy Marvin, Stephen Morgan, Asa Olmstead, Jared Patchin, Clapp Rockwell, Edward Rockwell, William Starling, Daniel Sturges, Ezekiel Sturges, Elias Sturges, David Sloan, Nathaniel Starling, Peter Smith, William St. John, Edmund Tuttle.

The Rev. Ruben Sherwood was succeeded by the Rev. Charles Smith, who was rector of the parish from 1816 to 1823. He also officiated a part of the time in Ridge-field. He was succeeded by Rev. Origin P. Holcomb, who took charge of the parish on Whit-Sunday, 1823, and continued until Easter, 1831. Until this time it appears that the church was without a bell, as we find that at the Easter meeting in 1828 a committee was appointed to procure one. Rev. Mr. Holcomb was followed by the Rev. Charles J. Todd, who remained in charge from 1831 to 1833. After him was Rev. William Barlow, from 1834 to 1836; Rev. Dr. Bethel Judd, 1836-37; Rev. R. C. Shimsal, 1837; Rev. Abel Nichols, 1838-39; Rev. G. V. Nichols and Rev. William G. Hyer, 1840. In July, 1840, the Rev. John Purves became rector, and continued till the year 1844. During this period the society was in a prosperous condition, but that happy state was suddenly disturbed by difficulties in relation to the funds of the society. These had been invested in a loan with securities. The principal failing to pay the interest, the society was obliged to call upon the indorser of the note for payment. This involved the parish in two long lawsuits. From 1844 to 1849 services were irregular, there being no settled clergyman. Within this period the Rev. David H. Short resided in the town, and officiated for a portion of the time for two years. From March till June, 1849, the Rev. Timothy Wilcoxson was a resident minister, and during this short time did much towards helping the parish to revive and resume its former efficiency. In June, 1849, the Rev. Abel Ogden was invited to the rectorship, and continued in charge until Easter, 1851. Under Mr. Ogden's ministry the church edifice was thoroughly repaired and painted within and without. He was followed in 1851 by the Rev. Levi G. Stinson, who continued until October, 1859. Under Mr. Stinson's rectorship the church was in a very prosperous condition. The present rectory belonging to the parish was built at that time. Mr. Stinson was followed by the Rev. Simon G. Fuller, who was rector from 1861 till November, 1863. The present church edifice was begun and completed under the charge of Rev. Mr. Fuller. It is built of stone and brick, in Gothic style, with nave and transepts, and seats about three hundred persons. The corner-stone was laid on June 17, 1862, by the Right Rev. John Williams, and the building consecrated by him May 21, 1864. The building committee were Rev. S. G. Fuller, James W. Pinkney, Theodore L. Sturges, Sherman P. Fitch, Charles Cannon, and Nathan M. Belden.

Rev. Mr. Fuller was succeeded by Rev. Albert U. Stanley, who was rector from 1864 to 1867; Rev. William L. Bostwick, from 1867 to 1870; Rev. J. E. Walton, from 1870 to November, 1878. Rev. Mr. Walton had also the charge of Emanuel Church, Weston. The present rector, Rev. Francis W. Barnett, took charge of the parish on Whit-Sunday, June 1, 1879.

The present officers of the parish are Nathan M.

Belden and Eli S. Betts, Wardens; Stephen James, Henry A. Barrett, Sherman P. Fitch, Henry G. Thomson, Serevo E. Ogden, Vestrymen; Nathan M. Belden, Clerk and Treasurer; David S. R. Lambert and Nathan M. Belden, Delegates to the Diocesan Convention. The parish now comprises fifty-four families and ninety communicants.

ZION HILL CHURCH.

Jan. 29, 1844, the first meeting was held to consider the practicability of building a church. Rev. Zachariah Davenport chairman, Wm. H. Taylor secretary.

At a meeting held Feb. 5, 1844, the first trustees were chosen, viz.: Daniel Allee, Joseph Scribner, Joshua Smith, Odle Bouton, Aaron Bennett, Sherman Cole, Sherman Morehouse, Albert Lockwood, Noah Patrick. At this meeting the building committee was chosen, viz.: William Nichols, Odle Bouton, Charles Scribner. The church was completed and dedicated Nov. 26, 1844; Rev. Francis Hodgson and J. L. Gilder performed the dedication service. Present trustees, viz.: A. B. Lockwood, John Olmsted, William Nichols, Wilbur Sturges, William B. Harbutt, Charles Scribner, Brewer Gilbert, Andrew Jackson, and Harman Gilbert.

The edifice was erected at a cost of about three thousand dollars, and is located near Cannon's Station.

There is a small class of Episcopal Methodists at Bull's Bridge, in this town, but they hold their connection with Gaylordsville Church, in the town of New Milford.

Rev. William H. Kirk is pastor of a small congregation connected with a small branch of Methodists called Reformed Methodists. They worship in a school-house in Macedonia School District, two miles west of the village of Kent Plains; number of members, fifteen. They also have an old church in the east part of this town on the mountain, organized fifty years ago. The society there is small and poor, but keeps up regular services. The present pastor is Rev. Elijah Fry; number of members, about twenty.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Prominent Men—List of College Graduates—Postmasters—Burying Grounds—The Ladies' Home Missionary Association—Educational—The Wilton Academy—Wilton Division, S. of T.—Civil History—Selection from Organization to 1880—Representatives—Military Record—List of Soldiers.

JONATHAN STURGES and Thaddeus Burr were delegates to the convention which ratified the Constitution of the United States, held at Hartford on the first Thursday of January, 1788.

* This list appeared in a pamphlet called the Anniversary of the Congregational Church, published several years ago. Since then some changes may have occurred which have not been noted.

The delegates to the convention which formed the State Constitution, held in Hartford in August in 1818, were David Hill and Gideon Tomlinson.

Aaron Burr was born in this town in 1714. He graduated at Yale in 1735, and in 1742 was settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J. In 1748 he became president of Princeton College, which position he occupied until his death, which occurred Sept. 24, 1757. He was an accomplished scholar and able divine. He married a daughter of Jonathan Edwards, and had two children, a daughter, who married Chief Justice Reeve, of Litchfield, and Aaron Burr, who became Vice-President of the United States.

Nathan Gold was a member of the Council for the first time in 1657, and held the office for forty-eight years. He was also chief justice of the Superior Court for ten years, and Deputy-Governor of Connecticut from 1708 to 1721. Unless there were two persons bearing the same name and residing in the same place, holding office continuously, the period of his official life extended over a period of sixty-seven years.

Ebenezer Silliman was born 1708, and graduated at Yale in 1727. He studied law, and soon after his admission to the bar was elected a representative from Fairfield, and at the October session, 1736, he was chosen Speaker of the House, and held the same position at the three succeeding sessions.

In 1739 he was chosen a member of the Council, or upper House of the Legislature, and was annually re-elected for twenty-seven years. At the end of that period he was again chosen a representative, and at the sessions in May and October, 1773, and in May, 1774, he was elevated to the Speaker's chair. Mr. Silliman was also annually elected a judge of the Superior Court for twenty-three years, besides being a judge of the Probate Court, judge of the County Court, colonial auditor, and a member of various important committees. For a period of over forty-five years he was almost constantly in public life.

LIST OF COLLEGE GRADUATES, ETC.

The following is a list of natives, and those who have resided in Wilton, who were college graduates, or entered one of the learned professions, or were authors, editors, or teachers.

A list is also appended of ladies who themselves or whose husbands belonged to one of these classes. The list may not be complete, but still is of great value:

David Lambert (Y. C., 1761).

Deacon Matthew Marvin (Y. C., 1785), died 1842. He was the son of Matthew Marvin, and the sixth in descent from Matthew Marvin, one of the first settlers of Norwalk.

Rev. David Belden (Y. C., 1785), died 1832. Took orders in the Episcopal Church. Afterwards engaged in farming, and resided in the upper part of Pimpeaug.

Rev. Zachariah Lewis and Rev. Isaac Lewis, D.D. (twin sons of Rev. Isaac Lewis, D.D.), born Jan. 1, 1773, graduated at Yale, 1794; useful and honored in many ways. (See Sprague's "Annals," vol. i. p. 666.) Zachariah died in Brooklyn, N. Y., Nov. 14, 1840; Isaac died in New York, Sept. 23, 1854.

Prof. Moses Stuart (Y. C., 1799), died 1852. He was born in 1780, in the house now owned and occupied by Abijah M. Jones, the son of Isaac and Olive Stuart. He read books with eagerness when four years old, but remained a farmer's boy with no thought of college till, at fourteen, a thirst for knowledge was manifest which neither toil nor years could quench. He went to Norwalk, made rapid progress in the rudiments of Latin and French, and was fitted for the Sophomore class by Roger Minot Sherman, who had the preceding year been a tutor at Yale. He graduated with the highest honor in the class of 1799; afterwards he taught in what was North Fairfield, and in Danbury; studied law, was admitted to the bar at Danbury in 1802; became tutor at Yale from 1802 to 1804. There and afterwards he showed almost unsurpassed skill in awakening the enthusiasm of young men in their studies. But here the Spirit of the Lord met him and he heard the call which Paul heard,—to preach the gospel. He united with the College Church and studied theology with Dr. Dwight. His first and only settlement was as pastor of the First Church in New Haven. It was an era (those almost four years of his pastorate are yet remembered there) during which above one hundred and seventy (170) were added to the church by profession. His successor, Rev. Dr. N. W. Taylor, forty years later, spoke in the highest terms of his power as a preacher, reckoning him second to none in this country. In 1810 he was wanted, as professor of Hebrew and Greek, in the new Theological Seminary at Andover, Mass. "We cannot spare him," said one of the Yale faculty to the Rev. Dr. Samuel Spring, of Newburyport, who had come to New Haven to get Mr. Stuart's assent to the plan. "We want no man who can be spared," was Dr. Spring's reply.

He went to Andover, as he himself said, with small knowledge of Hebrew, and of Greek grammar less than many a student who this year enters college. In two years he had prepared a Hebrew grammar, and, as there was no printer who understood the business, he was obliged to set a part of the types with his own hands.

Rev. William Belden (Y. C., 1803), died 1861; born July 16, 1781; son of Azor Belden. From 1812 to 1821 he was pastor at Greenfield, and teacher there and afterwards at Fairfield; also, in 1824 to 1843, in New York City. Resided in Brooklyn, 1858 to 1861.

C., 1826), son of Nathan and Sarah Hubbell; ordained at Mount Carmel, May 18, 1830; dismissed 1836; installed at Wolcottville, Feb. 29, 1837; dismissed Sept. 29, 1839; pastor at East Avon, Dec. 31, 1849, to July 1, 1853; pastor at North Stonington, Aug. 17, 1853, to April 6, 1869; pastor at Long Ridge, 1869 to Oct. 28, 1873; resides at Mount Carmel, Conn.

EDUCATIONAL.

The first reference in the old records to schools appears under date of December, 1728, as follows: "A meeting of the society of Wilton parish, Dec. 9, 1728, the said society did agree, by a major vote, to get up a school in said parish.

"At the same meeting the society, by a major vote, made choice of Lieut. Ketchum, Joseph Birchard, and Samuel Betts a committee for to look after and set up a school or schools in said parish."

"At a meeting of the said society of Wilton, on the 10th day of March, Anna Domini 1729, the said society did agree, by a major vote, that they hire the Rev. Mr. Sturgeon for to keep school in said parish for some time."

"March 2, 1730, the society of Wilton did agree, by a major vote, that Kent and Chestnut Hill should have one-third part of the colony money, they keeping a school so long as their part will come to."

There were frequent votes concerning the schools. In January, 1792, the parish was divided into nine school districts, as follows: No. 1, Nod; No. 2, Bald Hill; No. 3, Middlebrook District; No. 4, Drum Hill (Centre District); No. 6, Kent; No. 7, Pimpewaug; No. 8, Chestnut Hill; No. 9, Harry's Ridge. The Kent school-house stood in the triangle east of the Danbury road and south of the old burying-ground (as was customary), near the meeting-house.

THE WILTON ACADEMY.

The educational interests of Wilton from the beginning kept abreast with the rapid strides of progress, and the year 1816 witnessed an important era in the history of the town,—the founding of the Wilton Academy.

Hawley Olmstead, a man worthy to be held in lasting remembrance, graduated from Yale College the foremost scholar of the class of 1816.* He designed to study law, but a failure of his eyes in college induced him to open a school as an experiment. Dartmouth College had its origin in a small school-building yet standing in Columbia, Conn. The Wilton Academy was opened in 1816 in a small building, afterwards for many years used by the late Nathan Comstock as a store. It was soon seen that the young teacher had rare gifts for his office. Before entering college he had taught a district school, and, as assistant pupil, had aided Rev. William Belden, —himself a Wilton man,—at that time pastor in Greenfield and principal of its academy. An academy building was erected in 1820. The land upon which the academy was built was given "for the advancement of literature and science, and especially for the good will I have and bear to the Presbyterian Society of Wilton," by Nathan Comstock, to "David Willard, Samuel Comstock (2d), and Lewis Gregory, committee of the Presbyterian Society of Wilton, for the time being, and to their successors in office forever." The land given was sixty-five feet front and seventy deep. The land was to be used only for the erection of a building or buildings for "a school of higher order, and for religious and singing meetings," "which school, kept in said house, is to be under the direction of the clergyman of the Presbyterian Society, for the time being, and his successors in office, and the preceptor of the school; and in case of the society's being vacant or destitute of a clergyman, to be under the direction of the committee of said society." The date of the deed is March 25, 1820. Mention is made that the school at that time was in Mr. Comstock's store. The witnesses are Sylvanus Haight and Matthew Marvin. The deed is acknowledged before Matthew Marvin, justice of the peace, and is evidently in his handwriting.

The academy building stood south of the road, between the present site of the town-house and the parsonage. About the year 1832 it was removed to a spot a little northeast of the present chapel. The old building was sold, about 1870, to William A. Sturges,

* Hawley Olmst. of son of Aaron and Sarah Esther (Hawley) Olmstead, born Dec. 17, 1793, was descended, on his father's side, from Richard Olmstead, one of the first settlers of Norwalk, and its first representative in the Colonial Legislature. His mother was a "great-granddaughter" of Rev. Thomas Hawley, of Northampton, Mass., who was a graduate of Harvard College in 1709, and the first minister of Ridgefield, Conn. Mr. Olmstead married Miss Harriet Smith, of New Canaan, a niece of Rev. Daniel Smith, who was fifty-three years (1743-1846) pastor of the First Church, Stamford. Mrs. Olmstead still resides in New Haven.

and stands near the post-office. Mr. Haight, with his usual enthusiasm, aided to publish the excellencies of the teacher and to procure pupils from abroad. The two first pupils fitted here for college—Nathaniel Bouton and Jared B. Waterbury—have long been among the most honored and useful ministers of their generation. Each received the degree of D.D. many years since. Dr. Bouton, for forty years pastor of the church in Concord, N. H., is recognized as the historian of that State. The school so prospered that after four and a half years Mr. Olmstead was persuaded to remove to Norwalk. His health became impaired, and three years later he returned to Wilton to rest and engage in agriculture. He also heard private pupils. At the end of two and a half years, in 1826, he again opened his school, at first in the academy, and when the town-hall was built, a few years after, in the upper room of that building. There he continued thirteen years, with no public examination, no private circulars, no advertisement, and yet uniformly a full attendance of pupils. When he left Wilton, in 1839, to become rector of the Hopkins Grammar-School in New Haven,—an institution forty years older than the college,—he had had pupils from nearly, or quite, every State in the Union, and from several foreign countries. Some of the Christian young men, whose names are yet held in loving remembrance here, had made themselves very useful in the Sabbath-school and in social religious meetings.†

After ten years of extraordinary success in the grammar-school, Mr. Olmstead's health failed and he relinquished the rectorship to his son, who had for two years been his assistant. For ten years longer he taught private pupils in his own house. In 1862 he received from Yale the degree of LL.D. His death occurred the 3d of December, 1868, while he was addressing, in his own parlor, a club of ministers and laymen, with whom for more than twenty years he had met weekly to discuss some great moral and religious question. Said an eye-witness, "He had just completed a most thorough, logical, and, as his companions felt, richly beautiful argument. It was indeed the beautiful death of the Christian soldier with his armor on,—the disciple going out of the earthly service to the 'well done' of his Lord."

In one of the later years of his life, anticipating some such day as this for Wilton, and thinking he might not be present, Mr. Olmstead charged me to give a sentiment, which will be recognized as characteristic of the man, and is fit to be engraven as his epitaph. It was this: "Unswerving, supreme fidelity to Truth and Right."‡

‡ Mr. Olmstead was of medium height, stoutly built, very erect and dignified in his carriage, but courteous and affable in his address. He governed his school and won the lasting respect of his pupils in a remarkable degree with little apparent effort. His interest in Wilton was deep and constant to the day of his death. He was a member of the Happily for Wilton, the health of Mr. Edward Olmstead, who was for two years the assistant and then the successor of his father in the Hopkins Grammar-school, became impaired after a few years, which eventually occasioned his return to Wilton, in 1855, to resume the work of the academy,—at first in the room vacated by Mr. Hawley Olmstead in 1839, and afterwards in a building of his own, where he continues to this day doing for the children what his honored father had done for their parents.*

This establishment is located near Cannon's Station, and manufactures fine wire-cloth, copper and brass. The establishment was founded about four years ago by David and John Lockwood.

CIVIL HISTORY.

The first public movement to form a separate parish was made Dec. 7, 1725, when the town of Norwalk, which was then co-terminous with the ecclesiastical society, "by a major vote, signified their willingness that the inhabitants of Kent, Belden's Hill, and Chestnut Hill, and so upwards, become a parish or village by themselves." At the same meeting a committee was appointed "to joine with a committee from ye said inhabitants in viewing where ye bounds may be best fixt for ye said upper village, and make a report to ye town of their opinion." The little brook at the lower end of Kent formed a convenient starting-point, from which the committees proceeded east and west and fixed the bounds substantially where the present bounds of the town are, the eastern boundary excepted.

A petition was sent to the General Assembly for the incorporation of the town, signed by the following persons: Joseph Elmer, Joseph Jump, Daniel Abbott, Joseph Carle, John Keeler, Matthew St. John, David Keeler, John St. John, David Betts, Samuel Betts, Jr., Stephen Betts, Nathaniel Slauson, John Wood, Jr., Jonathan Wood, Jr., Nathan Betts, Daniel Trowbridge, Nathan Olmstead, Stephen Buckingham, John Stuart, Benjamin Hickok, Richard Bouton, Obadiah Wood, Thomas Bouton, James Trowbridge, Jonathan Sturdevant, Ralph Keeler, Jachin Gregory, John Dunning, Nathaniel Ketchum, John Taylor, William Parker. The act was passed May 12, 1726. The town was organized in 1802.

The Prime Ancient Society of Norwalk was disposed to deal generously with the new parish. Feb. 28, 1726, it voted "to the inhabitants of ye upper Society the old pulpit upon free gift;" and the next February it voted that the proprietors in Norwalk grant them ten acres of land, for "the use of ye Presbyterian or Congregational Ministry among them forever." Two years later five acres more were given. The harmony thus early existing between the two parishes has happily continued to this day.

Legislature in 1825-26 and 1828-29, and a senator from New Haven in 1853. As chairman of the committee on education in 1826, and again in 1828, he presented reports on common school education that attracted much attention and exercised a lasting influence.

STURGES BENNETT.

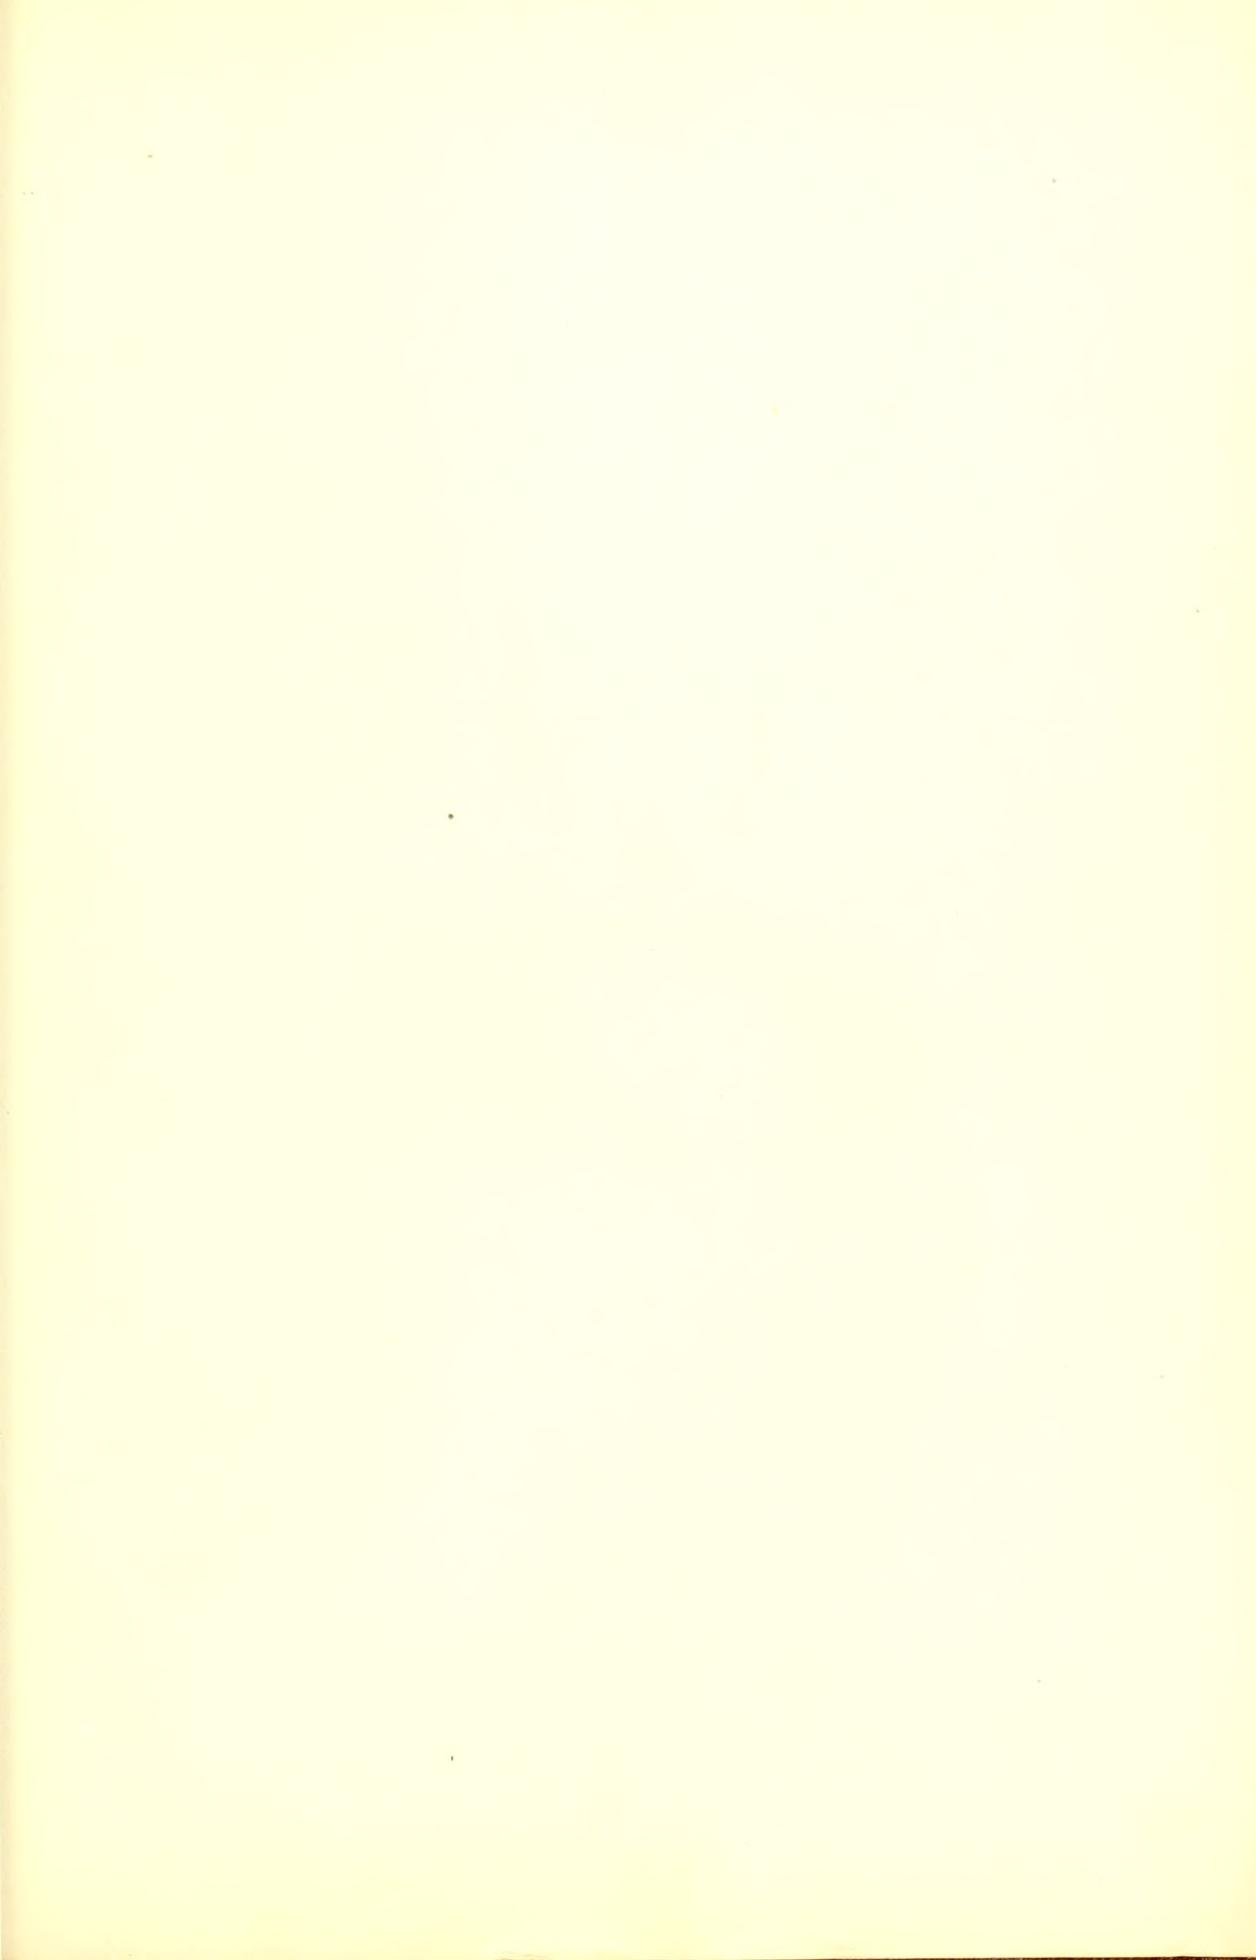

Sturges Bennett, son of Elias Bennett, Jr., descended from an old pioneer family of New England. He was born in 1805 and died May 30, 1880, at the ripe age of seventy-five. His grandfather was a soldier in the Revolution and took part in the battle at Ridgefield, in which Gen. Wooster was killed. He died at the age of ninety-six. His father, Elias Bennett, Jr., is remembered by the oldest inhabitants, as in the capacity of post-rider he for many years delivered the Bridgeport Standard and Farmer and the Norwalk Gazette through various towns.

In the spring of 1830, Sturges Bennett married for his first wife Charlotte, daughter of Benjamin Gilbert, by whom he had four children, three of whom preceded their mother to another world. Soon after this marriage he became associated with his father in business, and they built the red shop which stood on the site now occupied by the fine buildings now used as a store by his son Eli. From this small beginning sprang the extensive manufacturing business which has since been conducted with such success.

In 1848, Mr. Bennett was united in marriage to his second wife, who through all the succeeding years of his life was a cheerful, faithful, and affectionate companion, always making his pleasure and comfort her first consideration.

LEWIS OLMSTEAD.

ELBERT OLMSTEAD

SAMUEL KEELER

John B. Sturges.

LEWIS AND ELBERT OLMSTEAD.

LEWIS OLMSTEAD is of English-Scotch descent, of early settlers of New England, and was born Feb. 25, 1795. His grandfather Samuel Olmstead lies buried near Comstock's store, in North Wilton. His father, also named Samuel, is buried in Hillside Cemetery. Lewis was the eldest son of Samuel and Mercy Olmstead. He learned the trade of shoemaking in all its branches, but the loss of his hand, by an accident, compelled him to give up this business, and to support a large and growing family he was obliged to resort to other work. He began storekeeping in his native village; at the same time he commenced in a small way the manufacture of shirts. This was in 1831. He began making them for Mr. McGrath, a New York firm. His first invoice from him was two dozen shirts. These, owing to Mr. Olmstead's inexperience, were not made to the satisfaction of that gentleman, and he hesitated about giving him more; but the earnestness of Mr. Olmstead's manner gave assurance that the work would be done as well as he could do, which, with a little more experience, would be well enough. Mr. Olmstead received more work, which on its return was pronounced well done, and from that time forth no difficulty was experienced in getting all the work desired. The business had not been reduced to the system by which it is now conducted, neither was the work prepared as it is now. The kind manufactured were principally of common calico, with puff bosoms, and were difficult to make, the seamstresses throughout the country working by hand (this was before the sewing-machine came into general use,—indeed, we believe, before its invention). This difficulty Mr. Olmstead overcame, and from a small beginning his business assumed almost colossal proportions, and for many years he enjoyed the reputation of being the largest manufacturer of shirts in his section.

Lewis Olmstead was married, Feb. 24, 1818, to Miss Sally, second daughter of Elie and Isabel De Forest, of New Canaan, Conn. Seven children were born to them,—Melissa, Maria, Hiram, Samuel L., William De F., Mary, and William H. Melissa was married, Oct. 15, 1845, to Elbert Olmstead. Their children have been Frank L., Herman (deceased), and William E.

ELBERT OLMSTEAD had been in the business in the employ of his father-in-law, and on the death of the latter bought into the concern in connection with his brother-in-law, William H. Olmstead. After a partnership of a few years, Elbert bought the entire business, which he has since successfully conducted.

JOHN BURR STURGES.

John Burr Sturges, son of Samuel Burr and Elizabeth Marvin Sturges, was born in the city of New York, July 5, 1838. His grandfather, Samuel Sturges, was a native of Fairfield Co., Conn.

His father, Samuel Burr Sturges, was born in Wilton, Feb. 21, 1807, and died there Nov. 11, 1872. He followed the business of merchant and farmer combined; he was a prominent man in the Episcopal Church in that place, and one of its wardens for many years. Early in life he was married to Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Samuel and Lucretia Marvin, of Westport. Their children were Frederick Dennis, and John Burr. The former, a graduate of New York Medical College, is at this writing (1889) surgeon in the Pacific Mail Steamship service.

John B. Sturges was educated in New York City, and at Trinity College, Hartford. He follows from choice the vocation of farming. He has often been called to official position by the citizens of his town, and at present is one of its selectmen. He lives on what has been the Sturges homestead for nearly a century.

At the age of thirty-two he was married to Helen Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Sherman P. and Sarah M. (Jones) Fitch, of Wilton. At this writing their children are Florence M., Samuel B., Mabel F., and Frederick S.

SAMUEL KEELER.

Samuel Keeler bears the patronymic of his ancestors through many generations. His grandfather, Samuel Keeler, was one of the original settlers of Norwalk. His great-great-grandfather, Samuel Keeler, settled in what is now Wilton among the first settlers, and built the house the frame of which is still standing and is occupied by Mr. I. N. Benedict. The property on which Legrand W. Keeler, father of the subject of this sketch lives, has been owned by the family since its settlement.

The great-grandfather of Samuel, also named Samuel, was an active patriot during the Revolution, and was despoiled by the British under Tryon. His brother, Isaiah Keeler, was a soldier in the American army.

His grandfather, Isaiah Wheeler, was an extensive farmer and prominent in his town, often holding positions of public trust. He was married early in life to Lucy, daughter of Capt. John Watrous, of Ridgefield. Their children were Fannie M., Legrand W., Emily A. (deceased), and Martha (deceased).

Legrand W. Keeler was born Oct. 19, 1815. He married, Sept. 17, 1811, Catharine, youngest daughter of Horatio and Bethia Lockwood. Of this union there have been born Samuel, Edward L., Wellington R., Catharine L., and William L.

Samuel Keeler, subject of this memoir is (1889) in his thirty-fifth year, and was born in Wilton, Fairfield Co., Conn. He early evinced a disposition to acquire knowledge, for the attainment of which his father gave him every opportunity. He was fitted for college at the preparatory school of Professor Olmstead, of Wilton, and entered Yale College in the class of '67. After his graduation he studied law with Hon. Levi Warner, of Norwalk, and was admitted to the bar of Fairfield County, afterwards to the New York bar. He is now practicing his profession in New York City.

WILLIAM HENRY TAYLOR.

William Henry Taylor, the youngest son of Levi and Esther (Belden) Taylor, was born at Wilton, Conn., Jan. 5, 1810. His education was commenced in the district schools, and his studies were completed at the academy of Mr. Olinstead, in Wilton.

While but a youth he became a member of the Coast-Guard, organized in the latter part of the Revolutionary struggle to defend the shores of Long Island Sound against the attacks of ex-Governor Tryon and Benedict Arnold, for which service, in the later years of his life (after sustaining heavy losses of property), he drew a pension from the United States government.

When quite a young man he was appointed to the office of county surveyor, succeeding his father in that position. He afterwards established and maintained for several years a boarding- and day-school in the town of Wilton; his health failing by reason of close confinement and application to his duties, he was compelled to give up this enterprise and retire to his farm residence, where he spent most of his time. He at different times taught the district schools in or near his native town, and was always highly esteemed as an instructor by those with whom he was associated.

In February, 1842, Mr. Taylor experienced religion during services then being held at the Protestant Methodist church at Georgetown, Fairfield Co., Conn., and shortly afterwards united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he remained a consistent and useful member until the time of his death. He was one of the founders of the Zion's Hill Methodist Episcopal Church, at Wilton, Conn., which was dedicated in November, 1844. For many years he occupied an official relation in this church, being trustee, steward, and superintendent to the Sabbath-school. The latter office he was, however, compelled to resign on account of failing health a few years before his death.

During a portion of his lifetime he filled the office of justice of the peace, and was at different times selectman of his town. In the year 1851 he represented the town of Wilton in the Connecticut Legislature, but declined to serve a second term on account of his business interests, which required his entire attention.

In 1861, feeling a deep interest in the war of the Rebellion and the emancipation of the slaves, he was not satisfied until he had taken a trip to Washington and Virginia and visited the camps of our soldiers.

Mr. Taylor never married, but leaves one brother, one sister, and a number of nephews and nieces to honor his memory. He died at Wilton, Conn., May 13, 1863.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

Descriptive—Early Days—"Milking-Yard"—Manufactures—Miscellaneous.

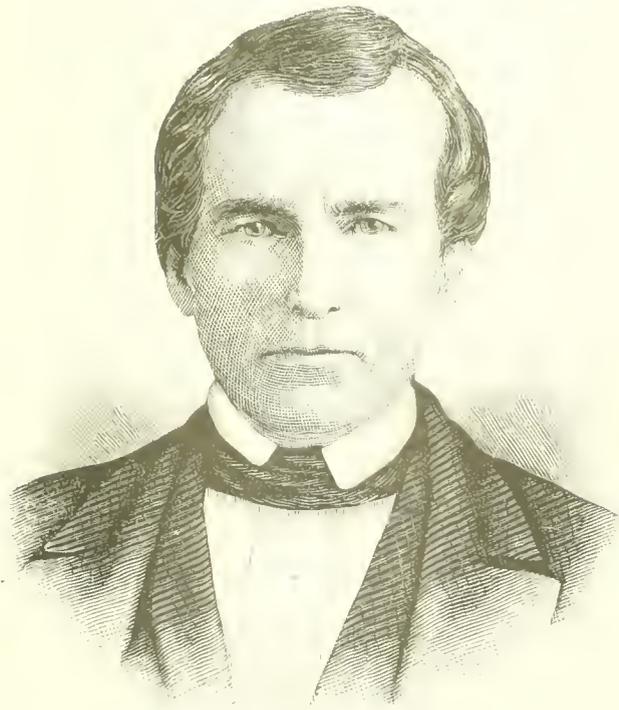

THE first settlers of our village must have had, at the best, only a faint idea of a future town of several hundred residences, a score and more of stores and markets, and nearly or quite as many manufacturing establishments.

The assemblage of dwellings, stores, factories, and shops constituting the village of Bethel is neither upon a hill nor in a valley, nor yet is it on a plain. Still there are hills and valleys, and upon the sides and summits of the hills, and in the lower grounds, the dwellings, the stores, and the factories are located. The grassy plain upon our western border, and now included in the borough of Bethel, is the only level ground of any considerable extent within the limits of the town. It certainly appears to be the only feasible situation in or upon which to locate a town site, and even this is of comparatively moderate extent. It is only a few years—certainly within the memory of many citizens now living—that this district seemed of small account, but within the last thirty-five years it has made wonderful strides towards metropolitan dignity. It has a number of fine residences, as good as the best in town. In Grassy Plain, also, you may find the best constructed, if not the largest, hat-factory in Bethel. It is a large structure, built of brick, and its business is conducted by the well-known firm of O. Benedict & Co. In good times, when hats are in lively demand and all hands—numbering one hundred or more—are at work, it can turn out from one hundred and twenty-five dozen to one hundred and fifty dozen hats per day.

This particular portion of the town will demand further notice as we progress in our observations about Bethel, ancient and modern.

As Bethel was a portion of Danbury at the date of the settlement of this part of the country, it follows naturally that a great deal of the early history of the younger place will be found in the records of the older one. Our town records were kept in Danbury, we voted at Danbury at Presidential elections, at State elections, and at town-meetings for many, many years. But as the first settlers came from Norwalk, they were obliged to pass through the territory now belonging to Bethel in order to reach their new homes, on streets now called South and Main Streets in the borough of Danbury. And these first settlers—the pioneers—had no smooth highway through Redding. Their first path was through the woods on the west side of the pond, and between that and the mountain. The pond now called "Sympang" (a good old Indian name it is) was, until the last quarter of a century, or perchance thirty-five years at most, known as "Milking-Yard Pond." The high hill on the west was always in the past called "Milking-Yard Mountain," and the broken, hilly land (perhaps one hundred acres) lying between pond and mountain was and still is known by the name of "Milking-Yard Farm." The name came naturally enough. More than fifty years ago, in the tender years of infancy and childhood, did the writer hear from the old Revolutionary grand-sire about the trouble the early settlers had with their cattle, particularly the cows, for before these pioneers had time to fence their grants, purchases, or farms, said cows would leave their "pastures fresh" in the up-country and return to the familiar scenes where now stands Norwalk. To prevent the exodus of the beasts a fence was built across the milking-yard farm, so-called, from the south end of the pond to the mountain on the west, the distance not being more than thirty rods. Here the progress of the cows towards their old home by the shore was stayed; and from homes on what is now Danbury's Main Street lads and lasses, grave fathers and sedate mothers rode on horseback a distance of three miles to milk the cows, for there were no wagons hereabout in those early days. We can hardly imagine the fun there must have been. Each horse, furnished with saddle and pillion for the occasion, would carry from two to four gay passengers. The cows having been milked, were left to their own "sweet will," while man and maiden returned with brimming pails of the healthful fluid. And thus it continued until the settlers could complete their houses and fence their fields.

Why should not this territory be known as "Milking-Yard" for all generations to come? In passing, it may be remarked that the country on the east side of the pond has been known as Sympang from time immemorial,—the genuine Indian name.

The "Milking-Yard Farm" has been in possession of one branch of the Benedict family for three generations most surely, perhaps for as many more. The writer should know something of it, having paid taxes on the land to the treasurers of both Danbury and Bethel.

After the lapse of years a more feasible route was found and opened between the new colony and the old home of its founders. The present highway, so far as can be learned at this date, corresponds very nearly with the one surveyed and laid out more than one hundred years ago. The present road is through the "Turkey Plain" neighborhood, a suggestive name indeed, for in the early history of the neighborhood there was an abundance of wild turkeys, and the name was given to this locality from this circumstance. "Turkey Plain" lies on the east side of "Milking-Yard Pond."

There were panthers also in the early years of this country. There is a rock on the mountain still known to some of us as "Painter Rock" (being an abbreviation for Panther Rock), where one of the ancestors of the writer, after a desperate fight, killed the furious animal. It is possible that from this same rock on the mountain the only view of the salt water of Long Island Sound can be obtained within the limits of this town; but on a clear day in fall or winter, when the trees are bereft of foliage, one can with naked eye look upon the glancing waters of that portion of the mighty ocean.

"Silver Spring" lies a little north and west from the pond. The water is very clear. Its form is nearly circular, with a diameter of fifty feet or more, and was in days long gone by famous for the large speckled trout taken from its limpid waters. It gives rise to a considerable stream which, uniting with the one from "Milking-Yard Pond," flows through Grassy Plain, and the two contribute to the volume of the Still River. With the exception of the extreme southern portion of the territory of the town, the water-shed inclines to the north, and the streams are thus discharged into the Housatonic River near New Milford, in Litchfield County, and thence into the salt water between the villages of Stratford and Milford.

As with nearly all colonists, the first care of our ancestors was to gain a livelihood, and as that must under the circumstances come from the soil, it follows that farming was the employment of the newcomers. And yet every house was a factory on a small scale. Wool was carded by hand, and matron and maiden made music with a spinning-wheel instead of a piano or organ. The cloth was woven at home and manufactured into garments in the house, and worn by father and mother and the children. The farmers raised and dressed their own flax also, and this continued to be the custom in some families until within about fifty years. We could find linen sheets and pillow-cases of home manufacture even now without leaving the house where we write. Many of the living remember the broad old fireplace, with its cheerful blaze, before the advent of stoves. For a number of years after stoves came into use the old grandfathers would have nothing to do with them. Fortunately wood was much more abundant then than at the present time.

Through the war of the Revolution, Bethel was loyal to the American cause. There were but few loyalists in the society, and five of its citizens joined the American army. On Saturday, April 26, 1777, the British army under Gen. Tryon marched through the place on its way to burn the military stores in Danbury. One of the few Tories who lived here secreted a deserter from the American army, Thompson by name. Thompson was hung soon after in Newtown.

In the summer and fall of 1775 a malignant form of dysentery prevailed in this place. It was known as the "camp distemper," from a supposition that it might have originated in and spread from the quarters of the Revolutionary army. Within three months there were about fifty deaths in the society, the greater portion of the suffering being among children.

Fifty years and more ago the most prominent manufacturing interests in Bethel were comb-making and hatting, and perhaps the former was even more prominent than the latter. But the comb-makers are among the things that were. There is nothing done at the business in the town now. Yet within the writer's recollection there were a number of firms and individuals who carried on an extensive business. In Elmwood District, Mr. Azrael Smith had a large factory which was surmounted by a cupola containing a bell. It depended upon a small stream for its power, but for its time was a large concern. It stood near the house of James P. Ridge. Mr. Charles Smith also had a shop in the same district a little east of the one just mentioned, nearly opposite the house formerly belonging to the late Joseph Taylor, Esq. The factory of Mr. A. Smith was destroyed by fire between forty and fifty years ago.

In Plumtrees the firm of Charles and Horace Couch did for many years a large business. The building now known as Bartow's saw- and cider-mills was built by the brothers Couch for comb-making purposes.

Charles Barnum also built a shop near the old factory, and for a number of years carried on the business. This was afterwards owned by Deacon Asahel Dunning and used as a hat-shop.

There were others, belonging to different members of the Williams family, in the near vicinity, and others in the village. Of all kinds of factories and shops for the manufacture of combs, in 1840, there were not less than twenty.

The manufacture of hats has not only held its old footing, but has absorbed almost everything else in the way of goods to be sent out of town for sale. The facilities for getting grain from the fertile Western States has made farming in these sterile New England towns a secondary consideration, and young men who are raised on the farm, as a rule, quit the old homestead, and either learn a trade or emigrate to the large cities or to the West. Of course many of these have helped to swell the company of hatters, so that now more than a thousand of our population depend upon employment in this trade for a support. There are at least fourteen establishments in town devoted to this work. A few of them are small shops, but seven or eight of them do a large business. In a good trade the semi-monthly payments for labor amount to three thousand dollars, or even four thousand dollars, in each of several of the larger factories.

The earliest reliable account of this business in Bethel dates back to 1793, when there were four small shops, in which boys, as apprentices, did most of the work. Of these, Zar Dibble's shop stood on the ground now occupied by Ferry's Block, corner of Centre and Chestnut Streets. Capt. Eli Taylor's was a little west of his house, the place now occupied by Eli T. Andrews. Thomas Taylor's shop stood just west of his house, in Grassy Plain. This house, apparently as old as the oldest in town, is the first dwelling near the highway, east of "The Willows" shop, and near the entrance to W. Kyle's Oakland farm.

The shop of Eli Hickok, the fourth in this enumeration, stood where Mr. E. T. Farnam now lives. In those days hats were made mostly of lamb's wool, napped with "back muskrat." Belly muskrat was considered too fine and short for use in those days. The hats were heavy, unwieldy head-gear compared with the specimens of the present time, but they had the virtue of durability, and one style of those days would outlast a half-score of such as we are now in the habit of using.

In the course of years business increased, and shops were built in the outside districts. There were a number in Wildeat (now Elmwood) District, and in Plumtrees and Wolfpits Districts, until they amounted at one time to more than twenty different places of manufacture. Some of these were small concerns in small buildings, just sufficient to contain one sizing-kettle and room for the men to work around it. But of late years they have become centralized, and, with two exceptions, the hatting business of the town is carried on in the Centre and Grassy Plain Districts.

The following is a list of the firms and individuals now engaged at hat-making: Messrs. Cole & Ambler, George G. Durant, Judd & Co., Judd & Dunning, George A. Hickok & Son, H. Hickok & Co., F. McKenzie, Judd & Judson, Charles W. Smith,—the above are in Centre District; O. Benedict & Co., E. T. Farnam, Short Brothers, Grassy Plain; Reuben Taylor, Elmwood; Nelson Taylor, Plumtrees.

Connected with the hat-making interest, Mr. Hugh Reid, of Grassy Plain, has a large factory for making paper-boxes, and in Centre District Theodore Clarke, Esq., has another for the same kind of work. There are also two factories for the manufacture of cases or large wooden boxes, in which the hats are shipped to market. New York is the immediate destination for the products of the factories here, although before the late war many firms sent their goods to Southern and Western cities, where some of them had partners and stores. At one time the work was almost exclusively upon silk hats, but of late, for twenty years perhaps, the soft and stiff hats only have been made.

Of stores, there are eleven in the grocery business, although two of them, E. S. Barnum & Co. and J. J. Meyer, keep dry goods also. Mr. C. H. Hoyt, in Ferry's Block, keeps a large stock of dry goods. There are three markets for the sale of meat and vegetables, and two that supply fresh fish and vegetables. There is one military company of about sixty members, Frederick Cole, of Redding, captain. The company have a fine armory over town-hall.

We have a Masonic lodge, established in 1857, and numbering about one hundred and sixty members. There is a lodge of Knights of Pythias, Sons of Temperance, and a Band of Hope for the young.

The Danbury and Norwalk Railroad runs frequent trains through the place, and the Shepaug Branch Railroad gives us a connection with the Housatonic Railroad, and is a continuation from Hawleyville of the Shepaug Road between that place and Litchfield.

Of physicians, we find the name simply of Dr. Peter Hayes, as far back as 1785, as a member of the Ecclesiastical Society, but learn nothing more of his history. During the present century there have been Drs. Orvis Taylor, Samuel Banks, Ransom Lyon, H. N. Bennett, and Joseph Clarke, deceased. Dr. E. P. Bennett, the celebrated surgeon and physician of Danbury, commenced the practice of his profession in Bethel, and removed from this place to Danbury forty-two years ago, in 1838. There have been several other medical men engaged in practice here for longer or shorter periods, some of whom are living in other places. Dr. R. Lyon, whose name has been mentioned among the deceased, was at the time of his death, August, 1863, surgeon of the Twenty-eighth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers. He died and was buried at Port Hudson, La. Of the present physicians, Drs. C. R. Hart and A. E. Barber are in active practice, and Dr. George Benedict, on account of ill health, attends but little to his profession. Drs. Hart and Benedict served as surgeons in Connecticut regiments during a part of the war of the Rebellion. The three are graduates of medical colleges of the regular practice.

One of the great institutions of Bethel is its water supply. It is conducted through iron mains from the reservoir near Mountain Pond, more than a mile distant, and is of excellent quality and abundant in quantity. It is in general or universal use in the hat-factories, and in more than one hundred and twenty dwellings.

It is not right to neglect mention of our boot- and shoe-stores. Messrs. A. B. Lockwood and W. Ferry keep supplies for the multitude on hand, and manufacture to order as required. There are also two news- and stationery-stores, two barber-shops, and two hotels conducted on temperance principles. Indeed, the town has always voted "no license," and if any liquors are sold in the town, it is done on the sly and in violation of the law.

At time of its being chartered, or made a separate town, Bethel contained a population of seventeen hundred and eleven. At the census taken in June of this year (1880), it was found to be two thousand seven hundred and twenty-six.

We have too well-organized fire and hose-companies, and two excellent well-drilled bands of music.

During the war of the Revolution Bethel furnished five soldiers. During the war of 1812 there were nine went forth, and during the late war of the Rebellion there were one hundred and thirty-three furnished by this town.

The Hatters' Bank of Bethel was chartered in 1852, with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars. Capt. Isaac H. Seeley was its first president, and Mr. Starr Ferry was the first cashier. It met with several losses in the early years, and in August, 1858, of all the contents of its vault. It was finally closed in 1867. H. H. Baird, Esq., was its last president, and William A. Judd the cashier.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

In the month of October, 1759, the first steps were taken to form an ecclesiastical society in the southern part of Danbury. A petition was sent to the Governor and company in Assembly at New Haven, and the report of a committee that had been appointed by the Assembly in the previous May was favorably received. Certain bounds and limits were set forth in a memorial of Ebenezer Hickok, Lemuel Beebe, and others, and it was Resolved, "That they shall be and hereby are made into a distinct ecclesiastical society, to be known and called by the name of Bethel, with the same powers and privileges as other ecclesiastical societies do enjoy."

This, then, is the starting-point of the Congregational Church in Bethel, dating nearly seventy-five years after the first settlement of Danbury. The first meeting subsequent to the above order, and in accordance with it, was held at the house of Isaac Hoyt, Esq., Nov. 12, 1859, before Thomas Benedict, justice of the peace. The territory was thinly settled, and there were but few houses where the lively village is now located. Yet even at this first meeting it was voted to call a candidate to preach in said society, and also "to build a house of worship which should be forty-eight by thirty-six feet, and twenty-one feet between joints." The sides of the house were to be covered with oak shingles riven three feet long. Capt. Ebenezer Hickok presented to the society land for a burying-ground and the site for a meeting-house.

On the 20th of August, 1760, it was voted "to call the worthy Mr. Noah Wetmore to the work of the gospel ministry in and for this society." On the 15th of October following, Mr. Wetmore accepted the call and was ordained Nov. 25, 1860.

Rev. Mr. White preached the sermon, Mr. Kent made the prayer of ordination, Rev. Mr. Judson gave the pastoral charge, and Mr. Sill presented the right hand of fellowship.

A form of confession of faith and covenant was adopted, and, by recommendation of the Rev. Mr. White, the following persons from the First Church in Danbury "were embodied into a distinct Church of Christ in full communion:"

John Benedict and his wife, Rachel Benedict; Ebenezer Hickok and his wife, Esther Hickok; Philip Judd and his wife, Lydia Judd; Nathan Taylor; Solomon Ferry and his wife, Mrs. Ferry; Theophilus Taylor and his wife, Sarah Taylor; Benjamin Judd and his wife, Sarah Judd; Nathaniel Benedict and his wife, Hannah Benedict; Abraham Benedict and his wife, Anah Benedict; James Crofut and his wife, Lydia Crofut; Ephraim Barnum and his wife, Ruth Barnum; Lemuel Beebe; John Dibble and his wife, Sarah Dibble; Ebenezer Platt and his wife, Marah Platt; Benjamin Benedict and his wife, Abigail Benedict; Benjamin Judd, Jr.; Simeon Rockwell and his wife, Mrs. Rockwell; Nathan Taylor and his wife, Mary Taylor; Jabez Taylor and his wife, Hannah Taylor; Samuel Judd and his wife, Hannah Judd; Samuel Hoyt and his wife, Jerusha Hoyt; Matthew Taylor; Ebenezer Munson and his wife, Mrs. Munson; John Benedict and his wife, Lydia Benedict; Noah Rockwell and his wife, Mary Rockwell; Stephen Trowbridge and his wife, Lydia Trowbridge; Isaac Hoyt and his wife, Sarah Hoyt; Benjamin Taylor; Phineas Judd and his wife, Deborah Judd; Joseph Ferry and his wife, Rachel Ferry; Nathaniel Hoyt and his wife, Ruth Hoyt; Jonathan Beebe; Samuel Benedict and his wife, Mrs. Benedict; Eliphalet Peck and his wife, Rebecca Peck; Jesse Peck; Joseph Beebe and his wife, Mrs. Beebe; Widow Sarah Benedict, Sarah Judd, Mrs. Hannah Seeley, Sarah Bush, Mrs. Lydia Bailey. Total, seventy-one members.

During Mr. Wetmore's ministry in Bethel there was difficulty in the parent church in Danbury, which caused some disaffection in the new society. It was caused by the introduction of the Sandemanian doctrines, so called from Rev. Robert Sandeman, from Scotland, who died and was buried in Danbury. Mr. Wetmore was very earnest in his preaching against the new doctrines. There were other causes of disturbance during this pastorate. Mr. Wetmore preached to this people twenty-four years. There is no record to be found of admissions to the church during this period. Mr. Wetmore was a graduate of Yale College, "a faithful preacher, and in social life an agreeable and instructive companion."

After Mr. Wetmore's dismission there was much division of counsel and action in the society, and a number of the members were strongly disposed to disband and return to Danbury. Such counsels did not prevail, but it was seven years before they could find a preacher to settle with them upon whom a maajority were agreed. Still, during this interval they hired a number of ministers, some of them for one year and some of them for a shorter term, and the catalogue (issued in 1870) enumerates the names of sixty new members admitted during this period. Capt. John Benedict and Capt. Ebenezer Hickok, the first deacons in the church, were appointed Feb. 11, 1761.

Rev. John Ely, a young minister from Lyme, who had preached acceptably as a candidate, received a call to settle, Sept. 6, 1791. The call was favorably entertained, and he was ordained November 31st of that year. The meeting-house had been in use now thirty-six years, with only partial finishing inside, when in 1797 it was accomplished. The lower floor was furnished with pews, a pulpit built, a floor laid in the gallery and a breastwork and one seat around it, and two flights of stairs.

Mr. Ely remained with the church twelve and one-half years, and was dismissed June 7, 1804. He was a graduate of Yale College, in class 1776, being a student at the time the college was temporarily closed in consequence of the approach of the British army.

In 1806 the Rev. Samuel Sturges, who had preached several weeks or months in 1790 very acceptably, received a regular call to become the settled pastor. He accepted and was installed April 9th of that year.

Mr. Sturges preached nearly six years with no events of particular importance, unless it was an increasing difficulty in raising funds to meet the annual salary.*

After the resignation and dismissal of Mr. Sturges there was a long interval of ten years during which the church and society were without a settled pastor. During much of the time, it is true, they had preachers from adjoining towns, and at other times public worship was conducted by officers of the church.

The first Sunday-school was organized in 1818, during the interval. Rev. Burr Baldwin was the originator, and he supplied a few tracts and pamphlets for the use of the scholars. Mr. Seth S. Aye gathered a Sunday-school in Grassy Plain the next summer, which was supplied with a valuable library for those early days, and had an attendance of from thirty to fifty scholars.

In November, 1821, the church and society extended a unanimous call to Rev. John G. Lowe, of Bedford, N. Y., to settle with them. He accepted and was installed Jan. 1, 1822. "Mr. Lowe was an English minister who had emigrated to this country with his family a few years before, and whose education had been at the Dissenting Seminary at Homer-ton, under the celebrated Dr. John Pye Smith."

In 1824 additional seats were made in the galleries, and in 1828 the first bell was procured. Mr. Lowe was dismissed Jan. 20, 1829, his ministry having continued seven years.

* Mr. Sturges was also a graduate of Yale College, of class of 1787.

Rev. Erastus Cole, from Otsego Co., N. Y., was invited to settle Aug. 6, 1830, and was installed as pastor on September 29th of that year. During the next year, 1831, fifty-seven members were added to the church. In 1832 the meeting house was repaired and the modern style of slips were substituted for the old-fashioned square pews.

Mr. Cole was dismissed Sept. 26, 1837, having been pastor seven years.

A few months after Mr. Cole's dismissal Rev. John Greenwood, who had recently arrived in this country from England, was called to settle, which call he accepted and was installed April 17, 1838.

Mr. Greenwood's health was feeble, and, perhaps mainly on this account, he was dismissed from the charge on the 27th of April, 1842.

On the night of the 21st of July of that year the meeting-house was totally destroyed by fire, the flames being communicated to it by the burning of a large barn directly in the rear. The society voted at once to rebuild, the new house to be fifty-two feet by thirty-eight feet. During the autumn and winter public worship was held in a small room known as Temperance Hall, corner of Elm and Maple Streets, and in the basement of the new structure. Here under the pastoral care of Rev. James Knox, of Norwalk, who was only a temporary supply, there was a very great religious awakening. The new house was soon completed and was dedicated June 1, 1843, on which occasion Mr. Knox preached a dedicatory sermon, and on the following Sunday, June 4th, one hundred and twenty-five members were added to the church.

The society continued without a settled minister until Nov. 4, 1846, at which date Rev. Sylvanus Haight, recently from Pottsville, Pa., was installed. His ministry was of short duration, as he was dismissed Feb. 8, 1848.

After Mr. Haight there was an interregnum of nearly a year, when Rev. John S. Whittlesey was settled. His term as minister continued two years, and he was dismissed Jan. 1, 1852.

On March 28, 1853, the Rev. Wheelock Nye Harvey was ordained. His ministry was very successful, but it terminated June 29, 1858.

In 1855, when Bethel was set off as a separate town, the society, by a change of its charter, became the First Ecclesiastical Society of the town of Bethel.

On Dec. 30, 1859, it was voted "That there be a committee of six to consider the propriety of a centennial celebration of the organization of this church, and report to a future meeting." This committee reported favorably, and Rev. Dr. L. P. Hickok, then president of Union College, and a native of this town, was requested to prepare a historical discourse for the occasion. He accepted the invitation, and the day selected for the celebration was Nov. 30, 1860.

Many of the facts thus far in the history of this church have been condensed from the above-mentioned historical discourse of Dr. Hickok.

Rev. Elijah C. Baldwin was called to settle as pastor in June, 1860, and was ordained Sept. 5, 1860. Mr. Baldwin remained pastor about five years, having been dismissed Feb. 5, 1865.

On the 11th of May of that year the church met its second loss of their house of worship. It was the result of a terrible tornado, which sent the tall spire through the roof into the body of the structure below. Divine services were held during the time occupied in building a new edifice in Fisher's Hall and in the old house of worship, which has been removed and repaired for a public hall. The new house was finished and dedicated in January, 1867. In August, 1869, more than four years after the dismissal of Mr. Baldwin, Rev. Robert C. Bell was unanimously called to settle, and was ordained Nov. 3, 1869. This pastorate was of short duration. Mr. Bell was dismissed by his own request after a settlement of less than two and a half years, April 1872.

An interval of a little more than a year elapsed, when a call was extended to the present incumbent, Rev. George F. Waters. He was ordained in July, 1872. The church continued to increase in numbers and in resources, and has a present membership of three hundred and forty-five. The Sunday-school is also prospering, and, including officers and teachers, numbers two hundred and fifty, with a valuable library consisting of six hundred and eighty volumes. The value of the church property, including a convenient parsonage, is from twenty-five thousand to twenty-eight thousand dollars.

A union Sunday-school, though mostly officered by members of the Congregational Church, has been successfully conducted at the school-house in Plumtrees District, during the summer and autumn, for many years. The attendance will average forty or more, and the district library contains more than one hundred volumes.

The officers of the church at the present time are: Pastor and Clerk, Rev. George F. Waters; Deacons, A. L. Benedict, W. W. Sherman, Samuel Kyle, and Charles Bailey.

HISTORY OF THE PARISH OF ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

St. Thomas' Church, Bethel, was organized as a separate parish on Monday, in Easter week, April 13, 1846, having been for eleven years previously a chapel of St. James' Church, Danbury. Its first officers were Everett Clark, Senior Warden; Starr Ferry, Junior Warden; Ira Benedict, William Hinman, Samuel Judd, Sherman Ferry, George Clapp, Vestrymen.

The following persons were also among the original coporators of the parish: Samuel Judd, George Ferry, Hiram Cole, Jabez Trowbridge, Orrin Benedict, James Beebe, William Shepard, George B. Beachem, Russell Eaton, James Starr Clark, Abram Stone, Clark B. Ferry, Noah S. Barnum, Whipple Williams, Eliakim Trowbridge, Charles H. Shepard, James Marrow, Levi Beebe, Horace R. Quick, Henry Williams.

The church edifice was erected during the summer of 1835, and consecrated October 26th of the same year. It was subsequently enlarged, furnished with a new bell and organ, and reopened with dedicatory services, Nov. 14, 1855, at a cost of three thousand six hundred dollars. The parsonage was purchased Jan. 15, 1849.

The first rectors were the Revs. David H. Short, Thomas G. Guion, John Purves, Henry Olmsted, and William Everett. The Rev. Mr. Purves was then recalled, Jan. 23, 1847, remaining six years, and laying solid foundations for future growth. He was succeeded, in September, 1853, by the Rev. George Rumsey, who, after a faithful rectorship of nearly seven years, resigned before Easter, 1860. The Rev. C. C. Barelay was then rector for one and a half years, and the Rev. F. D. Lewin for about two years, and was succeeded by the present incumbent, the Rev. Eugene C. Pattison, who entered upon his duties the first Sunday in April, 1868.

The church property, including the rectory, is estimated to be worth sixteen thousand dollars, and is entirely free from debt.

The present officers of the church are Harry S. Glover, Senior Warden; Zalmon Whitlock, Junior Warden; Orrin Benedict, Charles Peck, William H. Barnum, George M. Cole, Joseph W. Burr, William O. Bassett, E. T. Andrews, Vestrymen; Edwin Short, Treasurer; Robert S. Dauchy, Clerk; D. F. Taylor, Sunday-school Superintendent.

The church now numbers one hundred and sixty families and two hundred and eight communicants; the Sunday-school, fourteen teachers and one hundred and fifty scholars.

The brotherhood and ladies' society have been fruitful in good works, and this parish, now only in its forty-fifth year, is in a flourishing condition, and may well "thank God" for the past and "take courage" for the future.

The foregoing concise history was kindly furnished by the esteemed rector, Rev. Mr. Pattison.

HISTORY OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The origin of this, the youngest of the three churches in our village, was quite humble. Its history, however, is only a fresh proof that it is not well to despise the day of small things.

It was in the winter of 1837 that five persons—namely, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Trowbridge, Heman Benedict and wife, and Miss Laura Trowbridge—met at the house now occupied by Mr. Erie Wood, which then belonged to (and was occupied by) Mr. Trowbridge. At this time Rev. Jacob Shaw was preaching in Danbury, and occasionally holding meetings in Plumtrees District, in Bethel. Being unable to attend worship in Danbury, these five above mentioned and a few neighbors met together for prayer and class-meeting. The numbers interested in this early movement rapidly increased, and they were soon compelled to find larger quarters. There were a number of conversions from the outset, and their place of meeting was crowded. During 1839 they occupied as a place of worship a hall on the corner of Elm and Maple Streets. Here they had preaching by a minister from Danbury once in four weeks, and the district meetings in Plumtrees were discontinued except on irregular occasions.

At this time they became connected with the Conference circuit which at that time included Ridgefield, Danbury, and Poplar Plains, thus making a four weeks' circuit. They then removed to a hall suitably furnished for a place of worship, a few doors north of the corner, on Maple Street. This building was destroyed by fire during their occupancy, and they removed to Judd's Hall, over the store now occupied by B. Sparks on Main Street, opposite the Congregational church, and here they continued to worship until the building of their first church edifice in 1848 on Centre Street. This building, with repeated enlargements, is now known as Judd & Co.'s hat-factory.

Rev. Levi Perry was the first preacher, and entered upon his duties in 1848. He was succeeded by Rev. Morris Hill in 1849, and in this year the Long Ridge Society united with Bethel, and Mr. Hill was assisted by Rev. Elias Gilbert, a local preacher, now living in Ridgefield. In 1851 and 1852, Rev. Horace Bartlett was pastor; in 1853 and 1854, Rev. G. S. Stillman; in 1855 and 1856, Rev. S. H. Smith; and in 1857 and 1858, Rev. John Crawford. During his term of service there was a season of great religious interest, and during its progress there were more than one hundred conversions.

The Rev. D. Osborne succeeded Mr. Crawford, 1859. During 1860, and until 1863, Rev. S. H. Pease was pastor, and it was during his pastorate that the present large and commodious house of worship was erected. Rev. J. S. Breckenridge preached from 1863 to 1866. Rev. B. F. Abbott was pastor for the three following years. Rev. W. J. Robinson remained one year. Rev. T. N. Laine preached two years, and was succeeded by Rev. E. H. Dutcher, and Rev. George A. Parkington succeeded Mr. Dutcher. Rev. A. P. Chapman was next in order of succession, remaining in charge three years. The present incumbent, Rev. Wm. Brown, now in the second year of his pastorate, followed Mr. Chapman. During all these years the church has continued to increase in numbers and influence, and is now in a healthy condition. The present number of members of this church is two hundred.

The Sunday-school has six officers, twenty-two teachers, one hundred and seventy-five scholars,—total, two hundred and three.

Number of volumes in Sunday-school library is two hundred. Value of church property, including the parsonage, seventeen thousand dollars.

The oldest member is Mr. Cyrus Andrews, in the ninetyeth year of his age.

WILLIS JUDD.

Willis Judd was born in Bethel, Fairfield Co., Conn., Oct. 15, 1808.

His great-grandfather, Phineas Judd, was an active man in the church, and one of the founders of, and a deacon in, the Congregational Church in Bethel. His grandfather, Daniel Judd, was also a prominent man in church affairs, and a farmer by occupation. He was married to Eunice Dykeman, and their children were Phineas, Ard, Eli, Betty, Clara, Althea, and David.

Phineas, the eldest, was born in Bethel, April 4, 1773. He married Sarah, daughter of Ebenezer Silliman and niece of Gen. Silliman, of Revolutionary fame. The children of Phineas and Sarah Judd were Ebenezer S., Mary P. (who died on her eighteenth birthday), Betsey E., Willis, Sarah, Almon, and Julia.

Willis Judd spent his early life upon a farm, which he left at sixteen to learn the trade of hat-making, then a considerable industry in his native town of Bethel. He began in the shop of the Messrs. Beebe, remaining till reaching the age of twenty-one, when he removed to Saratoga Co., N. Y., working there at his trade for a little more than a year, when he returned to his native county and settled in Danbury. Thence he removed to Woodbury and started business in a small way on his own account. Here he met and married Miss Augusta M., daughter of Reuben Mallory. In 1849 he removed to Bridgeport, and for a year carried on the business of confectioner, but, this business not being to his liking, he sold out, returned to Bethel, and again took up his trade of hat-making, working as journeyman for seventeen years.

In 1867 he assisted his only child, Julius B. Judd, to enter upon the manufacture of hats, in company with Mr. George M. Cole, under the firm-name of Cole & Judd. This firm prospered, but Mr. Cole remained but a short time, selling his interest, to form other business connections, to Mr. Willis Judd. The firm has since been Judd & Co. The product of this factory has grown from a very small beginning to over one hundred thousand dollars' worth of goods per annum.

In 1856, Mr. Judd was elected justice of the peace for two years. He has served several terms in the Board of Relief, and at different times as treasurer of the town, and in every instance to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. He has also been frequently elected to the office of warden of the borough of Bethel.

GEORGE M. COLE.

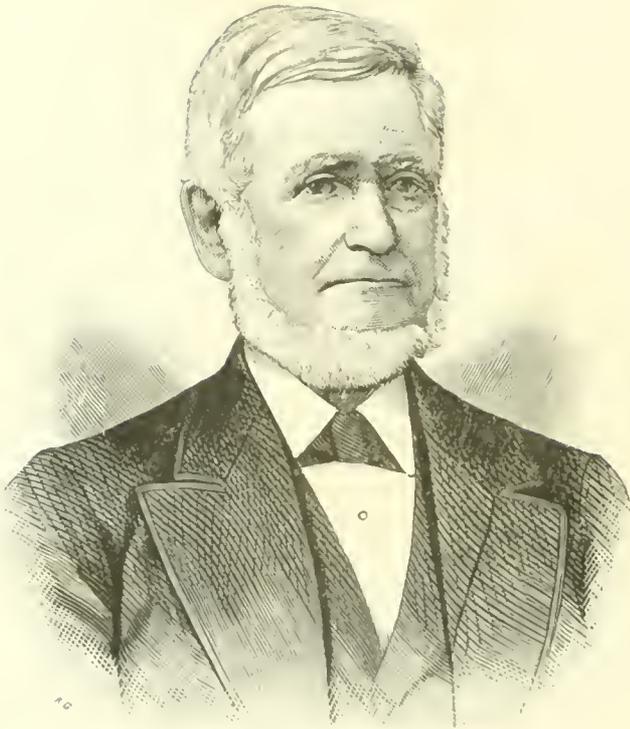

George M. Cole is a native of Newtown, Conn., where he was born Aug. 3, 1823. Hiram Cole, his father, was a hatter in Newtown, beginning the business there in 1814. He married Mary, daughter of Ichabod and Tamer Gilbert, and raised a family of thirteen children, of whom George was the eldest. He worked with his father after attaining to the proper age, learning the trade of hat-making. His father, with his family, removed to Newtown when George was sixteen years old. At the age of twenty-one he took his father's shop and did piece-work for four or five years, after which he worked as journeyman hatter in New York City, Danbury, and elsewhere, till 1867, when he formed a partnership with J. B. Judd and engaged in hat-manufacturing in Bethel. This partnership existed one year, when, disposing of his interest to Mr. Judd, Mr. Cole connected himself with Mr. S. S. Ambler in the same business. The business of Cole & Ambler, from a small beginning, has reached over one hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, turning out sixty dozen hats daily.

Mr. Cole was married in March, 1846, to Miss Eliza M., daughter of Eli and Jeannette French, of Monroe, Conn. But one child has been born to them, George H.

In 1873, Mr. Cole was elected warden of Bethel Borough, which position he held seven consecutive terms, and was re-elected to it again in 1880. It was chiefly through his efforts that Bethel was provided with the excellent water-works she possesses. Mr. Cole has held various town-offices. In 1878 he was elected selectman, and the year following one of the town-assessors. In politics he is a Democrat of the Jeffersonian school, as was his father before him.

Mr. and Mrs. Cole are members of St. Thomas' Episcopal Church of Bethel.

BENCH AND BAR.

HON. THADDEUS BETTS, an able lawyer, was born in Norwalk, Feb. 4, 1789; his parents were William Maltby Betts and his wife Lueretia Gregory. His grandparents were Dr. Thaddeus Betts and Elizabeth Maltby. The Betts in Norwalk appear to have rendered public services for several generations. Capt. Stephen Betts was in command in the skirmish with the enemy at Norwalk in 1779. Thaddeus Betts, justice of the peace, took his testimony, which is preserved in the records at Hartford. The late Thaddeus Betts graduated at Yale College, 1807, and was lieutenant-governor of Connecticut. Hon. Thomas B. Osborne, of Fairfield, said in the House: "Mr. Betts was distinguished for acuteness of intellect, vigor of understanding, and soundness and probity of his life. He was early brought in contact with the most eminent men that ever adorned the bar of New England. It is sufficient to say that he sustained and distinguished himself among such men as Daggett, Sherman, Smith, and Sherwood. He filled many important trusts in his own State."

He was admitted to the bar in 1810, and died in Washington, D. C., April 7, 1840. Two sons, Charles C. and Frederick T., are residents of Norwalk.

STRATFIELD BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church is located in the northeastern part of the town of Fairfield, and is the oldest Baptist Church in this section. Its first minister was the Rev. Joshua Morris, who organized the church in 1751. He was succeeded by Rev. John Sherwood, who was the first resident pastor. Meetings of the church were first held in his dwelling-house. He was succeeded by Rev. Benjamin Coles in 1767. The fourth pastor was Rev. John Whitman. He was succeeded by Rev. Seth Higby in 1771. He was succeeded in 1794 by Rev. Stephen Royce, whose salary was three hundred and thirty-six dollars per year. The next pastor was the Rev. Asahel Morse, who remained until 1812. In 1801 the church voted that the deacons should take care of what should be contributed to gift books for the Indians, and in 1802 a committee was appointed to hunt up strait brethren and sisters.

Rev. Daniel Wildman became pastor of the church in 1813. He was succeeded by Rev. Matthew Bolles, and he in turn by Daniel Wildman in 1817. Rev. Mr. Wildman was followed by Rev. Asa Bronson in 1822. Among his converts was Mr. Russell Jennings, who subsequently entered the ministry by ordination. He has since made large donations of money for religious and other praiseworthy purposes. Mr. Bronson resigned in 1829, and was succeeded in the same year by Rev. Elisha Cushman. He resigned in 1831, and was succeeded by Rev. James H. Lindsley. The thirteenth pastor was Rev. Enoch E. Chase in 1836. Mr. Chase closed his labors in October, 1839, and was followed by Rev. Matthew Batchelor in 1840. Mr. Batchelor was succeeded in 1842 by Rev. John Scott. In 1847 he resigned, and Rev. A. E. Clark became pastor, and remained as such until 1849. Since that time the pastors have been as follows: Rev. Harmon Ellis, one year; Rev. Nathan Dunning Benedict, from 1851 to 1860; Rev. Joseph Babbage, from 1860 to 1865. Rev. N. Benedict became pastor in 1865, and remains as such at the present time.

The first church building was erected in 1770. The church worshiped in this structure until 1813, when the present edifice was erected, having no external changes except recently blinds have been placed on the windows and a bell hung in the tower.

tional in Black Rock, and the Congregational Church in Greenfield Hill. Its capacity was inadequate, so this present year (1880) it was enlarged and rededicated. It is doing a good work, and is successful. It is located in Fairfield Woods, quite a distance from any church.

NEWTOWN ACADEMY.*

The academy at Newtown, Conn., was built in 1837. It is a modest structure, neatly painted white, and furnished with green blinds. It is surmounted by a cupola, in which is a bell to summon the cheerful company to their daily tasks. There is a playground of limited extent immediately in the rear. Up to the present time no perceptible change has been made in the external appearance of the building.

Rev. George L. Foote, a native of Newtown, and a recent graduate of Trinity (then Washington) College, at Hartford, Conn., was the first principal. He was ably assisted in both the male and female departments, one of the assistants being his sister, Miss Harriet Foote. A teacher of music was also employed, and it was the first school remembered herabouts in which "the service of song" accompanied devotional exercises at the opening of daily school duties.

The school was very successful under the charge of Mr. Foote. The number of pupils amounted to one hundred and twenty-five, and probably at times there was even a larger number.

Mr. Foote continued principal of the academy two and a half or three years. He died in Central New York a number of years ago, his disease being ramollissement, or softening of the brain. Miss Harriet Foote became the wife of the Rev. Mr. Atwell, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church. She died many years ago, while still young, in Steuben Co., N. Y.

The Rev. James S. Clark, D.D., a native of Bethel, now and for many years past principal of a large school, and rector of a church at Tivoli-on-the-Hudson, and A. L. Benedict, Esq., still a resident of Bethel, were pupils of Mr. Foote.

The Rev. Levi H. Corson succeeded as principal of the academy in the spring of 1840. Mr. Corson employed Miss Mary Foote, a sister of the late principal, as assistant and teacher in the female department.

There was quite a falling off in the number of pupils when Mr. Corson took charge of the school, so that when the writer commenced attendance—almost forty years ago (January, 1841)—there were only eighty-five or ninety scholars in both departments.

Hon. D. B. Booth, of Danbury, Maj. L. N. Middlebrook, attorney and counselor-at-law, of Bridgeport, E. M. Beardsley, M.D., of Monroe, the late John Deacon, M.D., of Waterbury, and others from different towns, more or less distinguished in their respective stations in life, were fellow-students in the institution.

Mr. Henry Sanford, senior partner of the firm of Sanford & Hawley, in Newtown, had completed his academical studies previous to the writer's advent in the town, and had commenced his successful mercantile career as clerk in the old, low store-building of Messrs. Baldwin & Beers, on the same corner where he now occupies a much more imposing edifice. Messrs. Baldwin & Beers were at that time actively engaged in trade and doing a large business. They lived to a good old age, and have long since been "gathered to their fathers."

The Rev. Mr. Corson, besides teaching as principal of the academy, was also hired for the year to supply the desk and pulpit of Trinity church. In 1880, Mr. Corson was living in Michigan at a very advanced age.

In the spring of 1841 the Rev. Thomas T. Guion, who had previously graduated at Trinity College, Hartford, was called to the charge of the academy. The number of pupils was still further diminished, and yet the rooms were even now comfortably filled.

I should have sooner mentioned that during Mr. Foote's administration there was quite a number of students from several of the Southern States, particularly from Virginia; and as many as fifteen of these remained during the year that Mr. Corson taught. But very few of these attended the school under Mr. Guion.

However, the school opened very pleasantly, and so continued for more than half of the year. In the summer of this year, I think in August, we lost one of our mates by death. Andrew J. Jarvis, with a number of others, had walked to Taunton Pond, now known as Fountain Lake, a distance of about a mile and a half, and while heated and perspiring went into the water to swim. The exposure resulted in an attack of acute erysipelas of the head, and after an illness of a few days his life closed, at the age of eighteen years. Poor Jarvis was kindly cared for, but he died far from home and kindred. He was buried in Newtown Cemetery.

In the following winter two opposing dancing-schools were opened, one at each of the hotels, at the north and south ends of Main Street. Mr. Guion did not think it proper or profitable that the attention of his pupils should be distracted by such exercises and associations. He therefore notified the young people of the school and the parents of some of them that they could not continue pupils of the academy and attend either of the dancing-schools. But the spirit of old Adam was aroused. Probably half the students, perhaps more than half, decided to cultivate the graces of their heels rather than of their heads and their hearts. In consequence of this unfortunate revolt the attendance was at once reduced to a minimum, not more than thirty or thirty-five of us remaining. Small as it was, however, the little company of the faithful continued on through the term which closed the school year. Mr. Guion was an excellent and most lovable man. His health had

Mr. Guion preached a number of years in Danbury and Bethel, and was at length called as rector of St. John's Church, Brooklyn. While here he received the degree of doctor of divinity. He was an energetic man and a hard worker in the cause of his Divine Master. In the midst of his usefulness he was disabled by sickness, and after lingering many months he, like Mr. Foote, one of his predecessors in the academy, died of ramollissement.

Succeeding Mr. Guion in the spring of 1842, Mr. Charles W. Wooster, another graduate of Trinity College, took charge of the school. Mr. Wooster had recently taken a wife from a family in Waterbury. Mrs. Wooster was an educated and accomplished lady, and came to Newtown with her husband to take charge of the female department. Her health proved insufficient to the labor and care incumbent upon her as teacher, and Miss Caroline Tudor, of Hartford (now the wife of Dr. Platt, of Waterbury), was engaged in her place. Mrs. Wooster had been in feeble health for months before removing to Newtown, and she declined rapidly after leaving the school, and died in June of that year. Her remains were taken to Waterbury for interment, and a number of the older pupils from both departments of the school made up a portion of the funeral procession. The school was not so large as it had been in its earlier years, yet there were as many as eighty different students during the year.

With the opening of the next school year, in 1843, Mr. Wooster continued with the same staff of assistants as during the preceding. A few of the older pupils still continued, but most of the newcomers were of more tender years. Of the Southern scholars, only one was left. The material in Newtown had been pretty thoroughly used except from the younger class, and, in fact, the academy had ceased to be a new thing, had lost prestige abroad, and with the close of the academic year it was closed for some time.

The Rev. D. P. Sanford made an effort to revive an interest in the neighboring towns as well as in Newtown, but did not meet with the success he had hoped for, and gave over the attempt.

After a time a select school was opened in one of the rooms by Mr. Elizur Keeler, a resident of the village. He continued for a year or more, and since then others have taught with varying success for longer or shorter periods. But the glory of its early days had departed for the time, and until it was taken in hand by Rev. J. P. Hoyt, of the Congregational Church, a few years ago. Mr. Hoyt has the reputation of teaching an excellent school and employs several assistants. It seems now as if some of the old-time prosperity must return, although it is hardly probable that the building will ever accommodate such a company as it did during the first years of its existence.

The following is a list of the teachers and officers in 1843: Charles W. Wooster, A. B., Principal; S. J. B. Dibble, Assistant; Caroline Tudor, Preceptress; Lewis T. Downs, Teacher of Music; Trustees, David V. B. Baldwin, David H. Belden, Josiah B. Fairchild, Charles Fairman, Charles Blakeslee; Josiah Sanford, Chairman; Charles Clarke, Secretary.

HIRAM LODGE, NO. 18, F. AND A. M.,

was organized by virtue of a charter derived from the Grand Lodge of the State of Connecticut, dated Jan. 6, 1791. The lodge continued in good working order for a number of years, till up as far as 1832, when there appears to have been a decline in its prosperity, which continued until the year 1848, when it ceased to work. It was a long time before Masonry revived in Newtown,—not until the years 1860-66, when a decided reaction took place. Perhaps one of the great incentives to this was the war which was about to be and was fought during these years. Two new lodges had been organized,—one at Bethel and one at Monroe, and to which numbers were added from Newtown, and from whom originated the idea of reviving the old lodge. A petition was presented to the M. W. Grand Lodge of the State of Connecticut for a renewal of the old charter by the following-named brethren: From Eureka Lodge, No. 83, Bethel, Conn., Julius Sanford, Wm. L. Horr, George Woffenden, Scofield C. Lamb, Smith P. Glover, Wm. E. Akley, Aaron Sanford; from Monroe Lodge, No. 93, Monroe, Conn., Augustus Warner, G. A. Hough; from Montgomery Lodge, No. 13, Salisbury, Conn., James A. Wilson; Wm. C. Perkins, Roxbury, Mass., who recommend Bro. Julius Sanford as first W. Master, Bro. Wm. L. Horr as first Senior Warden, and Bro. George Woffenden as first Junior Warden of said lodge. This petition was granted by the Grand Lodge at its annual communication, held in May, 1866, at New Haven.

The following officers were publicly installed June 25, 1866, by M. W. Channey M. Hatch, Deputy Grand Master: Julius Sanford, W. M.; Wm. L. Horr, S. W.; George Woffenden, J. W.; Smith P. Glover, Treas.; James A. Wilson, Sec.; Scofield C. Lamb, Chaplain; Wm. E. Akley, S. D.; G. A. Hough, J. D.

The following are the Masters to date: 1867, Wm. L. Horr; 1868, George Woffenden; 1869, George Woffenden; 1870, Clark H. Lockwood; 1871, Wm. L. Sanford; 1872, Charles Webster; 1873, Rev. Wm. N. Akley; 1874, James A. Wilson; 1875, James A. Wilson; 1876, John L. Sanford; 1877, Wm. L. Sanford; 1878, Wm. L. Sanford; 1879, Somers D. Croffutt.
