his class, and graduated with honor. He taught next in an academy in Windsor, and began the study of law under Hon. Oliver Ellsworth. He afterwards took a common school in Litchfield, and continued the study of law under the Hon. Tapping Reeve. In 1795 he was tutor in Yale College, and instructed the class that graduated in 1797, at the same time studying under Hon. Simeon Baldwin. There were several distinguished men, both in his own class and the one he instructed. As tutor he was peculiarly successful. He resigned that office, and in 1796 was admitted to the bar in New Haven. He then established himself in Norwalk, having married Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. William Gould, of New Haven. She was sister of Judge Gould, of Litchfield. They had two children, twin sons, of high promise, but they both died young. In 1807 he removed to Fairfield, where he resided till his death, which occurred Dec. 30, 1844. As a jurist he had few equals.

From 1814 to 1818, Mr. Sherman was a member of the upper branch of our State Legislature, where he showed a high power in debate and a patriotic devotion to the welfare of the people. In 1814 he was chosen by the Legislature of this State a delegate to the convention of the New England States assembled at Hartford for the purpose of devising measures suited to the exigency brought on by the war. New England sent her most gifted and patriotic statesmen. In this galaxy he shone with peculiar lustre, and an account of his labors has been published.

From 1818 to 1839 he was wholly devoted to his profession, except that he was now and then a member of the Legislature. He originated and drafted many important laws, which have become inwrought into the fixed policy of his native State. These refer to the administration of justice, tending to abridge the cost and delay involved in vindicating our rights at law, and to abolish cumbersome formalities.

In 1839 he was judge of the Superior Court and associate judge of the Supreme Court for the revision of errors in that State. His written opinions in the Court of Errors (published in Vols. XIII. and XIV. of the Connecticut Reports) are the most important monuments to his great intellect which he has left to posterity. In 1842 he resigned this office, on account of poor health, that he might have the genial support of a retired home-life. He died aged seventy-one years and seven months.

Judge Sherman was versed not only in jurisprudence, but in theology and metaphysics, and was fond of the exact and natural sciences. He was familiar with the theory of government and political economy, and with whatever a statesman should know. Neither did he neglect elegant literature. This various knowledge he made tributary to his profession in cases that could be illustrated by it, and sometimes astonished and delighted his auditors as he poured forth its treasures. He was not only great, but good, and was strictly subordinated to moral and religious principle. Without bigotry, he believed in the doctrines of Dwight and Edwards. He was a modest, unassuming, unobtrusive man, and impressed all who became acquainted with him. He maintained the strictest integrity and uprightness in all his public, private, and professional transactions, and scrupulously adhered to truth, kept his promises, abstained from making any which he could not fulfill, would not sell his conscience for office or emolument, discouraged what seemed to him to be groundless litigation, and was a model of parental and conjugal love, tenderness, and fidelity. He was an early and powerful advocate of the temperance cause, and seemed to be everybody's friend.*

He left a very lengthy will,—covering pages in the town records, volume for 1840, page 359,—of which the following is an abstract:

"I give the 'Edinburgh Encyclopædia,' Webster's large quarto dictionary, in 2 vols., Beza's Greek Testament, Scott's 'Family Bible,' in 5 vols. quarto, the works of Robert Hall, in 2 vols., the sermons of Dwight, Chambers, Saurin, Burder, Davies, and all other sermons and treatises on Theology, also Hume's 'History of England,' and the continuation of said history, in 12 vols., lettered on the back 'Hume's England,' the 'Life and Writings of John Jay,' Crabb's 'Synonyms,' Jay's 'Political Economy,' Bostick's 'Physiology,' Good's 'Book of Nature,' Olmsted's 'Philosophy,' in 2 vols., Murray's Grammar, octo., Spanish and French Dictionaries and Spanish Grammar, one Greek Lexicon, Alexander Adams' 'Roman Antiquities,' Barber's 'Historical Collections for Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New York,' and Dufresne's 'Nature Displayed,' to the First Ecclesiastic Society in Fairfield for the use of the ministers' library. The said books shall be always kept in said library, and shall never be sold or exchanged.

"I give and devise my homestead,—bounded southeasterly on the main street in Fairfield, on land of Mrs. Knapp and on land formerly belonging to Wm. Dimon, now deceased; southwesterly on highway on land of Abraham Gould Jennings, and on land formerly belonging to said Dimon; northwesterly on highway and land of said Jennings; northerly on land of Wm. S. Smith, together with the dwelling-house and all other buildings on said homestead,—and I also give the double windows or Russian lights, the Venetian blinds, all the fire-grates and stoves which shall be in use at my decease, the large mettlic clock, the carpet on the stairs, in the front hall, and all the carpets or mattings on the floors of the lower rooms and in use at my decease, and no other carpets or mattings, and the oil- or floor-cloth which may then be on the floor of the front entry, to the First Ecclesiastic Society in said Fairfield, in trust, for the personal use, habitation, and occupation of the minister of said Society while stately ministering therein, and every minister of said Society while stately ministering therein, etc., etc.

"I also give and bequeath to said Society twenty-five shares of Stock on Fairfield County Bank, in the Fairfield County Bank, in trust, to apply the dividends thereon and the income thereof to the keeping of the building and fences of the said homestead in good order and repair; and whenever said dividends or income shall be more than is necessary for that purpose, the surplus may be appropriated to purchasing carpets for the front rooms of the dwelling-house, should new carpets be necessary, and whatever of said income or dividends shall be more than wanted for either of the said purposes shall be safely kept or invested on good security, to be used or applied for those purposes and for no other whenever the same may become necessary or expedient."

The balance of his property (which amounted to seventy-two thousand and some odd dollars) he willed to various institutions and to various relatives.

He is said never to have replied "Yes" or "No" to a question. Once a friend, meeting him coming out of the post-office, thought sure he would put an interrogation which would draw out a "Yes" or a "No;"

so he asked "Is the mail in?" Sherman replied, "Are you expecting a letter?"†

A townsman, speaking of Mr. Sherman, said, "He was a lawyer what was a lawyer."

In the Foote Genealogy (published 1849), page 309, may be found the following:

"Mrs. Elizabeth Sherman, widow of the late Hon. Roger M. Sherman, died at Fairfield, Aug. 3, 1848, in the seventy-fifth year of her age. Thus has passed away all that remained of a man of eminent distinction in the Church and the State. His venerable relict, who has now followed him to the grave, adorned the station allotted her by Providence by bringing to it intellectual powers and accomplishments not inferior to those of her distinguished husband. Remarkable for her conscientiousness, prudence, wisdom, her firmness and steadfastness of attachment to the doctrine and ordinances of the gospel, her zeal in maintaining religious institutions, her liberality to the poor, and in sustaining the missionary and charitable enterprises,—she was in all these high points of a spirit congenial to his, of 'like precious faith,' his cordial and efficient fellow-helper, with him 'ready to do every good work.' In her death the poor universally mourn the loss of a great benefactor; the Church bewails the removal of a strong pillar; benevolent institutions will miss a constant and generous patron; society suffers the loss of a bright example and firm supporter of whatever is pure and lovely and of good report.

"In accordance with the mutual understanding and united wishes of herself and husband, she has made the following bequests to religious and public institutions. She has bequeathed her miscellaneous library, house, and homestead to the First Ecclesiastic Society of Fairfield, together with a fund of $2500 for the purpose of keeping the same in repair,—the former for the increase of the ministerial library, the latter for a parsonage. She has given the law-library of her late husband to the county of Fairfield for the use of the bar and courts of said county; $4000 to the corporation of Yale College, on the condition that they pay an annuity of $200 to one of her nephews during his life; $2000 to the East Windsor Institute; $4000 to the American Home Missionary Society; $3000 to the American Colonization Society; $2000 to the Retreat for the Insane at Hartford; $500 to the Female Beneficent Society of Fairfield."

A monument to the memory of Mr. and Mrs. Sherman and two sons is erected in the East ground:

"Hon. Roger Minot Sherman,
Judge of the Supreme Court of Connecticut, Died December 30, 1844,
aged 71 years & 7 mo.

"Eminent as a Civilian, a Jurist & an Orator, Adorned with rare moral and Christian excellence, in life he was widely beloved and revered, and in death greatly lamented.

"Reviviscemus?"

The inscription to his wife reads:

"Elizabeth,
widow of
Roger Minot Sherman,
Died Aug. 3, 1848,
Aged 74.

"Like her distinguished husband highly gifted by nature and education she was his associate & fellow-helper in all good works, & dying as she had lived, in the faith and hope of the gospel, her death was mourned as a public calamity."

The portraits of the judge and his wife hang in the parlor of the parsonage, which has been occupied since the demise of Mrs. Sherman by Dr. Lyman Atwater, now professor in Princeton, Dr. Willis Lord, Rev. Alexander McLean, Rev. E. E. Rankin, D.D., who at present resides in Hartford as a private citizen, and Rev. George S. Burroughs, who was elected last May a member of the American Oriental Society,

4. Rev. Andrew Eliot's Home.—This was not burnt in 1779, from the fact that it was not completed. Dr. David Hull, who married a Miss Susanna Eliot, daughter of Dr. Eliot, of Boston, purchased it, finished it, and resided there for a few years. That was the only house unoccupied at the time of the conflagration, and Dr. Hull intended to purchase it. There were, as near as can be ascertained, only nine houses standing at that time south of the railroad in Fairfield, five of which have been mentioned in the "Colonial Houses."† One of these was left standing till 1874, when Arthur Bennett had it torn down. It was not burnt in 1779, as it was owned by a Freemason. The house next to it is always spoken of as the Turney house, from which those of that name in town probably originated. The principal ones remaining are Albert and Theodore Turney,‡ who reside not far from this old "colonial." Rufus Turney was town clerk from 1867 to 1870.

The present town clerk, Daniel Maloney, was born in the "colonial" on the Bennett place. He served from 1872 to 1873, and from 1874 to 1880. He is the only one who served as town clerk who has not belonged to a colonial family, though he was born in a colonial house!

The Turney house was set fire to, but the flames were either extinguished or it failed to burn.

The house occupied by Burr Lyon, deceased, owned then by Isaac Jennings, was the first one fired and the first rebuilt.

Dr. Hull must have given up his house to Mr. Eliot within ten years, as he lived awhile with Justin Hobart, and his daughter Eliza was born in that "colonial" (No. 3). In time he purchased the house which stood close to the road in front of the residence of Gen. E. S. Parker, who is spoken of in the "American Cyclopaedia" as one of the most eminent men of the Iroquois nation, and who served on President Grant's staff and became commissioner of Indian affairs.

The present home of Gen. Parker, formerly that of Col. Robert C. Wetmore, a descendant of Quartermaster Richard Hubbell, "one of Fairfield's most fearless defenders," belonged once to Dr. David Hull, and here stood the "colonial" in which he lived and died. This house was fired in common with the rest, but was saved from destruction, though the fire burned through into the sitting-room, destroying in a great measure the base-boards, which Dr. Hull would never have replaced while he occupied it. He died in 1834, aged sixty-eight.

His two daughters, Mrs. John C. Sanford and Miss Eliza Hull, are yet living, and are in possession of several portraits of "ye olden time" and articles made a century or so ago. He was uncle to Com. Isaac Hull, and brother to Gen. William Hull, born in Derby.

It is said of the doctor that few lived more beloved and respected. He was distinguished for talent as a physician. He practiced in Fairfield more than forty years, and was conspicuous as a husband, a neighbor, and a member of the Christian Church.

During the occupation of Boston by the British a number of families left that place and took refuge in Fairfield. Among them was the family of Rev. Andrew Eliot (Sr.), D.D., a patriotic and faithful minister, who himself remained in Boston in the discharge of his appropriate duties. Dr. Eliot was born in 1718, and graduated from Harvard in 1737. He became pastor of the new North Church in Boston in 1742, and filled that position till his death, in 1778. He was elected president of Harvard University, but declined the honor. Some of his family (Mrs. Sarah Squire, Mrs. Dr. Hull, and his son, the Rev. Andrew Eliot) found a permanent home in Fairfield. His son Andrew was called to succeed the Rev. Noah Hobart (see "Colonial," No. 3) in 1774. Dr. Atwater speaks of him as a ripe scholar, a prudent, faithful, and beloved pastor. Benjamin Silliman, speaking of him, says: "In my early days much company resorted to Holland Hill, not a few lodging-guests,—and it was a favorite excursion from Fairfield, especially with young people of both sexes; and in Mr. Eliot's family there were sensible and agreeable daughters. The reverend gentleman was not forgotten by his Boston friends, even by the great. On one occasion the celebrated Governor Hancock" (see "Burr Family"), "president of Congress, drove up to Mr. Eliot's with his coach and four horses, and while he made his call the coachman drove farther up the road to find a place wide enough to turn the horses and carriage!"

It is said that Mr. Eliot came down from Holland Hill to build his own fires in the church. The seats were mere benches, such as were used in school-houses at that era. His salary was three hundred dollars per annum. When the parish was destroyed by fire in 1779 his people told him that, being crippled financially, they could not do as well by him as others could; but his noble manhood shone beautifully in his reply: "I've been with you in your prosperity, and I'll stay in your adversity;" and he stayed. He entered the following historical note on the church record:

"1779, July 7th.—A part of the British army, consisting of Britons, Germans, and American refugees, under the command of Maj.-Gen. Garth, landed in this town from a fleet commanded by Sir George Collier.

* W. A. Hoops, in the Southport Times, 1880.

† The other four were the Turney and Bennett houses; also one which stood on the site of the residence of the late Mr. George A. Phelps, a wealthy New York merchant and ship-owner, occupied for a long time by Miss Sally White; also one standing in front of the house occupied by Gen. E. S. Parker. A portion of this house is owned by Miss Eliza Hull.

‡ Sons of the late Andrew Turney.

"In the evening and night of the same day a great part of the buildings in the town-plot were consumed by said troops.

"July 8th.—In the morning the meeting-house, together with the Church-of-England building, the court-house, prisons, and almost all the principal buildings in the Society were laid in ashes.

"Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised Thee, is burnt with fire, and all our pleasant things are laid waste.

"The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away.

"Blessed be the name of the Lord.

"All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose.

"Alleluia!

"The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth. Amen!"

Dr. E. E. Rankin quoted these notes one hundred years after they were written, and said, "In subsequent times of prosperity and safety these sentiments have not been wholly lost."

Mr. Silliman, in speaking of Mr. Eliot as a teacher, writes: "Mr. Eliot was a thorough scholar, and was so fully imbued with classical zeal that he was not always patient of our slow progress. He, however, devoted himself with great zeal and fidelity to our instruction in all good learning that was adapted to our age and destination, and carried us safely through. He was most faithful during the more than two years that we were his private pupils." (Mr. Eliot prepared Mr. Silliman for college.) "Mr. Eliot took great delight in reading aloud to us from the 'Æneid.' Being excited and animated both by the poetry and the story, he evidently enjoyed the subject, and would fain have imparted to us a portion of his own enthusiasm."

Mr. Eliot, wife, and daughter lie within the only inclosure of an iron railing in the old ground in Fairfield. The daughter, Mary, aged twelve, died first, then the father, whose inscription reads:

"In Memory of the
Rev. Andrew Eliot, A.M.,
born at Boston, Mass., Jan. 11, 1735.
Ordained pastor of the first Church of Christ in Fairfield,
June 22, 1774, in which station he served God with fidelity until Sept. 29th, 1805, when he rested from his labors, in the 63^d year of his age and 32^d of his ministry.

"They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever, and ever."

His wife's reads:

"In Memory of Mary Eliot,
Relict of the late Rev^d Andrew Eliot, and Daughter of the Hon^{ble} Joseph Pynchon, of Boston,
and Mary his Wife.
She was born at Brookfield, Mass., was married July 19th, 1774,
and died Decem^r 10th, 1810,
in the 62^d year of her age.
Her flesh rests in hope."

Of their daughters, Ruth married Dr. William Burr Nash, Elizabeth married Gershom Burr, Mary married — Joy, father of Andrew Eliot Joy, of Bridgeport, and Susan married Rev. Nathaniel Hewitt, D.D. (See "Colonial," No. 5.)

Mr. Eliot's "mother was Mary Pynchon, of Springfield, Mass., a lineal descendant of William Pynchon, who settled Springfield with Jehu Burr, of Fairfield."

Among the old tombstones in Fairfield is the following, to

wife of Capt. Joseph Squire, and daughter of the late Reverend Andrew Eliot, D.D.,
died 3^d May, 1799, in her 44th year."

They lived in the house on the V or angle of the two roads converging near Capt. John Gould's estate. This was then a private residence; only half of it was plastered for years. It was the style through the State to erect a large frame, and finish as the owners were able.

The name of Squire was one of repute and respectability. David Squire lost both hands in the Revolution. John Squire's house stood on the site of George's Hotel. Samuel Squire was commissary in the army. Probably when Andrew Eliot, Jr., went to visit his aunt Mary Squire he became interested in Miss Sophia Wasson, who lived across the way with her mother, in a house belonging at present to Mr. Albert Turney. A tombstone in the old ground to her father's memory tells a portion of his history.

"Capt. John Wasson, died at New York, Nov. 11th, 1797, in his 43^d year; was removed to this place March 23^d, 1798."

Mr. Eliot called at Mrs. Wasson's one Saturday morning, and in an interview with Miss Sophia asked her to become Mrs. Eliot on the following day. It came so sudden to her that he consented to call in the evening for the reply. On conferring with her mother, who favored it, knowing her daughter's sentiments regarding the young minister, she said, as she was baking, she could as well bake some cake, so they could pass around some cake and wine, and she (the daughter) could look and see if she had a white dress ready to wear; if she had there was nothing to hinder the marriage. He called in the evening, and the result was that next morning the banns were duly published in church, and in the evening the white dress was worn and the cake and wine passed. This Rev. Andrew Eliot (3d) was pastor of the Congregational Church in New Milford, Conn., where his people were greatly attached to him, and always speak of him in endearing terms.

After the removal of the Eliot family by death and marriage, the house came into possession (by purchase, probably of Edmund Darrow. In time, Peter Burr Sturges owned it, and resided there for several years. Here he died, and his heirs disposed of it to Mrs. Henry Burr. The house is in excellent condition. It was finished with panelings and mouldings of delicate workmanship, which have been preserved carefully, and for the time and place it was a suitable home for Rev. Andrew Eliot, the scholar, patriot, and Christian.

5. The Home of the late Jonathan Sturges.—This is located in the part of Fairfield known as Mill Plain.

The name of "Sturges" is a historic one. The earliest account of the family is that of Peter Sturges, who settled in Fairfield in 1680. When Fairfield was burned, Judge Jonathan Sturges and his family were among the fugitives, leaving all their ancestral records, of date prior to and following their emigration from England, to destruction.

Jonathan Sturges (1st) left a will, bearing date 1711, in which he devised property to his three sons, Jonathan, Peter, and David. For his eldest son, Jonathan, he had already built upon the site of the old homestead. From conformity of dates and circumstantial evidence, it appears that his son Samuel graduated from Yale College in 1732. He married Ann Burr, and was the father of Judge Jonathan Sturges. The latter was a successful lawyer; for several years a member of Congress while that body held its sessions in Philadelphia, and was one of the judges of the Supreme Court of this State until his infirmities compelled his resignation. He was greatly valued and respected by his fellow-citizens. He married in early life Deborah Lewis, born in 1742, daughter of Lothrop Lewis, who came to this town from Barnstable, Mass., and married, in 1727, Sarah, daughter of Jonathan Sturges (another branch of the Sturges family. See "Colonial," No. 9.)

Judge Jonathan Sturges kept up the English style of going to Circuit Court on horseback with his saddle-bags, and would be gone a month at a time. His life is well stated on his tombstone in the old ground thus:

"In memory of the Honorable Jonathan Sturges, LL.D., who was born Aug. 23, 1740, and died Oct. 4, 1819,
aged 79 years.

"He sustained with high reputation from an early period a number of the most important offices in the gift of his native State, and was an efficient member of Congress under the confederation which vindicated the rights and the independence of the United States. Wise and prudent as a statesman, inflexibly upright as judge, a faithful friend, an affectionate parent, and, above all, an exemplary Christian, his friends have an assured hope that in his sudden death he passed into glory and received the welcome of his Divine Master."

The following is found in the "Life of Benjamin Silliman," vol. i. p. 24:

"Judge Jonathan Sturges, a noble gentleman, was an ornament to the town. He was a graduate of Yale in the class of 1760, and, although seven years later than my father's class of 1752, they were friends and contemporaries at the bar, at which both were eminent practitioners. Mr. Sturges was a member of the House of Representatives of the United States when convened in New York in 1789, in the first year of the Presidency of Gen. Washington, and the evening years of his life were devoted to the bench of the Supreme Court of Connecticut.

"With a fine person, he had the superior manners of that day, dignity softened by a kind and winning courtesy, with the stamp of benevolence. Judge Sturges had a large family, sons and daughters; the sons were gentlemen in sentiments and manners, and the daughters refined ladies, partaking of the blended traits of both parents. They were all amiable and intelligent and pleasant; some of them were beautiful. It was a delightful female circle."

The eldest son of Judge Sturges was Lewis Burr Sturges, who resided in Fairfield during the early part of his active life. He was member of Congress for several consecutive years. He resided in the house now occupied by Mrs. Catharine Beers, whose husband lies in the East burying-ground under this inscription:

"The Grave
of Augustin Prevost Beers, M.D., Surgeon of the United States Navy,
who died
on the 8th of June, 1831,
aged 28 years."

The Hon. Lewis Burr Sturges moved to Ohio, where he died at an advanced age.

Capt. B. Lothrop Sturges, another son of Judge Jonathan Sturges, lived in Southport. In 1800 he built the house at present occupied by David Banks. He was a farmer and a merchant. He built a large schooner, which when it went out of Southport harbor was prophesied to bring back a fortune; but the first voyage proved the only one for Mr. Sturges, as the French took the vessel as a trophy in the war known as the French war, which occurred about that time.

Mr. B. L. Sturges died in 1831 at the old homestead, leaving one son, the late Jonathan Sturges, the "millionaire merchant," and three daughters. He married Mary Sturges, who belonged to the family on Mill Plain. Her brother, Dimon Sturges, owned the property on which the late Jonathan Sturges built his house in 1841. He purchased these premises from Hezekiah Sturges, a son of Dimon Sturges, in 1835, for the use of his mother and sisters, the former of whom died in 1840.

About 1840 there were many changes in the buildings around the green. The old church (Episcopal) was entirely obliterated, the society building in Southport. Many of the old houses were repaired or replaced by new ones, which called out some excellent poetic effusions; one was by the late Mrs. Julia M. (Beers) Burr, and another was introduced to the public by the widow of the Rev. D. H. Short, D.D. Both were copied through the papers.

Mr. Sturges did not spend all his time on Mill Plain, as this was only his country-seat, he having been engaged in commercial interests in New York, whither he went in 1823 with such intent. He was eminently successful.

* Gen. G. S. Silliman.

Having obtained a situation with Mr. Luman Reed, he rose by successive grades to be the head of the firm. He also built the present stores, and after leaving business occupied the office in the store which his sons now hold. He married an accomplished lady, Miss Mary Pemberton Cady, a descendant of the family who gave the name to "Pemberton Hill," Boston. She was the mainspring in his prosperous career. She was trained in a literary atmosphere, her father being editor for many years of The Virginia Herald, one of a few papers published in the whole of that State. He died in 1874.

The late family interments, marked by beautiful and appropriate monuments,—viz., the late Mr. J. Sturges, his son, Arthur P. Sturges, a Princeton student, and daughter, Amelia, wife of Mr. Pierpont Morgan, and grandchildren,—are in Fairfield East burying-ground.

The homestead and city mansion are alternately occupied by Mrs. Sturges (who is largely associated with benevolent institutions) and her son, Henry C. Her other sons, Frederic and Edward, have also handsome estates in Fairfield. Her daughter, Mrs. William H. Osborne, and husband, are largely identified with the artistic, benevolent, and best interests of New York City.

6. Waldstein, the Home of the Osgood Family.—About thirty-one years ago the Rev. Samuel Osgood came to Fairfield to find a boarding-place, and possibly to locate for himself a home. He purchased a tract, not far from Fairfield depot, that no one would hardly accept as a gift, it scarcely being a sheep pasture for quality, overrun with cedars and cumbered with plenty of stones. This property he rescued from the wilds and made it to blossom as a rose, and there he built a residence after the modern cottage style of architecture surrounded by smiling and joyous nature. The apparently worthless natural incumbrances upon the place he converted into ornaments. The stones and rocks made fences, recesses, grottoes, monuments, trellises, and landscape-finishing. On a beautiful lawn near the house is a life-size figure of Dante, brought from Italy. It stands on a pedestal bearing this inscription:

"Your own Poets have said,
For we are also His offspring."

In the rear of Dante is a ledge of rocks which appear as if Nature had some intention in arranging expressly for the purpose for which they were used,—to commemorate the poets. The names of Emerson, Longfellow, Bryant, Chaucer, Tasso, Dante (1265), Alfieri, Petrarch, Shakspeare (1564), Goethe, Schiller, Corneille, Milton (the day this name was engraved an English oak was set out over the rock bearing it), Wordsworth, Keble, Scott, Homer, and Virgil are carved in individual rocks at various angles, about and over which graceful ferns and shrubbery throw a charm. The whole combination is beautiful and poetic. The inscription, "The grove were God's first temples," is very befitting.

On a solitary rock not far from the wayside is this text and injunction, "Know thyself," which was written over the door of the temple of Apollo, and originated with the poet Menander. Dr. Osgood gave this special prominence, as he felt it should be the foundation of every man's character.

In another direction is the ecclesiastical part of the ground, in which the beauties of the place are ascribed on one rock to "God;" on the next to "Our Father;" and lastly, "In Christ." "God our Father in Christ" is the thought that pervades this place. Three stones form a complete and natural pulpit. On the rock forming the right side is engraved "God is Love;" on the one forming the left side is "Glad Tidings." The scriptural quotations in view are: "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God;" "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is Liberty;" "Honor thy father and thy mother." Again, one sees "The Comforter," "The Holy Spirit," engraved on other rocks.

On another rise of ground is a long stone on which is engraved "The Prophets;" on another is "Watch and Pray." At the base of the undulation is the key to Christian progress, written in stone: "To do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God." This section is called Carmel, and not far from here is the dedication of the ground: "To TRUTH: A Student's Offering," and is on the central group or ledge of rocks. This rock bears also the monogram adopted by Dr. Osgood, in which P is combined with X; the P signifying Chi and the X rho, so that the two significations are blended in Chirho, a Greek word meaning "Christ." The P also denotes pax, Latin for "peace;" so the motto of his adoption is "Christ and Peace," or "Peace in Christ."

Another nook is devoted to the family, where, on the various rocks, are engraved the initials of each member of the family, and on the return of each birthday a floral decoration of the corresponding stone is the order of the celebration. A large vase is the centre-piece.

Not far distant one is reminded, from the long stone underlying a bank on which is engraved in excellent lettering, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow," of the Sermon on the Mount.

On another slope is a circular opening, formed by rock and trees, dedicated to sentiment. On one stone is the word "Psyche," on another rock is "Strong Song of God, Immortal Love," the first line of Tennyson's "In Memoriam."

Near the street is the patriotic group of rocks, on which are noble names of history, "Alfred," "Lincoln, 1865," and "Washington." On a huge rock close by the street a fairy-like structure, called "Union Tower," composed of cedar, has a commanding view. On this rock is cut "God and our Country. 1862."

Dr. Osgood was born at Charlestown, Mass., in 1812. He graduated from Harvard in 1832, having been prepared by Dr. Willard Parker; completed his theological course at the Cambridge Divinity School in 1835; preached in the West and South about two years; took charge of the Unitarian school in Nashua, N. H., in 1837; was called to the Westminster Church in Providence, R. I., in 1842, and in 1849 went to the Church of the Messiah, New York, as the successor of Dr. Dewey, where he remained twenty years. After this he took orders in the Episcopal Church, but, owing to various and extensive literary duties, did not take the entire charge of a parish.

Dr. Osgood was a delegate to the International Peace Congress; was a member of the New England Society, the Historical Society, the Century Club, and the Union League Club; president of the Fairfield Improvement Society, and of the Memorial Library. He was also president of the Fairfield Centennial Commemoration. He compiled the record of that day, which is a valuable contribution to the centennial histories of the country. Fairfield was to him the loveliest of earthly paradises. In its praise he was unceasing, in acts for its welfare persistent, enthusiastic, and lavish. He was a voluminous writer, both for periodicals and of books.

He died April 14, 1880, at his New York residence, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. His remains were brought to Fairfield and interred in the Oak Lawn Cemetery, in a retired spot which he selected a few years since, and corresponds with his own home for thirty years. Mill River ripples at its base, and the native trees sough above him. Last year he had a large stone conveyed thither, upon the top of which a Maltese cross was erected. The pedestal, a native rock, bears this inscription: "God is our Rock. 1879." This stone, his home, and his literary works are his undying monuments.* He intended to reside permanently in Fairfield when he retired from public life, and have a common interest with the people. His home is a lasting memento of his great intellect.

7. The Home of Frederic Bronson.—This was originally the place where Dr. Dwight lived and wrote the poem of "Greenfield Hill," published in 1794.

When Dr. Dwight left his charming home for New Haven, Dr. Oliver Bronson purchased it. His son Frederic heired this property, the other sons being settled elsewhere.

* His tombstones are of granite. His headstone contains:

"Samuel Osgood
Doctor in Divinity,
Born in Charlestown, Mass., Aug. 30, 1812,
Died New York City April 14th, 1880.
"Peace I leave with you"

This is headed by the monogram before referred to, signifying "Peace in Christ."

On the footstone is the Maltese cross, under which is "Sursum Corda," which, interpreted, means "Lift up your hearts." Under this are the initials "S. O." in monogram.

About ten years since the old part, built for Dr. Dwight, was removed, and a new addition was made to the other portion of the house.

On the eastern slope of Greenfield Hill, in a romantic locality, lies an estate of some two hundred and fifty acres, owned by Mr. Frederic Bronson, which has been in the Bronson family for nearly a century. This is one of the finest country-seats in the State.

8. The Residence of the Late Governor Gideon Tomlinson.—This house is exceedingly plain and unpretentious. It was erected by Sturges Lewis, of Fairfield, about 1780. He married a daughter of Samuel Bradley, Esq.; neither of them lived but a short time. It was then occupied by Dudley Baldwin, a prominent lawyer, who married a sister of Mrs. Lewis, a widow of Hanford Wakeman.

The spotted fever was raging in New Haven in 1794. Dudley Baldwin went there to see his sister, who was prostrate with it. He took the fever, and died in three days. A monument in the Greenfield ground contains this to his memory and to that of others of the family:

"Sacred to the repose of the dead &
the meditation of the living.
Dudley Baldwin,
an eminent Counselor,
an ardent patriot,
a faithful friend,
died 29th March, 1794,
Aged 41.
Sarah Baldwin,
his wife, whose virtues endeared her to the best of husbands, died 3 Dec., 1795,
Aged 37.
Abraham Baldwin
lies buried at Washington.
His memory needs no marble. His country is his monument, her constitution his greatest work.
He died a Senator in Congress, 4 March, 1807,
Aged 52."

After Mrs. Baldwin's death the house reverted to Walter Bradley, who rented it to Rev. Mr. Samuel Blatchford in 1796; he preached in this parish a year or so, then went to Pequonnock. It was sold to Samuel Broom, of New York, and repurchased again, and was rented to Rev. Mr. Horace Holly, who kept the academy and preached here from 1805 to 1808, and was then settled in Boston. Mr. Holly brought with him the first piano ever seen in Greenfield.

The house was afterwards rented for several years, until it was purchased by Gideon Tomlinson, LL.D. (born at Stratford, Conn., Dec. 31, 1780), a lawyer, who married a daughter of Walter Bradley. He graduated from Yale 1802; became eminent as a lawyer at Fairfield; was a member of Congress 1818-1827; Governor of Connecticut 1827-1831; and United States senator from 1831 to 1837.* He died Oct. 8, 1854. He is described as being a very correct man, also slow and sure.

Mrs. Tomlinson survived him till 1880, when the house was sold to Miss Agnes Murray. The remains of both Mr. and Mrs. Tomlinson were interred in Stratford.

9. The Habitation of Burr Sherwood.—This was a perfect museum,—not of animals, but of dirt and curiosities. Mr. Burr Sherwood was really an eccentric man, and as long as his large monument in Oak Lawn remains it will be pointed out for generations, and his story told to listening ears. He was born in 1795, and was colonel in the home militia. He was a fine-looking young man, and rode a milk-white steed the envy of many.

As the changes occurred in the family, such as is the lot of all families, in which all parties are removed by death or marriage, it happened that he lived entirely alone. He dwelt in the house built by his father, Abel, from whom he also inherited considerable property. He did his own cooking and his own housework, but one thing was evident: he never did any sweeping. His furniture and crockery indicated that the family had been in good circumstances, but the most motley collection of articles ever gathered was there. When away from home he always had his hands full homeward bound; if nothing more, a stone in each hand, or a ribbon, a string, a paper, or a bit of iron. One room was devoted to papers of all sorts, which probably were sent to him on account of his connection with the Southport Chronicle. These papers were heaped high in one corner of the room. He had considerable of a farm, which grew up to cedars. All the old iron or wheels or chains, and things apparently worthless, he readily purchased.

Why he took a fancy to live thus or spend his money so strangely, nobody seems able to account for. He was well educated, and had quite a library, which seemed to be devoted to law, love, and piety, with some miscellaneous works. He also owned a house in Southport, not far from the depot. He, however, lived on Mill Hill till a tragedy occurred there which rather intimidated him. One evening he heard a knock at the door, to which he responded by opening to the applicant, when two men seized and gagged him. He was about eighty years old at this time. They injured him greatly, breaking out his teeth, etc. He, however, managed to escape from the burglars, who came to rob him. After that he resided in Southport till he died, in March, 1879. He probably then fell down stairs and broke his neck, as he was found doubled up at the foot of the stairs, as if he had missed his footing or lost his equilibrium. People missed him, so they persuaded the authorities to investigate his mysterious disappearance, and they found him as described above. He died as he lived,—alone. He was eccentric in his wardrobe as well as in other ways, yet he was never known to be discourteous, as he was a gentleman of the old school even to the last.

After his death his effects were sold at auction, which drew a crowd. Many bought some of his articles for their intrinsic value, others purchased to secure a remembrance of the odd old things that shall assist in commemorating his eccentricities for untold years.

His neighbor, and probably a distant relative, David H. Sherwood, is the administrator of Burr Sherwood's estate.

The whole of Mill Hill was formerly owned by one family of Sherwoods, but by marrying it has passed into different branches, and somewhat into the Bulkeley name.

Burr Sherwood and his brother Abel having deceased not many months apart, John, David H., and Arthur, three brothers, are the representatives of the Sherwoods in that section. Capt. Edwin Sherwood, of Southport, comes in another line.

David H. Sherwood and P. T. Barnum ran the first mowing-machine (a Ketchum) in this county. There could not be found two men in the country who were so ready with wit or jokes on all occasions as the last-mentioned couple.

Mr. David H. Sherwood has always been interested in the Fairfield County Fair. At the time he was associated with Barnum everything from California was so immense, in grain, fruit, or stock, that when entering some of the latter for Barnum,—which was no less than some donkeys,—Mr. Sherwood entered them as "California Rabbits,"—a joke relished greatly by the great showman.

The Sherwood family have married into all the families in town from the early date of its settlement. One representative in Southport was the late Dr. Justin Sherwood, who was a graduate of Yale with Dr. Denison, of Fairfield. Their systems of practice were antagonistic, yet both were successful and highly esteemed, and they died within a few months of each other.

THE HULL FAMILY.†

Joseph Hull, born 1594, of St. Mary Hall, Oxford, took his first degree in 1614, and was in 1621 instituted rector of Northleigh, a parish adjoining the vicarage of his brother William. He arrived at Boston May 6, 1635, and was the first minister of Weymouth, Mass. He was freeman of Massachusetts and Plymouth, a delegate to the General Courts of both colonies, and the pioneer and founder of Barnstable, on Cape Cod. He removed to Maine in 1641, and was minister at the celebrated Isles of Shoals, at York, and at Oyster River. He died Nov. 19, 1665. Mr. Hull remained within the pale of the Established Church, and by the Puritans was suspected of episcopal, if not prelatial, tendencies. He was the lifelong opponent of the Massachusetts Bay Company, and Governor Winthrop informs us that he was a contentious man and ran a different course from the Boston party in both civil and ecclesiastical affairs. His descendants are found chiefly in Rhode Island and New York.

The parentage and birthplace of the Hulls are not known. Two well-defined family traditions have been traced back to early colonial days. One, transmitted by the descendants of George, of Fairfield, states that three brothers came from Old England, and that their immediate descendants located in Connecticut, in Massachusetts, and in Rhode Island. It evidently refers to George, John, and Joseph. The other tradition, found in the Rhode Island family (descendants of Joseph), is to the effect that their ancestor claimed descent from the family long seated at Larkebeare, in St. Leonard's parish, Exeter, Devonshire. Still another tradition has it that their father was also a clergyman, but this may point no farther back than to the brothers William and Joseph, both episcopally ordained. The probabilities are that their father was a substantial yeoman or thrifty burgher of Somerset, and that he claimed descent from the Larkebeare Hulls.

Mr. George Hull, the second of these brothers, was born about 1590. He and his daughter Marie are named in the vicar's will. To George was given a reversionary interest in an annuity issuing out of certain premises in Broad-Windsor in county Dorset, and to Marie a legacy of ten pounds. He came over with the West-Country people in the great ship "Mary and John," Capt. Squeb, which sailed from Plymouth, in Devon, March 30, 1629-30, and arrived May 30, 1630, at Nantasket (a point afterwards named Hull, in honor of his brother Joseph), and thirteen days before the arrival of Governor Winthrop at Salem. They located at Mattapan, and named their plantation Dorchester. These first comers, chiefly from Somerset, Devon, and Dorset, "were many of them persons of note and figure," and Mr. Hull was dignified then, and always after, with the title of "Mister" or "Master," "which but few in those days were." He took the freeman's oath May 14, 1633, and it is conjectured that he then for the first time attached himself to the Dorchester Church, and it does not appear that he thereafter took any active part in the ecclesiastical politics of the times. The same year he was a member of the town council which established the municipal government. In 1633 and 1634 he was one of the raters of the town, and he and Capt. John Bursley (who married his niece, Joanna Hull) were the tax commissioners. In 1635 and 1636 he was elected one of the selectmen "for the ordering of the plantation."

Mr. Hull was deputy from Dorchester to the first General Court held at Boston, May 14, 1634, the most notable body of representative men assembled among the founders of New England, which curbed the power of the theocracy by assuming to themselves the right of law-making; and "no country on earth," says Judge Savage, "can afford the history of any event more interesting to its own inhabitants."

In 1635 his brother Joseph, rector of Northleigh, arrived with many people out of Somerset and Dorset, and with twenty-one families, including his own, sat down at Wessagusset, now Weymouth, but which until the fall of the year remained within the territorial jurisdiction of the town of Dorchester. Thus for a short time the three brothers, George, John, and Joseph, were fellow-townsmen.

During the year 1636, George Hull and family, and his son-in-law, Mr. Pinney (who had married his daughter Marie), with many others,—in all, about one-half of the first comers and grantees,—removed to the Connecticut Valley and founded the town of Windsor. In the same year he surveyed Wethersfield, in Connecticut, and the records of Plymouth colony disclose the fact that he received a grant of land at Green's Harbor Path in 1637, perhaps in compensation for professional services as a surveyor.

He was representative from the town of Windsor to the first General Court assembled at Hartford, May 1, 1637, which declared war against the Pequot Indians, and by the spirited measures adopted is memorable in the history of the times. He continued to represent Windsor every year until 1646, when he removed to Fairfield, where he made purchase of several tracts of land. After his removal to Fairfield he was elected deputy to the General Court most of the time to the year 1656.

He was the personal friend and political adherent of Governor Roger Ludlow. He emigrated with him from England in 1630, removed with him to Connecticut in 1636, and, jointly with him, obtained from the court in 1638 a grant of the monopoly of the beaver-trade on the Connecticut River. When Governor Ludlow went to Fairfield, Mr. Hull soon followed, and was selected by the court his assistant or lieutenant in the military operations of the year 1649; and in 1651, and again in 1653 and 1654, he was appointed by the General Court as associate magistrate for the towns of the "Sea Side," being in this capacity the assistant of Mr. Ludlow, the magistrate. Mr. Ludlow embarked for Virginia in 1654, and Mr. Hull, though frequently thereafter elected by the people as their deputy, is not again appointed an assistant magistrate by the court.

He was twice married. His first wife—mother of all his children—died before his removal to Fairfield. She was probably Elizabeth, daughter of Henry Russell, who died at Weymouth, in 1640, leaving a small estate to his "only child, Elizabeth Hull." After June, 1654, he married Sarah, widow of David Phippen, or Fitzpen, of Boston, by whom there was no issue.

He died in 1659, aged about seventy years. He was public-spirited, active, and intelligent, and as a legislator and magistrate was instrumental in establishing two of the free and enlightened commonwealths of New England. Cotton Mather distinguished him with a place in his great book, and also places his brother Joseph in his "First Classis" or list of "First Good Men." Mr. Trumbull, historian of Connecticut, groups him with those whose names are worthy of perpetuation, and Mr. Stiles, historian of Windsor, tells us that he was a citizen of worth and distinction.

One of the pioneers of Fairfield not mentioned personally was George Hull, who was born in 1590.

Cornelius Hull, of Fairfield, Conn., born in 1626, married Rebecca, daughter of Rev. John and Sarah Jones, of Fairfield. Mr. Jones was episcopally ordained in England, and came in the ship "Defense" from London in 1635; was ordained pastor of the Concord Church April 6, 1637; removed with many of his parish to Fairfield in September, 1644. Upon the occasion of his marriage, in 1653, Mr. Hull, by deed of gift dated November 19th, granted to his son Cornelius a homestead farm in Fairfield, and November 24th he purchased a homestead lot of three acres in the village. Cornelius followed his father's profession,—that of a surveyor. He was representative to the General Court for many years,—1656-60, 1662-65, and 1667. In 1675 he was lieutenant of the Life-Guards, and in 1676 lieutenant of the Fairfield company, and was out in King Philip's war, in which service he received a grant of land in 1677. He left a will dated Sept. 16, 1695.

Hull.—This English surname is taken directly from the names of places and localities. It is the old English and Welsh word for the Anglo-Saxon hill, the French montagne, the Latin mons. The oldest estates and manors in the West of England giving names to families were Hull in Cheswardine, Salop; Hull in Arcenefeld, Herefordshire (the La Halla of Domesday Book); Hull in Piercholle, Staffordshire; and Hull in Taretone, Devonshire (corrupted into Hole by the Norman scribes in Domesday); and it is probable that all bearing the name of Hull, and also many bearing the name of Hill in the West counties, derive from families originally resident or holding lands at the above-named places. Several of these families can be traced back to the days of the Norman kings, when the name was written De la Hull, Del Hull, or La Hull; but the subsequent adoption of aliases—such as De la Hill, Du Mont, De Monte, De la Montagne—has thrown all of these pedigrees into endless confusion. It was not uncommon for a West county family to have an alias down to a comparatively recent period,—such as Hull alias Hill or Hill alias Hull,—which resulted, in many instances, in the final adoption of the more euphonious form of Hill.

As Fairfield was settled so early in our county's history the graveyards³ are very old. The town records and the tombstone inscriptions are all that are left to tell the doings of Fairfield's first settlers.

The first burials were made in the Peponnock, Fairfield old, and Mosquito Hill grounds. Those in the latter had no stones at all to mark the places, and, being located near the shore (west of Phipp's Beach), through the action of the winds and the waves they have been mostly washed away. In the other two grounds there was often no stone to mark the final resting-place of the dead; and if there were any, there was no mark intelligible to later generations. Then, as people had a little more time and could command tools, they improved on their first monuments, as they made a few rude initials, with the date of the year, carved in the stone in its original condition. On this account the Peponnock (or Stratfield) ground is a curiosity, the contour of some of the stones being very irregular. The first feeling of the beholder is that he is in some foreign country,—that he is evidently not at home.

The burials of the first era are marked by no stones; those of the second are indicated by the use of a common rough stone, unwrought; the third, by the blue-stone imported from England. These stones are of excellent quality, and, being susceptible of very high polish or having great smoothness, are not so readily covered by moss. The fourth era is marked by free-stone; the fifth, by marble or granite. The fashion of carvings, designs of "grinning deaths," willows, urns, and monograms seems to mark different eras also. The different expressions, "In Memory of," "Departed this Life," "Died," "Obt.," also seem to indicate different parts of the century, as does the orthography,—"Here lyes ye," etc. Then, again, the long epitaph or the reverse, the utmost simplicity, is in vogue at various times, an illustration of which is here given. The first is taken from Fairfield old ground, and is the longest one found:

"Here lies the Body of Thomas, Son to Mr Ebenezer & Mr Mary Beaman. He was Born February 22, A.D. 1764, & Died July 28th, A.D. 1794, Aged 5 months & 6 Days.

"Happy the Babe, who, privileged by Fate
To Shorter Labour and a Lighter weight,
Receiv'd but yesterday the Gift of Breath,
Order'd to-morrow to Return to Death.

"Since all the downward Tracts of Time
God's watchful Eye Surveys,
Oh, who So wise to 'choose our Lot
And Regulate our ways?"

"Since none Can doubt his Equal Love,
Unmeasurably kind,
To his unerring, gracious will,
Be Every wish Resigned."

"Good when He gives, Supremely good,
Nor Less when He denies,
Even Crosses from his Sovereign hand
Are Blessings in Disguise."

The shortest is from Fairfield East ground, and is simply,—

"David Hull, M.D., Ob. 1831, Aet. 68."

Probably there is not a person in town not familiar with Dr. Hull's name and reputation as a very successful and beloved physician.

The genealogist likes the following style, as it assists greatly in his research (the point referred to is in italics):

"In Memory of Mrs
Deborah Osborn,
Consort of Mr Daniel Osborn, Junr, & Daugh
of Col. Abraham Gould, who departed this Life
July 28, 1785, Aged 22 years & 3 days.

"Death is not the Nature due,
Which I have paid and so must you."*

A few are here given as curiosities in tombstone lore:

"Here lyes Buried ye Body of Benjamin Wynkoop of Fairfield.
He was born in New York
May ye 5th, old stile, 1705, & departed this Life Sept 1st, 1766, in ye 62 Year of His Age."

To read these old stones intelligibly, it is necessary to bear in mind that "previous to 1752 the English legal year began with March 25th, though the change to January 1st as the beginning of the year, adopted by Catholic nations in 1582, had been gradually gaining ground. To prevent confusion between the two styles it became usual to write all dates occurring between January 1st and March 25th with double year, thus: 'Feb. 22, 1731,' meaning that the year under the Old Style would be still 1731, while by the New Style it would be 1732. Under the New Style another change took place, by which ten days should be added to all dates previous to 1700 and eleven days to those between 1700 and 1752."† For that reason one finds a birth on the church record in near the first part of February; on referring to the town record the same is registered in the last part of January, showing that the change was not uniformly adopted. As an illustration of the above the following is given:

* See Fairfield Ground.

"Here lyes Buried ye Body of Mrs Ann
Allen, Wife to Lieut
Gideon Allen,
Who departed this life,
Mar 14th, Anno Dom.
1747, Aged 72 years."

The oldest inscription familiar to the historian so far reads:

"Here lyes ye Body
Joseph Phippen,
Aged about 26 years. Died ye 10th of July, 1712."

The letters are all in capitals. It is a very short stone, just high enough for five lines of inscription. The margin is broad and richly carved.

Two others:

"Here lies interr'd the body of Doct Thomas Hill, who died March 8th,
A.D. 1781, in the 36th
Year of his Age.

"Some hearty friends shall drop a ^{tear}
On our dry Bones and say
Those once were strong as mine appear
And mine must be as they."

"Here lyes ye Body
of Sarah Burr, the DAUGHTER of Peter Burr, Esq.,
Aged about 16 years.
1—7—2—3."

The month indicating her death is lost, as the slate has sealed off. The year is stretched across the stone.

Another:

"Here lies ye body of Abigail, ye wife of Joseph Gorham, who died Janua^r ye 23^d, 1723,
Aged 31 years."

I was "old stile" for J.

Another:

"In Memory of Lieut. Gideon Hawley,
who died
Sept. 11. 1784.
Aged years.
Gideon, son of Gideon & Hannah Hawley, died Jan. 6, 1788.
Aged 3 years & 6 months.

"Death, like an overflowing stream,
Sweeps us away; our life's a dream,
An empty tail; a morning flower,
Cut down and wither'd in a hour."

Another:

"In memory of Gersol, wife of Gershom Osborn,
who departed this life
January 16, 1829,
Aged 76 years."

"Grisel" and "Gershom" were common names in Fairfield, but they, like the dead who bore them, are objects of the past.

Another:

"Horace son of
Walter & Lucretia
Sherwood
born Aug. 13, 1811, & drown'd
June 15, 1816,
"of such is the kingdom of God."

Another:

"Here lies the Body of Peter
Burr, son to Mr Thad^s & Mrs Abigail Burr, died
Sept^r ye 13th, 1745, in ye 15th Year of his Age."

The next is a slab, though it says:

"This Monument is put up in Memory of Mr Gershom Burr."

The next has a lovely face at the top of the stone, the inscription beginning with:

"The Reader is hereby informed that the Body of Thaddens Burr," etc.

The next begins:

"The Corruptible of James Dennie Sayre, son of James Sayre, Minister of the Gospel, &
Sarah his wife, who fell asleep on the 25th Day of May, A.D. 1793, Aged almost 17 years.
Young man trust not thy Youth, health or strength; Trust in the Lord with all thy Heart, and remember thy Creator, who is also thy Redeemer."

Another:

"In Memory of Stephen Morehouse, who was drown'd
Oct. 28, 1817,
Æ. 30 Yrs & 6 Mo.

"Behold and see as you pass by;
As you are now, so once was I;
As I am now, so you must be:
Prepare for death & follow me."

Another:

"Memento Mori.
Here lyes ye Body of Mr Joseph Bartram.
He was Born February
ye 21st, O. S., 1728, and Died
March ye 28th, N. S., 1759,
Aged 30 Years & 24 Days.
"Princes, this Clay must be your bed,
In spite of all your towers;
The tall, the wise, the Reverend head
Must lie as low as ours."

Another:

"Here lyes Buried
the Body of Mr Ebenezer Jennings,
the husband of Mrs Rebecca Jennings, who died April 9th, 1768, in ye 76 Year of His Age."

Another:

"Underneath
this tomb lyes the body of Ebenezer Burr, son of William & Eunice Burr, who was born
Nov. 8th, 1783, and Died
April 8th, 1784, aged 6 months.
The parents' Joy in life was lost in death,
To be found in Christ."

Another:

"To the Memory of Mrs Althea Lamson, wife of
The Rev^d Mr Joseph Lamson, and Daug^r of the Rev^d Mr JAMES Wetmore, Rector of Rye in New York Province,
Who departed this Life ye 8th of Feb^r, 1766, Aged 44 Years."

Another:

"In memory of
Samuel Squire, Esq.,
Who departed this Life
27th May, 1801,
Aged 86 years.

"Praises on tombstones are but vainly spent, Assured life to come is our best monument."

Another:

"In memory of Noah Jarvis, son of Mr. Isaac & Mrs. Lydia Jarvis, who died May ye 19, 1766 in ye 9th year of his age.

"He on the waves of watery graves
The last breath he did fetch;
In blooming youth to tell the truth,
Death did him quickly snatch."

There was an old burying-ground on Mill Plain, thought at one time to contain the oldest stones, but the boundaries and the site are now only traditional. All that remains of it are five tombstones,* which will probably be set in the old Fairfield ground.

As land was plenty, there were no particular boundaries given at first to the burying-grounds, but people, with a very few exceptions, buried their dead in rows, in a general lot. As the Fairfield ground was the most central and the first church was located

These stones contain tributes to:

- (1) "Mr. Abraham Adams who de^d Aug. ye 9th, 1729, in ye 80th year of his age."
- (2) "Mrs. Rebecca Brown, de^d June ye 3rd, 1730,
In ye 75th year of her age."
- (3) "Mr. Benjamin Lines,
De^d February ye 21st, 1732,
In ye 44th year of his age."
- (4) "David Jennings, son of
Mr. Joshua and Mrs. Rebecca Jennings,
De^d March ye 9th, 1745, Aged 10 months."
- (5) "Mrs. Esther Lord, aged 67 years."

there, it was natural that it should be the most used. The one on Mill Plain was in the rear of or near the first Episcopal church. In all probability, the burials made there were on "common or undivided land," which in time was apportioned to various individuals, and, as generations succeeded, these portions passed to different owners; and, being disused for burials, all traces of this ground are lost. Mr. Frederic Sturges owns the original site of it.

Another reason: The second Episcopal church being built near Mr. Henry Rowland's, the burying-ground in Fairfield was used jointly by the two denominations. The old ground being filled, a new one was a necessity; but, as the town would not harmonize on the location, two cemeteries were laid out simultaneously,—one to accommodate Black Rock and such other portion of Fairfield as would prefer a burial there, and the other to accommodate Southport, Mill Plain, and Fairfield. The former (once owned by Mr. Jonathan Lewis, who possessed all that square) was in the rear of the Methodist church; the latter was on the Southport road, opposite, in later years, the original site of St. Thomas' (Catholic) church.

These cemeteries were calculated for a certain number of lots capable of holding a specified number of persons, for each of which lots a sum of three dollars gave a "warranty deed, fee simple," for all time. Many "took up" a lot without paying; others purchased, and they or their posterity are holders of the deeds.

As Green's Farms and the Pequonnock ground were originally in Fairfield, the early inhabitants were buried in them. A very few gravestones were erected previous to 1700, but they were not in general use till about 1730 or 1740. The grounds mentioned above, with Greenfield ground (Greenfield was the name given to Fairfield Northwest Parish Oct. 12, 1727), contain the dead whose burials occurred from the above dates till 1827.

The first interment in the East ground is marked by a stone which contains:

"The Grave of Eliza Burr, wife of Silliman Burr,
who died
Feb. 11, 1827, age 131 years."

The first interment in the West ground was that of Robert Pike, in 1830.

There is apparently a large vacant space in one corner of the old ground, which would make it appear to a stranger as if there was no necessity for a new ground, but on investigation it will be found that this portion was used exclusively for slaves and the poor.

The old way of settling a town was to select a site for a church, a town-house, a school, a burying-ground, and a green or parade-ground, and these were for the public benefit. Buying a burial-plot in this country is a recent custom, except in large cities. Southport, Mill Plain, and Fairfield placed their dead in this old ground for years. Some bodies have been removed to other resting-places, but the most of the illustrious dead of Fairfield for two hundred years lie here.

In 1865 the citizens who possessed due reverence for their ancestors had a mortar-laid wall built to preserve this old Fairfield burying-ground.

It is a wonderful coincidence that many of the original owners (and their descendants for three or four generations) of the "colonial" houses lie in this inclosure.

Fairfield West Parish (now Green's Farms), like Stratfield, had a graveyard of its own; likewise Fairfield North Parish (now Greenfield) had a ground to itself, but the latter has more antiquity, as it is said this was an old Indian burying-ground. The Indians buried their dead six feet deep, but they permitted the whites to use their ground, providing they would not bury deeper than four feet.

As the Indians passed away the whites continued to use it till it was full, and then they would have been obliged to extend this old ground or lay out a new cemetery had not Southport obviated that necessity by creating a cemetery of grand proportions for a rural community. The East ground was well occupied, the old, or middle, was disused, the West inadequate, and Greenfield ground was full; so a number of Southport gentlemen—Messrs. Benjamin Pomeroy, William W. Wakeman, Moses Bulkeley, Warren D. Gookin, Jonathan Godfrey, Edwin Sherwood, John A. Alvord, Oliver H. Perry and his sister Delia, George Bulkeley, and Frederic Marquand—formed an association, Dec. 29, 1865, under the Statute Laws of Connecticut, and purchased a portion of land lying between Greenfield and Southport, along the bank of Mill River. This has been laid out in beautiful walks and drives. The land being undulating, it is diversified by "glade and glen" and groves. The grounds are sold to parties wishing to purchase, and in consequence many people of wealth have contributed freely towards making their final resting-places comparatively as attractive as their earthly dwellings; so that the Oak Lawn Cemetery—named from a huge oak near the entrance—is rich in copings, inclosures, monuments, and tributes to departed friends. Here are stately monuments erected to the bearers of the names of Pomeroy, Wakeman, Bulkeley, Gookin, Sherwood, Alvord, Perry, Black, Nichols, Beers, McLean, Osgood, Jennings, Hull, Dimon, Goodsell, Ogden, Godfrey, Banks, and many others.

A portion of the East burying-ground is elegantly laid out, with the inclosures of coping and velvet turf. In the summer the dead appear as if inclosed in a sarcophagus of flowers labeled in beautifully carved marble. Here are the names of Sanford, Curtis, Phelps, Thorp, Gould, Lyon, Rowland, Hull, Brown, Jennings, Betts, Smith, Sturges, Jones, Jessup, Cogswell, Rogers, Wilson, and Burr, besides hosts of others, many of whom were the occupants of the beautiful mansions of Fairfield which have been standing from a quarter to half a century.

It is not an uncommon occurrence to find the members of a family buried in three cemeteries, which does not greatly facilitate the work of the historian or the genealogist.

In the old ground this inscription is found :

" W. P.
This Monument is erected by Mrs. Molly Pike to commemorate her Husband,
Mr. William Pike, who died April 1st, 1806, in the 55th year
of his age."

In the West ground a stone is

" Sacred
to the memory of Molly Pike, widow of William Pike,
who departed this life
15th Sept., 1834,
Aged 74 Years,
After having discharged a mother's duty to 15 children,
" Behold, and see what death has done!
This is the race we all must run,
Repent in time, while time you have;
There's no repentance in the grave."

In the old ground is found a stone erected

" In Memory of Capt. Eliphalet Thorp,
who departed this life
Sept. 1st, 1795, in the 56 Year
of his Age."

He died of yellow fever; he was father of Mrs. Molly Pike. She married (1) Jonathan Darrow, who was taken prisoner by the British, and died on their prison ship. He left one son, Jonathan. In 1779 his mother took him and her sister and their colored female slaves to the woods and remained till the danger was over. She married (2) William Pike, who was lieutenant under Gen. Washington. Of their fourteen children there are two living,—Capt. Julius Pike, of Southport, who formerly ran a packet from Charleston to New York, now is in his eighty-third year, and his sister, Charlotte, widow of James Perry, of Fairfield Woods, now eighty-seven. These children were born in Southport. Three of them were lost at sea,—one a young man eighteen years old; another, Capt. William, who started on a voyage with his vessel from Charleston and was never heard from afterwards; Capt. Robert, who lies buried near his mother, and has this inscription to his memory:

of Capt. Robert Pike,
who departed this life
on Barnegat Beach,
After humanely preserving the lives of his crew from shipwreck in the memorable gale on the 6th of December, 1830,
aged 37 years, 11 months,
and 6 days.
" Behold, vain mortals, fleeting forms
Beneath this clay-cold sod;
Here lies, a prey to numerous worms,
The noblest work of God."

In this West ground is this inscription :

" In memory of
Capt. John F. Langley, who was born in New Market, N. H., Nov. 20th, 1819,
and, together with his crew, was lost on Eaton's Neck, Long Island,
in a snow-storm,
Feb. 10th, 1845,
Aged 25 years, 2 mo.,
& 14 DAYS.
" He's gone and left me here below
To mourn his loss with grief and wo,
But God is just— may I be still,
Since 'tis my heavenly Father's will."

Another stone in the same ground contains :

" To the memory
of Aaron I. Hubbard,
Born Feb. 22nd, 1807, and came to his death by the Melancholy loss of the schooner 'Reeside,' which was wrecked in the severe snow-storm of FEBRUARY 4th, 1845, on Eaton's Neck, Long Island,
Aged 37 years, 11 mo.,
& 12 Days.
This stone commemorates the affectionate regard of the bereaved mother of him whose earthly remains repose beneath.
May he rest in peace!"

Among the epitaphs in the East ground are :

" Died
in the hopes of the Gospel, Euretta,
wife of
Jeremiah T. Denison, M.D., the 7th of February, 1844,
In the 33 year of her age.
Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord "

Another :

" Here rests in hope of a glorious immortality the mortal remains of Leander M. Sammis,
who died
Nov. 5, 1860,
Æ. 25 yrs., 6 mo., & 6 d's.

"Unvail thy bosom, faithful tomb;
Take this new treasure to thy trust,
And give these sacred relics room
To slumber in the silent dust.
So Jesus slept, God's dying Son,
Pass'd thro' the grave & blest the bed.
Rest here, blest saint, till from his throne
The morning break and pierce the shade."

Another:

"Capt.
Rufus Knapp, son of
John & Esther
Knapp,
Born in Fairfield,
Dec. 7, 1813.
Sailed from New York for Liverpool in the Ship 'Leviathan,'
Nov. 24, 1853.

We waited, watched, and hoped, but no tidings ever came.

"Sad, dark, mysterious thy fate and hard to bear, yet pleasant remembrances crowd the memory, and like a halo of light relieve the sadness and best bespeak thy worth."

There are more epitaphs and odd inscriptions in Greenfield ground than in all the other grounds in Fairfield. Here are a few specimens:

"In Memory of Capt Ebenezer Hill,
Son of Deaⁿ Joseph Hill,
who departed this Life
March 27th, 1798,
in the 57th year
of his age.

He was virtuous in Life, and resigned in Death."

The next stone contains:

"In
Marol, wife of Capt. Eben^r Hill, who died
Oct. 26, 1820, in her
75 year.

"She was the mother of six sons and three Daughters.

"In life she was industrious, epinomical, and virtuous, and in Death happy."

Another:

"In Memory of Uriah Burr, who died Oct 12, 1813,
Æ. 27.

"Learn, ye who view the silent tomb,
And round its borders tread,
I was cut down in perfect bloom
And number'd with the dead.

"As you are now, so once was I,
With youth and health adorned;
And soon like me you here must lie,
A helpless prey for worms.

"Then seize, oh seize, the transient hour,
Make sure your peace with God;
Youth, like the morning flower,
Is blasted in the bud."

Another:

"Francis Samuel Bulkley,
Born at Black Rock, Ct.,
June 3, 1811.
Died in New York
March 30, 1855.

"Death teaches heavy lessons hard to bear,
And most it teaches us what we have lost
In losing those who loved us."

Another:

"In
memory of Elijah Banks,
who died
April 12, 1840,
In the 50th year
of his age.

"The beloved partner of my heart,
Which Heaven so lately gave,
'Tis called with earth for Heaven to part
And left me here to grieve,
But soon, ah! soon, we'll meet again;
In Heaven we hope to dwell,
Free from all care and toil and pain:
Then, dearest one, Farewell!"

Another:

"A * in glory.
Henry B. Banks,
Died
July 20, 1854,
Æ. 32 Yrs & 4 mo.

"Yes, again we hope to meet thee,
Where no farewell tears are shed;
Jesus' precious blood hath bought thee,
And thou speakest all-though dead.
"He being dead, yet speaketh.—Heb. 17:4."

Another:

"Sacred
To the memory of Abbey Bradley, wife of Silas Wakeman,
& Daughter of Nathan & Clarine Wheeler,
Who Died
June 19, 1842,
aged 34 year
& 8 mos.

"Farewell, my partner & children dear;
Prepare for death while I sleep here."

Here is a memento of the late war:

"AMOR
PATRIÆ
DECI.
Francis B. Merwin,
Co. I, 23^d Regt C. V., Died in the service of his Country at Lafourche, La., Apr. 17th, 1863,
Aged 23 yrs.
& 11 mo.

Erected by his young associates,
A last sad tribute of their affection and esteem for their departed comrade."

Another:

"Sacred
to the memory of Hosea Hulbert, M.D.,
who departed this life
April 5, A.D. 1825,
in the 80th year
of his age.
Quiescat in pace."

He built the house occupied by Mr. Henry Bradley, and resided there. He was an antagonist in practice to Dr. Rogers.

St. Thomas' ground is a new one, and in consequence has had but few burials in it. It is a neat little ground, belonging to the Catholic church.

There are some fine stones and monuments here. Of the latter one large one bears this :

"Rev. Thomas Mullen,
Obit Aug. 5, 1877.
Ætat 33.
Requiescat in Pace."

He was greatly beloved by his people, and respected by all. He died under these trying circumstances: There was some unpleasantness existing between John Conklin and George Allen, whereupon the latter shot the former, the wound proving fatal. Rev. Mr. Mullen attended him faithfully as long as life was spared, but, being troubled with the heart-disease, the excitement was so great that he fell down dead. Allen was sent to prison for life.

There are several very sensible inscriptions in this ground; then, again, there are sentiment and epigrams. Here is one:

"Martha Ann,
daughter of Gamaliel & Jane
SMITH,
Died Nov. 17, 1870.

Æ. 9 yrs, 10 D's.

May her soul rest in peace! Amen.

"We loved her! Oh, no tongue can tell
How much we loved her or how well
God loved her too, and thought it best
To take her home with him to rest."

Another:

"Father!
Michael Kincella, died Sept. 19, 1872.

Æ. 44 yrs.

May his soul rest in peace!
We miss thee."

As an introduction to the records of the Oak Lawn Cemetery, Mr. O. H. Perry wrote therein an elaborate and excellent history of the burying-grounds of the town, which has suggested many items in this paper.

Associating the present "colonial" houses with Fairfield old and the Greenfield burying-grounds, a good idea of the colonial times may be evolved into an interesting history. The East and West grounds will, with the homes erected in the early part of the century, bring that history down seventy-five years later; while the historian in the next century will look to the extension of the East ground and Oak Lawn for the people of to-day.

There are, however, owing to the conflagration of 1779, many names of note, the bearers of which neither lived in "colonials" nor had they odd inscriptions; neither does space give them "special" history, but a worthy mention is due them. They are those of Allen, Barlow, Thorp, Lewis, Brewster (of whom was Capt. Calch, who died in 1827, aged seventy-nine years, and "was a brave and active officer of the Revolution;" so says his tombstone), Fowler, Knap, Whitehead, Bartram, Benedict, Rev. Joseph Webb (one of the founders of Yale College), Ely, Trabee, and Squire.

The only ground kept now under any system is the Oak Lawn, which has a perfect directory. Up to date there have been four hundred and thirty-five burials in it. There is a directory of the other grounds now being compiled for public use.

For information on the subject of burying-grounds credit is due to Mr. Samuel Wilson (gunsmith), Mr. Charles M. Johnson, Mr. Ebenezer Burr, Mr. David Banks, Mr. Oliver Perry, Capt. Julius Pike, and Miss Annie R. Jennings.

THE BOROUGH OF SOUTHPORT.

The charter of the borough of Southport was granted May 26, 1831, and the first borough-meeting was held July 4, 1831. At this meeting the following officers were chosen; Jonathan Bulkeley, Warden; Ebenezer Dinon, First Burgess; Charles Perry, Second Burgess; Andrew Bulkeley, Third Burgess; Justus Sherwood, Fourth Burgess; Jesup Alvord, Fifth Burgess; Wakeman B. Meeker, Sixth Burgess; Simon Sherwood, Treasurer; Julius Pike, Bailiff. The last borough-meeting was held Dec. 30, 1854.

THE SOUTHPORT NATIONAL BANK.

This bank was chartered as a branch of the Connecticut Bank of Bridgeport, January, 1832, and called "The Connecticut Branch Bank," with Jeremiah Sturges president, Jonathan Bulkeley cashier. Francis D. Perry was elected cashier Dec. 20, 1839, in place of Jonathan Bulkeley, resigned. In 1844, Jesup Alvord was elected president, to succeed Jeremiah Sturges, deceased. In 1847, Wyllis Atwater was elected cashier, to succeed Francis D. Perry, resigned.

In July, 1851, the connection with the Connecticut Bank ceased. The bank obtained an independent charter, and was known as "The Southport Bank," with Jesup Alvord president, and Wyllis Atwater cashier. In 1852, Wyllis Atwater resigned as cashier, and Francis D. Perry was elected instead.

Jan. 2, 1865, the bank adopted the national banking system, and was known as "The Southport National Bank." In February, 1865, Francis D. Perry resigned as cashier, and E. C. Sherwood was chosen to fill the vacancy. June 19, 1865, Jesup Alvord resigned as president, and Francis D. Perry was chosen.

The capital of the bank has been one hundred thousand dollars from the organization as a branch to the present time. The surplus at present is twenty-seven thousand dollars.

THE SOUTHPORT SAVINGS-BANK.

The Southport Savings-Bank was chartered by the General Assembly at its May session of 1854. It was organized in September, 1854, by the election of the following board of managers: President, Frederick Marquand; Vice-Presidents, William W. Wakeman, Edwin Sherwood, Augustus Jennings; Trustees, Jesup Alvord, Moses Bulkeley, George Bulkeley, Oliver H. Perry, Ebenezer Jesup, Simon Sherwood, William

* By various contributors.

Bulkeley, Allen Nichols, Jonathan Godfrey, Samuel A. Nichols, William Bibbins, John Gould; Secretary and Treasurer, F. D. Perry. Only six of this board now survive.

Deposits were first received Sept. 25, 1854, in the Southport Bank building. A new structure was erected, opposite the Southport National Bank, for the savings-bank and occupied June 24, 1865, nearly eleven years after its organization, and then having on deposit $287,655.41. The present amount of deposits (April 24, 1880) is $524,056.18.

Present board of managers: President, Frederick Marquand; Vice-Presidents, Edwin Sherwood, Augustus Jennings, Jonathan Godfrey; Trustees, George Bulkeley, F. D. Perry, W. B. Meeker, O. B. Jennings, Oliver Bulkeley, Paschal Sheffield, George Bulkeley, Jr., Francis Jelliff, Franklin Bulkeley, Benjamin A. Bulkeley, Simon C. Sherwood, Royal G. Skiff, John H. Wood, Edward Henshaw, Ebenezer Monroe, John H. Gorham; Loaning Committee, F. Marquand, Edwin Sherwood, and F. D. Perry; Auditors, L. F. Sherwood and Henry Davis; Secretary and Treasurer, O. H. Perry.

LIBRARIES.

The writer is indebted to Dr. Dunham and Miss Catharine A. Blakeman, of Greenfield, Mr. J. F. Jennings, of Southport, and the Bridgeport Standard for the following:

The first public library in the town of Fairfield was established about 1790-1800, and disbanded about 1850. It was originally a stock concern. The only account so far advanced is taken from an old bill, in which it is stated that Alfred Perry, in 1827, "bought of the executors of the estate of David Beers, deceased, at public vendue, one share in Fairfield Library for fifty-five cents." Some of the books of the original library are in the present Fairfield Library.

The second library was established in Greenfield in 1813. Each share in the library was sold at two dollars and fifty cents. The original by-laws, subscribers, and catalogue of books are in possession of M. V. B. Dunham, M.D., of Greenfield Hill. Among the subscribers' names are those associated with the colonial houses, some of whom took two shares,—viz., Rev. William Belden, Walter Bradley, David Hill, William B. Nash, A. D. Baldwin, Gideon Tomlinson, Gershom and Daniel Wakeman. They each paid a yearly tax of fifty cents. For keeping books beyond the allotted time there was levied a fine, and every one was mulcted some time.

As people may be curious to know of what libraries were composed in the pre-novel age, a quotation from the catalogue is given: "'Spectator,' 8 vols.; 'Rambler,' 4 vols.; 'Lives of the Poets,' 4 vols.; 'Rollins' 'Ancient History,' 8 vols.; 'Celebs,' 2 vols.; 'Practical Piety,' 'Christian Morals,' 'History of Charles Twelfth,' 'Vicar of Wakefield,' 'Life of Calvin,' Clark's 'Palestine,' 'Robinson Crusoe,' Jay's 'Sermons,'" etc.

The third library was founded in Southport in February, 1830, under the name of "Mill River Social Library." In this the cost of life-membership was ten dollars. Of life-members there were Jeremiah Sturges, Hezekiah Davis, Julius Pike,* Simeon Sherwood, and Joseph Bulkeley.

The fourth was formed in Greenfield in May, 1830, when the members agreed to constitute a joint stock by subscribing five dollars apiece. This time they purchased Arnott's "Physic," "Phrenology," Gibbons' "Rome," "Geology," and works of a similar character.

The fifth was at the Southport public school, which was established in 1858 by Mr. Frank D. Brinsmade, the principal of said school, who raised by public exhibitions a sufficient sum to purchase two hundred volumes, of which there are only two known to be in existence.

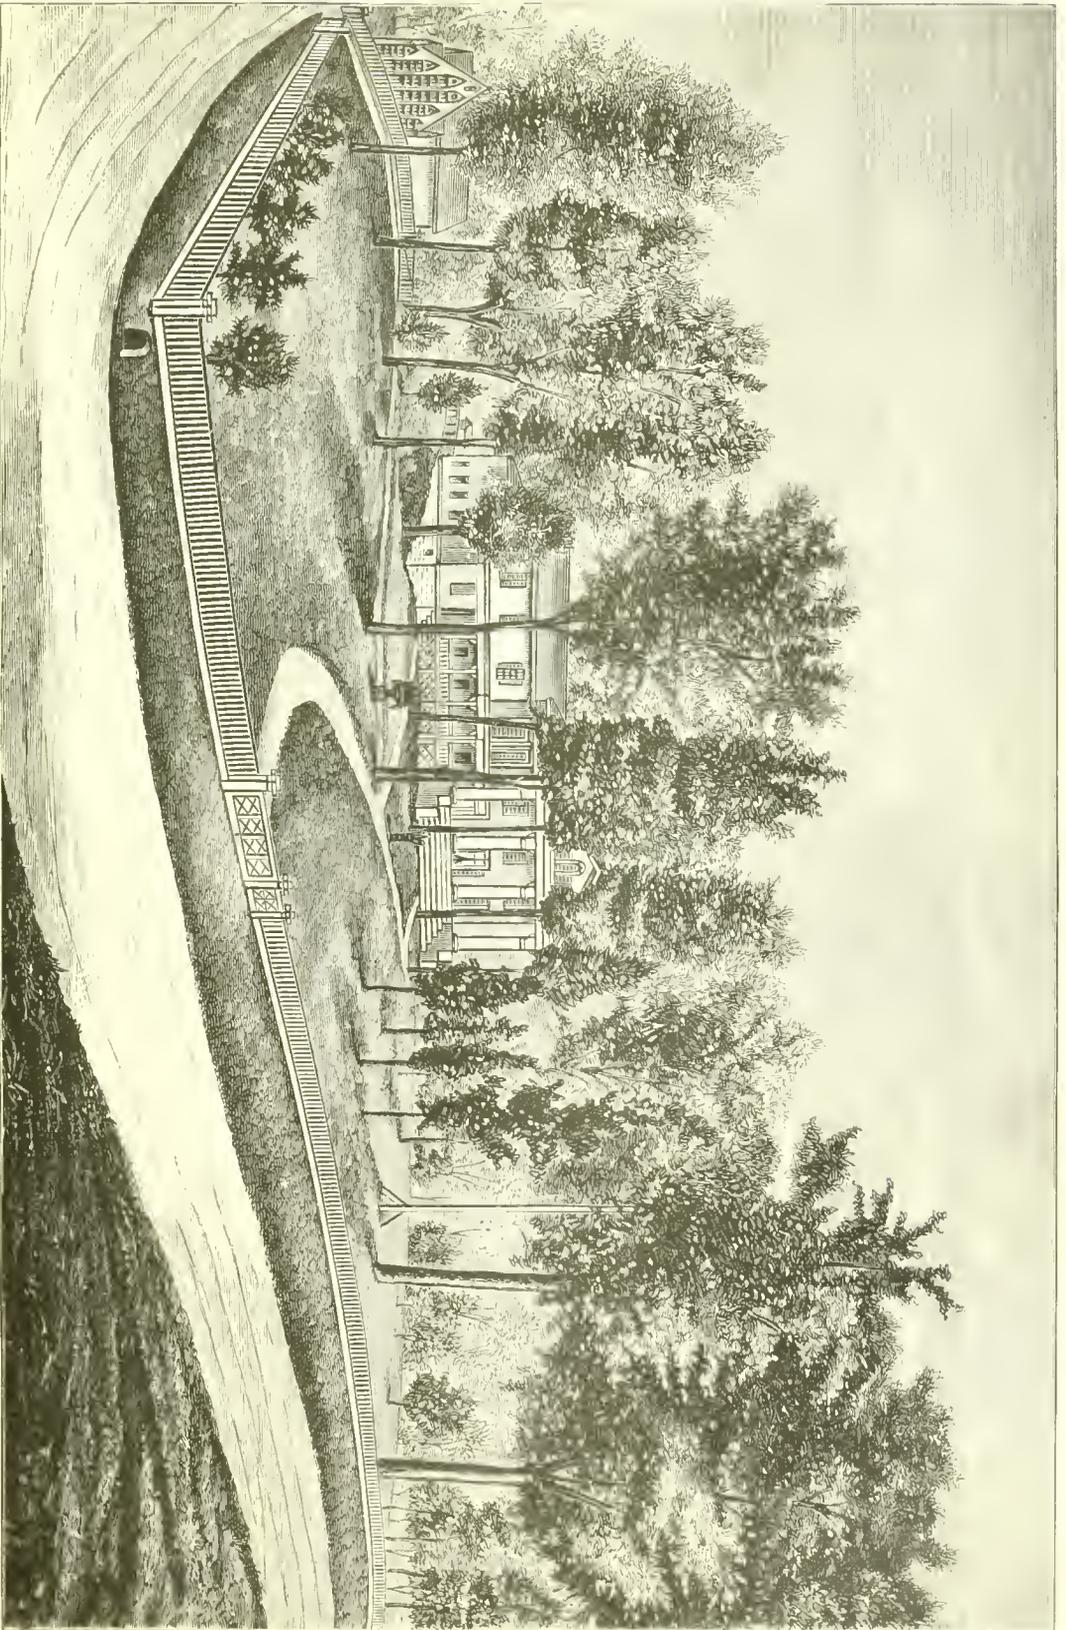

The sixth is the "Library Association of Mill Plain," abbreviated to "L. A. M. P.," which was established in 1871. The founders were Miss R. S. Carew, Ebenezer Burr, Jr., and Mrs. Burr Perry. It was originated by the latter, and began with no public meeting, but was started with one dollar by Mrs. Perry for capital. It has a circulating library of more than seven hundred and fifty volumes, has been successful, and retains its popularity. It is the only library organization in the town that has never changed its principal officers. It has been largely augmented through the donations of Mr. D. M. Redfield and his sisters, Mrs. Lounsbury, of Portchester, and Mrs. John Abendroth, of New York.

The seventh library was founded in Greenfield about the time the "L. A. M. P." was organized, and had for a nucleus the remains of its former libraries. The people of Greenfield preserve a warm interest in its behalf. It also numbers over seven hundred and fifty volumes, and is a decided success.

The eighth was organized in Southport in 1875. Two hundred and fifty dollars were subscribed by private individuals, which sum was increased by yearly dues. This library was given to the temperance organization.

The ninth, and last, was the "Memorial Library," given to Fairfield in 1876 by Mr. Morris W. Lyon, who donated the generous sum of one thousand dollars for its establishment. Mr. Lyon is a native of Fairfield, but for the past twenty-four years has resided in New York, where he still has a collegiate institute for boys. The original directors were: Rev. Drs. E. E. Rankin (who, leaving town, resigned), Samuel Osgood (who deceased while he was its popular and efficient president), Rev. James K. Lombard (present president), and Messrs. J. H. Glover, O. B. Jennings, Deacon Samuel Morehouse, and Deacon H. W. Curtis (deceased). At present it has a circulation of one thousand volumes.

Mr. Lyon has recently added a large sum to the original gift, and proves himself a benefactor to the literary world and to his native town.

The Mill Plain school also owns the "American Cyclopaedia" complete (this is also in Greenfield and Fairfield libraries); so that, with the reference books in all the public libraries, the readers in Fairfield are well accommodated. But, this being a wealthy town, there is not that need of circulating libraries which there would be if so many private individuals had not such extensive ones of their own.

SCHOOLS.

The first reference to schools in the old town records is under date of Dec. 27, 1661, as follows:

"Whereas ye town hath formerly voted y^e school-master shall have ten pounds towards his wages out of ye town-rate; and it is now ordered for ye fifteen pounds y^e remains of his wages it shall be paid by ye master and parents of such Children as need teaching from six years old and upwards; and if any shall send their Children under six years old or girls they shall be esteemed payable scholars."

From that time to the present a lively interest has ever been manifested in the educational training of the youth, and the schools of Fairfield have ever been ranked among the best in the State.

The old academy on Greenfield Hill was one of the leading educational institutions of the day. It was established by Timothy Dwight, D.D., and conducted by him about twelve years. In 1838 it was being conducted as a young ladies' seminary, but has long since been abandoned.

For present condition of the schools, see General History.

THE SOUTHPORT TIMES.*

The managing editor of this popular family newspaper is Henry A. Van Dalsem, and it is issued early every Friday morning. It entered upon its third volume Nov. 1, 1880, and since its first issue has been twice enlarged to meet public demands; which tells its own story of successful growth.

Independent in principles, clean in its utterances, and representing the interests of Southport, Fairfield, Mill Plain, and Greenfield, it meets with a cordial welcome at pretty much all the family fire-sides in the town of Fairfield. Besides its managing editor, it has a corps of contributing editors, who, residing in the several villages which make up the township, not only write up the current news of their respective localities regularly each week, but also contribute original articles of pertinent interest. Its columns are also enriched with frequent communications from the leading literary, agricultural, and commercial people of the vicinity, which makes the journal invaluable to many subscribers in various parts of the country who claim Fairfield as their native town, and who through this pleasant medium are kept in regular correspondence with relatives and acquaintances.

While the Times presents each week a carefully-condensed digest of all that is going on in the world, and is breezy and gossipy, strict care is observed that its tone shall always be pure and wholesome. Abreast with the times as to topics and sentiment, conservative in politics and religion, fresh and interesting in matter, it merits the success attained.

THE FAIRFIELD ACADEMY.

This was organized Nov. 4, 1802. The largest subscriber was Gershom Burr, who gave sixty dollars to the fund. The first charter granted was in 1804, and was given to Hon. Jonathan Sturges and Samuel Rowland, Esq., as they were appointed by the proprietors of the academy to receive the same. The original trustees were Jonathan Sturges, Andrew Eliot, David Judson, Nathan Beers, Jr., and Samuel Rowland.

The first teacher was William Stoddard, who studied medicine with Dr. David Hull. He taught three years; salary, five hundred dollars per annum. There is one person living who attended the academy the first day it was opened to the public, and she is Miss Eliza Hull.

In 1808, Matthew Rice Dutton, who was studying under Dr. Heman Humphrey for the ministry, taught here and occupied the position two years. He became professor of mathematics, natural philosophy, and astronomy in Yale College. He was ordained first over a church in Stratford. He died in New Haven.

1810.—Samuel J. Hitchcock followed as preceptor for two years, with entire satisfaction. He received the title of LL.D., and became a professor of law in Yale College, and was judge of New Haven County Court. Died in New Haven about 1844 or 1845.

1811.—Samuel Turney taught for a short time. He was a native of Fairfield. He died in 1823.

1812.—Elihu W. Baldwin taught for the ensuing two years. He was a most estimable man, beloved and respected by all. After a long and successful ministry he was called to preside over Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Ind.

1814.—A Mr. Worthington followed for a short time, when Dr. Humphrey took charge temporarily till a permanent teacher could be found.

1815.—Orrin Fowler followed. He was born in Lebanon, Conn., July 29, 1791; graduated at Yale, 1815; taught the Fairfield Academy one year; entered the Congregational ministry; became a missionary in the West; settled in 1819 as pastor at Plainfield, Conn.; was twenty years a minister at Fall River, Mass.; often in the State Legislature; in Congress 1848-52; distinguished as a temperance and anti-slavery orator; author of a treatise on Baptism (1835), Historical Sketch of Fall River (1841); died at Washington, D. C., Sept. 3, 1852.

* By W. A. Beers.

1816.—George E. Pierce, D.D., born at Southbury, Conn., Sept. 9, 1794; graduated from Yale, 1816, and taught in Fairfield Academy two years. He graduated from Andover Theological Seminary, 1821; was ordained pastor of a Congregational Church at Harwinton, Conn., 1822; president of Western Reserve College, 1834–55; died at Hudson, Ohio, May 27, 1871.

1818.—Henry Dutton was preceptor for the ensuing two years. He was brother of the Mr. Dutton previously mentioned. He was a jurist, born at Plymouth, Conn., Feb. 12, 1796, and graduated at Yale in 1818, was professor of law in Yale (1847–55), became Governor of Connecticut in 1854, and was a judge of the Superior Court and Court of Errors (1861–66). He prepared several digests, compilations of State statutes, etc. He died April 26, 1869.*

1820. Rev. William Belden had the academy for two years. This school had a wide reputation until Mr. Belden had charge. There were many students who attended it from the South, as institutions of high rank were not numerous through the country. Mr. Belden had a large class of youths prepared for Yale College, but not one of them could pass examination! From that date the glory of the academy began to depart. Mr. Belden was settled as pastor of Greenfield Congregational Church from 1812 till 1821.

In 1821, "upon the petition of Gen. Gershom Burr, Samuel Rowland, and Roger M. Sherman, Esq., agents of the proprietors of Fairfield Academy," "at a General Assembly of the State of Connecticut holden at Hartford, a new charter was granted, the former having by accident expired."

1821,†—H. Benedict was preceptor.

1825,‡—C. Whittlesey occupied that position.

The trustees were men of considerable note in the world, and all at this period (1821–30) were of much local celebrity. They were the Rev. Messrs. Nathaniel Hewitt, Edward Hooker, Andrew Eliot, Leonard Bacon, Deacon David Judson, Hon. R. M. Sherman, and William B. Nash, M.D. But with all their learning, charters, and account books, the first mention of a teacher in all the academy records is in 1828, when the building was leased‡ to Rev. C. G. Lee, for which he paid no rent further than to keep it in repair. He taught this school in 1828, 1829, and 1830.

In 1832–33, A. A. Pettengill, the late editor of the Bridgeport Standard, acted as preceptor. The next mention in the records after Mr. Lee (1828) of a teacher is: "Voted, That Mr. Wallace be requested to continue his school for another year and that he have the use of the academy for that purpose."§ This was April, 28, 1836. Hon. Thomas B. Osborne, lawyer, trustee, and secretary, records in 1838: "Voted, That Mr. Tufts, of the Senior Class of Yale College, be contracted with to take the place of Mr. Carter, as instructor."¶

In 1839, Mr. James Tufts became the preceptor. He now is pastor of a charge in or near Rochester, N. Y. 1840, Deacon David Judson resigns. The Board "Resolved to tender to him their thanks for his great services and strict fidelity in promoting the interests of this Institution from its first establishment" (thirty-six years). Capt. John Gould was voted in as trustee in place of Deacon Judson resigned.*

1840–1850.—Among the teachers of this decade were Daniel March, now D.D., with a pastorate near Boston, Mass.,—an excellent instructor; — Marsh, who died recently while missionary to Turkey (with one of these men originated the famous "Iron Horse," his graduating poem at Yale); — Benton; Willis Atwater, brother of Prof. Lyman Atwater, of Princeton, N. J.

In 1847 it is to be regretted that the boys were very destructive, so much so this entry is made in the records: "Voted, That while we desire the pupils of the school to enjoy themselves in all reasonable sports and recreations, we strongly disapprove and exhort them to refrain from the practice of throwing stones or other dangerous missiles."

The next meeting recorded is in 1853, and the next in 1866, making about two meetings in nearly twenty years!!

In 1866 the rates for tuition were: For Greek, Latin, and higher mathematics, ten dollars per quarter per scholar.

Common and higher English branches, eight dollars.

Primary department, four dollars and seventy-five cents.

In 1867, E. E. Rankin, D.D., was elected a member of the board.

In the decades from 1810 to 1870 the academy was under the preceptorship of Mr. Morris W. Lyon, a native of Fairfield, a graduate of Yale; and since he taught in the academy he has established a collegiate institute for boys in New York City, which he has continued for twenty-four years. He also founded the Fairfield Memorial Library in 1876, to which he has donated greatly since. This library occupies the lower floor of the academy. He also originated the "Commemoration of the Burning of Fairfield, in 1779," which was very successful; Rev. Platt T. Holly, father of Mrs. L. N. Norton, M.D., of Bridgeport; — Chamberlin; Thomas H. Pease; Lewis Beers, a lawyer, who was established later in Norwalk, and died, aged thirty-five; — Dey; — Moore; F. S. Lyon, editor of Connecticut Republican, Norwalk, Conn.; and Geo. F. Robinson, a graduate of Yale. In 1867, Geo. F. Robinson resigned. While he taught here, Mr. Thomas Rowland, an inventor and builder of monitors, presented the academy with a quantity of various shaped blocks, which, when properly arranged, formed a perfect globe or ball. When nearly arranged the coins of the period, the prominent dailies, and all the names of the pupils at that time in attendance at the academy were placed in this ball. It was then gilded and placed on top of the building, where it is daily seen by passers-by.*

In 1867,† after various conferences and Rev. L. B. Stimson's agitating the question of starting a private school, Mr. A. P. Somes, a native of Lebanon, N. H., and a graduate of Dartmouth, was employed, with his wife, to take charge of the school, $1000 a year guaranteed to them by Messrs. John H. Glover, O. B. Jennings, A. W. Sanford, H. T. Curtis,‡ M. G. Betts,§ and D. M. Bunker.¶ The tuition per quarter of 11 weeks was raised to $10 for English, $12 for Latin and Greek, and $6 for the primary. The sessions for school were to be from nine o'clock A.M. to two o'clock P.M., during which a half-hour's recess was to be given.

In 1868 the committee, Capt. D. M. Bunker, reported the board $25 in debt, and Mr. Somes reported the want of seats and stove, and suggests that a Webster's Unabridged Dictionary would be a valuable acquisition to the academy!!! The seats and stove were obtained!!!

In 1870, Mr. Oliver B. Jennings donated $100 to the academy for the purchase of apparatus.

In 1871 the income of the school was $1250, and a committee of Messrs. O. B. Jennings, Samuel Morehouse, and Samuel Glover were appointed to increase the rates or guarantee a certain price. As blackboards were needed, a better mode of heating and repairs on the building necessary, the tuition rates were raised to $8, $12, and $14 per quarter.

In 1872 this entry is made: "Mr. A. P. Somes, who has taught the academy school for a number of years, resigned and left."‡

The statement is recorded "that so many children are sent away to school it was inexpedient to employ a male teacher,"§ so a Mrs. M. E. Powers, from Maryland, was employed, with a salary of $800 per annum guaranteed her. The pupils then numbered twenty.

In 1873, there being some dissatisfaction with Mrs. Powers, she resigned, and Mr. A. P. Somes returned and took the academy, to be conducted at his own risk, paying twenty-five cents per scholar for academy tax. School reopened September, 1874.

In 1875, Mr. Somes was to collect an academy tax of fifty cents per scholar for the use of the building. 1879.—Mr. A. P. Somes resigned, and Miss Lily Huntington¶ completed the scholastic year on the same terms as her predecessor.

An item worth mentioning is that during the time of Mr. Somes' connection with the academy, from 1867 to 1879, there was not a death occurred among his numerous pupils.

At an informal meeting of three, the trustees employed Mr. Thomas E. Rochfort to take charge of the academy at his own risk. In 1880, Mr. Rochfort resigned, and a vacancy ensued, which promises to be indefinite, owing to the high grade of studies and system adopted in our free public schools and the migratory habits of several of the wealthy families.

For more than two hundred years Fairfield was the queen of the county: the courts were held there till 1852, or thereabouts; its educational advantages for both males and females ranked very high; and it was formerly a port of entry. It had for these various reasons an enviable reputation, but time has changed all these things, and Fairfield's future glory will be accorded from its being a town noted for its healthfulness and beauty, as the drift of public spirit of late expends itself mostly on sanitary measures and aesthetic culture.

SAMP MORTAR ROCK.

About three and a half miles from the Sound, and near the centre of the township of Fairfield, is a wonderful natural curiosity, attractive not only for its grandeur, but for the tradition associated with it. In visiting Niagara one should obtain the first view by looking upward from the foot of the fall; here one should take the first view from the top of the rock, looking down into the ravine below.

Theory asserts that the origin of Niagara was through the wearing away by the water of the brittle stone till it formed the stupendous cataract witnessed at this period; it must assert that here was a modified glacier of diluvial structure, which has suffered greatly by some great natural convulsion.

Approaching this freak of nature from the direction of the Sound, there is not the least intimation of anything unusual till the visitor is brought suddenly upon it. Conveyances stop at the foot of a massive ledge of immense layers of stone, which appear to have been regularly broken, but through some great agency have been separated slightly. The impulse is to stop and examine the species of stone, to note the marked difference between the severed strata and the under surface of the layers as they project beyond their supports, the layers being as discernible as the component parts of pastry when they are improperly incorporated; in fact, the face of the rock is decidedly streaked. The top, seen from above, bespeaks granite; the under layer seems semi-perforated by symmetrical indentures, as if sand-swallows had attempted to build their nests in reversed positions. In front of this ledge a cart-path begins, which leads up a gradual inclination, across which are large stones which appear to bear grooves caused by much usage. The ascent is easy, and, the top once reached, a distance of a few rods brings one to the brink of a rocky precipice, over which he peers cautiously and passes on mindful of his steps, watchful that a proper margin is observed, so that, in case of a slip or a misstep, he shall not be instantly hurled into eternity.

After traversing a few rods the traditional mortar—a round hole in the rock capable of containing from twelve to sixteen quarts of corn—is found; also the footmarks worn in the rock by the person grinding—rather cracking—the corn are identified. This is said to be the place where the Indians were wont to carry their corn to be prepared for food.

At this point the descent to the ravine below has already begun. Another section of the ledge is at the left, and contains a cave accessible to an average-sized individual, where he may enjoy a dark retreat at his option. The contour of the rocks, trees growing from the crevices, is worthy of observation.

The ravine gained, one is desirous of obtaining a glimpse of the great precipice over which he so carefully looked a few minutes before. A few feet above him is an overhanging rock; several feet above this is another, of similar form, projecting still farther, and away above this is still another, from whose top a birch-tree a foot and a half in diameter at its root, with a uniform trunk of nearly a foot, rears itself as if proud of its situation and view, apparently as secure as in a forest on a level plain. At its root ferns of the polypod species furnish a bit of trimming for a border. Long rock-like shelves appear at intervals, upon which one would be secure from northwest storms. From various crevices good-sized trees are growing, where it would seem impracticable for plants to obtain a root hold.

The ravine is here blocked by a mass of large rocks, whose size is rendered insignificant from their proximity to those so much greater. These rocks are broken and detached, but if one is dextrous he may pass through, over jagged edges, underneath a huge rock spanning the chasm, underneath which is a small cave, where some animals of rodent proclivities have reveled in their feasts, and which would furnish comfortable quarters for a hunter or a fugitive escaping the law.

This blockade in the ravine has evidently been, ages ago, rock overhanging from the main ledge, and, falling, has broken into various immense fragments. The western portion, having an inward slope upward from the base, remains as when first formed and located.

FAIRFIELD (Continued).

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

The First Congregational Church—Congregational Church, Greenfield—Congregational Church, Southport—Trinity Church, Southport—St. Paul's Church, Fairfield—Methodist Episcopal Church, Southport—Roman Catholic Church, Fairfield.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, FAIRFIELD.*

THE foundation of this church was coexistent with the settlement of the town, and the first pastor was Rev. John Jones, from 1639 to 1664.

"This first date is five years earlier than one which appears in a history of Concord, whence he came. He was one of the two elders of the church in that place, being associated with Peter Buckley, who had the title of teacher, while Mr. Jones was pastor. He was the son of William Jones, of Abergavenny, in Monmouthshire. He entered Jesus College, Oxford, in 1624, at the age of seventeen. Coming to New England, Oct. 2, 1635, he was ordained at Concord, Mass., April 6, 1637, sustaining the relation of colleague minister at Concord for some eight years. On account of 'the poverty and meanness of Concord, together with the badness and wetness of the meadows,' a seventh or eighth part of the people of that place emigrated in 1644 to Fairfield, and Mr. Jones came with them. These Concord people, with the previous colony from Windsor and others from Watertown, formed the first community, the fathers and mothers of our church and village. Few traces are left of this, the earliest minister of this church. He bore, according to tradition, a most highly respectable character. His position and education in England gives lustre to the occasion of his emigration, for he came when few save those who were devoted to the cause of liberty were willing to encounter for its sake trials and privations such as we can hardly estimate. At the age of seventy he fell asleep, leaving six children.

"A daughter was married to Thomas Bulkeley, † son of Rev. Peter Bulkeley, and removed with her father to Fairfield, where he died in 1652.

"One son, John, graduated at Harvard in 1643, and another, Eliphalet, was the first minister of Huntington, L. I., where he died about one hundred years old.

"A copy of the will of Mr. Jones may be seen at the Probate office, and is a document of interest.

"Rev. Samuel Wakeman succeeded Mr. Jones in the pastoral office, and his ministry continued from 1665 to 1692. He appears to have been a man of mark, and was one of five ministers appointed by the Legislature in 1668 to proceed to Saybrook and devise a way of uniting the churches in some general plan of communion and discipline. This was forty years previous to the adoption of the Saybrook Platform, and appears to have been the first step towards forming a religious constitution in the State.

"In 1694, Rev. Joseph Webb became pastor of the church, and with his ministry commences its earliest records now extant. The society records date no further back than 1694, owing to the fire of 1779.

"The first deacon of the church whose election is mentioned was Lothrop Lewis, chosen May 29, 1729, and when in June, 1733, Deacon Lewis declined to serve longer, Capt. Moses Dimon was chosen to succeed him. May 29, 1739, we have the record again of the choosing of Mr. Lothrop Lewis as deacon. There is the name of another deacon on the records of the same date, for 'the church appointed Mr. Lothrop Lewis and Mr. Samuel Rowland a committee to take an account of the church's stock which was in the hands of Deacon Hill, deceased, and is now to be delivered to Deacon Dimon.' So Deacon Hill's name probably stood in the destroyed records.

"In Mr. Webb's day some of the inner workings of the church and society are seen. Thus, at a church-meeting in May, 1729, it was voted that the worshipful John Gold should set and read the Psalm, and in case he be absent or indisposed, that his brother, Mr. Samuel Gold, should do it.

"The Psalm was set and read in this wise: After the minister had given out its number, this chosen leader of song whose social position is clearly a high one, for he is called the worshipful, rose in his place and after reading the first line sung it with the aid of a tuning-fork, or perchance a violin, and then reading the second line went on with the music, and so on to the end of the Psalm. The version used was probably the quaint collection of Sternhold and Hopkins, for although Dr. Isaac Watts was a cotemporary with Mr. Webb, his version of Psalms and hymns did not come into use until a later day.

"It was not until more than thirty years after the death of Mr. Webb, and late in the pastorate of Mr. Hobart, his successor, that the society voted and agreed 'that the rendering of Psalms line by line in ye established religious congregation in this society shall be omitted for the future.' Mr. Webb's ministry seems to have been a pleasant and successful one, although it is evident from some hints in the records that late in its continuance both he and the meeting-house in which he preached became sadly out of repair.

"The people showed their appreciation of his services by voting several years in succession an annual increase to his salary, and in March, 1732, the society voted to call some suitable person to assist him in the work of the ministry. Mr. Webb died at a place called Unity, on the 19th of September, 1732, and was brought home the next day and buried the day after. He was a Fellow of Yale College from the year 1700 until his death. Respecting his family no account is found further than several of the members lie in the old burying-ground.

"Rev. Noah Hobart, who had been invited to assist Mr. Webb a few months before he departed this life, was called Oct. 30, 1732, to be pastor of the church. The salary promised was two hundred pounds, current bills of credit, or in silver money at eighteen shillings the pound, provided he resign the whole use of the parsonage to the society. This parsonage land seems to have been a somewhat extensive tract, and it was ordered by the society to be leased.

"He accepted the call and conditions, and was ordained by the Consociation of Fairfield County on the 7th of February, 1733.

"Mr. Hobart was born in Dingham, Mass., Jan. 12, 1706. He was the son of David Hobart, and grandson of Rev. Peter Hobart, first pastor of the church in that town. President Dwight gave this testimony concerning him: He possessed high intellectual and moral distinction. He had a mind of great acuteness and discernment, was a laborious student, was extensively learned, especially in history and theology; adorned the doctrine which he professed by an exemplary life, and was holden in high veneration for his wisdom and virtue. His ministry here covered a period of forty years, 1733 to 1773, and was one of great activity. He was largely engaged in controversy, especially with respect to the validity of Presbyterian ordination, which he successfully defended. Dr. Sprague writes of him that he lived to bury two wives, eight children, and one thousand and ninety-three parishioners. He died in great peace on the 6th of December, 1773, having on the Sabbath previous to his death preached twice with more than his usual animation. During his ministry David Rowland and Nathan Buckley were elected deacons. The old meeting-house seems to have been fast hastening to decay, and December, 1739, two disinterested persons, Messrs. Edward Lewis, of Stratford, and John Betts, of Norwalk, were appointed a committee to see and give their opinion whether it were worth repairing. Whatever the report of this committee may have been, the society decided to make repairs, and we may judge something of the nature of the building by the resolutions that were passed. It was voted 'to put in new sills, two lites between the posts, excepting where the doors are and that square where the pulpit is dark; the meeting-house to be covered with white-wood siding, the seats (benches, I suppose) to be put closer together, and pews to be built in convenient places, to be sold to pay for these repairs.' This luxury of pews (probably square with high backs over which the children could scarcely look) seems to have somewhat perplexed and troubled the good people of these early days. A committee had to be called in from Norwalk and Stratford to say who shall have the pew places and what price they should pay for them, and when some persons on their own responsibility erected something like them in the meeting-house, the society ordered these to be removed and such persons to be hereafter prosecuted. Time and again afterwards at the annual meetings of the society, and after a new meeting-house had been built, it was voted 'that no person should hire one who was not the head of a family, that no one should hire more than one, and that no one should bid for one unless he belonged to Mr. Hobart's meeting.'

"Six years after making the repairs alluded to a new meeting-house was ordered to be built, its dimensions to be sixty by forty-four feet, and twenty-six feet in height, with a steeple one hundred and twenty feet high. A bell was subsequently procured and the County Court asked to help obtain it and to use it, with which request it is uncertain whether the court complied.

"This bell was rung every night at nine of the clock, and afterwards also at noon. Thus the new sanctuary was finished, but not to be so lasting as its predecessor. The bell that tolled at the funeral of Mr. Hobart, in December, 1773, was doomed within less than six years to fall with the burning steeple on which it was hung.

"On the 7th of February, 1774, the society sent Mr. Elijah Abel to Cambridge, to wait on Mr. Andrew Eliot, Jr., of Fairfield, and as the result of this mission, Mr. Eliot was called to the pastorate of the church on the 4th of the following April, and, accepting the call, was ordained and installed on the 22d of June, 1774. On this occasion his father preached the sermon, and Messrs. Mather, Dickinson, Wells, Sherwood, and Lewis, all pastors of churches in the Consociation of Fairfield West, performed other parts of the service.

"Mr. Eliot was the son of Rev. Andrew Eliot, D.D., the distinguished pastor of the North Street Church in Boston, and was born in that city in 1743. After his graduation, in 1762, at Harvard, he was appointed to the office of butler in that college, and at a fire which destroyed the old building lost all his personal property. In 1768 he was chosen tutor, and in 1773 fellow of the corporation, which offices he resigned on coming to Fairfield. During his connection with Harvard, he preached often and with great acceptance at Boston and Cambridge, and brought gratifying testimonials from the ministers there of his learning, prudence, and piety, which his ministry of thirty-one years among this people fully justified. The society promised for his support one hundred and twenty pounds lawful money and use of the parsonage, he to release all claim and demand or use of lands called parsonage lands, except the lot called Applegate's lot, adjoining the house where John Whitear, Sr., once lived. The early part of Mr. Eliot's ministry was passed in the troublous times of the American Revolution.

"The latest record concerning the meeting-house built during Mr. Hobart's pastorate is as follows: At a church-meeting, April 25, 1779, voted that Messrs. Diodate Silliman, Peter Hendricks, Samuel Sturges, David Allen, Peter Jennings, James Penfield, Israel Bibbins, Jeremiah Jennings, and any others of the church and society who are skilled in psalmody, be desired to sit together in the gallery on the Lord's day and lead the congregation in that part of divine worship, they to agree among themselves as to the person who is to pitch the tune.

"May 6th, voted that the thanks of this church be given to Mr. Daniel Osburne, for his services in setting the psalm for the two years past. Here then we have another advance, showing that it is just ninety years ago last April since the occupation of precentor ceased, and a choir was introduced into the public services of the church. Although the names of only eight persons are mentioned, and these all men,—probably young men,—there can be no reasonable doubt that the others who were skilled in psalmody were of that gentle sisterhood, without whose presence the choir would have lacked the needful constituents of full and perfect harmony.

"There are several pages in the old record in the clear and beautiful handwriting of Andrew Eliot.

"The resignation to the will of God in this dispensation appears all the more beautiful when we remember that Mr. Eliot's house, which, with a few others, had been marked for preservation, was by some accident consumed, together with his furniture and a large and choice library. Thus for a second time was he called to pass through the fire.

"It was on Thursday morning that the church building was consumed.

"On the next Lord's day the church and the society met with the pastor and carried on religious exercises as usual at the house of Deacon Bulkeley.

"Afterwards, for five successive Sabbaths, public worship was conducted at the dwellings of Diodate Silliman, Peter Perry, and Justin Hobart, the Lord's Supper being celebrated at the usual time at the last-named place.

"An interval of three weeks followed, in which there was no service on account of the illness of the pastor, and then, after an afternoon service at the house of Elizabeth Morehouse, in Jennings' Woods, Mr. Justin Hobart's house was appointed the stated place of public worship, except that once in a month it was agreed to hold it in Jennings' Woods.

"This arrangement continued for a year, until Sept. 10, 1780, when the public service was carried on and continued afterwards in the new court-house.

"The conflagration of Fairfield in 1779 brought much distress upon the people, and an abatement of society taxes was made to those not able to pay. Mr. Eliot received some aid at the hands of his friends in Boston, but his salary was for a number of years sadly behind in its payments. The society sold the iron and nails of the burned meeting-house, and applied the proceeds to the building of the town-house.

Thither they were summoned for more than five years by the beating of a drum, and meanwhile were making efforts to rebuild their own sanctuary. An application was made to the General Assembly in 1782 for a grant of one thousand pounds, from confiscated estates, and such grant seems to have been made to them, as well as to Green's Farms and Norwalk. On the 19th of January, 1785, after inquiries as to the estimated cost had been made, it was voted and agreed in society meeting, more than two-thirds of those present voting in the affirmative, to proceed to the building a new meeting-house. The honorable court was petitioned at its next session to fix the place and set up a stake where it should be built. It was further resolved to have it made of the same dimensions as the last, and within the same foundations, if the honorable court approve. A tax of six pence on the pound was laid, and a subscription paper started.

"The frame was raised in June, 1785, and on the 26th of March, 1786, it was so far advanced towards completion that divine service was held in it, the pastor preaching both morning and afternoon from Genesis xxviii. 17: 'This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of Heaven.'

"The appearance of the building on this day of its dedication must have been far from prepossessing. The walls were unplastered, the gallery floors unlaid, and with no stairway. There were no casings around the steeple doors or gallery windows; the only seats were rough benches, and there was no permanent pulpit. Yet the people acknowledged God's goodness in bringing them on thus far. It was not until some eleven or twelve years after the meeting-house was occupied that it was fully equipped with a pulpit 'after Mr. Bullfinch's plan,' and with long pews, having a door at each end in its centre, and others, like those in the former church, next to the wall.

"In March, 1799, the following resolution was passed:

"Whereas, Col. David Burr has generously offered to paint the pulpit in the meeting-house at his own expense, he have liberty to do the same, provided the paint be of a light stone color.'

"It may be in keeping here to say that the generous spirit which actuated Col. David Burr is still alive in the society, as the fence they have put up bears testimony. Mr. Burroughs, the efficient and persevering pastor, endeavors to preserve it with various original and commendable efforts, which, united with the co-operation of the church, must certainly be successful.

"To return to the old meeting-house in which so many were wont to gather on every Lord's day. Eight of the long pews in front and eight in the rear were at first reserved in common, but subsequently some of these were ordered to be leased. A bell was procured and rung every day during the summer at twelve o'clock noon, and in the winter at nine o'clock at night.

"Mr. Eliot pursued the even tenor of his way, and among the earliest of the many children he baptized was William Henry Bibbins, who afterwards married his grand-daughter and died in July last. During his ministry four deacons were at different times appointed and solemnly ordained with prayer and the laying on of hands: David Judson, Jan. 7, 1787; Gold Selleck Silliman, at a date not ascertained; Daniel Osborne, Sept. 5, 1799; and Moses Jennings, 1804.

"Mr. Eliot died on the 26th of September, 1805, in the sixty-second year of his age. He left a widow and six children. One of his sons graduated at Yale College in 1799; was ordained pastor of the church at New Milford in 1808, and died in 1829.

"One of his daughters became the wife of Rev. Dr. Hewitt; another of Deacon Bibbins; a third of Dr. Wm. B. Nash, of Bridgeport; and a fourth of — Burr. His children's children are with us unto this day.

"Dr. James Dana thus wrote of him: 'In Mr. Eliot the bereaved flock have lost a judicious, affectionate, and faithful pastor, to whom God had given the spirit of fortitude, love, and a sound mind,—who attended continually on his ministry unentangled with the things of this life. The steady affection and esteem, the deserved estimation in which he was ever held by his brethren in the ministry, and his acceptance in the churches, are honorable testimonies to his worth, candor, and unfeigned piety, which, with the wisdom that dwells with prudence, were distinguishing parts of his character. His acquaintance with general science, his urbanity and friendly and social affections, conciliated the esteem of all ranks.'

"After Mr. Eliot's decease it was agreed that his salary be continued to the widow so long as the ministers of this district supply the pulpit, each one Sabbath, which probably they did.

"In March, 1806, Mr. Porter was invited to preach on probation, and on the 12th of January, 1807, Herman Humphrey was called on a salary of six hundred dollars. His history is well known by the whole church in New England, and his life-labors have left a deep and lasting influence for good upon the whole country. He was ordained April 16, 1807, and dismissed May 15, 1817. After a ministry here of ten years he was settled as pastor of the first church in Pittsfield, Mass., and subsequently became president of Amherst College, an office which he filled for many years with distinguished success. He was the first pastor of this church who did not die in the office. Dr. Humphrey prepared the confession of faith and covenant still in use. Two deacons were chosen during his pastorate, both in 1810, viz., Elijah Bibbins and Roger M. Sherman. The memory of both of these is fragrant, and to the latter, who adorned the Church and State alike by his wisdom, eloquence, and piety, the society is indebted for the commodious parsonage which it possesses.

"In the year of Mr. Humphrey's installation a remonstrance was made by the society against the removal of the court to Greenfield. Another specimen of the trust reposed by the society in the generosity of individuals appears in the following vote, April 4, 1815: 'Voted, that any person may at his own expense paint the outside of the meeting-house, under the direction of the society's committee.'

"On the 1st day of May, 1817, Consociation was called to dismiss Mr. Humphrey. He was an able and faithful minister, and among the fruits of his labors were eighty-nine persons who made confession of Christ during his pastorate of ten years. Of these, three remained on the roll as late as 1867. The last of these, Mrs. Deborah Bennett, died early in 1880, in New Haven, at an advanced age. Dr. Humphrey died in Pittsfield, amid the scenes where he had previously witnessed the greatest and richest trophies of the gospel, in the year 1861."

The successors of Dr. Humphrey were as follows: Rev. Dr. Nathaniel Hewitt, Dr. Hunter, Dr. Willis Lord, Alexander McLean, Edward E. Rankin, D.D., and G. S. Burroughs. The present church edifice was erected in 1849.

Engraved on a stone in the foundation of the church, near the entrance, is the following inscription:

"First Church built about A.D. 1640.

"Second Church built A.D. 1675.

"Third Church built A.D. 1747, and burned by the British, 1779.

"Fourth Church built A.D. 1783."

On a tablet on the other side of the entrance is the following:

"This Church erected MDCCLXIX."

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, GREENFIELD.

The petition for the organization of this parish was granted by the General Court, Oct. 14, 1725. It was incorporated as the Northwest Parish, and two years later its name was changed to Greenfield. At its organization Greenfield Parish embraced all the northern part of the original town of Fairfield, and in Dr. Dwight's days numbered one thousand.

CHURCH EDIFICES.

The first move towards the erection of a church edifice was made in 1726, when it was voted that a meeting-house, fifty-two by forty-two feet, and twenty-two or twenty-five feet between joints, should be built, but it was not completed and occupied until 1743. In 1760 a new meeting-house was voted, and completed in the following year. This was occupied as a place of worship until the completion of the next church, in 1818. This was destroyed by fire on the night of Nov. 11, 1853. In the following March it was voted to build a new church, which is the present structure.

LIST OF PASTORS.

The pastors of this church have been as follows: Rev. John Goodsell, who was ordained at the time of the organization of the church, May 18, 1726. He officiated until 1756; Mr. Pomeroy, from 1757-70; William Mackey Tennant, 1772 to about 1780; Timothy Dwight, D.D., 1783-95; Samuel Blatchford, 1796-97, as supply; Stanley Griswold, 1803-4, as supply; Horace Holly, 1805-8; David Austin, 1810-12; William Belden, 1812-21; Richard Varrick Dey, 1821, —he remained but a short time, and was succeeded for a year or two by Charles Nicoll; he was followed by Nathaniel Freeman, who remained nine years. In 1819, Rodney G. Dennis preached for some months; Thomas B. Sturges, 1842-67; R. P. Hibbard, 1868-72; Henry B. Smith, 1873; he was succeeded, in 1878, by I. O. Rankin, who continued six months. Rev. Chester Bridgman commenced preaching Oct. 1, 1879, and is the present pastor.

The following persons were pew-holders in the first church edifice erected: Joseph Wheeler, Benjamin Banks, Joseph Diamond, Nathaniel Hull, Daniel Bradley, Benjamin Gilbert, John Thorp, Joseph Banks, Samuel Wakeman, Daniel Burr, John Gilbert, Samuel Bradley, Benjamin Sherwood, heirs of Eliphalet Hull, Joseph Hill, Jabez Wakeman, David Williams, and Samuel Price.

The covenant in 1726 was signed by John Goodsell, Cornelius Hull, Obadiah Gilburd, John Hyde, George Hull, Peter Burr, Daniel Bradley, Theophilus Hull, John Burr, Stephen Burr, and Ebenezer Hull.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, SOUTHPORT.

The village of Southport was originally included in the parish of Fairfield. A general desire on the part of its residents to enjoy the privileges of the sanctuary within a more convenient distance led to the completion of a church edifice in their village in the year 1843.

A meeting of the brethren of the Fairfield Church residing in the village was held Feb. 18, 1843, at which it was resolved to take the necessary steps to organize themselves into a separate church of Christ, to be denominated "The Congregational Church of Southport." Letters were accordingly sent to five churches in the vicinity,—namely, the First Church in Fairfield, the First Church in Bridgeport, the Second Church in Bridgeport, the church in Greenfield, and the church in Norwalk,—inviting them by their pastors and delegates to meet in council "for the purpose of organizing a church of Christ in the Borough of Southport."

The council thus called met March 7, 1843, and, after hearing and approving the purpose of the petitioners, proceeded to organize them into a church of Christ. The number of members so organized into the new church was twenty-eight. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Atwater, of Fairfield. In the evening the house was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God, the Rev. Dr. Hewit, of Bridgeport, preaching the dedication sermon. On application, the church was received into the Consociation of the Western District of Fairfield County, June 6, 1843.

The house completed in 1843 was used by the church as its place of worship until 1874, when it was removed and the present handsome and substantial stone edifice erected on its site. This was completed and dedicated Feb. 2, 1876. The Rev. S. J. M. Merwin, of Wilton, the first pastor of the church, preached the dedication sermon from the text, "The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of Hosts, and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of Hosts." Hez. ii. 9. He was assisted in the services by the Rev. Dr. Atwater, the Rev. Charles E. Lindsley, and the Rev. George E. Hill.

The first members of the church were Mrs. Elizabeth B. Alvord, Elias P. Benham, Mrs. Rachael M. Benham, Mrs. Miranda Bulkeley, Levi Down, Mrs. Peggy Lacey, Frederick Marquand, Mrs. Hetty Marquand, Anna Osborn, Mrs. Eleanor Osborn, Jeremiah Osborn, Mrs. Abigail Osborn, Austin Perry, Mrs. Emily A. Perry, Mary A. Perry, Delia F. Perry, Francis D. Perry, Mrs. Ann Eliza Perry, Oliver H. Perry, Mrs. Eliza P. Robinson, Mrs. Mary A. Sherwood, Mrs. Mary B. Sherwood, Mrs. Catherine G. Sherwood, Edward A. Smith, Mrs. Esther M. Smith, Walter Thorp, Mary C. Thorp, and Maurice Wakeman.

The pastors of the church have been as follows: Rev. Samuel J. M. Merwin, ordained Dec. 18, 1844, dismissed May 3, 1859; Rev. Charles E. Lindsley, installed Feb. 29, 1860, dismissed Feb. 16, 1869; Rev. George E. Hill, installed March 22, 1870, dismissed Dec. 27, 1876; Rev. William H. Holman, ordained June 12, 1878, present pastor.

The officers of the church are as follows: Deacons, Frederick Marquand, Charles Lacey, Oliver H. Perry, E. Cornelius Sherwood, and Levi T. Sherwood. Superintendent of Sunday-school, John H. Perry.

The membership of the church Jan. 1, 1880, was one hundred and sixty-seven.

TRINITY CHURCH, SOUTHPORT.

It appears from letters preserved in the archives of the society, that in the year 1723, Dr. James Laborie, a French physician of eminence, who had left his native country towards the close of the seventeenth century and been "ordained by Mr. Kinglet, antistes of the Canton of Zurich," in Switzerland, taught and held service according to the usage of the Church of England, in his own house in Fairfield, on those Sundays on which Mr. Pigot preached in Stratford or some other place. In one of those letters, Dr. Laborie says, moreover, that he "came to this country as a teacher under the patronage of the Bishop of London,† and being disturbed by Indians in the vicinity of Boston, came to the colony and county of Fairfield, and began by an introductory discourse to act as missionary to the English and native inhabitants, but was interrupted immediately by one of the magistrates." This commencement of his efforts in Connecticut was probably made at Stratford, where he seems to have resided from 1703 till 1717.‡ But it appears from the records of this town that he resided in Fairfield as early as 1718; having bought at that time of Mr. "Isaac Jennings" a place known as "the stone house on the rocks," probably the same of which he afterwards said, in the letter just referred to, that he had "destinated it to the service of the Church of England." It seems probable, therefore, that some steps were taken at that time for the formation of an Episcopal parish and the stated performance of its religious services in this town. But I find no record of the organization of a parish here, separate from that of Stratford, until the year 1724. At the close of the preceding year, Mr. Pigot, removing to Providence, had been succeeded in the mission at Stratford by the Rev. Samuel Johnson, who, with another Congregational minister, the rector or president of Yale College and a tutor of the same institution, embraced the doctrines of Episcopacy in 1722, and was ordained in England, with his two friends and companions, by the Bishop of Norwich, acting in behalf of the Bishop of London. In one of his earliest communications to the society from Stratford, Mr. Johnson stated that his parishioners in that town had "lately opened their new church, called Christ Church," and that at Fairfield the people were also "vig'rously going forward in building a church."§ Soon afterwards he reported that "the church at Fairfield was going on apace," and that "the people at New London would also build with all expedition." And on the 10th of November, 1725, the day of the annual thanksgiving of the colony, he opened, with a "suitable discourse," the church which the Episcopals of Fairfield had built, and which they then named "Trinity Church." In that church, which seems to have stood on Mill Plain, a few rods northeast of the place where the

† His medical diploma, dated London, 1697, written in Latin, and describing him as the son of a celebrated physician of France, was recorded by the clerk of the Fairfield County Court in 1703. And in 1713 leave was granted him by the town of Stratford "to build a pew" in the Congregational meeting-house, where Mr. Blackhatch, one of the struggling and waiting churchmen of Stratford, then had "a pew."

‡ In a "registry-book" kept by Mr. Pigot and Mr. Johnson, at Stratford, there is a record of the appointment, in 1723, of two wardens and nine vestrymen "for Stratford," one warden and two vestrymen "for Fairfield," one warden and two vestrymen "for Newtown," and two wardens and three vestrymen "for Ripton," the warden for Fairfield being Dougal Mackenzie, and the vestrymen, James Laborie, Sr., and Benjamin Sturges. At the same time James Laborie, Jr., was one of the vestrymen for Stratford.

country seat of the late Jonathan Sturges now stands,* Mr. Johnson preached a part of the time for some two years, dividing his labors for the most part between Stratford and Fairfield. At the same time Mr. Henry Caner, a graduate of Yale College, but as yet too young to be ordained, read service in Fairfield whenever Mr. Johnson preached at Stratford and other places. He was "son of the Mr. Caner who built the first college and rector's house" at New Haven. His parents are generally supposed to have been Congregationalists.† But Dr. Trumbull calls England "the land of his nativity."‡

Mr. Caner was ordained in England, and appointed missionary to Fairfield in 1727, having been very highly recommended to the society and to the Bishop of London by Mr. Johnson, under whose supervision he had pursued his theological studies for some three years. And from the time of his settlement here until the Revolution this parish seems to have been established on a permanent foundation, and to have been generally in a very prosperous condition, exhibiting, in the leading facts of its history, a very interesting view of the gradual, steady progress of Episcopacy in Connecticut during those fifty years of its struggles against various adverse influences, British as well as American.

It is to be much regretted, therefore, that by the burning of the church and parsonage in the conflagration of the town in 1779, the ancient records of the parish previous to that time were destroyed.§ And it is hardly less to be regretted that there is also in the records of this town a singular omission, extending from the year 1722, when the Rev. Mr. Pigot began to preach in Stratford and Fairfield, to the year 1728, when Mr. Caner had taken full charge of this parish, and including the whole period of its organization and incipient stages. This singular circumstance is especially unfortunate on account of the importance of the period in question. It was evidently a time of much excitement and change in the public affairs of this town. And the omission of all the acts and projects of that period from the copy of records, which contains an account of annual meetings and votes of the town during all the rest of the time from 1661 to 1728, in the same book which has the original record of annual meetings and votes from 1729 to 1800, leaves us almost entirely to the testimony of one of the parties interested in certain important changes.

It appears, then, from the reports of Mr. Johnson to the society, that in the year 1724 the prospects of Episcopacy in this town were very favorable in some respects. Speaking of the sufferings of "sundry people of both sexes" who had been persecuted and imprisoned on account of their attachment to the Episcopal system, and expressing his fear that if not soon relieved people would be quite discouraged, he at the same time expressed his belief that "the whole town would embrace the church if they had a good minister at Fairfield," and added, "I have a vast assembly every time I visit them." Within a few months afterwards he had "in Stratford and the neighboring towns more than a hundred communicants," of whom about forty had been admitted to communion by him. And in 1727, just before Mr. Caner took charge of this parish, Mr. Johnson informed the society that there were about forty families of Episcopalians in Fairfield. These were, according to his account, "mostly of the poorer sort;" as Mr. Caner also testified in his first report of the state of his mission. It is evident, however, from various circumstances noted in the records of this town, and upon tombstones in its old burial-places, that the parish at that time embraced some persons who had been, for many years previous, men of much consequence and influence in the town, and the most of them, if not all, Congregationalists. The same fact is manifest from the success which attended an application made to the Colonial government at that time by the wardens and vestrymen of Trinity Church, Fairfield, for an alteration of the laws concerning the support of religion. A petition was presented to the Assembly, signed by "Moses Ward and Samuel Lyon, church wardens, and Dougal Mackenzie, John Lockwood, Nathan Adams, Benjamin Sturges, and others, in the name and behalf of all the rest of their brethren," dated May 15, 1727, stating that ten of them had been lately imprisoned for taxes, contrary to the Hon. Governor's advice, and notwithstanding solemn promises before given to sit down and be concluded in the affair; praying that the sums of money so taken from them might be restored; and declaring that if their grievances might be redressed, they should "aim at nothing but to live peaceably and as becometh Christians among their dissenting brethren." And, in response to this petition, an act was passed, providing that the taxes collected from Episcopalians for the support of religion might, under certain circumstances, be paid to the Episcopal missionaries instead of the Congregational ministers. This movement of the early churchmen of Fairfield, about a hundred years after the settlement of this colony, was the first effectual step ever taken towards the establishment of religious liberty in Connecticut; an object which it required about another century to accomplish. And that those zealous churchmen, so worthy of honorable remembrance, were persons of good character, against whom their adversaries could find no occasion, may be safely inferred from the previous existence of a custom disclosed by the early records of this town: the practice of expelling from its limits, by a public vote, those who from time to time became obnoxious on any account to the majority of the community; which may be supposed to have been thus kept very pure and select, from the highest to the most humble citizen.

* The tangible evidences of the locality of the church were a few tombstones, which have been recently removed and are awaiting re-setting in some place where they may remain undisturbed. They are at present in possession of Mr. Frederic Sturges. One of them was erected by Abraham Adams, a worthy founder and liberal benefactor of Trinity Church, who was probably buried, according to the times, near the church.

‡ The name of "Henry Caner" was enrolled in the "registry-book" of Mr. Pigot, upon the list of communicants at Stratford, "Sept. 2, 1722," and that of "Henry Caner, Jr.," by Mr. Johnson, "March 28, 1725." It may be well to observe here that while the original orthography of Mr. Caner's name was that which is here employed, the received pronunciation of it was doubtless indicated more precisely by Dr. Trumbull, who wrote it Caner, and by the early churchmen of Fairfield, who sometimes wrote it Caner.

In view of these and other similar indications that the period of the organization of this parish was one of much excitement and change in the social aspect as well as the public acts of this town, it is to be regretted on all hands that the record of its acts during that most interesting period of five or six years is wanting in the copy which was made from an "old book," and preserved evidently safe and sound, having never lost a leaf of what was transcribed. Some clue, however, to the posture of public affairs in this town at that interesting crisis may be obtained from a record of colonial acts, which is preserved among old manuscripts in the office of the Secretary of State at Hartford. It is in these words: "May 14, 1725. On advice of the infirmities of Rev. Mr. Webb, and the present circumstances of that society of which he is pastor, we"—the General Association of Congregational ministers convened at Hartford—"could not but think that their case called for a speedy visitation, and that nothing less would attain the end designed and so earnestly to be desired for that people, than an act of this Hon. General Assembly, requiring that one or more of the ministry from the several counties or associations of this colony be sent to convene at Fairfield for the consideration of their state and the application of proper expedients for their united continuance in the faith and established order of the church of Christ in the colony." Whereupon a resolution was "passed by the Hon. Assembly, that Fairfield should call some other orthodox minister to help Mr. Webb, that their sorrowful and sinking circumstances might be relieved."[†] one of his reports to the society, that Fairfield was "the chief seat of opposition" to Episcopacy, a remark in which he also had reference to the fact that the seat of the County Court and its prison were in this town.

Some idea of the state and materials of the mission at Fairfield, when Mr. Caner took charge of it after his ordination, may be gathered from a comparison of the small number of the communicants whom he found here as a lay reader under Dr. Johnson in 1725, namely twelve, with the number of families belonging to the parish in 1727, namely, forty. It is manifest from such a comparison that few of the early members of this parish were originally churchmen. Most of them were doubtless converts from the Congregational Society. This appears, indeed, from a remark of Mr. Pigot, in one of his reports, that "the people of Fairfield, Ripton, and Newtown, were very desirous of a minister, many of them having conformed to the Church of England." And the changes of this kind, by which a very promising parish had been gathered here before 1727, in part by Mr. Caner himself as lay-reader, seem to have increased very rapidly after his appointment to the mission of Fairfield.

The first church edifice, as mentioned above, was completed in 1725, and was located on Mill Plain, near the residence of the late Jonathan Sturges. In 1738 liberty was given to "the members of the Church of England, upon certain conditions, to erect a house for public worship on the highway near the Old Fields-Gate." It was fifty-five by thirty-five feet in size, twenty feet in height, "with a handsome steeple and spire of one hundred feet and a good bell of five hundredweight." This church was burned by the British in 1779, and for about twelve years the parish was destitute of a convenient place of worship.

The third church edifice was erected in about the year 1790, and was located on the parade-ground at Mill Plain. This was occupied until the completion of the fourth church building, in 1835.

Mr. Caner remained until 1747, when he removed to Boston, and was succeeded by Rev. Joseph Lamson, who officiated as rector until his death. He was interred in the old colonial burying-ground. He was followed in the ministry by Rev. John Sayre, who was rector when the town was burned by the British, in 1779.

The first rector of the parish after the Revolution was Rev. Philo Shelton, of honored memory, a graduate of Yale College, who was ordained at the first ordination held by Bishop Seabury, Aug. 3, 1785. Mr. Shelton commenced lay reading here about six weeks after the burning of the town, which he continued until his ordination, in 1785.

Rev. Mr. Shelton served this parish faithfully for nearly forty years. He died Feb. 27, 1825. He was born in Ripton (now Huntington), May 5, 1754. He was succeeded by his son, the Rev. William Shelton, who remained until 1829. He was succeeded by Rev.

* The remark of Dr. Trumbull (p. xix.) that "the first records of Fairfield were burnt," seems, by long repetition, to have established an impression very widely that the archives of this ancient town are not worthy of examination. But even the writer of a recent "History of the Indians of Connecticut" (De Forest) might have found here some interesting particulars of purchases of land from the natives if he had not trusted too far the strange report that "the records of Fairfield have been destroyed." Page 167.

[†] The first meeting of the Prime Ancient (Congregational) Society of Fairfield, distinct from "town-meeting," was held, according to its own record, on "the 9th of December, 1727."

Charles Smith. Mr. Smith resigned in 1834, and Rev. N. E. Cornwall, M.A., became rector, and officiated until 1854. The succession since that time has been as follows: J. S. Purdy, 1855-57; Rufus Emery, 1858-70; E. L. Wells, 1870-76; T. F. Caskey, 1877-79; C. S. Adams, 1879, present rector.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH.*

Early in the year 1707 the "Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts" sent out from England the Rev. Mr. Muirson,† who visited Fairfield at irregular intervals, officiating at the homes of families by invitation.

After the death of Rev. Mr. Muirson, which occurred in the latter part of 1708, occasional services were held by Revs. Talbot, Sharpe, and Bridge, of New York and New Jersey; but until 1722, when Rev. Mr. Pigot was sent out, no regular services were observed. It was at Stratford that Rev. Mr. Pigot was located, which town seems to share with Fairfield the honor of establishing the oldest Episcopal parish in our State, services being alternated between these places, and held at appointed occasions. The form was that of the Church of England and the house of Mr. Thomas Hanford the place of service when Rev. Mr. Pigot was present, although the Episcopalian families met formally every Sunday.

In 1723, Dr. James Laborie, an eminent French physician, came here from Stratford, and purchased the dwelling of Mr. Isaac Jennings, known as "the stone house upon the rocks,"—probably the same which he afterwards devoted entirely to the church, —in which he held services on the Sundays when Rev. Mr. Pigot was absent.

The first reliable record of the establishment of a separate and distinct organization of an Episcopal parish in Fairfield is that of Rev. Samuel Johnson, who succeeded Rev. Mr. Pigot in 1724, who regularly administered the rites of the Church of England, and who at this time reports: "The church in Fairfield is going on apace." Nov. 10, 1725, the day of annual thanksgiving appointed by the civil authorities, Rev. Mr. Johnson opened with an appropriate service and discourse the original Trinity church, which was located a few rods northeast of the present residence of Mr. Jonathan Sturges, in Mill Plain. A few tombstones, until quite recently, marked the spot, one of which bore the inscription: Abraham Adams, worthy founder and benefactor of Trinity Church.

Rev. Mr. Johnson divided his time between Stratford and Fairfield for about two years, being succeeded by Rev. Henry Caner, who was graduated at Yale College, ordained in England in 1727, and appointed missionary to Fairfield. From this period until the Revolution permanence and prosperity are indicated from the facts that the parish included one hundred and seventy families, and that in 1732 the church was enlarged, a gallery sufficient to seat two hundred persons being added.

It appears that even these extensive additions soon became inadequate, and in 1738 a more complete edifice was built on the highway, near Old Field Gate, where, a few years since, stood the Marine Hotel, destroyed by fire in 1860. This second church was a fine, conspicuous edifice. Its dimensions were fifty-five feet in length, twenty feet in height, and thirty-five feet in width, with a steeple‡ of the unusual height, at that period, of one hundred feet. Rev. Mr. Caner continued his work here until failing health in 1747 compelled him to seek a smaller parish, greatly to the general regret, as he was singularly beloved, and had been very successful in building up the church, which at his departure numbered among its congregation two hundred communicants. His successor was Rev. Joseph Lamson, a native of the vicinity, whose ministry of twenty-six years terminated only at his death, and whose resting-place is marked by a stone in the old burial-ground of the village.

Rev. John Sayre§ succeeded in 1774. He was a talented and successful clergyman, but, being a native of Great Britain, refused to sign articles prescribed by the Continental Congress, and seems to have been subjected to a temporary banishment to New Britain. This suspension, however, was of brief duration, as his parishioners soon effected his return, and he continued his offices until Trinity church was destroyed by the burning of Fairfield by the British troops, July 8, 1779. It is an act of historic justice to Rev. Mr. Sayre to state that he used every endeavor to avert the disaster by both protest and entreaty; that his private effects, including a valuable library, shared the general fate; and that, though he took refuge on a British man-of-war after the conflagration, the purity of his motives and acts was above suspicion.

One month after this terrible calamity meetings were held at the house of Mr. John Sherwood (the great-grandfather of Mrs. C. A. Short, to whom we are indebted for much valuable material in this church history), at which it was determined to erect yet another edifice, Mill Plain being again selected for the site. This edifice was the scene of the first ordination by Bishop Seabury, the first bishop of Connecticut, an event of the profoundest interest to all churchmen. The recipient of this peculiar honor was Rev. Philo Shelton, who served at the altar thus signalized upwards of forty years. He died in February, 1825. A memorial tablet built in the chancel wall was a conspicuous ornament, and he is still tenderly remembered by many now living as "the devout and dear old man who taught us the catechism."

Rev. William Shelton, the honored son of this revered father, succeeded, remaining until 1829, when he was called to St. Paul's Church in Buffalo, where, at the age of eighty-two, he still officiates (the writer of this has a letter, under date of July 30, 1880, in which this venerable divine and excellent gentleman tenderly alludes to his own and his father's connection with the church in Fairfield).

Rev. Charles Smith took charge in 1830, continuing four years, until a new chapel was built in Southport, and Rev. N. E. Cornwall assumed the duties of the two churches.

Regular services at Mill Plain now began to be infrequent, and were finally discontinued; the reason for which was that a majority of the attendants, who resided nearer Southport, were of opinion that the Mill Plain church was, in view of the size of the parish, a superfluity. A warm discussion arose, the matter was submitted to arbitration, a decision adverse to the minority was rendered, and to the great sorrow of Episcopalians in the vicinity, the Mill Plain church was torn down and portions of it utilized in the construction of a rectory at Southport. As a reminiscence recalling the prejudices of those times, it is well to record that the arbitrators whose votes turned the scale were Presbyterians, and a tradition has been handed down that the decision was not wholly disconnected with a Puritanic desire to put the "Church of England" as far away as possible.

It was nearly twenty years after that practical efforts were made to revive the parish and build another church. The families with Episcopalian preferences living here at that time might have been counted on one's fingers, but among them were men and women who were full of the spirit that builds up the kingdom of Christ. Of these, the names of Knapp, Glover, and Ogden deserve honorable place in history. To the late Henry A. Knapp, however, whose indomitable work, both of soul and hands, was, through many trying years, pre-eminently conspicuous, must be accorded chiefest honor for the permanent establishment of the present parish and church of St. Paul's in Fairfield.

The site of St. Paul's church is identical with that of the old county jail, where among criminals were incarcerated men who could not pay money owed their fellow-men, and from whence certain offenders were led to the whipping-post on the adjacent green to receive lashes "well laid on" that the stern justice of the period inflicted. It was here that a new jail was being built, when, luckily for the rural as well as spiritual beauty of the village, the county offices were appropriated by Bridgeport, and the ground, together with partially-built side-walls for the new prison, offered for sale. They were purchased by the parish for the nominal sum of one thousand dollars.

Again might it have been said, "The work of the church in Fairfield goes on apace," for presently these prison-walls were converted into a sanctuary of Him who came not to bind, but to unloose,—a change, too, that had the remarkable precedent recorded in the fifteenth chapter of Acts, where the prison at Philippi, in Macedonia, was suddenly transformed into God's temple, and trembling men fell down before St. Paul, crying, "What shall we do to be saved?" It was this scriptural scene that by its coincidence gave the present edifice its name.

It was a day of rare beauty—Tuesday, May 20, 1856—that the Right Rev. Bishop Williams consecrated the building to the beauty of holiness; when, instead of iron-clamped doors giving emphasis to the "rarity of human charity," portals were thrown wide in honor of One who never put forth His hand to scourge, save in the one instance of the money-changers, and whose precept, "Owe no man anything," was supplemented with the prayer, "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors."

The consecration sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Hallam, from the appropriate text, "He loveth our nation and buildeth us a synagogue." Seventeen clergymen, in their surplices, were present, besides the bishop, the church was crowded to overflowing, and a liberal offering was made to the funds of the new parish. The clergy dined at the house of Mr. John Glover; other hospitable homes were opened to friends who had come from far and near to share the glories of the day. Rev. C. S. Leffingwell was installed as rector, and the parish increased and prospered under his kindly supervision. He was called to a larger field, and his place filled in 1860 by Rev. Levi B. Stimson, who remained for eleven years. Rev. Frederick S. Hyde was the next successor, and on his resignation, at Easter, 1871, Rev. Andrew Mackie, Jr., entered upon the duties, and on June 1, 1873, was called to a Western parish. July 13, 1873, the charge of the parish was accorded to the present rector, Rev. James K. Lombard.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTHPORT.*

From about the year 1805 to 1820, Methodist meetings were held at Green's Farms in the houses of Peter Jennings and Noah Osborn, and in the school-house. Green's Farms formed part of an extended circuit, and was visited by the Conference preacher once a month. In the absence of the preacher, Bradford Croft, a local preacher, supplied for them. Ebenezer Washburn was the first preacher appointed by Conference; Samuel Croft was the first class-leader. He and Bradford Croft and Joshua and Peter Wakeman were among the first official members of the church. The Crofts and their wives, Mrs. Wakeman, and Mr. Stratten were among the first members of the church.

In 1820, when the Green's Farms church was built, there were about forty members. They worshiped in

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

OLIVER HENRY PERRY.

Oliver Henry Perry, son of Walter Perry, was born at Mill River (afterwards the borough of Southport), in the town of Fairfield, Feb. 21, 1815.

The genealogy of the Perry family in America, so far as it has been ascertained, begins with Richard Perry, the immigrant, who is frequently mentioned in the records of the New Haven colony from 1639 to 1647 as "Mr. Richard Pery," often as a freeholder, and at one time "Secretarie for the Court of New Haven." In 1647 he "had liberty to go a voyage." These memoranda indicate that he was a man of substance and of note in that colony, and it is supposed that he came to Fairfield and was the ancestor of the Perry family there,—viz., Richard, who died 1658; Nathaniel, who died 1682; Joseph, who died 1753; Joseph, Jr., who died 1753; Peter, who died 1804; and Walter, who was the third son of Peter, born at Fairfield, Jan. 8, 1779, and died March 1, 1834.

Walter Perry was a merchant and ship-owner at Mill River, and was a thorough and successful man of business. He married Elizabeth Burr Sturges, daughter of Joseph Sturges, who gave his life for his country, as elsewhere stated in this volume. They had ten children, the youngest of whom was Oliver H., the subject of this notice.

Mr. Perry was fitted for college at the Fairfield Academy, under Rev. Chauncey S. Lee, and entered Yale in 1830, at the age of fifteen, but was obliged to leave college during his Freshman year on account of ill-health, and, in consequence of the death of his father, did not return. He studied law at the Yale Law School from 1838 to 1841, and was admitted to the bar at New Haven, Dec. 8, 1841, but never engaged in the active duties of his profession. He was always, however, a public-spirited and patriotic citizen, and took a lively interest in everything that concerned the welfare of his native village, State, and country. The confidence of his fellow-citizens in his ability, fidelity, and incorruptible integrity is shown by the many instances in which the most important trusts, both public and private, have been committed to his keeping. In his native village he served as the active member of the several committees which designed and erected the school-house for the graded public school in 1851-52, the building for the Southport Savings Bank in 1864-65, and the new Congregational church in 1875. He was one of the projectors and original trustees of the Oak Lawn Cemetery Association in 1865; was for many years a director in the Southport Bank under its original charter, and also after its organization as a National Bank, and was warden of the borough of Southport from 1846 to 1854.

He also filled other posts of duty in the town and State, such as quartermaster of the Fourth Brigade of Connecticut Infantry in 1836; representative from the town of Fairfield in the General Assembly of 1847, 1848, 1849, 1853, 1857, 1859, 1860, 1861; and Speaker of the House of Representatives in 1859 and 1860. He was an unsuccessful candidate of the Whig party for State Senator in 1852, and of the Republican party for Lieutenant-Governor in 1867. He was elected Secretary of State in 1854, and was also one of the Connecticut commissioners for the survey and settlement of the State boundary-line between New York and Connecticut in 1859-60. In 1851 he procured the charter for the Southport Savings Bank, was one of its original trustees, and since 1865 has been its treasurer.

In 1875, Yale College conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts. He was one of the number that organized the Congregational Church of Southport in 1843 (which was an off-shoot from "ye ancient church" in Fairfield), and in 1878 he was chosen one of its office-bearers.

Mr. Perry was married Sept. 9, 1846, to Harriette E. Hoyt, only daughter of Hon. Eli T. Hoyt, of Danbury. Their children are (1) John H., born July 27, 1848; graduated at Yale College 1870, at Columbia Law School, New York, 1872; is now of the law-firm of Woodward & Perry, at Norwalk, Conn., and has three times represented the town of Fairfield in the General Assembly. In 1874 he was married to F. Virginia Bulkley, daughter of George Bulkley, Esq., of Southport, whose ancestry is given in another place.

(2) Henry H., born Dec. 8, 1849, graduated at Yale Sheffield Scientific School 1869; was a civil engineer for two years, and afterwards engaged in trade. He was married in 1874 to Florence P. Sanborn, daughter of William Sanborn, of Ashtabula, Ohio.

(3) Winthrop H., born Sept. 20, 1854; graduated at Yale College, 1876; was married in 1880 to Louisa Huidekoper, daughter of Prof. Frederick Huidekoper, of Meadville, Pa.

(4) Hattie H., born July 27, 1858.

This record of the public life of Mr. Perry would be incomplete without a tribute to his moral worth. A firm believer in the Christian religion, a diligent student of the Holy Scriptures, a humble follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, a man of prayer, and exemplary in all the relations of private life, he has always sought to promote "whatsoever things are true and honest, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report."

His influence in favor of the cause of education and public improvement and "pure and undefiled religion" will never cease to be felt in the community in which he resides, and throughout a wide circle of friends and fellow-citizens.

REV. THOMAS BENEDICT STURGES, only son of Joseph Porter Sturges and Laura Benedict, of Danbury, Conn., was born in Bridgeport, Conn. His grandfather, Lewis Sturges, was of English descent; married and had two sons,—viz., Isaac and Joseph P. He removed to Greenville, Ohio, where he followed farming until his death.

His father was a carpenter and joiner in the earlier part of his life, and later was engaged in the lumber trade. He was a member of the Congregational Church. He died at the residence of his son, Rev. Thomas B. Sturges, of Greenfield Hill, Conn., in 1861, aged seventy-six years.

The mother of Rev. T. B. Sturges descended from Thomas Benedict, an Englishman of noble qualities, who settled in Connecticut at a very early day. She died in 1850.

Rev. T. B. Sturges prepared for college under the tutorship of Mr. Hamlin, now Bishop Hamlin, of Ohio, and Dr. Judson,—two noble men long to be remembered by their pupils, many of whom are alive till this day, 1880. In the year 1831 he entered Yale College, from which he was graduated in 1835, and immediately went to Andover Theological Seminary, where he remained one year; thence to New Haven Theological Seminary, where he remained two years. After spending some little time in regaining his health, he went to Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., where: he was engaged as a pastor of the Congregational Church at that place. Here he made many warm friends, and would have remained, but the lake winds proved too much for him, and he was compelled to resign his pastorate, much against the wishes of his people and his own inclinations. It was here he formed the acquaintance of Hannah W., daughter of Chauncey Baker, whom he married, Aug. 16, 1841.

J. B. Sturgis

Samuel A. Nichols

Of this union five children have been born,—viz., Edward B., a lawyer in Scranton, Pa.; Laura E., at home; William H., a merchant in St. Louis; Frank C., a lawyer in Wilkesbarre, Pa.; and Annie M., at home.

Soon after his marriage, in the fall of 1841, he returned to his native place, Bridgeport, where he remained the following winter. During this time he preached for the Congregational Church at Greenfield Hill, Conn. June 10, 1842, he was installed pastor of that church, and continued in active duty, except a few months spent abroad, until the summer of 1867, when failing health compelled him to resign, since which time he has not engaged in any business. In 1869 he visited the Holy Land, Egypt, Turkey, and other places of interest, and remained six months. In 1872 he took his wife and two daughters and visited England, France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and many other countries, and returned in the fall of 1876. He now resides in Greenfield Hill, Conn. He was a good preacher, and a better pastor. He enjoys the confidence of his brethren in the ministry, and the love and friendship of those who know him.

SAMUEL ALLEN NICHOLS.*

Samuel Allen Nichols, son of Hezekiah and Anna Penfield Nichols, was born in the town of Fairfield, Conn., May, 1789. His father was a farmer by occupation. He had five sons and four daughters, of whom Samuel A. was the youngest. Samuel A. had such advantages for an education as the common schools of his time afforded. Thus he laid the foundation of an education which, aided by a life-long perusal of the best books and papers at his command, made him one of the best-informed men of his day.

On the 20th of March, 1816, he married Wilsana, daughter of Capt. Wilson Wheeler, who died at sea. Mrs. Nichols was born in Bridgeport, Conn., in 1789, and died in Fairfield, Conn., in 1857, aged sixty-eight years and three months. Their children are as follows: Abby B., Julia B. (deceased), Anna P., Jane A., John (deceased), John (2), Henry (deceased). He was a farmer and dealer in general merchandise. He was by choice and the general bent of his mind a Whig and Republican, and as such one of the leading men of his town. He was town clerk of Fairfield from 1837 to 1863, a period of twenty-six consecutive years, and the books kept by him attest his ability; selectman several years, and magistrate for many years. His efficiency and popularity were such that he was elected by a unanimous vote of both the opposing parties.

Mr. and Mrs. Nichols were members of the Congregational Church of Fairfield for more than forty years, and he was elected deacon of the same in 1840, which position he filled at the time of his death, Feb. 4, 1864. Deacon Nichols is spoken of by those who knew him as an upright Christian gentleman, a man respected by all. He was courteous in his bearing towards others, and thus won a host of friends. He was a man of trust, and occupied an honorable place in society. He took a great interest in town matters, and in a measure the citizens are grateful to him for the elms which beautify the green in Fairfield, as he assisted in setting them out, and in watering them through a drought till they were self-sustaining. He left a family of daughters, who are engaged in every good work, and are ladies of education, refinement, and culture, and one son. He was a firm friend, kind and hospitable to the poor, and the church found in him a strong pillar. As a husband he was affectionate and true; as a father, kind and indulgent; as a citizen, patriotic and benevolent, and as a man, honest. Mr. Nichols built a fine residence, opposite H. J. Beers', in Fairfield, which is occupied by his daughters, Mrs. Kippen, Anna, and Abby B. This family is descended from William Nichols, an early settler in Fairfield. (See "Colonials," 16, 18.)

WILLIAM WEBB WAKEMAN.

William Webb Wakeman was the eldest son of Jesup Wakeman, who was a lineal descendant of Rev. Samuel Wakeman, the second pastor, from 1665 to 1692, of the old church of "The Prime Ecclesiastical Society" of Fairfield, coexistent with the town itself. Samuel was the son of John Wakeman, who was the first treasurer of the New Haven colony, and one of the founders of New Haven. The genealogical order is: John, Samuel, Joseph, Stephen, Jesup, Jesup, Jr., and William Webb. Samuel was educated in part at Harvard College, and became an able and strong man. He was not only one of the ecclesiastical lights of his day, but exerted a large influence in State matters as well, and left his impress upon the legislation of those early colonial times. His "election sermon" before the General Court in 1685 called forth the thanks of that body, with a vote to print it at its expense.

Jesup Wakeman, fifth in descent from the above, was born at Green's Farms, in the then "West Farms Parish of Fairfield," Feb. 12, 1771, and settled in Mill River, a village situated at the mouth of the river of that name, in the western part of the town of Fairfield, now called Southport, and who, with the Perry and Bulkley families, by their industry and enterprise, may rightfully be called the founders of its prosperity.

* By Mrs. Kate E. Perry.

Jesup engaged in trade and navigation, in which he was successful, and died May 4, 1844, leaving for his children a comfortable inheritance. He married Esther Dimon, daughter of William Dimon and Esther Sturges, of Fairfield. They had eight children,—Susan, William Webb, Maurice, Zalmon, Jesup, Julia, Hetty, and Cornelia.

William Webb, the subject of this sketch, was born at Mill River, now Southport, on June 19, 1799. After his education at the "Fairfield Academy," he first went into business with his father at Mill River, and soon after engaged in navigation on his own account, and while yet a young man became master of his own vessel. He then embarked in the coast trade between New York and Salem and Boston, and while so employed had the misfortune to wreck one of his vessels near Holmes' Hole, in which was brought out his characteristic coolness and determination, for every man on board was sent in safety to the shore before he would leave his stranded vessel. He then extended his coasting trade to Georgetown, D. C., and to other Southern ports, and soon, with others, established a line of vessels to run between New York and Savannah, Ga. He was also engaged in the China trade, and was one of the first that sent his vessels to California after its annexation to the United States. With the increase of capital and of vessels, he found it expedient to organize a shipping-house in New York, under the firm-name of Wakeman, Dimon & Co., afterwards Wakeman, Gookin & Dickinson, and subsequently W. W. Wakeman & Co.

To the prosperous line to Savannah, a few years afterwards, Wakeman, Gookin & Dickinson added a ship-line to Galveston, Texas, known as the "Star Line," and which before the war of the Rebellion gave place to a line of steamers, by which for some years they carried on a large and profitable traffic.

Besides their heavy shipping interests, this house became largely interested in gold and silver mining in California and Nevada, and at one time acted as the New York agent for some of those mines.

On Oct. 29, 1833, Mr. Wakeman married Mary Catharine Hull, daughter of Lyman Hull and Amelia Bakley, of Hull's Farms, town of Fairfield.

Their children were: Eliza H., married Charles M. Taintor, of New York City; Delia M., married Dwight Baker, of New York City (both now deceased); Cornelia C., married Charles B. Tompkins, of New York City; William W., married C. Augusta Wood, daughter of Ross Wood, of New York City; Mary C., who died young; Jesup, married Elizabeth Dutton, daughter of James Dutton, of Utica, N. Y.; and Susan A.

Mr. Wakeman was by nature a man of great energy and force of character, and so he made his influence felt, and often paramount, in whatever he undertook. This not only gave him success in business, but made him a valuable acquisition to any cause that he was led to espouse. In all public movements that promised moral or material improvement to the place or people among whom he lived, he was ever ready by labor or contribution to give his efficient aid.

He warmly advocated, and was one of the committee to build, a suitable house for a good graded public school in Southport in 1851-52; one of the original trustees of the Southport Savings Bank in 1854, and of the Oak Lawn Cemetery Association in 1865.

He became a member of the Congregational Church of Southport March 7, 1847, and was elected to the office of deacon Jan. 5, 1849. His church life, like his daily life, was earnest and faithful to whatsoever duty called, allowing no ordinary obstacle to hinder or defeat its conscientious performance. True to his convictions, prompt in his engagements, and open-handed to the poor and needy, he was always found a staunch friend on the side of right, and an outspoken foe to whatever he esteemed to be wrong. His works live after him, not only in his wholesome example and consistent religious life, but in his testamentary benefactions to his church, and to the leading benevolent institutions of the day, bearing testimony to those objects which in his later years lay very near to his heart.

Late in 1868 he went to California to look after his Pacific interests, and while there was developed the disease which, after his return to New York, put an end to his life on the 19th of April, 1869, in the seventieth year of his age,—a true, earnest, well-rounded life.

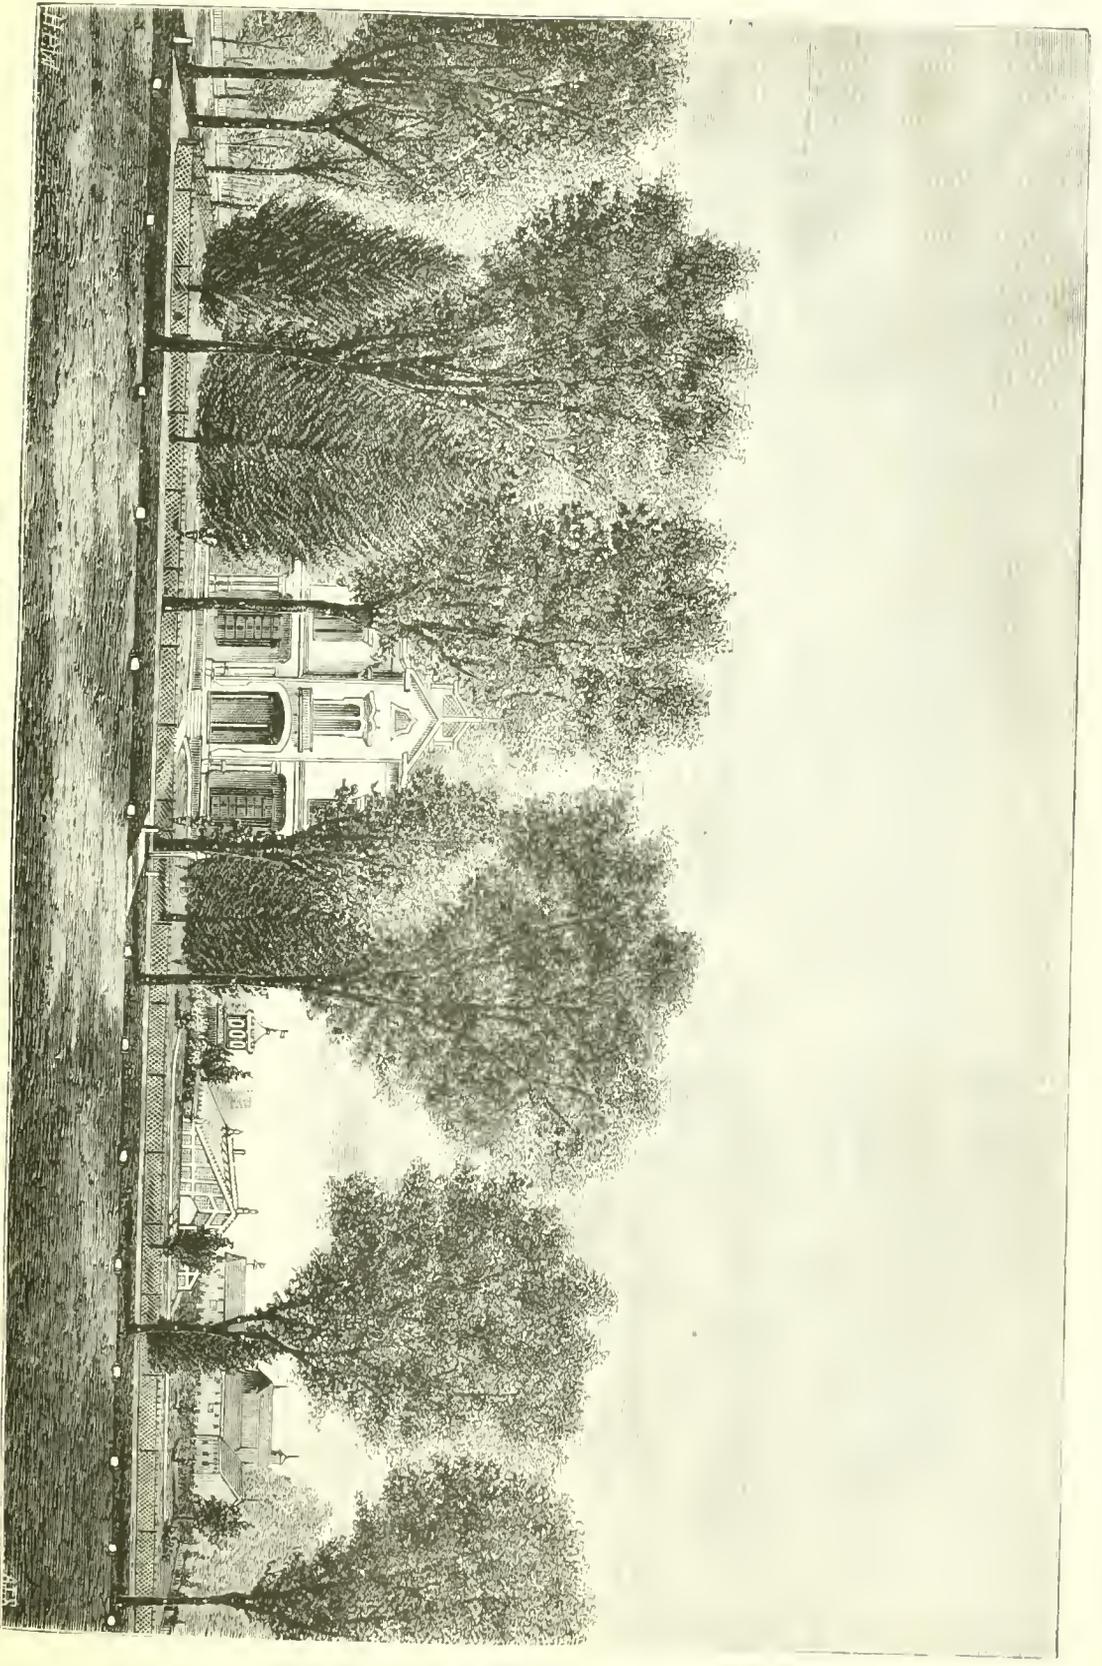

HENRY J. BEERS.

Henry J. Beers represents an old and honorable New England family, and was born in Fairfield in 1810. When a lad of fifteen he went to New York City; and, after serving diligently as a clerk for several years with a firm in the wholesale grocery business, a thorough knowledge of which his natural force and persistent application enabled him soon to acquire, he in connection with Peter L. Bogart formed a partnership in the same line. Under the title of Beers & Bogart the new firm started at 177 South Street, from whence they removed to 34 Broadway, where they, for upwards of twenty years, were widely known as a reliable and successful grocery-house.

Mr. Beers retired from active mercantile life in 1856 with a fair competency, and, returning to his native town, built the residence which the accompanying engraving fairly represents.

With the publication of this History, Mr. Beers enters upon his seventy-first year, and is as hale and hearty as if a quarter of a century younger.

Hospitable and open-handed, taking a lively interest in all that concerns his native town and its people, he has a large acquaintance, and commands that sterling regard that comes from manly straightforwardness and good citizenship.

Jesup B. Wakeman

Jesup B. Wakeman was a son of Jesup Wakeman, and was born in Southport, Conn., June 17, 1806. He received an academic education. He married Amelia A., daughter of James Jarvis, of New York City, Dec. 30, 1830, and to them were born three children,—viz., James J., Julia F., and Henry J.,—all of whom are dead.

Soon after his marriage he settled on a farm, where he continued to lead a quiet, unassuming life until his death, March 6, 1878. He was a member of the Episcopal Church at Southport. In politics he was a Republican. He never held any official positions, always preferring the quiet of home to official honors. He was a firm friend, a good citizen, and a kind husband. For a more extended history of the Wakeman family, see biography of William W. Wakeman.

CAPTAINS EDWIN AND CYRUS SHERWOOD.

Away back in the early history of England Sherwood Forest has often mention, and from the proprietors of that historic ground are descended the Sherwoods of Fairfield, Conn. It is an old, old family of good repute always, and leal and loyal ever. Thomas Sherwood, progenitor of the American Sherwoods, came to Fairfield from England before the organization of the town. He died about 1675. His son Thomas died about 1698. His son was Samuel. He had a son Daniel. This Daniel had a son who bore his own name, Daniel, and whose son, William, was the father of Capt. Edwin and Cyrus. The original place of settlement of Thomas was Hull's Farms, and here for two or three generations his posterity was born. DANIEL (2d) graduated from Yale College in 1756. His diploma, yet in existence, gives as the faculty at that time: Thomas Clapp, President, Jared Eliot, Ben Lord, Solomon Williams, and Noah Hobart. He married Abigail, daughter of Deacon John Andrews, of Green's Farms. He was a farmer and a magistrate, an office of dignity in those days. Their children were Abigail, born April 21, 1760, married 1779, died Dec. 24, 1814, mother of four children; Eleanor, born April 16, 1775,—no children; Elizabeth, born July 24, 1771, died Sept. 11, 1826,—no children; Daniel (3d), born June 8, 1761; Ralph, born Nov. 19, 1764; Justice, born Aug. 13, 1768; Abraham, born May 15, 1763, died Oct. 18, 1799; Walter, born Sept. 12, 1773, died Oct. 20, 1799, leaving no children; Aaron, born Nov. 28, 1766; Stephen, born March 2, 1779, had no children; William, born March 23, 1777.

WILLIAM SHERWOOD was a farmer and merchant. In politics, a Whig. He remained on the old homestead with his father until his marriage with Abigail Couch. She was born at Green's Farms, Aug. 14, 1782, was a member of the Congregational Church, and both her husband and herself died at Hull's Farms. His death occurred in April, 1844. From an old manuscript now in possession of Capt. Edwin Sherwood we give a synopsis of the American line of her descent. Thomas and Simon Couch were apprentices to a tailor in England. One finishing his apprenticeship, the other ran away, secreted himself on board of a vessel, and came to America with his brother. They landed at or near New Haven, and, holding up a stick, let it fall to direct them. Thomas went eastward, Simon, westward, as far as Green's Farms. The people at this place wanting a tailor, gave him a lot of land to settle with them. This lot lay on the hill near the bridge built over one of the branches of the New Creek, and commonly called Bridge Hill. He soon kept an inn, and, having married, had three sons, Thomas, Simon, and Samuel. Thomas received the best education the times and circumstances of the family could afford. Their father dying when they were young, unmarried men, Simon and Samuel agreed to send their elder brother to England (he having the best education) to receive an inheritance of five million dollars, which had there fallen. But at this time France and England were at war, and Thomas was taken at sea, carried into France, and never again heard of. Samuel settled at Benjamin Hill, about a mile northwest of the old burying-ground in Green's Farms. Simon had two sons—Thomas and Simon—and four daughters. Fourth generation: Simon Couch occupied his father's place at Turkey Hill; had four sons—Thomas, Simon, Gideon, Stephen—and three daughters, Sarah, Elizabeth, and Mary. So far the old manuscript. From another record we compile as follow: Simon Couch, grandfather of Mrs. William Sherwood, lived in a house on Great Lot, near the sea-shore, which was burned by the British during the Revolution. He afterwards removed to Redding Ridge, and married a daughter of old Capt. Nash, who lived near Green's Farms, on a place now belonging to Daniel Burr's estate. His son Simon was born at Green's Farms, in a house which was built by his father, in 1743. He married Abigail Chapman, Nov. 25, 1779. She was born Oct. 10, 1758. Their children were Simon, William, and Abigail, mother of Capt. Edwin and Cyrus Sherwood. All of the nine children—Simon, William, Edwin, Cyrus, Aaron, Albert, Abby, Elizabeth, and Mary—were born at Hull's Farms.

EDWIN SHERWOOD, son of William and Abigail (Couch) Sherwood, was born Feb. 24, 1805. He had a common-school education; at the age of seventeen left his father's farm and shipped as a sailor before the mast on a vessel plying between New York, Boston, and the Southern cities. He was mate for two years, and was master of a sloop of sixty tons, called "John," owned by Mecker & Sherwood, before he was twenty-one. About 1827 he became fourth owner of the brig "America," carrying one hundred and forty-seven tons, of which he was made captain. He ran her about four years; then purchasing an interest in the schooner "Georgia," two hundred tons, running between New York and Savannah, commanded her four years. Capt. Sherwood then superseded the "Georgia" by a brig carrying four hundred tons, which he built expressly for this route and commanded ten years, when he sold it, and has not been on active duty since 1845 or 1850.

Capt. Sherwood is now a director of Danbury and Norwalk Railroad, and vice-president of Southport Savings Bank, and, with his wife, belongs to the Congregational Church. He married Mary A., daughter of Deacon Joseph Hyde, Dec. 12, 1837. Their children are Edwin H. and Simon C. Edwin H. is a farmer at Omaha, Nebraska, and Simon also a farmer at the old home. Mrs. Sherwood was born at Green's Farms, July 12, 1813. She claims direct descent from Humphrey Hyde, whose name appears on the early records of the town of Fairfield as one of its earliest tax-payers, having possession of a large tract of land in what was called the "long lots." Her ancestors originally came from England, where, at different places, they have impressed their name on various locations, as Hyde Park, and left property valued at millions of dollars. Her father, Joseph, was born in 1761, married Arcté Jesup, and had a family of fourteen children, of which Mrs. Sherwood was youngest. Her grandfather was Joseph, born in 1739, and married Betty Sherwood. Her great-grandfather was John, third of the name, the father of the first being the Humphrey Hyde above spoken of. He was born in 1692, and married Rachel Holmes. John Hyde (2) was born in 1668, and married Rachel Rumsey. John Hyde, son of Humphrey, married Elizabeth —, and inherited from his father various tracts of land, in connection with his sisters, Hannah and Sarah, under will bearing date May 8, 1666, and recorded in records of the town of Fairfield on the same day.

CYRUS SHERWOOD, son of William and Abigail (Couch) Sherwood, was born Aug. 24, 1807. He remained on the farm with his father, receiving a common-school education, until he was about twenty years old, when he shipped as sailor before the mast on a vessel making trips from Southport to Providence. Shortly after he became captain of the sloop "Cornelia," running between Southport and New York. Following this for a year or so, he discovered that it was not good for man to be alone, and married, on March 6, 1831, Sally Bradley, daughter of Lyman and Amelia Hull, of Fairfield. For nearly fifty years this worthy pair have trodden life's pathway together, in peace and harmony with all, and with "kindness to all and malice to none" as a guiding maxim of their life. Soon after their marriage they settled on the old homestead of her ancestors. He left it once to engage with Wakeman B. Mecker and Simon Sherwood as captain of sloop "John." Selling his interest, he bought a share, with Capt. Joseph Jennings, in the sloop "Ganges." He was afterwards a merchant for a short time, but after he sold his store to Capt. Joseph Jennings he has made his home permanently on the farm.

Mr. Sherwood is a Republican in politics; has been selectman several years, member of the Legislature, and magistrate for a number of years.

Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood have only one child, Mary C., who married John Dimon Bradley, of Easton. She has one son, who is named Cyrus Sherwood, in honor of his grandfather.

Mr. Sherwood is a good citizen, a staunch friend, a kind neighbor, and has the esteem of a large circle of friends.

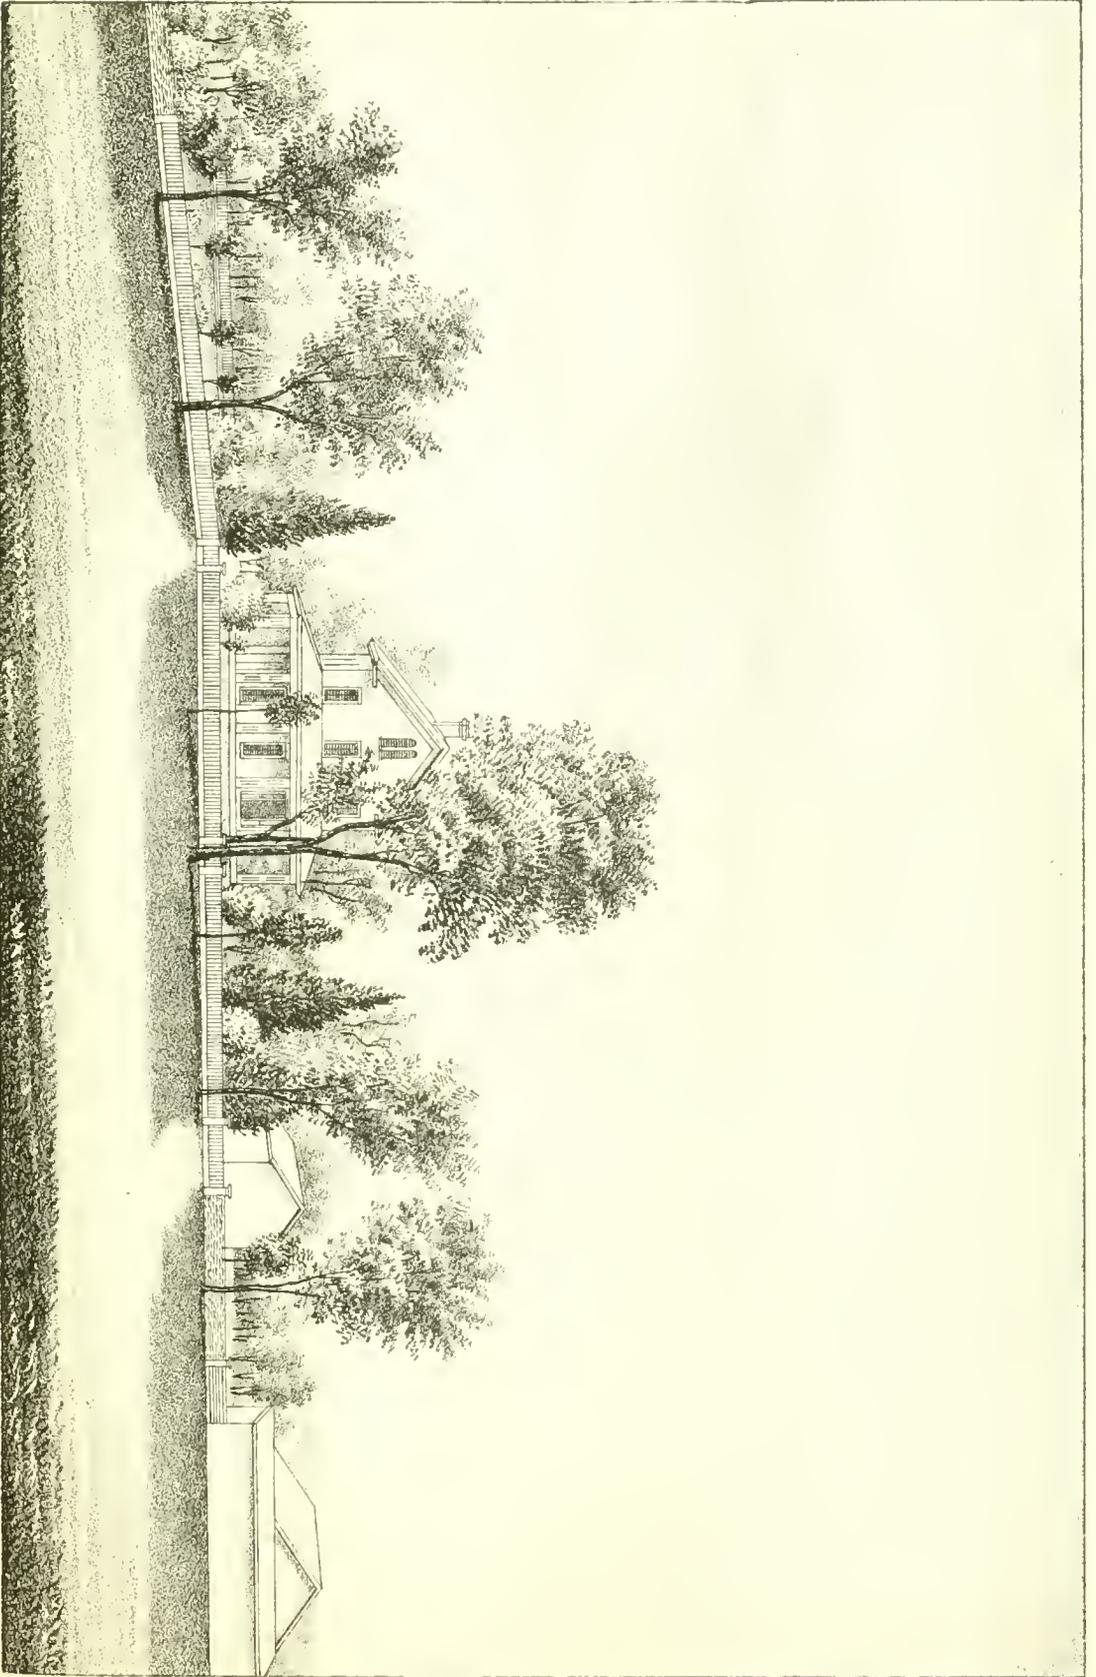

LYMAN HULL.

Lyman Hull, son of John and Eleanor (Sherwood) Hull, was born in the town of Fairfield, Aug. 22, 1776. He was a farmer, and resided always in the town of his birth. He was a quiet, undemonstrative man, caring little about publicity, and strong in his attachment for home and its surroundings. In 1798 he married Amelia Bulkley. Their children were Benjamin S., Eliza (Mrs. Simon Sherwood), Amelia Eleanor (Mrs. Capt. Joseph Jennings), Sally Bradley (Mrs. Cyrus Sherwood), Delia Maria (second wife of Capt. Joseph Jennings), Mary Catharine (Mrs. William Wakenan).

Mr. Hull was an attendant of the Congregational Church, and in his day was well considered by his associates. He was upright, generous, honest, and blessed not only with a fair share of this world's goods, but, better far, with that spirit of content which is more than riches. He died Oct. 11, 1822, from disease resulting from exposure while engaged in farming, leaving to his children the inheritance of an unblemished name.

The home of Cyrus Sherwood, on the place so long owned and occupied by Mr. Hull, is represented on another page.

EPHRAIM BURR.

The name Burr, formerly spelled Buer, is of German origin, but the ancestors having lived several generations in England are generally termed English. Between the years 1630 and 1640 three Puritans, heads of families, set sail for the New World, then, above everything else, attracting the attention of the bold and daring in every country of Europe. The first of these to arrive in this country was Jehu Burr. He came with Winthrop's famous fleet in 1630, and on his arrival settled in Roxbury, Mass.; thence he accompanied William Pynchon to the founding of Springfield, Mass., and eventually settled at Fairfield, Conn., where his descendants became the firmest pillars of the old colonial structure, and prominent in both civil and military affairs. The second was Benjamin Burr, who aided in the settlement of Hartford in 1635, and from whom has descended a very numerous and highly respectable family, known as the Hartford branch. The third was the Rev. Jonathan Burr, founder of the Dorchester branch. He was a man of fine education and eminent abilities.

Jehue, or Jehu, Burr was born in England about 1600, and died in Fairfield, Conn., about 1670, leaving a family of four sons, perhaps daughters, viz., Jehu (2d), John, Nathaniel (1), and Daniel. Nathaniel (1) was probably born in Springfield, Mass., about 1640, and settled with his parents in Fairfield; made freeman in 1664; was constable in 1669; representative during the years 1692, '93, '94, and '95. He was a farmer. He was twice married, and had two children by his first marriage, viz., Sarah and Nathaniel (2), and six children by his second, viz., John, Daniel, Ann, Mary, Esther, and Rebecca. His will is dated Feb. 22, 1712, and approved March 5, 1712.

Nathaniel (2) Burr was born in Fairfield, Conn., was a lawyer by profession and well reputed in the colony. He was deputy for Fairfield from October, 1697, until 1700. His children were as follows: Joseph and Nathaniel (3), twins, died in infancy, Sarah, Anna, Nathaniel (4), and Ephraim (1).

Ephraim (1) Burr was a native of Fairfield, Conn., married Abigail, daughter of Judge Peter Burr, Jan. 7, 1725. Their children were as follows: Eunice, Anna, Ellen, Ephraim (2), Ebenezer, Abigail, Sarah, and Peter, born Nov. 2, 1754. Ephraim Burr died in 1776, and his wife died in 1810.

Peter Burr married Esther, daughter of Dr. Seth Jennings, of Fairfield, Conn. Their children were as follows: Thaddeus, Sarah, Eunice, Anna, Esther, Abigail, Mary, Ephraim (2), and Ebenezer, or Eben, all of whom were born in Fairfield, Conn., and all had families except Mary.

Peter Burr was a farmer. He died July 4, 1816.

Ephraim (2) Burr was born in Fairfield, Conn., Oct. 7, 1794. He remained at home until he was twenty-two years of age, except some six months which he spent in coasting, and while thus engaged he was taken prisoner by the British in the war of 1812 and retained sixteen days. He then returned home and worked on the farm.

He married Eunice, daughter of Daniel Sherwood, May, 1823. Of this union two children were born, viz., Henry S. and Frances. Henry S. went to California, where he died in 1871, and left one son, Henry S.

Capt. Burr has been a farmer, and many years ago owned an interest in a vessel. He was for many years a captain of a company of State militia. He is one of the staunchest Republicans in the town. While he is not a member of any church, he gives to the support of the Congregational Church. His wife died June 9, 1864, aged seventy-two years.

BRADLEY H. NICHOLS.

Bradley H. Nichols, son of Ephraim and Mary (Bradley) Nichols, was born in Fairfield, Conn., in September, 1792, and died in the same town, Nov. 8, 1874. Ephraim Nichols was a tanner and carrier and boot and shoemaker. Bradley was early initiated into his father's business, and followed it until his love of agriculture caused him to become a farmer. Into this new employment Mr. Nichols carried not only a love for rural life, but the system and precision acquired in the practical business life of his early manhood, and was a thorough, successful, and good farmer. Through all the changes of his long life he never forsook the farm, but continued a live, progressive agriculturist until his death. He had a large stock of vitality, inherited from his Puritan ancestry, and, with a genial and social nature, was universally a favorite.

Mr. Nichols married Charlotte, daughter of Isaac Banks, a former resident in Fairfield, Jan. 19, 1815. Their children were Susan W., who married Zalmon Wakeman, an influential citizen of Fairfield, who left her a widow in 1865, and Eleanor Maria, who married William Bradley, a farmer, and formerly a merchant at Greenfield Hill.

Intelligent, of quick perceptions, ever active in works of progress and improvement, Mr. Nichols was held in high repute by his many friends and those who met him in business relations, and when, in the fullness of a hale old age, he was called away from earth, all felt the loss of an honest man.

ISAAC BANKS was born May 26, 1766, and married Eleanor Sturges, who was born May 20, 1765. They had four children,—Eleazar (deceased), Charity, Charlotte, and Horace. Mr. Banks died Dec. 26, 1810. His wife survived him six years, dying Feb. 19, 1847.

This town lies in the southwest corner of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Westchester Co., N. Y.; on the east by the town of Stamford; on the south by Long Island Sound; and on the west by Westchester Co., N. Y. The surface of Greenwich is hilly, and the soil is very fertile.

INDIAN OCCUPANCY.—PETUQUAPAEN.

Prior to the advent of the white settler this was one of the most thickly-settled portions of the Indian country, the permanent residents at Petuquapaen numbering about five hundred. The ruling sachem was Ponus, who died prior to 1640, having long wielded a powerful influence among the various tribes of the East. Wascussue, a brother of Ponus, was the ruling sachem of the Rippowams, at Stamford. The tract of land embraced within the bounds of what may properly be styled Petuquapaen extends from the present boundary-line between Stamford and Greenwich westward to the two streams known as the Brothers. On the west of this tract, extending to Byram River, was Miosschassaky, and still west of Byram was a smaller village, known as Huseco, which was located not far from the present village of Portchester, N. Y.

THE INDIAN PURCHASE.—THE DEED.

The first purchase from the Indians of land lying within the bounds of the present town of Greenwich was made by Capt. Daniel Patrick and Robert Feaks, July 16, 1640. The following is a copy of the deed which conveyed the lands to Patrick and Feaks:

"Was Amogeron, Sachem of Asamuck, and Rammatthone, Nawhorone, Sachems of Patomuck, have sold unto Robert Feaks and Daniel Patrick all their rights and interests in all ye severall lands betwene Asamuck river and Patchuck, which Patomuck is a little river which divideth ye bounds betwene Capt. GREENWICH MANOR.

The purchase was made ostensibly under the auspices of the New Haven colony, but Patrick, who, with various others of the early settlers, not regarding with favor the Puritanical restraints of the church, and having received but little assistance from that colony when the Dutch laid claim to the land included within his purchase, signed the following deed:

"Whereas, we, Capt. Daniel Patrick and Elizabeth Feake, duly authorized by her husband Robert Feake, now sick, have resided two years about five or six miles east of the New Netherlands, subject to the Lord States General, who have protested against us, declaring that the said land lay within their limits, and that they should not allow any person to usurp it against their lawful rights, and whereas, we have equally persisted in our course during these two years, having been well assured that his Majesty the King of England had pretended some to this soil; and whereas, we understand nothing thereof, and cannot any longer presume to remain thus on account both of this strife, the danger consequent thereon, and these treacherous and villainous Indians, of whom we have seen so many sorrowful examples enough. We therefore be-take ourselves under the protection of the Noble Lord States General,

His Highness the Prince of Orange, and the West India Company, or their Governor General of New Netherlands, promising for the future to be faithful to them, as all honest subjects are bound to be; whereunto we bind ourselves by solemn oath and signature, provided we be protected against our enemies as much as possible, and enjoy henceforth the same privileges that all Patroons of the New Netherlands have obtained agreeably to the Freedoms 1642, IXth of April, in Fort Amsterdam.

" DANIEL PATRICK.

"Witnesses, EVERARDUS BOGARDUS, JOHANNES WINKLEMAN."

Greenwich now became a manor, with Patrick and Feaks as patroons.

INDIAN TROUBLES.

For five or six years after the first settlement (1640-46) the people of Greenwich had much trouble with their Indian neighbors, the indirect cause being rum,—"cussed fire-water," as the savages called it,—brought of the Dutch at New York. To begin with (1642), some Dutch traders, a drunken Indian, cheating in a bargain for furs, and a murdered Indian, all near New York. Next, the killing of two Dutchmen, as an offset to the murdered Indian. Next (February, 1643), by way of retaliation, the treacherous and indiscriminate butchery, by order of the Dutch Governor, of more than one hundred sleeping Indians, men, women, and children, who had fled into the city for refuge from the pursuit of a band of Mohawks. Next (summer and fall of 1643), in revenge for such a deed of infamy, a general Indian war, waged by a confederacy of fifteen hundred warriors, up the east side of the Hudson, on Long Island, and on the Sound, eastward from New York, as far as Stamford,—everywhere murders, burning buildings, desolation, all the atrocities of savage warfare.

Ann Hutchinson was among the victims. Says De Forest, "Until the last moment the Indians came to the house in their usual friendly manner; then the hatchet fell, and the ill-fated woman perished, with seventeen others, in the massacre. To close the scene, the horses and cattle were driven into the barns, the barns were set on fire, and the helpless animals were roasted to death in the flames." So great was the devastation and so wide-spread the alarm, that the settlements were well-nigh broken up all along the shore from Stamford to New York.

Greenwich at that time being under the jurisdiction of New York, the settlers called on the Dutch Governor, Keift, for help. Accordingly (January, 1644) one hundred and twenty men, in three vessels, were sent to Greenwich, where their commander was informed by Capt. Patrick of a large encampment of the enemy a short distance inland. It was nearly night, but, desiring to surprise the Indians, the Dutch at once set off, and marched all night in a mistaken direction without finding the object of their pursuit. Next day the Dutch captain met Patrick; accused him of treachery and of purposely giving false information, and finally gave him the lie direct. The altercation resulted in Patrick's death. The Dutch force soon returned to New York, having succeeded only in surprising a small Indian village, killing eighteen or twenty men, and taking a few women and children prisoners.

Soon after, receiving fresh news of a great body of savages at Greenwich, Governor Keift (February, 1644) dispatched a second expedition in quest of them. The force consisted of one hundred and thirty men, under command of Capt. John Underhill, who reached Stamford in the evening and in a heavy snow-storm, which detained him there all night. Next day he made a slow march through two feet or more of snow, and about eight o'clock in the evening reached the Mianus River, where he rested two hours till the moon rose. Crossing the river at, or not far above, the present village of Mianus, and ascending the high western bank not far north of the present main road between Greenwich and Stamford, he had in front of him "Strickland's Plain," lying to the north and northwest of the present village of Cascob. On the western border of this plain, half a mile distant, he could see the lights of the "long-sought-for Petuquapaen,"—a village containing "more than a hundred permanent huts," partially protected by palisades, with numerous outside wigwams, the whole village being under a low wooded rise of ground, which sheltered it from the northwest winds. The savages had warning of the approach of their enemies, and were prepared to give them a warm reception. Only the warriors held the village, the women and children having been sent to a place of safety.

Space is wanting for a full description of the midnight battle, which was long and desperately fought. The undisciplined valor of the red man, with his bow and tomahawk, was no match for the musket, the bayonet, the broadsword, in the hands of the whites. The savages finally betook themselves to their fortified dwellings, but not till nearly two hundred of their number had fallen. Within their rude defenses they fought obstinately, till the terrible lesson taught to the Pequots a few years before recurred to Underhill's mind, and the fearful order, "Buru 'em out!" rang through the midnight air. The huts were built of bark and other light materials, and took fire as readily, almost, as tinder. In a very few minutes the whole village was in flames, and its wild and tortured tenants were yelling and howling in the agonies of despair and death. Such as darted out of the inclosure were mercilessly shot down by the soldiers who surrounded the village; and of the whole body of warriors who were gathered at the spot not more than eight or ten, at most, are supposed to have escaped.

The Dutch passed the night on the field they had so signally won, "warmed and cheered" by the fires which suffocated and roasted their enemies. The morning revealed a horrid sight. More than six hundred—some authors say more than one thousand—dead Sinaways lay bathed in blood over an area whose circumference must have been considerably less than one mile.

THE EARLIEST SETTLERS.

Daniel Patrick was a fighting Englishman from Massachusetts; he had bravely seconded Mason in the Pequot war and in the great swamp-fight in Fairfield. He was shot dead in Greenwich in 1644 by a Dutch officer into whose face he spat on being called a liar. He was high-tempered and reckless, scarcely fearing God or man, and indefatigable in promoting the interests of the settlement he planted. It is believed that no descendant of his is now living in Greenwich.

During 1640, Capt. John Underhill settled on the Patrick and Feaks' purchase, where he lived till his restless nature led him to New York in 1644, and finally to Killingworth, where he died in 1672. A warrior also, he was wounded at the burning out of the Pequots, in which engagement he was with Mason; he fought and defeated the Sinawoy warriors in a hard-fought battle; and, like Patrick, he had turned his back on Massachusetts on account of her Puritanic restraints.*

Jeffere Ferris was an early settler, whose descendants now abound in "Old Greenwich." Several Dutchmen were among the first comers, and one of them, Cornelius Labden, left his name to a ninety-foot precipice, now known as Labden's Rock, over which he is said to have plunged on horseback rather than be taken prisoner by some pursuing savages.

Among the first settlers also were the following: Robert Heusted, Andrew Messenger, John Winkelman, Angell Heusted, Richard Williams, Everardus Bogardus.

The prophetess, Ann Hutchinson, spurned by Massachusetts, lived secluded in Greenwich forests till a band of Indians hunted up and murdered both herself and family in 1643.

The numerous Meads, Hensteds, Peeks, Lockwoods, et alia, now residing in Greenwich are representatives of its early people. Such Dutch settlers as escaped the wrath of the savages soon gravitated, under political stress, to New York, with their families, and few, if any of them, are now represented among the people of Greenwich.

Up to 1665 the little settlement, now under the jurisdiction of the New Netherlands, showed no marked signs of activity. Among the few who came in 1656 were the ancestors of the Hubbards, the Studwells, and the Hobbys. Peter Disbrow, John Coe, and Thomas Studwell settled about this time, and Jeffere Ferris returned from Fairfield, whither he had gone when the town was ceded to the Dutch. John Mead and John Hobby settled in 1660. This year the settlement numbered about twenty adult males.

From this time on the settlement increased with

* He had also been bearer of dispatches to Queen Elizabeth, confidential servant to the Earl of Lancaster, Governor of the Dover colony in New Hampshire, etc.

marvelous rapidity, and not much time elapsed ere Greenwich became peopled by an intelligent and sturdy class of settlers, who have left their impress upon their numerous descendants. Meetings were held and in 1666 a school-house was built, but no record or tradition tells us of its location or who had the honor of wielding the pedagogue's sceptre.

In 1669 a demand was made by Daniel Patrick, son of the pioneer, Capt. Daniel, for all the land which had been formerly owned by his father. A compromise, however, was finally effected, and for a horse, saddle and bridle, and fifty pounds he relinquished "all his right, title, and interest in any land or estate in the settlement."

HORSENECK.

West Greenwich (now the borough) was called "Horseneck," from a peninsula of high ground, now known as "Field Point," west of Greenwich Harbor, and one and a half miles southwest of the borough, the peninsula having been a horse pasture.

Horseneck was purchased of the Indians in 1672 by twenty-seven individuals, known as the "27 Proprietors of 1672," as follows: Ephraim Palmer, Jonathan Reynolds, or Renolds, John Hubbe (Hobby), Stephen Sherwood, Joseph Mead, John Bowers, Joseph Finch, William Rundle, John Mead, John Asten, Jeremiah Peck, John Palmer, Walter Butler, Samuel Peck, Joseph Seres, Angell Heusted, William Hubbard, Samuel Ginkins (Jenkins), William Ratere, John Marshall, Jonathan Lockwood, John Renolds, Gershom Lockwood, James Seres, Thomas Close, Thomas Close, Jr., Daniel Smith.

CHURCH MATTERS.

The town now seemed to manifest a decided interest in church matters, and, although there had been occasional preaching prior to 1676, this year at a "full meeting" it was resolved to call a minister. A Mr. Nizwale was accordingly called, but, he not accepting, two years later, in 1678, a call was extended to Rev. Jeremiah Peck, of New Jersey, who was one of the twenty-seven proprietors mentioned above. He promptly accepted the call, and in the fall of the same year settled in the town, receiving for his salary sixty pounds.

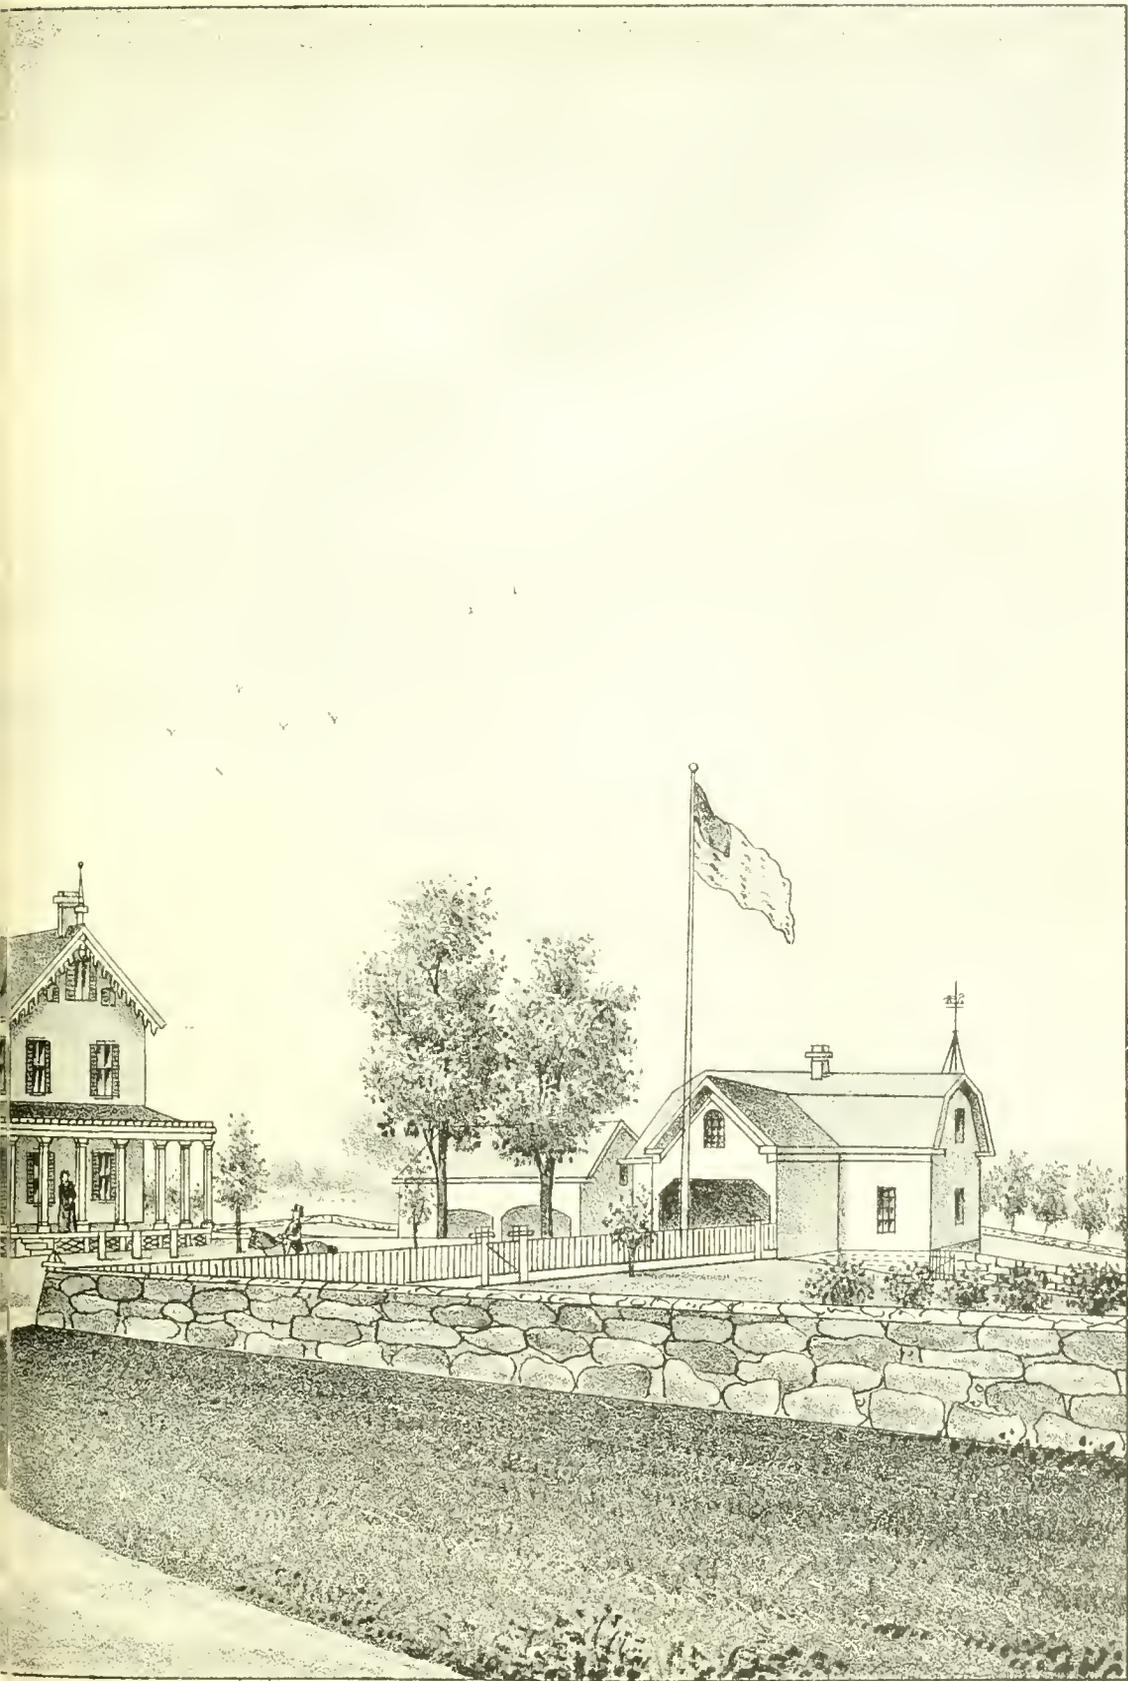

THE FIRST MARRIAGE, ETC.

The first recorded marriage in the town is that of John Mead, Jr., and Miss Ruth Hardey, by Rev. Mr. Peck, in 1681. In 1685, Lieut. Lockwood died, and the town passed resolutions of regret. In this year a saw- and grist-mill was erected at Dumpling Pond. In 1686 the Indians sold nearly their last acre of land in the town. These lands were on the western bank of the Myanos, near its mouth.

During the year 1687 permission was given to the citizens of the town to build fish-pounds on the seashore "anywhere outside ye fields." John Mead, Jr., was elected constable, then the most remunerative as well as important office in the gift of the town. Gershom Lockwood and his brother William during this year agreed to build a bridge across the Myanos at Dumping Pond, and receive in payment whatever the town should see fit to give after the work was done.

EARLY VOTERS.

In 1688 the legal voters numbered about fifty, and the settlement had increased to three hundred inhabitants. The following is a list of the legal voters in 1688: "Jonathan Lockwood, Angell Heusted, Joseph Mead, John Mead, Joseph Ferris, John Renalds, John Hubbe, Meriam Hubert, James Ferris, Jonathan Renalds, John Bowers, Joseph Finch, Meriam Hubert, Jr., Thomas Lyon, John Banks, Thomas Close, Frances Thorne, Nathaniel Howe, Joseph Palmer, William Rundle, Gershom Lockwood, John Marshall, Daniel Smith, Jonathan Heusted, Ebenezer Mead, Ephraim Palmer, James Palmer, Walter Butler, Samuel Peck, Rev. Jeremiah Peck, John Mead, Jr., Henere Rich, Jonathan Mead, Joshua Knapp, George Hubbard, Joseph Heusted, Angell Heusted, Jr., John Renalds, Jr., Peter Ferris, Thomas Hubbe, John Hubbe, Jr., Job Ferris, Jonathan Lockwood, Robert Lockwood, Caleb Peck, Joseph Mead, John Mead's son, Joseph Mead, Joseph Mead's son, Joseph Knapp, Jr., John Tash."

In 1689 it is voted that "ye towne per vote hathe agreed to bye a bulle." In 1691 it was voted to have a new meeting-house; and John Mead, Sr., John Mead, Jr., John Hubbe, Daniel Smith, and Samuel Peck were appointed a committee to procure materials and build the house. A subsequent meeting made its dimensions thirty-two feet long, twenty-six feet wide, and fifteen feet high. A controversy which lasted for years concerning the site delayed the putting up of the building. It was finally built upon a small rise of ground northwest of the old burying-ground in Old Greenwich.

The selectmen for this year were Daniel Smith, Jonathan Heusted, Joseph Finch, and John Hubbe.

In 1703 it was voted that the town-meetings be held one-half of the time at "Horseneck." Prior to this time the meetings had been held at "Old Greenwich."

The following are extracts from the records:

"At a Town meeting having Date May ye 4 1704 the towntaking into consideration that which hath formerly been Don by ye towne in order to Mr. Nathaniel Bowers settling in the towne hath been inbeductal & considering Mr. Bowers hath promised to setle at Horsneck if ye inhabitants did not call him to office on ye East sid Mianus river & being informed Mr. Bowers Desires to leave ye town these things considered ye towne pr vote see cause & reson to invite Mr. Bower to setle at Greenwich towne plot on ye west side Mianus river which if Mr Bowers sees cause to except, Then ye town doth promis & Engage to make suitable provision for himself & for setting him in his ministerial office."

"At a town meeting, December ye 19: 1704: The Town per vote grant Liberty unto Corinul hethent to build low small sloops sun where about Mianus river."

"Furthermore, moved ye towne put it to vot whether Mr. Bowers should have fifty-five pounds, and it passes in the Negative"

"Furthermore, ye town pr vot do not Desire Mr. Bowers to continue any longer in ye work of ye ministrye in Greenwich"

"Furthermore, ye Town per vot grant Liberty unto ye inhabitants on ye east sid mianus to bueld a mill upon any stream where they shall think convenient."

"Furthermore, the Town per vot do grant Liberty unto the inhabitants of greenwich living on the west side Mianus river, to build a tide mill upon Sticklin brook or Coseob river themselves or to employ some other person whom they shall think fit and likewise Do grant them use of ye streams for that end."

"At a meeting of ye Inhabitants of ye town of Greenwich on ye west side of Myanos river legally named and met on ye nineth day of June, 1705. Whereas, ye sd inhabitants have had a grant from ye town at a town meeting on ye 9th day of January 1704 of ye stream of ye tide or creek of Coseob river to own a grist mill, or employ whom the see cause therein the sd inhabitants have granted sd stream to Mr. Joseph Morgan to build a grist mill, and do therein oblige him, his heirs and assigns to grind for ye inhabitants of ye towne of Greenwich for about one 12 part of all the grain and do grant that toll and do oblige him and his heires assigns, to grind for said inhabitants what grain they bring to mill on Tuesdays and Fridays forthwith not to hinder them for strangers and do oblige him his heirs and successors by virtue of ye grant to keep a sufficient house for to secure ye grain yt is brought to sd mill."

THE FRENCH WAR.

In the beginning of this war Greenwich had no volunteer company, and several of the inhabitants were pressed into the service. "James Green," says the late D. M. Mead, "now long since dead, used to relate that while a company of young people, himself among the number, were quietly enjoying themselves at the tavern (then kept by one Mead, but now occupied as a dwelling-house by Epenetus Sniffin, Esq.), they were surprised by a press-gang and several of them forced into the service, while he with a few of others escaped from a window. After this time a regular volunteer company was raised. This company seems to have marched directly to Ticonderoga in 1759, and joined the Third Connecticut Regiment. One of the company, a Mr. Coit, residing in King Street, was mounted upon a rather sorry nag, which by the time the company had reached Nine Partners, in Dutchess County, had become quite leg-weary, and Coit, thinking perhaps that all is fair in time of war, took a noble horse from a pasturage and turned his own there instead, without any whys or wherefores with the real owner. His new horse did him good service during the company's stay at Ticonderoga, which was but little more than a month; and on his return the company halted, that Coit might deliver the horse to his owner. So well pleased was the latter with the boldness of Coit that he made the whole company stop for the night at his house free of expense. After the war Mr. Coit went to Vermont and settled there permanently; several years after, having become wealthy, he came to Greenwich in his carriage, and visited all his old comrades of the volunteer company."

Greenwich formed an association for the relief of the soldiers, of which Mrs. Abraham Mead was president.

An ancient powder-horn is still preserved by Col. Thomas A. Mead, upon which is almost perfectly delineated the relative positions and forts of the hostile armies while at Ticonderoga. This work was done by Dr. Amos Mead, who was surgeon of the Third Connecticut Regiment, while at Ticonderoga. The horn beside this chart has engraved upon it this inscription:

"Amos Mead
Surgeon of ye 3^d Conn Regt.
Ticonderoga October 1759."

At a town-meeting March 2, 1756, it was

"Further resolved that Mr. Nehemiah Mead should have liberty to sell the Town stock of Powder as soon as he can conveniently to ye Towns best advantage and lay out all the money that he shall sell said powder for, in powder that is good and put the same into Town stock as soon as he conveniently can."

In 1757, December 31, Monday,

"Voted to Mr. Edmund Brown and associates liberty to build a saw mill on Horseneck brook at Hangroot."

By this agreement Brown and his associates were to build and keep in repair the bridge at Hangroot, and be responsible for damages that might thereby occur by accident to any person.

The following record, taken with other similar extracts, shows that in 1758 the town-meetings were held alternately in all the places of worship in the town:

"At a Town meeting of the Inhabitants of the town of Greenwich, legally warned and attended at the House Built by the Professors of the Church of England in the Society of Horseneck on the top of the great hill on the Third Monday of December A. D. 1758, being ye 15th day of said month," etc., etc.

But on the 15th day of December, 1760, it was "Further Voted to Build a Town House and leave it to the authority and select men how large it shall be and where it shall stand."

"Further Voted that the Rate for building the Town House shall be paid by the first day of September next."

In 1767 the following petition was presented at town-meeting, relating to the dock at Coscob:

"To the benevolent inhabitants of the Town of Greenwich, in Fairfield County, the petition of Nathaniel Close, of said Greenwich, Humbly sheweth, that your Petr. being under a necessity of a store-house, as his performing a weekly Paquet or stage boat from here to New York lays both him and the inhabitants under a great disadvantage, in respect he hath no proper place to store the effects of his Freighters, nor for them to store what effects and produce they severally bring when his vessel is not there to receive it; which disadvantage hath been sensibly felt during the last summer. He therefore Prays Liberty of this meeting, that he may be permitted to build a store-house of 25 feet by 30, adjoining the Bank, between the Dwelling house of Mr. John Bush and the Gristmill of David Bush, so as to leave about sixteen feet from said mill road store, for a cartway, if need be, & that he may build it by the bank adjoining thereto, & to sd mill Pond; and as your Petr. conceives a House so built would incommode no particular Person, but be a General profit to the inhabitants, as well as your Petr. He therefore hopes that you, gentlemen, in your Prudence will grant his Request and your Petr. as in duty bound shall ever pray.

"NATHANIEL CLOSE,

"December, 21st, 1767."

The above was passed, and the acting selectmen were appointed a committee to select the exact site of the building, which was afterwards erected.

"At a Town meeting of the Inhabitants of the Town of Greenwich legally warned and holden on the 5th day of May, 1768, this question is put to vote, whether this town, in conjunction with the Town of Norwalk, in the County of Fairfield, will send their agent to the next ensuing Assembly to prefer a memorial to sd Assembly, that the Court House and Goal in said County of Fairfield may be built at said Norwalk. Resolved in the affirmative."

Afterwards, in the following October, after the session of the Assembly, in reference to the same subject the town voted, that

"Whereas, the Town of Norwalk, in conjunction with several other towns in the County of Fairfield, Preferred a memorial to the General Assembly, holden at New Haven, in October last, and now lies before said Assembly to be heard at the adjournment, in January next, paying that the said Town of Norwalk may be the Head or county town, &c., and whereas Mr. David Bush signed the same as agent, for and in behalf of said Town. It is therefore now voted and agreed that this Town allows and approves of the said David Bush's signing said Memorial as agent for this Town, and he is hereby fully Impowered and authorised in the name and behalf of this town to appear and Present said Memorial to a Final determination in the General Assembly, and that it is the earnest Request and Desire of the Inhabitants of this town, that the General Assembly would take the matters contained in said memorial into their wise consideration, and Grant the Prayer thereof, and that a copy of this vote may be used in the Trial of sd memorial, in order to signifye the minds of the inhabitants of this town in the premises."

"Further voted, the Town in sd meeting Grant Liberty unto David Bush, upon his Petition for building a mill upon sticklin's brook—Sticklin's brook under the overseeing of a Committee by sd Town appointed to grind for Town Inhabitants, and not to put them by for strangers. Voted in the affirmative.

"Edward Brush, Nehemiah Mead, and Deliverance Mead, Jabez Mead jun., Nathaniel Finch, and Caleb Mead, enters their protest on ye proceedings of sd meeting in sd vote."

EARLY MERCHANTS.

Among the earliest merchants at Greenwich were J. & B. Brush, in about the year 1827. This firm also had a store at Coscob. Knapp & Bush were also early merchants there. Jabez Mead was a pioneer merchant at Mianos, and Reuben Finch at Stanwick. The "red store" on West Street was built by Abra Smith. On Round Hill, Nathaniel Knapp, father of O. C. Knapp, was an early merchant.

PHYSICIANS.

Among the physicians who have practiced in this old town, and some of whom are still here, are mentioned the names of Shadrack Mead, Darius Mead, Sylvester Mead, James H. Hoyt, Barto F. White, Joel W. Hyde, D. W. Teller, James H. Brush, Francis M. Holly, James L. Marshall, John C. White, and Leander P. Jones.

LAWYERS.

The first permanent Gamaliel of the law in Greenwich was Julius B. Curtis, who now resides in Stamford. The present attorneys are Col. H. W. R. Hoyt, R. Jay Walsh, firm of Hoyt & Walsh, and Myron L. Mason and Frederick O. Hubbard, firm of Mason & Hubbard.

POST-OFFICE.

The first post-office at Greenwich was established at an early day, and was kept in a building which stood on the premises now owned by W. H. Knapp. It was subsequently removed to the place now occupied by Jacob T. Weed. The postmasters have been as follows: Isaac Mead, Stephen Holly, Samuel Close, Dr. F. M. Holly.

In 1849, J. E. Brush was appointed, and the office moved to present site. In 1853, Samuel Close was reappointed, and the office removed to a new building, which stood on premises now owned by William Scofield. In this building, also, Stephen Holley had kept the office. In 1861, Mr. Brush was reappointed, and the office came back. In 1866, William B. Westcomb held the office three or four weeks, when John Dayton received the appointment, and remained postmaster until 1869, when Mr. Brush was reappointed, and is the present incumbent.

The present postmaster at Stanwick is Geo. A. Lockwood; at Round Hill, O. C. Knapp; at Mianos, Allen J. Phinney; at Glenville, Webster Haight; at Riverside, William F. Thall; and at Banksville, ——. The office at Riversville has been discontinued.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

Resolutions in Answer to Continental Congress—Letter to the Delegates—Committee of Inspection and Safety—Committee appointed for Supplying Necessaries to Families of Continental Soldiers—Charges against Rev. Jonathan Murdock—Incidents of the Revolution—Governor Tryon's Expolition to Greenwich—Rivington's Press—The King Street Skirmish—The British in North Stamford—Putnam's Ride, etc.

The first reference to the war of the Revolution found in the old town records is under date Oct. 11, 1774, as follows:

"At a Town meeting of the Inhabitants of the Town of Greenwich, legally warned and holden on Tuesday, the 11th day of October, Anno Dom. 1774. A Letter is Read from the Honorable Eliphalet Dyer and Roger Sherman, Esq., from ye Continental Congress, at Philadelphia. It is proposed to this meeting whether there shall be a committee appointed to Draw a set of Resolves and an answer to said Letter from said Congress, and to lay the same before the next meeting of this town for their approbation. Resolved in the affirmative, and Dr. Amos Mead, Messrs. John Mackay, Jesse Parsons are per vote appointed a committee for the purpose aforesaid, on which the town per vote adjourned their meeting to the 17th day of Instant October, to the place where their annual Town meetings are held in said Town.

"At a meeting of the Inhabitants of the Town of Greenwich, in the County of Fairfield, & Colony of Connecticut, holden on the 17th day of October, 1774.

"This Meeting taking into their Serious consideration the alarming State of American Liberty, do unanimously approve of and adopt as the Sentiments of the Inhabitants of this Town the Resolves of the Honorable House of Representatives of this Colony, passed in their sessions at Hartford, in May last.

And Whereas, Certain Acts of the British Parliament have appeared since the above resolves were entered into; Particularly an act for altering the Government of Massachusetts Bay, and another for Establishing the Roman Catholic Religion in Canada, etc.

"Resolved by this meeting, that those acts are repugnant to the free principles of the English Constitution, and in a High Degree Dangerous to the Civil and Religious Liberty of both British and American Protestant subjects, and that notwithstanding the Torrent of False and malicious aspersions poured forth by designing men, We believe and declare the Contrivers and Devisors of these and all such unconstitutional acts Their Dupes and Emissaries, to be the only enemies to our Gracious Sovereign, and the Illustrious House of Hanover that we know of in his majesty's dominions.

"Resolved, That this meeting hereby approve of the Honorable Congress of Delegates from the several American Colonies, and will acquiesce and abide by their final determination.

"Resolved, That as the Province of Massachusetts Bay, especially the Town of Boston, is now suffering under the Iron Hand of Despotie Power and ministerial Influence, it is the Indispensable duty of this town, in Imitation of ye noble Examples set up by most of the Colony to contribute to the relief of the oppressed and suffering Poor in said Town of Boston, and that Messrs. David Bush, John Mackay, Benjamin Mead, Jr., Daniel Merritt, James Veris, Nathaniel Mead, Jr., Joseph Hobby, Jr., be a Committee to receive and keep an exact account of all donations that shall be Given by the Inhabitants of this town, and Transmit the same to the Select men of the Town of Boston, to be by them appropriated for the purpose aforesaid.

"Ordered by this meeting, that Dr. Amos Mead, Messrs. John Mackay, and Jesse Parsons be Desired to write to the Honorable members of Congress for this Colony an answer to theirs of the 19th ultimo, Inclosing a Copy of the Present Doings of this meeting, and transmit another copy thereof to the Printer, at New Haven, in order to be published.

"Recorded by me,

"JESSE PARSONS,

"Town Clerk."

COPY OF THE LETTER TO THE DELEGATES.

"GENTLEMEN,—We acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 19th ult., inclosing the Resolutions of the Honorable Congress, and with the Highest gratitude receive the assurance of the earliest intelligence of the proceedings of your Honorable Board, as soon as they shall be made Public. We have called a meeting, and communicated to them your letter and those proceedings, and do now inclose their resolutions thereon

"We are, Gentlemen, your most obedient, Humble servants,

"AMOS MEAD,

"JOHN MACKAY,

"JESSE PARSONS

"P. S. Upon enquiry into the Present State of the magazine of this Town, the Inhabitants are much surprised to find that the price of that most necessary article for our defence, viz., Gunpowder, is now doubled, which we are Desir'd to mention as worthy the notice of your Honorable Board.

"The Honorable Eliphail Dyer and Roger Sherman, Esqs."

At the same meeting it was further voted that

"As the Town Stock of ammunition wants a supply, there be a Committee appointed to examine the state of the Town Stock of Powder, Lead, &c., and the Selectmen are appointed a committee for that purpose and to take care to supply what is wanting at the expense of the town."

On the 8th of February, 1775, it was "Proposed to this meeting whether they will send Delegates to attend a County Congress at Fairfield on the 19th of February instant pursuant to a letter from Fairfield Committee agreeable to the Association of the Continental Congress, entered into and adopted by the Honorable House of Representatives of this Colony and said Committee to attend on their own expenses. Resolved in the affirmative, and that Doctor Amos Mead and John Mackay be their Delegates for the purpose aforesaid."

On the 3d of December of the same year (1775) the following persons were appointed a committee of inspection and safety. They, besides their duties as a vigilance committee, were empowered to appoint two or more from their own number to attend the next County Congress, should any be called: Amos Mead, Samuel Peck, James Ferris, John Mackay, Benjamin Mead, Jr., Nehemiah Mead, Col. John Mead, Roger Brown, Bezaleel Brown, David Wood, Maj. Thomas Hobby, Odell Close, Nathaniel Mead, Jr.

It was also

"Voted, That no body of men presume to assemble together and go upon any expedition, unless by order of the Honorable the Continental Congress, the Honorable the General Assembly, the County Congress, or Committee of Safety for this town, either of whom are to ascertain the number and direct the measures."

"At a special meeting of the inhabitants of the Town of Greenwich, legally warned and holden on the 15th day of January, Anno Dom 1776, The Town per vote AId to their Committee of Safety the following persons,—viz. Israel Knapp, Jr., Samuel Seymour, John Hobby, Messenger Palmer, and Peter Mead, Esq.

"In this meeting comes Jesse Hallock and presents himself to set up the Salt Peter works in this town, on encouragement Given by act of Assembly."

March 11, 1777, the town voted to send for the six-pounder and shot for the same, which had been granted to them on account of a memorial addressed to the General Assembly.

At a special town-meeting of the inhabitants of Greenwich, legally warned and held at the town-house in said Greenwich, on Monday, the 14th day of April, 1777, the town, by vote, made choice of Nehemiah Mead to be moderator for this present meeting. Further, the town, by vote, made choice of Messrs. Titus Mead, Nehemiah Mead, John Mackay, James Ferris, Enos Lockwood, Roger Brown, Daniel Merritt, to be a committee to inspect into and see that the families of those who enter into the Continental army shall be supplied with the necessaries of life at the prices as stated by law according to the Governor's proclamation. Further, that this meeting assist and support the ministers of justice in putting into execution the act of the Assembly respecting the stating prices. Same was repeated at the next regular town-meeting.

During this year, Col. Enos, of Hartford, was stationed in this town with Connecticut troops. His quarters were during a part of the time at Palmer's Hill, and a part of the time at the old Esquire Knapp place, now occupied by J. K. Stearns, Esq. The foraging of Col. Enos' troops was so excessive that the town, at a legal meeting, voted:

"Whereas the troops of Col. Enos regiment quartered in this town have committed great outrages upon the property of some of the Inhabitants of this town (viz.), in burning rails, cutting young growth of timber, &c. Therefore, it is proposed to this meeting, whether they will recommend unto the Sole t men of this Town, to apply to the Field Officers, for redress of the aforesaid grievances. Voted in the affirmative."

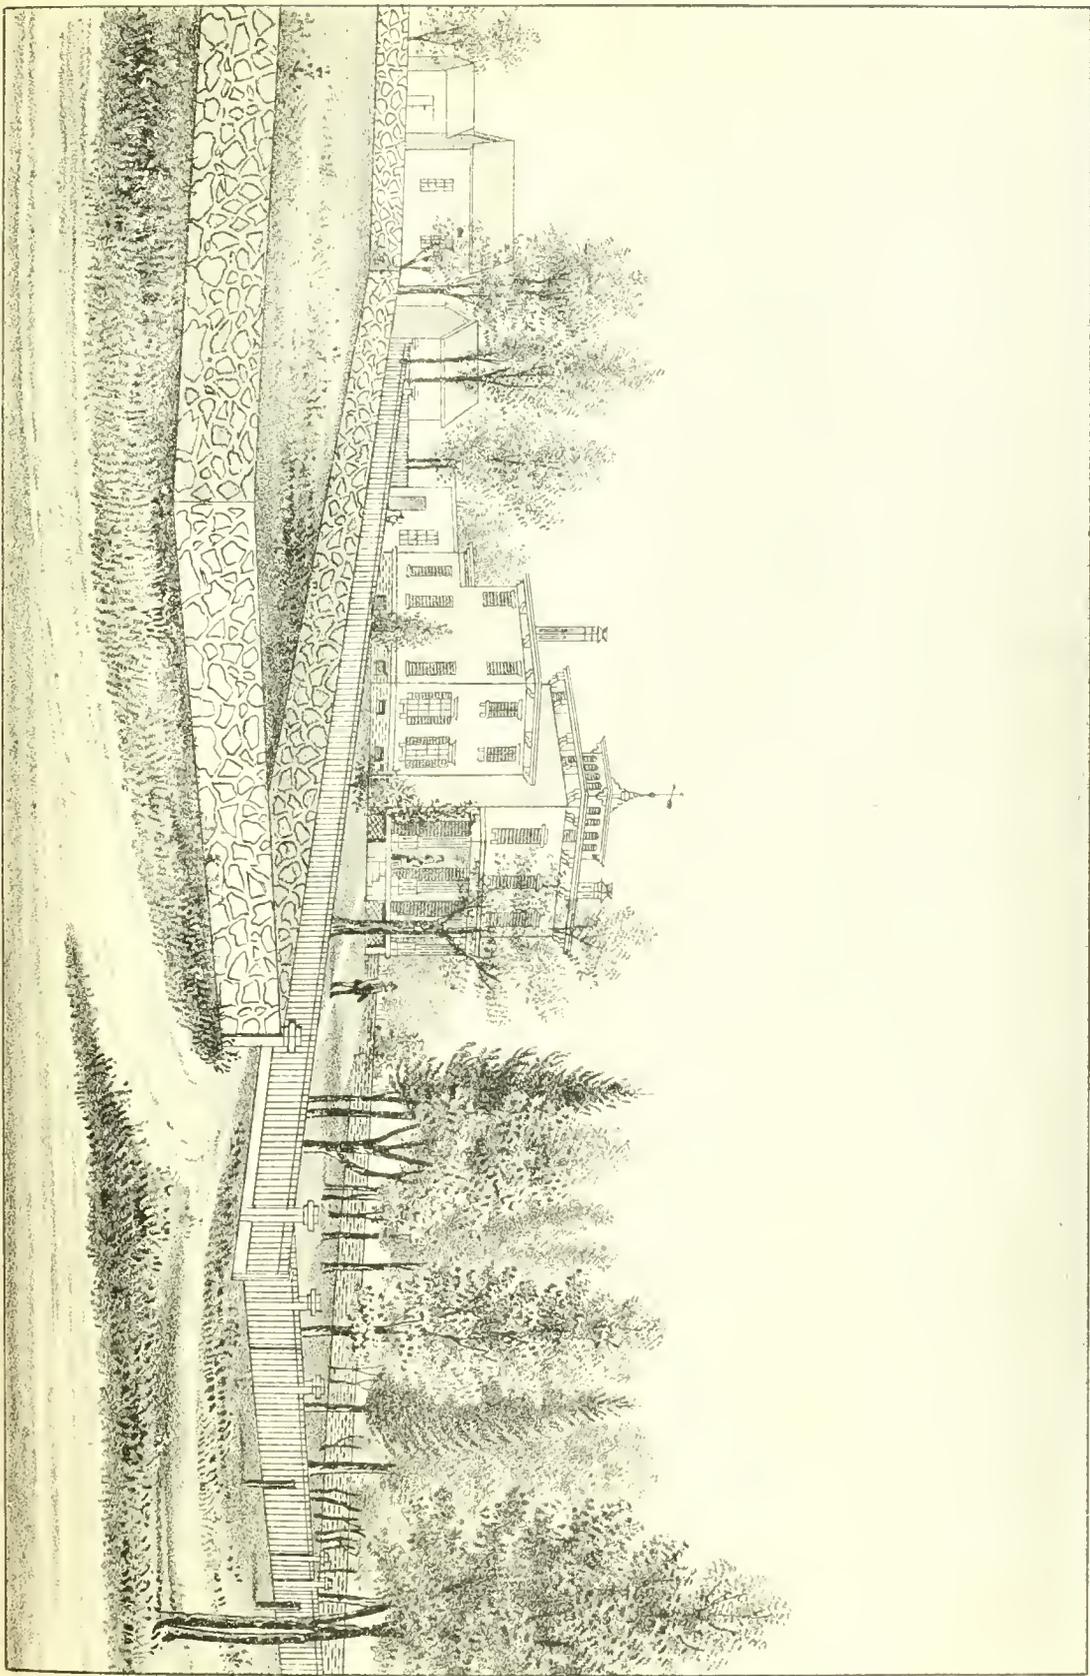

"At a special Town meeting of the inhabitants of the Town of Greenwich, legally warned and held in said Greenwich, on Monday ye 12th day of January, 1778, in pursuance of the Requisition from his Excellency the Governor, of ye 15th of December, 1777, communicate to the Inhabitants the Introduction to, and the Articles of Confederation & Perpetual Union between the States of America, that the sense of the Town might be known thereon, the town by vote made choice of Bezaleel Brown to be Moderator of this present meeting. The said Articles being in said meeting deliberately read and considered, were by vote, Nem. Con. (no one opposing), accepted and approved.

"It is proposed whether this meeting is willing, that non-commissioned officer and soldier who is draughted and voluntarily serves in this town's expedition, receive a proportionable part of all the fines paid in consequence of said draught. Voted in the affirmative, and that the Selectmen receive the said fines of the Town Treasurer and pay them out accordingly.

"Voted that the artillery men may have the Town House for a guard-house, and have liberty to build a chimney to it, and that the Town will be at the cost of having Masons for that purpose. The Town, by vote, made choice of Bezaleel Brown to be Barrack-Master, to supply the troops with wood and other necessaries. Meeting then adjourned."

"At a Town meeting of the Inhabitants of the Town of Greenwich holden in the Town House of said Greenwich, on Monday the 19th day of December, 1778 having made a choice of Bezaleel Brown for Moderator, and Jabez Fitch for Clerk, the meeting adjourned to the Meeting-House. This meeting taking into serious consideration the danger & distress of the inhabitants of this town, and the great loss and damage sustained by many of the good citizens thereof, occasioned chiefly by a number of vile abandoned wretches, who have gone over to and joined the common enemy of the United States of America, against the laws of this State, and the liberties and privileges of the good people thereof. Thereupon, it is resolved by this meeting, that it is, in their opinion, dangerous to the safety, liberties, Peace and good Government of this town, that any person that hath gone over to, and joined, aided, or assisted the common enemy of the United States, or taken Protection under them to remain in this town, or to return to it or over be capable of obtaining any settlement in it. Resolved, that it is the opinion of this meeting that the authority and selectmen take all proper and legal steps to free the town of all such vile Miscreants. Further the town then voted for Capt. Sylvanus Mead to be Barrack-Master for the year ensuing. For Messrs. Sylvanus Mead, Isaac Howe, Reuben Rundall, Abraham Mead, Josiah Ferris, Matthew Mead, Edmund Mead, to be the Committee of Safety."

"At a special town-meeting, etc., on the 12th day of August, 1783, the town voted for Benjamin Mead, Esq., to be their moderator," etc.

DESIGNED BY WILLIAM A. WHEELER

"The town taking into consideration the distress to which the inhabitants were reduced by the war-raging and plundering of the enemy, and the constantly quartering of troops for the defence of this State in the town during the late war with Great Britain and the great injury done thereby, and that it was brought to the town during the course of a war undertaken for the defence and security of the common liberties of the State in which it was understood and expected that the whole body should bear the extraordinary burden and whereas the General Assembly make a grant for the whole and make payment of a part of the damages done at Danbury accidentally thrown on any particular part and considering it is altogether just to us, have thereupon agreed and voted that Brigadier-General John Mead be agent for the town to make use of such measures by memorial to the General Assembly or otherwise to obtain redress of the town grievances in this behalf and for a repair of the damages to the sufferers occasioned by the war excepting to those sufferers who are known to be inimical to the liberties and independence of the United States of America. This meeting is adjourned to next Freeman's meeting day in September to begin immediately after Freeman's meeting is over."

"At a meeting of the inhabitants of the town of Greenwich convened in town meeting September the 16th, 1783. The inhabitants resumed the consideration of the grievances partly discussed at the preceding meeting and on reading a copy of the resolve of the Honorable General Assembly of this State on a memorial preferred to said Assembly by the representatives of this town in May last, the Inhabitants thereby agree in the following propositions:

"First, That the commission granted to the committee decreed by said resolve does not empower said committee to enter fully into the grievances complained of, and damages done to the inhabitants during the late war (not heretofore estimated) as it extends only to losses and damages occasioned by the enemy but does reach the losses and damages occasioned by this being a garrison-town and its inhabitants harassed and distressed by both parties.

"Second, That from the confidence that the inhabitants of this town have in the wisdom and justice of the Legislature of the State they are persuaded that nothing but the misrepresentations of some men either through ignorance of their real suffering or worse motives could have induced that Honorable body to appoint a committee with such limited powers as only warranted to consider partially a subject that ought in Justice and Equity to be taken upon a larger scale.

"Thirdly, That the burden of a war carried on for the General defence of a State whether occasioned by friends or foes ought to be borne as equal as possible by the citizens at large and that unless the principle is adopted and applied to the sufferings of the inhabitants of the town they are so far from being on equal footing with the greater part of their fellow citizens in the State that the contrary must doom them to a species of oppression incompatible with the equitable maxims of Legislation.

"Fourthly, That the inhabitants of this town do not entertain the most distant thought of an exemption from such part of the public burden as they are able to bear but when they view the present alarming situation of the town for want of resources occasioned by the check put upon their industry for years past and the powers of Providence on their labor in permitting their crops of wheat on which they chiefly depended to be cut off this season should they under these circumstances be called upon for a collection of their full proportion of the state taxes they will be reduced to such hardships as must terminate in uncomfortable ruin to themselves and families;

"Whereupon it is agreed and voted by the said inhabitants that Brigadier-General Mead the town agent do pursue such means by memorials to the General Assembly at the ensuing October session predicated on the foregoing sentiments or otherwise as he may judge most eligible for the purpose of obtaining redress of the grievances aforesaid by the appointment of a judicious committee invested with such power as the complicated distresses of this town evidently require or in such other way as the Honorable Legislature may in their wisdom direct."

It was also

"Resolved by this meeting that it is their opinion that the selectmen do not take bonds of any person or persons that have gone over to the enemy for the purpose of making said person or persons inhabitants of this town, or giving him or them a residence therein."

On July 12, 1784, the people, having passed through the troubles of the war, and now having some opportunity to turn their attention to other topics, met and preferred the following solemn charges against their minister, the Rev. Jonathan Murdock. The original copy of these charges is in the possession of Col. Thomas A. Mead, and reads as follows:

"Whereas, At a meeting of the Church of Christ, in the West Society, holden at the House of Mr. Benjamin Peck, in said Society, on the 12th day of July, 1784. The said church Voted, That the Association of the Western District, in Fairfield County, be called to meet on the 2nd Tensday of August next, at the house of Capt. John Hobby, in said Society, at 12 o'clock, at noon, then and there to Enquire into all matter of Difference and Grievance Subsisting between Mr. Jonathan Murdock, the Pastor, and the Church of Christ in this place, and to give their pastoral advice thereon; and that it was also Voted that Amos Mead and Benjamin Mead, Esqrs, be a Committee to call the said Association and to lay all matters of Difference and Grievance before them.

"Pursuant to the above said appointment take leave to offer the following matters of fact as the cause of the Difference and Grievances subsisting between the said Church and the said Pastor,—VIZ.

"1st, with Respect to his the said Pastor's public performances as a Minister of the Gospel in this place.

"2d, with Respect to his conduct since he was settled in the Work of the ministry in this place.

"1st, as to the first, it is the opinion of this church that the said pastor hath not followed the apostolick advice of Studying to make himself approved, Rightly dividing the word of truth, etc.—for instance, in a discourse from the 13th chapter of Luke and the 24th verse, 'Strive to enter in at the straight gate, for I say unto you that many will seek to enter in and shall not be able.' In which discourse he said that striving and seeking meant the same thing, and attempted to prove it. In another sermon against oppression and high prices, he observed that it was the crying sin of the land, for which the judgments of God were on the land, and in the close observed that everybody had gone into it, so that some must practice it, and could not live without it. He has lately in two sermons attempted to describe Evangelical Repentance, and did it in these words, viz, that it consisted in an unfeigned sorrow for sin & sincere intention to forsake it. There are many others that might be mentioned.

"2dnd, His general mode of proof has not been taken from the Scripture or Reason of things, But that he has heard so, that he believes it, and that he verily believes it.

"3d, That he dwells on general heads and does not descend into particulars, or adapt them to the Consciences of the hearers; But so delivers himself that it hath been frequently observed by his hearers that a person might be a Deist, & not be offended, but join with him.

"Secondly, with Respect to his conduct since he was settled in the work of the ministry in this place.

"1st, That soon after he was Installed in this place he began to enter into a multiplicity of Business, and wickedly neglected his study, and has continued so to do to this time.

"2dnd, That although he early took the Oath of Fidelity to this State, and in the beginning of the late War showed much zeal in the American Cause in the pulpit as well as elsewhere, yet contrary to his said oath of Fidelity, in 1779, on or about the 10th day of July, he voluntarily went to a British officer with a flagg then at the house late Seth Mead's, in this place, and there acknowledged his Political Friendship to the British, and that soon after he began to justly trade with the then enemies of this State among the people in this place, and Encouraged it by his own example.

"3d, In May, 1780, he was (with his own consent) taken by Delaney's Cove and Patched, only to come to their lines a prisoner when called for, but under no restraint by his parole as to his preaching or prayer. Yet after that he totally neglected in public to pray for protection to us, Discretion to our Councils, or Success to our arms, to the great Grievance of the people here.

"4th, That he was offered an exchange, but his friendship to the British interest prevailed over his oath of Fidelity & duty to his county as well as people, and he refused the exchange.

"5th, That on or about the 10th of October, 1779, his cows were (as he said) taken from him on a Friday night, and on the next Sabbath he went after them down among the Enemy, he obtained a permit to take them, he found them and sold them and he't British Goods with the money & brought the Goods into this State, contrary to law, and in thus doing he broke the Sabbath, set an ill example, and broke covenant with the church in neglecting his duty on the Lord's day.

"6th, In 1780, in the summer season, he frequently left the House of God in this place vacant in the afternoon of the Lord's day, & without the consent of the Church, in neglect of his duty here, went and preached to the separate Baptists at their place of worship, thereby countenancing that separation, to the great Greife of this Church and all the good people here.

"7th. In 1780, between fore and afternoon worship on the Lord's day, he sent Mr. Samuel Peck, jun. and called Mr. Silas Mead to his house, Mr. Benjamin Peck being present; he dunned him for what they owed him, and desired them to do the same to their neighbors. Yet not far from that time he reproved Mr. Theophilus Peck for breaking the Sabbath only for bringing back a sermon book in his pocket on the Lord's day. In other instances he admonished Mr. Phillips, the Baptist minister, against marrying upon the Sabbath as a great Immorality, since whi h he has frequently practised it himself.

"8th. He has frequently and abroad knowingly misrepresented and traduced this Church & society, in particular Capt. Mash, before the ordaining Committee at North Stamford, in declaring that this Society had never paid him in any thing but Continental money, which words so spoken, he Mr. Jonathan Murdock then knew were false, he himself being possessed of the means of knowledge that they were so.

"9th. He has frequently, as this Church takes it, been guilty of the breach of the 9th command in denying facts and appealing in an unchristianlike manner to the father of lights for confirmation of what he said. Viz.: On or about the 30th of April last, before the Society's meeting in this place, he publicly declared that the report that he had refused to settle accounts with the people of this society was without foundation, groundless and false; which declaration he, the said Mr. Jonathan Murdock, at the House of Mr. Henry Mead did in a publick manner make a few days before.

"10th. That the foregoing matters of Greivance and many more which might be mentioned have so disaffected the people in this place that there are many who have left the Society and gone over to and joined other denominations, and but few who attend Mr. Jonathan Murdock's ministry in this place.

"11th. That in the opinion of this church the breach is become so great between the said Mr. Jonathan Murdock & this Church & great part of the said Society that it can not be healed, but that his usefulness is at an end in this place."

Says Mead's "History," "Upon these charges Mr. Murdock was heard, and he was dismissed, being found guilty. He appears to have been a man of but little mind and energy, and at the time when dismissed had no friends in the church whatever. He graduated at New Haven in the class of 1776, with Dr. Timothy Dwight, Dr. Backus, David Ely, Dr. David Macclure, and Dr. Nathan Strong. Soon after his settlement at Greenwich he fell in love with Miss Ann Grigg, a bouncing girl of sixteen or seventeen, who was a much greater lover of fun than of Mr. Murdock. He persecuted her with epistles of love by bribing the blacks to bear his messages to her, or, when that was impossible, by thrusting them under her room-door. The blacks gladly carried his notes, and greatly enjoyed the reading of them with Miss Grigg herself. Once, on seeing him coming in at the door, she hid away in the garret, while a favorite negro woman politely informed Mr. Murdock that she, in a spirit of fun, had climbed up the chimney to hide from him. He, innocent of any thought of a joke, really believed the story, and put his head up the large winding chimney to find her. Finally raising himself high enough in the chimney with the greatest difficulty, he not only found her not there, but also found his clothes covered with soot and his throat exceedingly well choked with hot smoke.

"He visited considerably in his parish; and on a certain visit at Mr. Theophilus Peck's, where he was obliged, on account of the distance, to take dinner, he was much surprised, when being seated at the table, that Mr. Peck did not ask his pastor to implore the divine blessing, but that Mr. Peck performed the duty himself, using the following words: "O Lord! we have a wolf in sheep's clothing amongst us. Put a bridle in his mouth and a hook in his nose, and lead him back to the place whence he came."

INCIDENTS OF THE REVOLUTION.

Thus far we have given to our readers the simple records of the town-meetings held during these times so trying to true patriotism. At the outbreak of the war some, from their loyal and religious zeal, immediately sided with the enemy. However, they did not at that time openly avow their design. So little spirit was shown on the part of the Tories within the limits of the town up to 1777 that a vote sustaining the Declaration of Independence and the Continental Congress was passed in town-meeting without a dissenting voice. Yet there were disaffected ones, as the event proved, and before the war was finished ninety-two men had gone over to and openly joined the ranks of the enemy from the Second Society alone. A complete list of the names of these was made years ago by one of the committee of safety. The number of family names in the list is thirty-four, and twelve of these names are not now to be found in the town. The immediate descendants of the others are but few, and in many instances the race is quite extinct. There seems to have been a doom upon them and their descendants.

After the British had occupied New York there arose another class of men, much worse than the first. This body was composed of certain lawless characters, who seized with avidity upon every opportunity for plunder. They committed their depredations upon both the Americans and their enemies. Old grudges contracted before the war were now satisfied with relentless vigor. Hence the Americans suffered most from these wretches. And, inasmuch as they did by far the greater injury to the Americans, they were often assisted by British troops to carry out their foul cruelties and barbarities, and were always sheltered by the enemy when hotly pressed by the citizens. They banded together to carry out their nefarious designs. Skulking about at night in the woods and by-places, they would shoot down the inhabitants when they least supposed an enemy near. Their mode of warfare can only be compared with that of the Indians in the early history of the country. A few instances will show the refinement of blood-thirstiness which they had attained about the close of the war.

Shubal Merritt, whose family is now extinct, was one of these. With one of his boon companions, he was once lurking about the village of Rye for the accomplishment of some hidden purpose. An aged man was plowing a field hard by their hiding-place, and as he diligently pursued his labors backward and forward across the lot they were whiling away the time by playing cards. Finally, Shubal proposed a game to decide which should shoot the victim. The result was against Shubal, who, as the old man approached them slowly with his team, deliberately raised his musket and shot him through the heart. After the war was over the murderer suffered his just deserts. A son of his victim met him face to face at White Plains, and shot him dead upon the spot, and so great was the feeling of hatred to him on the part of the citizens that no notice was taken of the act.

Dr. Amos Mead, one of the committee of safety, was so chased and hunted by these men as to be obliged, with dog, horse, gun, and blankets, to travel about back in the country for a whole winter. He retraced by night the tracks he had made by day, and then, moving off a short distance in another direction, spent the night in the first sheltered place that could be found. At the close of winter he came down to look at a field of wheat, but when arriving at a certain point he turned back, deeming it unsafe to proceed farther. Soon after, one William Sackett, a refugee, met him, and told him that five men bent on his life had been hidden in that field of wheat with their muskets all aimed at a certain point in the road where he must have passed had he proceeded onward. Sackett had not become so hardened but that he gave this timely warning, and Dr. Mead wisely retired again into the country.

Among the most inveterate Tories were a family of the name of Knapp, living on what is now known as the Tracy place. One of them, Timothy Knapp, had been paying attentions, with a view to marriage, to a daughter of Titus Mead, then living in the old house, at present Mr. Solomon Mead's, a little northeast of the village, and on her refusing his hand he proudly told her that she should yet speak to him and he would in his turn take no notice of her. This threat was verified in a more terrible way than he intended. Horses were the most valuable booty that the refugees could lay their hands upon, and, knowing that Mr. Mead possessed a fine animal, which he every night led up the oaken stairs to his garret, Knapp with two of his brothers went to the house to take it. Mr. Mead had knowledge of their approach, and stationed a man who was with him at a back window up-stairs. It was at dusk, and when the three men had come to the door-step, after some words, Mr. Mead fired, the ball passing through the door and entering the heart of Timothy Knapp. Without waiting to see the result of the shot, his brothers ran off in an easterly direction, and at the same time the man stationed at the back window sprang out and ran with all his might. The remaining refugees, seeing him and supposing it to be their brother, called out, "Run, Tim, run!" which made him run the faster. At last the daughter, opening the door and seeing Timothy lying there, asked him if he were badly hurt, and he, making no answer, was found dead. She had spoken to him and he had taken no notice of her. On finding him dead, word was sent to the family that his body was lying as it fell on the door-step. They paid no attention to the messenger; and after the body had lain there for a considerable length of time, Mr. Mead buried it in a lot belonging to the Knapps in a pair of bars, where they must have driven over it in going out and in. Afterwards the family took up the body and buried it close by the house where he was shot, and his bones still rest there. A line of willow-trees now marks the spot, a little way south of the house.

Another class not so violent in their individual conduct, but equally inimical in other respects, were those who, under guise of permits from the English, resided here without molestation from the enemy, and in return for this privilege gave them sufficient and well-timed information of the doings of Americans in this quarter. There were quite a large number of this class among us, and we cannot but deplore the situation of our forefathers, thus situated with spies and villainous Tories in their midst and ready enemies close at hand.

GOVERNOR TRYON'S EXPEDITION TO GREENWICH.

The attack made upon Greenwich by Governor Tryon, and the escape of Gen. Putnam down the precipice, are the most prominent incidents in the history of the town. It is an exceedingly difficult task for a historian to collect facts merely from tradition, with the assistance of no other record than the official report of the commanding officer and short letters written from a distant part of the county. An officer, when forced to retreat after being almost, or perhaps quite, surprised at an outpost, feels in duty bound to represent the facts in as favorable light as possible, to avoid discouraging the patriots fighting for their country. Putnam, according to his own account, spent but little time in the village while the enemy were here, and the letters are obviously incorrect in many prominent points. Here is Putnam's account:

"CAMP AT READING, March 2, 1779.

"A detachment from the enemy at King's Bridge, consisting of the Fourteenth, Forty-fourth, and Fifty-seventh British Regiments, one of the Hessians, and two of the new levies, marched from their lines for Horseneck on the evening of the 25th ult. with the intention of surprising the troops at that place and destroying the salt-works.

"A captain and thirty men were sent from our advance lines from Horseneck, who discovered the enemy at New Rochelle in advance. They retired before them undiscovered as far as Ryerck, where, at growing light, the enemy observed and attacked them. They defended themselves as well as possible and made their way good to Sawpatts where they took advantage of a commanding piece of ground and made some little stand; but the superior force of the enemy obliged them to retire over Byram bridge, which they took up, and by that means had an opportunity of reaching Horseneck in safety.

"As I was there myself to see the situation of the guards, I had the troops formed on a hill by the meeting-house, ready to receive the enemy as they advanced. They came on briskly, and I soon discovered that their design was to turn our flanks and possess themselves of a defile in our rear, which would effectually prevent our retreat. I therefore ordered parties out on both flanks with directions to give me information of their approach, that we might retire in season. In the mean time a column advanced up the main road, where the remainder of the troops (amounting to only about sixty) were posted. We discharged some old field-pieces which were there a few times, and gave them a small fire of musketry, but without any considerable effect; the superior force of the enemy soon obliged our small detachment to abandon the place.

"I therefore directed the troops to retire and form on a hill a little distance from Horseneck, while I proceeded to Stamford and collected a body of militia and a few Continental troops which were there, with which I returned immediately, and found that the enemy (after plundering the inhabitants of the principal part of their effects and destroying a few salt-works, a small sloop, and a store) were on their return. The officer commanding the Continental troops stationed at Horseneck mistook my orders and went much farther than I intended, so that he could not come up with them to any advantage. I, however, ordered the few troops that came from Stamford to pursue them, thinking they might have an opportunity to pick up some stragglers. In this I was not mistaken, as Your Excellency will see by the enclosed list of prisoners. Besides those, eight or nine more were taken and sent off, so that I cannot tell to which particular regiments they belonged; one ammunition- and one baggage-wagon were taken. In the former there were about two hundred rounds of rouser, grape, and round-shot suited to three-pounders, some slow-mat-hos, and about two hundred tubes; the latter was filled with plunder, which I had the satisfaction of restoring to the inhabitants from whom it was taken. As I have not yet got a return, I cannot tell exactly the number we lost, though I don't think more than ten soldiers and about that number of inhabitants, but a few of which were in arms.

"List of Prisoners taken at Horseneck on the 25th ult.—Seventeenth Regiment, 15 privates; Forty-fourth do., 5 privates; Fifty-seventh do., 3 privates; Loyal American Regiment, 5; Emmerick Corps, 8; First Battalion of Artillery, 1; Pioneers, 1. Total, 38.

"N.B.—Seven deserters from Emmerick's Corps."

The following is from "Barber's Historical Collections of Connecticut," being extracts from two letters from Fairfield County, dated March 1, 1779, four days after the occurrence:

"The enemy have made an excursion within four miles of Stamford by the best accounts of about fourteen hundred or fifteen hundred, under the command of Governor Tryon; they reached Horseneck on Friday morning about nine o'clock. At Stamford they were not alarmed till ten o'clock, notwithstanding the enemy was discovered at nine o'clock the preceding evening by a small guard of Continental troops at East Chester, under the command of Capt. Titus Watson, who were obliged to give way, though they fought on their retreat, and some of them were wounded and taken prisoners. Capt. Watson was closely pursued by a light-horseman whom he had the good fortune to kill, and by the . . . made his escape. Gen. Putnam was accidentally at Stamford, but the Continental troops were too much scattered to be collected in season to oppose the enemy. About two hundred militia and a few Continental troops fell in with the enemy's rear, just as they were leaving Horseneck, about the middle of the afternoon, who killed eight or ten of them and took about fifty prisoners, who had made too free with the liquor they had plundered. They destroyed a small salt-works and burnt a schooner which lay at Mianus Creek. They plundered the inhabitants of everything they could lay their hands on, broke windows, etc., and many families were stripped of everything but the clothes they had on; even the house where Governor Tryon had his headquarters was not spared. They retreated to Bye on Friday evening, and next day to King's Bridge. Their retreat was so precipitate that they left behind two wagons loaded with plunder."

From the above reports, and from twenty or more different accounts, some of which have been handed down by the hottest of the Tories and some by over-zealous Americans, we have arranged the following account of the expedition, as being the most consistent and reliable. It is necessary that we should contradict some accounts, and even dispute some of the facts stated by Gen. Putnam himself. We ask all, therefore, who would relate the matter in a different manner to look upon our account in a spirit of leniency, remembering that where there is so much disagreement all cannot be right.

The headquarters at this time were at the house of Capt. John Hobby. Col. Holdridge, of the vicinity of Hartford, an officer much disliked by the Americans, was in command of the outpost. The house was situated a few feet south of the one now occupied by Henry M. Benedict, Esq., and a small guard-house was erected in the corner of the yard, but a few feet south of Mr. Benedict's western entrance, close by the side of the street, of which the carriage-path ran more than its width farther south than it now does.

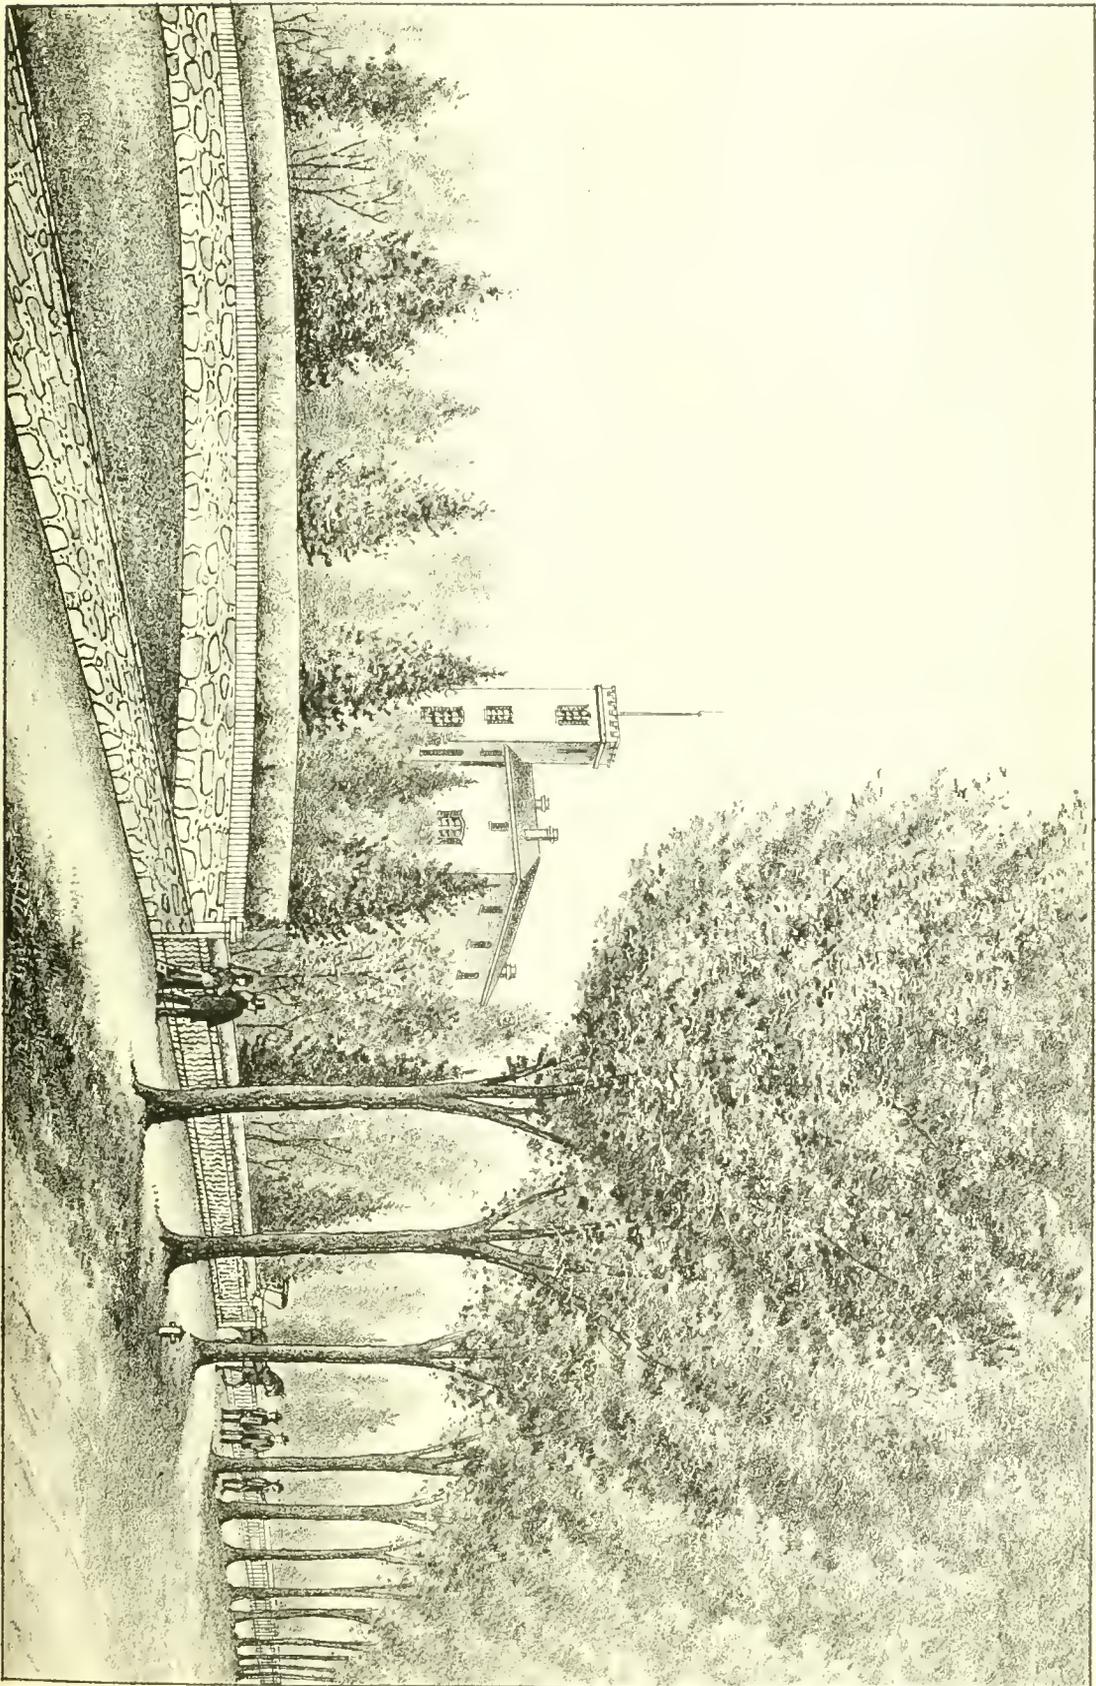

Some say that this outpost was at the house of the late John J. Tracy, but this was a hot-bed of Toryism, and further, those giving this account say that Putnam arose from the breakfast-table, sprang upon his horse, and rode for Stamford; in which case he could have given no orders to the men who were drawn up by the meeting-house, which he in fact did. We therefore take this account to be a mistake.

On the evening of the 25th of February, 1779, Gen. Putnam was at Horseneck, quartered with the picket-guard, where it was his custom to come almost every day to gain information of the doings of the enemy below. That evening a ball was held at the house of Moses Husted, Pecksland, on the same site where is now the residence of William A. Husted, Esq. Putnam attended, taking a lady on his horse behind him, according to the custom of those days. This lady, afterwards Mrs. Rogers, was a daughter of David Bush, of Coscob, living in the same house now occupied by George J. Smith, Esq. It was late when he accompanied her home, so that he did not leave her father's residence for Horseneck until nearly daylight on the morning of the 26th. This fact has led many to suppose that his headquarters were at Coscob, which is evidently a mistake.

The day before (the 25th) a small company of the Continental light-horsemen, under Capt. Titus Watson, consisting of about thirty men, had been ordered forward by Putnam to observe the doings of the enemy. They went down nearly as far as New Rochelle, where, between eight and nine o'clock in the evening, they found the enemy approaching, with Delancy's body of Tories in the van. The Continentals retired before them, but were discovered and come up with. By reason of superior numbers they were defeated, and many of them were killed. The enemy drove them from the stage-road down into Milton, where they managed to keep away from their pursuers, crossing the heads of the creeks, many of them hiding in the swamps. A few of them, with Capt. Watson, succeeded in reaching Byram Bridge, which they had time to take up when their pursuers were just in sight. Watson, with one or two others, then rode directly to Horseneck, with the company of Tories in full pursuit. Five of them turned southward and were pursued by a body of the enemy, who came up with one of the fugitives in the lot recently excavated by the New York and New Haven Railroad Company, now owned by Capt. Caleb W. Merritt. The soldier was there shot down and the horse inhumanly butchered, from which the inclosure has since been known as the "Horse Lot." The other four succeeded in reaching the Myanos in safety, where they were set across by Daniel Banks.

The alarm was given to the picket-guard by Capt. Watson, but there was little or no time to prepare for defense. The enemy had been informed of the weakness of the outpost, and advanced steadily for it. Mr. Matthew Mead, then a boy of twelve, was back of his father's house, where Mr. Bush Mead now lives, when he saw them at the top of the hill by Horse-neck Brook. His father sent him off, with the other children and the cattle, back in the lots, where he reached a place of safety. The Americans, warned by Capt. Watson, numbering according to the various accounts, from one to two hundred, having no cavalry, formed in front of the meeting-house and fired a six-pounder three times—which was a signal of alarm—just as the Tories passed the house of Mr. Matthew Mead. They then were walking their horses, but when they came in sight of Capt. John Hobby's they saw Putnam spring on his horse at the barn with his coat on his arm and ride with full speed to the meeting-house, where the Americans were drawn up. They now gave him full chase. He stopped a moment to order his men to retreat to a convenient distance, while he should ride on to Stamford for reinforcements. Being nearly come up with, he dashed on, and by the time he reached the precipice now known as Putnam's Hill, the commander of the Tories, Thomas Merritt, of Westchester County, was within two lengths of him.

The road, before reaching the brink of the precipice, then ran nearly east and west, then turning a short right angle ran north about thirty rods, when it turned directly about and ran south along under the precipice to about five rods below the causeway forming the present road, where it again turned eastward.

Putnam plunged his horse down this steep, which, being overgrown with stunted bushes, presented a wild appearance, at a headlong pace, across the road at the foot of the hill, into the thicket which then lay between the post-road and the swamp, now known as the "Ten Acres," and pursued a sort of drift-path through the thicket till he was beyond the present residence of Theodore H. Mead, Esq., where he again took to the road. The hill now presents a totally different aspect from what it formerly did, and the hardest part of Putnam's descent was after he crossed the road running along the side of the hill.

Some will have it that he started down the hill from the same point, but took a southeastern course, reaching the road at the foot of the stone steps, where the enemy had full aim at him all the while; others, that he rushed headlong down the seventy-four stone steps placed roughly one above another for the convenience of foot passengers, his weight being two hundred and forty pounds. Others, again, claim that he followed the road as long as it ran on the top of the hill, and then set off in a northeasterly direction above the Ten Acres; while the author has been coolly told that he was in no danger of being taken at all, and rode slowly around the hill as other people did. We have carefully traced and examined these different accounts, and have the fullest evidence, by the testimony of eye-witnesses, that the account first given is correct. One of the many balls fired at him by the Tories, from the brink of the hill as he passed through the bushes passed through his hat. Old Put on this occasion could not refrain from his customary exclamation when in trouble from the Tories, which he shouted as the balls whistled thickly past him: "God cuss ye! when I catch ye I'll hang ye to the next tree."

Col. Holdridge, who was in command of the Continental soldiers, retreated in an unsoldierlike manner to Stanwich, while Putnam intended that he should retire only a short distance. From the account by the Americans of this officer, who was a Hartford man, he was totally unfit to be a soldier at all, much less an officer.

The citizens hung about the village as near as they dared, hiding in the swamps and by-places during the whole day, taking advantage of every opportunity, by some during feat, to secure prisoners, and even fire upon the enemy.

About an hour after the arrival of the body of Tories, Governor Tryon, with his full force of about twelve hundred men, took full possession of the town. He made his quarters at the house of Mr. Henry Mead, who then kept a public-house on the site of the present residence of Miss Sarah Lewis and Mrs. Mason. The soldiers, meantime, separated themselves into squads and pillaged every house in the neighborhood; a large body of them visited Coscob, where they destroyed the salt-works, which were upon Bush's Point, a small sloop, and a sloop's store-house.

A party of them also entered the house of Daniel and Joshua Smith, which was situated a little way south of the present parsonage of the Second Congregational Society. They found this house deserted by all its inhabitants excepting a deaf old lady, the mother-in-law of Joshua Smith. As they entered they saw her standing at the head of the front stairs. As she could not hear, she disobeyed their orders to come down, which so enraged the soldiers that one of them sprang up stairs and cut her down with his sword. After this murder the house was set on fire and burned to the ground. This is said to have been the only house wholly burned by the British.

The houses of those who held the enemy's permits were safe from these depredations, but the others were ransacked and plundered of every valuable. The wagons brought to carry back the plunder were filled to their utmost capacity. After that, everything was destroyed. The farmers made granaries of their garrets, and the enemy, after cutting holes through the garret and main floors, shoveled all the grain into the cellars, where the cider-barrels were knocked in and all mingled in one useless mass.

The cider, however, was not all permitted to run upon the ground, but by the middle of the afternoon nearly all the privates had become so drunken with it as to be unfit for the least defense, and so little guard was kept by the enemy that an American crept slyly into the orchard by the Henry Mead house, in the midst of the enemy, and fired a ball through the clapboards, which whistled close by Governor Tryon's head and struck the mantel-piece, from which it rebounded upon the floor. This startled Tryon so much that he, without waiting for his late dinner, gave immediate orders for a retreat. The officers now experienced the greatest difficulty in forming their men. Many were beastly drunk, and a great number made irregular marches, so that the Greenwich men managed to take several prisoners. Though several shots were fired at the enemy before, their first man was killed in the road opposite the cedar-tree a little west of the house of William Knapp. Others were wounded, and the enemy was in a full and disorderly retreat. The Americans so hotly pressed upon their rear that the drivers cut their horses loose from an ammunition- and a plunder-wagon, and rode off after their companions at full speed. The Americans had just taken possession of them when Gen. Putnam, with between one and two hundred Continentals and militia, arrived from Stamford, too late to render any assistance to the inhabitants.

This was an eventful day for Greenwich. Houses, though not burned, were ruined, and in the midst of winter, all provision had been destroyed by the hostile army, and the Tories, from that time for about a year, had almost complete mastery of the town. It is absolutely impossible to depict the miseries of the people who, loving the American cause, were obliged to stay here until the next season.

It seems that Putnam, as well as the inhabitants, supposed, from the large number of the enemy, that they were to proceed farther on, to Stamford and Norwalk. Hence, Col. Mead early dispatched Mr. Titus Mead to New Haven to ask of reinforcements of Gen. Silliman. The messenger arrived at New Haven a little before six that evening, and Gen. Silliman immediately issued his orders. The following is a copy of the one sent to Woodbury, taken from Cothren's "History of Woodbury:"

NEW HAVEN, Feb. 29, 1779, 6 P.M.

GENT:—Mr. Titus Mead, a man to be depended on, is this moment with an express from Col. Mead, with a message by word of mouth only from Col. Mead, for their circumstances were such that Col. Mead could not write. He says when he left Horsesnek (which was early this morning) a Body of about six hundred men and a Body of Horse had pushed up the road into Horsesnek, and were on this side of Knapp's tavern; and it was reported that a Body of two or three thousand more were not far behind. You are therefore directed to muster & march your Regiments forthwith to Norwalk to oppose the enemy, & where you will receive further Orders. I do not a moment neither by Night nor day.

G. SELLECK SILLIMAN,

"Brig.-Gen. of Foot and Col. Cl. of Horse,

"To COL. MESLEY & MAJOR BELL, Woodbury.

Of course the early retreat of the enemy rendered the execution of this command of no avail.

The Tories now soon became possessed of the entire town. Their headquarters were a part of the time at the house of Mr. Abraham Mead, where Mr. Oliver Mead now resides. This, now being the neutral ground, was plundered by both friends and foes; and poor and sickening indeed was the lot of those who were obliged to stay here.

RIVINGTON'S PRESS.

Some time during the war a paper was published in the city of New York by one Rivington. This paper was professedly and to all outward appearance devoted to the British interests. It was afterwards, however, known to have aided the Americans much, and was under the control of Washington himself. The hostile appearance of the sheet, however, deceived the Americans as well as their enemies, and about half a dozen Greenwich men resolved that the press should be stopped; they stole into the city, destroyed the press, and bagged the type, which they brought off with them from the very midst of a watchful enemy. Messrs. Andrew and Peter Mead were the principal men of the expedition. It is said that they only of the company were able to carry the bags of type from the printing-office to the street and throw them across the backs of their horses. After the type was brought to Greenwich it was totally destroyed, except enough to print each of the company's names, which the veterans kept for a long time in memory of their exploit.

THE KING STREET SKIRMISH.

One great disadvantage which the people were subjected to during the whole war was the absolute want of bayonets. Few companies could be found wholly armed with these valuable weapons. But Lieut. Mosher was the commander of a small company of men who were amply provided with them. This company may have been larger, but consisted of only eighteen soldiers at the time here mentioned. Seven of them were from the farm of Gen. Pierre Van Cortland, of Cortlandtown, about half a dozen of them from Greenwich, and the remainder from the vicinity of the town of Harrison. On the 4th of December, 1781, Capt. Richard Sacket, of the same company, was taken prisoner, having unwisely separated himself from his company. The light-horse of the enemy, under Col. Holmes (a Tory) and Capt. Kipp, attacked the company. The latter retreated to the vicinity of a tavern recently kept by William Merritt, in King Street, where they formed to withstand the charge of the troop of horse. Without shelter of any kind, and upon an open plain, these eighteen men successfully stood charge after charge from the troop. Lieut. Mosher ordered his men not to fire a shot, but sternly to await the onset. At the first charge Col. Holmes, finding himself repulsed, ordered Mosher to surrender or he would cut them all to pieces. The only reply vouchsafed by Mosher was, "Cut and be damned!" and with silence he withstood the first and second charges. But after the third charge he ordered his men to fire on the retiring troops, which they did with terrible execution. One man was killed and eight dangerously wounded, Capt. Kipp mortally. The horses of Col. Holmes and Capt. Kipp were also killed under them. Mosher's men, taking advantage of the discomfiture of their assailants, escaped to a neighboring piece of woods, not having a man even wounded. It is said to have been the most astonishing feat, on the part of both the officers and men, that was enacted during the whole war. Gen. Washington often spoke of this affair, and it was reported all over Europe to show the utility of the bayonet, and that a small body of infantry thus armed may successfully resist a strong body of cavalry. Several of the enemy were severely wounded before they were fired upon.

THE BRITISH IN NORTH STAMFORD.

At one time during the war the nearest American outpost to New York in this quarter was at Byram, and the enemy being bent upon a deprecatory expedition to North Stamford and Long Ridge, came suddenly in the night and cut every one of the guard to pieces. This whole expedition seems to have been marked by bloody and horrible deeds, and it is said that Tarleton himself commanded the force. The whole populace around collected and followed the enemy, to attack and worry them on their retreat. An ambuscade was formed at a defile in Round Hill, near the residence of Roswell Mills, Esq., where the road passes through steep rocks overgrown with thick laurel. At other places on their return the British and Tories were sorely pressed, but here a deadly fire poured in upon them, killing and wounding great numbers. On that day in the retreat one of their regiments lost their standard, to their great mortification and disgrace.

ANDREW MEAD, HUMPHREY DENTON, AND RICHARD MEAD.

These men—more, perhaps, than any others—deserve the highest praise for their brave and daring acts. It was not so much their province to counsel and advise as to act. "Old men for counsel and young men for action." Such men as Dr. Amos Mead, John Mackay, and Abraham Mead were of great service to the inhabitants as counsellors. They were all past the meridian of life, and one of them,

Dr. Amos Mead, had gained much experience by active service in the French war. But if any daring deed was to be accomplished, where hardy, brave, and reliable men were necessary, the three former were always selected. After all control of the town was lost to the Americans by the destructive expedition of Governor Tryon, it was not safe for a patriot to remain publicly in the limits for an hour, yet these three hung about the place, ready to assist the defenseless population against the brutalities of the Tories. Each possessed of his arms, a faithful dog, and a fleet horse, they spent their time about the village, hidden in the by- and secret places. The winter of 1780 was one of the severest on record. The Sound was frozen across, and a great amount of snow accumulated. Yet these men scarcely knew a night, during the early part of that winter, in which they did not sleep with their horses and dogs among the snow. During that winter some dozen or twenty head of cattle, the most of which belonged to Mr. Jerad Mead, were taken off in haste by the Tories, and driven towards New York. After much earnest solicitation on the part of the owner, the trio consented to make the most daring attempt of crossing the enemy's lines to retake them. There had been recently a storm of rain, which had frozen as it fell and rendered the roads extremely slippery and made a hard sharp crust upon the snow. The pursuers, therefore, went upon the Sound with their horses and kept the ice as far as Mamaroneck, and then, taking the road, could track the cattle by the blood which had trickled from the wounds of the bayonets which had forced them along. At Mount Vernon they retook the cattle, and were returning when they found they were pursued by a body of the enemy under a lieutenant. Their horses were tired by their swift ride, and they soon knew that their only safety was in separation, and in that case, even, one must be inevitably taken. Accordingly they left the cattle and plunged separately in different directions. The enemy selected Richard Mead, pursued, and took him prisoner. This was about the middle of January, 1780. He was taken to New York and thrown into the famous Sugar-House, where he remained for a period of six weeks until exchanged.

These three men were held in high estimation by the people. Their known patriotism and courage, which could ever be relied on, caused the other citizens, long after the Revolutionary war, to remember their acts with the greatest gratitude.

We append the following concerning the brave and redoubtable old Continental chieftain Putnam, being an address delivered by Col. H. W. R. Hoyt at the Centennial commemoration of the ride of Gen. Putnam at Greenwich, Feb. 26, 1779. The address was delivered Feb. 22, 1879:

"In a quiet graveyard in the town of Brooklyn in this State, Israel Putnam has long rested from his labors. Through storm and sunshine for nearly ninety years the worn and wounded body of the old hero has slept in its well-earned repose. Almost a century, filled with historical deeds and brilliant with the annals of great events, has gone by since he was gathered to his fathers, but his fame has not been lessened, and the halo that surrounds his name has become brighter with the lapse of time. To-day the State of his adoption, through her Legislature and voluntary organizations, and adjoining States, through their representatives, have risen up to do honor to his memory. His fiery courage, his generous qualities, his patriotic zeal, and his important services have made him a most prominent figure among the heroes of these days in which, amid the thunder of cannon and the tread of contending armies, the foundations of a great nation were established. His nature and education had well fitted him for leadership in that time of turmoil and achievement. His experience in the French and Indian wars, and the education which he was held by the authorities, had given him a high position in the military forces of the State; and when, at Cambridge, in 1775, Washington assumed command of the Revolutionary army, bringing with him the commissions of the four major-generals assigned by the Continental Congress, Putnam's name was delivered, in consequence of a want of confidence in those upon whom the others were to have been conferred. The incidents of his whole life are tinged with romance. He was familiar with peril from his early youth, and had he lived in the days of mythology, the popular fancy would have invested him with all the attributes and endowments which were bestowed upon the ancient divinities.

"The exploit of Gen. Putnam which we now commemorate occurred at a period of gloom and depression in the course of the struggle for independence. The spirit of the colonists was unconquerable, the fires of their patriotism were unquenched, but their government was a rope of sand. There seemed to be no power in the Continental Congress to enforce its resolutions and regulations or to provide for the supplies and payment of the troops. The value of the Continental issues had become greatly depreciated. The masses of the people were enduring hardship and privation with patience and resolution. Occasional discontent manifested itself and mutterings were heard among the soldiery, but their faith was unshaken, their determination unflinching, and, although without pay and publicly without food, they remained steadfast to the good cause.

"The headquarters of the army for that winter were at Middlebrook, on the Raritan River, in New Jersey. The battle-line extended from the Delaware easterly along the Highlands to West Point, and then, turning eastward, followed the Connecticut shores as far as Stonington. In the fall campaign Savannah had been captured by the enemy, and the province of Georgia was under the dominion of the British. Above the island of New York and a portion of Long Island flared the banner of St. George, and foreign sentinels paced their beats from the Hudson to the East River, the British general Pigot commanded in Rhode Island; but, with these exceptions, the Atlantic coast was in the possession of the patriots. Sir Henry Clinton held supreme command of the British forces, and from his headquarters in New York City caused frequent predatory excursions to be made up the fertile valley of the Bronx along the range of hills that forms the backbone of Westchester County, and from point to point along the shores of Long Island and Connecticut.

"In 1778, Gen. Putnam had been relieved from duty in the Highlands, and was afterwards assigned to the command of the forces in Connecticut. He had two brigades of the Continental line, one brigade of New Hampshire troops, Col. Hazen's regiment of infantry, and one of the four regiments of cavalry commanded by Col. Sheldon. His headquarters were at Keating, in this county, about six miles southerly from Danbury. From this point he supervised the military operations in this State and maintained communication with the Continental forces on the Hudson. Documents were obtained at various places, one of his most important reports being dated by him in this vicinity. The territory from Kingsbridge to Greenwich was known as a desolated ground, and to the population of this time was a region of anxiety and danger. Lying along the border of this desolated territory, the people of Greenwich were in a most deplorable condition. Many of her sons were in the military service. Of those who were at home a large proportion were open avowed Loyalists, and a third class, who were living upon the possession of British permits, scarcely gave them food and finished supplies to the enemy. It was a winter of unusual severity. With but few exceptions, the people were weighed down by poverty, cold and hunger their only companions, and the most rigid economy was scarcely sufficient to supply them with the scantiest means for supporting life. The depression of the Continental currency, the severe taxation that had been resorted to to enable the State to pay the proportion of the public debt, and the expenses of the general Government that had been assigned to her, and the uncertain tenure of life and property, had destroyed all enterprise and rendered business undertakings impossible. Men moved about in fear and trepidation. Their hiding-places were in the fields and woods. No one knew the moment when a bullet from a concealed enemy might strike him down. Families were divided against each other; social ties were disrupted; old friends and neighbors regarded each other with hatred and distrust."

GREENWICH IN 1779.

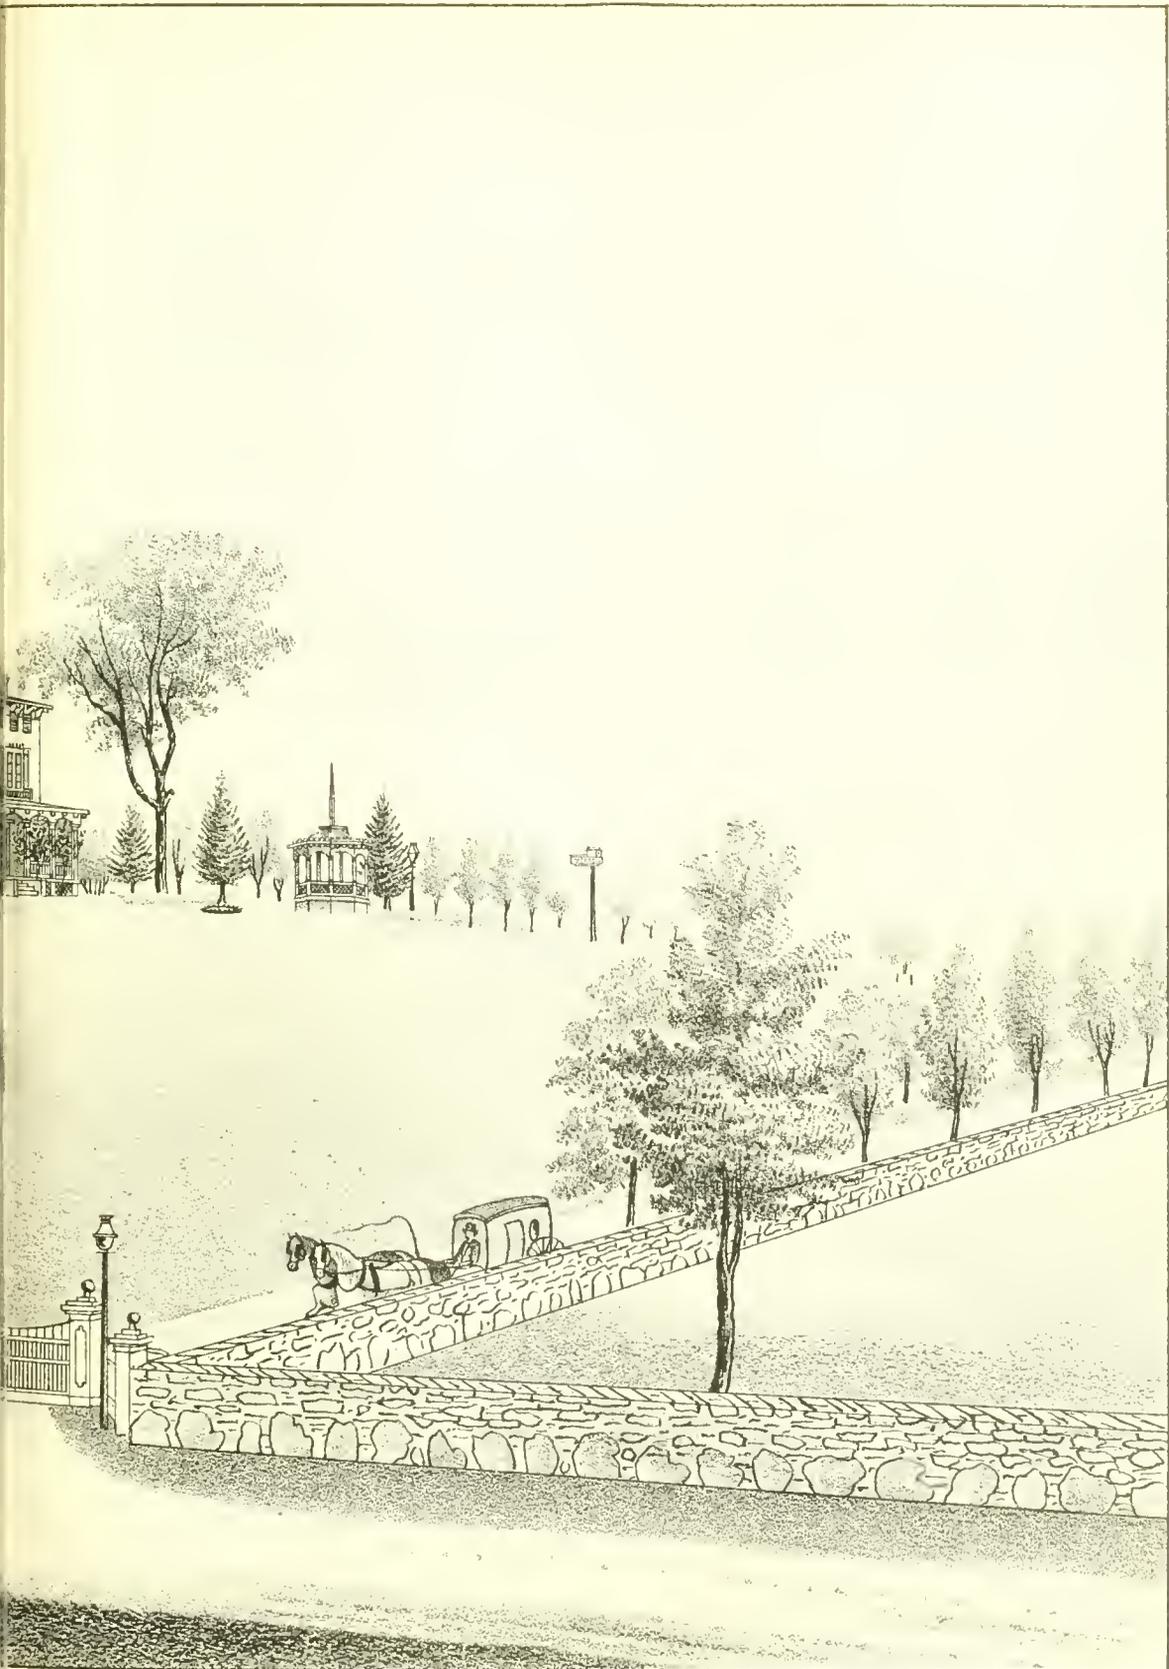

"The physical appearance of the town has been greatly changed. The stately mansions that now adorn the street along which Putnam rode in 1779 were then represented by the quaint dwellings of that early day, with gable-ends and long, low-slanting roofs. Just beyond the foot of the precipice now known as Putnam Hill, then stood the residence of Gen. Ebenezer Mead, who was a prominent member of the committee of safety and a soldier in the Continental service. On the summit of the hill, north of the old Episcopal church, was the residence of Jabez Fitch. The church itself was a plain frame building without walls, with the rafters showing overhead, and was so frail a structure that it was unable to withstand the force of the gale by which it was destroyed in 1821. The rear of the building stood a few feet from the brow of the hill. The main country road, as it was then called, led through the village to a point near the edge of the precipice, and then ran northerly for some three hundred feet. At the latter point it turned sharply to the south, and, hugging the side of the hill beneath the rocks that frowned above it, descended with a steep inclination to a point about eighty feet south of the present causeway. Then, bending again to the east, it trended off in the direction of Stamford. Northerly and westerly of the church, across the point where the passage-way has since been blasted through the rocks, the ground was level and unbroken. South of the church edifice was the graveyard, in which today are seen a few lonely and deserted relics of the past. From the rear of the church, across land now owned by Rev. B. M. Yarrington, a fence ran easterly down the hill along the southerly margin of the old road. Between the carriage-path and the fence rough and unimproved stones had been placed from time to time, forming an irregular stairway up the hill. The face of the precipice was covered with a growth of bushes. Westerly from the summit of the hill, and opposite the present vestry of the Episcopal church, was the old tavern kept at that time by Israel Knapp. The original building is still in existence, and is owned by J. E. Jencks Hays, the stone wing having been constructed since the period of which I now speak. Still farther towards the village stood an old house on the northwest corner of the present homestead of A. Foster Higgins, and on the lot now occupied by the Greenwich Academy was the residence of Moses Haslet. At this house the Amos and guards were frequently quartered. Just easterly of the church in which we are now assembled stood the house of Daniel Smith, which was burned by Tryon, and on the lot across the street, opposite the old Town Hall, had been erected another building, the property of Jared Mead. His residence stood near the present homestead of Frederick Mead. Angell Haslet (2d), owned a house on the land now occupied by the Congregational cemetery. Between that building and this church edifice the house of worship of the Second Congregational Society—in dimensions thirty-five by fifty feet—had been standing since 1730. Capt. John Hobby kept a public-house on the property now owned by Prof. William G. Peck. Clemente Hobby lived on the site of the Greenwich Savings Bank. Another house was situated on the ground now occupied by the Lenox House, and from that point to Rocky Neck, on the Sound, there was not a building in existence. Opposite the Lenox House was a building, then kept as a tavern, which is still standing, and is occupied by John H. Sutfen. On the property of Jacob T. West stood another dwelling, and near the residence of Capt. J. G. Mead was a dwelling-house that has been destroyed within the past fifteen years. On the brow of the hill, on the ground now occupied by the homestead of Col. Thomas A. Mead, stood another house, then owned by Col. Richard Mead. In place of the magnificent row of trees that now line Putnam Avenue there stood three ball-and-trees, two of which still remain. One of them is on the ground of Col. Thomas A. Mead, the other stands in front of the residence of the late Peter Akor, and the third stood near the dividing-line between the grounds of Luther P. Hulbar and Prof. William G. Peck."

PUTNAM'S RIDE.

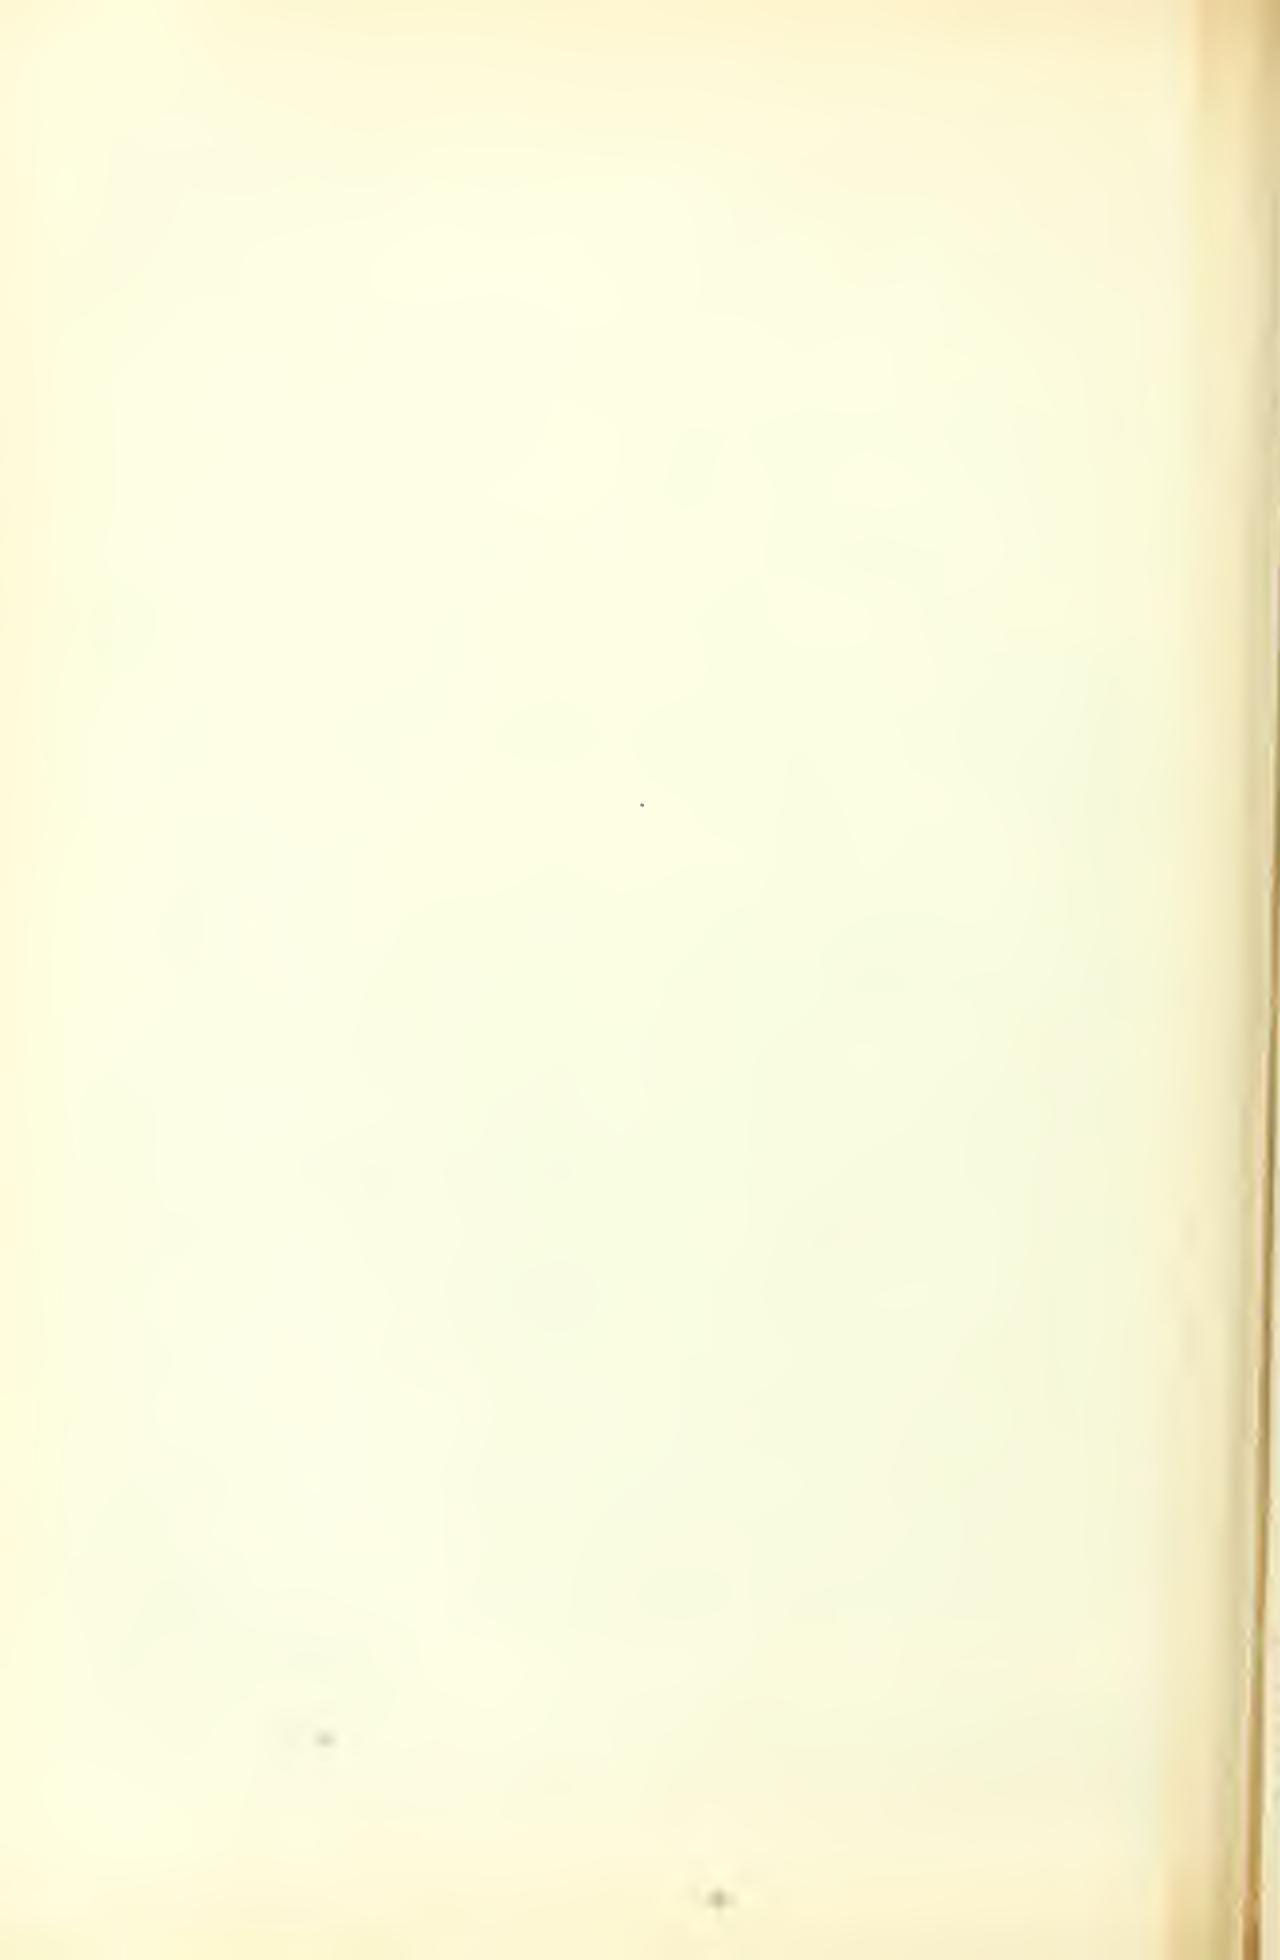

"The 26th day of February, 1779, is memorial in the annals of Greenwich. Guided by the records and traditions that exist, by the statements of eye-witnesses that have been handed down from generation to generation, we are able to put forth our hands into the shadows of the past and rescue from oblivion the true story of the incidents of that day that sur the blood at the bare road. As before, more objects of Putnam's exploit there may be room for dispute, but the main fact is beyond question. The morning broke cold and dreary. A feeling of uneasiness and uncertain apprehension had gained a place in the community. Down towards the British lines there was a movement among the soldiery out of that region of silence and desolation that intervened came the sound of martial buglions and the clatter of squadrons of horsemen. Their purpose and destination were unknown, but to the people of Greenwich, accustomed to alarm, these signs were ominous of danger. The official records show that on the evening of Feb. 25, 1779, a marauding expedition started from King's Bridge, commanded by Major-General Tryon, the Tory Governor of New York. His force consisted of about fifteen hundred men, composed of British and Hessian troops and two regiments of Tories. At New Rochelle they were met by a small body of Continental skirmishers, commanded by Capt. Titus Watson, who had been sent forward to reconnoitre. This company at once retreated, but near Milton, in the town of Rye, was overtaken and attacked. Their force became divided; a number of them were killed. A portion of the company concealed themselves in the swamps, and the remainder made their escape along the highway to the Byram River, which they reached in time to destroy the bridge before they were overtaken by their pursuers. Over the hills at full gallop rode Capt. Watson and his companions, to give warning to the few troops then in Greenwich. Col. Holdridge, of Hartford County, was in command of the outpost. General Putnam had arrived but a few days previous, to obtain information as to the military situation, and was then in the village. At this point occurs the first discrepancy in the traditions of that day, but the prevailing current of authority seems to indicate that his quarters at that time were at the public-house kept by Israel Knapp, which was known in later years as the Tray place. The enemy reached Greenwich at about nine o'clock on the morning of the 26th. The small body of Americans were posted across the road on the eminence south of the Congregational church. They had two small cannon, without horses or draughts. A portion of them were deployed as skirmishers on either flank, leaving but about sixty men to hold this position. A contest here would have been madness. They had no cavalry; the enemy outnumbered them ten to one. The guns were fired upon the advancing column, and then the order was given for retreat.

"In the van of Tryon's forces rode DeLancey's company, composed of Tories from Westchester County, who had enrolled themselves beneath the royal banners and were the most bitter and malignant enemies of the patriots. At the approach of this body, charging at a gallop, the few Continentals withdrew from the field, and Putnam started on his horse for Stamford to obtain reinforcements. Along the frozen highway ring the steel-shod hoofs of the Continental charger; thundering on in swift pursuit ride the enemy's dragons. The unexpected perils are almost within their grasp. Every nerve is strained to its utmost tension. The wheels are driven de profundis into the flanks of the firesteeds. When steel flashes in the sunlight, their scabbards clank loudly in the trusty air. Each man, ambitious of the glory of being the savior of so distinguished an officer in the rebel service, leans forward in his saddle, as though to lessen the distance between himself and the flying horseman. Nearer and nearer to the old hero come the pursuers. Only a moment more, and the mad chase will be ended and the American general will be a prisoner in the hands of his enemies. But by this time the brow of the hill is reached, and the bold rider—to whom fate is unknown, who in his lifetime has headed the wild beasts of the forest in their den, who in the line of duty has faced gun death a hundred times with unquailing eye—spurs his horse right onward across the precipice, and amid a volley of bullets from his balling pursuers takes his leap into chivalry.

"Here again the local traditions do not entirely agree. There were eye-witnesses to Putnam's ride both among the citizens of Greenwich and the troops under his command. All the traditions occur as to the spot at which he reached the foot of the hill, but the place at which he began his descent and the precise course he took are mixed in some obscurity. One story is that, leaving the highway, he turned slightly to his right, and, passing closely by the northeast corner of the church, rode near or directly down the steps. The other story places his point of divergence from the highway about one hundred feet north of the church, gives him a southeast course, and makes him strike the steps about one-third of the distance from the foot of the hill. Both accounts are based on statements made originally by those who witnessed the occurrence, but which have been forgotten or misunderstood in the course of frequent repetition. One thing, however, is certain: whatever may have been his starting-point, he performed a deed which the rough riders who followed him dared not emulate, which is worthy of historical mention and is a glorious exploit for commemoration.

"It is not my purpose to enter the controversy of the capture of Greenwich. The British losses attended through the engagement during the time in speculation and debate have resulted in a confused and unaided characterization of their doing. The water of their actions and property of every kind proved their better and more numerous. A detachment went to the Mianm River and burned the salt-stores, a schooner, and a sloop. At night, still the order to retreat was given. Reinforcements had arrived, and the American soldiers, on retreating, enemy, blazing upon their flanks and rear, retreated, recapturing the plunder they had stolen, and turning the reverse of the British into a substantial victory."

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

As early as 1643 Greenwich was taxed for preaching, and there was occasional service held in town. In 1660 the male inhabitants numbered about twenty, and all were obliged to contribute pro rata for the support of preaching, and attendance on divine service was enforced by law. Non-attendance was punished by a penalty of five shillings. The church was organized in 1670, and in 1675 a call was extended to Rev. Mr. Wizwell, who declined it.

PASTORS

The first pastor was Rev. Jeremiah Peck, and his salary was paid at "fifty pounds with fire-wood, or sixty pounds without fire-wood." Rev. Jeremiah Peck, 1678-89; Rev. Abraham Pierson, 1691-94; Rev. Salmon Treat, 1695-97; Rev. Joseph Morgan, 1697-1700; Rev. Nathaniel Bowers, 1707, remained probably two years. Mr. Jones supplied the church for a short time after Mr. Bower's dismissal, and was succeeded in 1715 by Rev. Mr. Sackett, and probably remained about two years. He was subsequently pastor at New Greenwich eleven years. Rev. Ephraim Bostwick, 1739-46; Rev. Ebenezer Davenport, 1743-60; Rev. Robert Morris, 1785-94. After 1794 the pulpit was supplied by the Rev. Platt Bullitt and Rev. Abner Benedict.

At the beginning of the century Rev. Samuel Sturge was pastor, and remained seven years; Rev. John Noyes, 1810-24; Rev. Charles F. Butler, 1824-34; Rev. Thomas Payne, 1837-42; Rev. S. B. S. Bissell, 1842-53; Rev. William A. Hyde, 1851-64; Rev. W. F. Arms, 1864, nearly two years; supply; Rev. William P. Hammond, 1867-72; Rev. J. S. Payne, 1872-76; Rev. Granville W. Nims, 1876-78. Frank S. Child, A.M., the present pastor, was installed Feb. 27, 1879.

THE CHURCH EDIFICES.

The first church edifice was erected in about the year 1666, near Greenwich Cove. The second church building is supposed to have stood near the Myanus. The third church edifice stood on the elevation of land south of the present residence of Mr. Charles Husted, and was built by Congregationalists, aided by the Episcopalians. The present building was commenced in 1855, and completed a few years later.

The old society and church books are very meagre in their records, and those in possession of the church to-day date back less than a hundred years. The treasurer's books give us some definite information. From them we learn that the annual salary of committeemen varied from fifty cents to one dollar and a half; in 1830 it was one dollar. The treasurer was more generously paid, receiving for his services the sum of two dollars. In those days it cost thirty-seven cents to sweep the church.

Among the charges on the treasurer's book we find one which denotes the status of the temperance question at that date. At the society's annual meeting, 18—, the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents was expended on liquors with which to regale the company.

In the early history of the church the people assembled for worship at eight o'clock in the morning; they brought their heaters and their benches with them. The pulpit was high above the heads of the people. Contributions were made by the magistrate and principal men of the congregation passing to the deacon's seat and depositing their gifts in the cash-box. Seats were assigned by an officer. Position and dignity in the community determined the matter of precedence.

The following extract appears in the Farmer's Journal, published at Danbury, under date Feb. 15, 1791:

THE SECOND CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

In an address delivered by Rev. Joel H. Linsley, D.D., Dec. 5, 1858, he says,—

"In March, 1682, the town, by their vote, directed that a number of home-lots should be laid out at Horseneck, but at the same time forbid the occupants from seeking any organization, civil or religious, separate from the town. Twelve years later, 1694, the town voted to build a new meeting-house, 32 by 26, which vote, however, does not seem to have been carried into effect.† Nearly at the same time there began to be dissensions between the inhabitants on the two sides of the river about the maintenance of worship on this side. Two years later, in 1696, Salmon Treat was called to settle in the town, with a provision for his preaching every third Sabbath at Horseneck,—the first recognition of this place as entitled to preaching,—but he did not accept the call. Early in 1699, by vote of the town, a home-lot was granted for a parsonage at Horseneck. The Rev. Joseph Morgan, the next minister, is believed to have come here in the autumn of 1696. He preached at first on both sides of the river, as it had been contemplated Mr. Treat should do; but it soon created dissatisfaction. The proprietors of the town say by vote that 'Mr. Morgan preaching part of the time at Horseneck is a damage to them, and takes away their religious privileges.'‡ Mr. Morgan continued the minister of the town four years, till May, 1700. He then left the settlement east of the Myanus, and assigned as a reason the want of union among the people. He seems after that to have labored on this side of the river, as we find the inhabitants bestowing upon him in January, 1705, some special privileges. On the 5th of March following the town was by vote divided into two societies; and here we suppose that we find the true date of the founding of this church. After this, Mr. Morgan continued its pastor till he was dismissed, October, 1708, by vote of the town, whether with or without any other formalities does not appear.§

"It has been thought that the dismission of Mr. Morgan was the last action of the town in ecclesiastical affairs. There were, however, votes of the town in 1709 and 1711 for providing a parsonage for the West society, and also a vote in 1713 assigning a location for their church, which was near the site we now occupy. Three years later, December, 1716, we find the town holding a meeting in the new house, which shows that the building is erected and so far advanced towards completion as to be occupied. It also indicates that the centre of population was changing from the east to the west side of the river. We ascertain, then, with tolerable certainty the following facts: That on the 5th of March, 1705, the two congregations became distinct by mutual agreement. Of course we must presume that this church was at that time regularly organized, with Joseph Morgan for its acting pastor. Its first house of worship was built by the town eleven years afterwards, in 1716. Its erection was voted through a series of years, from 1694 to 1713; the building itself, however, meanwhile made no progress. It would be difficult to say at what time its foundations were actually laid; probably, however, it was soon after the vote of 1713, which fixed its site between the dwellings of Joseph Chase and Ephraim Palmer. That house stood from 1716 to Jan. 7, 1793, a period of eighty-two years. During the latter part of this time it was in a very dilapidated state. At length the

† This is understood to be in the east settlement, now called Old Greenwich; and it may here be noted that in all early votes "the town" describes this settlement, then the seat of power.

‡ They add, "We think it convenient to give Mr. Morgan a qualification that we would not have him preach at Horseneck, but continue in the town."

§ The event here mentioned took place one hundred and fifty years since,—a period so far remote as to render it not improper to introduce an amusing incident suited to illustrate these early times. We find on the records of the town a very significant vote. In January, 1705, the inhabitants in the west settlement had granted Mr. Morgan, to aid in his support, a tide-mill, now owned by Mr. S. Davis. Three years after this Ebenezer Mead, Joshua Knapp, and Cadeo Knapp were sent to him as a committee "to see if he would cease tending his mill in person, and provide a miller, so that he might attend to the people;" and if he would not, the process of relief was to be of a summary character: "The committee were to consider the pulpit vacant, and at once proceed to provide another minister."

house we are now in was covered, and by the removal of the seats from the old house to the new was prepared so as to be occupied. It was dedicated Jan. 7, 1799, by the then pastor, Isaac Lewis, Sr. His discourse on that occasion was founded on Genesis xxxviii. 17. "And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven."* Everything shows that the old building had become unsightly and uncomfortable, and that it had been used to the last moment. Hence the hurry of the removal. The building was finished three years afterwards, the funds for that purpose being raised by a tax. The first renting of the pews† was December, 1802. The rental amounted to about $100. The whole cost of the church is thought to have been not far from $6000,—a heavier tax upon the property of the congregation than $60,000 would be now.‡

The following is a list of the pastors of this church: Richard Sackett, Stephen Monson, Daniel Granger, Abraham Todd, Jonathan Murdock, Isaac Lewis, Sr., Isaac Lewis, Jr., Joel Mann, J. H. Linsley, F. G. Clark, C. R. Treat.

The first church edifice was erected in about 1716, the second in 1730, and the third in 1798. The present church edifice was completed in 1858, at a cost of about fifty thousand dollars. The present deacons of the church are Charles Mead, Elkanah Mead, Moses Cristy, T. S. Pimco, M.D., William A. Howe.

The following is a list of members from 1728 to 1800:

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, STANWICH;

The church was organized in June, 1735, with thirteen members. The first pastor was Rev. Benjamin Strong, who served until March 3, 1767.

The pastors from the organization of the church to the present time are as follows: Rev. Benjamin Strong, June 17, 1735, to March 3, 1767; Rev. William Seward, Feb. 24, 1774, to Feb. 4, 1794; Rev. Platt Bullett, May 25, 1796, to June 30, 1835; Rev. Daniel Butts, Oct. 2, 1839, to Dec. 6, 1842; Rev. Monzo B. Rich, April 26, 1848, to Nov. 3, 1854; Rev. Henry G. Jessup, April 26, 1853, to Sept. 30, 1862; Rev. John S. Bayne, May 18, 1869, to Oct. 8, 1872; Rev. Homer Bradwell, 1875-78; Rev. F. C. Potter, Dec. 16, 1879, present incumbent.

The present officers of the church are as follows: Pastor, F. C. Potter; Deacons, George Derby, Alexander Lockwood, and Lewis M. Close; Clerk, George A. Lockwood. For information concerning this church we are indebted to Rev. F. C. Potter.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, NORTH GREENWICH

This church was organized Dec. 25, 1827, with eighteen members, as follows: Hannah (Close), wife of Lewis Mead; Rebecca (Holly), wife of Seymour Hobby; Sarah (Knapp), wife of Isaac Peck; Calvin Mead and Deborah, his wife; Hannah (Peck), wife of Darins Mead; Abigail (Rundle), wife of Levi Mead; Obadiah Mead and Alla, his wife; Luther Mead and Annis, his wife; Thizza (Mead), widow of James Palmer; William Loundsberry, Lewis Mead, Silas H. Mead, Huldah Mead, Heman Mead, Susan Loundsberry.

LIST OF MINISTERS.

The pastors have been: Channey Wilcox, June 25, 1828, to May 5, 1846; Frederic Munson, Sept. 22, 1847, to April 22, 1856; John Blood, Nov. 11, 1856, to Oct. 12, 1858; William H. Knouse, May 1, 1859, to May 3, 1863; William P. Alcott, Feb. 18, 1868, to Aug. 4, 1874; Alpheus Winter, June 27, 1876, to Aug. 4, 1877. Lemuel S. Potwin was acting pastor from Sept. 4, 1863, to March 1, 1865; Solomon H. Schofield, May 3, 1865, to May 1, 1867; Richard B. Bull, from Aug. 19, 1868, to 1878.

DEACONS.

Silas Harvey Mead was one of the active ones in the formation of the North Greenwich Church, and was chosen deacon the day the church was organized. He held his office and performed all the duties of it till his death, after a few days' illness, Dec. 14, 1878, aged eighty-two, having been in office fifty-one years lacking eleven days. He was a man of wisdom, perseverance, and success in promoting the interests of the church, and was a model for men of that office in prayerfulness, self-sacrifice, and diligence. The land—twelve acres—on which the church building and parsonage stand was his gift, and the position of the church early taken against slavery and intemperance was largely due to him.

Obadiah Mead, one of the first members of the church, was chosen deacon and ordained Sept. 28, 1828, and died in office. He was a man of marked ability and usefulness. At the semi-centennial of the church the pastor said of him, "Deacon Obadiah Mead, aged ninety-two years and nine months, who has been able to be in his place in this sanctuary, till within a few weeks, every Sabbath, but who to-day can almost see the boatman who is to ferry him over to the shores of bright deliverance."

Josiah Wilcox was ordained Sept. 2, 1864, and is now in active service. Silas D. Mead, son of Deacon S. H. Mead, was chosen soon after his father's death, Jan. 14, 1879. The present membership of the church is about one hundred and fifty.

The church was organized Dec. 25, 1827, and took the name of "The North Greenwich Congregational Church." It began in self-support, and has always paid its bills and kept itself free from debt.

The pastor is supported by tax on the assessment of the property of the society as it stands on the town-list, after having received such contributions from them who are not members of the society, but who are willing to pay for seats. The assessment is now nine mills on the dollar.

The testimony of the church has always been real and earnest on the questions of anti-slavery and temperance. It has used no fermented wine at communion since 1850.

In the war for the Union and Freedom twenty-nine men from the church and congregation put their names on the roll of honor, six of whom gave their lives.

The Sunday-school was organized in April, 1828. In 1829 it had fourteen teachers and forty-two scholars. Selah Savage was chosen superintendent in 1832, and has been annually chosen to that office since that time, nearly forty-eight years. In fitness for his work and the doing of it he has few equals.

The Ladies' Beneficent Society of the church was organized in 1848. All that has been done to the church since that time has been its work. The Bible, bell, window-blinds, lamps, cushions, carpets, furniture, and stoves the ladies' society paid for. It has also done much of the work needed on the parsonage. Mrs. Silas Husted and Mrs. Silas D. Mead have been in the office of first and second directors of the society since 1852. Mrs. Amy (Husted) Chase has been secretary and treasurer for many years.

The contributions of the church to benevolent objects average about five hundred and seventy-five dollars per annum.

SILAS D. MEAD is a lineal descendant of one John Mead, who came from England in company with his two sons, John and Joseph, in 1642, and after remaining a short time in Massachusetts settled at Hempstead, L. I., where they remained until October, 1660, when they settled in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., where many of the descendants now (Nov. 2, 1880) reside. (For a more extended sketch of his ancestors see biography of Col. Thomas A. Mead.)

Silas Mead, "the first," second son of the second Ebenezer, was born May 22, 1720, and died in the year 1817. His wife, Mrs. Mary Mead, was born in 1724 and died in 1787. Their children were as follows: Silas, Abner, Aaron, Mary, Mary (2d), and Calvin.

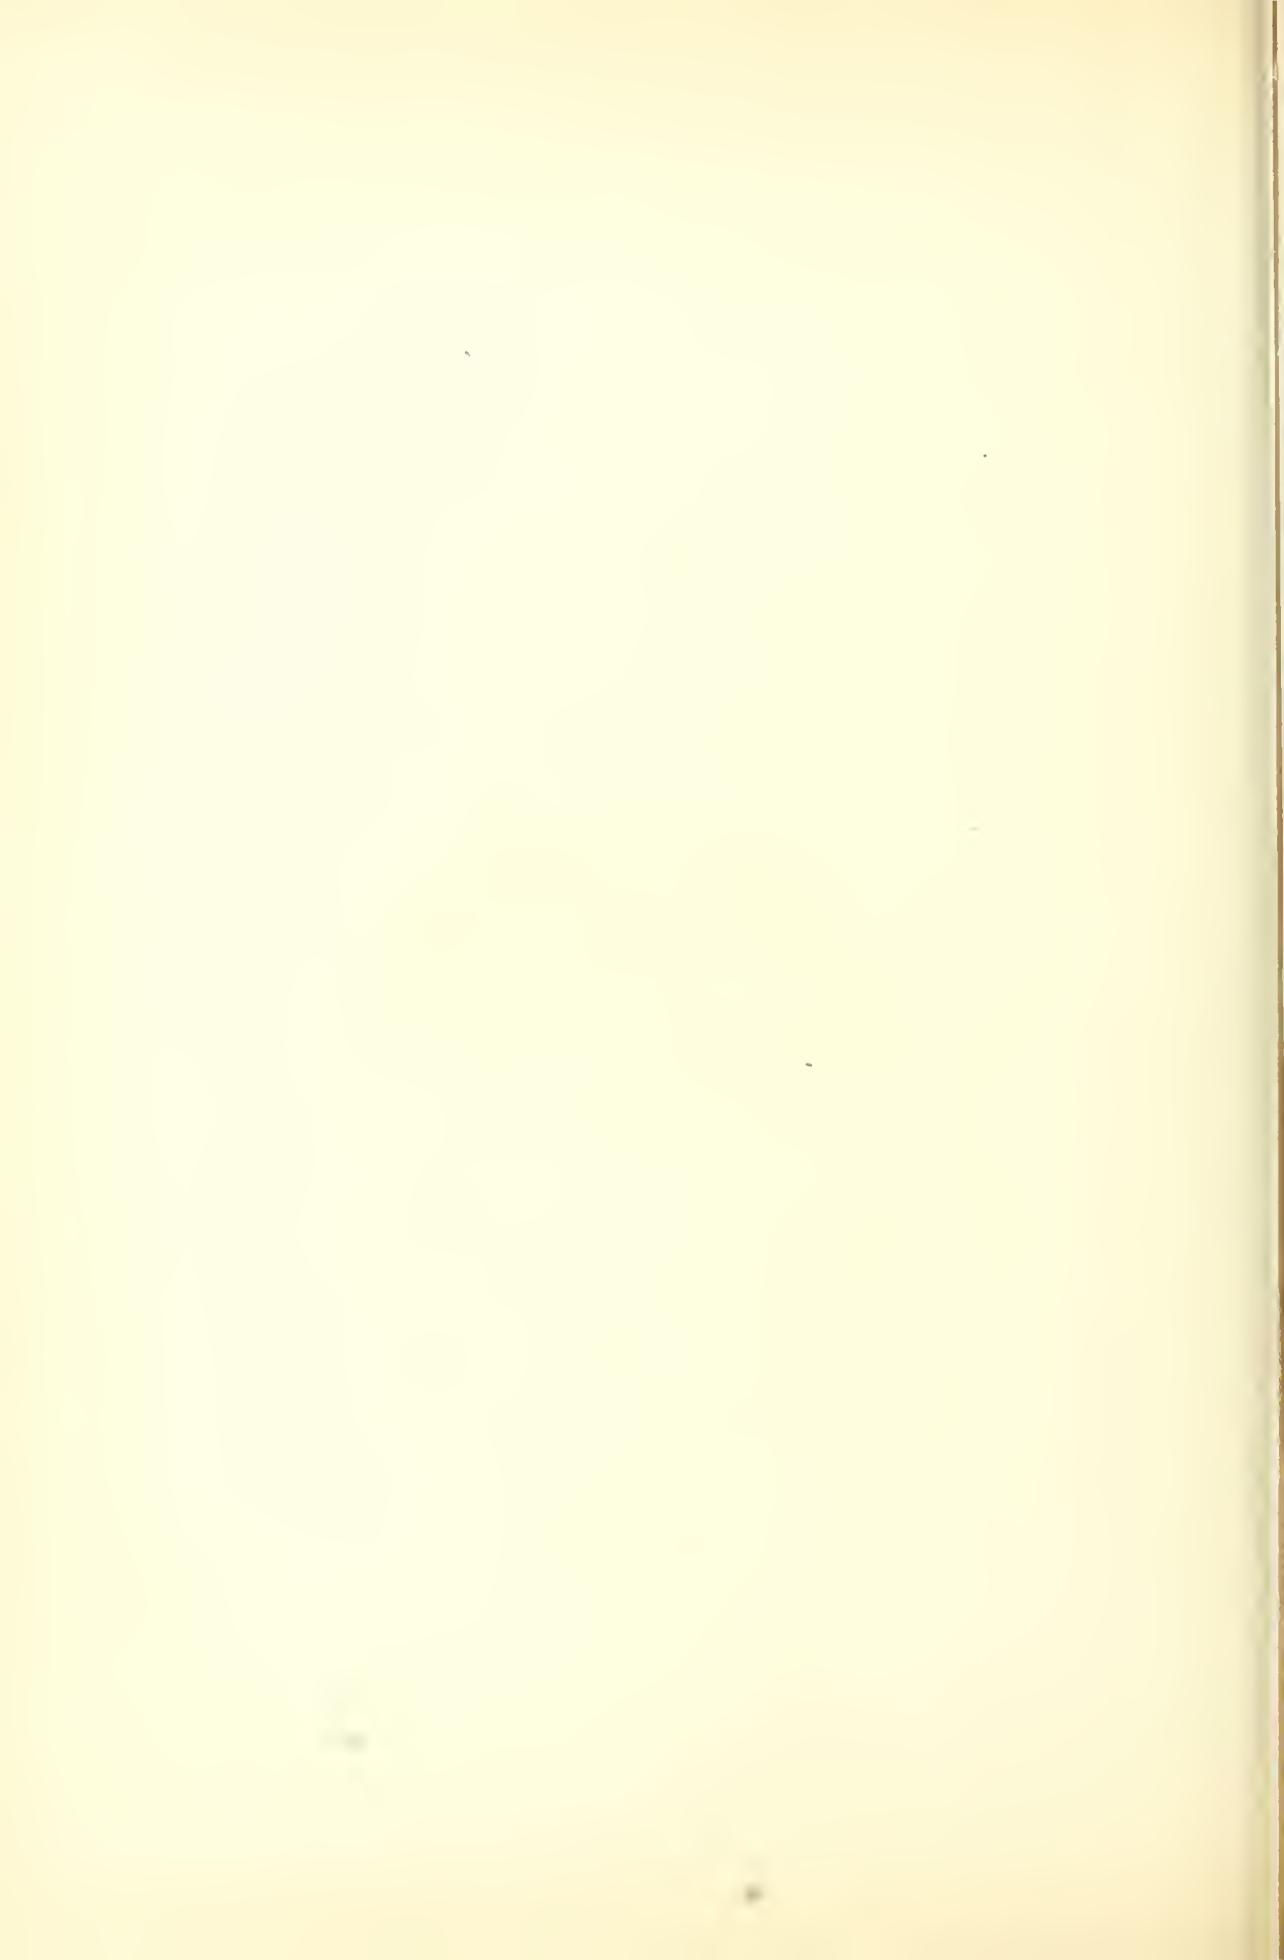

Silas Mead, the first, settled at North Greenwich, and was a farmer. He was a member of the Second Congregational Church at Greenwich.

Silas Mead, "the second," was born in 1748 and died in 1813. His wife was Sarah Mead, a daughter of Deliverance Mead, who was also the sixth son of the second Ebenezer Mead. Their children were as follows: Sarah, Silas H., and Francis, who died young. Mr. Mead lived on the "old home" farm, and was a substantial citizen of North Greenwich, Conn. He was killed by being thrown from a wagon near his home; his wife died in 1812.

Silas H. Mead was born Dec. 12, 1796, at North Greenwich, Conn.; he was a large farmer and a leading man in the community. In politics he was an uncompromising Abolitionist, and by voice and vote did all he could to educate the people of his community to the idea of human liberty. He united with the Second Congregational Church at Greenwich in 1826, and immediately took a deep interest in religious matters.

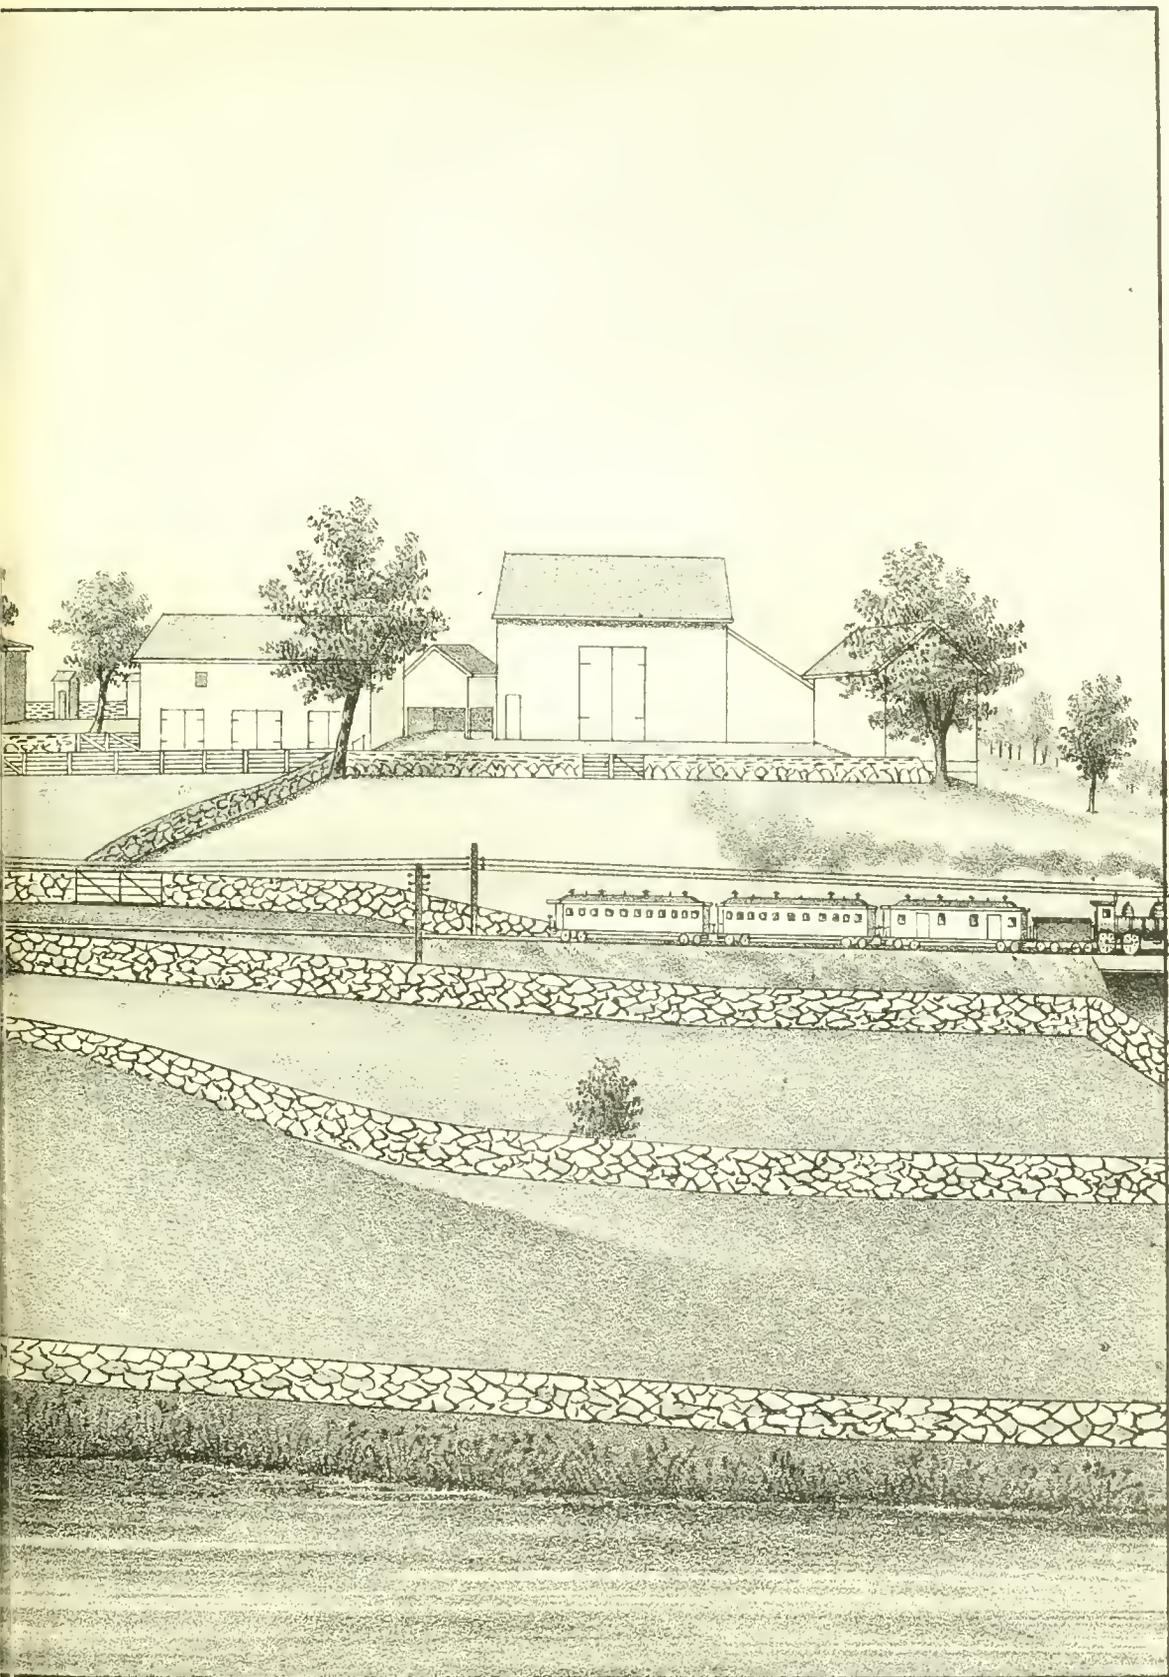

The Congregational Church at North Greenwich was built in 1827, and its erection was largely due to the interest and efforts of Mr. Mead. He was chosen its first deacon, which honorable position he held until the day of his death, Dec. 14, 1878. He always took a deep interest in missionary matters, and was very liberal towards all religious enterprises. He was one of Greenwich's best and most respected citizens, and, dying, left the record of a good name.

He married Harriet Mead, daughter of Jehiel Mead, and had the following children: Sarah M. (who married Selah Savage, a farmer of North Greenwich, and has two children, William L. and Roxa M.), and Silas D. (2d). Mrs. Mead died July 1, 1870.

SILAS D. MEAD (2d) was born at North Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., Jan. 31, 1819. He received a common-school and academic education. He married Emily L., daughter of Ezekiel Close and Althea Palmer, Sept. 22, 1849. She was born Dec. 21, 1820, in Greenwich, Conn. Their children are as follows: Myrtilla, Silas D., Emily Cornelia, Sarah C. (deceased), Horatio B., Harriet A., and Ezekiel C. Myrtilla married Livingston Disbrow, a farmer, of New Rochelle, N. Y. Silas E. married Cornelia M., daughter of Josiah Wilcox, and has four children, Silas F. (who died at four), Mable W., Louise C., and Josiah W.

Mr. Mead owns a portion of his father's farm, which has been in the family for many generations; to this he has added until he now owns over three hundred and forty acres of land. He has made all the improvements on his farm.

In 1838 he united with the Congregational Church at North Greenwich, and has been one of its most liberal supporters and best workers. He has taken charge of the singing for more than forty years, and is to be found at his post of duty to-day. In March, 1879, he was chosen deacon, to take the place so long and faithfully filled by his honored father.

He has always been identified with the Sunday-school interests of his church, and has been a teacher for many years. He is a thorough temperance man, never having used tobacco or liquor of any kind. He is very liberal in all matters pertaining to educational or religious matters, and is, and has been for more than forty years, one of the strong pillars of the Congregational Church at North Greenwich.

In politics he was a Whig until 1856, when he joined the Republican party.

STEEP HOLLOW CHAPEL.

The Steep Hollow Chapel Sunday-school was started in a small old district school-house on the Mianus River, by Mr. Stickney and others from Stamford, about 1850, and furnished with a library. It was kept for about two years (in the summer), and then given up.

Soon after, Rev. Mr. Bessel and others from Old Greenwich and Mianus started it again, and continued it for three summers, using the same house and library, when it was again given up.

In the spring of 1856, Miss Beers, an earnest Christian lady, teaching in the district, with the aid of Miss Ritch, started it once more, commencing with a few scholars, in the same old school-house. They invited Rev. Mr. Hyde, Deacon Hawes, and others to help them. Very soon the number of pupils so increased that the house was full, and some were obliged to remain outside on the wall. Many had been furnished with hats and shoes for the first time. Some were children of Catholic parents, who were furnished with testaments bearing a gift cross, put on them by Miss Ritch. They took them home and read them, and when they moved away they carried the good influence with them, but the hats and shoes the teachers found hung upon the cart-stake. A library containing two hundred volumes, with thirty Bibles, was furnished, and Mr. Dodge, Revs. Brush, Button, and Cristy have been superintendents.

Miss Ritch carried the library home every week for two years, when a chapel was built on a new and beautiful spot, at a cost of about sixteen hundred dollars, furnished with blinds and painted, and not one dollar owing on it, in 1858 and 1859; it has been kept in a very prosperous condition ever since, and has averaged about ninety scholars for the last twenty years. The superintendent and teachers all come from two to four miles, in heat and cold, summer and winter.

In the collections for Christian work, &c., the average is about one hundred dollars a year.

There is a Sabbath-school missionary association. Monthly letters have been received from missionaries in Wisconsin and Kansas, and a sum amounting to nearly seventy dollars has been contributed yearly to their support.

CHRIST CHURCH, GREENWICH.

The first Episcopal services were held in this town in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and the first church edifice was erected in 1749, and stood on the brow of Putnam's Hill. This was demolished by a gale in 1821. A new church building was erected in 1832, and May 4, 1834, was consecrated by Rt. Rev. Thomas Church Brownell, D.D., LL.D., bishop of the diocese. The present church edifice was erected in 1856.

The following have served the church as rectors: Revs. James Wetmore, Ebenezer Dibble, Amzi Rogers, Robert Davis, Joseph H. Nichols, and Benjamin M. Yarrington. The latter began his labors with the parish April 27, 1839, and is the present rector.

EMANUEL CHURCH, GLENVILLE.

This building was consecrated April 22, 1842, by Rt. Rev. Thomas Church Brownell, D.D., LL.D., bishop of the diocese. Present, Rev. Ambrose Todd, D.D., Rev. William C. Mead, D.D., Rev. John Purves, Rev. Mr. Howell, Rev. B. M. Yarrington; also, of diocese of New York, Rev. Thomas Coit, D.D., Rev. Mr. Harris, and Rev. Mr. Partridge.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH is located at Riverside.

CALVARY CHURCH, ROUND HILL.

This church was incorporated June 25, 1859, with Isaac Peck and Barton White, Wardens; Nathaniel Ferris, Benjamin Knapp, James Husted, Daniel Sniffen, Jonathan Husted, C. W. Merritt, Zalmon Minor, and John Purdy, Jr., Vestrymen; James Husted, Clerk. This church was erected in the summer of 1860, and the first service held in it was by Rev. Isaac Peck, Aug. 26, 1860. It was consecrated by Bishop Williams on Oct. 29, 1860. The baptismal font was presented by the vestry of Christ Church, Greenwich.

The following have been rectors: Rev. Isaac Peck, Aug. 26, 1860, to Feb. 26, 1865; Rev. William Binet (in charge), Aug. 14, 1865, to Jan. 15, 1866; Rev. D. H. Short, D.D., July 15, 1866, to Feb. 18, 1867. Rev. B. M. Yarrington held occasional services, which were continued by lay-readings by Mark Banks, Esq., of Greenwich, until the coming of Rev. R. H. Barns, who was rector from April 24, 1868, to April 24, 1871. Rev. C. W. Bolton has been minister in charge from Nov. 1, 1872, to the present.

The church was built by the efforts and personal contributions of Dr. Barton T. White, resident physician of the place. The officers at present (1880) are as follows: Wardens, Nathaniel Ferris, Col. T. A. Haight; vestry, Benjamin Knapp, W. H. Briggs, Dr. J. C. White, H. Thompson, Edward Reddington.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, GREENWICH.

The first sermon preached by a Methodist in this place was about the year 1810, by a Rev. Mr. Canfield, but no regular church organization was effected until 1813, as shown by the following agreement:

"Whereas, The members of the Methodist Episcopal Church resident in Horseneck, in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., desire to make provision for the maintenance of the public worship of God according to the usages and doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church in said Horseneck as may be considered necessary;

"Therefore, We, the undersigned, for the accomplishment of the above-named object, do hereby by mutual agreement associate ourselves together as a religious society for the maintenance of the public worship of God according to the said usages and doctrines of the said Methodist Episcopal Church in said Horseneck, by the name and style of the Horseneck Methodist Episcopal Society, by which name and style the said society is to be called and known; which said society we do hereby constitute to be subject to all the incidents and liabilities to which religious societies and congregations are by law subject, and possess and enjoy all rights, powers, and privileges given by law to religious societies and congregations.

"And we hereby declare this meeting, at which the undersigned are present, to be the first meeting of said society, the same being holden by us all this 14th day of November, A.D. 1813, at the school-house in said Horseneck. And we do hereby appoint John A. Merritt clerk of said society, to continue in office until another be chosen and sworn in his room. And we also appoint Jonathan A. Close, Elisha Halstead, Gilbert Marshall, Solomon S. Gansey, and Benjamin Peck, Jr., to be the committee of the said society to order the affairs of said society according to law.

"And we do hereby fix on the school-house in Horseneck Society as the place of holding the meetings of said society until the society shall otherwise direct; and we direct that the clerk of this society shall cause the articles of association to be recorded in the records of this society.

"We also appoint Elisha Halstead treasurer of this society. We also fix on the first Monday of November as the time when the annual meetings of this society shall be holden until the society shall otherwise direct.

"Witness our hands this 14th day of November, A.D. 1813.

"ELISHA HALSTEAD.

"JOHN A. MERRITT.

"GILBERT MARSHALL.

"JOHN M. WEED.

"JONATHAN A. CLOSE.

"BENJAMIN PECK, JR."

Among other early Methodists in the vicinity are mentioned the names of John Avery and wife, Benjamin Wilson and wife, Mrs. Matilda Mead, Mrs. Platt Newman, Miss Mahala Hitchcock, Mrs. Maria Marshall, Mrs. Elizabeth Palmer, Mrs. Isaac Weed, Mrs. Selah Mead, Miss Marilda Fletcher, Mrs. William Mead, Mrs. Huldah Tracey, Mrs. Nehemiah Mead, Mrs. Charity Tudor (colored), Mrs. Ellen Treadwell (colored), Gilbert Lent, Samuel Slagle, Samuel Minor, William Funston, William McF. Howard, John Marshall, William Barmore, Charles Gorse.

First society committee: Jonathan A. Close, Elisha Halstead, Gilbert Marshall, Solomon S. Gansey, Benjamin Peck, Jr.; first clerk, John A. Merritt.

The first house of worship was erected in 1844, in which the society worshiped until 1869, when the present edifice was dedicated, the corner-stone of which was laid May 12th of the previous year.

The following is a list of the pastors: Rufus C. Putman, Benjamin Redford; 1847, Rev. Jacob C. Washburn, assisted by Rev. B. M. Adams; 1848-49, Rev. Charles Gorse and William F. Smith; 1850, Rev. William McKendree Bangs and J. A. Selleck; 1851, the charge embraced Greenwich and Coscob, Rev. J. A. Selleck, preacher; 1852-53, Rev. George L. Fuller; 1854, Rev. Philip L. Hoyt; 1855, Rev. George Dunbar; 1856-57, Rev. S. Howland; 1858, Rev. E. Oldrin; 1859-60, Rev. George Hollis; 1861-62, Rev. George Stillman. In 1863 it was connected with Round Hill and Stanwich, and supplied by Rev. A. McAllister; in 1864 it was associated with Round Hill only, and Rev. A. McAllister returned to this charge; 1865, Rev. Moses Lyon; in 1866, Greenwich was separated from the other charges, and Rev. William R. Webster was the preacher; 1867-70, William F. Hatfield; 1870-73, Arza Hill; 1873-75, Charles C. Glover; 1875-76, J. W. Beach, D.D.; 1876-77, Richard Rust; 1877-80, George Taylor; 1880, C. P. Corner. The present trustees are George Selleck, John H. Ferris, John H. Ray, Hanford Lockwood, Thomas P. Hunt, and Joseph G. Merritt.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, ROUND HILL.

Methodism first made its appearance in this vicinity about the year 1800, through the instrumentality of Nathaniel Husted and Benjamin Lockwood, men of means and of large landed estates.

Mr. Husted says in his oration,—

* Compiled from an address delivered by N. C. Husted, M.D., at the semi-centennial of the Round Hill Methodist Episcopal Church in 1878.

* Nathaniel Husted was not only a soldier, patriot, but a patriot, a man who had rendered service to his country, and had held a commission under the renowned Gen. Putnam, of Revolutionary notoriety.

* Benjamin Lockwood was much of the same sort of a Christian and patriot. These two men, together with their families, then planted Methodism here. The first place for holding meetings known to us was at the house of Nathaniel Husted, where Mary, the widow of James Husted, now lives,—a Methodist preacher by the name of Drummond conducted the services,—and after this preaching in a wood lot northwest of the barn, where Ward Sables now lives, under an oak tree. The property was then owned and occupied by Nathaniel Husted. The quarterly meetings were held in a cider-mill, then standing by the roadside, just above the house now occupied by Mr. Sables, and owned by Mr. O. H. P. Archer, of New York City. Benjamin Lockwood's house was also another preaching-station. There a minister by the name of Crawford was known to have preached. That renowned and energetic character Lorenzo Dow is known to have preached in this vicinity, as there are living witnesses who have listened to his peculiar and startling words. This little band of brothers, with those whom they gathered into the fold, met from house to house, until they finally contemplated building a house of worship. God saw that a church was needed here. Two years, or thereabouts, before the church was dedicated, one of its earliest and noblest workers, Nathaniel Husted, died, Jan. 20, 1826. I need not say he died a true and earnest Christian.

* But the work which had been started did not stop. His three sons, James, Nathaniel, and Samuel, who took his place and walked in his footsteps, continued on in the good work. James and Nathaniel have followed their father, and have long since gone to their eternal abode. All, as you know, were endowed with Christian hearts. Their homes were always open to the Methodist minister, the same as their father's. The house of Benjamin Lockwood is still standing as the second landmark of Methodism, and is now occupied by his grandson, who bears his grandfather's name. Benjamin Lockwood's membership, it is said, can be traced back eighty years. Some of the prophets of that day predicted that the Methodist would 'beat them out of house and home.' But their prophecies proved untrue, as they lived comfortable all their days, having sufficient to eat and drink.

* Major Lockwood, son of Benjamin Lockwood, has been a member of this society for sixty-six years. He still holds his connection with this church, and occasionally fills his place in this time-honored sanctuary. He was the first class-leader after the dedication of the church. He united with the church at a very early age, and marks the time by the preachers who were on the circuit at the time when the Rev. Phineas Rice preached, and the same year that Gen. Hull, of the American army, in the war of 1812, surrendered to the British in Canada without striking a blow. Mr. Lockwood recollects distinctly the remarks of Brother Rice when he heard of Hull's inglorious surrender. He said he would like to have been general instead of Hull; 'he thought the British would not have got off so easy.' And now Brother Lockwood still lives to see the connecting link between the old and newly-church.

* From this point Methodism first made its way into Round Hill. At or about this time an appointment was established at the old school-house which stood in front of this edifice at the junction of the roads, and where the sign-post now stands. This building has long since been demolished, and a new one erected opposite and a little to the south. Could the old school-house tell the story of the past, it would not only speak of the wonders accomplished in literature and science by the teachings of the veteran schoolmaster and his accompanying rod of correction,—here it was that your honored servant received his early training,—not only that, but it would tell of many a battle under the Captain of our salvation, and many a glorious victory.

* Returning to the church, the ground on which this structure originally stood was deeded to the society by two brothers who are still living and honorable members of this church. Their names are Benjamin and Jonathan Husted. The trustees were originally Benjamin Husted, Ayl Reynolds, of Stanwich; Nathaniel Husted, James Husted, Nehemiah Brown, Major Lockwood, and Abel Reynolds, of Round Hill. The building committee were two brothers, Nathaniel and Samuel Husted. The builder was Silas Brundage. Only one trustee lives to tell us of the past; his name is Major Lockwood. Only one of the building committee lives,—Samuel Husted, who is now eighty-four years of age, and lives in Western New York.

* The church was dedicated to Almighty God by Rev. Noah Levings, D.D., of the New York Conference, on Thanksgiving day, just fifty years ago. It was Anno Domini 1828, the Rev. Daniel DeVenne being preacher in charge, and the Rev. Daniel Ostrander presiding elder. The frame was raised in the month of August. It was the custom in those days, when there was a raising, to invite the people from an adjoining country, and after the last rafters of the temple were put in place to give it a name. This is done by one of the apprentices of the carpenter, who, with a bottle of liquor in hand, goes to the highest point of the building that his courage would bear, and then swinging the bottle three times around his head, says the name to the building, throwing the bottle to dash it in pieces if possible. If the bottle did not break, then whoever first got the bottle had the privilege of drinking from it, and then gave it another throw, and so on until it was broken. This custom, it appears, extended even to church raisings. At the raising of this frame Absalom Sables was the youngest apprentice. When all was completed he mounted the frame, and, climbing to its extreme point or pinnacle, he swung the bottle and gave the name in the following couplet:

* Here stands a strong and elegant frame,
The Flower of Round Hill shall be its name.*

Away went the bottle, the cork flew out, and the liquid went spouting through the air. The bottle struck the ground, but did not break, where a struggle ensued between Samuel Husted and another man. Samuel was the victor and broke the bottle. The church was dedicated by the late Rev. Noah Levings, D.D.

* Of the eighteen presiding elders who have presided over the district which has included Round Hill, only four are now living. Their names are as follows: Rev. Charles Fletcher, presiding elder at present; Rev. J. B. Merwin, D.D.; Rev. G. H. Kettell, D.D.; Rev. H. F. Pease, superannuated.

* Of the sixty-six preachers who have occupied this circuit since 1810, forty-two are deceased, twelve are superannuated, nine are in the effective work, and three are supernumerary.

* The corner stone of the present edifice was laid on the 22d day of November, 1871. The old building was then removed, placed upon its foundation, and recovered a lobby and steeple being added. The building committee was Rev. S. Howland, Krastus M. Garsall, John Purdy (2d), N. H. Husted, A. P. Raymond. John Purdy (2d) was treasurer; Nehemiah H. Husted, secretary. The ground was purchased of William S. Brown. The church was dedicated on the 31st day of July, 1873, Rev. Ephraim Watt preacher in charge, and Rev. John B. Merwin presiding elder of the district.

* The following is a list of the presiding elders from 1810 to 1878: Joseph Crawford, Preben Garrison, Samuel Merwin, Nathan Bangs, Peter P. Soutter, Lalan Clark, Daniel Ostrander, Phineas Rice, Marvin Richardson, Nicholas White, Heman Bangs, James Floy, William H. Norris, Edwin E. Griswold, Hart P. Pease, John B. Merwin, George H. Kettell, Charles Fletcher.

* The following are the names of the members of the old church during its history from 1810 to 1878, where the present church record commences, as far as have been obtained: Nathaniel Husted, Ruth Husted, Benjamin Lockwood, Jemima Lockwood, Major Lockwood, Catharine Lockwood, Susan Lockwood, Nehemiah Brown, Betsey Brown, Conklin Husted, Polly Ann Husted, James Husted, Mary B. METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, KING STREET.

The Methodist church in King Street dates its origin from before the Revolution. As New York City was the birthplace of Methodism in this country, it was quite natural that the region about that city should feel much of its influence. Some of the oldest records to be found mention King Street as a preaching-place. Later it formed part of a six weeks' circuit with such places as White Plains, Tuckahoe, and Portchester. Francis Asbury, the first bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, often preached in the old school-house which once stood about two hundred feet south from the present church edifice on the Haight farm.

The present building was erected in 1829, and dedicated by Nathan Bangs, D.D. Some of its early pastors were I. Candee, Peter Sanford, John N. Maffet, Stephen Martindale, Robert Seacey, Nathan Rice, and William Jewett. Its first board of trustees were Jesse Dawson, Daniel Haight, Nehemiah Brown, Samuel Pine, Nehemiah Sherwood.

Its later pastors were John Edmunds, Joseph Vinton, J. Rawlenson, John Haveland, M. D. Buell, Charles Barnhart, and J. B. Sheperd. Its present board of trustees are W. D. Slawson, J. W. Sherwood, J. B. Haight, John Green, Joseph Haight.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT MIANUS.†

The attractive and substantial edifice in which this society worships to-day stands upon a height known in the town of Greenwich as Diamond Hill. The location is sightly. Westward, within the horizon that limits the view of an observer standing upon the summit of this hill, rise the stately churches and beautiful residences of New Greenwich. Turn the eye to the southward, and there comes in view the long, brightly-gleaming water-line of the Sound.

Desirable as a situation with such a prospect may be for a church-site, one other fact made it still more desirable: Diamond Hill is rock—a kind of granite rock—suitable for building purposes. Thus out of a rock and on a rock the church was built.

The edifice is Gothic in its style of architecture. Its windows are of stained glass, some given as memorials of departed friends. Within, the furnishing is substantial and simple. The aim has been to present not fancy filigree-work to surprise, but plain attractiveness to win, the worshiper.

The Methodist Society at Mianus is quite young in its separate existence. The circuit to which it belonged was for many years called "The Greenwich, Round Hill, Roxbury, Stanwich, and Mianus Circuit." Not until June, 1871, was Mianus recognized as an independent charge. The society prior to 1878 met in the old neglected structure near the junction of the Stanwich and Stamford roads. The church was gathering her means to build, so the old building suffered neglect.

While still a member of a circuit the church aimed at a separate independent existence. Her first step was to erect a new church. The marble slab over the main entrance of the church has this inscription:

"Methodist Episcopal Church.
Erected 1868."

In a report of the Rev. G. H. Anderson to the Quarterly Conference for the year 1869, a few sentences are found giving a description of the state of affairs in the society: "The new edifice is enclosed, the heavy work done, and the building gradually goes on to completion. The trustees gave themselves three years to complete the work; two have already expired. At the end of the third they will probably be in their new church, and with debt enough to make them comfortable." The following years proved the often-reiterated truth that a large church debt makes a small society very uncomfortable.

In 1874 the debt stood thus: mortgages, $10,000; floating debt, $48. In July, 1878, the floating debt amounted to fifteen hundred dollars. Thus, after a lapse of ten years, although the society had a fine church, it had such a debt upon the building that matters were desperate.

It was during this year—the second of the pastorate of the Rev. G. A. Graves—that an effort was made to lift this constantly-increasing indebtedness. The task seemed quite hopeless. How could eleven thousand five hundred dollars be raised? Too much credit cannot be given to this pastor and his most active colaborer, Mr. J. H. Okerhansen, treasurer of the board of trustees, for their persistent, energetic efforts to liquidate the debt. The members of the society gave liberally, and its friends were generous when they saw a fair prospect of success. These two men fought this "fair prospect" into existence.

The church to-day has the property secured. Most of the debt is paid in cash, the remainder is covered by reliable subscriptions. A sense of thankfulness pervades the society that the property, valued at thirty-five thousand dollars, is theirs. It looks forward now to prosperous times.

The history of the church establishes this, that honest endeavor, persistently made, can accomplish what at first seemed impossible.

There is also a Methodist Church at Coscob, but our application for information concerning it has met with no response.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN (GERMAN) ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, EAST PORTCHESTER.

This church was organized in 1863 by Messrs. Philip Rollhaus and August and William Abendroth, and Hein. Pfeiffer. The first officers were Hein. Pfeiffer, Conrad Schmehl, Heinrich Menger, John Roemer, and Heinrich (or Henry) Delmer.

The ministers have been as follows: Herrman J. Fischer, John Steiner, Q. Hoeck, B. Cuz, W. Rechenberg, and J. C. Hoffman, present incumbent.

The present officers are Henry Pfeiffer and Conrad Schmehl (Aeltesbe), Mr. John Roemer, Christopher Müller, Jacob Cuz, and John Frey.

The present members are Conrad Schuchl, Henry Menger, Henry Pfeiffer, John Roemer, Henry Delmer, Wilh. Diehl, John Frey, Philipp Bender, Valentin Haupt, Friederich Steinmetz, Christoph Müller, Henry Schantz, Jacob Cuz, John Möller, Christian Roemer, and John Frey, Jr.

The above persons, Mr. Rollhaus and Jbr. William Abendroth and August Abendroth, are not members of this church, being members of the Episcopal Church (English), but they aided largely in the erection of the church, which was built in 1863, at a cost of ten thousand dollars.

BANKSVILLE BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1853, and the first deacons were John Banks and Daniel Young. Subsequent deacons have been Franklin Hobby, D. Babbage, John Hull, John Banks, and John J. Hull. The two latter are the present deacons.

The church building was erected in 1853, at a cost of about six thousand dollars.

The pastors have been as follows: Revs. H. F. Smith, D.D., W. B. Guiscard, A. J. Allen, J. S. Gifford, Warren Lincoln, and the present incumbent, Rev. Harvey Alley, who was selected July 1, 1874, and to whom we are indebted for the history of the church.

The present society's committee is as follows: Jeremiah Green, three years; John Hull, two years; Emmett Smith, one year; James Ferris, President; Isaac Collard, Vice-President; William Sniffen, Clerk; J. Albert Barrett, Treasurer. The present membership of the church is one hundred and twenty.

BAPTIST CHURCH, KING STREET

The King Street Baptist Church celebrated its centennial in 1873. Up to that time there had been but three settled pastors. Elder Finch, pastor for about forty years, was followed by Rev. Mr. Raymond, who held the pastorate for nearly forty five years, being succeeded by Rev. O. C. Kirkum. The old house still stands, and in perfect preservation, though never repaired by so much as a shingle. Regular services are now held under the pastorate of Rev. A. F. Perry.

ST. MARY'S ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is located at Greenwich, and is a flourishing ecclesiastical body. It is under the pastoral care of Rev. Thomas Smith.

THE GREENWICH ACADEMY.†

The Greenwich Academy divides with the Congregational church an elevation of land which is not only the most prominent in the village, but the most commanding on the coast between Maine and Florida. It overlooks a landscape of great variety and beauty. The two buildings, by their bold situation and contiguity, fitly symbolize the two forces of religion and education which have been most potent in the development of New England, and through which she has impressed her thought upon a large part of the continent.

The academy was incorporated by a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut in the year 1827, Dr. Darins Mead and Mr. Alvin Mead being its most energetic promoters. At the first meeting for organization the stockholders elected Dr. Darius Mead, Mr. Joseph Brush, and Mr. Alvin Mead trustees, and in the same year the present site was selected, a part of the present building erected, and the school put into practical operation, the Rev. Mason Grosvenor being the first principal.

The academy speedily became a flourishing one, drawing pupils from a large section of adjacent country and attaining excellent rank in point of scholarship. From 1827 to 1863 the school changed principals seven times, passing under the charge successively of the Rev. Mason Grosvenor, the Rev. William Bushnell, the Rev. William B. Sherwood, the Rev. Elam Clarke, the Rev. Mr. Pearson, Mr. Alexander Reynolds, Mr. Jeremiah Spencer, Mr. Philander Button, Mr. Gilbert Sticking, and Mr. William D. Penfield.

It may be said, without making any invidious distinction, that of these teachers Mr. Philander Button was the most successful and left the most lasting influence upon the community. A graduate of Yale College, he united with fine scholarly attainments a rare business faculty and a strength and vigor of character which early won and always held the respect of the school and the neighborhood.

From 1863 to 1880, with the exception of a period of about three years, Mr. Frank Shepard was principal of the academy. He graduated from Williams College in the class of 1856, and under his management, for a number of years, the school was greatly prospered, the number of pupils exceeding that of any previous period of its history, and the efficiency displayed in all departments being attested by long-continued patronage.

In 1870, under Mr. Shepard's supervision and as the result of his energetic efforts, the academy building was enlarged so as to accommodate more than double the number provided for in the original structure, and is now well adapted for the purposes of a high school. It has the great and permanent advantage of a beautiful situation, with free access on all sides to sunshine and fresh air.

The course of instruction comprises those branches which are commonly recognized as preparatory for either business life or a college education, and it is the purpose of trustees and teachers to secure and maintain a high standard of scholarship. The scholastic year commences the second Monday in September and continues for forty weeks. For more than half a century the academy has been the educational centre of Greenwich, training two generations for the duties and work of life, and preparing not a few for the responsibilities of a liberal education. At home and abroad, wherever its graduates have gone, its influence has been felt in the interests of intelligence and character.

INSURANCE.

The Greenwich Mutual Insurance Company was chartered at the May session of the Legislature in 1855, and commenced business July 28, 1855. The object of the company is self-protection, and its business is confined to the town of Greenwich. The present president is Col. Thomas A. Mead.

ACACIA LODGE, NO. 83, F. A. M.*

The lodge was organized June 27, 1857. The charter was granted May 12, 1858, with the following members: Samuel Close, William L. Lyon, Daniel Lyon, Frederick Lockwood, Titus Mead, Daniel M. Mead, Lewis A. Reed, Charles Wilson, Nehemiah Peck, Benjamin Husted, Bartow F. White, Abraham H. Close, Luke A. Lockwood, Isaac J. Lockwood, Edward B. Hewes, Joseph Horne, Lewis Howe, Francis Douchy, Ezra Keeler, Denom Palmer.

The Masters from 1857 to 1880 have been Luke A. Lockwood, 1857-58, 1861-62, 1863, 1866, 1868-69, 1878-79; Joseph Horne, 1859-60; Edward B. Hewes, 1864; John N. Lewis, 1865; George M. Lockwood, 1867; Benjamin P. Smith, 1870; Joseph R. Merritt, 1871; Silas S. Downes, 1872-73, 1877; Robert T. Merritt, 1874-75; Edward Greenwood, 1876.

The present (1880) officers are as follows: Oscar Peck, W. M.; Elias S. Peck, S. W.; George G. McNall, J. W.; Robert Wellstood, Sec.; Isaac L. Mead, Treas.; Fred A. Hubbard, S. D.; Samuel Guion, J. D.; Luke A. Lockwood, Chap.; Benjamin L. Lockwood, Solomon Reynolds, Stewards; John Richl, Tiler. The number of members on the roll is one hundred and eighty-eight.

THE GREENWICH WATER COMPANY.

This company was incorporated by the Legislature of 1880, and has a capital of sixty thousand dollars, with permission to increase to one hundred thousand dollars. The reservoir comprises sixty-five acres, with a capacity of three hundred million gallons. The charter covers Greenwich and vicinity, and the company have now under consideration the subject of supplying Portchester, N. Y., a large and growing village adjoining this town, in New York State. As far as Greenwich is concerned, the company will give a full supply of water.

The lake from which the water is taken is at an elevation of two hundred and eighty-five feet above tide-water and finely located, being a sort of natural basin inclosed by hills. Across the southerly end the company have built a dam four hundred and eighty-five feet long, composed of an earth embankment built on both sides of a strong stone wall. The extreme width of the dam at its base is one hundred and six feet, and at the top twenty feet.

The water will pass through a large filterer before entering pipes. The filtering-chamber is divided into three sections: in the first section the water enters from the lake and filters through charcoal into a second chamber filled with sponges, and from this second chamber to a third, from which the mains start.

There will be one hundred and thirty-four feet to the highest point in village, and at the lowest about two hundred and eighty-five feet, the water-level. There will be a pressure of from sixty to one hundred and twenty pounds to the square inch in the village, according to situation.

The present officers are: President, A. Foster Higgins; Vice-President and Treasurer, E. Cornelius Benedict; Secretary, George G. McNall; Directors, A. Foster Higgins, Jeremiah Milbank, William Rockefeller, Luke A. Lockwood, and E. C. Benedict.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

COL. THOMAS A. MEAD.

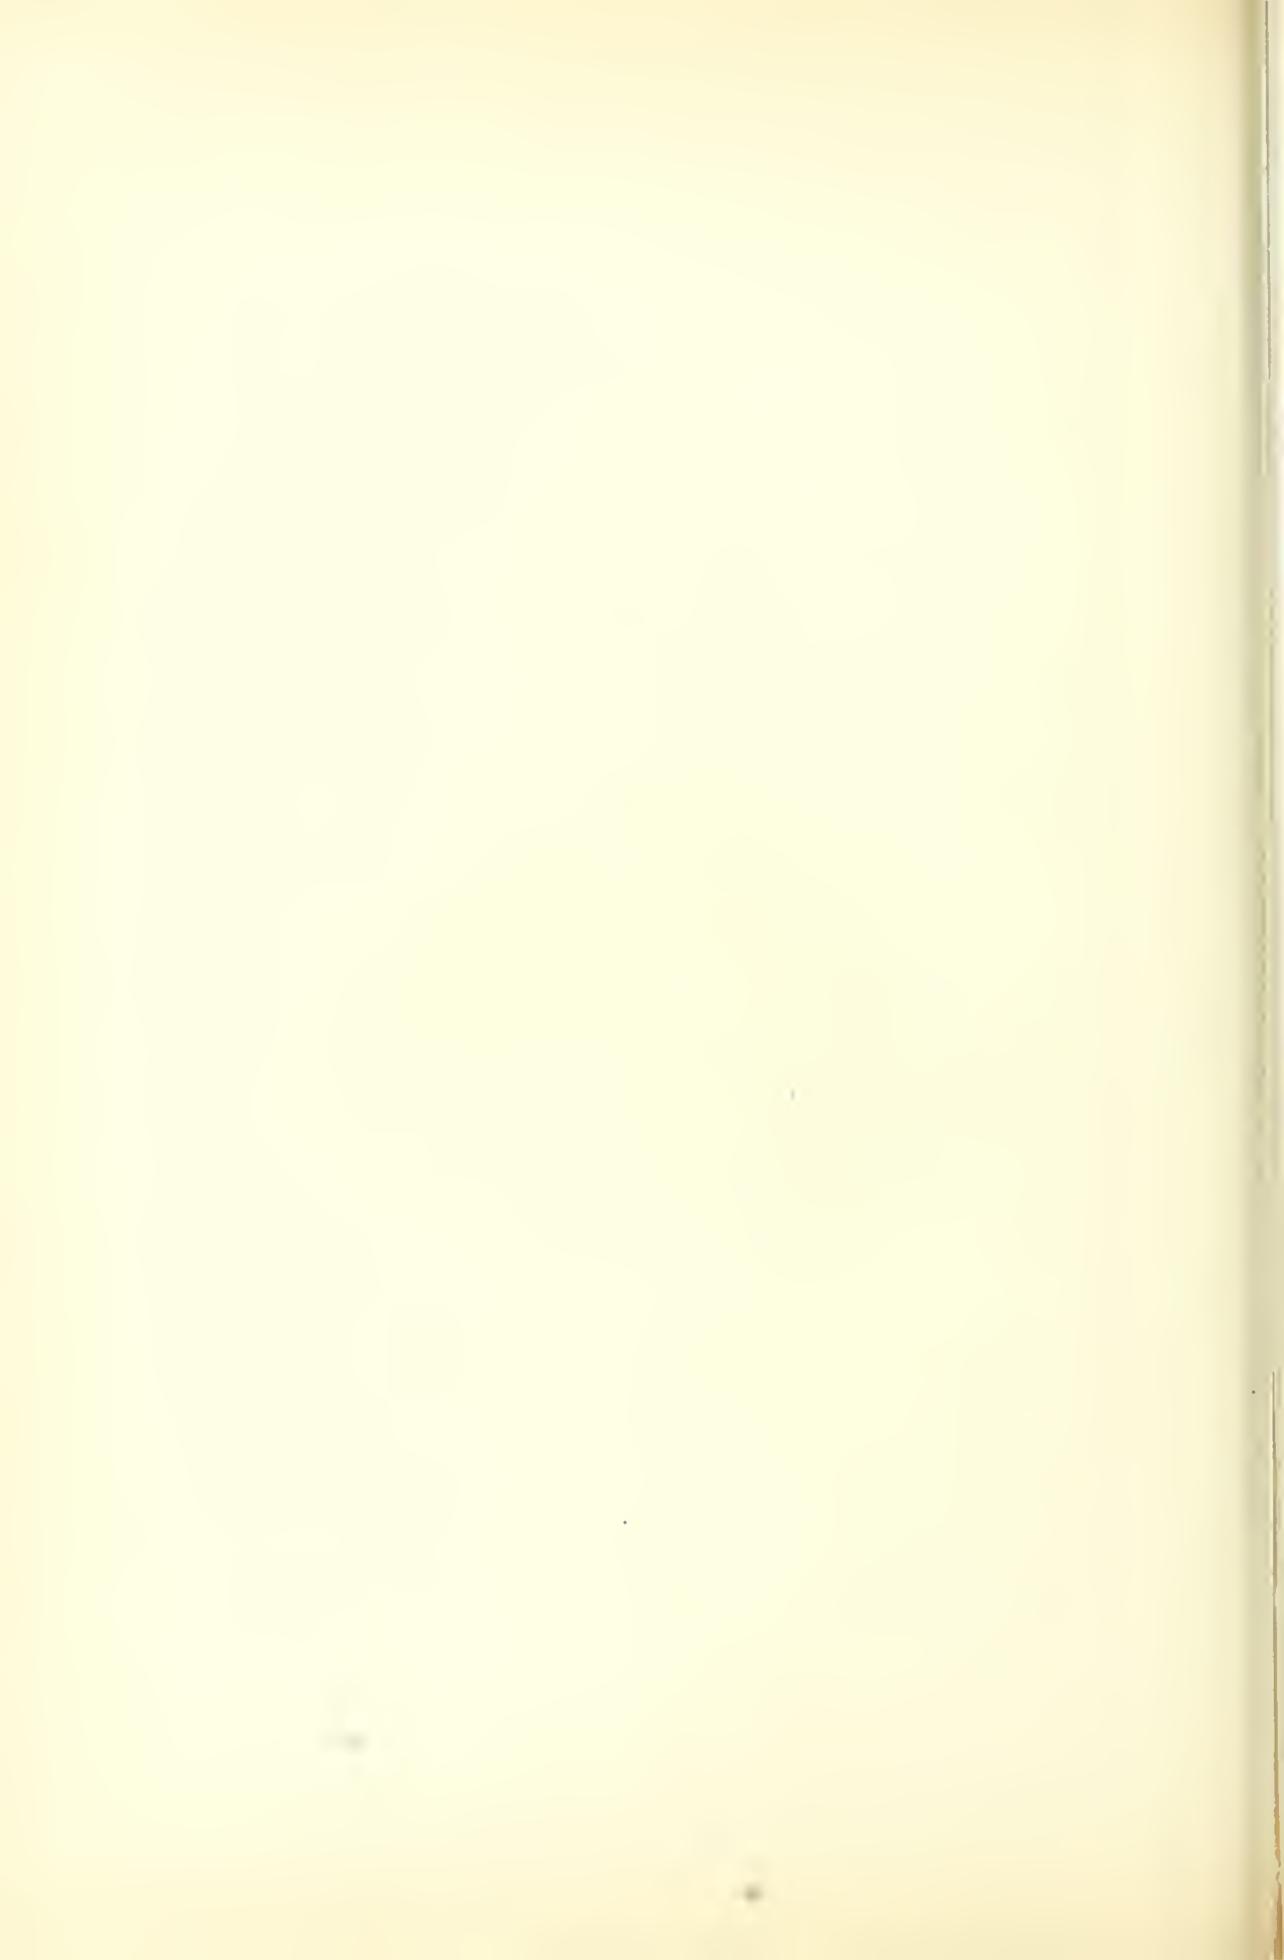

John Mead was one of two brothers who emigrated from England about the year 1642. The family was then an ancient and honorable one, though it is not within the author's means to trace their genealogy previous to their emigration to this country.

One of their ancestors had been the friend and the physician of the talented though not very amiable Queen Elizabeth. One of two brothers emigrated to Virginia, where the family still exists. The other, John Mead, with his two sons, came to New England about the year 1642. The name is spelled Meade as well as Mead. Many claim that they emigrated from Greenwich, Kent Co., England, but we have not fallen in with any direct proof of the fact, and this town was known by its present name long before the settlement of the Mead family. John Mead and his two sons, John and Joseph, having tarried awhile in Massachusetts, first settled at Hempstead, L. I., where they remained until October, 1660, when the two sons came to Greenwich and bought land of Richard Crab and others, which was deeded to John Mead, he being the elder. Either John, the father, never came to Greenwich, or if so, he took no active part in life, now having become quite an old man. His son Joseph left no children in this town. He may have died young, or left no issue, or may have emigrated to a different part of the country.

John Mead, the second,—died 1696,—married Miss

Abner Mead

Potter, of Stamford, and left, as appears by his will, eight sons and, tradition says, three daughters, viz.: John, Joseph, Jonathan, Ebenezer, Nathaniel, David, Samuel, Abigail, Mary, and Susan or Susannah. Ebenezer, the fourth son of second John, was born in 1663, and married Sarah Knapp, of Stamford, and left Ebenezer, Caleb, Sarah, who married Jonathan Hobby, Hannah, who married John Hobby, Jabez, David, Abigail, who married Isaac Hedges, Susannah, who married Moses Husted, Jemima, who married Moses Knapp. The second Ebenezer was born Oct. 25, 1692, and died May 3, 1775. He married Hannah Brown, of Rye, N. Y., on the 12th of December, 1717. His children were Ebenezer, Silas, Abraham, Jonas, Solomon, Deliverance, Amos, Edmund, Hannah, Jabez, Jared, and Abraham, second.

Amos Mead, seventh son of the second Ebenezer, was a physician by profession, and was a surgeon of the Third Connecticut Regiment in the French and Indian war, and his grandson, Col. Thomas A. Mead, has now (1880) in his possession a powder-horn, a rich souvenir of those terrible days. He was a prominent man during the Revolutionary war, and represented his town a great many times in the Colonial Legislature, and after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, was a member of the State Legislature. He was a member of that noble body of men who adopted the Constitution of the United States. He married Ruth Bush. Their children were Richard, born September, 1753, and Thomas, who died soon after he had completed his college course in 1773. Dr. Amos Mead was a member of the Congregational Church of Greenwich. He died February, 1807.

Richard Mead was a farmer by occupation, and during the Revolutionary war rendered valuable aid to the American army. We quote the following from the history of Greenwich: "Andrew Mead, Humphrey Denton, and Richard Mead. These men—more, perhaps, than any others—deserve the highest praise for their brave and daring acts. It was not so much their province to counsel and advise us to act. 'Old men for counsel and young men for action.' Such men as Dr. Amos Mead, John Mackay, and Abraham Mead were of great service to the inhabitants as counselors. They were past the meridian of life, and one of them, Dr. Amos Mead, had gained much experience by active service in the French war. But was any daring deed to be accomplished, where hardy, brave, and reliable men were necessary, the three former were always selected. After all control of the town was lost to the Americans by the destructive expedition of Governor Tryon, it was not safe for a patriot to remain publicly in the limits for an hour. Yet these three hung about the place ready to assist the defenseless population against the brutalities of the Tories. Each possessed of his arms, a faithful dog, and a fleet horse, they spent their time about the village, hidden in the by- and secret-places. The winter of 1780 was one of the severest on record. The Sound was frozen across, and a great amount of snow accumulated. Yet these men scarcely knew a night, during the early part of that winter, in which they did not sleep with their horses and dogs in the snow. During that winter some dozen or twenty head of cattle, the most of which belonged to Mr. Jared Mead, were taken off in haste by the Tories and driven towards New York. After much earnest solicitation on the part of the owner, the trio consented to make the most daring attempt of crossing the enemy's lines to retake them. There had been recently a storm of rain, which had frozen as it fell and rendered the roads extremely slippery, and made a hard, sharp crust upon the snow. The pursuers therefore went upon the Sound with their horses, and kept the ice as far as Mamaroneck, and then, taking the road, could track the cattle by the blood which had trickled from the wounds of the bayonets which had forced them along. At Mount Vernon they retook the cattle, and were returning when they found they were pursued by a body of the enemy under a lieutenant. Their horses were tired by their swift ride, and they soon knew that their only safety was in separation, and in that case even one must be inevitably taken. Accordingly, they left the cattle and plunged separately in different directions. The enemy selected Richard Mead, pursued and took him prisoner. This was about the middle of January, 1780. He was taken to New York and thrown into the famous Sugar-House, where he remained for a period of six weeks until exchanged. These three men were held in high estimation by the people. Their known patriotism and courage, which could ever be relied on, caused the other citizens, long after the Revolutionary war, to remember their acts with the greatest gratitude." Other facts might be recited and incidents given. Richard Mead was twice married: first to Sarah Mead, and had one daughter, Sophia, who married Peter De Mill; second to Rachel Mead, widow of Whitman Mead, and had three children, viz., Thomas A., Elizabeth R., and Sarah A. Elizabeth R. married George Webb, of New York, and is now dead. Sarah A. married Joseph Brush, of Greenwich, and died leaving a family of ten children. Richard Mead was a man respected by all those who knew him. He died April 19, 1824. His only son, Col. Thomas A. Mead, was born in the same house where he now (1880) resides in Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., May 29, 1799. He has always been a farmer, and now owns the same farm his father owned, which has been in the family since 1785, and lives in the house built by his father in 1797. He married Hannan Seaman, daughter of David Seaman, of New York, Feb. 23, 1833. They have had eight children, seven of whom are still living, viz.: Louisa S., Mrs. Thomas Ritch; Thomas R., who was a captain of Company G, Tenth Regiment, Connecticut Volunteers, was in several engagements, sickened and died at Washington, N. C., Oct. 22, 1862; Seaman; Abigail R., Mrs. Benjamin Wright; Elizabeth H., Mrs. Henry Webb; Delia, Mrs. William E. Mead; Zophar; and Lucinda P.

In politics, Col. Mead has always been a Whig and Republican, and as such has been one of the leading men of Greenwich. He was an assessor ten years, selectman a number of years, member of the State Legislature two terms, 1852 and 1872, and during his last term served on the committee of railroads, and county commissioner two terms. He has often been appointed an appraiser for different railroads, a jurymen a great many times on important cases, and has settled a great many estates to the satisfaction of those interested. He and wife are members of the Congregational Church at Greenwich.

For many years he was a colonel of a regiment of State militia. In all the various positions that he has been called upon to fill he has performed his duty faithfully, — alike a credit to himself and a satisfaction to his constituents.

He reviews the past with some degree of satisfaction, and looks forward to the future with no apprehension.

ALVAN MEAD.

The subject of this sketch is a lineal descendant of the sixth generation from one John Mead, who, with his two sons, John and Joseph, emigrated from England and settled in Massachusetts, in 1642, thence to Hempstead, L. I., where they remained until October, 1660, when all of them settled in the town of Greenwich, Conn. (See biography of Col. Thomas A. Mead for further notice of the ancestors.) Some of the family think that the above Joseph had children, and that he settled in the north-central part of Fairfield County, as the Meads there claim to be descended from Joseph.

The grandfather of Alvan Mead, Ebenezer Mead (2d), was born Oct. 25, 1692, and died May 3, 1775. He was a representative man of his town, and a great many times represented his town in the Colonial Legislature. He was a farmer by occupation. He married Hannah Brown, of Rye, N. Y., Dec. 12, 1717, and had twelve children, — viz.: Ebenezer, Silas, Abraham (1st), Jonas, Solomon, Deliverance, Amos, Edmund, Hannah, Jabez, Jared, and Abraham (2d).

Jared Mead was the tenth son in a family of twelve children, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Conn., in the same house where he always lived through a long and honorable life, and died June 8, 1832. He was a farmer by occupation, and owned his father's farm.

He married Lydia, daughter of Daniel Smith, and had seven children, namely: Zette, Lydia, Alma, Daniel, Hannah, Jared, and Alvan, all of whom are now (1880) dead except Alvan. He held various town offices. Both Mr. and Mrs. Mead were members of the Congregational Church at Greenwich, Conn. Mrs. Mead died May 27, 1827.

Alvan Mead was born in Greenwich, Conn., Nov. 30, 1794. His advantages for an education were limited to the common schools of his day, working on the farm summers and attending school winters until he was seventeen years of age, when he took charge of his father's farm, as he was the only son left at home.

He was a farmer on the same place where his father and grandfather lived until 1851, since which he has resided in the borough of Greenwich, Conn. He married Eliza, daughter of Nathaniel Peck, Dec. 18, 1821.

Their children were Ralph P., who went to California in 1849, married, and had two sons, — namely, Charles C. and Ralph R., — who together with their mother reside in Portland, Oregon.

Ralph P. died Oct. 7, 1862; Warren B. resides at Wichita, Kansas, married, and has three children, — namely, Alvan E., Edgar S., and Mary P.; Melancthon W. died May 30, 1878, leaving a widow and two children, Frank A. and Frederick B., who reside in Brooklyn, N. Y.; Cornelia G., who married Stephen G. White, and now resides with her father; their children are Warren P., Lucy M., Elam C. (deceased).

In politics, Mr. Mead has always been a staunch Whig and Republican. He has been a magistrate of Greenwich for many years, besides holding several other town offices. His wife was a member of the Congregational Church. She died Sept. 22, 1864.

Mr. Mead is one of the oldest if not the oldest man in the town. He has the entire confidence of his fellow-townsmen, and has lived a long and useful life. He is a regular attendant of the Congregational Church; though not a member, he contributes to its support.

LYMAN MEAD.

Lyman Mead is the son of Zenas Mead and Mary Lashley, and was born in Greenwich, Conn., March 26, 1824. His father was a son of Deliverance Mead, who was the sixth son of the second Ebenezer Mead (see biography of Col. Thomas A. Mead), and was born in 1782 (another record says 1779), and died June, 1858. He married Mary Lashley, and had the following children, — viz., Abigail, who married Jonas Mead; Lucretia, died young; Deborah (deceased), Henry (deceased), Julia, married Isaac Peck; Eliza (deceased), married Lockwood P. Clark, and Lyman.

Zenas Mead was a farmer; in politics a Whig, and as such was a representative man. He was town treasurer for many years, and member of the Assembly two terms. He and wife were members of the Second Congregational Church at Greenwich, Conn. She died in November, 1860.

Lyman Mead was reared on the farm, receiving the advantages of a common-school education. He is one of the substantial farmers and business men of the town, and whatever he has undertaken he has been successful in. He has been twice married, first to Sarah F., daughter of Peter Acker, March 1, 1830, by whom he had three children,—viz., Sarah M., Julia A. (deceased), and Emma F. Mrs. Mead was a member of the Second Congregational Church. She died July 26, 1857, having been born March 1, 1830. Mr. Mead married for his second wife Harriet R., daughter of Jabez Mead, Dec. 21, 1858. She was born Dec. 19, 1837. Their children are Ida F., Hattie J., Isadora M. (deceased), Frederick G. C., Nellie R., Martha H. (deceased), Annabelle L., Laura D., Rolland E., and Lucretia G., all of whom were born on the farm where Mr. Mead now resides.

Mr. Mead has been a staunch Whig and Republican. He has represented his town three times (1855, 1879, and 1880) in the State Legislature. He has been a delegate to county and State conventions. He is a director in the Greenwich Savings Bank, besides having been a director in other important business enterprises. He is and has been the treasurer of his school district for many years.

Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Mead are members of the Congregational Church at Greenwich, Conn., and he is one of its best supporters.

Solomon Mead is a lineal descendant on both paternal and maternal side from John Mead, an Englishman, who came to America and settled in Massachusetts in 1642, and at Hempstead, L. I., soon after, where he remained until October, 1669, when he came, in all probability, to Greenwich, Conn., in company with his two sons, John and Joseph. (For a full history of Solomon Mead's ancestors, see biography of Col. Thos. A. Mead.)

Solomon Mead is an only son of Joshua Mead by his second wife, Hannah Mead, who was a daughter of Deliverance Mead, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., Jan. 15, 1808. His paternal grandfather was Nathaniel Mead, who married Prudence Wood and had several children, one of whom was named Joshua.

Very little or nothing is known of the ancestors of Nathaniel Mead, more than that they were good, industrious citizens and generally members of the Congregational Church, as was Nathaniel, who died at an advanced age.

Joshua Mead was born in Greenwich, Conn., May 16, 1751, married Hannah Mead Nov. 15, 1801, and died May 30, 1812. His wife died March 14, 1844. They had one child,—Solomon.

Joshua Mead was a good farmer, a true patriot and citizen, and a member of the Congregational Church. He rendered valuable aid to the American army during the Revolutionary war, though he was not a soldier. He was a strong Federalist and Whig.

Solomon Mead was reared on his father's farm, receiving the advantages of an education such as the common schools of his day afforded, supplemented with a few terms at the Greenwich Academy. When he was sixteen years of age—in 1824—he settled on the place now owned by Mr. Titus Mead, in the borough of Greenwich, where he remained until about 1845, when he settled on the place where he now (1880) resides, but which he had purchased several years before. He began building his present house in 1858, and in December, 1860, moved into it. He purchased his present place of the Seymour family, which he has made one of the most attractive in the borough, as it stands on an eminence near the Second Congregational church, which is said to be the most elevated place on the Sound between New York and Boston. From the observatory on his house one has a grand view of all the surrounding country, even across the Sound on to Long Island. A view of his residence may be seen in another part of this work. Mr. Mead has devoted his attention entirely to agriculture, and has been very successful.

On the 22d of April, 1856, he married Mary E., daughter of David and Elizabeth Dayton. Their children are as follows,—viz.: Hannah More, Abram N., Mary E., Emily J., Solomon Christy, Sarah L., Everett D., and Chas. H. (deceased).

Mr. and Mrs. Mead are members of the Second Congregational Church of Greenwich, Conn., and he is one of its main supporters.

He was a Whig until 1856, since which time he has been a staunch Republican. He has held various town offices, and is a trustee of the Greenwich Savings Bank. He has often been a delegate to county and State conventions, and takes an interest in all matters relating to the best interest of his town.

COL. CONKLIN HUSTED

is a son of Benjamin Husted and Sarah Dayton, and grandson of Benjamin Husted and Sarah Newman, and was born in Greenwich, Conn., Dec. 7, 1790. His father was a native of Greenwich, Conn.; was a farmer by occupation; married Sarah Dayton, by whom he had the following children,—viz., David D., Hannah, Benjamin, Martha, William, Conklin, Mary, Roswell, and Rachel. He was a Revolutionary soldier; was a Quaker in religion. He died August, 1834, at a great age. His wife was a member of the Congregational Church, and died September, 1838, at an advanced age. (For history of Benjamin Husted "the first," see biography of James Husted.)

Conklin Husted worked on his father's farm summers and attended the district schools winters until he was nineteen years of age, when he commenced teaching school at fifteen dollars a month, and followed it more or less winters until he was married, April 28, 1834, to Mary Ann, daughter of Abram and Mary Close. She was born Aug. 7, 1799, and died

November, 1876. Their children are Julia E., who married William H. Briggs, a farmer in Greenwich, Conn., and Eveline C., who married Allen Brundage, a farmer of North Castle, N. Y. They have one son, —Chauncey Conklin.

Mr. Husted was a very large and successful farmer, and took charge of his farm till 1869, when he retired, to be succeeded by his son-in-law, William H. Briggs, with whom he is now (1880) living. In politics he was a Jeffersonian Democrat until 1856, when he became a strong supporter of the Republican party. He has held all the important offices of his town to the general satisfaction of his constituents, among which we mention those of assessor and selectman for many years, magistrate for more than twenty-five years; was a member of the board of relief for a long time, and during his long life he has settled a great many estates. He has been a member of the State Legislature eight terms, and while there served on important committees. He has represented his constituents many times in county and State conventions. He always took an active and leading part in military matters. He was a captain of the fourth company of the Third Regiment Connecticut Flying Artillery for many years, was promoted to the colonelcy of the same regiment, and had the distinguished honor of commanding that regiment which escorted Gen. Lafayette from the State line of New York through to Stamford the last time the general ever visited America. He was always a great admirer of a fine horse, and took great pride in military affairs. He is now almost ninety years of age, but his mind is good, and he recounts the struggles of a long and useful life with a great deal of interest. He has been a strong pillar in society, both politically and religiously. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church more than sixty years ago, and has been one of its most liberal supporters. He has held every office in the church which falls to the lot of a layman. His wife was an adherent of the Episcopal Church. Col. Husted reviews the past with no apprehension of the future, and is only waiting to hear his Master say, "It's enough; come up higher." was a son of Benjamin Husted and Sarah Dayton, and was born in Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., April 1, 1781. Early in life he devoted his time to general merchandising, and for many years was a captain of a vessel making trips between New York and Boston and the intervening ports; later in life he devoted himself to agriculture.

CAPT. BENJAMIN HUSTED

He was one of the prominent men in town, several times representing his constituents in the State Legislature, besides holding all the more important town offices. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and gave liberally to its support.

He married Olivia, daughter of Samuel Mills,

Their children were Samuel, Lydia (married Robert Scott), Sarah (married Zacharius Close), Benjamin, and Mary E. (married Samuel Dayton). Of these only Samuel and Sarah are now (1880) living.

Capt. Husted died in February, 1871, and his wife died in 1874.

JAMES HUSTED.

The grandfather of the subject of this sketch was Benjamin Husted (1), who married Sarah Newman, and had the following children, —viz.: Benjamin, Nathaniel, Sarah, who married Titus Reynolds; Deborah, who married Nathaniel Reynolds; Martha, who married James Brush; Rachel, who married John Delavan; Mary, who married Jona Mead; and Zuba, who married Stephen Palmer, all of whom were born in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn.

Benjamin Husted was a farmer by occupation, lived an honorable life, and died at an advanced age. His son Nathaniel married Ruth Sniffin, and had the following children, —viz.: James, Nathaniel, Samuel, Benjamin, Jonathan, Rachel, and Mary, all born in Greenwich, Conn. He was also a farmer.

James Husted, son of Nathaniel, was born in June, 1786, and died Sept. 23, 1852. He always resided on the old farm, now owned and occupied by his aged widow. He was one of the successful farmers of the town, and blessed the community in which he lived by his generous deeds.

Very early in life he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church at Round Hill, where he resided, and became one of its most active and leading supporters. He was known by his hospitality, and many are the ministers who found his house a welcome place. He was a steward, class-leader, and superintendent of the Sunday-school for a great many years.

On the 12th of January, 1825, he married Mary B., daughter of Benjamin Husted and Sarah Dayton, and granddaughter of Benjamin and Sarah (Newman) Husted. She was born in the town of Greenwich, Conn., May 22, 1793, and now (October, 1880) like her brother, Col. Conklin Husted, retains her faculties remarkably well. She has been a life-long member of the Congregational Church, but attended the Methodist Episcopal Church.

JAMES HUSTED, JR.

James Husted, fourth son of Samuel and Nancy Husted, was born in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., on the 28th of September, 1828. His father was the third son of Nathaniel and Ruth (Sniffin) Husted. He is a farmer by occupation, and now resides in Ontario Co., N. Y. His children are as follows, —viz.: Amos, Nathaniel, Eunice, Elizabeth, John, James, Samuel, and Mary, all of whom are living.

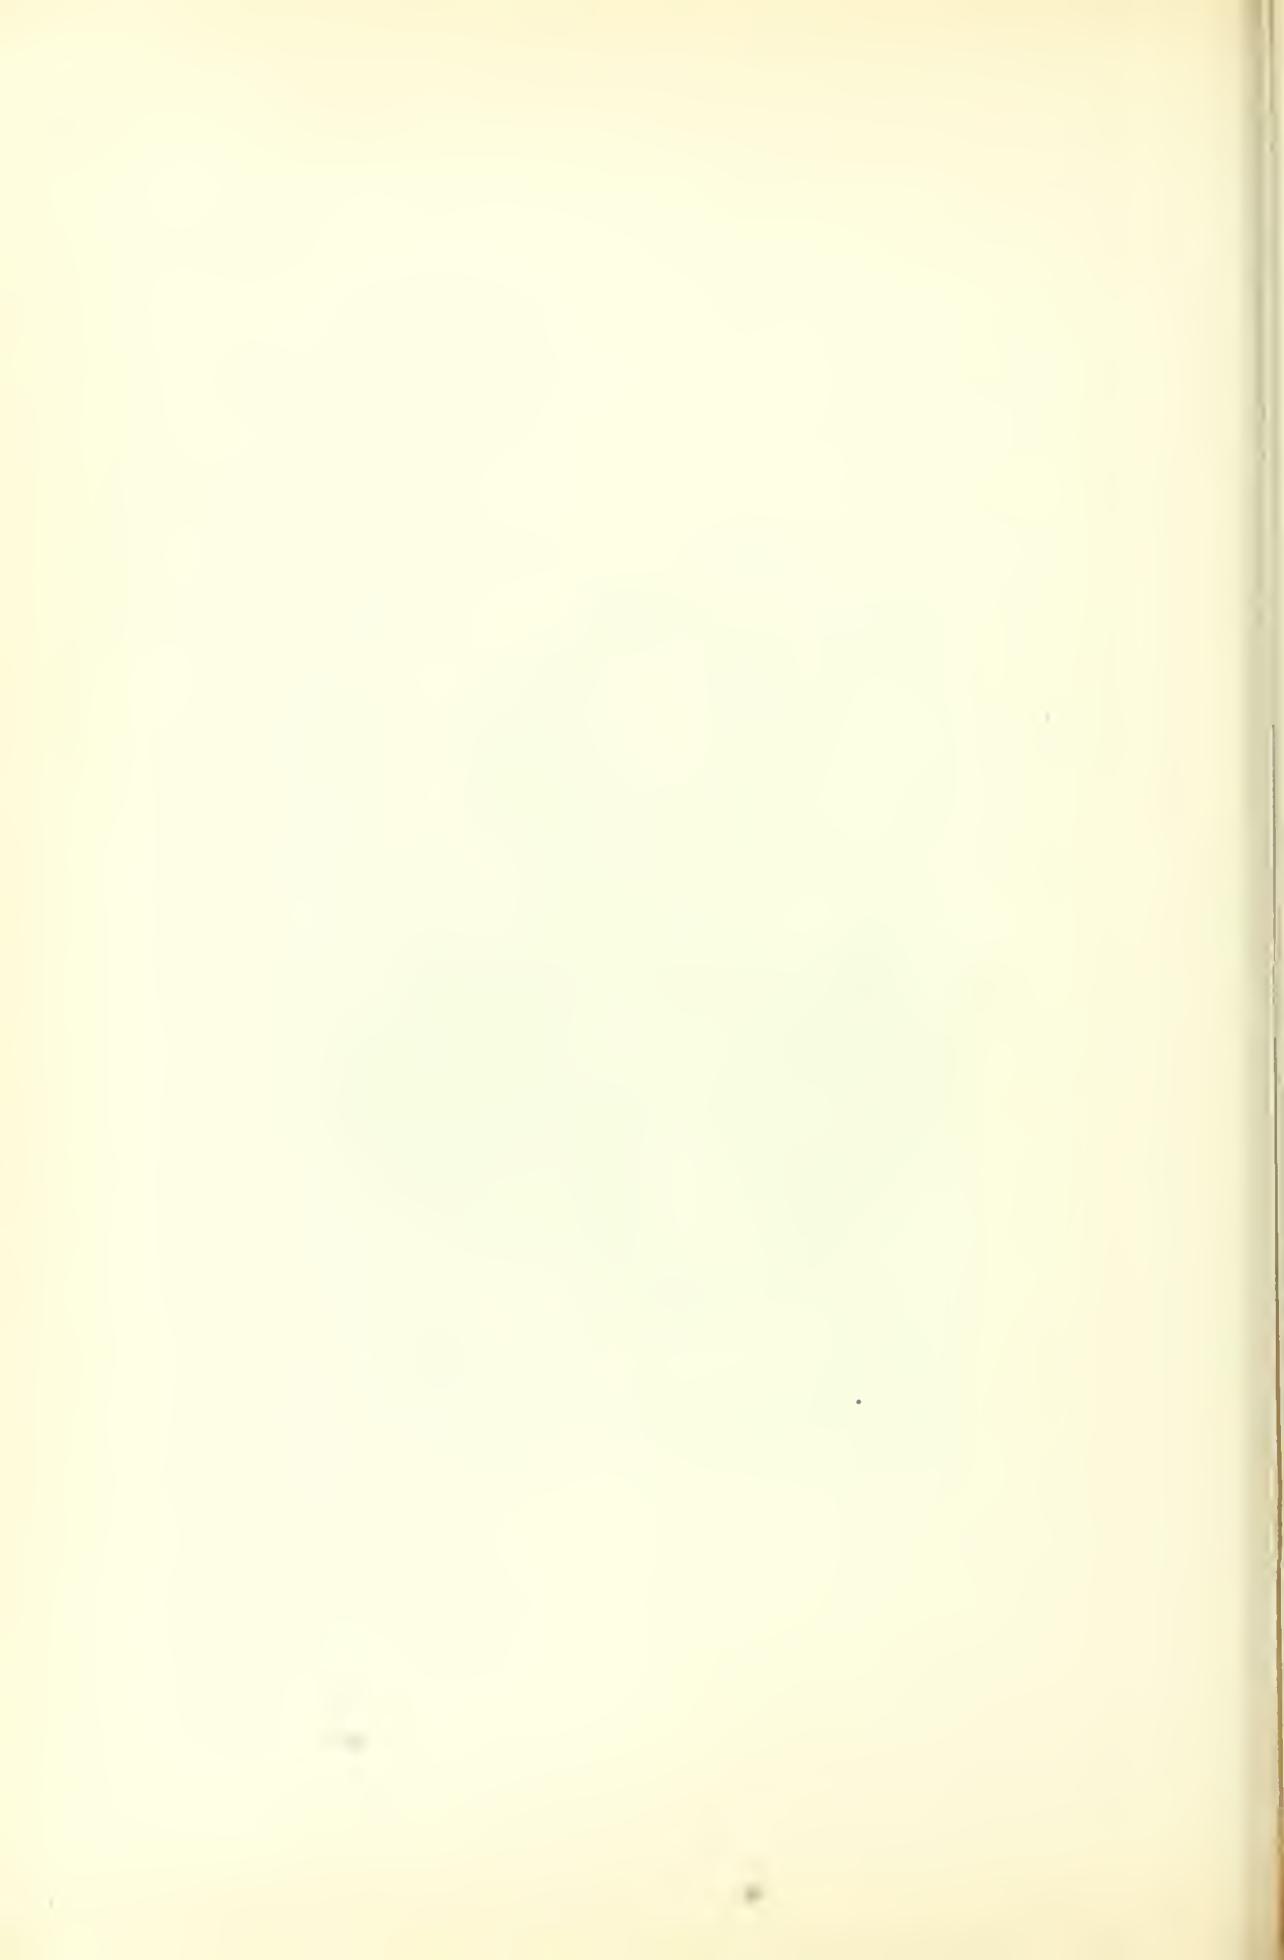

James Husted left his father's home at eleven years of age (1839) to live with his uncle, James Husted, after whom he was named. His advantages for an education were limited to the common schools of his day. He has continued to reside on the farm with uncle and aunt, except a few years while he was at Tarrytown, N. Y., and Rushville, N. Y., engaged in merchandising. On the 12th of September, 1869, he married Stella P., daughter of Joseph and Sarah A. (Mead) Brush. She was born May 22, 1838, in Greenwich, Conn. Their children are James F. (deceased), Joseph B., Sarah E., Emily M., Eunice L., James H., and Hellen. In politics Mr. Husted is a Democrat, but takes no active part in political matters.

WILLIAM A. HUSTED.

William A. Husted is an only son of Elnathan and Nancy (Close) Husted, and was born in Greenwich, Conn., Dec. 31, 1801. His grandfather was named Peter Husted, who married Eunice Lyon, of Greenwich, Conn. They had six sons and two daughters,—viz., Elnathan, Amos, Cynthia, Peter, Moses, Aaron, Eunice, and Caleb. (See history of James Husted, Sr.)

William A. Husted

Elnathan Husted was a successful farmer and drover, married Nancy Close, and had one son, William A. He was a member of the Second Congregational Church at Greenwich, Conn., and was a man respected. He died in 1825, aged fifty years. His wife died at seventy-three years of age.

William A. was reared on his father's farm, and farming has been his business nearly all his life. He owns the old homestead of two hundred acres where he was born. A view of his present house, which he built in 1871, may be seen in another part of this work. In politics a Republican.

On the 12th of December, 1822, he married Susannah Caroline Hobby, daughter of Squire Hobby. She was born Nov. 23, 1803, in the town of Greenwich, Conn. Their children are:

(1) Elnathan, who was a soldier in the Rebellion, and died March 4, 1864, leaving a wife and two daughters,—Caroline and Augusta.

(2) William F., married, and has four children, and resides at Davenport, Iowa, with Lyman B., who has one son, and is a farmer.

(3) George, died young.

(4) Susannah.

(5) Lyman B.

(6) Squire Jerome, who has one son, and is living at Oyster Bay, L. I.

(7) Mortimer, died Nov. 21, 1876, leaving a wife and one son.

(8) Nancy E., married John Andrews, a lawyer in Brooklyn, and has one son and two daughters.

CAPT. BENJAMIN W. HUSTED is the only living son of William Husted and Mary Lyon, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Conn., Jan. 15, 1808. His great-grandfather was David Husted (see history of James Husted, Sr.), who had a son Abraham, who married Hannah Knapp, and had two children, one of whom was William Husted. Abraham was a lieutenant in the Revolutionary war, and was a farmer by occupation. William Husted was born in 1783, in the town of Greenwich, Conn., and died in 1838. He married Mary Lyon, and had the following children,—viz., Benjamin W., Israel, Hannah, who married Husted Hobby; Phebe Ann, married Caleb W. Merritt; David, and William H., all of whom are now (1880) dead except Benjamin W. and Phebe Ann.

Mr. Husted was a farmer, and lived one mile south of where his son Benjamin W. now resides, on a farm which was in the family several generations.

Benjamin W. has always been a practical farmer, receiving the advantages of a common-school education till he was fifteen years of age. On the 24th of Dec., 1827, he married Rachel P., daughter of Enon and Elizabeth (Webb) Lyon. She was born Nov. 16, 1806. Their children are as follows,—viz., Julia (deceased), Israel G., who does business in New York City; Theophilus P. (deceased) and Eliphilet P., who is a farmer (twins); William E., also a farmer.

Nathaniel L. was a soldier in Company I, Tenth Connecticut Volunteer Regiment; served three years, was in all the engagements of his regiment, and was wounded in both ankles and in his left knee at the same time, and received an honorable discharge Oct. 2, 1861, since which time he has resided at home on the farm.

Mary E. married Alexander G. Knapp, who is a farmer near Council Bluffs, Iowa. Mr. Husted settled on his present farm in 1828. He is a Republican in politics, though he cast his first Presidential vote for Gen. Jackson at his second election. Mr. and Mrs. Husted are members of the Congregational Church at Greenwich, Conn.

He has held several town offices, and was a captain of a company of State militia for a great many years, and is known as Capt. Benjamin Husted. He is one of Greenwich's best citizens, a man universally respected.

HANFORD LOCKWOOD.

The name of Lockwood is traced back as far as 1170, when Annie, only daughter of Richard Lockwood, married Thomas Henshaw, who thereby became possessed of a large estate in Staffordshire, England. Those of the name in Greenwich, Stamford, Brundridge, and probably those of the name at Norwalk and other parts of the county, are descended from Edmund Lockwood, freeman, May 18, 1631. Was of Cambridge, Mass., in 1632, and probably removed to Connecticut with Messrs. Hooker and Stone. Lieut. Jonathan Lockwood and Lieut. Gershom Lockwood were in their day prominent and influential men in Greenwich, Conn.

Hanford Lockwood is a son of Ira and Clemendine (Mills) Lockwood and grandson of Thaddeus Lockwood, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., two and a half miles north of where he now resides, June 7, 1808.

His father was born at the same place Oct. 19, 1769, and died April 18, 1846, having lived nearly seventy-seven years on the same farm. He was one of the most successful farmers in the town, though not a large one. He commenced life poor, but by energy and economy became well off. It is related of him that at one time during the Revolutionary war he was standing guard, though not a soldier, and one dark night he heard the footsteps of something coming, and three times said, "Who comes there?" No answer came, and he fired, when he discovered he had shot a colt, thinking it was a Tory. He had four sons and one daughter,—viz., Aya, Lydia, Ira, Ralph, and Hanford, all of whom were born in the town of Greenwich, and all are now (1889) dead except Hanford. Lydia married Isaac Ostrander, of New York City, and had a large family of children.

Ira Lockwood, Sr., was a Whig in politics, and was a constable and collector of Greenwich a number of years. During the earlier part of his life he and his wife were members of the Baptist Church, but later were members of the Episcopal Church.

Thaddeus Lockwood, grandfather of Hanford Lockwood, was a farmer by occupation, married, and had a large family. He died about 1812 to 1814, aged ninety-three years.

Hanford Lockwood worked on his father's farm summers and attended the district school winters until he was fifteen years of age, when he went to New York City, and became a clerk in the employ of William J. Romer, a grocer, for five dollars a month. At the end of the first year he had saved more than thirty dollars, which he gave to his father, besides having properly clothed himself. This was the beginning of a successful business life. On account of sickness he returned home and remained two years, working on his father's farm; subsequently returned to New York, and entered the grocery-store of his brother-in-law, Isaac Ostrander, as clerk at eight dollars a month for one year, then received twelve dollars for his second year, and fifteen dollars for his third year's work.

The summer that he was twenty years of age he spent at home, and during the fall and winter following taught school at twelve dollars a month, and the following spring engaged for one year to teach in what was known as the Nash District at fifteen dollars a month, and "boarded around." He relates that he had a good time and made many warm friends. During this time he made the acquaintance of Susan, daughter of James Nash, the man who had engaged him to teach the school, and on the 6th of October, 1830, they were married. In the month of April, 1831, he commenced business as a grocer in the city of New York, and continued in that business for twenty-four years, when he retired from active employment and returned to his native town, and resided on the old home-stead where he first saw the light of day until February, 1878, when he settled where he now (1880) resides. During his residence in the city he made good investments in real estate, which have greatly increased in value on his hands. He was a first-class business man, and attributes his success in life more to the fact that at an early age he became interested in the cause of religion, under the influence of one Mary Ostrander, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church under the ministry of the Rev. William Jewett. He is one of the most worthy and influential members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Greenwich. He has held in the past and holds to-day the various offices of his church, such as steward, trustee, recording secretary, licensed exhorter, Sunday-school superintendent for many years, and a worker in the Sunday-school as teacher or superintendent the most of the time since he united with the church. He has always been very liberal to his church as well as to other denominations, and the poor have in him a true friend, and they go not empty away. He is the possessor of more than five hundred acres of land, two hundred and fifteen of which are in his present beautiful farm, called Grandview. See view of his place on another page. He has been twice married. His first wife died Oct. 27, 1869, and was buried at Stanwich, Conn., where a fine marble monument marks her resting-place. He married for his second wife Fanny Louns-

Joseph Wilcox

Josiah Wilcox, the subject of this sketch, remained at home, receiving the advantages of a common school education, until he was sixteen years of age, when he left to learn the manufacture of tinners' tools. After serving an apprenticeship of some five years, he began to work as a journeyman at one dollar a day, and the first year he put in three thousand one hundred and fifty hours of hard labor, or equal to three hundred and fifteen days of ten hours each. In the month of September, 1828, he settled where he now (Nov. 2, 1880) resides, five miles northeast of Portchester, N. Y., in the town of Greenwich, Conn. Here he built the first factory for the manufacture of tinman's tools in 1828. His factory was thirty by thirty-five feet, and this he enlarged from time to time until now his buildings are many. Mr. Wilcox manufactures shaft-couplings with no weld either in the eye or clip, thus making them lighter and stronger, but his specialty is at present the manufacture of carriage hardware, which is equal to supply the demands of more than one hundred thousand carriages annually. He is also interested in two other large factories at Southington, Conn., namely, Pecks, Stow & Wilcox Company, with a joint-stock capital of one million dollars, and the Etna Iron-Rolling Mills.

He married Celestia Wilcox, Aug. 21, 1828. She was born in Berlin, Conn., Sept. 11, 1806. Their children were George E. (deceased), George E. (2), Willis H. (deceased), Caroline O., Willis H. (2), Cornelia M., and Josiah N., all of whom were born on the old home where Mr. Wilcox now resides.

Mr. Wilcox was a Whig until 1856, since which time he has been a staunch Republican, and Nov. 2, 1880, he voted for Gen. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, for President. As a Whig and Republican he has five times represented his town in the State Legislature,—first in 1849, '51, '52, '53, and '54. He has often been a delegate to county and State conventions.

At seventeen years of age he united with the Congregational Church at Berlin, Conn., and since his residence in Greenwich he has been one of the strong pillars and main supporters of the Congregational Church at North Greenwich. His wife was a member of the same church, and he is a deacon of the same. Through a long and useful life he has taken a deep interest in the cause of temperance, and thoroughly believes that total abstinence is the only safe way. For the last twenty years he has been a director in the Portchester Bank. He commenced life a poor boy, but by his own energy, supplemented by that of his faithful wife, he has reared a family of children, who are universally respected, and they, as well as many of their children, are among Greenwich's best citizens.

George E. Wilcox married Sarah Lyon, and has two children,—viz., Gilbert L. and Bertha; Caroline O. married Henry S. Banks, of Portchester, and has two children, Clara and George; Willis H. married Susan C., daughter of Edward Mead, of Cos Cob, and has one son, Robert Mead; Cornelia M. married Silas E. Mead, of North Greenwich, and has three children, Mable, Louisa, and Josiah W.; Josiah N. married Henrietta Lyon, of Portchester, and has two children, Lillian and Arthur R. He is a cashier in the Portchester National Bank, at Portchester, N. Y., and the other boys are identified in the manufacture of carriage hardware with their father, one of whom, Willis H., was a soldier in the great civil war, having enlisted in Company I, Tenth Connecticut Volunteer Regiment, in September, 1861, and went forth to battle and was in more than fifty engagements under Gen. Burnside. He was slightly wounded at Strawberry Plain. He was mustered out October, 1864.

WILLIAM BRUSH.

William Brush is a lineal descendant of Capt. Benjamin Brush, who was a Revolutionary soldier, and who was taken prisoner during the Revolutionary war and put in the famous Sugar-House, in New York City, where he remained some time. He was a hatter by trade, but towards the latter part of his life devoted himself to agriculture. He married Rebecca Finch, and had nine children,—viz., Rachel, Abigail, Ard, Ann, Rebecca, Benjamin, Jonathan, Mary Ann, and Lucy Ann, the last two of whom are living.

Benjamin Brush died about 1822, and his wife about 1824.

Benjamin Brush (2) was born April 28, 1774; married Rachel Brush June 22, 1799. She was born Sept. 26, 1779. Their children were Shubel, William, Charles, and John (deceased).

Shubel married and had three children,—viz., Mary A., Rachel A. (deceased), and Harriet (deceased). His daughter, Mary A., married George A. Lockwood, and had five children,—viz., Frederick, William, Charles, Caroline, and twins, names not known.

Benjamin Brush was a tanner and farmer by occupation, a Whig in politics, and a member of the Congregational Church at Stanwich. He died in September, 1852, and his wife in March, 1853.

William Brush, son of Benjamin and Rachel Brush, was born at Stanwich, Conn., Sept. 26, 1802. He worked at the boot and shoe trade and tanner and carrier till 1832, when he settled on a farm, working it summers and at his trade winters until 1838, when he settled where he now resides. In politics he is a Republican.

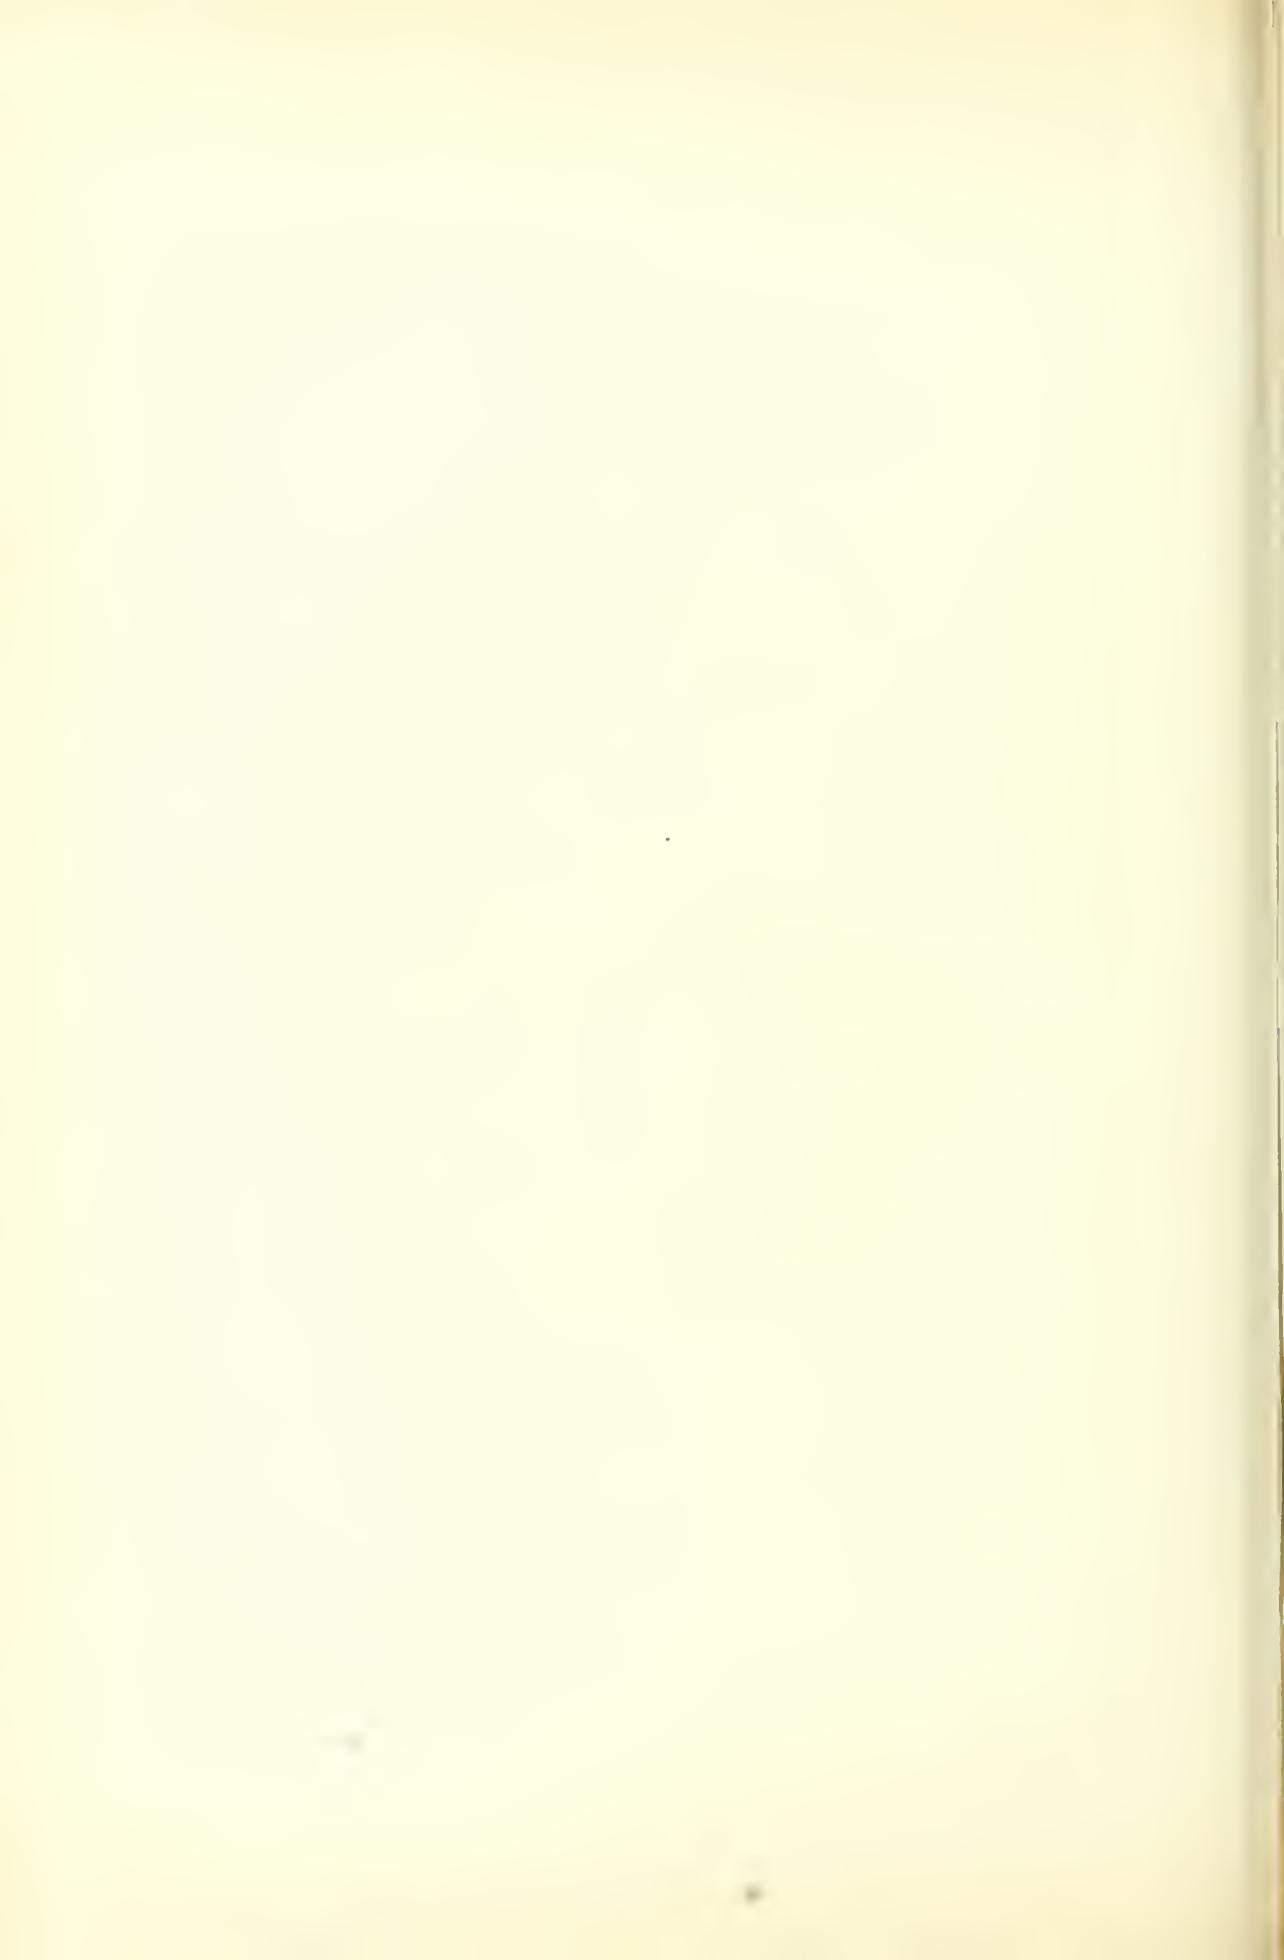

Mr. Brush is a liberal man, seeking to bestow his money where it will do good. He is a good citizen, and is universally respected.

JOHN G. REYNOLDS.

John G. Reynolds is a lineal descendant of the fifth generation from one of four brothers who came from England and settled in Greenwich, Conn., perhaps more than two hundred years ago, or the latter part of the seventeenth century.

We are not able to give the names of the four brothers, but they married, and one of them had the following children, viz., Nathaniel, Nezer, Enos, Timothy, Rebecca, Deborah, and Abigail, the eldest of whom, Nathaniel, was the great-grandfather of John G. Reynolds. This Nathaniel married Sarah Lockwood, and had the following children, viz.: Nathaniel, born Sept. 7, 1745, died June 6, 1822; Ezekiel, born Oct. 13, 1747, died Nov. 24, 1833; Abigail, born Dec. 11, 1749, died March 27, 1839; Benjamin, killed in battle in Revolutionary war; Phebe, born April 16, 1757, died June 19, 1829; James, born April 16, 1764, died March 2, 1833; Sarah, born Feb. 8, 1762, died Aug. 31, 1849; Philemon, born Feb. 21, 1764, died July 28, 1835; Nezer died young; Deborah, born May 13, 1776, and lived to be nearly one hundred years of age; and Lockwood, born April 20, 1768, died June 7, 1827.

The first Nathaniel Reynolds was a farmer, and owned a large tract of land near Stanwich, Greenwich, Conn. This was subdivided among his children, many of whom were farmers also.

Nathaniel Reynolds (the third) married Deborah Husted, daughter of Benjamin Husted and Sarah Newman (see biography of James Husted), for his second wife, and had several children, viz., Ard, Harriet, Benjamin, and Husted. He died in 1821, and she many years later. Ard Reynolds was born about a mile south of Stanwich, Conn., March 20, 1781. On the 13th of December, 1810, he married Anna Eliza Doell, a native of Germany, who came to America and settled in Albany, N. Y., at nine years of age. Their children were: Elizabeth P., who married Rev. Warner Hoyt, of Danbury, Conn.; Sally D., who married Tompkins Close, of Greenwich, Conn.; Benjamin H., who was killed at eight years of age; Ann Eliza (deceased); John G.; Harriet E., married Charles S. Guion, of Bedford, N. Y.; Julia H., who married Rev. Seneca Howland, of New York; and Maria S. (deceased).

In politics Mr. Reynolds was a Whig, and as such was one of the leading men of his town. He held the various town offices, such as magistrate and selectman, and was known as 'Squire Reynolds. He represented his town in the State Legislature, and took an active part while there. Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Stanwich, and he was one of the leading men of the same. His home was always open to ministers, and many there were who found it a welcome place. He died April 26, 1857, and his wife Feb. 25, 1858, and both lie buried in the private cemetery on the "home farm."

John Godfried Reynolds was born on the place where he now resides, a mile south of Stanwich, in the town of Greenwich, Conn., March 25, 1821. He received a common-school education, with a few terms at the Stamford Academy, at Stamford, Conn. On the 26th of August, 1851, he married Mrs. Julia R., widow of Augustus L. Reynolds, and daughter of Jared Smith. He was a Whig in politics until 1856, since which time he has been a Democrat. He has held nearly all of the town offices to the general satisfaction of his constituents, among which we may mention those of magistrate for a number of years, treasurer for eleven years, and register of voters since the adoption of the present system. He represented his town in the Assembly during those trying years of 1863 and '64, and again in '71, '75, and '77, and while there occupied important places on different committees, and was chairman on education one term. He is a trustee and director of the Greenwich Savings Bank. Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds are members of the Episcopal Church at Greenwich, Conn., and he has been a vestryman for many years, and at the present time is junior warden.

WILLIAM T. REYNOLDS.

William T. Reynolds is a son of Ezekiel and Phebe Reynolds, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Conn., July 18, 1814. His paternal grandfather, James Reynolds, was born in Greenwich, Conn., and married Abigail Knapp, Oct. 18, 1786. She was born in Greenwich, Oct. 4, 1755. Their children were as follows: Stephen, Ezekiel, James, Josiah, Silas, Nezer or Ebenezer, Enoch, Abigail, Reuben, Rachel, Hanford, Lockwood, Joseph, Sarah, and Amanda. This large family was born in Greenwich, and many of them have passed away. James Reynolds, Sr. was a farmer by occupation, reared his large family to industry and economy, and they became some of Fairfield County's best citizens. Mr. Reynolds died at an advanced age. (See history of John G. Reynolds.)

Ezekiel (second son of James) was born Aug. 7, 1788; married Phebe Reynolds, Dec. 21, 1809. They have had five children, all of whom were born in Greenwich, Conn. Names of their children are as follows, viz.: Adaline, who married Erastus Rundle, and has two sons and a daughter; James, died young; William T., Stephen, and Elkanah M.

Mr. Reynolds was a farmer, is a staunch Republican, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and so was his wife. He has always been very liberal to the poor and to the church. He is now (1880) ninety-two years and some months old, and he has lived to see nearly three generations pass away. He is living with a bright hope of a happy future, when soon the Master will say, "It's enough, come up higher."

William T. Reynolds remained at home until he was married, receiving such advantages for an education as the district schools afforded. On the 23d of February, 1836, he married Mary A., daughter of Stephen and Rachel (Brown) Halsey. She was born in the city of New York, May 29, 1818. Her father was a ship-carpenter and merchant, and was born on Long Island. Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds have the following children, viz.: Louisa H., Mary B., Julia R., Sarah W., William E. (deceased), Ezekiel, Jr., Isabella E., Frederick W. (deceased), Halsey W., and Louis E.

In the spring of 1836, Mr. Reynolds settled on the place where he now resides, and which was formerly owned by Mrs. Josiah Brown, grandmother of Mrs. Reynolds. He has a fine farm of one hundred and twenty-five acres, which is in a good state of cultivation. In 1856 he built his present house, in which the family still reside.

Mr. Reynolds is a strong believer in the principles of the Republican party. He and his wife are members of the Congregational Church of Stanwich, and he is one of its main supporters. He has never sought political honors, preferring the quiet of home.

JOHN R. GRIGG

is a son of Henry Grigg and Elizabeth Bush, and grandson of Henry Grigg, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Conn., Nov. 25, 1805. His ancestors were among the early settlers of Fairfield County. His father was born about 1760, was one of a large family of children, and married Elizabeth Bush, by whom he had the following children,—viz.: David (deceased), William (deceased), Sarah (deceased), Mary (deceased), Henry D., born Jan. 8, 1800, and was for more than fifty years on the water as captain; Ann Eliza, John R., James, and Rebecca, who married Nelson Seymour, and is now dead.

He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and was a farmer by occupation. He died in 1844, aged eighty-four years, and his wife in 1846. John R. Grigg worked on his father's farm summers, receiving such advantages for an education as the district schools of his day afforded. During many years of the earlier part of his life he was engaged in quarrying stone for New York and Fort Schuyler at Frog's Point. Since the death of his mother he has devoted himself to farming, which is his present employment.

He married Ophelia A., daughter of John and Elizabeth Banks, April 26, 1836. She was born in Greenwich, Sept. 2, 1809. Their children are Mary A. (deceased), Matilda (who married Alexander Mead), George W., Ann E. (deceased), Grace O., and Fannie B.

In politics, Mr. Grigg is a Democrat. He and wife are members of the Episcopal Church at Greenwich, of which he is a vestryman and one of its liberal supporters.

Mr. Grigg is a plain, unassuming man, one who attends strictly to his business and never was an aspirant for any political office, though he has held some minor ones. He is generous, kind, and industrious, and a man universally respected.

CAPT. GEORGE A. PALMER is a grandson of Denham Palmer, who came from England in company with his wife and settled in the town of Greenwich, Conn., and reared a large family.

Denham Palmer, the first, was a farmer by occupation, living to be well advanced in years. His children were as follows, viz.: Denham (2d), Henry, and James, and perhaps others.

Denham (2d) was born Aug. 12, 1766, married Mary Lockwood, who was born Sept. 12, 1767.

Their children were as follows:

(1) Maria, born Jan. 1, 1797, married Robert Clark and had eleven children; she died Nov. 2, 1879.

(2) Lockwood, born April 7, 1798; deceased.

(3) Solomon, born Nov. 7, 1799; deceased.

(4) Deborah A., born Dec. 9, 1801; deceased.

(5) Frances, born Sept. 10, 1803, married Chandler Comings, of Boston; died and left four children.

(6) Lewis, born April 7, 1805; deceased.

(7) George Augustus, born Sept. 5, 1807.

All of whom were born in Greenwich, Conn., and all of them are now (1880) dead except George Augustus.

Denham (2d) was a mechanic and farmer. His wife was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and died Feb. 18, 1847. He died at an advanced age.

Capt. George A. Palmer, familiarly known as Cold-water George, was reared on his father's farm, receiving only such advantages for an education as the district schools of his early day afforded. When he was about twenty-one years of age he purchased a market-boat and ran it between his native town and New York City. This, however, was soon laid aside for a new one, which he built himself, named "Locomotive." He was the captain of this for more than twenty years, carrying provisions to and fro. The captain was so thoroughly temperate, even in those early days when drinking was considered more respectable than it is now, that he would not carry liquors of any kind, beer, or even cider, and on account of his strict temperance principles, received the would-be stigma, "Cold-water George"; but to-day it proves to be a title of honor, rather than reproach. The captain has been successful in whatever he has undertaken, and succeeded better and made more money in his trading than any man who carried rum. Since 1850 he has been engaged in farming. In politics a Whig and a Republican, and as such has held some minor town offices. He has been a worthy member of the Congregational Church for a great many years,—more than fifty,—and one of its strong supporters. He has been twice married,—first, to Harriet Knapp, daughter of Abraham Knapp, Sept. 9, 1834. She was born Sept. 23, 1809, and died June 1, 1852, having been a member of the church many years. Their children were: 1) Darius M., born Dec. 25, 1836, and is now engaged in business at Port Chester, N. Y.; 2) Elizabeth E., born Sept. 21, 1838, and died Jan. 4, 1850. For his second wife he married Phoebe E., a sister of his first wife, March 19, 1853. She was born April 6, 1805, and is a member of the church.

JOHN DAYTON.

John Dayton is the eldest son of David Dayton, and grandson of David Dayton, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., Feb. 5, 1828. Nothing is known of his ancestors farther back than his grandfather, David, who was born at East Hampton, L. I., in 1761; married Jan. 21, 1789, to Elizabeth Osborne, who was born at East Hampton, L. I., in 1776.

David Dayton, Sr., was a tanner and currier, and boot and shoemaker by trade. He settled in the town of Greenwich, Conn., towards the close of the eighteenth century, where his children were born. His wife died April 10, 1837, and he died Jan. 23, 1838. Their children were as follows, viz.: Betsey, born Nov. 9, 1790; Jacob, born March 10, 1793; Sarah, born July 26, 1795; David, Jr., born March 6, 1798; Amy, born Feb. 3, 1800; and Melitable, born June 21, 1802.

David Dayton, the second, was born in Greenwich, Conn., where he followed the occupation of a farmer. He was a Democrat of the Jeffersonian and Jackson school, but never took any active part in politics, always preferring the quiet of home to any official honors. He married Elizabeth Brush, March 6, 1827.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Dayton were worthy members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mrs. Dayton died Sept. 20, 1863, in Greenwich, the town of her nativity. Mr. Dayton died Jan. 26, 1872. He was a good citizen and neighbor, a kind husband and an affectionate father. He left the record of an honest, industrious life, and a good name as the precious legacy to his descendants. Their children are as follows, viz.: John, born Feb. 5, 1828; Sarah, born Feb. 15, 1830; Charles, born Dec. 4, 1832; Henry, born Sept. 10, 1834; Mary E., born Dec. 28, 1836; David O., born Feb. 23, 1840; and George, born Aug. 22, 1842; all of whom were born in the town of Greenwich, Conn.

John Dayton remained at home working on his father's farm summers and attending the district school winters until he was eighteen years of age, when he began to learn the shoemaker's trade, which he followed, more or less, till he was twenty-six years of age. On the 29th of September, 1851, he married Matilda, daughter of Shadrach Sebeck, a native of Stamford, Conn. They have one daughter, Mary Frances. In the spring of 1852 Mr. Dayton settled in the village of Greenwich, and opened a boot-and-shoe store, where he is now (October, 1880) engaged in business. In politics he follows the footsteps of his fathers, and is a Democrat, and as such is one of the leading men of his town. He has been a constable for twenty-six years; deputy sheriff six years; warden of the borough several years; assessor many years; postmaster under President Andrew Johnson's administration; and member of the State Legislature during the years 1870 and '71. The first year he was in the Legislature he served on the committee of State prisons, and the second year on the humane committee. He has often been a delegate to town, county, and State conventions. Mr. Dayton is a man universally respected; even his bitterest political opponents are among his warm personal friends. He is an honest, upright citizen, and to him more than to any other man in his town is due the credit of the great interest manifested by the people of Greenwich in the history of Fairfield Co., Conn.

His brother, George Dayton, was a soldier in Company I, Tenth Connecticut Volunteer Regiment, in the great civil war; was in several engagements, and was wounded by being shot through his right lung at Newberne, the ball passing out below his left shoulder-blade, lodging in his coat. At the present time he is connected with the Broadway Fire Insurance Company, New York.

ISRAEL PECK.

Among the early settlers who came from England and settled in the town of Greenwich, Conn., was one Jeremiah Peck, a Presbyterian clergyman, who first settled at Elizabethtown, N. J., and then in Greenwich. He had two sons, Samuel and Theophilus. Theophilus was a cabinet-maker and joiner by trade, married a Miss Mead and had twelve children, one of whom was Israel Peck, who was born in Greenwich, Conn., April 9, 1750. He married Lovina Purdy; she was born Feb. 9, 1755. Their children were as follows,—viz., Israel, Nehemiah, Elizabeth, Rachel, Levina, Israel (2), and Elizabeth (2).

Israel Peck was a large farmer, a man greatly respected in the community. He and wife were regular attendants of the Congregational Church at Greenwich. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war a very short time, but furnished a substitute, which released him. He died Jan. 18, 1819, and his wife died Jan. 12, 1836. Israel Peck, son of Israel Peck, was born on the 7th of December, 1794, married Darinda Peck, who was born Feb. 20, 1796. Their children were Mary, born July 12, 1820, and Jabez, born April 12, 1822, and died April 9, 1847. Mary Peck married Gilbert Shute, and died March 24, 1867. Mrs. Darinda Peck died Oct. 20, 1871, and Aug. 19, 1873, Mr. Peck married, for his second wife, Mrs. Almira M. Platt, widow of Rev. Ebenezer Platt, and daughter of Ebenezer Mead. Mr. Peck was reared a farmer, which has always been his business until infirmity caused him to sell his farm. He owned the old homestead known as "Peck's Landing," which he sold about 1866 or 1868, and after residing at Port Chester a few years settled in the borough of Greenwich in 1873, where he has continued to reside until the present time.

He was a captain of a light militia company some four years. In politics he is a strong Republican. For more than fifty-one years he has been a worthy member of the Second Congregational Church at Greenwich, and one of its main pillars. His wife is also a member.

Mr. Peck is a very strong temperance man, and believes that total abstinence is the only true safeguard.

DAVID BANKS.

Among the noble band of worthy men whose names grace the pages of this History none have been more bold in declaring their honest convictions on all questions of moral or religious reform than the subject of this sketch. He is of English origin, and was born in the town of Greenwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., Aug. 11, 1791. His grandfather, David Banks, was a Revolutionary soldier, was a shoemaker by trade, and a man honored and respected. He died at a ripe old age.

David Banks worked on the farm summers and attended the South Stanwich district school winters until he was thirteen years of age, when he commenced to learn the shoemaker's trade with his uncle, Daniel Banks. The time thus spent at the district school, supplemented with eleven weeks some time afterwards in studying English grammar, laid the foundation for his education. Mr. Banks has been a great reader and quite a logical thinker, and to-day has one of the best-informed minds in the town. At the early age of eight years he received religious impressions by the earnest prayers of a faithful school-teacher, which took deep root, the result of which has been an earnest Christian life, devoted to God and the cause of humanity. On the 1st of January, 1815, he united with the Congregational Church at Stanwich, Conn., and at the present time is a member of the Church of the Puritans in New York City.

He succeeded his uncle Daniel as the proprietor of the shop at twenty-one years of age, having in the mean time become somewhat noted as a first-class shoemaker, making a specialty of good fits on fine boots and shoes. His business increased, and he was compelled to hire two men to assist him. He commenced business in the same house where he first saw the light of day, and remained there until 1828 or 1830, when he settled where he now resides.

He built his present house on temperance principles in 1826 or 1828, it being the first house in the town put up without the use of rum at the raising. As a characteristic of his well-known temperance principles, even in those early days, we mention that when his head carpenter came to him and said that the men would not work without rum, he replied that the timber could lie and rot before one drop of rum should be brought on his premises. He stuck to his vow, and the result was his house was put up all right, and no one was injured. He continued at his trade until 1860, since which time he has been a farmer.

On the 10th of May, 1821, he married Matilda, daughter of Rev. David Peck, of Greenwich, Conn. She was born May 7, 1797, and died June 17, 1879. She was a devoted wife and an affectionate mother. Their children were as follows: Zaccheus, Cornelius (deceased), Ann (deceased), David (deceased), Alpheus (deceased), Augustus, Elethea, Sarah H., and Mary E.

Mr. Banks has always been an outspoken, bold, anti-slavery man, and his own house has often been opened for prayer and public meetings to discuss the slavery question, even when the church was barred against such meetings; but time has wrought a wonderful change, and such a change. In politics he was a Free-Soiler and Whig till 1856, when he became a staunch Republican, and in November, 1880, voted for Gen. Garfield, of Ohio, for President of the United States.

In 1840 he voted the Liberty ticket, having James G. Birney for President and a Mr. — Earle for Vice-President. There were only about seven thousand votes cast for this ticket in the United States in 1840, but this small party, under different names, at different times, has grown until its principles are well known and felt throughout the length and breadth of our vast domain, and in 1880 elected the ripest scholar and statesman that ever graced the Presidential chair.

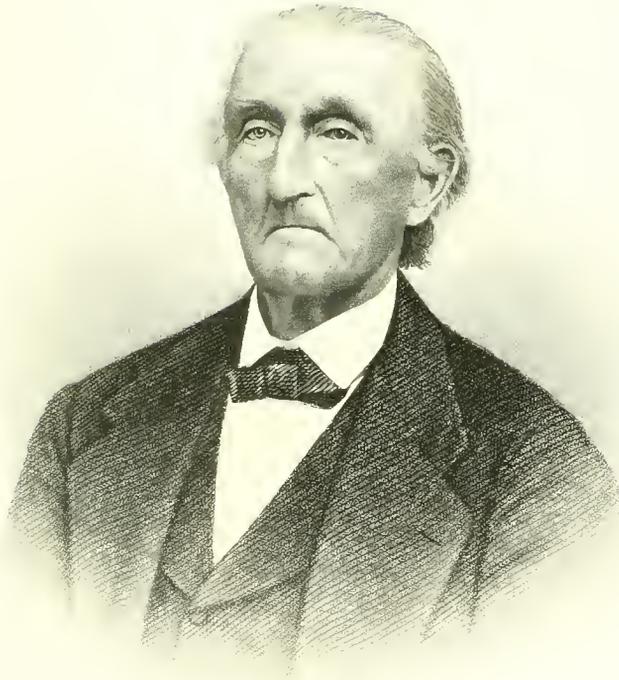

Mr. Banks has been very liberal indeed, having given more than two thousand dollars to aid the missionary cause, besides doing his part for home interest.

NATHAN FINCH.

Nathan Finch, son of Reuben Finch and Abigail Reynolds, was born in the town of Greenwich, at or near Stanwich, Fairfield Co., Conn., April 7, 1802. His great-grandfather, on his father's side, was named Nathan Finch, who, together with his brother Jonathan, came from England and settled in the town of Greenwich, Conn. Jonathan Finch soon after left the town and county, and nothing has ever been known of him or his descendants, and it is generally supposed that he died leaving no family. Nathan (1st) married and had a family of children, one of whom was named Jonathan, who married and had several children, one of whom was named Reuben, who was born in the town of Greenwich, Conn., July 19, 1773, married Abigail Reynolds, Oct. 5, 1794. She was born in Greenwich, Conn., Nov. 13, 1774. Their children were as follows: Reuben R. (deceased), Deborah A., Amos (deceased), Nathan, Lockwood (deceased), Mary R., Jonathan (deceased), Hannah M., Julia E., and George G. (deceased). Reuben Finch was a merchant for a great many years, and was moderately successful. He also was engaged in farming for many years, and reared his children to industry and economy. He died on the 28th of April, 1839.

Nathan Finch (2d) worked on his father's farm summers and attended the district school winters until he was twenty years of age, when he entered his father's store as a partner with his father and remained a few years, when he became a copartner with his brother, Reuben R., in general merchandising in the city of New York, where he remained about a year, when he returned to his native town and entered the employ of Joseph Brush, of Cos Cob, Conn., where he remained a short time. During the next five years he was a merchant at Sing Sing, N. Y., and the succeeding five years were spent at Peekskill, N. Y., as a merchant with his brother Reuben R., when he again returned home and became a partner with his brother Jonathan in general merchandising, which continued some three years, when he became interested in the stock trade, bought and sold, together, and with butchering, in which business he remained some fifteen years, since which time he has not been actively engaged in any business.

He is regarded as an honest, upright citizen, is a Republican in politics, but never aspired to any official positions, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Stanwich, Conn.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

HUNTINGTON.

Geographical—Topographical—The Pioneers—Extracts from Town Records—Slavery—The Indian Well—List of Settlers—List of Representatives—Villages, &c.—Ecclesiastical History.

THE town of Huntington lies on the eastern border of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by the town of Monroe and the Housatonic River; on the east by the Housatonic River, which separates it from New Haven County; on the south by the towns of Stratford and Trumbull; and on the west by Trumbull and Monroe. The surface of the town is uneven, being diversified with numerous hills and valleys. The soil is generally fertile.

THE PIONEERS.

Prominent among the pioneers of Huntington was Daniel Shelton, of honored memory, the common ancestor of all who bear the name of Shelton in this portion of the United States. The following sketch of this pioneer is taken from a discourse delivered by the Rev. William Shelton, D.D., June 11, 1877:

"That he came from England, and from the town of Rippon (or, as we call it, Ripton), in about 1687; was married in Stratford in 1692; was a vestryman of that venerable parish, which is among the oldest in the country; that he was a merchant and farmer; that he had seven children, and that he was a large landowner, as appears by the town records and by the traditional knowledge of his descendants; that he was a devoted and intelligent churchman and suffered for his attachment to the holy principles of the Book of Common Prayer,—are among the chiefest of our reminiscences of him. But to give the reasons why he is so dear to all of us, as I shall endeavor to show.

"It is well known that he was distressed to and was persecuted by those great and grand principles of the Church of England transcribed by law from primitive antiquity; that he did what in him lay to persevere and to defend them in this then new and hostile country; that he was thrown into prison some eight miles from his home, and carried there in a humiliating manner, for refusing to pay his money to support the preaching of doctrines and a system of theology in which he had no belief or confidence,—are among the traditions of his life. This must have been an astonishment to a man who had crossed the ocean to settle himself in a country regarding which it had been publicly proclaimed that all men were born free and could worship God in their own manner, provided they did not intrude upon the rights of others. He had come from his native land, which had been distracted by conflicting parties on all religious subjects, the Independents on the one hand, and the corrupt Church of Rome on the other, both equally hostile and equally assailing, and persecuting the Church of England. He had looked, doubtless, for peace, and had sought quiet in a new country, where, as he thought, party animosity did not exist. It must have surprised him, I say, to find himself imprisoned and evil treated because he would not pay for the support of a system of religion in which he did not believe. He was really in the condition in which this country claimed to be many years after, when the war was raised against the mother-country because she exacted a tax without representation.

"He was a member of the Church of England, and yet a religious society rudely took him from his farm and thrust him into prison, where he was confined at least one night. It is not stated that he refused to contribute to the support of divine religion, for he was at one time a vestryman of his parish church, which he would not have been had he proved himself so far forgetful of his duty as not to promote the temporal as well as spiritual interests of religion, and it is recorded that on All Saints' day, in 1722, sixteen Episcopalians, inhabitants of Ripton, addressed a paper to the secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, asking for a pastor of their own, or for stated supplies every third Sunday from the ministers settled in Stratford and New Haven. 'We are emboldened,' they state, 'to hope this, both because we design to set apart a globe for our spiritual guide when he comes, and also because we suffer a great persecution for the Church's sake from those who have the civil power here, and who have made that a handle to grasp the ecclesiastical.' The second signature to this document was that of Daniel Shelton, and the fifteenth was undoubtedly that of his son, Joseph, then twenty-four years of age and ripening into the fortitude and manliness of defending the principles in which he had been educated by his father. It is recorded, also, that the elder died before a church had been built in Ripton, under the ministrations of Dr. Johnson; but he left a name, it is said, and an influence behind him which lived and was fruitful in good works.

"His name stands among the earliest churchmen of Stratford, which then included Huntington, and next to the head of the list of those who petitioned the Bishop of London, in 1707, to aid them in the midst of the most rigid Presbyterians and Independents. Violent opposition and threatened imprisonment followed the ministrations of a church missionary who had visited the town of Stratford and ordained and administered the sacraments of Penance and the Lord's Supper. These peti-

"They (the Independents) still persisted with vigor to continue their persecution, and seized the body of Daniel Shelton at his habitation or farm, being about eight miles distant from the town, hurrying him away towards the town, in order to carry him to the county goal. Passing by a house, he requested of them that he might go in and warm him and take some refreshments, which was granted; but they, being in a hurry, bid him come along, but, he desiring a little longer time, they barbarously laid violent hands on his person and flung his body across a horse's back and called for ropes to tie him on the horse, to the truth of which several persons can give their testimony and are ready when thereunto called; and, having brought him to the town, they immediately seized the bodies of William Rowlinson and Archibald Dunlap and carried them all three to the county goal, it being the 16th day of January, 1709, and there confined them until such time as they disbursed such sums of money as the gaoler demanded of them, which money was last in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor, Nathaniel Gould, Esq., he promising them that the next General Court should hear and determine the matter and that the money left in his hands should be disposed of as the Court should order; and they were at present released, being the 17th day of the same inst."—*Documentary History of Connecticut, edited by the Rev. EXTRACTS FROM TOWN RECORDS.

"Feb. 11, 1789. Mr. Ebenezer Beach ear-mark, crop on the near ear and half-penny, — the upper side of the same. Transferred to William Beach."

"Huntington, Jan. 6, 1795, personally appeared Ebenezer Beach, Esq., and deposed that Amos, a negro boy, was born in his house on the 20th day of August, Anno Dom. 1786."

"Feb. 11, 1789. Mr. Stiles Nichols' ear-mark, two half-pennies under the near ear, and a hole in the same."

"February, 1789. Mr. Abijah Beardsley ear-mark, swallow fork on the end of each ear, and a half-penny fore-side the near ear."

"1789. Lieut. Curtis Tomlinson ear-mark, a slit in the end of the off ear, and a nick under the same, and a half-Tarant under side of the near ear."

"James Dunning ear-mark, swallow fork on the near ear" (a small piece of colored paper illustrating the said 'swallow fork' is pinned to the page of the old town book.)

"1791. Samuel L. Hyde's ear-mark, crop on the near ear, and a half-penny fore-side the off ear."

SLAVERY.

Under date of 1791, Mr. Daniel Shelton "Declares that Peter, a negro boy, was born on the 15th day of September, A.D. 1786, and that a negro boy named Toke was born the 20th day of March, A.D. 1791." The following advertisement is from an old paper:

"Ban away from the subscriber sometime last month, a negro slave, named Sampson. All persons are forbid harbouring or trusting him, and all masters of vessels are forbid carrying him away on penalty of the law.

THE INDIAN WELL.

The old Indian well is one of the attractions of this town, and is indeed, to those who love the strange and curious in nature, a place well worth visiting. It is a secluded spot in the mountain-gorge where the rays of the sun seldom penetrate. "Silence reigns here supreme, broken only by the soft murmur of the stream falling a distance of twenty-five feet. Tradition says the Indians fathomed the well to the depth of one hundred feet and found no bottom, and that they held some superstitious awe and veneration for the place. It is an enchanting spot, and thousands of pleasure-seekers visit it in the summer to enjoy its romantic scenery and seek recreation from the busy routine of daily avocations."

CIVIL LIST.

Huntington was incorporated as a town in 1789, and included that portion of the old town of Stratford known as the parishes of Ripton and New Stratford. The area of the town was decreased in 1823 by the setting off of the parish of New Stratford, which was incorporated as the town of Monroe.

SELECTMEN.

The record of the proceedings of the annual town-meeting cannot be found prior to 1845. The following is a list of the selectmen from that year to the present time:

1845, Ely Lewis, Wm. L. Bennett; 1846, Daniel Bennett; 1846-48, David Beecher; 1847-49, Henry B. Lake; 1849-50, Orville Booth; 1850-52, 1854, 1861, Charles C. Tomlinson; 1851-53, David Lewis; 1853-55, Wm. A. Judson; 1855-56, 1864, John M. Beardley; 1856-60, 1862-61, 1867, Wm. L. Bennett; 1857-60, Ely Lewis; 1861, Eli N. Baldwin; 1862-63, Wells Hubbell; 1865-66, Lewis B. Gray, James H. Beard; 1867, Orville Booth; 1868, Stephen Beardley; 1869-71, 1873, 1878-79, F. G. Perry; 1869, S. P. Buckingham; 1869-71, Ambrose Shelton; 1870, Edgar S. Wooster; 1871-72, James Mills, David N. Lane; 1872, Lewis J. Shelton; 1873, 1878-79, Charles Beau; 1873, S. G. Blakeman; 1874-75, James W. Wheeler; 1874, S. M. Wakelee, John Franley; 1875, 1879, Erastus Bennett; 1875, Isaac Birdseye; 1876-77, James H. Beard, Wells Hubbell, Horace S. Lyon; 1878, John C. Buckingham.

VILLAGE OF SHELTON.

The village of Shelton is located in the eastern part of the town on the Housatonic, opposite Birmingham, and was named in honor of Edward H. Shelton, Esq. It is delightfully located, overlooking the Housatonic, and commands a fine view of the neighboring town of Derby. It is the seat of various manufacturing establishments, and is one of the flourishing villages of Fairfield County. The medical profession is represented by Gould A. Shelton, M.D., who is the only physician in the village.

Huntington is a hamlet, containing two churches, located in the centre of the town.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

Huntington, originally in Stratford, was incorporated in 1789, and embraced two parishes, Ripton and New Stratford (now Monroe). When Monroe became a town Ripton took the name of Huntington. The church was organized with ninety-two members from the Stratford church, Feb. 12, 1724, and the pastor, Rev. Jedediah Mills, was ordained the same day. In connection with the call and settlement of Mr. Mills the following vote was passed, "without contradiction of any person," viz.: "to give Mr. Mills eighty pounds towards building his house,—forty pounds of it in money and forty pounds of it in work,—and in the beginning fifty pounds salary a year, and afterwards rising as God shall enable us and as Mr. Mills shall stand in need, and as this society shall think fit, and also one hundred acres of land already given by the town of Stratford."

The first meeting-house was probably erected about 1720, and stood on Fanton Hill, about eighty rods northeast of the present one. The second edifice stood about twenty rods northeast of the present one, which is the third, and was erected in 1832.

The following are the names and terms of service of each minister: Rev. Jedediah Mills, 1724-76; Rev. Daniel Ely, D.D., 1773-1816; Rev. Thomas F. Davis, 1817-18; Rev. Thomas Punderson, 1818-41; Rev. Charles N. Seymour, 1844-47; Rev. Eliakim Phelps, D.D., 1847-49; Rev. William B. Curtis, 1850-58; Rev. John Blood, 1858-62; Rev. William D. Morton, 1864-69; Rev. Loring B. Marsh, 1869-72; Rev. Allen Clark, 1873-74; Rev. Lucin. H. Higgins, 1875.

The following are the present officers of the church and society: Pastor, Rev. L. H. Higgins; Deacons, George L. Nichols, Oliver G. Beard, Lewis J. Shelton; Superintendent of Sunday-school, Edward S. Hawley; Assistant Superintendent of Sunday-school, Frank W. Wooster; Church Clerk, N. W. Blackman; Society's Committee, Deacon L. J. Shelton, S. B. Nichols, D. A. Nichols; Secretary and Treasurer, Mr. E. S. Hawley. The number of present members is one hundred and forty-five.

Among the incidents in the history of the church are the following:

The so-called "Half-Way Covenant" was used by the church till done away with in 1817.

In 1743, David Brainerd was expelled from Yale College, in part "because he had disobeyed orders in attending prohibited meetings of those who were attached to the preaching of Whitefield and Tennent." Rev. Mr. Mills regarding his treatment as unjust received him into his family, and under his instruction he studied theology, and, thus fitted, went forth as a missionary to the Stockbridge Indians.

During Dr. Ely's ministry there were additions to the church by profession every year except six. He was a member of the corporation of Yale College, and about one hundred young men were fitted for college under him.

During Rev. Mr. Punderson's ministry of twenty-six years two hundred and fourteen were admitted to the church.

Dr. Phelps had somewhat of notoriety in connection with the "Stratford knockings." He was the father of Rev. Austin Phelps, D.D., of Andover Theological Seminary, Massachusetts.

During the winter and spring of 1877 there occurred one of the most marked works of grace that had been witnessed for a generation, as one result of which nearly forty united with the church.

The Scattergood Mission is under the care of Rev. Friend Hoyt, who founded it, and to whose untiring energy the success of the movement is due. An effort is being made to organize it into a Missionary Church Society.

* Dr. Ely was a colleague with the Rev. Mr. Mills for three years preceding the death of the latter.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

The first church was organized Nov. 3, 1838, with the following members: Ferris Drew, James Beard, Wright Drew, Jesse Gilbert, John G. Beardsley, Smith Beardsley, Rebecca Beardsley, Israel Hamilton, Fanny Drew, Ann Hamilton, Charity Drew, Phebe Olmstead, Emily Hubbell, James Drew, Reuben Drew, Phebe Drew, Maria Drew, Ann Beardsley, Mary Beardsley, Lucias Hubbell, William M. Hubbell, C. Johnson, Samuel Drew, Sarah G. Johnson. Pastors: William A. Demison, Alva Gregory, Judson G. Lyman, William B. Knapp, John Waterbery, F. N. Barlow, A. N. Benedict, Charles Nichols, Amos Benedict, C. W. Potter, J. G. Galun, George F. Pay, Sumner Tatbam, Addison Brainard, and F. Perry. The church building was erected in 1839.

Present officers: Committee, George W. Drew, John Tomlinson; Church Clerk, Levi Beamas. The present membership is between thirty and forty.

ST. PAUL'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The parish of Ripton, in Huntington, and the parish of New Stratford, in Monroe, were once a part of the parish of Christ's Church, at Stratford. St. Paul's church at Huntington, was built about the year 1740. The parish of Ripton was set off from the parish of Christ's Church, at Stratford, in April, 1749. Rev. Christopher Newton was its first minister, and was one of a small number who went to England for holy orders of the Episcopal Church, and was ordained by Zachary Pearce, Bishop of Bangor, at the chapel of Spring Garden, Westminster, by order of Thomas, Lord Bishop of London. He was admitted to the holy order of deacon on the 25th day of July, 1755, being St. James' Day. On Sunday, the 27th day of July, he was admitted to the holy order of priests according to the manner and form of the Church of England.† He was appointed missionary at Huntington in 1755. During his ministry at Ripton Parish he officiated some part of the time at Tashua, in Trumbull.

The first records of Ripton parish are dated "Easter Monday, April 12, 1784." The following may show the manner in which the minister's salary was sometimes raised in those days:

"Vote, That Rev. Mr. Newton's rate on 1st of 1784 shall be two pence halfpenny on the pound, including his wood; with this reserve considered in the vote. Those who have a mind to furnish any wood may pay the halfpenny on the pound in wood."

The Rev. Mr. Newton's death occurred on Feb. 6, 1787. He was an able and sound divine.

Rev. Abram Lynson Clark succeeded Rev. Mr. Newton in 1787, and resigned in 1792, when he removed to Providence, R. I. The Rev. Charles Seabury succeeded him for one year.

It is certified on the parish records that a vote was

* Contributed by Mrs. J. P. Shelton.

† These orders are preserved and are at the home of Mrs. David Shelton, in Huntington, whose husband was grandson of Rev. Mr. Newton.

passed to employ the Rev. William Green for one year, and for his services during this time he was to be allowed one hundred pounds lawful money. A certified copy of this vote was forwarded to Bishop Provost, of New York.

The records also show that at a meeting held June 24, 1789, it was voted to allow the Rev. Calvin White one hundred pounds lawful money, and the use of the glebe houses and land, and thirty-three loads of wood.

In the year 1800 the Rev. Ambrose Todd was settled, and remained until his death, which occurred July 25, 1809, in the forty-sixth year of his age and the twenty-second year of his ministry. He was much beloved by his people, and at his death was deeply lamented. The records show that when he was called to the parish, a vote was passed to call the Rev. Ambrose Todd, at a salary of one hundred pounds, lawful money, and forty loads of wood.

In 1805 the Rev. Mr. Todd was requested to perform divine service at St. Paul's church at Ripton, and at St. Peter's church at New Stratford (now Monroe), one-third of the time, and the wardens of St. Paul's church, at Ripton parish, were empowered, when called upon, to make such arrangements for the direction of the new church at New Stratford as might seem necessary. The people in New Stratford had heretofore assisted in paying for services in Ripton parish.

In the year 1800, St. Paul's Church Society voted to sell the glebe house and lot to Rev. Mr. Todd. In August, 1809, the society voted to continue the salary of the Rev. Ambrose Todd to his family until the fifth of the next December, together with the use of the glebe orchard. At the same time and place it was voted that the society entertain the highest regard for his memory, and agree to defray his funeral expenses and erect a tombstone to his memory.

June 17, 1811, the two societies voted to call the Rev. Menzies Rayner to preach alternately at St. Paul's church, at Ripton, and at St. Peter's church, at New Stratford, at a salary of five hundred and fifty dollars per annum and the use of the glebe lot, providing the salary could be raised without taxation.

The people in the parish of Ripton being desirous that the relationship of minister and people between them and Rev. Mr. Rayner should be brought to a close, a committee was appointed in December, 1826, to visit Rev. Mr. Rayner to ascertain the lowest terms upon which he would leave the society. The committee reported that Rev. Mr. Rayner would join with St. Paul's Church Society in requesting the bishop to dissolve the connection with that society in consideration of two hundred dollars, and that his services should cease on the last Sunday of December. The dissolution was made by Thomas C. Brownell, Bishop of Connecticut.

On Jan. 8, 1811, a subscription was started and the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars was raised for a fund, the interest of which should be appropriated forever for the support of preaching in Ripton parish by an Episcopal clergyman.

In June, 1811, St. Paul's church was destroyed by fire. It originated in consequence of a young man, a citizen of the town, shooting a dove which was sitting on some part of the church.

From the close of Mr. Rayner's rectorship to the year 1864 several different clergymen occupied the pulpit for short intervals.

In 1836 the society, being in embarrassed circumstances, made application to the bishop for pecuniary aid, that it might be enabled to have preaching continued. Since that time it has been a missionary society. In 1841 a parsonage was built on the glebe property.

In April, 1864, the Rev. Joseph Covell was called, and remained for nearly thirteen years, when he resigned on account of ill-health and infirmities of age. He was an efficient Christian minister, a sound divine, and looked well to the interest of his small flock. By good advice and Christian ministrations he was instrumental in adding numbers to the church, leaving the small society in a united and prosperous condition. During his rectorship the church was improved in appearance by repainting, re-seating, frescoing, and being made more modern in style. The expense incurred was nearly twelve hundred dollars, which was all subscribed and paid as soon as the work was completed.

Rev. Mortimer Hyde next filled the rectorship for two years. Since his resignation there has been no regular clergyman, but the pulpit has been supplied by lay-reading and the ministerial services of the Rev. Mr. Dunfield, of Monroe.

The society was once large and flourishing, but by deaths and removals, and the members in the eastern part of the town uniting with St. James' Church at Birmingham, it has been rendered unable to keep up ministerial services without great sacrifices on the part of the membership.

CHAPTER XL.

HUNTINGTON (Continued).

MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

The Ousatonic Water Company—The Derby Silver Company—Birmingham Corset Company—The Shelton Company—Bolts, Tacks, Etc.—Wilkins & Co.'s Paper-Mills.

THE OUSATONIC WATER COMPANY.

CONNECTICUT is emphatically a manufacturing State, and, as in many other portions of New England, the sagacity, enterprise, and perseverance of her citizens are everywhere observable in the manner in which they utilize every afforded facility for internal improvements and the development of the great industries which are peculiar to these localities. As a result of such enterprise, villages and towns of rare beauty and interest have rapidly sprung up along the margin of her rivers, where the opening of the present century witnessed no indications of busy, bustling humanity. But these places, wild and unforbidding as was their natural appearance, have, by the embellishments of art, been rendered far more delightful and desirable than those which were often originally more attractive.

Much of the surface of this State is broken and hilly, yet it can boast of no mountain scenery properly so called. The face of the country is delightfully varied by low ranges of hills, and the passage of the Connecticut and Housatonic and other smaller yet beautiful rivers through its entire length. There are several elevations in the State dignified by the name of mountain, and, although their highest peaks are much inferior in height to the mountains in other parts of New England, they present many attractions and add much to the scenic views of the State. The lakes nestling among these miniature mountains in some parts of the State are extremely beautiful. But the most picturesque scenery is to be found in the valleys of her rivers, where it is ever changing and loses none of its beauties from the sources of the rivers to where they mingle with the waters of Long Island Sound.

A late writer, in speaking of the attractive places and manufacturing interests on the Ousatonic—better known as Housatonic—River, says, in reference to the great achievement of the Ousatonic Water Company:

"At the present day, when manufacturing enterprise seeks every available opportunity for its development, it seems strange that less than forty years ago the project of utilizing one of the finest water-powers in New England should have encountered vigorous opposition; yet such was the fact, and but for the indomitable energy and perseverance of some half a dozen individuals the great improvement might have slumbered for another generation.

"A brief history of the enterprise which under the auspices of the Ousatonic Water Company, at Derby, Conn., was brought to successful completion in 1870 cannot fail to prove of interest to our readers, and especially to those who desire to find an advantageous location for manufacturing operations within easy distance of New York City.

"The Ousatonic—or Housatonic, according to modern orthography—is one of the largest rivers in New England, having a much greater volume of water than the Blackstone, Quinnabaug, Chicopee, Shetucket, or Willimantic, all bordered by flourishing manufacturing towns, and but little less than the Merrimac, which drives the countless spindles of Lowell. The Housatonic takes its rise among the hills of Berkshire Co., Mass., more than one hundred miles above the head of tide water at Birmingham, Conn., and empties into Long Island Sound near Bridgeport.

"It drains about two thousand square miles of territory and receives numerous tributaries, some of which are rivers of considerable magnitude, such as Still River, Pomperaug, Shopung, etc. These affluents usually commence their course at the outlet of large lakes which serve as natural reservoirs, equalizing the flow of water and insuring an un-failing supply at all seasons of the year. The minimum average flow of water during the lowest stages is estimated at not less than five hundred cubic feet per second, which is equivalent to twenty-five hundred horse-power for twelve hours per day.

"Aside from the abundance of water which the Housatonic affords, the fact that it was the last available large water-power in close proximity to navigable tide-water along the whole New England coast would seem to have been sufficient inducement for its speedy utilization, but it is only within a few years that its incomparable advantages appear to have been fully recognized.

"The project of damming the Housatonic River was first broached in 1838, and in the following year the State Legislature granted a charter, or rather revived an old one which had been issued in 1822 for the purpose of constructing a canal, and which had expired by its own limitation. The provisions of the charter were liberal, with the exception of one restriction: the company were not allowed to build a high dam for fear of injury to the shad-fisheries, which were then considered very valuable. The construction of fish-weirs was not so well understood at that time as at the present day, and people were sceptical as to the practicality of inducing shad to perform the acrobatic feat of sealing a dam, even with the aid of mechanical contrivances.

"To erect a low, tumbling dam at the only available spot would have involved the necessity of a canal to bring the water where it could be made serviceable, and the estimated cost was so great that the project was abandoned, and for more than twenty years was allowed to rest undisturbed.

"The matter was again revived in 1863, and in 1864 application was made to the Legislature to dam the river at any point that might be selected, and the privilege was granted after satisfying the committee of the Legislature that the rights of navigation and other rights would be maintained by the building of locks, etc.

"The next difficulty was to secure the assistance of capitalists, and it was not until the autumn of 1866 that the requisite amount of capital—$100,000—was secured and the company fully organized for active operations. Mr. Henry T. Potter was appointed engineer and superintendent, and the great work was fairly inaugurated by the laying of the first stone on the 17th of July, 1867. With several interruptions from freshets the work progressed, and was nearly completed when the great freshet of Oct. 4, 1869, swept away nearly one-quarter of the dam. In the following spring operations were again resumed, and without further serious hindrance carried to final completion, the last cap-stone of the noble structure being laid on the 5th of October, 1870.

"The difficulties encountered were of no ordinary magnitude, but fortunately the directors of the undertaking were men of indomitable determination, and each added obstacle seemed but a further incentive to vigorous prosecution of the work. Among those most prominently concerned, who contributed largely, not only of money, but valuable time and attention, should be mentioned the names of Mr. Edward N. Shelton, Dr. John L. Howe, David W. Plumb, Edwin Wooster, Robert N. Bassett, A. H. Alling, Royal M. Bassett, William E. Downs, Thomas Elmes, and others.

"On the 10th of October, 1870, the completion of the work was signalized by a celebration in the village of Birmingham, participated in by the Governor of the State, the mayor of New Haven, and many other distinguished guests. A procession exceeding a mile in length was formed, and under military escort proceeded to the vicinity of the dam, where eloquent speeches, the recitation of an appropriate poem, and the inspiring strains of martial music combined to render the commemoration worthy of the occasion, and marked the day as one to be borne in remembrance while the sparkling waters of the Housatonic continue to furnish the motive power for the active industries that contribute to the welfare of the entire nation."

This privilege is located at the head of navigation on the Housatonic River, only seventy miles by rail from the city of New York.

A dam of solid masonry twenty-two feet in height, constructed in the most approved and substantial manner across the Housatonic River at this point, creates the largest and most reliable water-power in the State. The river extends over one hundred miles above the dam, and drains about two thousand square miles of territory; on its tributaries are numerous lakes with a combined area of not less than ten thousand acres, which serve as natural store-houses for water, equalizing the flow and affording a large amount at all seasons of the year. This, together with the immense reservoir above the dam, five miles in length, insures a permanent supply of not less than five hundred cubic feet per second, equal to two thousand five hundred horse-power twelve hours per day. There are at present ten mills in full operation, giving employment to a large number of hands.

The water may be used on both sides of the river, and as each factory-lot has a frontage on the river, water-transportation may be had for heavy freights, such as coal, iron, lumber, etc. But little expense for grading or foundation would be requisite, and everything necessary for building purposes is conveniently procurable. There are good roads on each side of the river. The company own about two hundred and sixty acres of land below the dam, affording numerous eligible sites for manufacturing purposes. Since the completion of the dam there have been erected, and are now in full operation, ten manufacturing establishments, including one paper-mill, one zinc-mill, two bolt-factories, one shovel-factory, one silver-plating works, and one woolen-mill; also one pin-factory, one manufactory of carriage-hardware, and two saw-mills; the whole, however, is using but a small portion of the actual power. About two hundred acres are suitable for building-lots, and a large number of dwelling-houses are already erected. The entire property is worth not less than one million dollars.

As a location for manufacturing purposes this is certainly unsurpassed in New England, whether we consider its natural advantages or the fact that it is but seventy miles distant from New York, with which city there is an established communication by steam and sailing-vessels, railroad and telegraph. There are five trains daily in each direction, both via New Haven and Bridgeport, making twenty arrivals and departures each day.

A great advancement in manufacturing operations will undoubtedly soon be witnessed, and it would be wisdom on the part of those who contemplate new enterprises of the kind, or desire to remove into a more eligible location than they now occupy, to examine into the advantages attending the factory-sites which are now offered by the Ousatonic Water Company. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to find any other situation possessing equally advantageous features within so short a distance of the great metropolis, and prudence would suggest securing the favorable opportunity now extended, for such chances for profitable investment are not likely to remain very long without due appreciation.

Some of the superior advantages of the location are its proximity to New York City, its connection therewith by rail and water, being distant only two and one-half hours by rail, the frequency of the trains allowing ample time for daily transaction of business, and return, from either point. Transportation by water and two competing lines of railroad, either Bridgeport or New Haven, insures low rates and connection with all freight-lines throughout the country.

If we compare the rate of freight from Birmingham to New York and the cost of coal at Birmingham with the rate of freight from the other New England manufacturing centres to New York and the cost of coal at these manufacturing centres, the desirability of the Birmingham location will be apparent.

The average cost of freight between New York City and the principal New England manufacturing centres is about three times as much per hundred as between New York and Birmingham, and the average price of coal at the same places more than twice as high as at Birmingham, which would make a difference in the items of freight and coal, for an average mill of one hundred horse-power, of about four thousand dollars annually. This difference would pay the rent for a good mill-site with one hundred horse-power at Birmingham and leave a margin of about two thousand dollars. If we also consider the cost of a dam, flowage, and canal, with the repairs necessary to keep them in order,—which are usually part of the expenses of the mill-owner, but which in this case are provided and maintained by the company,—the difference in favor of the Birmingham location will be greatly increased.

The location in the midst of a manufacturing community, with a population of ten thousand within a radius of two miles, and the proximity of other manufacturing-towns of the Naugatuck Valley, are of great advantage in respect to skilled labor.

For beauty of scenery, health, and educational facilities the location ranks among the first. The beautiful views up either river, Housatonic or Naugatuck, which form a junction here, are the subject of remark by all who visit the place. Birmingham has churches of all denominations, excellent schools, bank with three hundred thousand dollars capital, savings bank with over one million dollars deposit, telegraph- and express-offices, also gas- and water-works. Its proximity to New Haven, only ten miles distant by rail, adds to its desirability as a place of residence.

The company own a large amount of real estate in the immediate vicinity of their works, providing ample room for mills and for the accommodation of operatives; also lots more remote, admirably adapted for first-class residences.

The present officers of the company are as follows: President, E. N. Shelton; Vice-President, D. W. Plumb; Secretary, D. S. Brinsmade.

The Derby Silver Company, manufacturers of silver-plated ware, was organized in January, 1873, with a capital of sixty thousand dollars, which has since been increased to one hundred and forty thousand dollars. The company is now doing a large and successful business. The present officers are: President, E. De F. Shelton; Secretary, W. J. Miller; Treasurer, William E. Downs; Directors, George W. Cheesman, D. W. Plumb, William E. Downs, E. N. Shelton, E. De F. Shelton, W. J. Miller, P. McEnerney.

Birmingham Corset Company.—The firm of J. W. Birdseye commenced business about fourteen years ago in White Hills, Huntington, for the manufacture of hoop-skirts, and seven years ago, in April, moved to the village of Shelton, continuing in same business.

They also, two years later, commenced the manufacture of corsets in a moderate way.

The business has rapidly increased, and at the present time one hundred dozen corsets per day are manufactured, and over two hundred persons are employed. Capital, about sixty thousand dollars; value of present annual product, about one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

The Shelton Company, Manufacturers of Tacks, Bolts, etc.—This business was established by E. N. Shelton in 1836. In 1854 he was succeeded by the present company, and the manufacture of small bolts was commenced. Upon the completion of the Ousatonic dam, in 1871, the works were removed to Shelton. About three tons of small bolts, etc., are made per day.

The officers of the company are: President, E. De F. Shelton; Secretary and Treasurer, George Blakeman.

Wilkinson Brothers & Co.'s Paper-Mills.—The first mills erected by this firm in Shelton were of wood, commenced in October, 1871, and were in operation in November of the following year. Nov. 4, 1878, the mills were totally destroyed by fire, but their rebuilding was immediately commenced, and in four months and eighteen days the manufacture of paper was begun.

The mills, which are of brick, were enlarged very much, and many radical changes made both in the construction of buildings and also in machinery. The present buildings cover about an acre of ground. Additions have been made, and at the present time the establishment is furnished with two one-thousand-pound and two six-hundred-pound washer-engines, and six six-hundred-pound and one eight-hundred-pound Gould heating-engines. The machine-room is sixty by one hundred and thirty feet, and has one sixty-eight-inch cylinder and one eighty-four-inch Fourdrinier machine, built by Rice, Barton & Fales' Machine- and Iron-Works, of Worcester, Mass. The finishing-room is fifty by one hundred, and has two stacks of super-calenders. The cutting-room is forty by fifty, and the dust is removed by a Sturtevant exhaust blower.

There are three large rotary boilers, with capacity for ten tons of paper per day. About sixty hands are employed.

Feb. 1, 1879, the firm was changed by taking into partnership Charles A. Wheldon and George S. Arnold, making five in the firm at present time.

The buildings are protected from fire by a complete system of automatic sprinklers (Parnellee's patent) and the town water-works, with six double hydrants in the yard and directly in front of the mill. In addition to the town supply of water, they have a large Holyoke Machine Company's double rotary fire-pump, capable of supplying eleven hundred gallons of water per minute. Steam for drying, boiling, and heating is supplied from four steam boilers.

This firm are now (May, 1880) building wood-pulp works, to be run in connection with the present mills.

The store-house, forty by one hundred and fifty, two stories, for manufactured and raw stock, is situated across the canal, about one hundred and twenty-five feet distant from the mills.

The Wilkinson Bros. & Co.'s mills rank among the leading establishments of the kind in the country, and are such as give character and stability to a town. Manilla, colored, envelope, and hardware papers are manufactured, known by the trade as the "Derby Mills."

Radeliff Brothers, manufacturers of hosiery goods, erected their factory in 1874. They employ about one hundred and ten persons, and the value of annual product is one hundred and forty thousand dollars.

The Derby Cotton-Mills, Robt. Adams proprietor, were established in 1880. They employ three hundred and twenty-five hands, have seventeen thousand spindles, and turn out four thousand five hundred pieces of goods per day. Value of annual product, three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The mills manufacture linings, mosquito-netting, buckram, and crinoline.

Among other enterprises may be mentioned the Beard-ley Building Company, Zachariah Spence, machinist, and Church Brothers, manufacturers of brackets and wooden-ware.

Shelton Water Company.—The village of Shelton is supplied with water by the Shelton Water Company. The officers of the company are: President, D. W. Plumb; General Agent, C. H. Nettleton.

Sharon Bassett's Bolt-Factory was established in 1872, and at present employs about sixty persons. Value of annual product, one hundred thousand dollars.

G. C. Maltby & Son, manufacturers of spoons, forks, and Maltby's decorated cocoa-nuts, is a flourishing establishment, and employs about eighty persons. The factory building was erected by the late Edwin Wooster, who was drowned in the Housatonic in April, 1876.

Wilson & Howe, manufacturers of carriage-hardware, employ about forty persons, and the value of annual product is about one hundred thousand dollars.

The Star Pin Company was established in 1867 at Wells Hollow, with Geo. H. Peck, president, and Joseph Tomlinson, secretary and treasurer. Their present brick factory in Shelton was erected in 1875. They employ fifty hands, and the value of the annual product is about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

D. W. Plumb is the present president of the company, and G. H. Peck secretary and treasurer. In addition to pins, hooks, and eyes, hairpins are also manufactured.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE SHELTON FAMILY OF CONNECTICUT.

As far as is known, the Shelton-scattered through the Northern States are descendants of Daniel Shelton, and those in the Southern States, where the name has often been changed to Chilton, are descendants of Richard Shelton, his brother.

The old home of the Shelton family in England was at Shelton, in County Norfolk, but the branch from which the American Sheltons are descended were more recently in Derbyshire. Daniel and Richard Shelton came to this country before 1699, Richard going to Virginia and Daniel to Stratford, Conn., where he settled. He was one of the non-resident proprietors of Waterbury, Conn., and owned lands in Stratford, Stamford, Farmington, Oxford, Woodbury, and Derby. He lived in that part of Stratford called Long Hill. He married April 4, 1692, Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel Welles and granddaughter of Hon. Thomas Welles, one of the early Governors of Connecticut; he died in January, 1728, at about sixty years of age. He had two daughters and seven sons. One son died aged twenty-one, the others married and lived within what were then the limits of the town of Stratford.

The eldest son, Joseph Shelton, born June 21, 1696, married Mary, daughter of Joseph Hollister, of Glastonbury. Joseph Shelton lived at Long Hill; he died there Aug. 10, 1782, aged eighty-six. He had four daughters and two sons.—Joseph, who died aged fourteen, and William Shelton, born July 26, 1739, who married, Oct. 1, 1764, Susannah, daughter of Thomas Strong, of Brookhaven, L. I., a descendant of Elder John Strong, of the Dorchester colony, Elder Brewster, of the "Mayflower," and Roger Ludlow, Deputy-

Governor of Massachusetts. William Shelton lived at Long Hill; he died Jan. 27, 1812, aged seventy-three. He had two daughters and six sons. Philo and Thomas died without issue. William, Jr., graduated at Yale in 1788, was a physician, and lived in Huntington. Two of his sons were physicians.—Dr. William Shelton, of Stratford, and Dr. James Shelton, of Huntington.

Selah, son of William Shelton, had eight daughters and two sons. George lived in Ohio and Missouri, and Alfred in Huntington, where his descendants now live.

George, son of William Shelton, had two sons.—Charles, who was for eight years medical missionary in India, and George Wellington, who lives in Birmingham, Conn.

Joseph, eldest son of William Shelton, born Aug. 27, 1765, married, Nov. 24, 1791, Charity, daughter of Stephen Lewis, of Stratford, Conn. Joseph Shelton lived at Long Hill; he died Sept. 1, 1848, aged eighty-two; he had three daughters and five sons.

The youngest son, Edward Nelson Shelton, was born Sept. 4, 1812; he received his education at the public school in Huntington and the academy in Derby, at Partridge's then celebrated academy in Middletown, the last year of its existence, and from scientific lectures at Yale during one winter. He is a man of prudence and generosity, of keen business foresight and great public spirit, having been always a leader in whatever was for the welfare of the town or the church of which he is a member, a man of honor and strict integrity, a wise counselor, and a true friend.

Mr. Shelton's business career has been one of marked success. He has been identified with manufacturing, mining, banking, and various other enterprises. He commenced manufacturing tacks, nails, etc., in 1836, at Birmingham, and has continued the same successfully to the present time, besides assuming responsibilities as chief executive officer of many other corporations. He has held the office of president of the Birmingham National Bank—formerly the Manufacturers' Bank—since its organization in 1848, and that of president of the Ousatonic Water Company since it was organized in 1866. Nothing that Mr. Shelton has been connected with has so well shown to the public his energy, perseverance, and business ability as this. The project of building a dam across the Ousatonic River had long been considered, and to Mr. Shelton's efforts the fulfillment of it is principally due. The labor in connection with it was very varied and arduous; four distinct efforts were required: first, the securing the land, then the charter from the Legislature, then the necessary capital, and then the supervision of the work in all its details until the result was obtained in the development of one of the finest water-powers in the country, and the establishment of the thriving and growing village which, in his honor, is called Shelton.

G. A. SHELTON, M.D.

Gould Abijah Shelton, the subject of this sketch, is the fourth son of Judson Curtiss and Hannah Lewis Shelton, and was born in Huntington, Aug. 19, 1841. He received his early education at the common schools of his town, but at eighteen years of age, desirous of pursuing a more extended course of study, he entered Staples Academy at Easton, Conn., where he remained three years under the popular instructor H. W. Siglar, thus making thorough preparation for a collegiate course at Yale, in which institution he matriculated in 1862. During his junior year, he left his class to engage in the work of teaching. Late in 1864 he accepted the position of instructor in the languages and mathematics in Mountain View Seminary, at Fishkill-on-the-Hudson; the year following he was elected principal of the public school at Port Washington, Long Island, N. Y. Filling his engagements here with credit to himself and satisfaction to his patrons, he decided to follow the bent of a long-felt inclination, and at once entered the medical school at Yale College, from which institution, after three years of arduous application,—in the class of 1869,—he received the degree of M.D., immediately afterwards locating in the new village of Shelton, in his native town, and offering his professional services to the public.

It is not a little remarkable that Huntington should have enjoyed a succession of as capable men, of the same profession and family name, extending over so long a period. William Shelton, Jr., M.D., received his degree from Yale in 1788; he was a native of Huntington, and until his death, Aug. 29, 1819, enjoyed a highly successful practice. He was succeeded by his son, Dr. James Hovey Shelton, who, throughout life, was held in the highest esteem, both as a man and as a physician. His labors closed with his death, which occurred on May 10, 1868. The professional mantle fell upon the nephew of this latter representative, and to-day Dr. G. A. Shelton not only enjoys the advantages of the prestige of a century, but for his own worth and ability, through his own energy and success, he has attained an enviable place in his profession and the society in which he moves. For nine years he has been an active member of the board of school visitors, always taking a lively interest in everything that elevates the educational standing of the schools of his town. For three years he has been register of vital statistics, and is a member of the Fairfield County, Connecticut State, and American Medical Associations.

Dr. Shelton was united in marriage, June 16, 1874, to Emily Plumb Capel, niece of Hon. D. W. Plumb, of Shelton. Miss Capel was born in Bridgeport, Conn., Aug. 12, 1847.

GENEALOGY.

G. A. Shelton is the son of Judson C., who was the son of Samuel Frederick, who was the son of Daniel, who was the son of Samuel, who was the son of Daniel, the first settler of the name in Connecticut.

DAVID SHELTON.

Daniel Shelton, the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, with his brother Richard, emigrated to this country from Yorkshire, England, in the year 1690. Daniel settled in the town of Stratford, Fairfield Co., Conn., Richard going to Virginia. Daniel married Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel Wells, of Wethersfield, Conn., who bore him nine children,—Elizabeth, Sarah, Joseph, Daniel, Thaddeus, Samuel, James, John, and Josiah.

Samuel, the fourth son, married Abigail, daughter of Philo and Mahitaba Nichol, by whom he had fourteen children,—Mary, Daniel, Samuel, Elizabeth, David, Abigail, Joseph, Andrew, Sarah, Ann, Josiah, Philo, Isaac Wells, and Agur.

Agur, the fourteenth child, was born Aug. 11, 1758, marrying Abigail Newton, daughter of Rev. Christopher Newton, who bore him six children,—Polly Amelia, Charles, Avis, Abigail, Christopher Newton, and David.

David Shelton was born Sept. 17, 1799, and was united in marriage to Jane Perry, June 4, 1830, dying June 2, 1872.

Jane Perry was born March 18, 1811, and was the daughter of A. Hawley Perry, who came to Huntington at the age of twenty-one years and lived there until his death, Nov. 21, 1826. Mr. Perry was the son of Yelverton Perry and Patience Tomlinson, of Oxford. He married Polly Leavenworth, March 6, 1809. Polly Leavenworth was the daughter of Edmund Leavenworth, the youngest son of Capt. Edmund Leavenworth, who was the son of Dr. Thomas Leavenworth, the first settler of that name in Fairfield County.

David and Jane Shelton had but one child, Mary Jane, born Feb. 8, 1833, and who was united in marriage to Edwin Wooster, May 23, 1860. Being the only child, great pains were taken in her education and training, which were amply repaid in the development of a character of rare sweetness and vivacity. In disposition combining amiability and liveliness, she was the idol of her parents and the acknowledged favorite of a large circle of friends. Her early death, which occurred June 4, 1864, no doubt did much to shorten her father's life and was the first real sorrow of her mother's life, preparing her, as it were, for another heavier sorrow in the death of her husband.

Mr. Wooster continued to reside with Mr. and Mrs. Shelton, to whom he was greatly attached, after the death of his wife, until his own unfortunate death, April 29, 1876. On the night of April 29, 1876, he was piloting the "Dunderburg" down the river above the dam. The night was dark, and, deceived by the light or shadows, in some way he missed the canal lock and the boat went over the dam. His two companions were saved, but Mr. Wooster was drowned. He was a man of more than ordinary business ability, and by his energy and sagacity did much towards the successful completion of the dam.

DAVID SHELTON.

W. C. Downey

Mr. Shelton was from a line of farmers, and as a business man was careful rather than pushing. Inheriting comfortable property from his father and acquiring a moderate property by his wife, he was independent of trade and traffic, and preferred to quietly preserve and enjoy that which he had rather than to strive to accumulate. His accounts were always straight and accurate, and he never went into debt. In politics he was a Democrat, as was his father before him. Quiet and unostentatious in his mode of life, domestic in his tastes, his amiable and modest bearing endeared him to a large circle of friends, whom it was his delight to entertain.

Affectionate in disposition, his marital relations were most fortunate. In his wife he found a true woman, a genuine friend,—a warm second in the exercise of that genuine though modest hospitality that made his house a favored resort. Few couples perhaps enjoyed so smooth and pleasant a life as they. Mrs. Shelton still lives at the old Shelton homestead, preserving her intellect and activity to a remarkable degree.

Charles Shelton, brother of David, a graduate of Yale College, is now a practicing physician in the town of Cheshire, Conn., which town he has represented in the Senate and lower House of the General Assembly. Christopher N. and David were graduates of the Episcopal Academy at Cheshire. Christopher was town representative for a number of years, and prominent in educational works.

JAMES B. BRINSMADE.

James B. Brinsmade graduated at Yale in 1813; went to Easton, Pa., as principal of an academy. About 1820 came to New York and went into mercantile business. He died in 1857. The last twenty-five years of his life were devoted almost exclusively to the cause of education for the poor in the city, acting in the capacity of a trustee of the Public School Society, and of vice-president of the American Sunday-School Union. He had four children, all of whom died early in life without issue except his son, J. B.

He was born in New York City in 1824 (May 1st), graduated at Yale in 1845, was admitted to the bar in 1847, practiced law in Albany till 1853, then moved to New York and at once entered into a large practice. His health failed in 1868, as the result of overwork and close application to business. He had already acquired some interests in the iron business which required attention, and, abandoning his profession, he became an iron-master, which he continues to the present time with success. He has six children,—three boys and three girls,—Henry, 23, Mary, 21; William B., 16; Eleanor, 13; Alice, 11; Charles L., 9. His home in winter is in Brooklyn, and in summer at Lake Mahopae.

His grandmother was Mary Beebee. Her father was

Rev. James Beebee, the first minister settled in Stratford (now Trumbull). He preached in a "meeting-house" which stood where the Trumbull church now stands. He was a chaplain to the army which invaded Canada in the old French war, and he had a son James, who was a captain in the Revolution, and was wounded at Monmouth. Ex-Judge Lucien Birdseye, late of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, is grandson of the latter.

Rev. James Beebee had another son, Rev. Henry Beebee (both graduated at Yale). Gen. Henry B. Carrington, U.S.A., is his grandson. Gen. Carrington was the commander of the expedition which culminated in the Fort Fetterman massacre. He was retired for wounds received in service, and was detailed to take the chair of military science in Wabash College. He is the author of "Absaraka," "Crisis Thoughts," "Battles of the American Revolution," and other works. He also graduated at Yale in 1845.

Mr. J. B. Brinsmade has in his possession the commission as captain of militia issued by Governor Trumbull to his grandfather, Abraham Brinsmade, and tradition says that he fought at Ridgefield under Gen. Benedict Arnold.

NELSON H. DOWNS.

The subject of this sketch is one of the most prominent self-made men now residing in the town of Huntington. His ancestors for generations had been tillers of the soil and residents of Fairfield County. His father, Lewis Downs, is to this day remembered as one of the thriving representative farmers of the ante-bellum period.

Until eighteen years of age Nelson H. remained upon his father's farm, doing customary labor during the spring and summer and attending the common schools during the winter season; his education, therefore, was limited to an acquaintance with the ordinary English branches, yet, by his large and varied experience in subsequent years, and through general reading, he now has a mind well stored with much useful information, and holds that place in society that belongs only to a gentleman of esteem and intelligence.

When eighteen years of age, with the acquiescence of his parents, he left the farm and engaged in business with his brother, who was then a merchant in the new village of Birmingham. In consideration of health and general preferences, at the expiration of seven years Mr. Downs disposed of his mercantile interests and embarked in manufacture upon his own account, and he has since been more or less engaged in this kind of industry. He first made carriage-joints, next matches, then tacks. He was among the first to manufacture hoop-skirts, and the very first to make corsets, in the village of Birmingham. His extraordinary foresight revealed the advantages, and with characteristic promptness he anticipated all others in the erection of the first factory on the west bank of Ousatonie; he was also attracted by the beautiful eminence beyond, and quickly made purchases to the right and to the left, and early erected upon a point commanding a charming view one of the most sightly and desirable residences to be found in the surrounding country. Altogether, Mr. Downs has erected four factories, and quite a number of dwellings and other buildings. For eighteen years he gave his personal attention to his manufacturing business, and throughout the whole time it was his invariable rule to pay all of his employees, every fortnight, with his own hands; he failed but once, and then on account of sickness. Using money only as he made it, he conducted his affairs on the pay-as-you-go system, and in all of his varied enterprises gave but two notes, and at no time executed a mortgage on property. His factory was the first industry of Shelton, his residence the sixth building; and this thriving village owes much of its rapid progress, both as to its manufactories and private residences, to the energy and exertions of Mr. Downs.

The family mansion is worthy of special note. Beautifully located upon the commanding eminence that here runs parallel with the river, the view is superb, taking in Birmingham, Derby, Ansonia, and miles of the Ousatonie River. In construction it is characteristic of the man: from basement to garret it is filled with original conceptions and home-like conveniences.

Mr. Downs, we are told, never had political aspirations, and, though frequently urged by his party to accept nominations, always declined to do so, and never attended a political caucus. Before the war a Whig of the Bell and Everett stamp, he has since voted with the Republicans. He has held various offices of public trust, the duties of which were faithfully and satisfactorily performed.

Warm-hearted and generous in his friendships, liberal and open-handed in his charities, his ready and vigorous aid is always counted upon in matters of public weal. No work of public utility failed to receive his assistance, and no poor man was ever turned away from his door. Although Mr. Downs is not a member of any church, he has always been liberal in his contributions both to the erection and support of religious institutions.

Mr. Downs has retired from active business, owing to bad health, and is now enjoying that leisure which his successful business career has secured him.

On May 8, 1843, he was united in wedlock to Elizabeth B., oldest daughter of Abijah Wallace, by whom he has had four children, named in the family genealogy given below. Mrs. Downs is an excellent lady, justly esteemed by a large circle of acquaintances.

GENEALOGY

Joseph Downs, born Jan. 11, 1768, died March 17, 1823; Hannah Patterson, wife of Joseph Downs, born July 28, 1767, died June 9, 1857. To this couple were born the following children: James, born July 13, 1786, died Aug. 27, 1868; Philo, born Aug. 1, 1788, died June 15, 1862; Lewis, born Dec. 19, 1790, died March 19, 1876; Ezekiel, born March 2, 1793, died March 28, 1866; Hepsy, born Sept. 2, 1795, died Aug. 11, 1874; Beach, born Dec. 18, 1797, died July 28, 1865; Hannah, born Jan. 8, 1809, died Feb. 13, 1853; Webb, born July 25, 1802, died March 9, 1874; Eliza, born July 2, 1804, died Oct. 24, 1846.

Lewis Downs was united in marriage to Mary Gilbert, and to them were born the following children: Sidney A., born Aug. 13, 1817; Henry L., born Feb. 7, 1820, died Feb. 10, 1872; Nelson H., born Nov. 18, 1821.

Eli Gilbert, father of Mrs. Lewis Downs, died Oct. 18, 1847, at the age of eighty-four; his wife died Sept. 2, 1840, at the advanced age of eighty-two; and their daughter, the wife of Lewis Downs, lived to the ripe old age of eighty.

To N. H. Downs and wife were born the following: Sarah E., born July 30, 1845, who lived but one month; Hattie W., born Feb. 28, 1849; Edward W., born Oct. 20, 1852; Lizzie, born Jan. 15, 1863.

Hattie W. was married to H. F. Wanning, June 14, 1869. There were three children,—to wit, Gracie E., Frankie N., and Hattie D.

Edward W. was married to Maggie Barker, May 1, 1874; at the expiration of two years this union was dissolved by the death of his beloved wife, leaving a son named Frank Westley. On April 30, 1879, Edward W. Downs was married to Alice Benedict.

Abijah Wallace was born Nov. 3, 1794, and died Dec. 26, 1877. Pauline Wakeman, his wife, was born Aug. 15, 1797, and died Sept. 15, 1847. Their daughter, Elizabeth B., wife of N. H. Downs, was born Nov. 6, 1821.

D. W. PLUMB.

Among those thoroughly identified with the business and social interests and general prosperity of Huntington, particularly the part embraced by Shelton, none are more worthy than he whose name appears at the head of this sketch.

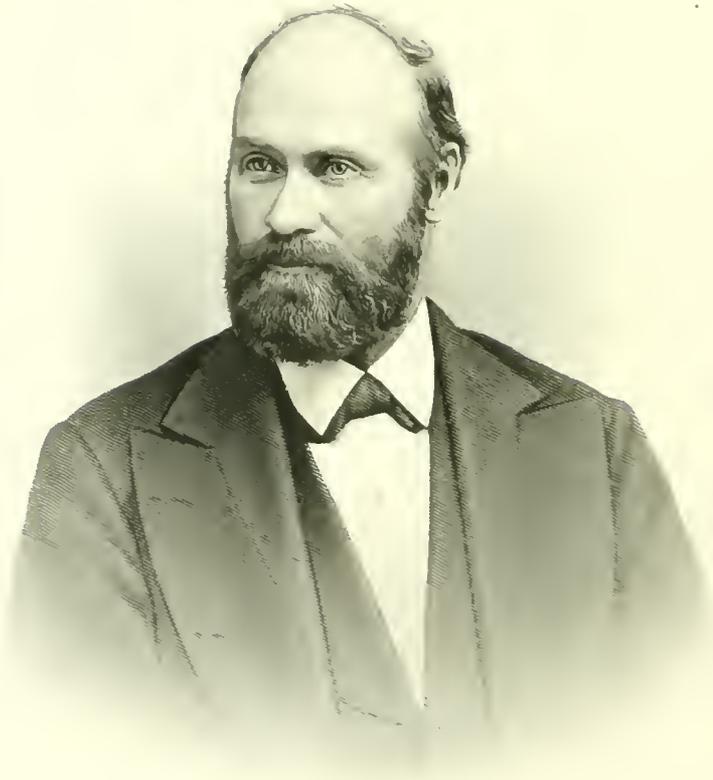

D. W. Plumb was born Oct. 13, 1808; he is of English descent, though his ancestors were early settlers in the town of Milford, New Haven Co., Conn. His father Noah, his grandfather David, and his great-grandfather Noah, were all farmers of highly respectable standing, and residents of this section of New England.

When David was five years of age his father removed with his family to what is now known as North Bridgeport, where he resided until his death, in 1862, at fourscore years of age. He was a citizen of estimable worth, and always wielded a good influence in the community where he resided. He represented Bridgeport many times in the Legislature, and in the year 1841 both father and son David were representatives of their respective districts in the State Senate.

David's mother, whose maiden name was Urania Welles, was of Stratford. She was a descendant of Hon. Thomas Welles, who was Governor of the State in 1655 and 1658. She died in her eighty-second year.

David was the eldest of eight children, whom we name in the order of their birth,—viz.: David W., Louisa T. (deceased), Mary N. (deceased), Hepsy B. (deceased), Sally E., Elias N. (deceased), Emily M., and Horace S.

David enjoyed the advantages of the common and select schools of his day, and at twenty-four years we find him selling goods on his own account in a small country store in North Bridgeport. He closed business here in 1836 to engage in the manufacture of woolen goods at the new village of Birmingham, where he continued till 1848, when, to enlarge the business, he removed to Ansonia, and there remained in the same line of industry till 1865, when he disposed of his interests to the Slade Manufacturing Company. Three years later he erected in Shelton his present residence, upon a site that commands a view of the grandest business enterprise with which he was ever identified. To the brain, nerve, and money of E. N. Shelton, D. W. Plumb, and others, thousands who once knew nothing of the beautiful Ousatic are indebted for the opportunity they today enjoy for obtaining an easy support—yes, in many instances, considerable fortune.

From the beginning of the enterprise, Mr. Plumb has been prominent in the affairs of the Ousatic Water Company.

In addition to his varied business cares and trusts, Mr. Plumb has been active in his investigation and elucidation of questions affecting the nation's history, the State's prosperity, and his county and town's general interests. He represented the town of Derby in the State Legislature in the years '38, '52, '60, '62, and '64, the only person who has been so frequently chosen to represent the town since the adoption of the constitution. He was a senator from the Fifth District in 1841.

In 1860 he procured the passage of the act authorizing the removal of the Bank of North America from Seymour to Ansonia, and in 1862 obtained the charter of the Savings Bank of Ansonia. The Bank of North America on its removal to Ansonia had its title changed to that of "The Ansonia Bank," of which he was president for quite a time, and until his resignation. He is now vice-president of Birmingham National Bank. In 1864 he obtained the charter for the borough of Ansonia and the incorporation of the Ousatic Water Company. The latter was strongly opposed by parties who were interested in shad-fisheries.

It will thus be seen that the life of Mr. Plumb has been one of active business enterprises, beginning in early boyhood and attaining practical results rarely realized as the fruits of one's own unaided exertions. In addition to business concerns and official duties, he has been thoroughly identified with the growing interests of the villages of Ansonia, Birmingham, and Shelton. He has grown up with them, they have grown up with him. By honesty and constancy of purpose, sound judgment, and strict integrity in all dealings, he was enabled to early gain the confidence of the community and to successfully terminate matters that he undertook. He never stooped to any meanness in all his varied transactions; there has been no double-dealing. He hates shams of all kinds; pretensions and superficial seemings he abhors. He constitutes a notable specimen of the American growth which starts from small beginnings, encounters adversity, yet conquers, and develops into wealth, wide personal influence, and financial control.

In politics a staunch Republican; in religion not an avowed professor, yet churches and ministers of all denominations could testify to his liberality.

Mr. Plumb has been married twice, but has no children,—first to Miss Clarissa Allen, of Derby, who died in 1865 without issue; and in 1875 he married Miss Louise Wakelee, of Huntington.

WILLIAM WILKINSON,

of Wilkinson Bros. & Co., was born in Nottingham, England, in 1834. When six years of age his father moved to Canada East and bought a farm. William remained with his father for ten years, in the mean time receiving from the district schools a good English education.

At sixteen years of age William went into the pine-woods of the Adirondack Mountains and engaged in the lumbering business for one year. Next we find him a pupil at Dunham Flat Academy, where he remained eighteen months. Upon quitting school, with the capital accumulated in the mountains, he began the sale of merchandise, traveling through the country with a horse and wagon while disposing of his wares. Quitting his business at twenty-one years of age, he emigrated to the territory of Minnesota, where he followed the trade of a mason for four years. At twenty-two he married Miss Elizabeth E. Fay, by whom he had one daughter, Emma, now deceased. As an evidence of Mr. Wilkinson's popularity at his new home, it is worthy of remark that within four years after locating he was elected to the responsible office of high sheriff of the county, which position he filled for three consecutive terms.

At twenty-six he went to Pike's Peak,—the year of the discovery of gold in that locality. Along with thousands of others from the States, he found in his search for gold a bitter experience and disappointment. He was fortunate in losing only one-half of his capital, which at that time amounted to fifteen hundred dollars.

Returning to Minnesota he resumed his business as a mason, which he continued until the death of his wife, an event that occurred when he was thirty years of age. Pretty soon we find him in New York City with a cash capital of three dollars. At the suggestion of an older brother, he invested two dollars and seventy-five cents in one ream of tissue paper, which he disposed of at three dollars and twenty-five cents. His next sale was one bundle of twenty-four by thirty-six paper, which was sold to Barnum Bros., clothiers, of Chatham Square. He assisted his brother at chores, who was employed at Wm. H. Parson's store, and made that place his headquarters, doing business in the manner above named for about twelve months. At the expiration of this time he and his brother Joseph began business on their own account at No. 42 Duane Street, their joint capital being two thousand two hundred and eighty-five dollars. They prospered for eighteen months, when William purchased his brother's interest for eight thousand dollars. He admitted as a partner his brother Thomas P., who added four hundred dollars to the capital. Two years later William H. Leach was admitted into the firm. In 1870, owing to the increase of business, larger and better quarters were taken at No. 72 Duane Street. Prosperity again followed, and in 1871 they decided to build a mill of their own, to be operated in connection with the store, and it was agreed that William Wilkinson should locate, build, and run the mill. His attention was early called to the advantages of the power of the Onsatonic Water Company, and, after examining the location, he decided on erecting the mill at Shelton, in the town of Huntington. A fine establishment was built and run successfully until the fourth day of November, 1878, when, at 4.30 P.M., it was totally destroyed by fire. The insurance was adjusted on the 28th of November, and in the afternoon of the same day work was begun on the new mill, and, through the force and energy of Mr. Wilkinson, it was completed and the manufacture of paper begun in just four months and eighteen days from the date that rebuilding was commenced. The total length of the mill is four hundred and thirty-five feet, and it covers about two acres of ground. Owing to the increase of business, on the 1st of February, 1879, two new partners were admitted,—Charles A. Whedon, of New York, and George S. Arnold, of Birmingham, Conn.,—and another store, No. 74 Duane Street, New York City, was occupied. The company deals in all kinds of paper and twines in New York, and manufacture A No. 1 Manillas, all the different colored papers, English hardware and Bristol boards. The "Derby Mills" are among the largest in the manufacture of paper in the United States. They employ about seventy hands and have a daily capacity of twenty thousand pounds of paper. In addition to their own mill, Wilkinson Bros. & Co. control five others, selling them their stock and taking their product. The company are at the time of this writing engaged in erecting a large wood-pulp mill over two hundred feet long, to be run in connection with the present establishment. The firm's annual business is in excess of one million five hundred thousand dollars,—an outgrowth of a cash capital of three dollars,—all of which has been accomplished in sixteen years.

Mr. Wilkinson is a man of extraordinary energy, keen judgment, and great foresight. He knows no such word as failure; undertakings which would stagger the majority of men are inaugurated by him and pushed through to successful consummation. Sharp and curt at times when busy, at others he is one of the most courteous and agreeable of gentlemen. In charity, he is one of the readiest and most liberal; he lends substantial encouragement to all enterprises that are for the public good.

He has built two elegant residences in Shelton, one of which is occupied by himself and family, the other by the relief of a former employee, who lost his life while doing hazardous work for the company. Mr. Wilkinson is a living example from which all may learn to conquer fortune and meet with general success.

It will be seen that it was by no mere luck or chance that he is to-day at the head of such a stupendous enterprise as the Derby Mills; it is owing to early formed habits of economy, persevering diligence, and unflinching application to whatsoever he had undertaken. Never idle himself, he has no sympathy whatever with the drones of society. We meet with no more apt disciple of the school that teaches "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

Mr. Wilkinson devotes himself to his business rather than to political affairs, and, although frequently urged to do so, he has never allowed his name to be used for office by either party.

For his second wife Mr. Wilkinson married Hannah Maria Briggs, by whom he has three children,—John A., Frederick Charles, and Albert Theodore.

HON. ROYAL M. BASSETT.

This gentleman was born in the town of Derby, Nov. 22, 1828. His education was obtained at the common district schools, except one year that was spent at the Academy of Stiles and French, at New Haven, and two annual terms at the Haddam Academy.

His father, Sheldon Bassett, was one of the leading men of Derby, and a pioneer in the business enterprises of Birmingham, which have brought to the towns of Derby and Huntington their present prosperity.

He was long engaged as a merchant, then as a manufacturer. He held many official positions with credit, but after the purchase of the Colburns' iron-foundry, in 1850, he devoted all his time to this business enterprise until his death, which occurred June 26, 1864, in the sixtieth year of his age.

On the decease of his father, Royal M., with his brother Theodore, managed the iron-foundry with great success, giving steady employment to about one hundred and twenty-five hands for sixteen years, making it a valuable and most desirable establishment to Birmingham.

Under its present management it is among the first solid manufacturing concerns in the Naugatuck Valley.

Royal M. Bassett has been engaged in various manufacturing enterprises, railroads, and real estate operations during more than a quarter of a century. Is now director in three railroad companies, and president of a Northern railroad. His adaptation to this kind of business is remarkable, and he has managed with such skill and judgment as to gain the confidence and good will of all with whom he has been associated.

President of the iron-foundry sixteen years, warden of the borough of Birmingham for two years, an active, efficient, and influential committeeman of the Birmingham public schools for twelve years, besides filling with honor many other local positions. These united have placed him among the reliable and public-spirited men of his native town.

The Ousatonic water enterprise, which is the outgrowth of Shelton, and makes an enterprising and flourishing spot in Fairfield County, was encouraged and fostered by Mr. Bassett. He was one of its active company workers, also one of the original incorporators of the company, and is now one of its directors. He was also one of the incorporators of the Derby Gas Company, located in Shelton, and being now a stockholder and principal director, identifying him largely with the interests of this infant village, for these reasons he very properly deserves the place accorded him in this history.

In all his business transactions he has proved himself a thoroughly upright man, and has been remarkably successful in his large and diversified pursuits. Mr. Bassett's mother was Harriet Hull, a niece of Gen. William Hull, of Detroit notoriety. In 1858, Royal M. was married to Mrs. Frances J. Stratton, of Bridgeport, by whom he has had three children, two sons and one daughter.

Mr. Bassett has never mingled much in politics, though he has always been a warm Democrat, and has represented the Fifth Senatorial District in the Legislature with credit to himself and honor to his party.

Social, affable, of great gentlemanly bearing, liberal, and ever willing and ready to forward any needed work for the public good, he stands among the popular and influential citizens of his native place and the adjoining town of Huntington.

EDMUND LEAVENWORTH

Edmund Leavenworth was born in Huntington, Conn., Dec. 14, 1766, and was closely identified with the affairs of the town for nearly three-quarters of a century. His early life was spent in active work on his father's farm and in shipbuilding. Having a constitution naturally robust, this early training developed a fine physique and great muscular strength, and he became very fond of athletic sports, jumping, wrestling, hunting, and horse-racing. He was fond of deer-hunting on horseback, and made frequent visits to Long Island to enjoy this sport. He was the owner of many fine horses at different times, and races on the road lying along the river-bank near his residence were of frequent occurrence. At these races many of the best horses of the surrounding country were competitors. With Mr. Leavenworth, however, these sports were but the spicing of a very active and busy life. His place was noted for the amount of business done there. At all hours of the day men and teams could have been seen busily engaged, some scoring and hewing and others hauling timber for the building of bridges, wharves, and ships. In these pursuits a large number of horses and oxen were employed, and, true to his taste, Mr. Leavenworth took particular pride in the best animals that could be obtained. His judgment of such stock was remarkably good. Indeed, his judgment of workmanship in scoring and fitting was such that journeymen, as recommendation to themselves, would refer to the fact that they had hewed timbers for Edmund Leavenworth. He built several sloops at his shipyard, the last two of which were fitted out for the West India trade, but, being captured by French privateers in the war of 1812, involved him in financial ruin. His claims for indemnity were covered by the "French Spoliation Bill," but these claims were never paid by the United States government.

Genial, warm-hearted, benevolent, strongly attached to his friends, he possessed great personal popularity. His influence in town affairs was such that he could command a majority for any measure he wished to carry. He was elected selectman for thirteen successive years, and the poor of the town were never better cared for than during this time. In his political preferences he was Democratic, having never voted any other ticket in his life. He cast a vote at every Presidential election from Washington's to Buchanan's, and in later life referred to this fact with great pride. At one time he left New London in a sloop on the morning of election-day and arrived at the voting-place (Stratford) fifteen minutes before the polls were closed.

Mr. Leavenworth was truly an original character, having attended school but three days. Familiarly called "Uncle Ed" by those who knew him late in life, he is still quoted as the author of pithy and quaint remarks, expressions, and anecdotes. His manners and language were unpolished, but the roughness was outward rather than within, for there was a kindness and sympathy within him which but few possess.

In his maturer years he inclined more to the ways of religion, and his choice being the Episcopal Church, he united with them, and was a member of that communion when he died. Fairfield County doubtless contained many more highly cultured than Edmund Leavenworth, but it had very few who were more whole-souled and generous and ready to help the suffering in time of need.

Although but twelve years of age in 1777, when his father, Capt. Edmund, was ordered to Fairfield with his company, he volunteered to go, and served as a waiter to his father in that campaign, joining the company as a private April 2, 1777. When his father with his company was again ordered out, in 1779, Edmund again enlisted as a private, and served during the campaign.

He died in Derby, Jan. 20, 1857, aged ninety-one, and with his two wives, only son, and eldest daughter lies buried at White Hills. He was married to Mary Judson, Jan. 5, 1786, and to Amy Tomlinson, Oct. 26, 1823. His children were: Hepsy, born Nov. 17, 1786, died Jan. 18, 1865; Polly, born Aug. 27, 1789, died May 31, 1871; Delilah, born Jan. 1, 1791, died February, 1876; Maria, born March 13, 1794, still living, 1880; Laura, born Sept. 29, 1796, died Jan. 27, 1865; Edmund, born Dec. 8, 1801, drowned in Ousatonic River, June 13, 1823.

GENEALOGY.

Edmund Leavenworth was the son of Capt. Edmund Leavenworth, the son of Dr. Thomas Leavenworth, son of Dr. Thomas Leavenworth. The last-named is the progenitor of all the Leavenworth families in the United States.

HENRY GLOVER.

Henry Glover, youngest son of Simeon Glover, of Newtown, Conn., was born Nov. 19, 1816.

In early life he served an apprenticeship to the blacksmith trade, after which he studied for the ministry. On account of the weakness of his voice, which broke down under the effort to preach, Mr. Glover abandoned the idea of preaching and turned his attention to the school-room, following that profession for a number of years, teaching in Bridgeport and Westport. His health failing him in the school-room, he entered the stove business in Bridgeport about the year 1850. This he followed for seven years, removing to Brookfield to engage in farming in 1856. There he lived for four years, when, having an opportunity to sell to advantage, he did so and returned to Bridgeport, where he entered a foundry. Preferring farm life, however, for which he had a decided taste, he only remained in the foundry a year, when he purchased a farm in the town of Huntington, where he lived for six years. Again meeting with a good offer, he sold this farm and bought one near the village of Huntington Centre, where he died Oct. 1, 1879, falling dead from his chair from heart disease. His mother also died suddenly from the same cause.

In Huntington Mr. Glover engaged in the dairying and gardening business, making a success of it and gradually improving and beautifying his quiet country home.

In religious belief Mr. Glover was a Universalist, having joined that denomination when quite a young man. Forbidden to preach on account of the weakness of his voice, he always took an active interest in church matters, and was an official of his church organization at Bridgeport for many years. He was a man of sterling integrity, living strictly up to his Christian principles. In manners genial, by nature kind-hearted, he gained both the respect and the esteem of his neighbors and acquaintances, and was called upon several times to fill offices of public trust.

In politics, Mr. Glover was a Republican from the first organization of that party, and was alive to all the questions of the day.

Mr. Glover was married March 20, 1838, to Henrietta Smith, daughter of Henry A. Smith, a son of Fitch Smith, of Derby, Conn. The union was blessed by two children,—Henry Fordyce, born Dec. 2, 1842, and Theophilus Nichols, born Aug. 9, 1847.

Henry Fordyce Glover succeeds his father in the management of the farm and dairy, and is a man strong in nerve and body.

Theophilus Nichols Glover is a minister of the Universalist faith, and fills the pulpit of that church at Dowagiac, Michigan.

Simeon, father of Henry Glover, was married three times. His third wife, Mary Gregory, bore him four children,—Ives, Melora, Nancy, and Henry. Simeon was the son of Henry. Henry had three sons,—Simeon, Elias, and Solomon. Henry was the son of Henry, who was the son of John Glover, who came to Newtown from Stratford.

REV. THOMAS PUNDERSON.

The name and the pleasant face of one long since glorified will awaken many tender and endearing recollections in the minds of surviving friends in his former parishes, in the ministry, and in the church at large. "His record is on high." To those who knew him best, in the favored intimacy of home, no earthly record nor speaking likeness is needed to keep him ever clearly in sight. To those less favored in the intimacy of acquaintance, no better memorial can be offered than the following biographical sketch, prepared for the New York Observer by the late Rev. Dr. Hewitt, of Bridgeport, a neighboring pastor and a beloved friend.

* By the Rev. Rollin S. Stone.

Henry Glover

"The late Rev. Thomas Punderson was born in New Haven, Conn., Dec. 28, 1783; a descendant of John Punderson, one of the original seven pillars of the First Church, then under the ministry of John Davenport; was graduated at Yale College, September, 1804; was licensed to preach the gospel in 1806; spent a part of the summer of 1807 on a mission to the northwest portion of the State of New York; was ordained to the work of the ministry in the Second Congregational Church and Society in Pittsfield, Mass., Oct. 26, 1809; was married to Miss Betsey Day, of Catskill, N. Y., May 4, 1813; was dismissed, in consequence of the reunion of the Second with the First Church, Feb. 26, 1817; was installed pastor of the church and society in Huntington, Conn., Nov. 18, 1818; was dismissed Jan. 1, 1844, and died Aug. 1, 1848.

"Being a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, he attended the annual meeting in September last at Buffalo, and while on his way home he was taken ill of a bowel complaint, from the effects of which he did not recover. On Thursday morning last, July 27th, a stricture of the large intestines took place, followed by acute pain, and terminating fatally on the morning of Tuesday, Aug. 1, in the sixty-fifth year of his age and the thirty-ninth of his ministry, leaving a widow and four children (a son and three daughters, one of whom is married) to mourn their irreparable loss.

"He was aware of the severe and dangerous nature of his last illness, and when it was evident that his recovery was hopeless, he manifested the same calm and even temper which he exhibited through life. With the tenderness of a husband and a father, and with the faith, hope, and sublime tranquillity of a saint, he blessed his wife and children, one by one, in the name of the Lord; and when his failing voice had sunk to a scarcely audible whisper, he exclaimed, 'Grace, 'tis a charming sound!—Glory to God in the highest!' and expired.

"The character of Mr. Punderson is more easily apprehended than it can be described. He was a transparent man,—an Israelite indeed.' His piety, his integrity, his benignity, his humility, his disinterestedness, his cheerfulness, his consistency,—indeed, all his qualities, as a man, a Christian, and a minister of the gospel,—were evident as the light. He walked with God. In his own house he was a pattern for our imitation in all that is amiable in domestic life, and his dwelling was the home of purity, comfort, and thankfulness. In the house of God he was a good minister. He was sound in the faith once delivered to the saints, and he preached the distinguishing doctrines of grace with an unction which the love of the truth only can impart. He was not ambitious, neither was he covetous or envious. Patiently, meekly, earnestly, constantly, he sought the present peace and future salvation of all the souls committed to his care. He loved his work, and he loved his people.

No one hath aught to lay to his charge; nor is there any one known who insinuated even that he was not an example to believers in every good word and work. Few ministers of the gospel, if, indeed, any there are, who may with more confidence than he exclaim, 'I am pure of the blood of all men.'

"His funeral was attended on Thursday, the 3d inst., by a large concourse of the inhabitants of the town, of all denominations, and from the towns adjoining, and by his neighboring brethren. The deep solemnity of the people through all the services, from the dwelling-house to the church and from the church to the grave, gave impressive witness to the universal conviction that he was a man of God, and that he had gone to receive from the lips of the Lord, whom he had served in his life and glorified in his death, the plaudit, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant! enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'

To the foregoing obituary sketch by Dr. Hewitt, a member of Mr. Punderson's family adds the reminiscence that in his missionary tour in the State of New York in the summer of 1807, spoken of above, "he was accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Bennet Tyler," afterwards president of East Windsor Seminary, Conn., and that "he preached in Rochester when that place contained but one frame house, and the only building capable of accommodating a congregation was a barn, which was used on that occasion in lieu of a church."

The present writer recalls a temperance meeting which he had been invited to address in Mr. Punderson's parish full fifty years ago, when a mere sophomore himself, and how, at the close of his youthful and perhaps useless effort, the beloved pastor came to his support with a rousing and most effective home-made and impromptu speech. He drew a striking comparison between the ravages of strong drink and those of beasts of prey let loose in a community and destroying many a precious life, while yet the people did not seem to be at all alarmed and did not bestir themselves to check the dreadful slaughter.

Near the close of his quarter-century pastorate in Huntington, when so many churches were wearying of their old pastors and longing after smart young men, he one day preached a mildly satirical sermon from the complaint of the Israelites in the wilderness, "Our soul loatheth this light bread" (Num. xxi. 5). If they did not see the quails falling round the camp that day, they were served with a dish of "strong meat" well flavored and prepared.

His long, quiet, uneventful life was yet full of telling points,—full of gentle humor and silent force,—not tame, dull, monotonous, at all; "not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." Years after his decease, and at the grave of his noble wife, a venerable deacon said, in answer to the inquiry how the church had prospered since he left it, "We made a great mistake when we let Mr. Punderson go."

He belonged to a generation not at all inferior to the present, but very unlike,—a generation of ministers not adapted to the wants of our more bustling and aggressive age, but in their day and generation faithful and beloved, and whose praise was in all the churches of the land.

Having lost by death one daughter and an only son, and having survived her husband nearly twenty-eight years, Mrs. Punderson died in New Haven, April 30, 1876, and was buried in Huntington, by the side of her husband and among the friends of her youth. Two married daughters still survive her,—Mrs. Emily P. Ritchie, of Brooklyn, and Mrs. Frances P. Gilbert, of New Haven.

JOHN L. HOWE,

the eldest son of William Howe and Mary Ireland, was born in the town of Ridgefield, Conn., July 20, 1793, and died in Birmingham, Conn., Sept. 10, 1876.

He remained at home, working on his father's farm in the summer and attending the district school in the winter, until the age of nineteen, when he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Perry, a physician of that town. He was graduated at the medical university of New York about the year 1814. He commenced the practice of his profession in the city of New York, and for several years was one of the resident physicians of the New York almshouse.

On the 15th of May, 1820, he was married to Cornelia A., daughter of George Ireland, of New York. He continued in the city until the year 1829, when he was compelled, by a severe illness, which seriously impaired his constitution, to abandon his profession and his residence, and removed to North Salem, N. Y. It was a most bitter disappointment to be obliged to resign a profession to which he was admirably adapted, and in which he had secured a very honorable position.

For two or three years before leaving New York he became engaged in experiments on India-rubber, with a view to its application for the purposes to which it has since been so successfully applied, and in 1828 he obtained a patent for rubber compounds. In his own words, "So far as I know, I was the first person who attempted to utilize rubber by combining other substances with it, but I did not happen to stumble upon the right substance."

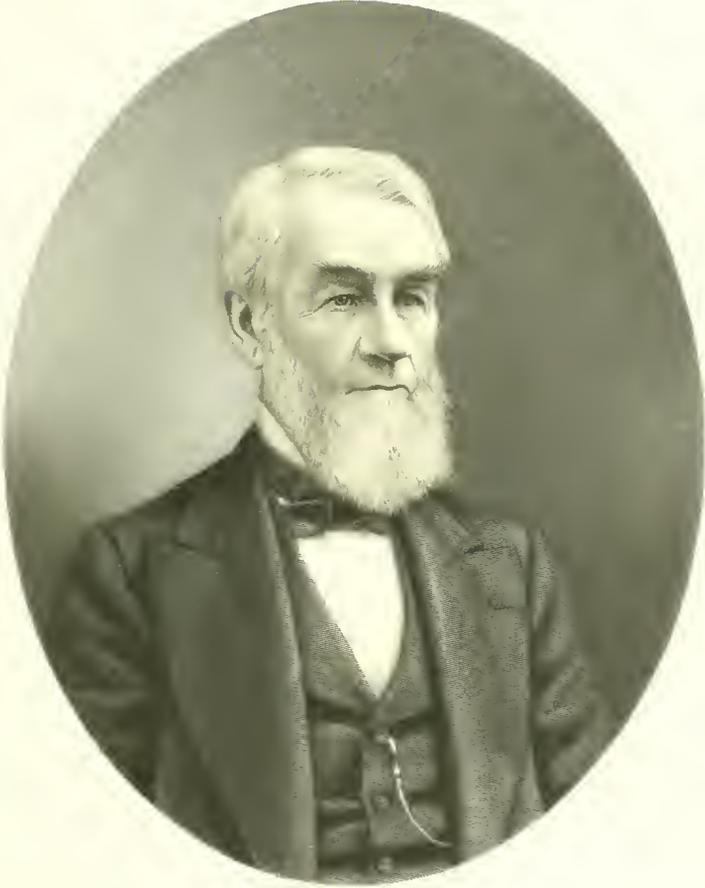

While engaged as a physician at the New York almshouse he had seen English pins made by the old manual process, and had heard of a machine having been invented for that purpose. During the winter of 1830-31 he employed himself in a series of experiments with a view to constructing a pin-machine, which resulted in a rude model. Acquiring in these efforts gradually the skill and experience in mechanical drawing upon which so much depends in perfecting the details of complicated mechanism, in the winter of 1831-32 he succeeded in building a machine at the establishment of Robert Hoe & Co., in New York, that was successful as a working model and would make pins, though in an imperfect way. This machine was patented in 1832, and in the same year it was exhibited at the fair of the American Institute, and attracted considerable attention. The Institute awarded him a silver medal "for a machine for making pins at one operation." In the winter of 1832, Dr. Howe began to construct a second machine, which was completed in the spring of 1833. For the purpose of securing patents in Europe he sailed for England in May, 1833, and reached London after a passage of thirty days, then considered short. Patents were secured in France, England, Scotland, and Ireland during the year, and in January, 1834, Dr. Howe left London for Manchester, where he was engaged in building machines according to the principles of his invention until the spring of 1835, when he returned to New York.

In December of that year the "Howe Manufacturing Company," named after its founder, was organized for the purpose of manufacturing pins by means of Dr. Howe's machines, and he was appointed general agent of the company, and in that capacity had the management of its manufacturing department until 1863. The company, in 1836-37, built five machines for making what are called "spun-heads," which machines were all altered into solid-heads, and were run successfully for a short time, when they were superseded by a new "rotary" machine, invented by Dr. Howe. The first rotary was completed in 1838, but the patent was not taken out until 1840. In 1842 the American Institute of New York awarded Dr. Howe a gold medal for the "best solid-headed pins," which were made on this machine.

Previous to this—to wit, in April, 1838—the company had removed their manufactory from New York to Birmingham, Conn., for its advantages in water-power. This removal compelled Dr. Howe to locate in Birmingham, where he continued to reside until his decease.

In 1842, Dr. Howe invented an important improvement in the operation of sticking pins in paper, which consisted in the construction and operation of "crimping-bars." Dr. Howe's skill and devotion to the business compelled success. The early years of the business were years of struggle and toil. Skilled labor, appropriate tools, and perfect machinery were not at command as in these days. The language of the historian of Derby is well deserved: "Dr. Howe, with a persevering courage, contending against prejudice, inexperience, and poverty, knew no defeat, and must be placed at the head as the first practical and successful pin-manufacturer by means of automatic machinery, however worthy may be his numerous predecessors and competitors, especially Sloeum, Fowler, Atwood, and others;" as also that of Dr. J. L. Bishop in his "History of American Manufactures:" "Dr. Howe was "the inventor of the first practical automatic pin-making machine," "and has contribthe subject of this sketch, was born in the town of Huntington, Fairfield Co., Conn., Jan. 5, 1817. Christopher Hubbell, his father, was a farmer of but moderate means, and gave to Charles little besides an ordinary education. Being a man of more than ordinary industry, who stood not back at small difficulties, he gradually accumulated a comfortable property, and gave to his children good educations. In the matter of education and schools he was ever interested, and the meeting of the district school board never found him an absentee. In disposition Mr. Hubbell was quiet and domestic, always finding something to do on the farm. In politics an earnest Democrat, as were all his people, he gave the principles of that party staunch support, but never entered into politics as a debater or office-seeker. As a neighbor and a citizen he was a good man, ready at all times to face his duty and perform it to the very best of his ability.

On Sept. 10, 1848, he was united in marriage to Miss Charlotte A. Shelton, born Jan. 9, 1828. Charlotte A. was the daughter of Wm. Shelton, son of Jeremiah, the son of Daniel, who was the son of Thaddens, son of Daniel Shelton. Daniel Shelton came from Deptford, Yorkshire, England, and settled at Long Hill, Huntington, about 1690.

Mrs. Hubbell's mother was Luey Johnson, daughter of Ebenezer Johnson, a tailor and farmer of Huntington.

Christopher Hubbell, father of Charles, was married twice. His first wife was Ann Wells, to whom he was married Dec. 23, 1802, and who died May 18, 1814. By her he had three children,—John, born Oct. 27, 1803; Betsy Ann, born Nov. 4, 1805; Maryette, born Dec. 6, 1807. John became a sea captain, and died in the West Indies,—it is supposed, of yellow fever. Betsy Ann married Mr. Blakeman, and died Nov. 22, 1835. Maryette married Mr. Webb Downs, of Monroe.

Sept. 14, 1815, Christopher Hubbell was married to his second wife, Melissa Tueker, who bore him three children,—Charles, born Jan. 5, 1817; Wells, born June 17, 1818; Jane Melissa, March 2, 1826.

Mr. Hubbell found in Charlotte Shelton a faithful helpmate, to whose industry he owed much, and to whose affectionate influence his children owe much. He died Aug. 31, 1878. His children are: Amanda M., born Nov. 1, 1850, married to Geo. P. Bidwell, Oct. 28, 1874; Theresa J., born Oct. 11, 1854; Warren C., born March 22, 1860. Warren succeeds to the management of the farm. The only male representative of his branch of the family, he promises to worthily follow his father's example of temperance and industry, and is justly held in esteem by the community.

F. G. PERRY.

M. B. PERRY.

FREDERICK G. AND MILES B. PERRY.

But a little more than one decade ago "the lowing herd roamed slowly o'er the lea" where now is heard the buzz and whir of machinery, the rattle of the busy loom, the heavy thud of the massive trip-hammer. The site of the present thriving and busy village of Shelton was "seeded down to grass, its soil undisturbed save by the farmer's plowshare."

Samuel Leavenworth Perry, son of Abner Perry and grandfather of F. G. and M. B. Perry, was born Feb. 18, 1762. Growing to manhood's estate he married Anna Davidson and located among the rugged hills of Huntington, opposite Birmingham, where the town of Shelton is now located. Undismayed by the ruggedness of its aspect, he built the house now occupied by his grandsons on one of the most commanding building sites in the vicinity, and commenced the laborious task of felling timber and removing the stone. Dying Jan. 13, 1828, at the age of sixty-six, his son Garry continued the improvement of the estate, and by his energy and industry was enabled to make his family comfortable and prosperous. Garry Perry was born Sept. 13, 1792, and was married to Sallie Birdseye, of Stratford, Nov. 24, 1824. His wife lived not quite a year, dying Oct. 9, 1825. Mr. Perry remained a widower until Oct. 11, 1837, when he was married to Fanny Bennett, daughter of Isaac Bennett and Mary Johnson, of Easton. By this marriage he had two children, Frederick Garry, born Sept. 29, 1838, and Miles Bennett, born Oct. 6, 1840.

Mr. Perry was a man of delicate strength, industrious habits, and considerable force of character; a prominent member of the Presbyterian Church, taking an active part in church and school matters of his day. He died at the age of fifty, Sept. 8, 1842.

The early education of Frederick and Miles Perry was received at the schools in Birmingham, Frederick finishing his education at Franklin, N. Y., and Miles at the academy at Easton, Conn. They engaged in farming until 1873, when they entered the coal and wood business in Shelton, in which they are at present engaged.

Dealing with all alike, they have increased their business from the sale of one thousand tons of coal the first year to six thousand tons for 1879. The fact that these gentlemen live together, keeping no accounts with each other, but hold their property in common, fittingly illustrates their feelings towards each other.

Frederick Perry was united in marriage to Miss Mary E. Beach, Dec. 21, 1870. Miss Beach is a daughter of David M. and Emily Buckingham Beach, of Trumbull. David M. Beach is son of Eli B. Beach, and he a son of Daniel Beach, a soldier of the Revolutionary war. Frederick G. Perry has had two children, Jessie Bennett, born April 25, 1872, dying Aug. 22, 1872; and Emily Blakeman, born July 19, 1874. F. G. Perry served the town as representative during the session of 1878-79; also as selectman and town agent.

M. B. Perry has never taken part in public politics. Indeed, it can be said of both that they are disposed rather to quietly look after their own affairs than those of their neighbors or the general public. In politics both gentlemen are Republicans.

The children of Samuel L. Perry were Anna Maria, Charlotte, and Garry. Dr. John Tomlinson married Anna Maria, by whom he had one child, Samuel Perry; and upon her death married Charlotte, by whom he had two children, John B. and Anna Maria.

uted efficiently to the establishment of an important branch of American manufactures."

His life was essentially a home-life. To know him as he was it was essential to enter that circle. He was a devourer of books, mostly scientific; but there were few subjects that escaped his thoughtful investigation. A perseverance that would not turn aside from its object, that would not be baffled or thwarted, that came what would his purpose must be accomplished, was his most characteristic trait. Diffidence balked his public utterance, but those who have read his wonderfully clear and readily understood descriptions of complicated machinery know how thoroughly he was master of this accomplishment.

While a resident of Birmingham, Dr. Howe held many offices of trust, and interested himself in all new business undertakings. Especially was he interested in that great enterprise which resulted in the damming of the Ousatonie River, and contributed by his moral and material aid largely to its success.

In the war for the preservation of the Union he was responsive to every call, and contributed fifteen hundred dollars to the families of soldiers who were at the front.

During the latter years of his life he alternated between his books and his fruits; in the cultivation of the latter, and in the propagation of new species, he found genuine pleasure, leaving as a legacy more than fifty new kinds of pears. He died in his garden, under the branches of a favorite peach-tree, his basket partly filled with specimens of fruits intended for exhibition at the International Exposition at Philadelphia. Thus peacefully and alone he passed away, in the place where he had spent so many happy hours. It was on a beautiful Sunday morning in September. Life rounded and full was ripe for the gathering along with his fruits.

It is good to contemplate such a life, warm in its friendships, faithful in its relations, clear in its convictions, unbending in its integrity, winning the esteem of the wise and the approbation of the good.

Dr. Howe's descendants at the time of his death were two grandsons and two granddaughters, the children of his only daughter, Mrs. William E. Downes.

CHAPTER XLI.

MONROE.

Geographical—Topographical—Streams—Surface—Soil—Reminiscences of Monroe, by Rev. T. T. Waterman—Early Settlers—Their Locations—Incidents—Public and Select Schools—Initial Events—St. Peter's Church—Mineral Deposit—Civil History—Organization of Town—First Town-Meeting—Officers Elected—Representatives to the General Assembly from 1824 to 1881.

THIS town lies in the eastern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Newtown and the Housatonie River; on the east by the Housatonie and the town of Huntington; on the south by Huntington and Trumbull; and on the west by Easton and Newtown. The surface of the town is generally uneven, and in some portions exceedingly rough. The soil is good and well adapted to grazing.

REMINISCENCES OF ONE HUNDRED YEARS IN MONROE.

The following excellent address is not taken entire. Some extracts not strictly historical have been eliminated:

"The flight of time, leaving with it all we have of possession, friendship, and life, is full of instruction. The past is the present as it was and is. It is all stern reality. In this sense, in the words of Solomon, that which hath been now is.

"Today, as a church and congregation, we record the passing away of 3,153,600,000 seconds, 51,560,000 minutes, 876,000 hours, 36,500 days, or one hundred years of our religious history. This history commenced in the organization of this church, Dec. 14, 1764. Of the order of exercises on that occasion, the place in which the persons by whom those exercises were conducted, the sentiments uttered, the emotions expressed, the portions of Scripture read, the hymns sung, the prayers offered, the sermon preached, we have no record. Tradition is silent. To my knowledge no one lives to tell us of that day and that scene.

"Were it otherwise we might give reality to the enactments of that interesting hour by a sketch of the men, women, youth, and children who then entered into solemn covenant with each other and with the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Gathered amid joy and tears, anxieties and misgivings, and yet with buoyant and blessed hope to plant, on this then wilderness hill-top, a branch of the true vine, which to-day is and to-morrow and still to-morrow we trust will be, all who on that day wept and rejoiced around this then new altar of the Lord, this then new communion-table, have mouldered back to dust. Unknown to us by name, in their works they live, and by all that is dear in the past and grateful in the present of our existence as a church, they with the emphasis of 'a hundred years ago' greet us in love to-day.

"We remember their deeds of Christian heroism and love, and, bidding them 'All hail!' we render thanks unto God and bless His holy name.

"In attempting to signalize the hallowed associations of this hour, I shall notice some particulars connected with the early history of our State and county, and some as identified with individuals and incidents in our advance as a church and congregation.

"The settlement of our State commenced in 1635, or two hundred and twenty-nine years ago; that of Stratford,—which then embraced Newfield (now Bridgeport), North Stratford (now Trumbull), New Stratford (now Monroe), and Kipton (now Huntington),—in 1639.

"The Indians were numerous at that date in this section. Their number in the State was computed to be twenty thousand. Of these some four thousand were trained warriors; three hundred of this class were in the limits of Huntington. Some of these were friendly and greatly aided the first settlers by teaching them the mode of cultivating corn and of securing other means of subsistence. Others, not a few of them, were intensely hostile, and against them and their depredations the settlers had constantly to watch and in stern battle array to fight. A yell of an Indian at morning, noon, or midnight was a doleful sound in the ears of fathers and mothers and neighbors, exposed and wholly unprotected as they were. Of all this we in our quietude have no just conception.

"The Indians prepared the ground for corn with the clam-shell or a small piece of wood sharpened for the purpose, and cultivated it with the same implements. They leveled large forest-trees such as they wished for their canoes, some of which accommodated forty or fifty men, by fire and their stone axes.

"In 1639 it is stated there were not more than five plows in this State. The price of a cow was one hundred and fifty dollars, of a pair of oxen two hundred dollars, and at one season that of corn was three dollars per bushel.

"In 1637 the snow lay from the 4th of November until the 23d of

* By T. T. Waterman. Delivered on Dec. 14, 1864, at the centennial celebration of the organization of the Congregational Church, Dec. 14, 1764.

March, and was at times three or four feet deep. The whole inland of our State was a perfect wilderness,—no roads, no dwellings, no cultivated grounds. Wolves, bears, foxes, deer, moose, wild turkeys and fowl of various descriptions, and Indians were the tenants. Aside from these, all was solitude, silence, and gloom. Thus, too, was it for nearly one hundred years from 1639.

"In the year 1713 thirty-eight towns had been incorporated. Nine of these were in Fairfield County,—Stratford, Fairfield, Greenwich, Stamford, Norwalk, Woodbury, Danbury, Newtown, Ridgefield. The population of the State was then seventeen thousand; one regiment of militia in each county, four regiments in the State. But one cloth-mill in the State, and all its operator could do was to fill the cloth, which was worn unshorn and unpressed.

"The first printer in the State was Thomas Short, 1709. He settled in New London, in 1719 printed the Say-Brooke Platform, and soon died. The next printer was Timothy Green, of Cambridge, Mass., and son of Samuel Green, the first printer in North America. He settled in New London, 1711.

"During this period, near 1617, the use of tobacco was unfortunately introduced, and to prevent, if possible, its disgusting prevalence, no person under the age of twenty years was permitted to use it, unless under medical treatment. All persons over twenty years of age were prohibited using it in company, or when traveling with others, and but once a day. Had this wisely-designed proscription of this noxious weed prevailed, the health, manners, and thrift of thousands would have been greatly promoted, the worse than useless expenditure of millions of dollars, and the melancholy fact that the cultivation of corn and substantial vegetable crops is being supplanted by this impudent and rampant twenty-four-inch leaved and vile worm-bearing narcotic, and this on our best soil, would have been prevented. But then, as now, the hly appetite proved itself a mighty spoiler of man's dignity, refinement, and peace. Not a few then, as now, could let decency and thrift and money go to make their tobacco-quids and their puffing sure! It was thought strange in 1647, and if possible is more strange in 1864, that an intelligent man could consent, by chewing it, to make a sink of his stomach, a sink-drain of his throat, and a sink-spout of his nose, or by smoking it a fireplace of his mouth, a chimney of his nose, and a smoke-house of his brain!

"In 1646 such were the disappointments and sad forebodings of the settlers at New Haven that they formed a purpose to leave the country. They had invitations to Ireland and to Jamaica, in the West Indies, and actually, it is said, entered into treaties for the city of Galloway as a place of settlement. They were provisionally prevented from executing their designs, and in 1694 what spot more attractive and beautiful and far famed than that then sad and gloomy and about to be forsaken New Haven?

"At this time the settlements were almost exclusively on the line of the sea-shore. All was labor, sacrifice, exposure, watchfulness, and warfare. Every man must be drilled as a soldier,—a soldier when he stood in his door; a soldier when he sat at his meals; a soldier when he went to his corn-field; a soldier when he entered the place of worship; a soldier by day and by night. These were days of unceasing peril and endurance, and thus for some one hundred and fifty years in our State. Incidents surpassing fiction, and acts of heroism by man and woman and child, characterize those eventful days. What was then attempted and accomplished for the sake of liberty and truth, home and country, and in preparing this our beautiful heritage for us and our children and children's children, is replete with instruction and counsel. All this may be forgotten by us and be unknown to our descendants, but it will all live in our history and in the book of God's account.

"For holy faith, triumphant zeal, and beneficent design the record stands unsurpassed in the annals of man. If through party prejudice, sectarian zeal, or any other influence any persons choose to be ignorant, so let them be; or if any choose to know only to prevent, divide, it may be denounce, so to let them do. May God enable us and ours to know and revere His name in these wonderful doings and doings of our fathers in this State from 1635 to 1776.

"In the midst of all this endurance and heroism on the sea-shore, hunting and exploring expeditions into the interior were not infrequent. The hills about us, as Bagburn and Barn and Moore, attracted early notice, and were favorite spots, being at an early date partially cultivated and settled. In 1755, as tradition affirms, Mr. Samuel Lewis, with his family, moved from Stratford and settled on this then forest-covered and wild but beautiful hill; his residence was north and west of the green, on the street running north. Mr. Frederick Lewis, the father of Mr. Henry Lewis, was then two years old. He died in 1825.

"The mother of Mr. Henry Lewis was the widow of the son of Deacon

Henry Hawley, one of the first deacons of this church. The family name of Mrs. Lewis was Scott; she was a member of this church.

"The landed estate of this early and enterprising settler, Mr. Samuel Lewis, or portions of it, are now in the possession of the respected representative of the third generation of this family, who is present to-day. Mr. Samuel Lewis gave distinctive proof of his interest in this church and society by presenting the Rev. Mr. Rexford a lot of ground, on which he erected the tenement which is standing, a memorial of the first pastor of this church.

"Capt. and Deacon Henry Hawley, as we infer, was from Stratford, and a direct descendant, if not son, of Mr. Samuel Hawley, one of the prominent first settlers of Stratford. The traditional record of Deacon Lewis is highly commendatory. He was intelligent, industrious, patriotic in the colonial service, evangelical and consistent in his Christian profession. He resided near Mr. Samuel Lewis, north and west of the green; the ruins of his homestead still speak the place. He probably settled here as early as 1756, and was, we suppose, at the organization of the church, and then or soon after appointed its deacon. By name he is identified with a family of many influential branches, and which, in its public and private relations, has been and is known and felt throughout this county. I cannot say that any of his immediate descendants remain in this town. The name frequently occurs in our list of members from the commencement to the present time.

"Gideon Hawley and Elias Hawley were early and prominent settlers in the more western portion of the town. Their influence was felt as members of this society and church; they lived to be aged. Gen. Eli Hawley, who years past has done this society valuable service, and who is now eighty-seven years of age, is of this branch of the family.

"The wife of Deacon Henry Hawley—Ruth, I believe—was sister of Deacon John Judson, and, in the language of tradition, was mighty prim,—that is, as I take it, a smart, bright-eyed, neat, precise, well-to-do lady, one who in word and deed caused her influence to be felt, if not feared. She was, I infer, a good wife for a deacon, as she certainly was the wife of a good deacon.

"The family of Deacon Judson, we suppose, was among the earlier settlers. He lived on Elm Street, nearly opposite the residence of Mr. Hiram Beardslee. He is said to have been wealthy, a large landholder, and, as the phrase is, 'no fool.' As we infer from tradition, he was a man of strong common sense and firm adherence to right, just, and equal law. He was a justice of the peace or judge, and, as he wore his leathern apron in court rather than silk and French broadcloth and a wig, was called the 'leathern-apron judge.'

"It is reported that some guilty of witchery were arraigned before him for various misdemeanors. As he was too honest to be bribed and too bold to be frightened by invisible things or by dead men, he proved himself too much for Beelzebub strategy, wizard legerdemain, and profane holo-goblinism. As the record is, he put the criminals and witches through by law. He lived to be some eighty years of age, and was an influential and early deacon in this church. His descendants still exist in New York, none of them, I believe, in this town.

"It is given as an illustration of the influence of his decisions against the impudent claims of spirit mediums and dealers with the unseen world, fortune-tellers, midnight wonder-doers, apparitions, voices, ghosts, and the like harum-scarum, that among the inhabitants of this town there is little credit given to those absurd and consummately silly nerva conpatoren wizzarda nopolachus quas tunc dead man and womanano poolaveon delusions.

"In one instance a young lady of one of the families we notice to-day was told, as a means of deterring her from a discharge of her duty, frightening her into the faith, in going alone to a certain place in the evening that she would meet a man with his head cut off coming towards her. 'Ah, indeed!' said this Judge Judson heroine; 'I should be much more alarmed if I should meet a man with his head on!' That is noble womanhood! It is men with their heads on that we all, especially young women, have reason to fear.

"Capt. Joseph Moore, whose residence was on the northeast corner of the green, on a lot now owned by Deacon N. Wheeler, has a reputation among the first settlers in this centre. He was a man of pecuniary means, and, in the language of the day, 'head of the heap.' He is said to have been very clever when he was pleased and had his own way. He was a shrewd and cynical genius. He at least had influence and generosity.

"The original meeting-house, it seems, was at first located by a committee appointed for the purpose to be one-half mile west of this, near Mrs. William Beacher's residence. Capt. Moore and others were dissatisfied, and procured the appointment of another committee, who located it on this hill. Capt. Moore donated the land for its site, and also for our present common or green. Through thoughtlessness or to save labor the beautiful triangular form of this common has at times, and for highway purposes, been disfigured in a manner which we believe, could Capt. Moore be present and witness the same, would call forth from him emphatic words and gestures. Happy is it for some who thus err in working out their highway tax that the doctrine of spirit mediums is false; otherwise the spirit of the old and stern gentleman to their sorrow might be after them.

"A daughter of Capt. Moore tradition signalizes as a noted belle, in personal charms, attainments, and general attractiveness surpassing all other female youth in this section. She married the Rev. Mr. Monson, a brother of Mrs. Rexford, who was pastor of a church in Lenox, Mass., and afterwards removed to this place, and here died. Connections of this family still reside in this place, and are members of the church. Mr. Monson, of New York, son of this lady, gave fifty dollars towards the erection of this house of worship.

"Capt. Moore was appointed to superintend the building of the meeting-house, which was raised on the 21st and 22d days of June, 1769, some five years after the organization of the church. It occupied ground a few feet in advance of this edifice, encroaching upon the green. The house, tradition states, was some seventeen years in the process of completion. This delay was the result, no doubt, of the difficulty of procuring materials, and specially of securing laborers, as the young men (many if not most of them) were in the ranks fighting the battles of our freedom.

"Capt. Moore, being a white-oak and persevering kind of man, held it on its course, and in 1786, as we judge, it was completed and dedicated. The last religious service held within its walls was on June 13, 1847. This house, which happily succeeded it, was raised July 20, 1847, and was dedicated Dec. 15, 1847, seventeen years ago to-morrow.

"Previous to the erection of the regular meeting-house, there was a temporary building, in form like a barn, in which divine services were held. For a time the Rev. Jedediah Mills, of Ripton, who has honorable mention for energy, eloquence, and zeal in the history of this State, preached to the people here every third Sabbath. Originally the settlers here attended meeting at Ripton, being, many of them, until 1764 members of that church.

Reference is made to houses built with fireplaces and rooms convenient to be occupied by persons from a distance during intermission on the Sabbath, and thus called 'Sabbath-day houses'. In the one noted in this place, or in a portion of it, an old Mrs. Tooley lived, sweeping and looking after the things of the meeting-house.

"Almost immediately on the organization of the church the Rev. Elisha Rexford was ordained its pastor. This happened on the 9th of January, 1665, twenty-six days after the event of organization. We infer from this that Mr. Rexford must have been with the church, probably as a supply, previous to its formation. No doubt he was happily instrumental in consummating the interesting event.

"Mr. Rexford, as I understand, was a graduate of Yale College, and married as his first wife a Miss Monson, of New Haven. In tradition he bears the reputation of a wise and good man, pious, intelligent, and consistent in his ministrations, sound in doctrine, correct in practice, economical and frugal, loyal to his country and to freedom, acting as chaplain in the Revolution, respected and beloved by his people, until his death, April 3, 1808, or for a period of forty-four years.

"In his pastoral relation he numbered some four thousand five hundred and seventy-six Sabbath services and many occasional week-day ministrations. An interesting revival occurred during his ministry, which gladdened his own soul and greatly strengthened and refreshed the church. The influence going forth from a wise, thoughtful, kind and true-hearted man of God day by day, and week by week, and Sabbath by Sabbath, for forty-four years,—and such years as were those from 1765 to 1808,—and thus in his daily conversation, example, preaching, and counsel in seasons of bereavement and death, of marriage and of burial, may be silent with him in the grave, unthought of by us as the moss-covered stone telling the spot where his dust reposes; that influence was and still is immensely great. Felt by those who with him have here worshiped and with him have gone to their home above, and felt by us who here live and worship to-day,—ay, and will be felt along down successive generations of those who will come after us!

"He for a time gave his attention to the subject of education, having had, as I understand, a select school for both sexes in this place.

"Mr. Rexford was seventy-one years of age when he died, and must have been twenty-seven when he was ordained as pastor of this church.

"The letter of Mr. Rexford to this society in which he tendered his resignation of his pastoral office is extant, and breathes a spirit of love to the truth and to the best good of this people worthy of his office and his age. It is dated Dec. 29, 1807.

"Another family of influence in the society and church bore the name DeForest. At an early period they settled in the south part of the parish, and removed here in or before the year 1776. Mr. DeForest built and kept a public-house and store on the west side of the green,—the first store opened in the centre, the trading previous to 1776 having passed to Ripton. This Mr. DeForest was father of Deacon William DeForest, of Bridgeport, and Lockwood DeForest, Esq., of New York. He was a social and stirring old man, and a faithful overseer and tutor of the boys and their manners when rude and boisterous, and when throwing stones at the meeting-house or marking on the fences. He entertained the officers of a French force of some five hundred men who during the Revolutionary war were quartered for a few weeks on this hill. He named his son De Lazon, after one of those officers.

"This family was, we infer, descended from the Huguenots, and had a natural ease and gentility of address, and politeness of manner,—matters which all Frenchmen, if not all Americans, regard.

"The family left in the year 1800. They still exist and are influential in Bridgeport and in New York. Two of them, William and Lockwood, gave each fifty dollars to aid in the erection of this house. One of these, Deacon William DeForest, I remember as one prominent in the church in Bridgeport, of which my father was long pastor. He was a gentleman of fine appearance and genial manner, kind, shrewd, and sympathetic. His quick-uttered words, expressive smiles, and graceful gestures would interest children and men in advanced life. He lived to a good old age, and died a few years since in the triumph of Christian faith.

"The memory of Capt. Nathan Booth, who resided in Elm Street, is embalmed in a donation of ten pounds made to the church to meet the expenses of the communion-table. This somewhat singular yet effective legacy increased, and was sufficient a few years since to furnish the neat silver set for our communion-table. It is still on interest as a fund in the treasury of the church.

"Mr. Booth is said to have been social, somewhat set in his ways, blunt, and fractious in his intercourse with others. He was a great foe to card-playing and gambling, the favorite employment of idlers and heedless ones. He was plain-spoken on these topics, and has left a record which it would be well if many youths and persons more advanced would in this day heed. He was, moreover, fond of music, and, as I infer, a good singer and leader of the choir in this church.

"The descendants of this somewhat noted man are still with us in the persons of Mr. William Booth, his great-grandson, and Elisha Booth, a great-great-grandson. To the one the society credits a donation of one hundred and ten dollars towards the erection of this church, and to the other the favor of acting chorister for a series of years. Of him, as in the fullness of his warm heart he proves himself full of song, it may be said he comes honestly by it. May he and his still live here to sing and pray and praise!

"There was another family of this name, Zechariah Booth, noted for social influence. They resided in Elm Street, and opposite to Mr. C. T. Crane's. This family, I believe, is not now represented in the place.

"Honorable mention is made of a Mr. James Judson, who was father of Mr. Levi Judson and Miss Betsey Judson. At an early date he settled here and built or occupied the house next east of the Wakeman place. The family is still represented by membership of children and grandchildren in this church, and highly respectable branches of the same are in other towns. Miss Betsey Judson still lives, a constant attendant upon divine service here, and manifests a strong love to the church and society. She has been connected with the church fifty-one years. Mr. Levi Judson, her brother, is some fourscore years on, and in the sunset of his days.

"Special allusion, too, is made to the family of Beardlee, and particularly to an early settler on Bagburn Hill, reported to me as old Capt. Beardlee,—captain, I suppose, in the colonial service, and a true patriot.

"Mr. Samuel B. Beardlee and Judge Beardlee, Esq., once a prominent lawyer in this place, and Mr. Azur Beardlee, formerly a deacon of this church, are descendants immediately or more remotely from him. This family, Mr. Samuel B. Beardlee, Mr. Elisha Beardlee, Col. Samuel Beardlee, and Dr. Edward M. Beardlee, is still prominent in this church and society.

"There must have been a good deal of power and much of the spirit of 1664 in that same old captain on Bagburn Hill a hundred years ago. He speaks, in a subscription of some six hundred and forty-two dollars by his grandchildren or great-great-grandchildren, in behalf of the erection of this meeting-house. He speaks from Sabbath to Sabbath in our sweet-toned and sweetly-touched melody, and in the alto notes of our choir, and in all our services to-day, and we trust will continue here thus to speak in his children's children until time shall be no more.

"Capt. Robert Lewis and family are remembered and named with respect. He built the residence now occupied by the Misses Lewis, though an entirely distinct family. His son, Lieut. Legrand Morse Lewis, is noticed as an intelligent, influential man. This family has, I believe, become extinct. They are nevertheless well remembered.

"A family of some note is named as the Carpenter family, and as having lived during or at the close of the Revolution in the Wakeman place. The father was a soldier in the Revolutionary war. This is said to have been a talented family. A daughter, by her own energy and efforts, became noted as a teacher in New Haven, and afterwards at the South. Mr. Carpenter was for some time mail-carrier between New Haven and New Milford,—an office of importance, and even distinction, in those days. Then the news traveled on weary-footed horses, not, as now, on the breathings of steam or the wings of the lightning. Then, day by day, on wilderness roads, 'mid cold, and sleet, and snow in winter, and burning heat in summer, the news-man must sound his horn on time at each expectant farm-residence or village-office. Welcome then was the sound of his voice or his horn as he came with tidings from near and afar. In all this Mr. Carpenter was a man who could and did well fulfill his trust. The family is gone, being now unknown here.

"A Mr. Cole, whose name often occurs in the filed accounts of this society, was a blacksmith. His shop was near the residence of Rev. Mr. Rexford. He is said to have been a singular or very peculiar man. He, for some reason, in hardening iron, seemed to have hardened his heart. His family were interested in and attended church.

"Deacon Wheeler, of Ripton Parish, was committee on land-titles, then a great and responsible business. He had, from his office, a special influence in this town. He was a prominent man,—a man of integrity and promptness, and shrewd in trade.

"His son, Nathan Wheeler, the father of our respected friend, Deacon Nathan Wheeler, of this church, purchased the Monson—originally the Capt. Moore—estate, and removed to this place. He lived and died in the Monson house, the ruins of which mark the northeast corner lot of the green. These grounds are still in possession of the family, being owned by Deacon Wheeler.

"A deep interest has ever been felt by this family in this church and society. The valuable lot on which this edifice stands was given to the society in 1847 by Deacon Nathan Wheeler, who generously added a subscription of one hundred and thirty-five dollars towards its erection. The sister of Deacon Wheeler, Mrs. Betsey Smith, was also a contributor to this object, and has in times past and recently manifested a deep and valuable interest in the house itself, and in the general welfare of the church and society.

"Thus the owners of the Capt. Moore estate have twice furnished a spot of ground upon which this ark of God has rested. Believe me, as blessings came upon the house of Obed-edom for attentions to the ark of the Lord, so will blessings come upon all who in love and faith sustain the house of God and its worship.

"Samuel Wheeler, Esq., was a cousin of Deacon Nathan Wheeler and son of Mr. Joseph Wheeler. He for years traded in this place. He was father of Mr. Henry S. Wheeler, who was a devoted member of this church and society. He generously remembered its necessities in his will, and to-day speaks to us in the continued ministrations of this pulpit, and will continue so to speak while years, and even centuries, roll by. A memory thus embalmed in the services of the house of God is fragrant indeed.

"The mother of Henry S. Wheeler, the first wife of Samuel Wheeler, Esq., was, I am informed, a daughter of Dr. Fitch, of Norwalk, and sister of the mother of the late celebrated Professor Knight, of Yale College.

"In this connection it is proper and just that reference be made to Mr. Henry T. Curtis, whose donations and labors in behalf of this edifice and this church and society shine so conspicuously on our records. He is connected by marriage with the family of Henry S. Wheeler, and has most effectively co-operated with that devoted man in elevating and perpetuating the services of this our sanctuary. Though gone from our town, he lives in our grateful remembrances. Such benevolence and such labors never die. They have their reward.

"I have heard, too, of a singular and eccentric, and yet talented, kind of gentle and eloquent purper peripatetic or street-preacher who years since came to this town from Windham, in this State. He was noted for his somewhat imposing dress,—his cocked hat, buckskin breeches, and large knee-buckles in antique style. He had great resources for conversation and extemporary addresses, was keen at an impromptu and lightning retort, was full of curling figures of speech and remarks, and by original and not always reverential touches tended to wake up, if not to astonish, more stupid thinkers. As he passed a school-horse such was his power, I have been told, that the boys would at times form in a line and, paying him their respects, he would address them and pass on his way. He was a friend and admirer of Mr. Rexford, of whom he once remarked, in his quaint and significant style, that he was a good man, a peculiar man; he was the friend of both worlds.

"This man was a poet, and the following is given as a sarcastic impromptu comment upon a careless lawyer after his being summoned as a witness in a case before Justice Adams, in Ripton, and which went by default of the writ:

"A court were had,
The writ was had,
And could not be amended;
The plaintiff lost
His expected cost,
And so the matter ended."

"This strange genius, around whose history a deep mysteriousness gathers, was, through disappointment in his early hopes, probably insane, and was thus lost to the standing and influence which his talents and connections in life rendered him signally capable of sustaining. We refer to him to remind you what a lasting influence the most penniless and obscure person may have upon the thoughts and manners and characters of a community.

"My father was in his early ministry pastor for ten years in Windham, and the family name of Manning was of note there. The name is now of note in Western New York, and descendants of this same strange man known here have character and influence. How and why a descendant of that family should so live and die here in this town is a mystery. Believe me, there is a cause for all this, and it may well lead us all to ponder our ways lest our descendants be, like him, mere mysterious wanderers or paperers in the world.

"He sleeps the sleep of death,
Gone to his long and last account,
Unknown to us, but known to God."

"The regularly reported pastors and acting pastors of this church are eleven in number, and as follows: Elisha Rexford, John Noyes, Asahel Nettleton, Chamney G. Lee, Amos Bassett, Daniel Jones, James Kant, Robert D. Gardner, Lewis M. Shepard, Edward B. Emerson, George C. Prudden.*

"The church, as reported now, numbers thirty-four males and seventy-one females; total, one hundred and five,—the largest number ever on its list. This is the seal of God's covenant love visible upon the event of its organization, one hundred years ago. The little vine then planted in this wilderness still lives and flourishes. From its branches rich clusters have been plucked for the upper sanctuary, while its influence in beloved members gone hence far and near is widespread. There is scarcely a family in the congregation which has not in it one or more members of the church; in some instances all the members of the family are members of the church. In not a small portion of the families in the congregation both heads of the family are in covenant with us. Most, too, of the youths over fifteen years of age are one with us in Christ. With rare exceptions, the families of the congregation are regular attendants upon the sanctuary and contributors to the support of the same, and to different benevolent objects.

"During the current year, the last of this one hundred years of our history, our contributions for home and other objects have equaled, it is computed, six hundred dollars. During this year, through the enterprise and benevolence of the general committee,—Mr. Charles T. Crane, David A. Nichols, and Samuel C. Beard-lee,—the interior of this house has been handsomely and beautifully refitted. In this the members of the church and society and of the female sewing society have cheerfully and generously contributed. Such services and benevolent aid live on. This day, too, greets us a united church and people. Peace and joy, brotherly love, and friendly co-operation in a remarkable degree here reign, the language of each, one and all, being—

"I love Thy kingdom, Lord;
The house of Thine abode;
The Church our Best Redeemer made
With His own precious blood."

"These are pleasing comments upon the fruits of the organization which has lived one hundred years this day all told, and which, we trust, will live with increasing faith and unity and zeal centuries on centuries yet to come.

* The successors of Mr. Prudden have been T. T. Waterman, O. S. St. John, William B. Curtis, Alfred Waterman, Dighton Moses, and Rev. Charles D. Hubert.—Ed.

"The preaching of the word has thus not been void. The faithful preaching of that word, as it has been here seen and honored, is a standing testimony in its effects to the life-giving energies and joys thereof. Honored and happy is the people who thus sustain and rejoice in a distinctive, searching, and uncompromising dispensation of the word of God.

"Nor has this church been blessed only in its ministers, it has been especially so in its deacons. Of these, as recorded, there have been sixteen: Henry Hawley, Edmund Lewis, Peter Curtis, Elijah Curtis, John Judson, Deodate Silliman, Daniel Wilcoxson, John Wilcoxson, James McEwen, Agur Beardslee, Elisha Curtis, Daniel Tomlinson, Ebenezer Lewis, Nathan W. Wheeler, Daniel Nichols, and Isaac Barr.

"Of Henry Hawley and John Judson we have before spoken.

"Peter Curtis was an early settler on Bagburn Hill. In intelligence, enterprise, patriotism, and faith as we infer, a representative man. He was sound in the faith and in practice,—a man of prayer and constant in his attendance upon the sanctuary; a lover of the church. He was the great-grandfather of Mr. William Curtis and Charles Curtis, still residents on portions of the original estate.

"This name Curtis is identified with the past and present history of our church and town. It is titled in Church and State, in law, politics, education, medicine, agriculture, and military display. Some five hundred and ninety dollars is credited to this name in behalf of the erection of this church. Whether Deacon Peter Curtis is connected with the ancestry of all this numerous generation I am not informed.

Daniel Wilcoxson resided, and probably was an early settler, on Barn Hill. He was wealthy, a man of ability and faith. His son, Daniel Wilcoxson, was a graduate of Yale College, and for some two years was a teacher in Bermuda,—a gentleman of taste and influence. Tradition states that he introduced the first piano into this town, if not the first in this county. This simple relic of the past is in possession of Mr. H. Beardslee. It was manufactured by Ball, Nottingham (now London), and presented to Miss Sylvia Curtis, in the year 1802,—sixty-two years ago. Daniel was accidentally drowned, being thrown from his house in crossing Leavenworth Bridge,—the first bridge built over the Housatonic River.

"Elijah Curtiss, son of Peter Curtiss, lived beyond East Village, on or near what was called Webb's place. He was fitted for college. A large landholder, a man of ability and of wide political influence, he was often a member of the State Legislature; was esteemed as an honest and exemplary man; was a warm supporter, I infer, of the church and of public worship.

"James McEwen was an early settler, and resided on the beautiful northern slope of Bagburn Hill, on the corner opposite the residence of our friend Charles McEwen. The ruins of his homestead are still visible, and some fruit-trees stand to memorialize the spot. His mind ran in a remarkable degree upon the Bible, with which, as illustrated by Brown's 'Commentary,'—a large folio volume,—he was remarkably familiar. He was a man of great faith, social and quiet, and a great loss, as we may well infer, when he died. It is stated of him that he was absent but one Sabbath for years from the sanctuary. He was found dead in his corn-field in or near the year 1815. His descendants, as represented in our midst, are known and esteemed by us, a granddaughter, Mrs. Samuel B. Beardslee, and a grandson, Mr. Charles McEwen, being members of this church.

"Ebenezer Lewis lived in Walker's Farm District. He was a man of property, and remarkable in prayer and exhortation. His daughter married the father of Mr. W. Plumb, and in that family he is honorably represented in the church.

"Elijah Curtiss, a son of Elisha Curtiss, and grandson of Peter Curtiss,—and grandfather, I believe, of Mr. William and Charles Curtiss,—a man of marked ability, shrewd and influential, went to the Legislature several times; was a true patriot, strong in the principles of the gospel, and a great supporter of public worship. It is reported of him that for years he did not fail to attend meetings on the Sabbath. His name and faith still live,—the third in one family descent who sustained a deaconship in this church.

"Edmond Lewis, son of Deacon Benjamin Lewis, was a devotedly pious and exemplary man,—one of whom the world took knowledge that he walked with God. He had no children, and gave an important legacy to this society. In the support of the preaching of the word this legacy speaks his praise, and will speak it while this church and society shall exist.

"Deodate Silliman lived on the road west of Upper Stepany. He is reported as a man of deep social feelings, given to pleasantry and wit in conversation, and yet a man of devout feelings, and one deeply interested in the welfare of the church and society. He was uncle to the late eminent Benjamin Silliman, professor in Yale College.

"John Wilcoxson, nephew of Deacon Wilcoxson, lived on Barn Hill; was a man of faith and prayer. He died in 1820.

"As far as tradition affirms, all these deacons were men of ability and worth. They were, too, blessed, we believe, with exemplary wives, who with them loved and helped sustain the church.

"At different periods, when the society was feeble and supplies were not obtained for the pulpit, divine service was maintained by the deacons. In this they were sustained by the members of the church and society and their families. This is named as one of the great means of preserving the church. It speaks volumes for the intelligence and energy of the deacons and the true-heartedness of the people. Even the young people, it is said, were punctual in attendance, and thus most happily and effectively aided in the work of building up this temple of the Lord.

"The bell, or the first one, if there have been two, must have been procured early,—probably in 1786, the year when the first house, as we infer, was dedicated. I find in the filed accounts of the society charges for repairing the tongue of the bell as far back as 1795, if not earlier. The present bell dates 1826; if so, it has pealed forth its joyous notes for some thirty-eight years—or some two thousand times—as Sabbath after Sabbath has rolled by. The tongue, worn by frequent utterance, on the last Sabbath loosed its load, dropped from its place, and was reverently silent during the day. It has been refitted, and stands again ready to do its joyful work, we trust, for a hundred years to come.

"The singing of the congregation and church has ever been, we judge, well sustained and of more than a common order. It was early conducted, we believe, by Capt. Nathan Booth,—certainly for a number of years by Mr. Abel French, who was an esteemed and active member of this society. More recently it has had the valuable services of Mr. Elisha Booth, aided by Messrs. Elisha Beardslee, Charles McEwen, Hiram Beardslee, William Curtiss, Dr. Edward M. Beardslee, Miss Wheeler, Page, Curtiss, the Miss Beardslees, and others well known by all.

"Many a sweet psalm and hymn has during the five thousand and two hundred Sabbaths of the one hundred years now closing here sent forth its sweet utterances of penitential joy and excellent praise. Many a time, with help of the flute, clarionet, bugle, and more recently the melodeon, have voices sweet sounded forth 'Old Hundred,' 'Windham,' 'Denmarke,' 'Wells,' 'Mear,' 'China,' 'Delight,' 'Mortality,' 'Majesty,' 'Lenox,' and the anthem, 'See the Purple Banners Flying';—times which, amid all the revolutions and changes and boasted improvements in sacred music, remain unsurpassed in power of musical and devotional effect. While, then, we would have what is good in the new, let us at the same time remember and honor what was, and is, so precious in the old.

"Among the teachers of select and private schools I find reference to Rev. Mr. Rexford, a clergyman, who succeeded him, Legrand Moore Lewis, Samuel Monson, Miss Hannah Howley, Miss Nancy Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Atwell, Miss Lyon Judson, Samuel B. Beardslee, Dr. E. M. Beardslee, Dr. R. Grey, and Miss Wheeler. The elements of knowledge were thoroughly taught in these nurseries of intelligence and good morals. The schools of those days, though far inferior in advantages, were wonderfully effective.

"To the close of the last century, and somewhat into this, there were but few if any four-wheeled vehicles. Journeying and passing to and fro was performed on the saddle,—side-saddle and pillion,—on horseback or on foot, or on the ox-sled and cart.

"Then the conveniences for warming school-houses and churches as now enjoyed were unknown, the only stove being the small hand foot-stove, some of which, as curiosities, still exist in our midst. Not long since, a stranger here inquired of a friend, 'What is that square tin thing in a frame that woman carries about in church?'

"Then there were but few roads and bridges and means of communication by travel or by letter. The celebrated Judge Swift, of this State, then a member of Congress in Philadelphia, in his anxiety to hear from home by mail, the time being some three weeks, said, in a note to my father, that the best idea he ever had of eternity was given him while waiting for the mail.

"Then friends comparatively near by each other were far apart, and a few miles from a river or shore settlement was like being in the distant wilderness or on or beyond the Rocky Mountains.

"Well do I remember, quite within this century, when thoughts of the wilderness West, as in Central or Western New York and Ohio, were full of dread and alarm. Then a song, the chorus of which, as I remember it,—

"We'll travel through the wild wood,
We'll hunt the buffalo,
And we'll camp on the banks Of the pleasant Ohio,"— seemed like an utterance of the ages to come.

"No less distinctly do I remember the first four-wheeled, one-horse wagon seen in Bridgeport. It was quite small,—not so high as the wheels,—say in 1815. It attracted as much attention as a locomotive has more recently. It was thought a wonder that the fore and hind wheels would run in the same track, and that it could be turned about without taking it to pieces. That wagon was owned by Capt. George Hoyt, the then cashier of the Bridgeport Bank. It was brought, I believe, from somewhere in the county near here."

ST. PETER'S CHURCH.

At the beginning of the present century the parish of New Stratford (now Monroe) was incorporated with the town of Ripton (now Huntington), and for a long time these two organizations were substantially one, having the same rector and a united interest. The earliest accounts of this parish are therefore much scattered and necessarily few, many of the records being in the adjoining town and mingled with other statistics, and later ones imperfectly kept or not kept at all.

We have no means of knowing who composed the families and members of this church at its organization, and the first real intimation of its existence as a parish dates at the commencement of this present century. In an old number of the Churchman's Magazine, under date of September, 1807, we find a published account of the consecration of this church.

It seems, from the account given, that Bishop Jarvis and a number of his presbyters, on the 16th of September, 1807, assembled in Bridgeport, where he consecrated the Episcopal church there by the name of St. John's. On the day following, the 17th, the bishop proceeded to the church in Trumbull, and administered the rite of confirmation to forty-one persons. "On the 18th the Episcopal church at New Stratford (Monroe) was consecrated by the bishop, and named St. Peter's church. Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Burhans, and an appropriate sermon was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Baldwin. At this church the rite of confirmation was administered to thirty-six persons." After its consecration it continued for many years in connection with the church at Ripton, the same rector officiating in both places. Five years after the consecration of this church we find, from Bishop Jarvis' address in June, 1812, that "Mr. Rayner has been regularly dismissed from the church in Hartford, and hath been chosen rector of the parish in the town of Huntington."

The first parochial report of these two parishes found in print is in 1815, when Mr. Rayner reported for the two parishes one hundred and fifty families and only seventy-two communicants. Five years later, in 1820, the number of communicants in the two parishes amounted to about one hundred, and in 1825 the same number is still given.

In 1827, Bishop Brownell says in his convention address, "The Rev. Mr. Rayner having made an arrangement with the parish of Huntington for a dissolution of his pastoral connection with that parish, I have given my consent to the same, and the parish of Huntington is now vacant."† From these data it will appear that Mr. Rayner held the rectorship of the two parishes about fifteen years,—from 1811 to 1826. For a short time he remained rector of this parish alone, but from 1827 to 1829 no mention is made of the parish of Monroe in the conventional reports.

In the report for 1829 it is stated that Mr. Rossiter had taken charge of this parish in connection with Trumbull, and in his report for 1830 he gives the number of communicants as thirty-two, and in 1832 as fifty-one. From 1834 to 1838 we find that the Rev. Mr. Rossiter had charge also of St. James' Church, Newtown, in addition to his charge of Monroe; but from 1838 to his decease, in 1846,—a period of eight years,—he ministered in this parish alone. The holding of full services in this parish, with the exception of a short period by Mr. Rayner in 1827, commences with 1838. Mr. Rossiter's whole rectorship here, including his connection with the parishes of Trumbull and Zoar, extends from 1829 to 1846,—a period of seventeen years. He died November 25th, and was buried Nov. 26, 1846 (Thanksgiving Day), aged fifty-nine years, eleven months, and seven days.

Mr. Rossiter was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Betts, who remained in charge of the parish three years. During his rectorship the chancel arrangements were altered and a silver communion-service purchased at a cost of ninety-eight dollars. About the same time the font was presented to the church by the late Mrs. Rossiter, the expense of which was thirty-five dollars, and about the same time the chandeliers are reported as a gift of Mr. George Lewis. These little items are here mentioned to show that a commendable spirit of improvement and interest was manifest under his rectorship.

The Rev. Mr. Betts was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Holliman, who was rector just three years, taking charge of the parish at Easter, 1850, and resigning it Easter, 1853. He was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Godfrey, who was rector one year.

At the convention for 1855 the Rev. Mr. Judd is reported as officiating in Monroe, which he continued to do till 1858, when the Rev. Seth Davis assumed the charge, which he held until death released him. It was during the incumbency of the latter (1859) that great improvements were made in this church, by the addition of a recess, chancel, and by other renovations which the church required.

Mr. Davis died in Monroe, July 6, 1862, aged sixty years, and was succeeded by Rev. James Edward Coley, who remained until Sept. 5, 1877. Since that time the church has had no settled rector. Services are now held by Rev. Silas B. Duffield, as a supply, this being his third year.

† Convention Report for 1827.

The present officers of the church are as follows: Wardens, F. W. Wheeler and Samuel S. Hurd; Vestrymen, Orville B. Sherwood, William A. Clark, Hobart E. Beardsley, Benjamin S. Hurd, Homer E. Clarke, William B. Beardsley, Agur Beardsley, Samuel G. Huntington, Henry W. Edwards, Walter Beardsley, Charles Staples, Martin J. Mullett, and Frank Beardsley.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, STEPNEY.

Previous to the erection of the present house of worship there was a class in Lower Stepney, which was formed by Burton Beach, who then resided at Daniel's Farms, and led the class some time after its formation. He subsequently became a member of the New York Conference, and is still a highly-esteemed superannuated member.

Lewis Penfield afterwards took charge of the class, which position (as leader) he held for many years; and he became the chief promoter of Methodism in Stepney, he and his brothers, Andrew and William, bearing for some time the principal financial burdens of the church, and they were active in its spiritual prosperity.

At the time of its formation the class at Lower Stepney was connected with the Daniel's Farms church, the preacher from that church frequently holding services in the school-house and in a building owned and fitted up by the Pennfields.

The erection of a church being contemplated, on the 28th of November, 1836, on the application of Lewis Penfield and others, Ira Ferriz, preacher in charge, appointed the following persons trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Stepney: Lewis Penfield, Abram S. Johnson, Elam Beard, Albert Johnson, and William Pennfield. Lewis Edwards, Esq., donated the ground on which to erect the church.

An unoccupied barn belonging to the Pennfield brothers, in Lower Stepney, was used as a shop, in which were prepared all the building materials for the church, but it was all consumed by fire. The Pennfield brothers, upon whom the loss mainly fell, commenced again the erection of the church, which was dedicated in July, 1839. Rev. Geo. Coles preached the dedication sermon; Nathaniel Mead was the preacher in charge.

The church, since its formation, has been blessed with not a few gracious revival seasons. Under the labors of Rev. Mr. Mead, during the winter following the dedication of the church, there was a great revival, which resulted in a large accession to the membership. In 1842, during the first pastorate of Rev. Mr. Stebbens, a revival occurred at Cutler's Farms, resulting in a large ingathering. During the pastorate of Rev. H. N. Mead, of 1855-56, there was a large accession. Mr. Mead was assisted in the revival work by Rev. Elbert Osborn. There were also revivals under Rev. Mr. Lovejoy in 1865, and Rev. Mr. Laine in 1869; while more or less revival influence has attended the labors of all the pastors.

In 1856 the parsonage was purchased, during the pastorate of Rev. L. D. Nickerson, and in 1873, under the pastorate of Rev. D. Osborn, quite extensive repairs were made.

In 1870, under the administration of Rev. D. Nash, the church edifice was repaired and very much improved. The church property now consists of a pleasant and commodious house of worship and a neat and comfortable parsonage, both free from debt.

MINERAL DEPOSIT.

The following reference to the mineral deposit in Monroe is from Barbor's "Historical Collections":

"Monroe is much celebrated for its extensive deposit of minerals. More than fifteen years since, a shaft was sunk a few feet on the farm of Mr. Ephraim Lane. This revealed a rich variety of interesting mineral substances. Among them were tungsten, tellurium, native bismuth, native silver, magnetic and common iron pyrites, copper pyrites, galena, blende, tourmaline, etc. It is greatly to be desired that this locality should be further explored. Four miles south of this spot is a vein of fluor spar about two feet in width.

"The vein is much penetrated by quartz, mica, feldspar, and talc, but it has been hitherto examined only on the surface. It is principally massive, and its structure foliated or coarsely granular, but it presents well-defined cubical crystals. Its colors vary from white to deep violet and purple, and are principally various shades of the two latter. But the most interesting circumstance relating to it is its splendid phosphorescence. The light emitted when it is thrown in a dark place upon a hot shovel is the purest emerald green; pieces of an inch in diameter become in a few seconds fully illuminated, and the light is so strong and enduring that when carried into a room lighted by candles or by diffuse (not direct) light of the sun, they still continue distinctly luminous, and the light dies away very gradually as the mineral cools.

"Mr. Lane has also discovered on his land a locality of beryls, some of which are very large. Native sulphur has been found near the surface of the earth."

CIVIL HISTORY.

The first town-meeting was held June 16, 1823, when the following officers were elected: Capt. Levi Edwards was moderator; Selectmen, Daniel B. Hubbell, Samuel Beardsley, and August Lewis; Town Clerk, Samuel Wheeler; Treasurer, August Lewis; Constables, Fred. Nichols, Asa B. Beardsley, Alonzo Chapman, Wm. Beach, and Roswell Wells; Grand Jurors, Wm. Richards and Geo. L. Sherman; Tythingmen, Nathan Sherman, James Clark, Abel Hawley, A. Sherman, and Henry Lane; Haywards, Benj. M. French and Andrew Judson; Sealer of Weights and Measures, John Curtis.

"Voted, That Abel Babbitt's pound be a lawful pound, and that the same Abel be Key Keeper of the same."

"Voted, That Philip Nichols's yard be a lawful pound, and that Philip Nichols be Key keeper."

"Voted, That Ephraim Sherwood's yard be a lawful pound, and that said Ephraim be Key Keeper."

"Voted, That swine be allowed to go at large on the common with a good and sufficient ring in the centre of their nose."

CHARLES B. WHEELER,

son of Eli and Cynthia (Banks) Wheeler, was born in the town of Easton (formerly Weston), Fairfield Co., Conn., April 11, 1821. His father was a farmer in Easton, married Cynthia Banks, and had a family of seven children, of whom Charles B. is the third. He died at the age of fifty years.

Charles B. remained at home, working at farming summers and attending the common school winters, until he was sixteen years of age, when he commenced to learn the boot-and-shoe business, which he has followed more or less ever since. In 1851 he began to manufacture for himself, and during our great civil war manufactured boots and shoes for the United States army, and had in his employ about seventy-five men. He is still engaged in the boot-and-shoe trade.

In politics he is an uncompromising Republican, and as such is the leader of his party in his town. He has twice been a member of the State Legislature, being the first Republican representative ever elected in Monroe, one term of which he was chairman of the committee on federal relations. In 1879 he was selected by the Legislature to be a commissioner of Fairfield County for the three years ensuing. He has been a selectman of Monroe, collector of the town taxes for twelve years, commissioner by appointment by the Supreme Court, chairman of the Republican committee of the town for a number of years, besides other town offices. He was a candidate for the State Senate in 1872, and though defeated he ran far ahead of his ticket in many towns. He is a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has held various offices therein. He married Parmelia, daughter of Elam Beard, Nov. 19, 1851, and at the present time is living in Upper Stepmey, town of Monroe, where he settled Sept. 5, 1850.

The Wheeler family is one of the oldest in this part of the county, having settled in Fairfield County with the first colonists. The mother of Mr. Wheeler is still living, and is in good health, at the advanced age of eighty-six years. She resides with her son Ezra B.

FREDERICK W. WHEELER.

Intimately connected with the early settlement and development of Fairfield Co., Conn., may be found the name of Wheeler, from whom have descended some of the best citizens of the county or State.

Frederick W. Wheeler is the only son of Chauncey Wheeler and Laura J. Lum, and was born in the town of Monroe, Conn., in August, 1841, at the "old homestead," which has been in the family for five generations. "His great-grandfather was named Joseph Wheeler, his grandfather William Wheeler, and his father Chauncey (who died April 29, 1880, aged seventy-six), all of whom were industrious men and good citizens, and left the best of legacies, 'a good name.'"

His advantages for an education were such as the common schools of his town afforded, which he diligently improved. At an early age he engaged in business, dealing in horses and cattle, which, added to farming, constitutes his chief business at present. He is one of the leading agriculturists in the town, and his judgment is often sought in matters of business.

Very early in life Mr. Wheeler took an active part in political matters, being both by choice and inheritance a Jeffersonian Democrat. He was elected in 1866 to the office of selectman, and continued in that position for five consecutive years. In 1872 he was elected town clerk, and held that position until 1879.

In 1874 he was chosen to represent his town in the State Legislature, where, by his genial disposition, rare integrity of character, and sound judgment, he made many warm friends.

He is a member of St. Peter's Episcopal Church of Monroe, and has been warden for several years.

In 1861 he married Estelle R. Brewster, a lineal descendant of the "Mayflower" pilgrim, and five children are the fruit of this happy union.

DR. E. M. BEARDSLEY, only son of Samuel B. and Abigail McEwen, was born in Danbury, Conn., March 5, 1823. He is a lineal descendant of Samuel Beardsley, who was born at Stratford, Conn., June 20, 1718. He was a farmer in Stratford. He married Anna French. They had a large family of sons and one daughter. He died June 20, 1790.

One of his sons was named Samuel, who was born in Monroe, Conn., May 14, 1760. Like his father, he was a farmer. He married Phebe, daughter of Silas Curtis. She was born Jan. 19, 1767, and died in 1857. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and was several times a representative to the State Legislature. He was magistrate and selectman of his town for a great many years. He and his wife were esteemed members of the Congregational Church of Monroe. He died July 20, 1836, aged seventy-six years. They had six children, viz.,—Silas C., Elisha, Agur, Samuel B., Nancy, and Maria. Silas C. was a farmer, and died at seventy-six. Elisha was a farmer, and died at seventy-eight. Agur was a farmer in Monroe, and died at eighty-one.

Samuel B., the father of Dr. Edward M., was born in Monroe, Jan. 22, 1795, graduated from Yale College in 1815, and followed the noble profession of teaching for more than forty-seven years. He taught at Snow Hill, Md., from 1815 to 1819, then in Bridgeport for many years; then he went to Danbury, Conn., and taught several years, then returned to Monroe and taught a select school until 1861. He was a very successful teacher, as hundreds of his pupils will attest. He was, as his fathers before him, a Jeffersonian Democrat until the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, when he became a staunch Whig, and later a Republican. He married Abigail, daughter of Lemuel McEwen, Feb. 20, 1819.

They have two children,—viz., Edward M. and Elma A., who married John G. Stevens, now of Monroe, Conn.

Mrs. Beardsley was born in Monroe, formerly New Stratford, Feb. 27, 1798. She is still hale and hearty and living with her son Edward M. Samuel B. died Sept. 17, 1873.

Dr. E. M. Beardsley was educated by his father, and graduated from the Yale Medical College in 1844. During the time he was getting his education he was an assistant teacher to his father, and in that capacity made many warm friends. Soon after his graduation he was engaged in the drug business for some two and a half years in New Haven, when he returned to Monroe and followed the profession of teaching and the practice of medicine until 1861, since which time he has devoted himself to his profession. His practice has been very extensive, reaching far into the adjoining towns, and many are the families in Monroe and elsewhere that look to him with gratitude for his wise and timely aid.

Of late he has retired from the active duties of his profession and devotes himself to agriculture. In politics he has always been a staunch Republican, but has never taken an active part in politics. In the fall of 1879 he was elected by the Republicans of his town to the State Legislature. He served as a member of the committee on foreign relations. He married Elizabeth A., daughter of David O. Gray, of Monroe, April 22, 1855. They have seven children,—viz., Samuel B., Edward G., Charles M., Sarah A., Louis B., Elizabeth A., and Mary L.

JAMES C. JOHNSON.

The subject of this sketch is the only son and eldest child of Albert and Mary L. (Wheeler) Johnson, and was born in the town of Newtown, Fairfield Co., Conn., Dec. 8, 1833. His father was a son of Joseph W. Johnson, and was born in Newtown, Conn., March, 1798, and died at his residence in the town of Monroe, Fairfield Co., Conn., on the 14th of February, 1871. He was a farmer and cooper by trade, a man universally respected by those who knew him. In politics a Democrat, and in religion he and his wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Mary L. Wheeler, and to them were born three children,—viz., James C., Mary J., and Huldah F. Mrs. Johnson still resides on the "old homestead" with her daughter, Mrs. Huldah F. Edwards.

James C. Johnson was reared on the farm, and early learned those principles which have been the chief characteristics of his life. His advantages for an education were confined to the common schools of his town, except a few terms spent at an academy. During the time spent in obtaining his education he worked on the farm and in his father's cooper-shop summers, and went to school winters. He taught school two winters, and now recalls with pleasure the time thus spent.

On the 26th of September, 1855, he married Marietta C., daughter of Miles and Eloisa Beardsley, of Trumbull, Conn. She was born in Trumbull, Conn., June 8, 1834. They have four children,—viz., Miles B., Mary E., Seymour J., and Merwin W.

Mr. Johnson purchased his present farm of one hundred and thirty acres in 1856, built his house in the summer of 1857, and in September of that year settled where he has continued to reside, and where his children have been born. He has made nearly all the improvements on his farm, and is to-day regarded one of the best men and farmers in this town. He is a man well proportioned, about six feet in height, and will weigh about two hundred pounds. He possesses great force of character and a vast amount of energy. Physically he has not his superior in the town, and probably no man of his years in the town or county has done more hard manual labor. He enjoys the respect and confidence of his fellow-townsmen, and he is generally regarded one of the leading men in the town. He is one of the leading Democrats of his town, and as such has been constable, magistrate, assessor, and a member of the State Legislature in 1871. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson are members of the Congregational Church of Monroe Centre, and he is one of the liberal supporters of the same. Very little is known of his early ancestors in this country, but it is well known that President Andrew Johnson and Hon. Jas. E. Johnson are descendants of the same Johnson in this country.

CHAPTER XLII.

NEW CANAAN.

THE FIRST SETTLEMENTS.—THE OLD PARISH.

Geographical—Topographical—The First Settlements—Organization of "Canaan Parish"—The Pioneers—The First Meeting-House—The Primitive Dwelling—Revolutionary Incident—"Ye Old Training-Days"—Slavery—The Whipping-Post and Stocks—Pioneer Merchants—Early Physicians—Industrial Pursuits—Boot and Shoe Manufacturing, &c.

THE settlement of New Canaan was doubtless commenced soon after the year 1700 by inhabitants of Stamford and Norwalk, and the names of the adventurous settlers may be found in the history of those towns elsewhere in this work, as it formed a portion of the old parishes until its incorporation, in 1731.

New Canaan is first noticed in the Stamford records as a distinct parish Dec. 8, 1730, when John Bouton and others ask liberty of moving out of town to join with a part of Norwalk in order to be a society. The permission, however, was not granted; yet in the following year, under date December 14th, Ebenezer Seeley and Nathaniel Bouton are appointed tythingmen for the new society. In the following year, 1702, Ebenezer Seeley and John Bouton are chosen tythingmen for "Canaan Parish."

At a town-meeting in Stamford, held Dec. 27, 1733, it was voted that "the town agree that there shall be a committee chosen to agree with those men that have land lying where it may be thought needful for a highway for the convenience of Canaan parish to go to meeting, and to lay it out where they think it may be most convenient."

The first meeting of the New Canaan society was held July 1, 1731, with John Bouton moderator and John Betts, Sr., clerk. The following is a list of the Stamford settlers in New Canaan as appear in 1732: John, Nathaniel, Daniel, Eleazer, and John Bouton, Jr., John Davenport, John Finch, Nathaniel Green, James Hoyt, Job Hoyt, Joshua Hoyt, Eliphalet Slason, Eliphalet and Ebenezer Seeley, Thos. Talmadge, David Stevens, and David Waterbury.

The late Prof. Samuel St. John says,—

"The next year there were forty-seven members,—thirty on the Norwalk and seven-teen on the Stamford side. The first question discussed by them was the expediency of building a meeting-house for the public worship of God. Decided in the affirmative, twenty-four to one. They were unable to agree upon the place where the building should be erected, and they appointed a suitable person to represent them in the General Court to be held in October, to request the Hon. Assembly to appoint a committee to fix a place for the house. It was decided that the house should be built at the lower end of Haines' Ridge, the house to be thirty feet square and of a height suitable for one tier of galleries. A building committee was appointed, who were either to let out the work 'by the great' or hire men by the day. They levied a tax of ten pence on the pound in the list. Then follows a list of members, with their assessments. In February, 1732, they appointed a committee to make application to the reverend elders of the county for advice and direction in order to the calling and settlement of a minister. They were directed to Rev. John Eells, of Milford, who preached among them nine months on probation, and in June, 1733, was settled among them as their minister, residing on Clapboard Hills. After this time the society's meetings were devoted to such business as devolves upon it at the present day, with several items which are now managed by the town, such as taking charge of the schools, laying out highways, &c. Their meetings were commonly warned to be held at 'sun two hours high at night.' Clocks and watches were probably not common, and we find an appropriation of two shillings nine pence to buy an hour-glass.

"At this time all inhabitants of the parish were members, and were taxed for its support; it is not strange that some should have been restive and sought relief. One member petitioned the Legislature to that effect, but met there a committee from the society, who successfully opposed the petition. They assessed themselves as high as nineteen pence on the pound, and collected it by 'stess' if necessary.

"The building of the meeting-house was a severe draught on their slender resources. As the expenses of the society were defrayed by tax, the seats were common property, but the society was accustomed to 'seat the meeting-house,' as it was termed, according to 'rate and dignity.' By vote, they gave Rev. Mr. Eells the seat next to the pulpit, on the women's side. Similar seatings of the meeting-house appear in the records of Stamford and Norwalk. It was the custom to appoint some person to 'set the psalm."

SINGING BY RULE.

"In 1739 they voted to 'sing by rule,' or that which is called the new way in the congregation." Huntington says this change from the old to the new way of singing had been introduced in 1721. The eight or nine tunes brought over by the pioneers 'had become barbarously perverted,' and the Rev. Thomas Walter, of Roxbury, Mass., composer, in that year published 'The Grounds and Rules of Music Explained, or an Introduction to the Art of singing by Note.' The book contained twenty-four tunes harmonized in three parts.

"After six years' 'experience' (as it was termed) with Mr. Eells, some began to be dissatisfied, and in 1740 the society appointed a committee to acquaint Mr. Eells and see if he would give his consent to have a vote tried to see who is easy and who is uneasy with him. The test showed twenty-four uneasy. In 1741, Mr. Eells was dismissed. Tradition assigns to him ability, learning, and piety, together with certain eccentricities deemed inconsistent in a minister of the gospel. He continued to reside here until his death, in 1785.

"The society proceeded promptly to fill his place. The Rev. Robert Silliman was ordained February, 1742.

THE ANCIENT MEETING-HOUSE.

"During his ministry there was such increase in the congregation as to require an addition to the meeting-house eleven feet on each end and twelve feet on the south side. They also built a society-house north of the meeting-house, twenty-one by sixteen feet, with seven-foot posts. This was probably to accommodate those who came to meeting from a distance, and was furnished with a fireplace, where they might spend the time between services, the meeting-house being without any device for heating.

"In 1750 the society resolves to build a new meeting-house, fifty feet by forty, with one tier of galleries and turret (bell-tower). This structure was so far advanced as to be deemed fit for use in 1752, though the galleries were not made until 1787. In 1797 the turret was completed and the first bell obtained, which was to be rung not only on the Sabbath, but also at nine o'clock every evening except Saturday. The new house was built a short distance north of the old one and about one hundred and fifty feet southeast of the present building. For ninety years it was in constant use as a place of worship. Every Sabbath, Thanksgiving, and fast-day its courts were well filled with devout worshippers, and the memory of the old meeting-house will ever be hallowed. It was built in the style quite common in that day, precisely like the one then in Stamford, except that the latter had a spire that rose from the ground. Opening the double doors, on the south side, we entered an area of small square pews, whose floors were elevated about eight inches above the floor of the central portion of the room. This latter was at first filled with slips on each side of the centre or broad aisle leading up to the pulpit. A narrow aisle passed quite around these slips, furnishing access to the pews which occupied the entire walls except where the doors on the east, the south, and the west sides, the stairs leading to the galleries at the corners, and the pulpit at the centre of the north side, occupied the space. The slips in the centre were afterwards (in 1808) converted into square pews. The galleries were deep, filled with square pews along the south wall, and elsewhere with the long slips. The choir was ranged along the front, and sometimes extended nearly the entire length of the galleries, the bass on the west, the treble on the east, and the tenor, or 'counter,' with the leader on the south. The pulpit was a hexagonal structure, placed upon a pillar, about eight feet above the floor, and reached by a flight of stairs; it was neatly finished and painted white. Above it was suspended a canopy or sounding-board, hexagonal in shape, about seven feet above the floor of the pulpit, with a screw at the top of the iron rod supporting it, so that its height might be adjusted to the proper distance for reflection of the sound. The arrangement was indeed stiff and awkward, and was often severely criticised. I remember hearing one clergyman—a man of large size—remark that he would as soon get into a hog's-head and preach from the bung. The deacons' seat was directly beneath the pulpit, access to it being had through the minister's pew.

To resume the history of the parish: When their minister, Mr. Silliman, had served them a quarter of a century, some uneasiness began to manifest itself. A vote in April, 1768, showed forty-six 'easy' and thirty-seven 'uneasy' with him, but not long after they voted, twenty-four to fifteen, that they would employ Mr. Silliman no longer. Mr. Silliman appealed to the General Assembly at Hartford, and the society appeared there by their representative. The Legislature sent a committee to see how peace could be restored, who advised Mr. Silliman to ask for a dismissal, and in June, 1772, he was dismissed.

In the succeeding winter Mr. William Drummond, born and educated in Scotland, was settled as minister. He remained five years, and was succeeded by Rev. Justus Mitchell, who by his scholarship and devotion to his calling and to the cause of education secured the prosperity of the entire community and gave the parish a desirable fame throughout the State. A spirit of toleration manifested itself, and the records show many instances of the release of persons, who preferred other modes of worship, from their responsibilities to this society. The pews were rented to defray expenses and relieve from taxation. Mr. Mitchell died in 1806.

THE PRIMITIVE DWELLINGS.

Among the first houses erected within the present limits of this town were a few rudely-constructed buildings, on what is now known as "Clapboard Hills." Several of the first houses were also built at "Canoe-Hill." Following more closely the western slope of the river, a cluster of houses was built on the upper part of Haines' Ridge, among which were the old residences of Col. Enoch St. John, Elnathan Lockwood, Mr. Moses Comstock, Mr. Uriah Reed, and Mr. Aaron Comstock. Three of these have been demolished and one so remodeled as not to appear like an old house, while one remains essentially unchanged in aspect.

The settlers from Stamford followed similarly the course of the Noroton River, as also, still farther west, that of Mill River. A single style of architecture was almost universal, not only here but throughout New England, in those days. The house was of two stories in front, presenting two eligible chambers, while the rear roof sloped off to the height of seven or eight feet from the ground. A massive stone chimney was in the centre, with its huge fireplace admitting back-logs and fore-sticks four feet long, and still furnishing warming-room within its jaws for all the children. Here was the ponderous crane with its assortment of trammels of varying lengths for pots and kettles, the iron andirons, tongs, and peel with its handle four feet long, terminating in a large hemispherical knob (this was used for cleaning out the coals from the brick oven, which occupied a part of the deep recesses of the old chimney), the spider, the skillet, the griddle,—all over the open fire. No prosaic, economical cooking-stove or range had yet made its appearance.

The rooms of these old-time houses were ranged around the chimney,—the keeping-room and parlor, on either side in front, the latter with its beaufet displaying the glittering pewter plates and platters and a slender assortment of china cups and saucers; the kitchen in the rear, with bed-rooms on either side; the hall in front, with winding stairs leading to chambers above. These all communicated by doors, so that on festal occasions, in families moulded not according to the strictest sect of the Puritans, this arrangement furnished ample scope for merry games and dancing.

INCIDENT OF THE REVOLUTION.

The following incident was related to the late Dr. Edwin Hall, of Norwalk, by Miss Phebe Comstock, who lived at Canoe Hill during the Revolution. She used to go over to her uncle's and climb an apple-tree from which Norwalk could be seen distinctly. Went to meeting at New Canaan. In cases of alarm, which was given by firing three guns in succession, the men left all and hastened to the parade. Such alarms often came. Her father would run in and say, "Now, girls, unyoke the oxen and turn them out," and in less than five minutes would be off to the parade. They used to carry their guns to meeting; no more thought of going to meeting then without their guns than we do now without our psalm-books. "They never had an alarm without repairing to the parade; and they did not go slow, neither." The alarm at the burning of Norwalk came about daybreak. Went to the apple-tree; saw the flames; heard the guns. Her father and four brothers were engaged in the defense; the "dreadfullest day she ever saw;" the guns kept firing a long time; "a dreadful fight." She saw the "red-coats" take up several of their dead or wounded and carry them to their boats; saw the steeple of the meeting-house fall in.

TRAINING DAYS.

The first Mondays of May and September were by statute training-days, and every able-bodied man of a certain age was required to appear for inspection and drill. At ten o'clock they assembled on the "parade-ground," which was an open field given to the town for this purpose. The commanding officer sent his compliments to the minister, with a request that he would favor them with his presence, which he did, and opened the exercises with prayer. Soon after they adjourned for dinner. There were two companies,—one uniformed, called the grenadiers, the other the militia. The music was fife and drum, and when, after wondrous evolutions, they marched down the ridge to the meeting-house hill, the martial ardor of the boys was at boiling-point.

The Thanksgivings were much like those of the present day, except that the house of God was well filled and the Thanksgiving anthem fell upon enchanted ears. The public exercises began with the reading of the Governor's proclamation. (It had been read two successive Sundays before.) It was an awe-inspiring document, especially as it closed with the ominous injunction, "All servile labor and vain recreation are on said day by law forbidden." After the service the reunited families gathered round tables loaded with a bewildering multiplicity of dishes, among which roast turkey and pumpkin-pie held their long-established pre-eminence. There, amid representatives of three or perhaps four generations, this family festival held high carnival. Long may it keep its power to recall the sons and daughters of New England to the old homesteads.

SLAVERY.

Many of the early families were owners of slaves, and when the Emancipation Act was passed by the State, only those born after a certain date were exempted, leaving the others still under the ban of this hated bondage.

THE WHIPPING-POST AND STOCKS.

This evidence of civilization stood at the angle of the road, southeast of the Congregational church, and here the strong arm of the law administered the requisite number of lashes to the luckless wight who chanced to fall a victim to its degrading punishment.

EARLY MERCHANTS.

One of the earliest merchants was Samuel St. John, in a building which stood near the Congregational church. Other early tradesmen were Nathan Seeley, Husted & Hoyt, Nash & Hoyt, Raymond & Comstock, etc.

PHYSICIANS.

Among the pioneer physicians were Daniel Bouton, Joseph Silliman, S. S. Noyes, and Lewis Richards. The latter was in active practice about fifty years, and Dr. Noyes about sixty years, when he died at an advanced age. The present physicians are Theodore Roberts and W. G. Brownson (homeopaths).

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

"The occupations of the early inhabitants of New Canaan were purely agricultural, with artisans enough barely to supply their own wants. The tailors and mantuamakers, and even shoemakers, were accustomed to circulate through the town semi-annually, making up the requisite wardrobes of the families. The farmers were exceedingly patient, hard-working men; their farms required clearing not only of trees and bushes, but of the numerous stones which in this diluvial soil almost covered the face of the earth. To dispose of these stones, they built walls inclosing small fields. They raised wheat (until the Hessian fly destroyed that crop), rye, corn, oats, and potatoes. Timothy or herd-grass was introduced at a comparatively late period. Their hay consisted of the harsh, low meadow-grass and the natural grasses of the uplands near their barns. The great problem with them was, how to winter their stock. They supplemented their tender supply of hay with cornstalks and husks and oat-straw. Their stock in the spring were emaciated, and many of them died of "horn distemper," which generally meant starvation. The old wooden plow was a rough, heavy, clumsy instrument, and I remember hearing discussions among the workmen on the probability of the introduction of an iron plow which was then in use in the West of that day,—that is, Central and Western New York. I rejoice in having lived to see the toils of the husbandman relieved by the steel plow, the tooth-harrow, the horse-rake, the mower and reaper, and other machines which not only lighten labor, but make it more efficient. Nor will we forget the spinning-jennies, power-looms, and sewing-machines which relieve the women of the present day from that incessant hard labor which in the case of their grandmothers, together with the inevitable care of the household, crushed their physical energies and suppressed every rising aspiration for intellectual and aesthetic culture. Let the spinning-wheels, large and small, go to grace the elegant parlors of New York—and I would that they were gifted with speech!—to portray the scenes of unrepining toil enacted at their sides in days gone by; and perhaps gentlemen might profit by a plow or flail of the olden time in their offices."

BOOT- AND SHOE-MANUFACTURING.

But there came a time when the enterprise of New Canaan was turned in the direction of manufacturing boots and shoes. The town was dotted over with little shops and ranked among the foremost in that manufacture. "Niles' Register," giving an account of the town in 1818, states that fifty thousand pairs of boots and shoes were annually sent out.

The following are now engaged in this business: Benedict & Co., J. F. Bliss & Co., George Lockwood, J. & T. W. Benedict, H. A. Pimney, W. G. Webb & Co.

Benedict & Co.—This firm is a successor of Benedict, Hall & Co., and has a reputation second to none in the country for the manufacture of a good quality of goods.

J. & T. W. Benedict.—The business of which this firm are the lineal successors was commenced in about the year 1779 or 1780 by James Benedict, in a small way in a shop attached to his dwelling.

There, with a number of apprentices, he made shoes for the New York market. In those days there were only about four different styles made, whereas now it would be impossible for any one to find out the number. James Benedict was in course of time succeeded by his son, Caleb Benedict, who in turn was followed by his son, C. S. Benedict, who in turn was followed by his sons, the present firm of J. & T. W. Benedict. This is a representative institution of the town.

Prominent among the obsolete concerns was that of Ebenezer Ayres, who was a large manufacturer in 1825, and was finally succeeded by his son, Hebron L.

Jared and Amos Ayres, brothers of Ebenezer, were also early manufacturers.

CLOTHING MANUFACTURERS.

H. B. Rogers & Co.—This business was established about twenty years ago in a small way, in connection with a country store, by Comstock, Rogers & Co., and was continued by that firm until within a few years, when it passed into the hands of the present firm. This is a large establishment, and justly merits its present success.

George Lockwood commenced business in about 1840. The firms of J. F. Bliss & Co. (J. F. Bliss, Stephen Bishop, James Fairty), William G. Webb & Co., and H. A. Finney, although not among the oldest established in New Canaan, are mostly representatives of the shoe-manufacturing business.

THE NEW CANAAN NURSERIES.

The New Canaan Nurseries were established in 1848 by Stephen Hoyt, of New Canaan, and D. C. Scofield, of New York. In 1856, Stephen Hoyt bought out D. C. Scofield. He then took his two sons, James and Edwin, into the business, and increased the business until over one hundred acres were covered with nursery stock. This nursery is, and has been for many years, the largest in New England, and, in fact, east of Syracuse, N. Y.

The nursery has no specialties, but grows a general assortment of fruit, forest, and ornamental trees. The plantings for a few years past have been about one hundred thousand apple-trees, ten thousand to fifteen thousand cherry-trees, twenty thousand pear-trees, one hundred thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand peach-trees, one hundred thousand, or over, currants, and strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, etc., in large quantities, while forest- and evergreen-trees have claimed a large place. The nursery at present embraces three hundred and fifty acres, and is rapidly increasing.

The senior partner, Stephen Hoyt, died in 1879, aged seventy-nine years, and the business has since been conducted by his sons, James and Edwin. Their sales extend over New England and many of the Southern and Western States.

As stated above, this is a representative institution of its kind in the United States, and much credit is due its enterprising progenitors and those through whose industry and perseverance it has secured its present enviable reputation.

ECCLESIASTICAL AND EDUCATIONAL.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

As the history of the parish was really a history of the Congregational Church up to the time the parish was incorporated as a town, and as that history has been thoroughly detailed on previous pages, the church narrative will be continued from that time (1801).

Upon the organization of the parish the society henceforth devoted itself solely to the care of the temporal affairs of the church. The pastors from Mr. Mitchell have been as follows: Rev. William Bonney, 1808-31; Rev. Theophilus Smith, 1831 until his death, in 1853; Rev. Frederick G. Williams, 1854-59; Rev. Ralph Smith, 1860-63; Rev. Benjamin L. Swan, 1864-66; Rev. Joseph Greenleaf settled in 1871, and is the present incumbent of the pastoral office. The present church edifice was erected during the ministry of Mr. Smith, and was dedicated in 1843.

ST. MARK'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The first Episcopal church building erected within the present bounds of New Canaan was raised May 13, 1762, on land obtained from Mr. Husted, about three-quarters of a mile northwest from the present church edifice. Says the late Professor Samuel St. John,—

"There had been a discussion respecting its location on or adjoining the parade-ground. The building was soon rendered fit for use, but was not completed for many years, and for that reason, probably, was never consecrated. At this time the church-people here were accustomed to attend service at Norwalk and Stamford, and the rates which were collected of churchmen in this parish were paid over to the rectors of those churches. In 1791 they organized themselves into a distinct parish. From that time there have been regular records kept. The first wardens were Stephen Betts and Dunlap Coggsball, and there were thirty-four heads of families who considered themselves as belonging to the church and contributed to its support. Services were held about one-fifth of the Sabbaths, but the church languished until the project was conceived and executed of building a new church edifice nearer the village. The lot whereon the present building stands was purchased of Mr. Richard Fay-erweather. The building committee were Samuel Raymond, Edward Nash, David S. Knight. The building was finished and consecrated May 6, 1834; the old one had been taken down the year before.

"At this time the Rev. Charles Todd was rector, dividing his time equally between this church and the one in Ridgefield. He resigned his charge in 1835, and was followed by Rev. Jacob L. Clark, who also had the care of both churches. After his resignation, in 1837, Rev. David Ogden was called to give his undivided attention to this church. In 1842 ill health compelled him to give up his parish, and he died in 1845. The succeeding rectors were Rev. William Everett, 1845-46; Rev. Dr. Short, 1846-52; Rev. William Long, 1852-55; Rev. William H. Williams, 1855-58; Rev. William Cook, 1858-63; Rev. William A. Des Brisay, 1864-71; Rev. Isaac W. Hallam, pastor, 1875-79. Rev. T. B. Fogg became rector in 1873, and is the present incumbent.

"The church edifice was remodeled and the spire erected during the pastorate of Rev. William H. Williams, and reopened May, 1858. In the winter of 1873-74 the interior was frescoed and two windows placed in the chancel. The Sunday-school was organized in 1853, under the superintendence of Miss Esther Betts.*

THE METHODIST CHURCH.

The first Methodist society established in this part of the county was at Dantown, in 1787, by Rev. Samuel Q. Talbot. It is believed that this was the first Methodist society organized in New England. Among the first members of this ancient church were Samuel Dunn and Rhuama, his wife, 1787; Sarah Selleck and Hannah De Forest, 1787; John Slawson, Rhoda Slawson, Enoch Stevens, and Rhuama Bishop, 1799; Betsey Jones, Susanna Fancher, Anna Ruseo, John and Rebecca Hanford, Benjamin and Nancy Seeley, Sarah Jones, Polly Stevens, Thirza Potts, Dorcas Coe, 1809; Millicent Raymond, 1810; Seth and Nancy Olmstead, 1812; Nancy Avery, Agnita Dunn, Nathaniel Dunn, 1814; Anna Slawson, Ruth Dunn, Sanford Dunn, Betsey Dunn, Harriet Stevens, 1819; Isaac and Lois Jones, John and Sarah Seeley, Isaac Potts, Sanford and Betsey Selleck, John D. and Betsey Slawson, Betsey Brown, Abigail Pennoyer, Caroline Monroe, Samuel and Nancy Selleck, Mary Dunn, Catharine Jones, Martha Hoyt, Isaac and Nancy Selleck, 1812. A church edifice was erected in 1800.

The first Methodist society in New Canaan was organized in 1808, at Silver Mine, and the following were among the first members: Capt. Ebenezer Crofut, Nathan and Sally Monroe, Abigail Beers, Daniel Betts, Luther Constock, Silas and Hannah Hayes, Abigail Raymond, Delia Dickens, Miles Root, Nehemiah Stevens, May Gromsey, Joseph Fitch, Amos Dickens, Daniel and Esther Chase. The above-named persons were all members of the church prior to 1829.

From 1816 to 1833, New Canaan formed a part of the Stamford circuit, which is the oldest in New England. In October, 1833, the first Methodist house of worship, which is the present town-hall, was dedicated. From 1833 to 1836, New Canaan was united to Norwalk in a circuit under the pastorate of two ministers. These were Rev. Elijah Hibbard, Rev. Abram S. Francis, 1833; Rev. Luther Mead, Rev. Abram S. Francis, 1834; Rev. David Stocking, Rev. John Crawford, 1835. In 1836, New Canaan was set off by itself as a station under the pastorate of a single minister.

This denomination of Christians has made rapid progress, endeavoring faithfully to do the work of a true church of the Lord Jesus Christ. The present house was dedicated Dec. 21, 1854.

The following are the successive pastors of the Methodist Church and their terms of service: Revs. J. Crawford, 1836; Clark Fuller, 1837; S. W. King, 1838-39; J. W. Selleck, 1840-41; Charles F. Pelton, 1842; Jesse Hunt, 1843; James H. Romer, 1844-45; A. H. Ferguson, 1846-47; J. D. Marshall, 1848-49; Jacob Shaw, 1850-51; L. D. Nickerson, 1852-53;

Harvey Husted, 1854-55; Mark Staple, 1856-57; J. L. Gilder, 1858-59; C. B. Ford, 1860-61; A. H. Mead, 1862; William T. Hill, 1863; J. M. Carroll, 1864-66; William F. Collins, 1867; S. M. Hammond, 1867; S. M. Hammond, 1868-70; B. T. Abbott, 1871-73; J. M. Carroll, 1874-76; A. V. R. Abbott, 1877, present incumbent.

THE UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

Universalist preaching began in the town in 1832, Mr. Hillyer, and afterwards Mr. Hitchcock, officiating. They have no separate organization.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Services according to the Roman Catholic forms of worship were first held here in a hall in the village, subsequently in the town-hall. Their church was built in 1863. Clergymen from Norwalk, principally, have officiated at this church. It is at present under the charge of Father Russell, of Norwalk.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

The first person in New Canaan professing faith in Christ through baptism by immersion was baptized by Rev. John Gano, of New York City, in the year 1772. Soon after, as Elder Gano was baptizing in Stamford, where a Baptist Church was organized in 1773, Baptist meetings were held in New Canaan, and have been held at varying intervals to the present time. The records of the Canaan parish have several votes exempting Baptists from paying society rates so long as they remain of the persuasion.

Nov. 4, 1871, the First Baptist Society of New Canaan was incorporated. Their house of worship was opened Feb. 6, 1773, the service of recognition being held in that house the 13th day of March following. Their pastor is the Rev. E. M. Ogden.

THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH OF SILVER MINE.*

This church was organized in the year 1837, by Revs. Henderson and Langdon (the latter the colleague of the former), at the house of Mr. Ezekiel Beers. Among the first members were Amos Dickens, Delia Dickens, Hannah Hays, Abby Beers, Sarah A. Beers.

Religious services were held at the house of Ezekiel Beers and at the school-house, under the charge of Revs. Timberman and Wade, Griswold and Lent, and W. H. Johnson until the year 1844, when, under the latter, the society enjoyed a wonderful revival influence, and F. L. Aiken, Lydia B. Aiken, Perry Beers, Sanford Beers, Charles Platt, Michael Harrison and wife, with many others, united, thus greatly increasing their strength numerically.

In the year 1844, Rev. J. L. Smith assumed the pastoral charge, and the society proceeded to build a church. In the month of August of the same year the house was dedicated, the Rev. Zenas Covel officiating, taking for his subject, "The prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple."

The first board of trustees was composed of Amos Dickens, F. L. Aiken, William S. Beers.

Rev. Smith was followed in the pastorate by Rev. Witzel and Joshua Hudson, each retaining it for three years, the time prescribed by discipline. Their successors have been Revs. O. C. Dickerson, R. R. Diossy, — Crossman, J. H. Painter, E. Jones, P. Weaver, G. B. Wray, N. Britton, M. Staple, J. Holden, L. Brown, T. L. Dibble.

Latterly the church has been less uniform as to the length of time she has retained her pastors, owing largely to the change of boundaries of the work of which she has been a part. She has prospered, though subject to so many changes. The pastor for the longest period was Rev. M. Staples, he being continued for seven years in succession.

A few of her first members yet live; others have passed away. At present her membership numbers forty-six. The present officers are: Clerk, J. B. Miller; Trustees, A. P. Beers, Henry Harris, William E. Lane, William Reynolds, F. L. Aiken; Treasurer, F. L. Aiken; Pastor, T. L. Dibble.

There is also a Methodist Episcopal Church at Selleck's Corners, but we have been unable to obtain any data concerning it. Rev. William T. Gilbert was pastor in March, 1879.

EDUCATION—THE NEW CANAAN ACADEMY.

"Among the early settlers of New Canaan were very few men of literary culture. Neither the time nor pecuniary resources had allowed them the advantages of any scholastic training. But the New England fathers and our pioneers were among them, saw that the only way to establish and perpetuate a society which would satisfy their hopes would be by means of a careful, thorough, and general education of their children. The fundamental laws of the colony required, under severe penalties, every town to provide means for the early instruction of their children. The statute reads:

"The selectmen of every town shall have a vigilant eye over their brethren and neighbors to see, first, that none of them shall suffer so much barbarism in any of their families as not to endeavor to teach, by themselves or others, their children and apprentices so much learning as may enable them perfectly to read the English tongue and knowledge of the capital laws, upon a penalty of twenty shillings for each neglect thereon."

"It was still further provided that every town having fifty households in it should forthwith appoint one within the town to teach all such children as shall resort to him to write and read, whose wages shall be paid either by the parents or masters of such children, or by the inhabitants in general. Among the earliest functions discharged by Canaan parish is the appointment of school committees. Where the first school house was built and the school now be continued. It was doubtless, like their first meeting-house, exceedingly plain, with no needless room in it, and no useless expensive adorning. At this day we can have no adequate conception of the extreme difficulty attending these early educational matters, but their influence on succeeding generations has been incalculable. For a more extended education than that furnished by the common or, as it is now termed, district school no provision was made for many years. Rev. Justus Mitchell, who was settled in the ministry here in 1781, kept a select school during a considerable time. Eight young men from New Canaan and a large number from other places were fitted for college with him. Elisha St. John, Esq., who graduated at Yale College in 1791, devoted himself to teaching in the district one on Brushy Ridge, and though the school consisted mainly of young men from New York fitting themselves for business, still some citizens of New Canaan and adjoining towns availed themselves of the advantages of this school.

"The New Canaan Academy was established in 1815, and the building erected in 1816. The teachers were, successively, Rev. Herman Duggett, Rev. James B. Lindsey, Rev. John Smith, Dr. Samuel W. Belden, Rev. Dr. Milton Badger, Rev. Theophilus Smith, Hon. David L. Seymour, President Julian M. Furtervant, Rev. Dr. Flavel Basson, Rev. Dr. Alfred Newton, Rev. John C. Hart, Rev. William B. Lewis, Prof. Ebenezer A. Johnson.

"This academy about 1834 was converted into a private boarding-school, and was owned and taught successively by Messrs. Silas Davenport, David S. Rockwell, and Rev. J. L. Gilder. The academy was revived in 1859, taught by Rev. J. C. Wyckoff for several years, afterwards by Mr. Thomas Pease, and was broken up during the last year of the civil war. Twenty-five persons have graduated at Yale College from this town, a majority of whom would have not enjoyed the privilege of a collegiate education had not the academy enabled them to fit themselves here. Besides these graduates, a much larger number of young men were fitted for business, young ladies also enjoyed in the academy the advantages of a thorough course of study. It ranked second only to the churches in elevating the standard of moral and intellectual culture in the town."

FRIENDSHIP DIVISION, NO. 10, SONS OF TEMPERANCE.

The division was instituted Jan. 8, 1845, by Caleb S. Benedict, Joshua Smallhorn, William G. Webb, Chauncey Foot, Stephen Hoyt, William Watson, Almadurus Brower, Floyd T. Rusco, Timothy E. Raymond, Abram Crissy, Jr., Joseph Bouton, Benjamin Heath, Benjamin Baraclaugh, Stephen Hartford. L. L. Beecher at that time was Grand Worthy Patriarch. Caleb S. Benedict and Stephen Hoyt kept with the division until their deaths, about two years ago. William G. Webb is now a member; Chauncey Foot is now in Wilton. William McKendrick is at present Worthy Patriarch. The present membership is two hundred, and the division is prosperous.

There is also a lodge of Odd-Fellows here, but we have been unable to secure its history.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

The First National Bank of New Canaan was organized in 1865, with Watts Comstock as president, who officiated in that capacity until his death, when Stephen Hoyt was chosen to fill the vacancy. The present president is Russel L. Hall, and the present cashier S. Y. St. John.

THE NEW CANAAN SAVINGS BANK.

This bank was organized in 1859, and Samuel A. Weed was chosen president. He was succeeded by Watts Comstock, Stephen Hoyt, and Henry B. Rogers, the present incumbent.

THE NEW CANAAN MESSENGER.

This paper was established by William W. Gillespie, one of the publishers of the Stamford Advocate, in January, 1877. It was printed in connection with the Advocate, and edited by Frank E. Weed. About a year later Mr. Weed was succeeded by L. M. Monroe. August 9th the paper was purchased by Kirk & Weed, and four weeks later Will W. Kirk became the editor and publisher, and has continued as such to the present time. This is the first paper ever established in New Canaan. It is a lively local sheet, and justly merits its present popularity.

BOARD OF TRADE.

Alive to the interests of the town, the enterprising citizens have during this year (1880) organized a Board of Trade, which will doubtless accomplish much lasting good.

The following were the first officers: President, W. E. Raymond; Vice-President, W. G. Brownson; Secretary, Will W. Kirk; Treasurer, J. F. Silliman; Directors, L. M. Monroe, F. E. Weed, B. P. Mead.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

PROFESSOR SAMUEL ST. JOHN.

Professor Samuel St. John was born in New Canaan, March 29, 1813, and was in his sixty-third year at the time of his death. He graduated at Yale College in the class of 1834. In 1838 he accepted an appointment as professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology in the Western Reserve College, at Hudson, Ohio, in which office he remained until 1851. He was principal of the Cleveland Seminary for young ladies from 1852 to 1856, and during this time was professor of chemistry and medical jurisprudence in the Cleveland Medical College. In 1856 he was appointed professor of chemistry and medical jurisprudence in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City. This position he held until his death.

When appointed to the New York college he made his home in his native village, and continued to take an active interest in all enterprises undertaken for the benefit of the place. He was one of the first and best friends of the New Canaan Railroad. He became president of the company, and to him is greatly due the success of the enterprise. One of his last conspicuous public services was the writing of a "History of New Canaan," which he read at the celebration of the Centennial Fourth of July, and which is an enduring memorial of his interest in New Canaan and its people, as well as of his literary skill.

Professor St. John married, in 1840, Amelia P. C. Curtis, who died December, 1856, in Cleveland, Ohio. Their children were Walter, died in infancy; Eliza C.; Samuel B.; George, died in infancy. Samuel B. was born in 1845. He graduated at Yale College in 1866, at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, in 1870. He was house surgeon of the Bellevue Hospital and Manhattan Eye and Ear Hospital, New York; surgeon of the New York Dispensary, Northwestern Dispensary, New York, and to the Eye and Ear Infirmary, New York; attended the hospitals in Edinburgh, London, Berlin, Vienna, and Paris in 1872 and 1873. He is a member of the New York Ophthalmological and American Ophthalmological Societies (whose rules prohibit the announcement in print of any specialty).

In 1835, Dr. St. John visited Europe in company with Dr. Parker. He went to Europe a second time, and once more in 1873 he visited the Vienna Exposition in company with his son and daughter. He died Sept. 6, 1876.

We cannot, here, give anything like a comprehensive analysis, or pay adequate tribute to the character of one who, for his profound learning, useful life, labors, and noble example of unselfishness and integrity, was an honor not only to New Canaan, but to Connecticut, which has lost many better-known citizens, but none of more solid attainments or more real worth. Very rarely does the loss of a citizen occasion such a deep and heartfelt sorrow, such wide-spread and universal sense of bereavement in any community, as did the death of Professor Samuel St. John in the town of New Canaan. It is another proof that real goodness, real nobility of character, will compel recognition in every class of society, and when such a one is taken away there is no exception to the general sorrow, and the humble, the proud, the poor, the rich, the vulgar, the refined, the reckless, and the thoughtful, all unite, for a time at least, in one common bond of mutual grief. Well is it for those on whom the lesson makes a permanent impression, who are able to grasp the full meaning of such a life, and who resolve to make it a model for their own.

Dr. St. John was loved in New Canaan as few men are loved in any community. A native of the village, he ever regarded New Canaan as his home, no matter how far away circumstances led him in the active labors of his life. New Canaan was the scene of his childhood and youthful memories, and in his riper years, when circumstances permitted, New Canaan was his chosen and permanent home. He was known and beloved by everybody in the town, young and old alike. He was a warm friend of every project having for its object the good of the town, and devoted his time, talents, and means to promote its interests. He was a true patriot, loving his country and her institutions with loyal affection, but his scholarly and philosophical mind, his broad culture “rich with the spoils of time;” and with the results of his own observation, and original research in the domain of science and learning, made him more than willing to keep aloof from active connection with the management of partisan struggles.

In conformity with recommendations of the President's proclamation, that some suitable history be written of each town in the United States during the Centennial year, supplemented by an urgent invitation of a committee of his townsmen, and upon the positive assurance that he would be interfering with the prerogative of no one, he consented to write the “History of New Canaan,” which he delivered on the Centennial Fourth of July, as before stated. From this address the historian of this work has largely drawn for material for the history of that town, for which due credit has elsewhere been given. The closing words of Professor St. John's historical address are significant, and we cannot do better, perhaps, than to reproduce them here: “We who are now assembled here, gathering up the influences of this occasion, must soon be numbered with the congregations of other days. The time of our departure is at hand, to make room for our successors in the theatre of life. It may be that our posterity will assemble here to review their past. Shall it be amid joy or sorrow? The answer is in part left to us. May he who, at the distance of another century, shall stand here to celebrate this day, still look around upon a free, happy, and virtuous people; and may the God of our fathers give us grace to so administer the trust committed to us that our record shall enable the historian to rank us with them as having been faithful to the principles which they established!”

SELLECK Y. ST. JOHN.

Selleck Y. St. John, the oldest child of Zadock and Mary W. St. John, was born at South Salem, Westchester Co., and State of New York, on the 10th day of February, 1819. His father was the third son of Samuel St. John, of Ridgebury, Conn., where he was born in 1793, and died at Lewisboro' (formerly South Salem), Westchester Co., N. Y., in 1865.

His mother was the oldest child of Ebenezer Selleck, of Lewisboro', where she was born in 1801, and where she died in 1876. His parents were married Jan. 8, 1818; they lived together forty-seven years, and had four sons. The father's death was the first in the family.

Until thirteen years of age the subject of our sketch had only the ordinary advantages of a common school; then for the best part of two years he was favored with the advantages of an excellent practical academy, conducted by his cousin, Samuel S. St. John, Esq., at Ridgefield, Conn.

At sixteen years of age he entered as a clerk the store of Seymour Comstock, Esq., of New Canaan, who was at that time one of the leading merchants of this place and vicinity, and continued in the mercantile business as a clerk and for himself for about eighteen years. He has often been elected by the people of New Canaan to various offices of trust and responsibility,—town clerk for nine years; fifteen years continuously elected a magistrate, whether the town went Democratic or Republican, and was finally obliged to refuse to qualify to get rid of it, because of its interference with his other duties; was among the very first magistrates, if not the very first, in the State to try a case under the “Maine Law,” so called, passed in 1854; was elected to the Legislature in 1878, and served in the session of 1879, the first that met in the new State-House, at Hartford.

In 1859 the New Canaan Savings Bank was chartered, and upon being organized he was chosen its treasurer, in which capacity he served seventeen consecutive years, and then was chosen its president for two years, but resigned before the expiration of the second year.

In 1865 the First National Bank of New Canaan was established, and he was chosen its cashier, in which capacity he has served until the present time.

In 1868 the New Canaan Railroad was organized, and in the following year he was chosen one of its directors, and served continuously until, in 1876, he was chosen to fill the vacancy made by the death of Professor Samuel St. John (who had been president from its organization), and continues in that capacity to the present time.

The New Canaan Cemetery Association was organized in 1867, of which he was chosen one of its directors, in which he has served continuously to the present; and upon the death of Capt. Stephen Hoyt, its first and only president until his death, which occurred in February, 1878, Mr. St. John was chosen his successor, and still acts in that capacity.

In December, 1840, Mr. St. John was married to Mary A., daughter of Holly Seymour, of New Canaan, who died in 1833, leaving a widow and five children. His widow died in 1849, leaving the two youngest children, a son and daughter. It was the mother's dying request that Mr. St. John and wife should give up their own home and come back to the old homestead, which had been in the family from the earliest settlement of the town, where her children had been born and reared, and make a home for the young brother and sister. The promise was made and sacredly kept, and from that time until the present, a period of over thirty years, there has scarcely been a time, however short, but that they have had this brother and sister or their children, as well as other nieces and nephews of himself and wife, as members of their family, and in which they have always been treated with love and kindness, as if their own.

They had only two children of their own, and both are now deceased,—Amanda, born in 1844, died March, 1879, leaving one little girl, Josie May Martin, to the care and affection of her grandparents; Hannah, born in 1854, and died in 1860.

During the last thirty years of his life Mr. St. John has often been chosen to act as executor, administrator, assignee, or trustee of estates and guardian of minor children. Perhaps no man in the town has ever been intrusted with the care and custody of other people's money to such an extent and such large amounts, and up to this day he has never failed at the proper time to account for every dollar of the millions thus confided to him.

Another feature of his business life in which he has great reason to congratulate himself is the fact that, while acting so prominently in a fiduciary capacity, and especially during the late war and just after, when so many had money to invest, and there were so many schemes to answer this great demand, some of which were worthy, and an innumerable number of unworthy ones, as was natural, his advice was often sought by men and women as to what or where they should invest their money. And he has the proud satisfaction of knowing that no person, and no estate of which he had charge of the investments, but that have already or can now realize one hundred cents on the dollar. And it was not because he was not thoroughly tempted, as thousands of other men were, constantly besieged and implored to take the agency of this, that, or the other thing, with large and tempting commissions offered as the price of his advice and influence. Happy man! A million dollars would be poor pay for the blotting of such a record and memory as that.

On the temperance question Mr. St. John has been a "radical" from early boyhood, having signed the pledge when only fourteen years old; that was the "old pledge," which covered alcoholic beverages only. A year or two later, alone and by himself, without persuasion or influence of any sort, never having heard a discussion or lecture on the subject, but simply reading an article in a newspaper that accidentally came into his hands, he resolved to abstain from everything that could intoxicate, and from that time until 1876, a period of over forty years, no intoxicating liquors passed his lips, and then only as he took other poisons, from the hands and by the advice of a trusty friend and physician. Forty-three years ago this summer he and and six other young men—all under or about twenty years of age—organized the New Canaan Young Men's Total Abstinence Society, and circulated the first pledge of that kind in the town, which has borne good fruit. And, what is a remarkable fact, six of those men are still living, one only having fallen from grace, who died several years ago.

During the winter of 1840-41 he was induced to attend and listen to a lecture on slavery. He went to the meeting with a strong prejudice against abolition and abolition lecturers; but what he heard made a profound impression upon his mind, as it was well calculated to do, the argument being principally moral and biblical. When leaving the house an intimate friend said to him, "What do you think of that?" meaning the lecture. The answer was, "I hardly know what to think, but it seems to be God's truth." "Well," said the friend, "what are you going to do about it?" "I don't know; try to do right. If I become convinced that slavery is contrary to right and justice and cannot be reconciled with the 'Golden Rule,' then I shall be an abolitionist. I must be!" And yet hoping, almost praying, that he might see his way clear to "do right" and yet not be obliged to become an abolitionist. It soon became known that he was on the anxious seat, and his friends became as anxious to save him from what they thought would be utter ruin and disgrace; those that were real friends labored in season and out of season, kindly, calmly, and prayerfully; pretended friends sneered and prophesied and even threatened, and this only added fuel to the fire, for his was a nature that might be won, but could not be bullied or bribed. It is impossible in these days to comprehend or hardly believe the strife and struggles that the abolitionists of forty years ago had to endure and surmount. It produced alienation of long-time friends, broke up the affections and harmony of churches and families. His experience was only that of thousands of others. Friends tried to persuade, dear relations, with blood-connected ties, begged and prayed that he would listen to reason and save himself and them from disgrace. Ministers of the Gospel of Jesus of Nazareth interfered with advice and remonstrance. And finally the culmination came one evening, when calling upon the one minister who of all others had his love, confidence, and veneration. When, with a kind and loving seriousness and prayerful earnestness befitting the attempt to "snatch a brand from the burning," his reverend friend (and he knew and felt it was a real friend) pictured and set before him, as only a master hand can do, the grand and glowing prospects that were opening before him as a young man, in business relations, in society, and in the church, everything almost that an intelligent, ambitious young man might be supposed to aspire to, was apparently almost ready to fall into his hands, the interview ended. Mr. St. John had expected to attend an anti-slavery meeting that evening and had stopped on his way. He was staggered for a while; he saw and felt the deep and sincere earnestness of his friend; knew he was a good, esteemed, and earnest minister of the Gospel, and that he ought to know a great deal better about such a question of morals than himself; knew and admitted that many and most of the consequences so dreaded by his friends would come upon him, and yet he did not half know the consequences that would follow him as an open and avowed abolitionist, and well he did not, for he thought he had all he could bear. He passed out of his friend's door into the darkness of night with a heart full almost of agony and eyes raining tears down his face. As he went slowly down the street he reasoned with himself. Worldly ease and ambition tempted him to give up and yield to the entreaties and try to believe that the slave was better off as he was than he would be to be a "free nigger." But a good spirit said, "How about the 'Golden Rule?' can a slaveholder be doing what, and as he would that, others should do unto him? and John Wesley says, 'American slavery is the sum of all villainies,' and I believe it! I will be an abolitionist and accept the consequences. Thank God for this decision! I know I am right." And from that moment there was never anything that could amount to a temptation to turn back. All that was prophesied came upon him, and more; but all the trials and difficulties were ordained for good, as is promised to them that are faithful to God and humanity and a good conscience, and now this chapter of his experience in life is regarded and cherished as the brightest, and crowded with pleasant memories.

Of course, as may be inferred, from the time of his conversion he voted as he prayed and talked and wrote. He acted with the poor, despised "Liberty party" fanatics until the organization of the "Free Soil" party, then with them until the organization of the Republican party, whose grand and glorious mission was to first stop the spread, then strangle, and finally, with flashing sabre and glittering bayonets and thundering cannon, in the hands of a million "Boys in Blue," stamp out for aye and evermore the American system and "sum of all villainies." With this party he stood from the first, and stands to-day with "malice towards none and charity towards all."

In 1836 he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, where he still worships. Creed and professions he regards much less than the every-day walk and conversation, and, while reverencing the Bible, he has no fears that it will be sacrilegious to have the old one revised and corrected, fully believing that we have as good and learned men as they had two hundred years or more ago, that are capable of revising it in the interests of truth, righteousness, and revelation. He has no anxiety either about what science has already developed, or will develop, in reference to the truth of what is esteemed Bible teachings, for wherein truth is really found God will be found also, and He can be trusted to take care of His own.

From his earliest recollections he has been fond of reading, and in his sixteenth year subscribed for Mr. Greeley's New Yorker, a weekly literary paper, which, he insists, he has never seen excelled. He continued that until its publication was suspended. He has been a constant reader of the Tribune from its start, has taken the daily regularly for twenty-eight years, and considers himself under obligations to Horace Greeley for more and better sound common-sense instruction in morality, social as well as political, than all other persons or sources combined. In addition to the popular magazines and other monthly issues, he averages, besides the Daily Tribune, at least one weekly every day, Sunday included, and has one of the largest, if not the largest private library of miscellaneous books in the town.

His farm, which, when he came into possession, had been without a proper head for seventeen years, and had become almost a waste, has been cleared up, drained and fenced, buildings renovated and added to, until it has become one of the best farms in the vicinity, and is now an unpretending but comfortable and delightful country home.

He was re-elected to the Legislature in 1880.

CALEB S. BENEDICT.

The Benedicts are of English descent, and came to this country at a very early day, settling in Norwalk, Conn.

The great-grandfather of Caleb S. Benedict, also named Caleb, was one of the earliest settlers of New Canaan. He died in 1761, at the age of fifty-two. An arm-chair used by him is in the possession of the family. James Benedict, one of his sons, died at the age of ninety-five. He was the founder of the shoe business in New Canaan. His youngest son, Caleb, was the first to begin the manufacture of peg shoes in that place, having bought the right to do so from parties in New York. His was a town-right, which permitted him to manufacture in New Canaan only. He from a small beginning manufactured quite extensively at last, probably to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars per annum. He was married at about the age of twenty to Miss Ellis, daughter of Hezekiah St. John, of New Canaan. There were fifteen children, of whom Caleb S. was the eldest son. He was born in New Canaan, Oct. 28, 1803, and was reared to the trade of his father, working in his father's establishment until his marriage, Nov. 9, 1826, to Miss Hannah E., eldest daughter of Deacon William and Polly (Mills) Crissey, of New Canaan, when he engaged in business on his own account. The children of the last-recorded marriage have been eleven in number, of whom eight are living,—namely: Harriet E., now Mrs. H. D. Lockwood, of Stamford; Mary J., now Mrs. William E. Husted; Joseph I.; Junius C. S., Jr.; Polly M., now Mrs. George Kellogg, of Ocean Grove; Theodore W.; and Henry G. The three deceased are Harriet E., William C., killed in battle of Murfreesboro', and Edward S.

Three years since, Mr. and Mrs. Benedict celebrated their golden wedding, at which there were present ninety-nine guests, the major part of whom were their descendants.

The life of Mr. Benedict has been one of active business; considerable of his time has been given to the interests of the public, having at various times held almost all of the town offices. In 1866 he was elected to the Legislature, representing his town again in that body in 1872.

The manufacture of the establishment with which Mr. Benedict is connected does not exceed thirty thousand dollars per annum. Associated in business with him are several of his sons.

EBENEZER J. RICHARDS.

The Richards are of Welsh extraction, and trace their descent in this country from Samuel Richards, who was one of the original settlers in Norwalk, and who was great-grandfather to the subject of our sketch.

James Richards settled in New Canaan some years before the Revolution. One of his children, Jesse, youngest but one of a large family, was married to Miss Lydia, daughter of Jesse and Lydia Hickok, of New Canaan. His children were six by his first wife; his second marriage was to Clarissa, daughter of Judge Ebenezer Lockwood, of Westchester, N. Y.

Ebenezer J. Richards was the only child of this second marriage, and was born April 3, 1816, in New Canaan. His opportunities for acquiring an education were such as are afforded by the common school, with one term at a higher institution of learning in New York City.

Possessing talents which would have enabled him to reach success in professional life, he has clung to the calling of his father, that of farming, from choice, believing that to be a business requiring quite as high order of talent to prosecute successfully as the learned professions. Mr. Richards enjoys the reputation of a successful farmer.

Ebenezer J. Richards was married somewhat late in life to Miss Julia M., youngest daughter of Hartford and Mabel Fitch Carter, of New Canaan.

Mr. Carter was a man of more than ordinary talent and force of character, and represented his town a number of times in the Legislature, and was for many years one of its selectmen.

E. J. Richards has filled many town offices, and in 1863 represented his town in the Legislature of his State.

WILLIAM EDGAR RAYMOND.

William Edgar Raymond, third son of Samuel Raymond, was born in the city of New York in 1821. His grandfather, William Raymond, moved into the parish of Canaan about the year 1785, from Norwalk, settling on a small tract of land in the eastern part of the township, where he built a house in which he lived and died. He was a descendant of one of three brothers who immigrated to this country from France in the early settlement of the colony of Connecticut. Two of the brothers, according to tradition, settled in New London, the third in Norwalk. William Raymond was a soldier in the French-Canadian war, and his discharge and receipt are on file in the comptroller's office at Hartford. He came into the parish of Canaan a cripple, from wounds received in battle, and was comparatively a poor man, but he reared quite a large family of children,—sons and daughters,—all of whom, with the exception of the youngest son, Samuel, went to other States and settled, and their numerous descendants have made honored names for themselves and families.

Samuel Raymond early saw his situation,—that his father's few acres of rough land would not give him a living,—and prevailed on his father to allow him to do something for himself. On the rocky farm of one Matthias St. John, young Samuel began the real battle of life, remaining with him until he was bound out to learn the trade of shoemaker. Mr. St. John afterwards married his oldest sister. At the age of twenty Samuel purchased his time and went to Walton, Delaware Co., N. Y. Here he remained one year, and returned to his native town and commenced the manufacture of shoes, in which he was moderately successful.

In 1808 he was married to Polly, daughter of Jacob Selleck, a well-to-do farmer of New Canaan. Jacob Selleck became the purchaser of "the Shaker Farm" when that society sold out and removed to Lebanon, N. Y. It is now owned by the sons of the late Capt. Stephen Hoyt. The children of Samuel were Charlotte, Charles, Thomas, and William E.

Samuel Raymond was a man prominent not only in his native town, but also in his county and State. He was well versed in the laws of the State, some of which he drafted, while many were passed during his membership in the Legislature. He represented New Canaan in the Legislature thirteen years, with one year in the Senate, and his influence was second to none. An extensive reader, retaining all he read, he could cope in debate with the ablest members of his day. A strong partisan, but not an extremist, he was thoroughly honest, and no party measure ever received his encouragement or support if in his view there was anything wrong in it. Party caucuses never succeeded in whipping him into the traces, and for his adherence to what he conceived to be the right, which was contrary to the views of his party in a matter relating to the banks of the State, he was at one time "read out."

For many years previous to 1842 he had been engaged in the mercantile business. That year he was elected sheriff, and sold his business to his three sons. This business was in a short time bought by the two youngest sons, who remained together several years, and was finally bought by William E., who continued it down to 1857, when he sold out and went to Iowa, where he had a large interest in government lands. He went West with the intention of engaging in banking, but, not liking the way they did business in that new State, in the autumn of the same year he returned to Connecticut.

In 1859 he was elected to the Legislature, and the same year he engaged in manufacturing, following it to 1875, when he retired. In 1873 he was elected State treasurer, faithfully and satisfactorily performing the duties of that office for four successive years. The present four and a half per cent, bonded indebtedness of the State was recommended in his last report to the General Assembly, and by its adoption many thousands of dollars have been saved to the taxpayers.

William E. Raymond has filled various offices of trust and responsibility. At present he is an active trustee of the New Canaan Railroad; is a bank director and an honorary member of the American Board.

Samuel Raymond died in 1865, at the advanced age of nearly eighty-two, and is still well remembered.

RUSSELL L. HALL.

Russell L. Hall was born Aug. 18, 1832, in Warren, Litchfield Co., Conn., and is of Welsh descent. His early life was spent in laying the foundation of the education which has enabled him to become the successful business man he is to-day. His education was both common school and academic. At the age of sixteen he began the trade of cabinet-maker, in Goshen, Litchfield Co. As an apprentice he worked for George S. Brewster for nearly five years, receiving as compensation twenty-five dollars first, with five dollars advance each year, receiving for the last year forty-five dollars.

In 1853 he came to New Canaan, the place of his present abode, and in the following spring embarked in business on his own account. His success has been uniform, and he stands to-day one of the prominent men of his adopted town.

Elnathan Hall, his great-grandfather, was a large landholder in the western part of Fairfield County at an early day, and just before the Revolution purchased a large tract of land in Vermont, which he divided among his children, some of whom went there to live. His youngest son, Elnathan L., moved to Fairfield County, where he learned the trades of tanner and shoemaker, which business, in connection with farming, he followed through life. His wife's name was Huldah Stone, of Danbury, and their children eight in number, all of whom are living, the youngest about sixty, the eldest nearly eighty.

Norman S. Hall, father of Russell, was a native of Litchfield County. His business was that of tanner, principally. His wife was Mary A., eldest daughter of Russell and — Hurd Stone, of Kent. Their children were Russell L., Harriet E., Ezra S., Amelia Sophia (deceased), Mary J., Charles W., Laura I., and Lucy M. (deceased).

Russell L. Hall was married Dec. 24, 1857, to Miss Betsy A., eldest daughter of Reuben and Sarah (Seefeld) Jones, of New Canaan. Their children are Julia M. and Lewis C.

Mr. Hall has filled with satisfaction to his constituents various offices of trust in his town. He has been treasurer of New Canaan Savings Bank for some time, and in 1878 he was elected president of First National Bank of New Canaan, having previously filled the office of vice-president of the institution for several years.

CAPT. STEPHEN HOYT.

Capt. Stephen Hoyt was born in New Canaan, April 7, 1800. He was the only son of Stephen and Polly (Carter) Hoyt, and had four sisters. Of these, Polly married Bradley Keeler; Hannah, Alfred Sealey; and Sally Carter, Benjamin Hoyt; while Julia, the youngest but one, died unmarried at the age of nineteen. An only son, Stephen enjoyed all that parental and sisterly love could provide, while he, on his part, contributed, to the extent of his ability, to their comfort and happiness. His parents, in comfortable circumstances, planned to give him a collegiate education, but "Man proposes, God disposes." Young Stephen's eyesight failing him in part, he was obliged to abandon study and seek other pursuits.

When twenty years of age he taught the winter term of what is known as the White Oak District School. The spring following he entered mercantile life, taking his father's interest in the store kept by Husted & Hoyt. The business was carried on in the corner-store now owned by S. C. Weed, the only store at that time in the village of New Canaan. At the end of about five years Mr. Husted sold his interest to Edwin Nash, who remained in the firm until his death, in 1845. In 1837, Benjamin Hoyt became a partner, and business was conducted under the firm-name of S. & B. Hoyt. In 1849, Stephen sold his interest to Andrews Weed, that he might give his entire attention to the cultivation of his farm bought three years before.

At twenty-three he was married to Sally, daughter of Caleb Benedict, commencing housekeeping in a new building built by his father opposite the old home.

In 1824 he was elected captain in a company of militia, serving three years, during the time marching his company to Norwalk to do honor to Gen. Lafayette, then making the tour of the States.

As a merchant he was obliging and popular, and quite successful, but on account of his large and growing family, which he felt could be better trained in the country, he abandoned mercantile for farm life. This he did against the opposition of his father's family, who idolized him and wished him to remain near them.

In politics he was a Whig, and represented his party in 1836 and 1849 in the State Legislature. As selectman he served several terms, and for many years was treasurer of the town deposit fund. He was an earnest advocate and defender of human liberty, and joined the Free Soil party in 1848 and the Republican party in 1856. He was, during the Rebellion, a thorough Union man, giving of time, money, and voice, aiding his town to raise its quota, and in assisting the families of those who had gone to the front. After the war he withdrew from active politics and devoted himself to the improvement of his farm.

He was a man of high moral character, and entered heartily into any project having for its object the elevation of mankind or the improvement of his town. He took a resolute stand in 1840 in connection with the, in his town, unpopular Washingtonian reform movement. Signing the pledge, he banished from his table and fields cider, as well as all other intoxicants. In this new and unpopular sphere he showed the same resolute determination characteristic with him in all his undertakings. He spent much of his time and money in attending and sustaining State, county, and town temperance organizations, and for years was rarely absent from their weekly meetings held in the town.

He was one of the fourteen charter members who organized Friendship Division, No. 10, Sons of Temperance, in New Canaan, in 1845,—an organization which has existed upwards of thirty-five years, with a membership at the present writing of nearly two hundred. At his death he was one of the few charter members who remained true to the great principles of this reform.

Capt. Hoyt took great interest in the New Canaan Railroad, giving much time and money towards its construction. He was stockholder and director of the First National Bank, and for several years its president, and for many years director and loaning committee of the savings bank. He interested himself in forming the Union Cemetery Company, of which he was chosen president. To this work he devoted much time and labor, and advanced the money necessary to make the survey, lay out the drives and walks, and for other work necessary to bring the corporation into a self-sustaining association.

The cemetery was dedicated in 1872. The elm-tree standing in the triangle of the road as you enter the village of New Canaan from the east was planted there by Capt. Hoyt in 1870, and the stone coping surrounding it was caused to be placed there by Mrs. Dr. W. Parker.

As a farmer Capt. Hoyt was eminently successful. His farm, bought in 1837, was known as the Shaker Farm, comprising at that time one hundred and sixty-three acres of worn-out rocky land, with poor fences and outbuildings. He entered at once upon the work of improvement, and long before his death had the satisfaction of bringing about a complete transformation, the rocky, unproductive fields giving place to grass, orchard, and tree-covered, fertile ones, and the old tumble-down fences and buildings entirely replaced by new. In 1842 he cultivated a few onions, increasing the quantity of ground until five acres were annually cultivated, yielding from two thousand five hundred to three thousand bushels. In 1846 he started the first milk-route in New Canaan. In 1848 he formed a partnership with a Mr. Scofield for the purpose of starting a nursery in New Canaan. Seeds were sown and every arrangement made for growing nursery stock. This was the beginning of the celebrated nursery of Stephen Hoyt's Sons, now carried on by James & Edwin Hoyt, who have more than one hundred acres exclusively devoted to the growing of young trees.

Kind-hearted and liberal, no man of his generation in New Canaan was more identified with its interests; and he was ever ready to lend a helping hand to those seeking his aid. He gave employment to a large number, many of whom were with him continuously for nearly thirty years.

Of his ten children seven are still living, three having died in infancy.

Oct. 23, 1873, Capt. Hoyt celebrated his golden wedding, which was participated in by nearly two hundred guests, and was a social occasion long to be remembered.

He died Feb. 24, 1879, thus ending the career of an energetic, persevering, and good man.

AARON JELLIFF, Jr.

Aaron Jelliff, Jr., was born in Wilton, Fairfield Co., Conn., March 2, 1839. His father, also named Aaron, was a hatter by trade, following it for some years in his native town, Wilton, also in Pennsylvania. Relinquishing the hat business, he began in a small way the manufacture of wire sieves.

He was married to Miss Caroline Dunning, of Wilton, and became the father of nine children, of whom Aaron was the fifth child and fourth son. His second wife was Mrs. Bartram, of Redding. Of this union there was no issue.

Aaron Jelliff, Jr., learned the business of sieve-making from his father, whom he assisted up to and after his marriage, which took place on his reaching his twenty-first birthday, to Samantha, daughter of Major and Hannah (Keeler) Dickens, of Redding. The only child which has been born to them is George H., born Dec. 18, 1861. After his marriage Mr. Jelliff commenced the manufacture of brush-blocks in Georgetown, soon after removing to Wilton, where he continued the business until 1868, when he connected with it the business of making coal-sieves, weaving his own cloth and making his own frames. To this small business he has added from time to time, until now the product of the factory consists of coal- and flour-sieves, of muzzles, wire-cloth, and the celebrated "Rival Ash-Sifter." This latter business has reached such proportions as to crowd out the brush-block business almost entirely.

In 1869, Mr. Jelliff moved to the town of New Canaan, and took possession of what is known as Waterbury's Mills, which, in company with his brother Charles, he had recently purchased. The property was in a sad state of dilapidation.—“Nothing local, as one might say,” but the whole having, not a mild, but a strong and most pronounced, flavor of decay. But the brothers were not of the kind easily discouraged, and set about repairing the place as well as their limited means would allow. First they were obliged to build a house to live in, which done they turned their attention to the mill, finding it necessary to substitute a new wheel for the ones in the mill in order to get the power requisite for their business. They put in a “Leflé” wheel twenty-three inches in diameter, by which they get over fifteen-horse power, and by the aid of which they do all the sawing and planing for their frames.

SAMUEL COMSTOCK.

Samuel Comstock is descended from the pioneer of that name who was one of the earliest settlers of Norwalk.

Abijah Comstock, the paternal grandfather of Samuel, settled in New Canaan on the farm which has ever since been owned and occupied by his descendants. His wife's name was Deborah Benedict, and their children were eight, four sons and four daughters, of whom the father of our subject, also named Samuel, was the youngest; he was a farmer by occupation, but bore the title of major, probably of militia. He was also engaged in mercantile pursuits to some extent. He was born July 15, 1767; married, Dec. 6, 1793, to Catharine, daughter of Jonathan and Sarah (Green) Clock. Joseph Green, father of Sarah, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war and was killed at Compo, April 30, 1777, in the fifty-seventh year of his age.

The children of Samuel and Catharine (Clock) Comstock were eight, four sons and four daughters, as in the preceding generation, of whom the subject of this memoir was son. He was born July 4, 1802, and died March 11, 1871.

The family of which he was a member consisted of Deborah, Dinah (deceased), Hannah (deceased), Ruth (deceased), Samuel (deceased), William (deceased), David, a Congregational minister, now living retired in Stamford, Conn., and Thomas Anthony, living in Brooklyn, and the father of Anthony Comstock, agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice.

Samuel Comstock's education was derived from the common school of his native town principally, with a short academical term in New Canaan Academy. At his father's death, which occurred when he was sixteen, he was obliged to withdraw from his studies, which he never afterwards found time to resume, and assume charge of the farm, as the eldest son.

His father, just previous to his death, which occurred suddenly, had been engaged in repairs and improvements at considerable expense, which left the estate somewhat encumbered. This encumbrance young Samuel, by his industry, prudence, and foresight, ably assisted by his mother, an energetic woman of excellent judgment, soon removed, and was able to assist his younger brother. At the age of thirty-five Samuel was married to Sarah, daughter of David and Cynthia (Abbott) Comstock, of Norwalk. Their children were Hannah (deceased), Sarah, Eliza, Josephine, Clementine, and Samuel. In politics Mr. Comstock was a Whig, but, although taking a lively interest in political matters, he persistently refused office.

In religious matters he was very liberal. He was a regular attendant at the Congregational church in New Canaan, and a member of “the society.”

Dinah Comstock, second sister of Samuel, was the wife of Rev. Chester Isham, at the time of his death settled over Trinitarian Church, Taunton, Mass. Ruth, the youngest sister, kept a young ladies' boarding-school in New Haven for more than twenty years. This school was started by Dinah (Mrs. Isham) and Ruth Comstock, and was known as Dwight Place Seminary, also as Miss Comstock's school, and on the death of Mrs. Isham was continued by Ruth Comstock, as stated above. The school had an enviable reputation, and educated ladies from all parts of the United States.

FRANCIS E. CHICHESTER.

Throughout the entire history of the southern portion of Connecticut the name of Chichester figures. It is an English name and found among the original settlers of Norwalk. The paternal grandfather of Francis E. Chichester was David Chichester, and on his mother's side, Enos Weed, both natives and lifelong residents of the town of New Canaan, Fairfield Co.

David Chichester was a soldier in the Revolution, and took part in the battle of Ridgefield. The action was quite severe, David, however, escaping with no greater damage than two bullet-holes through his coat. His widow after his death was a pensioner of that war. David was the father of a large family, all of whom reached an advanced age, the youngest being sixty before a death occurred among the children.

Enos Weed was three times married,—first to a Miss Powers, of New Canaan; his second and third wives were sisters, named Andrews, of Darien.

The eldest son of David Chichester, Isaac, was a Presbyterian minister, and at his death was settled at Bennington, N. Y. Alanson Chichester, third son, was the father of the subject of our sketch. He was a farmer by occupation, a man of much force of character, though retiring in his manner. He was married early in life to Sally, eldest daughter of Enos and Kesiah (Powers) Weed, of New Canaan. Their children were Hannah, Francis E., George A. (merchant in Danbury), Sarah (deceased), David N. (living on the homestead in Pound Ridge), and Mary P.

Francis E. Chichester was the eldest son and was born Nov. 15, 1822, in New Canaan, where he lived until his fifth year, when his father removed to Pound Ridge, Westchester Co., N. Y. Here Francis remained till his marriage, Jan. 29, 1845, to Miss Adelia J., second daughter of Frederick and Polly (St. John) Barrett, of Bedford, N. Y.

Francis' boyhood was spent in helping his father with his farm work and in attending school. After his marriage he returned to his native town and began farming on his grandfather Weed's farm, working it on shares at first, afterwards buying it, it being his home at the present time. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Chichester have been Amelia J. (now Mrs. Samuel J. Whaley, of New Canaan) and Helen F. (deceased).

In politics Mr. Chichester is Republican, and by his party has been elected to fill various town offices.

The entire family are members of the Congregational Church of New Canaan, to the support of which they liberally contribute.

CHAPTER XLV.

NEW FAIRFIELD.

Geographical—Topographical—Original Grant—Ebenezer Burr First Survey—Indian Village—Indian Burying-Ground—The Pioneers—The Drain Company—Ecclesiastical—First Congregational Church—List of Representatives.

THE town of New Fairfield lies in the northern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Sherman; on the east by Litchfield County and the town of Brookfield; on the south by Danbury; and on the west by Putnam Co., N. Y. The surface of the town is generally hilly, and the soil fertile.

This town was granted to twelve proprietors, who made a division and allotment of rights and surveyed it about 1736-37. The grant comprised the present towns of New Fairfield and Sherman, called the "Lower and the Upper Seven Miles." The choice of location in the allotment was won by Ebenezer Burr, of Fairfield, who, not having explored the towship, chose the centre lot in the "Lower Seven Miles," which, when located and surveyed, included a large part of what is now called "Short Woods," a mountainous portion, and the least valuable of any of the townships. The remains of a dwelling occupied by some of the descendants of Ebenezer Burr still exist near the residence of Richard Barrett.

The southeastern portion of the town, easterly from Wood Creek, was surveyed by Thomas and John Edwards, of Stratford, in 1737. Their survey comprised a tract of two hundred and thirty-six acres, and included a part of the farms now owned by B. B. Kellogg, Esq., and Mrs. H. G. Betts. This portion of the town was then called the "Apple-trees," from some apple-trees which it is said were planted by the Indians, and were standing within the recollection of persons now living. On a portion of this tract surveyed by the Edwards were an Indian village and burying-ground. Many stone implements and curiosities of Indian workmanship are turned up by the plow in cultivating the soil, some of which have been presented to the Smithsonian Institution, at Washington, by Mr. B. B. Kellogg.

The ridge of land northerly from Neversink Pond was surveyed by Onesimus Gould a little later in the same year of the Edwards survey. A large tract of swamp-land, covered with pine, now known as "the Pine Swamp," had previously been surveyed by Thomas Reed. Gould's survey commenced at the southwest corner of Reed's pine swamp, and running westerly over the hill to near the south end of "Bear's Pond," and then southerly by the swamp around the south end of the ridge by Neversink Pond, thence northerly to the place of beginning, taking in all the upland.

In the swamp northerly from Neversink Pond was formerly a heavy growth of white cedar. This was considered of so much value by the first proprietors for the purpose of making pails, tubs, and woodenware, which were all home-made, that this tract was surveyed and divided into twelve lots, which still remain as originally surveyed. The title to some of these lots is rather vague, in consequence of their not having been distributed or properly conveyed in the settlement of the estates of the proprietors or their descendants.

THE PIONEERS.

Among the early settlers were Medack Rogers, grandfather of D. B. Rogers, of Danbury, Jeroc Scudder, who lived in what is now Centerville, Thomas Burse, the Beardsleys, the Penfields, Squire Treadwell, grandfather of L. P. Treadwell, treasurer of the Union Savings Bank of Danbury, and Amos R. Stevens. The latter was in the war of the Revolution, and was an ancestor of Hon. Ezra Stevens, who represented this district in the State Senate. The Manzer family were at one time prominent in the affairs of the town. There were five sons in the family, to each of whom the father gave a farm. He was a large landholder, and owned nearly the whole northeastern part of the town. The names of other settlers may be found in the history of the Congregational Church. The Kelloggs were early and prominent settlers. (See biography of Hon. B. B. Kellogg.)

THE DRAIN COMPANY.

A petition for the organization of this company was granted by the Superior Court in September, 1880, and S. L. Warner, of New Milford, and B. B. Kellogg, of this town, were appointed scavengers. The petition was presented by proprietors of the extensive swamp-lands situated in the towns of New Fairfield, Brookfield, and New Milford, with certain described bounds named, for the purpose of draining and improving such lands.

Messrs. Warner and Kellogg were directed by the court to call a meeting of the proprietors, to be held at Mr. Kellogg's residence, to appoint a third scavenger and other officers. The meeting was held Oct. 11, 1880, when D. H. Wanzer, of New Milford, was elected third scavenger, C. D. H. Kellogg clerk, A. E. Knowles, of New Milford, collector, and B. B. Kellogg, treasurer.

These swamp-lands comprise a tract estimated to contain near three thousand acres, a large portion now unimproved and unproductive, except for a growth of wood on some portions, most of which has sprung up since it was partially drained under a grant from the Legislature passed in 1842.

Previous to that time it had been a vast quagmire, much of it covered with water the greater part of the year, a feeding- and resting-place for the wild geese and ducks in their migratory flights from the sea to the northern lakes and return, the paradise of the muskrat, the mink, and the otter, and where the farmers sometimes turned their swine during the summer months to feed on the wild roots which grow in abundance in this water-covered marsh, losing sight of them for weeks, and sometimes months, until time for fattening in the fall, when after a long and weary hunt they would be found in a semi-wild state, but in a much improved condition.

The commissioners appointed in 1842 made a survey of the stream, having to navigate it in a boat, and also of what was called the "outlet." This is a narrow gorge between what is known as the Green Pond Mountain and the high ridge directly east. The obstruction may have been formed by a slip from the mountain in some former period, thereby causing the inundation of a large tract of land, the water gradually wearing a partial channel through the obstruction in the course of years, leaving the accumulated vegetable deposit a store-house of undeveloped wealth, waiting for the intelligence of some age to appreciate, develop, and utilize its fertility.

The commissioners had the prejudices of many of the then proprietors to contend against. They looked upon it as a Nazareth out of which no good could come. Many a stray steer or cow had broken from its enclosure and wandered into the treacherous bog, and found a resting-place for its bones, or if discovered in season been hauled out with ropes by the combined strength of the neighboring farmers, who often, after a hard day of labor, were called upon at sunset or dark to assist in pulling from the mire. It seemed to them "casting bread upon the waters" with no hope of return.

The commissioners had the stream cleared of obstructions and deepened the outlet, expending about fourteen hundred dollars, which was paid by an as-essment on the proprietors. The draining was only partially accomplished, but the result fully proved the wisdom of the projectors. Some of the more elevated portions have been cultivated and now made into valuable meadow, and, with further improvement which the scavengers now appointed have in view, it is believed the whole can be converted into most valuable lands for meadow and general agriculture.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

The church was organized Nov. 9, 1742. The first pastor was Benajah Case, and on his settlement two hundred acres of land were given him by the town-proprietors.

When Mr. Case was settled, or how long he remained pastor, we have now no means of ascertaining, as the first leaf of the church records was lost years ago. The first entry on the society's record was in 1755. There had been a difficulty with Mr. Case, it appears, throughout most of his pastorate. The society was trying to settle it with him, and voted to leave it to outside parties. At the same time they were extending invitations to their "Danbury neighbors" to join with them in society business and privileges, referring to a district on the north part of Danbury, called Pembroke, some of whom acceded to their invitation. The probability is that Mr. Case's pastorate extended to 1755 or thereabouts.

Rev. James Taylor was installed pastor in 1758, and in 1764 complaint was made against him that he left the doctrines and principles of the church, and had drawn off a part of the people, and met in a private house for worship. The following is the protest of a part of the society:

"Whereas, At a meeting of the South Society in New Fairfield, December the 6th, 1764, the Society, by a major vote, invited Mr. James Taylor into the meeting-house to preach, although he has, notwithstanding his ordination vows, openly deserted his pastoral office, cast off with seeming contempt the religious constitution of this colony, and separated from the First Church in this Society, and has with others set up and maintains a meeting in a private house on the Lord's day, to the disturbance of those that worship in the meeting-house, contrary to a law of this colony in that case made and provided; and it is judged by a united council of both Conventions in this county of Fairfield that he, ye sd Mr. Taylor, ought not to be employed or encouraged in exercising any part of the ministerial office. The subscribers, looking upon sd Mr. Taylor to be an intruder into ye sacred work of the ministry, think ourselves in duty bound to enter a protest against sd vote, as witness our hands on ye sd date above.

"JOHN BEARDSLEE,	NEHEMIAH BEARDSLEE

"BENJAMIN TAYLOR,	GEOFF BEARDSLEE,

"DANIEL SMITH,	SAMUEL TROWBRIDGE,
"PHILAS BEARDSLEE,	ELIJAH FAIRFIELD,

	"Society's Clerk."

A vote was passed in society's meeting "ye 21st day of May, 1765," that they would not employ Mr. Taylor any longer, and Mr. Taylor would not give up the use of the parsonage land till in 1768, when Rev. Joseph Peck was called as pastor.

The names of the first members cannot now be given on account of the loss of some part of the first records. Doubtless, some of the following names found, under date of 1758, are of the first: Benajah Case and wife, Deacon Samuel Trowbridge and wife, Deacon Pardee, Thomas Hodges and wife, Samuel Wheeler and wife, John Beardslee and wife, Obadiah Beardslee and wife, Elnathan Hall and wife, Jabez Hall, Samuel Gregory and wife, Nathaniel Barnum and wife, John June and wife, Andrew Fairchild and wife, Thomas Brush and wife, Caleb Trowbridge and wife, Hezekiah Odell and wife, James Baker and wife, John Mitchell and wife, Joseph Rundle, Josiah Bass, Thomas Cosier, Eben Stevens and wife, Jonathan Weeks and wife, Edward Lacey and wife, Abel Barnum and wife, Noah Smith and wife, Daniel Smith and wife, Mary Comstock, Dorothy Pardee, Jemima Beardslee, and Eunice Beardslee.

In 1775, Mr. Peck was dismissed at his own request. In 1786, Rev. Medad Rogers was installed pastor, and in 1818 a revival began in the busiest season of the year, and about one hundred were converted. It has always since been spoken of as the "great revival." There have been seasons of revival at different times since and additions to the church.

The present number is not far from fifty resident members. Many in years past have removed to various parts of the West and elsewhere.

In the last century the minister was supported by tax in part, and in part by a farm of about two hundred acres. The taxes were not always paid, from poor individuals, consequently the minister suffered and the society was getting behind in paying him. At one time a receipt was given by one of the ministers for one thousand dollars as balance for a long term of years. At some of the society meetings a committee was appointed to see how much the minister would be willing to accept in lieu of what was due him. One hundred dollars in money was frequently all he would name for a year.

The following are extracts from the records of the society taken at random:

"Dec. 1, 1758. Resolved, To adjourn this meeting to Monday next, at sun one hour high, at the school-house."

At another time,

"Resolved, To adjourn all meetings the 13th of Instant April at sun 2 1/2 o'clock, at night, at ye school-house. Put to vote to give Sergeant Hoyle & Stevens 2 s. for a year, & to give for sweeping the meeting-house & putting the doors and windows in ye best order year past, &c."

"Resolved, To give Leel & Joseph Hall four shillings for sweeping the meeting-house & keeping the key of the door, & putting & shutting the door & shutting the windows for ye year ending."

1794. Resolved, To Mr. Elisha Hubbard 1/2 s. for sweeping the meeting-house & shutting doors & windows of the house to be swept once in 2 weeks.

1795. Resolved, To Elisha Hubbard 1/2 l. a year for sweeping, &c., if he will do well.

"Resolved, To give Ebenezer Osburne $3.00 for sweeping the meeting-house, &c. — 1795."

They were in the habit of renting the pews from 1755 to 1798, when we see no more record of the fact.

Rev. Ebenezer Davenport preached for the society in 1766; it is not known how long. They were much pleased with him, and made him an offer of settlement, but he did not accede to the proposal. They also made proposals to a Mr. Mills and to a Mr. Barrett. The society voted that the grist that was brought first to the mill should be ground first. They also voted on the subject of schools and dividing into districts, &c.

The following are the dates of ordination and dismissal of the several pastors of the church in New Fairfield after the Rev. Benajah Case: James Taylor, 1758-64; Joseph Peck, 1769-75; Medad Rogers, 1786-1822 (he died in 1824, aged seventy-four); Abram O. Stansbury, 1823-26; Daniel Crocker, 1827 (died 1830); George Coan, 1833-35; Benajah Y. Morse, 1835-38 (supply); David C. Perry, 1838-44; Henry H. Morgan, 1844-49; Lewis Pennell, 1849-53; Aaron B. Leffers, 1855-58; Ezra D. Kenney, 1859-61 (supply); William S. Clark, 1861-63; Daniel D. Frost, 1863-65; Stephen A. Loper, 1865-67; Charles B. Dye, 1868-71; Erastus B. Claggett, 1871-77; — Lam, 1880. Enoch Knapp, Deacon. The present church building was erected in 1836.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

BARZILLAI BULKLEY KELLOGG.

Barzillai Bulkley Kellogg was born Dec. 25, 1818, at the old homestead, in the eastern part of New Fairfield, Fairfield Co., Conn. His ancestors were English, Daniel Kellogg, of the seventh previous generation, being one of the original settlers of Norwalk. His great-grandfather, Martin Kellogg, settled in New Fairfield about 1765, the township having been surveyed about twenty-eight years previously.

Barzillai B. Kellogg was reared on the farm, receiving a common-school and academic education, and taught in the public schools. In September, 1844, he was married to Emeline, daughter of Daniel Johnson, of Brookfield. She died April 29, 1880, having reared a family of seven children.

Mr. Kellogg has been largely engaged in building and real estate operations and in various public improvements. In 1858 he was elected State senator for the Eleventh Senatorial District, and for many years he has been justice of the peace; was an active supporter of the suppression of the Rebellion; was elected first selectman of the town in 1869, re-elected continuously for ten years, and again in 1880. He is at present acting in the interests of the drain company for improving the swamp-lands of Wood Creek Valley. In 1860 he was made a director of the National Paliquoque Bank in Danbury, and elected its president in 1879.

KELLOGG GENEALOGY.

1. Daniel Kellogg, one of the original settlers of Norwalk, Conn., married, in 1655, Bridget Bouton, daughter of John Bouton.

2. Samuel Kellogg, born Feb. 19, 1673, married, Sept. 6, 1704, Sarah Platt, daughter of Deacon John Platt.

3. Martin, born March 23, 1711, married Mary —; he died July 7, 1756. She married (2d) March 22, 1757, Capt. Samuel Hanford, of New Canaan Parish.

4. Martin, born Oct. 10, 1740, married, May 13, 1762, Mercy Benedict, born April 13, 1742, daughter of James Benedict, of Danbury, who was born in 1710; Mercy Knapp, his wife, was born about 1713.

5. Martin, born Sept. 3, 1763, married Rachel Stevens, of Danbury, born in 1766. He died May 3, 1813; his wife died April 29, 1831.

6. Hanford Martin Kellogg, born Oct. 2, 1788, married Sarah Bulkley, of New Fairfield, born Nov. 27, 1792; died Feb. 5, 1851. He died June 11, 1870.

7. Barzillai Bulkley Kellogg, born Dec. 25, 1818, married Emeline Johnson, born July 19, 1821; died April 29, 1880.

ALEXANDER BUCKLEY BRUSH.

Alexander Buckley Brush was born in New Fairfield, Fairfield Co., Conn. His great-grandfather, Thomas Brush, was born in 1715, and settled in Greenwich some time anterior to the Revolution, coming from Long Island, moving to New Fairfield a short time afterwards. Thomas Brush's family consisted of eight children, one of whom was Amos. The latter was married to Miss Hannah Bourse, who bore him eight children, among whom was Ely, father of the subject of this brief sketch. He was a farmer by occupation; served in the war of the Revolution as minute-man; was married to Killa, daughter of Stephen Davis, of New Fairfield. Their children were Alexander B. and Hannah Elizabeth Graves.

Alexander B. Brush was born in 1829, on what has been the homestead of the Brush family for three generations. In 1874 he was married to Mary Louisa, daughter of S. Merwin Mead, Esq. The issue of this union has been three children,—Alexander A., Ella M., and Anna L.

Mr. Brush's occupation is that of farming and stock-raising. He is one of the representative men of his town, and has filled numerous local offices; is on the school committee and a selectman of his town.

ENOCH KNAPP.

Enoch Knapp, grandson of Jonathian and son of Dr. Isaac Knapp, was born in Greenwich, Fairfield Co., May 29, 1805. He is of German extraction, the first of the family settling in this country early in the eighteenth century. His grandfather, Jonathian Knapp, also a native of Greenwich, was a farmer by occupation. His family consisted of twelve children,—eight sons and four daughters. The fourth son was Dr. Isaac Knapp, born in Greenwich, who at about the age of twenty-five settled in New Fairfield, where he married Amy, the daughter of Amos and Hannah Brush. Their children were seven in number, five of whom are still living,—namely, Enoch, Sarah Leech, Ezra B., Dr. David A., and Euphemia H., Theresa (deceased) and Isaac H. (deceased), the latter leaving one son,—Smith H.

Dr. Knapp was the first of the profession to practice medicine in New Fairfield, and became one of the most prominent physicians in the county, being particularly successful in treating malarial fevers, at one time very prevalent in his circuit. He died in 1838.

Enoch Knapp was educated in the schools of his town, with one term at the New Canaan Academy. In 1838 he married Rachel A., daughter of Deacon Seeley and Louisa Rogers Barnum. Their children were: Almira E., Sarah T., Charlotte L., Mary C., Isaac Seeley, Frederick Enoch, Mary Louisa (deceased) and Isaac S. (deceased).

Deacon Seeley Barnum was a son of Deacon Ephraim Barnum, of Bethel, Conn., who for many years was an active member of his church.

The father of Miss Rogers, the Rev. Medad Rogers, was a minister in New Fairfield, where he preached for nearly half a century.

In his calling—that of farming and cattle-raising—Mr. Enoch Knapp has been very successful. He is an active member of the Congregational Church of his town, to the support of which he liberally contributes, and in which he has officiated as deacon for twenty years.

HENDRICK H. WILDMAN

is the second son of Hezekiah Wildman, or Wellman, the latter of which was probably the original name. He was born March 25, 1790, in the town of Sherman, which at that time was a part of New Fairfield. At the age of twenty-five years he married Martha Wakeman, by whom he had one daughter, Phebe Jane, who married Napoleon B. Turner, of Ridgebury, Conn. He was drafted during the war of 1812 and served for a time in the militia at Bridgeport, his neighbors in his absence harvesting his crop for him. His first wife died about 1817, and in 1818 he married Lassey M., daughter of Abijah Watkins, who bore him two sons,—viz., Marvin E. and Hendrick Hudson Wildman, the subject of this memoir, who was born in the town of New Fairfield, March 25, 1830. He attended the district school until he was about thirteen years of age, when he took a course of three years' study at the New Fairfield Academy, a portion of the time working for his board by doing chores for the principal. At the age of twenty years he commenced teaching district schools winters, and followed that occupation about twenty years, teaching school during the winter and working upon a farm in the summer. Mr. Wildman has been acting school visitor for twenty-four years, constable of his town during one term, assessor of taxes five terms, three times member of the board of relief, register of votes fifteen years, town auditor twelve years; he has held the offices of commissioner of the Superior Court and justice of the peace on an aggregate of fifteen years, was contractor for keeping the poor of the town from 1870 to 1876. He was elected to the House of Representatives at the General Assembly of 1863, and re-elected in November, 1878, for the session of 1879, serving on the committee on education. He took an active part in the debates of the House, and was noted for his clear and concise manner of expression in such debates.

Mr. Wildman was married Oct. 14, 1852, to Eveline, daughter of Matthew L. and Eliza Pearce, of New Fairfield. They have had six children, four of whom are now living,—to wit, Phebe G., Hendrick Hudson, Jr. (now constable of New Fairfield), Lucius P., and Lillie G. The other two children died in infancy.

Though not admitted to the bar, Mr. Wildman is recognized by the fraternity as a pretty good lawyer, and has some local practice in that capacity. He is a member of the Grand Lodge of Odd-Fellows of the State of Connecticut, and has filled nearly all the elective offices in the subordinate lodge.

Geographical—Topographical—Indian Name—Location of Indian Village—The Indian Purchase—Early Records—First Officers—Laying out of Lands—First Grist-Mill—Penalty for Non-attendance at Town-Meetings—"Pitching" for Land—Filling-Mill—"Beating ye Drum"—Town Stock of Ammunition—Ear-marks—Taking Care of the Toll—The Pioneers—Early Baths—Town-Houses—The Hanging of Robert Thoms—Old Lawyers—Merchants—An Advertisement of 1792—Villages.

This town lies on the northeast border of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by the town of Brookfield and the county of New Haven; on the east by New Haven and the town of Monroe; on the south by Monroe and Easton; and on the west by Redding, Bethel, and Brookfield. The surface of the town is hilly, and consists principally of gravelly loam, which is very productive.

"The Indian name of the town was Pohtatuck. The principal seat of the Indians appears to have been at the junction of the Pohtatuck with the Housatonic River."

THE INDIAN PURCHASE.

This town was purchased of the Indians by deed dated July 25, 1705. It is signed by Indian chiefs, who bear the euphonious names of Manguash, Massumpas, Nummawank, etc., and they testify by their signatures or marks that in consideration of four guns, four coats, four blankets, forty pounds of lead, ten pounds of powder, and a few other comparatively valueless articles, they do give a tract of land eight miles long and six broad, more or less, bounded by what is called the Great River, to William Junos, of Stratford; Justice Bush, of New York; and Samuel Hawley, Jr., of Stratford.

The earliest record in the old town book is as follows:

"At a meeting of the Proprietors of New Towne, held Sept. 21, 1711, legally met at ye house of Peter Hubbell, yt was then voted that Peter Hubbell should be Towne Clarke for the year ensuing.

"Voted, That Abraham Kimberly should be Constable for ye year ensuing.

"Voted, That Ebenezer Prindle & Thomas Sharp shall be surveyors of high ways for the year ensuing.

"Voted, That Joseph Graye and Daniel Foote shall be fence-viewers for the year ensuing.

"Voted, That Thomas Lake shall slip his twenty acre division, and take it up on the west side of the brook, against the better part of Newhaven plains, westerly of said plains, to be laid out by the committee upon the said lake charge.

"Voted, That each proprietor containing the number of forty-eight shall forthwith, as soon as can conveniently be done, have four acres of meadow apiece laid out by the committee, the said committee to lay out the same in the great meadow at the south end of the town, laying on the deep brook, and the meadow at the north end of the town, where it may be as convenient either under mount tom or elsewhere, as also four acres of meadow for the ministry, as the rest are laid out; and it is to be understood and it is voted that swamp-land that is suitable is accepted as meadow, and so to be laid out, the said committee to size the whole meadow and swamp-land, and the proprietors to draw for ye lots as hath been usual unless they order otherwise.

"Voted, That Mr. Pheneas Fisk is invited to come to this place to preach a sermon amongst us, and that we may discourse him about settling amongst us a minister of the gospel for half a year or some other space of time, as may be agreed on, for a Trial; and that Lieut. Wm Adams be the person to invite him on that design, and wait upon him here as soon as can be conveniently attended to."

GRIST-MILL.

"Dec. ye 1th, 1711, it was voted that Jeremiah Turner should have liberty to build a grist-mill, and the Town to promise to give ye s^d Turner 40 acres of land adjoining to ye mill."

Under date Dec. 14, 1711, is the following record:

"At a meeting of ye inhabitants of Newton, legally meett, at ye home of Daniel Foot, Voted, That Mr. Benj. Shetman, Ebenezer Pimall, and Samuel Sanford shall agree with Jeremiah Turner, and draw an agreement with said Turner concerning a grist-mill upon the said brooke."

Dec. 14, 1714, an agreement was entered into for the building of a grist-mill between the town and Samuel Sanford. The document closes as follows:

"Set to our hands and seals in Newton, this 4th day of December, 1714, and in ye first year of our Sovereign Lord George, &c. Signed, sealed in presence of Joseph Gray and Peter Hubbell.

"SAMUEL SANFORD, THOMAS BENNETT, ABRAHAM KIMBERLY, DANIEL FOOT.

"Recorded by Jos. Peck, Recorder, Sept. 21, 1715."

PENALTY FOR NON-ATTENDANCE AT TOWN MEETINGS.

Dec. 30, 1712, it was again

"Voted, That all and every person or persons duly and legally notified to give ye attendance at ye respective town-meetings ye hereafter shall be, and shall refuse or neglect to attend on ye s^d Town-meeting, at Time and place, shall pay ye sum of three shillings to ye treasury of ye Town, except ye fine be remitted and returned by the Town."

At the same meeting it was "Voted, That all that absent themselves from ye town-meeting when legally warned shall paye a fine of 3 shillings to the town treasury except they give reasonable satisfaction."

SAW-MILL.

March 17, 1712, it was "Voted, That Benj. Sherman and Capt. John Holly and John Seely shall have liberty to gat a saw-mill on the deep brook south of the towne."

PITCHING FOR LAND.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of Newton, legally warned, held April 2, 1712, it was "Voted, For to take the fore acres devition that is to be laid out by pitches.

"Voted, That the proprietors shall go, 8 in a company, and draw by figures, as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, till the whole number of 10 lots be laid out.

"Voted, That Mr. John Glover shall have his pitch at the reare of his home-lot to the high way west, and north so farr as it will hold out, and the sd Glover will pay to the town treasurer 12 shillings for his pitch.

"Voted, That Abraham Kimberly shall take his pitch at the rere of his home-lot so far as it will hold out.

"Voted, That Abraham Kimberly shall draw for all the proprietors of the towne.

"Voted, That if any of the proprietors are absent when the time come for to pitch they shall loose their pitch, and the next shall take it successively.

"Voted, That Samuel Farris shall be a committee man in the room of Ebenezer Prindle.

"Voted, That the 7 days of Apl. shall be the day for the company to pitch, and successively till they have done, excepting fowl weather hinder."

FULLING MILL.

In 1712 it was

"Voted and agreed, That Joseph Dudley shall have liberty to get a fulling-mill on the deep brooke above the saw-mill, and the use of half an acre of land about his mill, provided he do not damage the saw-mill, so long as he maintain a sufficient fulling-mill thereon the deep brook."

BEATING THE DRUM.

December "ye 9th," 1712, it was "Voted, That Stephen Pamerly shall have the use of an acre and a half of land which is the burying-place, provided he clear the bushes and fence it, and sow it with English grassseed.

"Voted, That Nathaniel Pamerly is to beat the drum for the year ensuing.

"Voted, That Peter Hubbell do keep a house of Entertainment for the year ensuing."

TOWN'S STOCK OF AMMUNITION.

"At a lawful town-meeting of ye inhabitants of Newton, held March ye 7th, 1714, voted by ye inhabitants that a rate and tax of one penny half-penny shall be levied upon the rateable estate of ye inhabitants above sd, to defray ye charges of providing a Town Stock of ammunition, viz., powder, bullets, and flints.

"Entered by Jos. Peck, town clerk, ye Date above."

EAR-MARKS.

The following are specimens of ear-marks used in the early times to distinguish sheep, cattle, etc.:

"Joseph Peck's ear-mark for his cattle & other Creatures is a half-penny on ye inner side of the neare ear. Recorded June ye 5th, 1714, by me, John Glover, Town Clerk.

Caleb Dayton's ear-mark was "two half-pennies upon the fore-side of each ear. Recorded January 11, 1711, pr me, Joseph Peck."

Benjamin Dannon and Samuel Farris were grand jurors in 1712.

January ye 12th, 1712 & 13. The town grants Samuel Sanford liberty to "set a grist-mill upon ye Pond brook for to grinde ye towne graine. Recorded by me, John Glover, Recorder."

TAKING CARE OF THE TOLL.

In December, 1715, "John Lake was chosen and appointed a committee man for to take care of the town's part of the toll of Sanford's mill, so-called, belonging to the inhabitants of Newton, for ye yeare ensuing, and give an account to ye select men, and that he is to have one bushel of good wheat for his service."

PIONEERS.

The following were among the residents of the town of Newtown in 1712: John Leavenworth, Moses Johnson, Ephraim Hawley, Jedediah Hawley, Henry Botsford, Henry Botsford, Jr., Daniel Foot, Jedadiah Parmelee, Ebenezer Johnson, Joseph Peck, Joseph Peck, Jr., James Birsee, Nathaniel Birsee, Jeremiah Johnson, Thomas Northup, Thomas Pearce, Jonathan Hubbell, John Platt, James Baldwin, Benjamin Northup, Ebenezer Platt, Stephen Parmelee, Matthew Sherman, Joseph Benedict, John Botsford, Joseph Benedict, Jr., Nathan Baldwin, Gideon Benedict, Caleb Baldwin, Samuel Pearce, Capt. Thomas Tousey, Samuel Griffin, Samuel Sommers, John Lake, Benjamin Dunning, Daniel Booth, Stephen Burritt, Jhosoplat Prindle, Capt. Thomas Bennett, Edward Fairchild, John Golat, Stephen Hawley, Joseph Botsford, Ephraim Prindle, Noah Parmelee, Joseph Prindle, John Blackman, Thomas Skidmore, Jeremiah Northrup, Lieut. John Northrup, Joseph Brigtoll, Moses Botsford, Ebenezer Prindle, Benjamin Dunning, Jr., Samuel Sanford, Lemuel Camp, Peter Hubbell, John Hull, Job Sherman, Abel Booth.

EARLY BIRTHS.

The following births are recorded:

"Abigail Sherman, ye daughter of Matthew Sherman, by Hannah, his wife, borne November ye 13th, 1711.

"Rebekah Sherman, ye Daughter of Matthew Sherman, by Hannah his wife, born July ye 9th, 1715.

We find the following reference to a "fair" in the town records under date of April, 1785:

"The town voted to prefer a memorial to the next General Assembly petitioning for a charter twice each year in this town."

TOWN-HOUSE.

The first vote concerning the erection of a town-house was taken Dec. 8, 1766, and Jonathan Booth, Ebenezer Ford, and Nathaniel Nichols were appointed a committee "to examine into what place is most convenient to suit said house, and also what said house will cost, and make report at the next meeting."

The first town-house stood on the site now occupied by Trinity church. The second occupied the present site of the residence of Mrs. Charles Brisco. The third was over Baldwins & Beers' store. The fourth, and present, was over the store owned by Norman B. Glover.

HANGING IN NEWTOWN.

The first and only execution that ever occurred in Newtown was the hanging of Robert Thompson as a spy in June, 1777. The following is a copy of the warrant for his execution, and the certificate of the officer commanding that the execution was duly performed:

SEAL.

"To Lieut. Samuel Richards, of Col. Wyllie's Battalion, in Continental Service:

GREETING:

"Whereas, Robert Thompson, of New Town, in the State of Connecticut, was, on the 21 day of April, An. D. m. 1777, before a General Court-Martial, holden at Danbury, wherof Colonel Charles Webb was President, accus'd of spying out the State of the Army & Country with Intent to give Intelligence thereof to the Enemy & of enticing Sundry Persons, Inhabitants, & Dwellers in Connecticut, into the Enemy's Service, of which crimes sundry Proofs were exhibit'd & Produced before Said Court, and the Said Thompson fully heard in his Defence: and Said Court, upon Consideration thereof gave Sentence that Said Thompson was guilty of a breach of the 19 article of the 13 Section of the Rules & Regulations of the Army, & also of a Regulation of Congress of the 21 of August, 1776, and that he suffer Death, which Sentence is approved, and Execution thereof remains to be done.

"These are, therefore, to require & order you, the said Samuel Richards, to cause the Said Sentence to be executed by hanging the Said Thompson by the Neck, in New Town aforesaid, on the Ninth day of June, Inst., between the Hours of Eight in the morning & Six in the Afternoon; for which this shall be your sufficient Warrant.

"Given under my Hand & Seal in New Haven, the Sixth Day of June 1777.

"SAM. H. PARSONS,
"Brig'-General."

"NEWTOWN, June 9, 1777.

"In obedience to the within warrant, I did, on this day, being the 9 day of June, 1777, direct a Sergeant of the detachment under my command to draw out twelve soldiers of the detachment, and with their assistance perform the execution of the within-named Robert Thompson, which execution I saw duly performed on said day; and on the application of his friends I consented to have them take down the body for interment at their discretion.

"SAMUEL RICHARDS."

OLD ATTORNEYS.

Among the prominent lawyers who were either born or practiced their profession in Newtown, was William Edmonds. He served in the Revolutionary war, and was wounded at the battle of Ridgefield and lay on the field over night. He afterwards became judge of the Superior Court.

Among others who have practiced here were Asa Chapman,* Samuel C. Blackman, Col. Timothy Shepherd (who was in the war of 1812), Benjamin F. Shelton, D. B. Beers, Isaac M. Sturges, Henry Dutton, Charles Chapman, Frederick D. Mills, Amos S. Treat, E. B. Swift, and James A. Wilson,†

The father of Gen. William T. Sherman also studied law here, in the office of Judge Asa Chapman; so also did ex-Governors Clark Bissell, Holbrook Curtis, and J. B. Thornton.

PHYSICIANS.

The first disciple of Esculapius in Newtown was Dr. Gideon Shepherd. He was followed by Bennet Perry, Oliver Baneroff, John Judson, Thomas D. Shepherd, C. H. Booth, Dr. Shelton, Dr. Skidmore, George Judson, Erastus Erwin, Thomas Dutton, and — Graves.

Dr. Thomas Chambers was an early physician here, and was known as the "stick" doctor.

The present physicians are Monroe Judson, F. N. Bennett, William E. Bronson, Celest A. Benedict, William C. Wile, and George T. Brown.

MERCHANTS.

The first merchant in Newtown was David Curtis, who kept a store on the site of the present store of Sanford & Hawley. The old building is standing, and occupied by the Beer office and a tin-shop. He was succeeded in the same building by Elijah Nichols & Son, who remained a number of years, when it passed into the hands of Nichols & Prince. This firm was succeeded by Joseph Nichols, son of Elijah. Joseph finally sold to Baldwin & Beers, and removed to New York.

This firm continued nearly half a century, when they were succeeded by Henry Sanford, who carried on the business fifteen years, when he associated with him Eli C. Barnum. This partnership continued about six years.

This firm was succeeded by Sanford & Hawley, the present firm. Mr. Henry Sanford is a veteran in the mercantile business in the town, having conducted its business on this site over forty-three years.

Ezra Morgan, father of D. N. Morgan, the present (1880) mayor of Bridgeport, was a merchant in this town for over forty years, and did much to advance the material interests of the town and county.

ADVERTISEMENT OF 1792.

The following advertisement appeared in the Farmers' Journal, published at Danbury, under date Dec. 22, 1792:

VILLAGES.

The village of Newtown is pleasantly located on an elevated ridge a little north of the centre of the town, and is an important station for the Housatonic Railroad. The main street, upon which is located the business of the village, is one of the finest in this section. It contains two churches, Episcopal and Congregational, and an academy.

Sandy Hook is a manufacturing hamlet located on the Pohtatuck Brook, a fine mill-stream which furnishes an abundance of water-power. Here are located the New York Belting and Packing Works, besides other industries.

Hawleyville is a small hamlet and a station on the Housatonic Railroad, located in the northwestern part of the town. Cold Spring is a post-office in the southern part of the town.

In Barber's "History," published in 1838, he says, "The borough of Newton is situated on the southern termination of a ridge of elevated land. After ascending the ridge from the south there is a broad and level street about eighty rods in extent. The borough is mostly built on this street; there are about forty or fifty dwelling-houses, three churches,—one Congregational, one Episcopal, and one Methodist,—and four mercantile stores.”

Of Sandy Hook he writes, “The flourishing village of Sandy Hook is situated about one and a half miles northeast of the centre part of Newtown, at the foot of a rocky eminence, a bluff, from the top of which is a fine prospect of the surrounding country. A fine mill-stream (the Pohlattuck) runs in a northerly course through the village at the base of the bluff, which rises almost perpendicularly to the height of one hundred and sixty feet. Near Mr. Sanford’s cotton-factory, at the northern extremity of the village, some traces of coal have been discovered. The village contained, in 1831, one cotton, one hat, one comb, and two woolen-factories. There was also one machine-shop and one establishment for making brass. The village contained about fifty families in 1834; it is at the present time rapidly increasing.”

The following is an abstract from the address delivered at the centennial of the Congregational church:

“What has the past to tell us of the history of our world from the beginning up to the year 1700, when the authentic history of this town and church (as preserved in the documents and records) begins? I say from the beginning, for I propose to begin at the beginning, as every historian should. We need not wait long for an answer to this question. The oldest and the best history of this town, and all towns and all parts of our world—written by inspiration—replies, ‘In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and the earth was without form, and void.’ The elements which compose the soil of this continent and of this town, then, were brought into existence by the creative act of God, and for a time—a long time (we know not how long)—were formless, confused, and unfashioned. But He who created was not idle, and in the successive periods of creation, so vividly and beautifully described in the first chapter of Genesis, He separated earth from water and light from darkness.

“He gathered the waters together into yonder seas and lakes and rivers, and depressed the land into these valleys or uplifted it into these hills; and when, finally, the firm world stood forth with its rocky skeleton, He covered it (in the course of ages) with the soft soil, and then clothed this huge body with the verdure of trees and shrubs and grass, each having its seed within itself. Finally, he placed on a selected portion of the earth man, created in His own image, and made him lord and possessor of all. When God saw what He had made He pronounced it very good. I believe this town was included in the survey, for these hills then rose toward heaven as now; the same streams flowed through these valleys, and these places now so familiar to us were then fully prepared for our habitation. The dust beneath our feet is as old as the world; the rocks in our glens, the bowlders upon our meadows, yonder lake, hollowed out from the midst of the surrounding hills and filled with the water of heaven, this air, this sky, the stars which will look down upon us to-night, all are as they were in the beginning, or rather at the end of the beginning, when God looked upon the rolling earth and pronounced it finished.”

PURCHASE AND SETTLEMENT OF NEWTOWN.

“Thus it came to pass that a company of men from the then important settlements of Stratford and Milford bought a tract of land of the Indians living on a stream called the Pootatuck, which soon after was incorporated as a town, and, in distinction from the old town, Stratford, from which it was taken, called Newtown. This town, then, from the time of its erection, waited for its name, and so its nominal existence, six thousand years at least; but during all this time it was an object of care to Him who created it, and with whom a thousand years are but as one day.

“The town was formally settled in 1709, the first nucleus of a village being, as I am told, on the plain near Mr. Philo Clark’s residence, but afterwards changed to this hill. (On vol. i., page 90, of the town records is a plan of the original thirty-four home-lots on Main Street, each lot sixteen by forty rods, with the names of the original owners.) On Dec. 19, 1710, William Junos and Mr. Bush sold their share for twenty-two pounds ten shillings (about one hundred dollars) to thirty-seven men named in the deed. Among these thirty-seven names I find the following names of families still residing in the town: Hawley, Prindle, Nichols, Curtiss, Sherman, and Judson. Freegrace Adams is also named, but most of them have no descendants or representatives of their name living among us. In the next year—i. e., in 1711—a grist-mill was erected by vote of the town on Pond Brook, and afterwards another on Pootatuck Brook. In 1717 the first school-house was built; it was twenty-five feet square and stood nearly opposite this church; it was used also as a town-house. Other framed buildings soon followed, and the town of Newtown, now fully organized, took its place in history. Homes were established, marriages, births, and deaths

"The first white child born in Newtown was Jeremiah Turner; his grave is near Hawleyville. He was born in 1709 and died in 1778, aged sixty-nine years. The large elm in front of Mr. Russell Wheeler's house, which is over one hundred years old and has sheltered six generations, was planted about the time of his death, and thus is a connecting-link between us and the settlement of this town. May woodman and time alike spare that tree!

"This town, which had its origin in the way related, is one of the largest, if not the largest, in area of the towns in the State. Although once a new town in fact as well as name, it is now one of the oldest of the towns,—older, e.g., than our neighbor, Watertown, by seventy-five years, and older than this nation by seventy years. It has always had an honorable history. Newtown was prosperous, populous, and influential before Bridgeport had a name, and it has given to the world men and women who have lived and do live in deeds and words. Governors, cabinet-officers, legislators have lived here, and one-half score of generations of men, women, and children unknown to fame, but known to God. Oh what an influence has been exerted by the many thousands who have had their homes here! What revelations would be made if the past should speak of them and tell us the story of their hardships and trials, their sorrows and joys!

"Think of all those who erst have been Living where thou art even now,
 Looking upon life's busy scene
 With glance as careless and light as thou.
 All these, like thee, have lived and moved,
 Have seen what now thou lookest upon
 Have feared, hoped, hated, mourned, or loved,
 And now from mortal sight have gone."

"We do think of them to-day, and, thinking, we are made solemn by the thought that we are but a part of the long procession,—that we, too, are passing away; that we soon shall be numbered with the generations that are gone, and our successors will sometime be asking 'the days that are past' about us.

"If the days that are past be compared with those that are present, what wonderful changes will appear! Imagine that the Indians who sold this town to its original proprietors, or those original proprietors themselves, should awake from the sleep of the centuries and survey this goodly land, what would they see which they did not see in 1700 or 1705? In the place of forests and swamps are meadows and cultivated fields; in place of log huts or wigwams are substantial, and often costly, houses; in place of a few red men or hardy settlers is a population of over four thousand. Where the Pootatuck rolled its silent way to the 'Great River' are large manufactories, which supply all parts of the country and the world with articles then unknown, while the railroad and telegraph and our printing-presses would call forth exclamations of astonishment and many questions.

"But I must not forget that we are assembled to-day not to be questioned by our predecessors or ancestors, but to question them. 'Ask now,' says our text, 'of the days that are past.' Let us, then, continue to ask questions of the past. This morning we asked what the past could tell us of history up to the time and during the time of the settlement of this town.

"It would be interesting to recount many more facts and traditions which have come down to us from colonial times, but it is impossible, in such an outline as this, even to allude to them. We therefore hasten to ask another question,—viz. :

"What has the past to tell us of the history of the town, and especially its churches, from 1700 (for our ecclesiastical history begins almost with the century) down to the present time? Here we enter upon a broad and almost boundless field; we can cull only a few of the more important facts and join them, as links in a chain, binding us to the past."

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

"That a church was early founded in this town we cannot doubt, and it is probable that a rude church edifice was built about 1710, succeeded by a better building, fifty by thirty-six feet, erected in 1717 at the intersection of Main Street and a 'lane running east and west,' probably where the liberty-pole now stands. But the first allusion to church matters which I have been able to discover in the abstract of the town records before me is dated Sept. 24, 1711, when, at a meeting of the proprietors of Newtown, it was voted to invite Mr. Phineas Fisk to preach one year 'on trial.'

"Mr. Fisk, it seems, declined the call, and so, on May 21, 1713, or at an adjourned meeting held soon after, a call was extended to Rev. Thomas Tousey, of Wethersfield, to preach for one year at a salary of thirty pounds, afterwards increased to sixty pounds and the proceeds of some land which the society agreed to break up, sow, and harvest."

THE FIRST PASTOR, REV. THOMAS TOUSEY.

"Mr. Tousey graduated at Yale College in 1707. He began his ministry here in or about 1714, and the formal organization of a church occurred soon after, probably on Oct. 17, 1715. An old record states that thirty families were then included in the parish. For a time there seems to have been harmony and good feeling in the church, but in 1723 there appeared signs of restlessness and dissatisfaction; some declared that they could not 'sit easy under him' (I quote from the town records), and others that they 'were of a different persuasion,' meaning, doubtless, that they favored the Church of England. The result was that Mr. Tousey went to England, received a commission as captain in the king's army, and on his return resigned the pastoral office; he remained in the place, however, and took an active part in church matters and in town politics until his death, which occurred March 14, 1761. His grave has been identified, but I have not been able to decipher the moss-covered epigraph. I notice that he was selected to fix the boundary between New Milford and Newtown, and also appointed in 1743 to oppose the formation of a new ecclesiastical society in Newbury, now called Brookfield. He lived, I am told, near the present residence of Mr. C. H. Peck, and was the ancestor of Governor Tousey (whose father lived at the head of the street where Mr. Charles Morehouse now resides) and of all bearing that name who have at any time lived in our town, and also of many of our citizens bearing other names. He was an eminent man, and I regret that so few memories and traditions of him are preserved.

"In July, 1724, just one hundred and fifty-six years ago, the society called Rev. John Beach, of Stratford, giving him in settlement one hundred and twenty-three acres of land and a home-lot of four acres, a house forty by twenty feet, and a salary of sixty pounds, afterwards increased to one hundred pounds.

"In 1735, soon after the erection of the first Episcopal church, the Congregational Society, stimulated, perhaps, to such extravagance by the growth of the other society, added to their church six 'fashionable pews' (fashionable being spelt on the records 'fationable,' and adjoining 'aging,' showing not the ignorance of our ancestors, but the unsettled state of English orthography before the days of Webster). The other seats were merely rough benches, and were probably un-'fationable.' Before this luxurious(?) addition to the church edifice had been made, the society had called another minister, in the person of Rev. Elisha Kent."

PASTORATE OF REV. ELISHA KENT (1733-1740).

"The vote was taken Jan. 30, 1732, and is signed by sixty-four males, all apparently active members of the society, showing that, notwithstanding the withdrawal of Mr. Beach and his party, the society was vigorous, large, and strong. This is further shown by the fact that Mr. Kent's salary in 1740 was two hundred pounds, and his successor's, in 1744, three hundred pounds, or about fifteen hundred dollars, — a large sum for those days, even if paid in what were called 'bills of credit.' The society, it appears, also gave Mr. Kent one hundred and four acres in settlement, provided (and here I quote from the record) 'that Mr. Elisha Kent shall give good security that if he shall see cause to alter his principles from ye foundation on which he shall be settled, he will pay ye above Presbyterian party ye sum of four hundred pounds lawful money,' or about two thousand dollars. You will observe that those shrewd men did not intend to lose their minister again without making him pay roundly for the trouble he would cause them.

"But they did not foresee the trouble he would make in another direction. About ten years after his settlement certain charges were alleged against him; there was a long and tedious investigation on the part of the church and association, and he finally was dismissed. The documents relating to the trial and to the man are very voluminous, and after a somewhat careful perusal I am in doubt (and it seems to me that his associates were in doubt) as to his innocence or guilt. I cannot but think that he was harshly judged, and so misjudged. He appears to have lived a useful life ever after, and was much esteemed by his church in South East, N. Y., where he died July 17, 1776. He was the grandfather of Chief Justice and Chancellor Kent, one of the most eminent men of his day, and great-grandfather of Elisha Kent Kane, the renowned Arctic explorer."

PASTORATE OF REV. DAVID JUDSON (1743-1776).

"Mr. Kent's successor was Rev. David Judson, who was ordained in September, 1743. For many years the church and society were united and prosperous under Mr. Judson. I note a few items of interest: In 1745 the church edifice was repaired at an expense of two hundred and thirty pounds; glass was inserted in sashes,—something new for those days; a bell of five hundred pounds' weight was procured, and apparently was melted and recast and rehung on the 3d day of July, 1768. This bell cost twenty-seven pounds four shillings. It still hangs in the steeple, and for more than one hundred years has summoned the people to the sanctuary and tolled the knell of the departed. I saw it recently, and read upon it this inscription: 'The gift of Cap. Amos Botsford and Lt. Nath. Briscoe; John Witter, fecit 1768.' Perhaps some one who now reads this will follow their example, and put a new bell in the steeple to record his name and speak his fame with its iron tongue for one hundred years to come.

"Mr. Judson and the majority of the church, it would seem, were not favorable towards the Saybrook Platform, and some items recorded have led me to think that they sympathized with the Sandemanians, or Glassites; but no definite action was taken, and the church soon returned to the orthodox faith.

"Mr. Judson died, after a long ministry of thirty-three years, Sept. 24, 1776, aged sixty-two, of a disease caught, as it is said, while visiting the American camp in the Revolutionary war. His grave is in our cemetery; a cypress, evidently self-sown, grows out of the heart, as if to keep his memory green.

"There is among the records of the church a time-stained and faded, but very valuable, record of the births, marriages, and deaths for a quarter of a century, in Mr. Judson's handwriting; the last entry is that of Mr. Judson's own death, made by some friendly hand.

"The following summary of Mr. Judson's ministry may be of interest; it was compiled from the ancient record referred to: Ministry from 1743 to 1776, thirty-three years; marriages, 1743 to 1776, two hundred and twenty-six, or yearly seven; deaths, 1756 to 1776, three hundred and seventy-eight, or yearly nineteen; baptisms, 1744 to 1776, eight hundred and eighty-seven (including thirteen slave-children owned by seven masters), and eight adults,—only eight,—showing how almost universal infant baptism was at that time. The average number of children baptized yearly in this church was twenty-seven. Received into the church: (a) On owning the covenant, from 1743 to 1776, ninety; (b) by letter, 1757 to 1776, five; (c) by profession, 1757 to 1776, one hundred and sixty-nine (or yearly eight). Total additions in twenty-three years, two hundred and sixty-four.

“There were probably one hundred and fifty families connected with this congregation at that time, and over two hundred members. All the eight hundred and seventy-nine children whose baptism is recorded by Mr. Judson are now dead; the last survivor was Mr. Lampson Birch, who was baptized Oct. 27, 1771. (His widow reached the advanced age of one hundred and two, and died in 1879.)

“In the year 1758 (the record continues) there were thirty-four deaths, nearly double the usual number. Of these, one was a child of Lieut. Winton, ‘which waded into Taunton Pond and was drowned, aged seven years;’ another a son of Alexander Bryon, who died in the Revolutionary army; and another a son of William Northrop, about twenty years old, ‘who was lost in the armie by the sword of the enemy in September.’ This was the year of the capture of Louisburg and of the expedition against Ticonderoga and Crown Point.

“In the church in that year (1778) ‘Watts’ Psalms were adopted to be used altogether in public worship, and Deacon Northrop read the Psalms and Ebenezer Ford and James Blackman tuned them.’

“Among the baptisms recorded is this: ‘Venus, negro child belonging to Abner Booth, baptized Oct. 26, 1743.’

“Among the marriages this: ‘Peter Negro and Ginny Negro (Negro being used as the family name), servants to Matthew Curtis, were married April 3, 1752.’

“Negro slavery in Newtown! How strange this reads at the present day, when not a slave exists in the United States.

“There is also in this record a long list of deaths, with the diseases which ended life, —a list enumerating all the ills to which flesh is heir. If I should give the list many, perhaps most, of the present native inhabitants of this town would learn when, where, and of what their ancestors died, for there is scarcely a family name in Newtown but is included in this list. This is one thing that ought to unite all the residents of this town in their interest in and affection for this church; in this church your ancestors were baptized, and by its ministers they were married and buried.

This church is the ecclesiastical homestead of all Newtown. Let me suggest that measures be taken to copy and preserve this old record; it is becoming more and more illegible every year, and yet more and more valuable every year. I have deposited it for safe-keeping in the town clerk’s office.

“It is supposed that the church edifice of the Congregational Society was occupied by troops during the war of the Revolution, and the vane now on the steeple bears the marks of bullets then fired. This town was intensely loyal to the ‘loving and loved Sovereign Lord, King George,’ as he was styled, and in 1775 presented an able protest to the State Legislature against the action of Congress. (See town records, vol. iv., pages 30-34.) The town, however, furnished its quota.

“This society at the close of the Revolutionary war was in a low condition, on account of the loss in men and means occasioned by the war, and the parsonage, which must have stood on or near the site of the present Episcopal church edifice, was sold to pay its debts.”

PASTORATE OF REV. Z. H. SMITH (1783-1798).

“Zephaniah H. Smith was the next minister. He, as well as all his predecessors and most of his successors, was a graduate of Yale College. His pastorate began in 1783. A tax of one penny on every pound was assessed in order to provide him a settlement. A house on the main street was also built for him in 1786 (the same now owned by Mr. George Stuart), but he made the society a poor return for their generosity. The records show that he tried to break up the church organization and to form a Sandemanian Church upon its ruins. He caused those who opposed him to be excommunicated, and finally abandoned his charge without being dismissed, leaving the church almost a wreck, floating upon the troubled sea without a pilot and almost without a crew. But a few faithful souls remained in the ship, and, although discouraged, they nobly stood at their post and rescued the Zion they loved from utter destruction. Mr. Smith removed to Glastonbury, in this State, became a lawyer, and died in 1836, aged seventy-seven. His daughters still reside there, and have become known to fame by their refusal to pay taxes unless allowed to vote. They are also known as accomplished scholars, and have recently published a translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew and Greek, for all of which Newtown can claim its share of the honor.

“The church edifice, which until 1793 had stood in the middle of the street, nearly opposite its present location, was moved back to its present site, the Episcopal Society (since it was for their accommodation) bearing the expense and doing the work.”

PASTORATE OF REV. JEDU CLARKE.

“John Clarke was the next pastor. He resided just opposite the present parsonage. He was installed in 1799, the services being held (by invitation) in the Episcopal church. The Congregational Church was now at the lowest ebb in its history; it was so completely demoralized that it was reorganized, and comparatively few were found who were willing to identify themselves with it.

"In 1808 an attempt was made to build a new Congregational church edifice, and in order to raise funds a public lottery was held, authorized, as was the custom of the day, by the Legislature. As might have been expected, this ill-advised course did more harm than good, and during the war of 1812 the church was so deeply involved in debt that a tax of seventeen cents on the dollar was assessed to meet expenses. The church edifice was only partially finished, and for want of support Mr. Clarke resigned in 1816; he died in 1839.

"Several candidates supplied the pulpit from 1816 to 1825, among them Rev. Lauren P. Hickok, D.D., since president of Union College, and Rev. Mr. Burritt, whose labors were blessed in the conversion of at least sixteen persons who united with the church and greatly strengthened it; but still the membership was comparatively small, and many recorded as members were absent from the place."

PASTORATE OF REV. WILLIAM MITCHELL.

"Rev. William Mitchell was elected pastor and installed Jan. 14, 1825. Mr. Mitchell was a faithful and laborious pastor,—one of the best, I should judge, the church has had. During his ministry there was a powerful revival, chiefly in Taunton, which resulted in many conversions and twenty additions to this church. A 'Ladies' and Gentlemen's Missionary Society' was successfully established, also a temperance society. The church and society, however, unfortunately lost about one-half of the fund (which had accumulated during successive pastorates) by the failure of the Eagle Bank in New Haven. Although crippled by the loss, five hundred dollars were spent in repairing the church edifice and eighty-five dollars in procuring the communion-set now in use.

Mr. Mitchell resigned and was dismissed May 31, 1831. He moved to Vermont and then to Corpus Christi, Texas, where he died of yellow fever, Aug. 1, 1867."

PASTORATE OF REV. N. M. URNSTON.

"Rev. N. M. Urnston's pastorate began Dec. 5, 1832, and ended April 1, 1838. He, as well as Mr. Mitchell, lived at the head of the street where Mrs. Bennett Fairchild now resides. Nothing of special interest occurred during his pastorate. The church records abound in accounts of trials and excommunications; it is to be regretted, I think, that names and facts were not suppressed. It is better to hide a brother's fault than to make it the subject of a lengthy record. It is well that the church should be purified and cleansed, but not at all necessary to preserve the filth and the rubbish. 'Let the past, then, bury its dead from our sight.'

"Mr. Urnston, after leaving Newtown, preached in Cornwall and Sherman, in this State, and then went to Ohio. I received a card from him recently; he is very feeble and infirm, and may not be living now. He was succeeded by several temporary supplies—Rev. Mr. Leadbetter, Rev. Mr. Ambler, and others—until 1845, when Rev. Jason Atwater became stated supply."

PASTORATE OF REV. JASON ATWATER.

"Mr. Atwater, like Mr. Mitchell, was a conscientious and faithful pastor. He resided where Mrs. Booth Terrill now lives; indeed, there is scarcely a building in Main Street that does not seem at some time to have been occupied by a minister of this or some other church. The interests of the churches in general, and of this church in particular, were dear to Mr. Atwater, and he labored hard and successfully in this his chosen field. At first there was a decided advance under his leadership; the broken walls of Zion were literally and figuratively repaired, for after a three years' effort twelve hundred dollars were raised, and the church edifice, which had again become somewhat dilapidated, was renovated, put in good repair, and dedicated anew Jan. 7, 1847. The congregation increased in numbers, and a new life seemed infused into the church. But a decline or a reaction set in, and the question of abandoning the ground and removing the church to Sandy Hook was seriously agitated. A council, however, advised against it, and God set his seal of approval upon the decision by graciously reviving his work and adding to His church thirty-five members, many of whom have been, and are now, the most valued and useful of our number.

"In 1852 the basement was fitted up and new seats and a new pulpit provided for the audience-room of the church, at an expense of five hundred dollars. There seems, however, to have been another reaction. Some of the strong arms upon which the pastor leaned were taken away by death or removal, and, somewhat discouraged, Mr. Atwater accepted a call to Southbury. He showed his continued love for and interest in this church by leaving it a legacy of one hundred and fifty dollars at his death, which occurred in 1860."

RECENT PASTORATES.

"The remaining pastors of this church until the year 1874—Rev. W. H. Moore, Rev. W. F. Arms, Rev. D. W. Fox, Rev. H. B. Smith—are yet among the living; their work is not yet done, and of them and their work, therefore, we will not speak at length. Mr. Moore's pastorate lasted from 1856 to 1862, when he was dismissed to be a bishop over our Connecticut churches. He still fills the responsible position of State secretary. Mr. Arms' pastorate was very short, only about a year, from May, 1863, to September, 1864. He went from here to Greenwich, Conn., then removed to Pennsylvania, and is now in Sunderland, Mass., pastor of a church of more than three hundred members. Mr. Fox was the first minister who occupied your pleasant and commodious parsonage, which cost about two thousand dollars but is now worth more than twice that amount, proving our Saviour's words, 'Give, and it shall be given.' No society or individual loses by a generous act. Mr. Fox, like his predecessor, Mr. Moore, was the registrar of this Association; his health unfortunately soon failed and he was dismissed; he is now pastor of a church in New Jersey.

"This church, therefore, had three pastors during the late civil war, in striking contrast with the Revolutionary period, when it had one pastor for a third of a century and until he died.

"Rev. Henry B. Smith was the next pastor, from 1867 to 1873. From here he removed to Greenfield Hill, thence to Staffordville, Conn., and is now living in South Amherst, Mass. He was a faithful pastor and an earnest worker, especially in the Sabbath-school."

THE PRESENT PASTORATE.

"The present pastorate has been the longest this church has had in more than one hundred years (with two exceptions). Your minister* preached his first sermon in this church Jan. 11, 1874. The previous year the interior of the church had been remodeled and beautified, as you see it to-day, at an expense of two thousand five hundred dollars. Since then seventy have been added to the church and fourteen hundred dollars to the fund (five hundred dollars being donated by Miss Sarah Blackman, of New Haven, a descendant of the first pastor, Rev. Thomas Tousey). The debt resting on the society has been paid; we are at peace among ourselves; this church, I am assured, numerically and financially, is now more prosperous than at any time for a century past. And yet it never needed the help of all its members and friends more than now. If this help is given, this church may recover what it has lost and be in generations to come what it was in colonial times, before the war for our liberty drained it of its resources and members. If so, we will be thankful; if not, we will be hopeful and still do our work. For this church has a work to do; it is a 'free union church,' where all who love our Lord and cherish a hope of immortality and heaven may have a home; where an evangelical gospel shall be preached, but each one be permitted and expected to think for himself. 'We preach as those who must give an account,' but we 'judge not, that we be not judged.' God is the Judge of all. Our motto is, 'In essentials, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity.' Brethren and friends, if all you who are, or ought to be, interested in the welfare of this church do your whole duty its future is assured. Such is the past and present of this church; the past has told its story.

* Rev. J. P. Hoyt.

"One hundred years from now the pastor of this church (who will he be?) will doubtless prepare a centennial sermon similar to this, and to him we will commit the record. What will that record be? What will be the future of this nation, this town, and of this church? Will the changes of the future be as great as those of the past? Who will comprise this audience one hundred years hence? When the congregation is dismissed on that day and the people go to their homes, how will this street and village look to them? What will be the religious sentiment of the place and day? Will the immortal soul then be estimated at its true value? We cannot answer these questions; they belong to the future, and to the future we leave them. We have performed our task; we have (as directed in the text) asked questions only of the 'days that are past,' and we have recorded the answers. And now, farewell to the past. We break the connection again; we busy ourselves with the present; we leave the future with God, praying that he will bless this ancient church, this loved town, with its churches, and schools, and interests, this illustrious commonwealth, this great nation, and trusting that when another century has rolled by, and we for many years have slept with our fathers, church and town and State and nation may be stronger and purer and better than now."

TRINITY CHURCH.†

The first church building was erected in 1733, and stood in the road nearly opposite the present brick town-house. Rev. Dr. Beardsley, in his "History of the Church in Connecticut," remarks,—

"It is said that the frame of the building in Newtown, twenty-eight feet long and twenty-four feet wide, was raised on Saturday, the roof boards were put on the same evening, and the next day the handful of churchmen assembled for divine service under its imperfect protection, sitting upon the timbers and kneeling upon the ground."

Previous to the erection of this first church building, history informs us that, because there was no suitable place for assembling, the Rev. John Beach, rector, invited the few professors of the Church of England to meet in his own house, where for a considerable time he conducted the church services; and the first sermon preached by him was under an immense buttonball (or sycamore) tree that stood on the green in front of the present residence of Charles C. Warner, Esq.

In 1746 a second church building was erected, which Dr. Beardsley says—doubtless quoting the words of Rev. John Beach in his report to the Propagation Society—"was a strong, neat building, forty-six feet long and thirty-five wide."

Forty-four years passed away, during which time the people continued worshipping in that church, but, probably owing to its prosperity and growth, it was found to be too small to accommodate the worshippers, and we find from the parish records that a society's meeting was held Nov. 2, 1790, when a vote was taken "to build a new church house."

We find that then, as now, there were obstacles in the way of pushing such things along, for at an adjourned meeting, held Nov. 25, 1790, an effort was made to rescind the aforesaid vote, which was defeated. At a meeting held Dec. 30, 1790, "Resolved, That if we do build a new church, that it shall be erected where the town-house now stands."

Passing along until Oct. 3, 1791, it was "Resolved, That we will build the church by signation, provided we can get subscribed one thousand pounds lawful money by the second Tuesday in November next." At an adjourned meeting held Nov. 8, 1791, "Resolved, That the bigness of the church-house shall be sixty-eight feet by forty-eight."

March 5, 1792, another meeting was held, when it was voted that the price of the common timber for building the church be four pence per square foot, brought to the place of building and well dressed; and a committee was also appointed to appraise the extraordinary timber.

This church was finished in 1793, and received its name at a parish-meeting held June 17, 1793, when it was voted that the new church be called "Trinity." It stood just north of the present site of the stone edifice. No record can be found giving an account of its consecration, but it was consecrated by the venerable Bishop Seabury, the first bishop of America. It was said to have been for a long time the largest house of Episcopal worship in the State, and tradition records that it excited the wonder of the surrounding country, so that people came from all directions to visit it; and for more than three-quarters of a century it stood a noble monument of the liberality, public spirit, and piety of the men who erected it.

At the time of its erection Rev. Philo Perry was rector, on a salary of one hundred pounds per year, officiating one-fourth part of the time in Brookfield, and the salary was provided for by a tax of three per cent. on the pound on the grand list of the town. Stoves and fire in church were then unknown, and for twenty-seven years the worshippers had no tax to pay for fuel, but at a meeting held Jan. 24, 1820, it was "Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to erect a stove in Trinity Church." In this church were held three Diocesan Conventions, in the years 1801, 1806, and 1826.

Although missionary work had been done to some extent in Newtown as far back as 1722, and perhaps previous to that year, yet there could properly be said to be no church organization here until 1732, when the Rev. John Beach, then a young man, who had been settled for eight years among the Independents at Newtown and very popular with all classes, publicly informed his people of a change in his views in favor of the Church of England. He was entered as a communicant at Stratford, his native place, Easter Day, April 9th of the same year, went to England for holy orders, and, returning with them in September, 1732, commenced his work, and in six months after speaks of having forty communicants. His rectorship extended over a period of fifty years,—from 1732 to 1782.

He was followed by Rev. Philo Perry, rector from 1787 to 1798. He was succeeded by Rev. Daniel Burhans, D.D., rector from Aug. 5, 1799, to Nov. 1, 1830; Rev. Samuel C. Stratton, 1831-39; Rev. S. S. Setocking, 1841-48; Rev. William Carmichael, 1850-52; Rev. Benjamin W. Stone, D.D., 1852-56; Rev. Newton E. Marble, D.D., 1857-78, when he was obliged to resign on account of physical infirmities; Rev. Thomas W. Harkins, Oct. 14, 1878, to Oct. 1, 1880.

From the report made to the Diocesan Convention by the rector in June, 1880, there were then one hundred and eighty-nine families and three hundred and thirty-one communicants in the parish. At the meeting of the Diocesan Convention in June, 1880, a new parish was formed within the limits of the present Trinity Church, Newtown, to be known as St. John's Parish, Sandy Hook.

We have no means of ascertaining who were the first officers of the church. The officers at the present time are as follows: Wardens, Beach Camp, William B. Prindle; Vestrymen, Simeon B. Peck, Charles Skidmore, Philo Clark, E. Levan Johnson, Hobert B. Camp, Albert W. Peck, Homer A. Hawley; Clerk, Daniel G. Beers; Treasurer, Frederick Sanford.

The first movements towards building the present beautiful stone edifice, that stands just south of the site of the old church building, were inaugurated at a parish-meeting held Sept. 12, 1866, but the building was not completed until January, 1870. The first sermon delivered in the new church was by the rector, Rev. Newton E. Marble, D.D., on Feb. 6, 1870, from 2 Cor. v. 17: "Old things are passed away, behold all things are become new."

Heretofore the churches erected by the parish had been temporary structures, as all wood buildings are, and could last but a comparatively short time, but the noble edifice of which we now write will stand sound and solid when centuries have rolled away and the many generations that have worshiped within its sacred walls shall have mouldered to dust,—unless it shall be destroyed by some unforeseen catastrophe or convulsion of nature,—a noble monument to the memory of those men and women who contributed of their time and means to accomplish so desirable an end.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SANDY HOOK.

As nearly as we can ascertain, about the year 1800 a class was formed and Methodist preaching was given by two local preachers, Levi Bunson and Joseph Pierce, in a house that stood upon the ground where Trinity church now stands, in Newtown Street. The first preaching by an itinerant minister was by Samuel M. Erwin, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, about the year 1804.

In 1805 a class was formed as a nucleus to forming a church organization. Here follow the names of the original class-paper: Isaac Sanford, Ann Sanford, Benjamin Curtiss, Polly Curtiss, Sally Curtiss, Amca Summers, Hannah Gamley, Sarah Lyon, Jacob Raymond, Hannah Platt, Semiah Sanford, Sabia Booth, Polly Nap, Betsey Hand, Beach Bennett, Sarah Anderson.

The circuit over which the itinerants traveled was from Milford to New Milford, and from Dantown to the Housatonic River, about forty by fifty miles. At this time there was but one Methodist Episcopal church building, and situated at Easton.

A class was formed at Flat Swamp (western part of Newtown) as early as 1828. Circuit preaching was had, once in about four weeks at school-house or at private dwelling. There was circuit preaching in Newtown once in two weeks on a week-day. In 1831 John Lovejoy held a love-feast at the town-hall. It was on this occasion that the speaking of a certain female produced such an impression that some of the citizens said the Methodists shall have a church.

About this time trustees were appointed, viz.: Uriah Hays, of Brookfield, Isaac Scudder, Alanson Gilbert, Ebenezer Blackman, Zera Blackman, and Benjamin Curtiss, Jr. They entered at once upon the work of building a church edifice, which was dedicated by William Dykiman in 1831, situated on Newtown Street, south of Dick's Hotel.

Here follow a list of preachers who have labored in the circuit from 1805 to 1850: Peter Monarty, Samuel Mervine, 1805; Nathan Feleh, Oliver Sykes, 1806; J. M. Smith, Zalman Lyon, 1807; N. W. Thomas, Jonathan Lyon, 1808; Billy Hubbard, Isaac Candor, 1809; Nathan Emery, John Russell, 1810; A. Hunt, O. Sykes, J. Reynolds, 1811; Seth Orville, G. Lyon, S. Beach, 1812; A. Hunt, H. Eames, 1813; E. Washburn, R. Harris, 1814; Elijah Robbins, Benjamin English, 1815; R. Harris, 1816; R. Harris, E. Canfield, 1817; Samuel Bushnell, A. Pierce, 1818; Beardsley Northrup, David Miller, 1819; Bela Smith, David Miller, 1820; Bela Smith, James Coleman, 1821; Labem Clark, Eli Bennett, 1822; Labem Clark, John Nixon, 1823; E. Denniston, John S. Pierce, 1824; E. Denniston, Julius Field, 1825; S. O. Ferguson, W. V. Buck, and ——— Lucky (supply), 1826; Eli Bennett, W. V. Buck, 1827; John Lovejoy, J. H. Romer, O. Sykes (supply), 1828; John Lovejoy, J. H. Romer, 1829; Horace Bartlet, Charles Shuman, 1830; John Lovejoy, 1831; Luther Meade, O. Sykes (supply), 1832; J. Hunt, J. B. Beach, 1833; J. Bower, J. B. Beach, 1834; H. Humphrey, John Davis, 1835; John Dykiman, 1836; C. Silliman, 1837; John D.

Bangs (died here), 1838; N. Meade, 1839-40; S. J. Stebbins, 1841-42; L. Clark, G. L. Fuller, 1843; A. S. Hill and G. L. Fuller, in 1844-45; S. W. Smith, 1846-47; L. D. Nickerson, 1848; N. C. Lewis, 1849-50.

During the year 1850 the church edifice at Newtown was sold and a more commodious one built at Sandy Hook, a small village one mile and three-quarters east of Newtown, at a cost of three thousand three hundred dollars. The Rev. Dr. Kennedy preached the dedication sermon, and the following have filled the pulpit to the year 1880: W. H. Bangs, 1851-52; P. Lovejoy, 1853-54; A. McAlister, 1855-56; ——— Gidman, 1857; Benjamin Redford, 1858; R. K. Reynolds, 1859-60; Edward Oldine, 1861-62; S. H. Platt, 1863-64; S. C. Lamb, 1865; B. A. Gilman, 1866-67; F. W. Lockwood, 1868-69; A. M. Sherman, 1870; Sylvester Smith, 1871-72; without supply, 1873; Joseph W. Pattison, 1874-75; James Taylor, 1876-78; Cornell S. Dykiman, 1879-80.

This church recommended Luman Sanford for admission into the Conference about 1830; Isaac Sanford, 1840; G. A. Hubbell, 1845 (now presiding elder in New Haven District); S. H. Platt, 1853; William T. Hill, 1855 (now presiding elder in Bridgeport District).

This church has Deman Blackman and Edgar Butt as local preachers; local deacons, Thomas Clinger, H. L. Wheeler.

The present officers are Ezra Patch, Henry L. Wheeler, Silas E. Fairchild, Elias S. Sanford, B. B. Curtiss, Trustees.

OTHER CHURCHES, ETC.

The disintegration (as we may term it) of the Congregational Church must have encouraged the Methodist brethren to form a separate church organization, for we are informed that their first class met in 1800, the first preaching services being held in the house of Mrs. Phoebe Peck, just above the village, and afterwards in the old town-house. Their first meeting-house stood near Mrs. Briscoe's residence. Since that time there have been eighty-six ministers of that denomination who have supplied the pulpit, either in the old Methodist church at Newtown (which was dedicated in 1831) or in the present church edifice in Sandy Hook, which was built in 1850.

A Universalist Society, organized early in the century, built a commodious house of worship in the central part of the village, but afterwards sold it to the Catholic Society, and now hold no separate services. This church edifice, with the small Baptist church in Zoar and the Union chapel in Taunton, erected by the generosity of Mrs. Polly Beers in 1878, completes the list of churches. St. James' chapel, which once crowned Zoar Hill, having years ago been abandoned.

* During the year 1850 the society built a parsonage at a cost of eighteen hundred dollars.

The Catholic Church is now so strong that a change to the plain near the depot and the erection of a larger building and series of buildings is in contemplation.

GRANITE LODGE, NO. 122, I. O. G. T.

This lodge was instituted May 5, 1869, with fifty-seven members, as follows: Rev. F. W. Lockwood, Mrs. O. P. Gately, Mrs. M. A. Tomlinson, W. W. Perkins, Silas N. Beers, Martha A. Akley, Sarah N. Beers, George R. Couch, Charles M. Parsons, Ezra J. Hall, Cornelia M. Tucker, Sarah Woffenden, Mary C. Tenant, Ella C. Gately, M. Ella Couch, Julia S. Gibson, Annie White, Mary C. Woffenden, Mary E. Beers, Mary F. Peck, Grace Nichols, Emily Sanford, Augustus Allen, Eliza Crofut, Mrs. N. R. Couch, Sarah E. Northup, Eva E. May, Ann E. Sanford, Arthur D. Allen, Ann Gillett, Mrs. Sarah Wheeler, Abel F. Gillett, Mrs. Z. S. Peck, N. R. Couch, Annie B. Northup, Mrs. M. C. Perkins, Fannie E. Hurlbut, Julia H. Towle, Charles E. Jones, Frederick Bechler, Chester Hard, Emily A. Bennett, Robert M. Prindle, Charles Hurlbut, Mary E. Hough, Annie E. Booth, John J. Haight, William Brewer, James E. Parsons, Sarah E. Haight, P. H. Skidmore, H. B. Smith, John D. Bolan, Annie M. Sherman, Reba J. Lockwood, Bella Judson, Sylvester Beers.

The first regular meeting was held May 14, 1869, with the following officers: W. W. Perkins, W. C. T.; Julia H. Towle, W. V. T.; Rev. F. W. Lockwood, W. Chap.; Charles M. Parsons, W. Sec.; Mrs. O. P. Gately, W. A. S.; Silas N. Beers, W. T. S.; Sarah N. Beers, W. T.; Ezra J. Hall, W. M.; Julia S. Gibson, W. D. M.; Eva E. May, W. I. G.; George R. Couch, W. O. G.; Emily A. Sanford, W. R. H. S.; Cornelia M. Tucker, W. L. H. S.; Charles E. Jones, P. W. C. T. Since the lodge was instituted two hundred and fifty members have been enrolled. Among the fruits of its efforts are three lodges of juvenile Temples,—Alpha, No. 1, being the first lodge of juvenile templars instituted in the State, and located at Sandy Hook; Olive Branch, No. 14, at Newtown, South Centre District, and Myrtle, No. 26, at Newtown, North Centre District.

Alpha Juvenile Temple, No. 1, was instituted March 6, 1871. The charter members were Curtis P. Gately, Ada J. Leland, William H. Perkins, Julia H. Gibson, Olive P. Gately, Sadie D. Gately.

Olive Branch Temple, No. 14, was instituted May, 1874, with following charter members: Chas. Johnson, Lee Johnson, Annie Henderson, Susie Beers, Willie Partridge, Willie Johnson, Freddie Johnson, Julia Henderson, Robert Tomlinson, John Tomlinson, Clarence Minor, Susie I. and Edith J. Wason.

Myrtle Temple, No. 26, was instituted Jan. 1, 1879. Charter members: Wallace Hoyt, Willie Hoyt, George Pearce, Samuel Pearce, Emma Hoyt, Lillie Cook, Harry Cook, George Hoyt, Bertha Cook, Maggie Riminsland, Julia Riminsland.

SCHOOLS.

The first reference in the old records to schools appears under date "Sept. 13, 1727," when it was "Agreed and Voted, That there shall be School-house erected between y^e Date above s^d and December next ensuing y^e s^d Date, and y^e Charges rising in building s^d school-house shall be Defrayed by y^e town Rates of y^e Inhabitants of s^d town.

"Test: Jos. PECK,
"Clerk."

For present condition of schools, see General History.

THE BOROUGH OF NEWTOWN.

The borough of Newtown was incorporated in May, 1821, and on the 2d of the following month the first officers were chosen. These were: Clerk, Charles Chapman; Warden, Asa Chapman; Senior Burgess, Benjamin F. Shelton; Junior Burgesses, Eli Bennett, Oscar Glover, Thomas Blackman, Squire Dibble, and David B. Botsford; Treasurer, Henry Beers; Bailiff, Theophilus Nichols; Haywards, Thomas Seely, John Rogers, and Harry Sherman; Pound-keeper, Squire Dibble; Street Inspectors, McPherson Sherman and Elijah Botsford; Fire Inspectors, Arcillus Hamlin, Philo Whitney, and Oscar Keeler; Collector of Taxes, John Johnson.

There has been no meeting held in the borough to elect officers for some time.

NEWTOWN SAVINGS BANK.

This institution was organized July 1, 1855. The first board of trustees were Walter Clarke, Henry Beers Glover, David B. Beers, Theophilus Nichols, Jerome Judson, Henry Baldwin, Alva B. Beecher, Henry Sanford, Moses Parsons, Zerah Fairman, Samuel Curtis, James B. Blakslee, Saller P. Barnum, Monroe Judson, Charles F. Blakslee, William Beard, Henry Baldwin. The first officers were: President, Henry Beers; Vice-Presidents, David H. Johnson, Edward Starr, Samuel B. Peck; Secretary and Treasurer, Henry Beers Glover.

The present board of trustees is as follows: Charles C. Warner, Simeon B. Peck, Hezekiah Peck, Philo Clarke, Henry Sanford, William L. Terrill, Aaron Sanford, Monroe Judson, John Judson, William S. Northrop, Abel Stilson, E. M. Peck, C. B. Sherman, H. B. Northrop, D. G. Beers, William Botsford.

The first deposit in this bank was made by Henry Beers Glover, in trust for Mary Gover; amount, $2.00. Present amount of deposits, $344,121.57.

NEWSPAPERS.

The Newtown Bee was established by A. A. BenseL, June 27, 1877, with John T. Pearce as editor and manager. It was continued by Mr. BenseL until April, 1878, when Mr. Pearce became sole owner. In September, 1879, it was purchased by A. H. Hawkins, who conducted it until February, 1880, when Mr. Pearce resumed its ownership and editorial management. March 15, 1880, it was purchased by H. A. Van Dalsem, who published it a few months, when Mr. Pearce again assumed control, and is its present editor and proprietor.

The Bee is a lively local journal, and is in a prosperous condition, having a good circulation and advertising patronage.

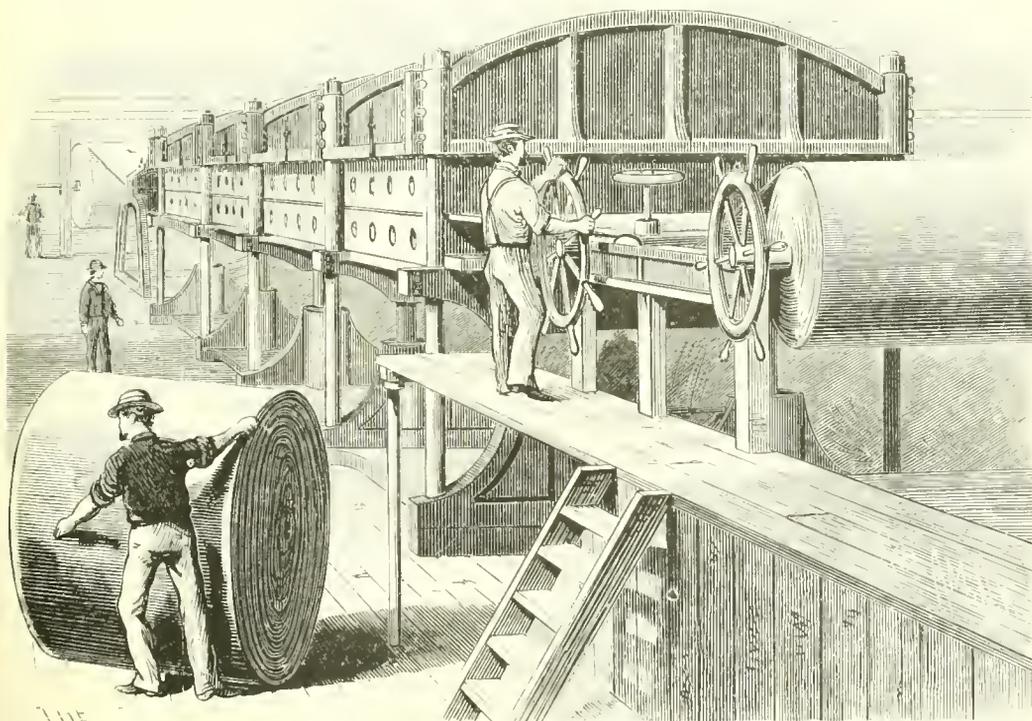

The Newtown Chronicle was established March 27, 1880, by J. A. Maddigan, and is now conducted by him.

THE NEW YORK BELTING AND PACKING COMPANY.

This is the largest institution of its kind in the world. "The making of vulcanized rubber fabrics adapted to mechanical purposes," says the Scientific American, "is here carried on in a way which indi-is in either water, steam, or compressed air, together with a variety of valves, gaskets, and rings for similar use; hose for fire-engines and watering gardens, besides heavy steam and brewers' hose; wagon- and car-springs, gas-tubing, solid vulcanite emery-wheels, corrugated matting and mats, cushions for billiard-tables, etc. A full list of their productions would, indeed, make a formidable catalogue, but the interest therein to the general reader would be enhanced by the reflection that in so few years a comparatively unknown substance had come to play so important a part in our industries."

We illustrate one of the most wonderful machines for manufacturing vulcanized rubber belting, etc., whereby perfectly smooth surfaces and great solidity are insured. This press will take a belt six feet wide and fifteen feet of its length at once; it weighs eighty-five thousand pounds; the steam is let into the bed and platen so that the temperature can be readily icates the full fruition of Charles Goodyear's anticipations, whether we consider the quantity and variety of goods made or the highly important relations which these productions hold to all industrial pursuits, for in many cases they meet wants never before satisfied and fit needs for which no equally good substitute could be devised. The articles regularly manufactured at this factory include bands or belting for running machinery, from the largest belts ever made down to the smallest sizes in use; packing, to make tight joints in pumps, engines, etc., where the work regulated; the platen is stationary, and the bed is lifted by hydraulic pressure. The most novel feature of this great press, however, is that it is arranged with appliances at each end for stretching the belts, so that, while the belt is under the full tension of the heaviest strain it may be desired to put upon it, it may at the same time be compressed between the hot plates, and thus set its fibres as firmly as a bar of steel.

They manufactured the immense driving and elevator belts for the Buckingham elevators at Chicago, which have been running perfectly for more than twelve years; also those for Armour, Dole & Co., Chicago, and Vanderbilt's great elevators of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroads, New York, being the largest belts in the world. They have just manufactured (1880) an elevator belt thirty-six inches wide and two thousand five hundred feet in length, which will weigh over eighteen thousand pounds. The company own the patent for this stretcher in combination with the press, as they do many other patents of great importance in the business. The principal Goodyear patent on vulcanizing expired in 1865, but this company had then been many years manufacturing, and had obtained subsequent patents for improvements, some of which are of great value in their present manufactory.

The offices, salesroom, and warehouse of the company are at 37 and 38 Park Row, New York. John H. Cheever is the treasurer of the company and general manager of the business. Mr. D. C. Gately is superintendent of the works, which are located at Sandy Hook.

In addition to the numerous establishments mentioned above are the following manufactories: Blanket factory, owned by Sturtevant & Son, of New York; combs and buttons, Samuel Curtis & Sons; button-factory, John Griffen; and the establishment of S. A. Blackman & Co.

RAILROADS.

The town is well supplied with railroads. The Housatonic extends northwest through the centre of the town, with stations at Botsford, Newtown, and Hawleyville, intersecting at the latter place with the Shepaug Railroad, which crosses the northern part of the town. This road extends from Litchfield, in Litchfield County, to Bethel in this county. The New York and New England Railroad, now in process of construction, will also intersect with the above roads at Hawleyville.

CIVIL AND MILITARY HISTORY.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM 1747 TO 1880.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HENRY SANFORD.

This worthy descendant of Josiah Sanford was born in Newtown, June 2, 1822.

He remained with his parents until he attained his fourteenth year, in the mean time enjoying the benefits of the neighborhood school and the wholesome practical lessons daily taught by his father's precepts and example. It was a part of his father's religious belief, to which he tenaciously held, that children should be made to form habits of industry, to be applied not only to books but to business pursuits. The father was jovial, and encouraged his children in their legitimate sports, yet the main object of his training was to prepare them for life in its reality, and with Henry, no less than with his brothers and sisters, was this parental treatment made available in the near three-score years that he has battled with the world.

At fourteen years of age he was placed by his father at Baldwin & Beers', who kept a general store in the village of Newtown. He remained with this firm seven years at fifty dollars per annum, and from this scanty allowance he was expected to purchase clothing, keep in pocket change, and lay by for a rainy day.

Reaching his majority, his employers engaged his services for two years at one hundred and fifty dollars per annum.

Just here it is proper to remark that Henry's department had been such that at eighteen he virtually did the whole business of the establishment. He did all the buying, and at regular intervals would make out his bills, visit New York, make his purchases and payments. Once a year a statement of the business and the transactions for the twelve months was rendered to his employers.

At twenty-three, with assistance (by indorsement) from his father, he purchased a one-half interest, and continued the general management as before. Proud day for the young merchant, who was now a partner in one of the oldest mercantile establishments in the town of his nativity.

The lessons of promptness and general application of that old father were strictly adhered to, and the reward followed. For fifteen years the youth Henry did not lose from any cause exceeding fifteen days from his business. Will the youth aspiring to fortune and honorable station pin this fact upon his memory and emulate the example?

In the natural course of time other purchases,—the remaining half-interest in stock, then again the building and grounds; another period, the old store-house torn down, and new and more extensive ones erected. A gradual, legitimate, and certain increase,—the result of those habits of economy, application, industry, and constancy of purpose that made up the characteristics of the man whom we are sketching. Was it from selfish motives that Henry Sanford was so aspiring in his youth? Then notice his walk when a mature man.

Property after property was bought; improved, and re-sold at a small advance upon original purchase. Why? That the town might present a more attractive appearance to its citizens, its visitors.

Together with Aaron Sanford and M. C. Hawley he erected the beautiful Grand Central Hotel, and hundreds of summer boarders annually thank them for their enterprise.

But the crowning, the grandest effort of his life is the handsome monument to his nerve and constancy of purpose that attracts every passer-by. We allude to that solid, beautiful, grand old structure, the Holy Episcopal church, which stands within the centre of the village.

For four years he unfalteringly prosecuted the work. Through favor and disfavor, obstacles and difficulties at times absolutely appalling were finally triumphantly overridden. Imagine a town of eight hundred voters; a church to be built that cost fifty thousand dollars; invitations extended to all; the greatest official of the sect expected; a fair day, and only five single individuals, including the rector and officers who were to officiate, being present at the solemn and ancient custom of laying the corner-stone, and you have some conception of the encouragement, rather the discouragement, Henry Sanford encountered while prosecuting this his grandest achievement.

For years he had been a vestryman and the church treasurer. The old building was tottering. It was suggested to repair it.

But by persistent appeals Mr. Sanford got his brethren to agree to put up a new structure, and as treasurer and financial agent he carried the project through to successful consummation, with but one prominent and efficient ally with whom to divide any of the labor attending details of the construction. This conjutor was Mr. Silas N. Beers, whose brain and pencil first put upon paper what was so accurately followed by the mechanics, under the joint surveillance and superintendence of the two Christian friends.

JULIUS SANFORD.

This son of Josiah Sanford was subjected to the same vigorous, wholesome training of his brothers. Having a fondness for machinery he was longer retained in his father's factory than were his brothers. When about eighteen years of age, however, he repaired to Naugatuck to learn the machinist's trade in the shops of Warner & Isbel. Having served his apprenticeship, he returned to Sandy Hook and engaged with Moses Parsons to learn the latter's trade. He remained with Mr. Parsons several years, becoming in the meanwhile thoroughly acquainted with the process of hat manufacture.

On leaving Mr. Parsons, Julius obtained from him his daughter Mary in marriage and his good-will in business, and immediately began in the same village manufacturing on his own account.

Julius Sanford

For a time he made nap-, fur-, and silk-hats complete, and in abundance; but owing to reverses occasioned by the failure of contracting parties in New York, and at the suggestion and with the co-operation of his father, he changed his business to the special and more profitable branch of manufacture,—“forming” wool-felts for soft hats. He was applying himself with ardor to this industry at the time of the great crisis that was pending just prior to the breaking out of the Rebellion of 1861.

When it absolutely became apparent that the Southern States were seriously meditating on the dissolution and destruction of the nation and cradle of liberty, that they were positively bereft of patriotism, reason, and justice,—when this news, wafted as it were by the wings of the wind, came to his ears he answered with alacrity in response to the nation's call, and enlisted upon the side of liberty and the perpetuity of the Union, and the preservation of American institutions. He was complimented by his fellows-in-arms in a unanimous vote that he should accept the captaincy.

It is also worthy of note that his sword contained the following inscription: "Presented to Captain Julius Sanford by many citizens of Newtown, Conn." The Twenty-third Connecticut Infantry had no braver or more popular officer than the captain of Company "C" of Newtown.

The fortunes of war, however, were disastrous; for, while guarding a large amount of stores at Brazier City, La., Capt. Sanford and all of the guard with him were compelled to capitulate to a superior force of the enemy. The surrender did not take place, however, until the stores were destroyed by fire. Capt. Sanford was incarcerated at the military prison of Camp Ford, near Tyler, Texas, and suffered all the rigors of a prison life for fourteen months. His existence during this period was only made tolerable by indirect benefits that were secured through Masonic influence. Fortunately, friends and fellow-prisoners of Capt. Sanford were the recipients of favors that were obtained through the above-named fraternity. Upon his return home Capt. Sanford took early steps to gain membership with an order that would not suffer sectional animosity in time of war to deter its brotherhood from practically illustrating the beautiful features of its mission.

He applied himself with assiduity in familiarizing himself with the principles and work of the fraternity, and prosecuted his work with such success as to early become a master spirit and Master Mason in the society. He was a charter member and a Worshipful Master of Hiram Lodge of Newtown.

After the war Capt. Sanford was more domestic in his taste. Always fond of his family and attentive to their wants, and to gratify the wishes of his wife, he removed to New Haven, Conn., and, with other business, assumed charge of a music store, where he remained until his death, Nov. 1, 1879. In politics and religion, Capt. Sanford was in full sympathy with his father and brothers. He died from disease contracted while in prison.

FREDERICK SANFORD.

This representative of an old New England name is the fourth son of Josiah Sanford, and was born in Newtown, Sept. 18, 1825. A full account of Mr. Sanford's varied business and traveling experience would make quite a little volume in itself, and one of no mean interest. Complete data can be had for this did the limits of this sketch admit, for, by nature, by education, and long habit, he is methodical, and his day-book is a complete history of his life, his business, his travels, what he has seen, and whom he has met. Like thousands of others of New England, he left its crowded walks to seek elsewhere his fortune; returning, however, content and satisfied to remain under its old roof-tree. So the year 1880 finds him at the old homestead, where for five generations his family have lived. His education was received at the public and private schools and the academy of his town. At eighteen he was placed with John H. Tweedy & Co., of Danbury, to learn the mercantile business. These gentlemen manufactured clothing for their wholesale and jobbing houses at New York City and Charleston, S. C., and in conjunction carried on a general store. In 1845, John H. Tweedy withdrew and was succeeded by Edgar S. Tweedy, from which time Frederick was in charge of the business until his majority, when he went with Alvah Merriam, who carried on a general country store at Woodbury, remaining with Mr. Merriam two years. In September, 1849, he went South, and engaged in book-keeping for the hat-jobbing house of D. A. Ambler, at Charleston, S. C. Receiving a very excellent offer from Haviland, Harral & Co., he went to live with this firm. These gentlemen were wholesale druggists, with branch houses in Atlanta and Augusta, Ga., and a house in New York under the firm-name of Haviland, Keese & Co., and a fine retail store, in addition to their wholesale house, in Charleston. By reason of their having been long established and well and favorably known, Haviland, Harral & Co. had an exceptionally fine class of customers, and Mr. Sanford looks upon this period of his life as a very pleasant one, indeed. The South at this time was at a high degree of prosperity, and he had many opportunities of becoming familiar with the habits and customs of the people, and seeing the different phases of slavery and the manners and customs of the slaves, and especially their quaint religious doings and their jollifications on Christmas and other holidays.

At different times of life, and during different trips South and West, Mr. Sanford has visited nearly every section of the American Union, and witnessed some of the most imposing of our political and national pageantries and "receptions," and has heard Webster, Clay, and Calhoun on the floor of the Senate.

His first initiation South was an attack of yellow fever, from which, by the skill of his physician, the celebrated Dr. Robertson, and good nursing, he recovered. The following season he had the "break-bone" fever, after which he was considered pretty well acclimated. His father's health failing, he returned home just in time to see him die, July 26, 1851.

At the solicitation of his family, and to assist in winding up his father's estate, he remained in Newtown, engaging in the manufacture of hutting-felts,—first with his brother Henry, then Henry and Julius, and then alone from 1859 to 1867, when he leased his factory to Horr & Mitchell, wool-hat manufacturers, of Boston, Mass. These gentlemen operated his factory till January, 1867, when it was destroyed by fire. Since this time Mr. Sanford has retired from active business-life.

Reared as a Whig, he votes and acts with the Republican party, but his acquaintance with and knowledge of the people of different sections of our common country prevent his taking an active part in the sectional politics of the day. He has filled many town offices and other positions of trust. He is a member of Trinity Episcopal Church, being the present treasurer of that society.

The peculiar management and training of his children by Josiah Sanford is elsewhere remarked, and perhaps its effect is not more marked upon any of them than the subject of this sketch. He has kept a cash account and diary since his fourteenth year, and has not been of one dollar expense to his father since. As before remarked, this diary is a complete kaleidoscope, as it were, of the events of his life.

JOSIAH SANFORD.

Samuel Sanford, the father of Josiah Sanford, had a shop opposite the old Sanford homestead, where Frederick Sanford now lives, and was engaged in the manufacture of spinning-wheels, reels, and looms for spinning thread and weaving cloth, carpets, etc. He was succeeded by his son Josiah, who followed the same business till the year 1830, when he entered into the manufacture of broadcloth, cassimeres, and satinets, in the village of Sandy Hook. He remained in this business, extending it from time to time, till 1842. Between the years 1830 and 1842 he did a very heavy business, building and causing the erection of a large part of the village of Sandy Hook. In addition to his factory he ran a large general store, and bought a considerable tract of land and ran an extensive farm.

Mr. Sanford was married to Polly, daughter of Capt. Enos Johnson, Aug. 7, 1816. Mr. Sanford was a man of great force of character and originality, a leading member of Trinity Episcopal Church, and one of the founders of Newtown Academy. His management of his children was especially noticeable. If the boys wanted spending-money he gave them a job of work and paid them for it, thus making them earn the money, and letting them estimate its value by the labor it cost them. He would give them opportunities of earning money and then borrow it of them, giving them his note, drawing interest in regular form. In settlements they produced the note and he had them to reckon up the interest themselves, refusing to settle until it was done properly. Thus he instilled into them correct ideas of value and the necessity of strict business habits that in after life has served them well. He died July 26, 1851. His children were eight in number,—viz., Edwin (deceased), Julius (deceased), Henry, Frederick, Charlotte (Mrs. George B. Wheeler), Margarette (Mrs. Albert Northrop), Josiah, Augusta.

Josiah Sanford (6) was the son of Samuel Sanford (5) by his second wife, Charity (Foote) Bristol. Samuel Sanford (5) was born in 1743. His children were, by his first wife, (Abiah Dunning),—viz., Annet (1), Isaac (2), Josiah (3), Betsey (4), Sarah (5), Joel (6), Ruah (7), Azubah (8), Artemesia (9), Abigail (10). By his second wife: Abiah, Ann, Josiah, and Philo.

Samuel (5) was the son of Samuel (4), who was born April 1, 1704. His children by his wife, Hannah Gilbert, were Thomas, Amos, Mary, James, Hannah, Sarah, Samuel, and Louis.

Samuel Sanford (4) was the son of Samuel Sanford (3), who was born March 12, 1680, who married Esther Baldwin, and whose children were Nathaniel, Samuel (4), Ebenezer, Esther, John, David, Stephen, Job, Hannah, Rachel (Mrs. Eben Booth).

Samuel Sanford (3) was son of Samuel Sanford (2), who was born April 3, 1643, and who married Mary Brinson. His children were Hannah, Thomas, Samuel (3), Sarah, Mary, and Thomas.

Samuel Sanford (2) was son of Thomas Sanford (1), who married Sarah —, and whose children were Ezekiel, Sarah, Mary, and Samuel (3). Thomas Sanford died October, 1681. The date of his birth is unknown.

To Julius, son of Josiah, were born Ellen Louisa (Mrs. Sherwood S. Thompson), Katie, and Gertrude. Henry Sanford married Mary E., daughter of Dr. Cyrenius H. Booth, Nov. 9, 1845, to whom were born Annie E. and Sarah E.

GENEALOGY OF THE SANDFORDS.*

Sandford Manor of England is one of those very few Shropshire estates which can be said to be held by the lineal descendants of its earliest feoffee.

Thomas de Sandford, a Norman follower of William Duke of Normandy, is mentioned on the roll of Battle Abbey, Oct. 14, 1066. His son, Sir Thomas de Sandford, held under King Henry I. the manors of Sandford and Rothal, and the former is still held by his descendants. The armorial bearings of this family are quarterly 1 and 4 per chevron sa and erm, in chief two boars' heads couped close, or 2 and 3 quarterly per fesse indented azure and ermine. Crest, a falcon with wings endorsed preying on a partridge ppr. Motto, Nec temere Nec timide.

Another family of almost equal antiquity, but who, unlike the preceding, usually dispense with first letter "d" in their name, are derived from John de Sanford, Lord of Great Homede, county Hertz, whose name is met with in 1199 and 1220 in ancient records. He was father of Gilbert de Sanford, Lord of Great Homede, and chamberlain of Queen Eleanor, the wife of King Henry III., and daughter of Raimond Berenger, the last Count of Provence.

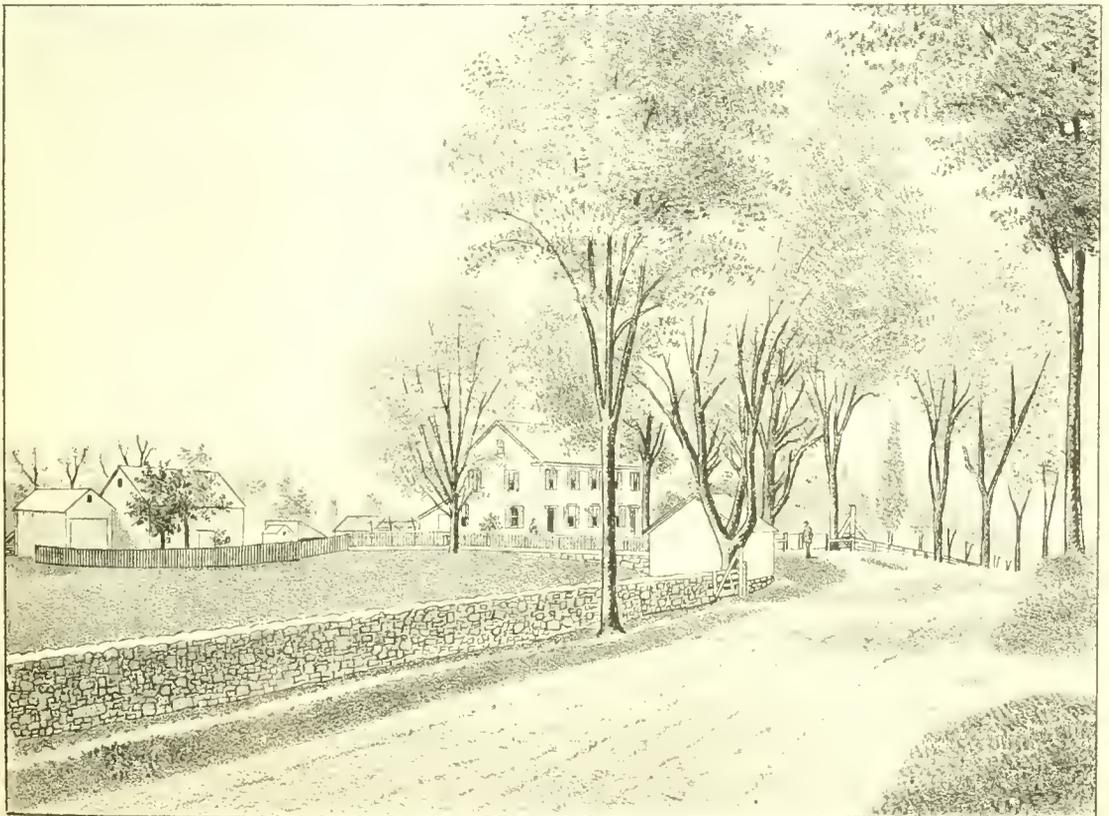

The former of these families are undoubtedly the ancestors of the Connecticut Sandfords. Thomas Sandford, sometimes spelt Sampford or Samford in the records, came to Boston about 1631. He first appears in Dorchester, Mass., in 1634, and went to Milford, Conn., in 1639, and died there in 1681. His name

D. C. GATELY.

Dennis C. Gately, superintendent of the New York Belting and Packing Company, situated at Newtown, Conn., was born in Roxbury, Mass. (now a part of Boston), Aug. 12, 1816, in the same house where Gen. Joseph Warren, who was killed at Bunker Hill, was born. Dennis was about twelve years of age when his father died, and the mother being left with a large family Dennis was taken into the family of Supply C. Twing, a commission merchant of Boston, with whom he remained three years, attending school and doing errands, and was commended for his faithfulness, which in later years was testified to by his early benefactor, whom he always revered. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to Louis A. Lauriat, a noted French chemist, but, preferring a more active life, a year later he chose the trade of housewright. He served till he was twenty-one with the firm of James Sinclair & Co. Being slight of physique he often labored beyond his strength, but persevered and learned the trade in all its details, finishing up all the nice work, and often retained till after the family moved in. As he was careful and painstaking he made many friends among the owners of fine estates about the city of Boston. "Brookline," the fine house of Gen. Lyman, he helped to build, and was the last man to leave the premises.

In April, 1846, a gentleman by the name of John Haskins (an early inventor in rubber), knowing Dennis from his having worked on his house eight years previous, recommended him to the superintendency of a small rubber factory in Roxbury. After a few months this company failed, and he was placed as keeper till a new company was formed, called the "Boston Belting Company," under the firm of Tappan, McBarney & Cheever, as principal agents. From a beginning with fifteen men he continued with them till they employed one hundred and forty men. During this time, by careful savings, he built himself a house, where he placed his mother, who cared for him till he married. At the age of thirty-five he was married to Oline F. Perkins, daughter of William Curtis Perkins, of Maine. His mother lived to be nearly ninety-two years of age, and was tenderly cared for by Dennis, who was the only surviving child but one of nine children. April, 1856, ten years after the "Boston Belting Company" was organized, Mr. Cheever retired from the firm and went to New York. Mr. Gately received and accepted a liberal offer from the "New York Belting and Packing Company." It was with reluctance that he left Roxbury, where he had been identified so long, to begin anew among those who looked with suspicion upon all he did.

The intention of the New York Company was to retain Mr. Gately in New York City, where a special part of the business was to be carried forward in the manufacture of the lighter articles of rubber goods, but difficulties arising at Newtown among the workmen and between the former superintendent and the senior member of the company, made it necessary for Mr. Gately to take the factory at Newtown in charge, and the old factory burning down the first season, the business, after rebuilding, was transacted wholly at Newtown.

As the years passed on Mr. Gately made several valuable inventions, which have contributed largely to the advantage of the company in the manufacture of their goods. The company now employ nearly three hundred operatives, doing the largest business of the kind in the United States.

Mr. Gately's business career and his present business and social standing are eminently worthy of contemplation, showing, as they do, what persistent attention to details will do. His entire success is due to this characteristic. What he did was well done, finished, and properly finished. Genial, kind, and unassuming, this same considerate and painstaking phase of Mr. Gately's character, during twenty-five years' residence in his adopted town, has secured to him the esteem of its citizens, and has conspired in all the degrees and relations of life, whether as son, father, husband, friend, or citizen, to secure to him respect and affection.

His children are six,—viz.: Caroline Ryder, Ella Catherine, Curtis Perkins, Sarah Dennis, Charles Lincoln, and Harry Grant.

LEMUEL FAIRCHILD CAMP.

Lemuel Camp (1), the great-great-grandfather of Lemuel H. Camp, came to Newtown, it is supposed, from old Milford about the time of the first settlement (1807). He had nine children,—viz.: Joel (2), John, Samuel (who died in the French war), Silas, Julius, Phebe (Mrs. Sirenas Hard), Heppie (Mrs. Amile Peck), Allie, or Alice (Mrs. Sims), and Clarisa (Mrs. Josiah Blackman).

Joel Camp (2) was born Oct. 20, 1734, and died October, 1779. He married Ellen Jackson, by whom he had eight children,—viz.: Deborah (Mrs. Mathew Sherman), Lemuel (3), John, Susan (Mrs. Joseph Wheeler), Jacob, Phebe, Silas, and Samuel.

Lemuel Camp (3), in addition to his occupation as a farmer, was a school teacher and surveyor. A man of probity and intelligence, he won the confidence of his neighbors, and was a general peacemaker as well as arbiter of disputes in the neighborhood. He married Sarah, daughter of Samuel Dibble, by whom he had ten children. Joel Trowbridge (4), Cyrus, Dibble, Polly (Mrs. Samuel Fairchild), Adah (second wife of Beers Fairchild), Maria (Mrs. John Smith), Beach, Hiram, Sarah Ann (Mrs. Zacharia Clark), and Mary Ann.

Joel Trowbridge Camp (4) was born March 1, 1794, and was married to Polly, daughter of Zadoc Fairchild, April 13, 1819. His children are Lemuel Fairchild (5), Lucia (Mrs. John R. Smith), Edwin, and Samuel Burtis.

Mr. Camp is now living with his son Lemuel F., at the advanced age of eighty-seven. He has been a man of great industry, following farming and making upon his own farm the implements required. Very fond of the retirement of his home he has never been on a railroad car and never farther from home than Hartford.

Lemuel Fairchild Camp, the subject of this sketch, was born Dec. 8, 1820. His youth was that usual to the New England farmers' boy, working upon the farm and attending the district school. When twenty-one years of age he was quite desirous of going West, but, his father strongly opposing the step, he decided to content himself among the rocky hills of his native town. His father purchasing the place of his present residence about this time, Lemuel was put in charge. April 4, 1855 he was united in marriage to Sarah Jane, daughter of Amos and Mary Ann Lake. Since this time, by the safe and sure way of industry and good management, affairs have prospered with Mr. Camp. The old house on the place at the time of purchase has been torn down and a new one erected, comfortable barns have been built and orchards planted. Fond of home, like the most of the old New Englanders, Mr. Camp is happy in the society of his family. Possessed of a taste for stock, of which he is a fine judge, he gives considerable attention to buying and grazing cattle for the markets, and it is not often that superior stock cannot be found upon his premises. In politics Mr. Camp is a Republican, is a member of the Episcopal Church, and, as might be expected, is a director of and stockholder in the Danbury Agricultural and Manufacturers' Fair Association,—the only stockholder, by-the-by, in Newtown.

His children are Carrie Amelia (deceased), Anna Melora, Mary Alice, Amos Trowbridge, and Sarah Annie.

WILLIAM PLATT.

Among the original thinkers and progressive fruit-growers of Newtown none outrank William Platt, Esq., a view of whose residence appears upon another page. Mr. Platt is a native of Litchfield County, but for thirty years he has been a resident of Newtown, and in the several capacities of manufacturer, farmer, and fruit-grower he has been decidedly successful.

Inasmuch as Mr. Platt entertains peculiar religious views, and employs the local press as a medium to impress others with his belief in well-written and forcible paragraphs, he is termed the "Newtown Philosopher." It is a practice of Mr. Platt to prepare at frequent intervals short articles,—sometimes appeals, sometimes protests; these he posts in manuscript at the public places in the village. It will perhaps be interesting in the town's history to insert at least one of these characteristic paragraphs, which we clip from the Danbury News:

"Nothing is right that is not fair." "Platform lectures are never fair, and they are in direct opposition to Christ's plain teaching." "Go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone. A person will receive a reproof with thankfulness from another when the two are alone, which if administered in the presence of a third person or a crowd would excite anger; and further, the party reprov'd may have consciousness that his actions were not subject to censure, and he justly deems himself mistreated when reprimanded by a hireling, before whom he can make no explanation or vindication without being an offender of the common law. If platform preaching or lectures were ever allowable, they are not needed now, for the printer has placed the lectures of Him 'who spake as never man spake' in the hands of all." "No toll-gates on the way to Heaven." Mr. Platt is an industrious, cultivated, and useful citizen, frank and courteous in his manner.

NORWALK.

Geographical—Topographical—The First Purchase—First Indian Deed to Roger Ludlow—Indian Deed to Capt. Patrick—The Ludlow Agreement—Confirmation of Patrick's Purchase—Assignment by Ludlow—Deed from Runkinghoze—The Patent—The Pioneers—Original Grants of Home-Lots—Plan of Ancient Settlement.

NORWALK is a coast town, and is bounded as follows: On the north by New Canaan and Wilton; on the east by Westport; on the south by Long Island Sound; and on the west by Darien and New Canaan. The surface of the town is uneven and its soil fertile.

To the intrepid and talented Roger Ludlow, whose history is interwoven with the pioneer events in this section of the State, is due the honor of having made the first purchase of lands of the Indians within the bounds of the present town of Norwalk. This purchase was made on the 26th of February, 1640, and embraced that portion of the town lying between the Saugatuck and Norwalk Rivers. On the 20th of the following April a subsequent purchase was made of the central portion of the town by Capt. Daniel Patrick. The western portion of the town was not purchased until 1651.

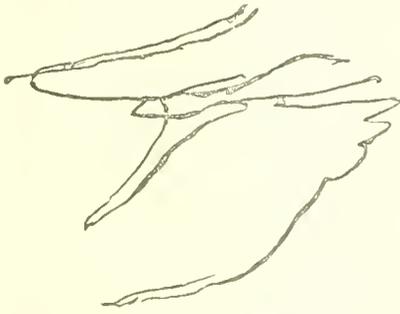

FIRST INDIAN DEED.

The following is a copy of the first deed from the Norwalk Indians to Roger Ludlow:

INDIAN DEED TO CAPT. PATRICK.

"An agreement betwixt Daniell Patrick and Mahoken, and Naramake and Pemenate Hewnonpon Indians of Norwake and Makentouh, the said Daniell Patricke hath bought of the sayd three indians, the ground called sacumyte mapneke, all-o Meeanworth, thirldly Assumows, fourthly all the land adjoyninge to the aforementioned, as far up in the country as an indian can goe in a day, from sun rising to sun setting; and two Islands nere adjoining to the sayed Arant-mayneck, all bounded on the west side with noewanton on the east side to the middle of the River of Norwake, and all trees, meadows, waters and naturall adjuncts therunto belonginge, for him and his forever; for which Lands the sayed indians are to receive of the sayed Daniell Patricke, of wampum, ten fathoms, hat-belts three, hoes three, when shippes come; sixe glasses, twelke tobacco pipes, three knives, ten drills, ten needles; this as full satisfaction, for the aforementioned lands, and for the peaceable possession of which the aforementioned nabachemill doth promise and undertake to silence all opposers of this purchase, if any should in his time act, to witnesse which, on both sides, hands are interchangeably hereunto sett, this 20th of Aprill, 1640.

THE PATENT.

Thirty-six years elapsed after the settlement of the town, before the General Court granted the patent. It bears date March 30, 1686, and was as follows:

“Whereas the Generall Court of Connecticut have formerly granted unto ye proprietors inhabitants of Norwalk, all those lands both meadow and upland, within these limitations, upon the Sea on the South, and to runn from the sea towards the north, full Twelve miles, and about on the Wilderness on the North, and on Fairfield bounds on the East, and on Stamford bounds on the West, the said land having been by purchase or otherwise lawfully obtained by the Indian native proprietors; and whereas the proprietors Inhabitants of Norwalk have made application to the Governor and Company of the Colony of Connecticut assembled in Court May the 11, 1685, that they may have a patten for confirmation of the aforesaid lands to them so purchased and granted to them as aforesaid, and which they have stood seized and quietly possessed of for more than twenty years last past, without interruption; now, for a more full confirmation of the aforesaid Tracts of land, as it is butted and bounded aforesaid, unto the present proprietors of the Township of Norwalk,— Know ye that the said Governor and Company, assembled in Generall Court, according to the commission, and by virtue of the power granted to them, by our late Sovereigne LORD KING CHARLES the Second of Blessed memory, in his late patent bearing date the three and twentieth day of April in the fourteenth year of his said majestie's Reigne, Have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant, Ratifie and Confirm, unto Mr. Thomas Fitch, Mr. Thomas Hanford, Capt. Richard Olmstead, Mr. Thomas Benedict, Mr. Walter Hoyt, Mr. Matthew Marven, Mr. John Ruscoe, Mr. Nathaniel Hayes, Mr. Daniel Kellog, and Mr. Thomas Semore, and the rest of the present proprietors of the Township of Norwalk, and their heirs and assigns forever, and to each of them, in such proportion as they have already agreed upon for the division of the same, all that aforesaid tract and parcell of land as it is butted and bounded; together with all the woods, upland, arable lands, meadows, pastures, ponds, havens, ports, waters, rivers, adjoining Islands, fishings, huntings, fowlings, mines, minerals, quarries, and precious stones, upon or within the said tract of land, and all other profits and commodities therein to belonging, or in any wise appertaining; AND do also grant unto the afore named Mr. Thomas Fitch, and Mr. Thomas Hanford, . . . &c., that the aforesaid tract of land shall be forever hereafter deemed, and reputed, and be, an entire township of itself—To HAVE and to HOLD the said tract of land, &c., . . . according to the tenour of his majestie's manner of East Greenwich in the county of Kent in ye Kingdom of England, in free and common soverage, and not in capitee nor by Knight service; yielding and paying therefore to our Sovereigne Lord the King, his heirs and successors, only the fifth part of all the Ore of Gold and Silver which from time to time, and at all times hereafter shall be gotten, had, or otherwise obtained; in lieu of all rents, services, duties, and demands whatsoever according to CHARTER.

“IN WITNESS whereof, we have caused the seal of the Colony to be hereunto affixed, this eighth day of July, 1686, in the second year of the Reigne of our Sovereigne Lord JAMES the Second, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith, &c.

THE PIONEERS.

Although the purchase of the Indians was made in 1640, the permanent settlement of the town was not effected until 1651. Trumbull, in his history of Connecticut, says, “A few families seem to have planted themselves in the town, about the time (1640) of these purchases.” Hollister states that “the better evidence appears to be that a few bold planters had taken possession soon after these grants were made, and had continued to hold it until the arrival of the company,” in 1651. Both of those authors have failed to cite any authority for these statements, and certain it is that no reference is made in the town records to the settlement of the town until 1651.

The agreement of the settlers with Mr. Ludlow bears date June 19, 1650, but the permanent settlement did not take place until 1651. As early as February 15th of that year the sturdy pioneers were all in their wilderness home, as appears in the deed from Runckinheage and the other Indians.

There is a tradition that a portion of the planters spent the winter of 1650 here, which is doubtless true.

The only names extant of the original settlers are those mentioned in the agreement with Mr. Ludlow, as follows: "Nathaniel Eli, Richard Olmstead, Richard Webb, Nathaniel Rithards, Mathew Marvin, Richard Seamer, Thomas Spencer, Thomas Hales, Nathaniel Ruskoe, Isacke Graves, Ralph Keeler, John Holloway, Edward Church, John Ruskoe." This, of course, is not a complete list, as the article states that the agreement is entered into between Mr. Ludlow and those mentioned above, and "some others."

The following is the most perfect list of the early settlers that is known to be in existence, being a table of "Estates of Lands and Accommodations," made in 1655:

In a list of accounts in 1654 are the following names, which do not appear in the preceding list of estates, viz.: — Bryant, Edward Church, Joseph Fitch, Edward Nash, Richard Raiment, Richard Seamer, Giles Whitinge.

In 1656 the following names also appear: Owen Morgan, William Reid.

In the table of home-lots, the following names also appear: Thomas Benedict, Sr., Thomas Benedict, Jr., John Benedict, Thomas Betts, Richard Bushnell, Samuel Campfield, Christopher Comstock, John Crampton, Thomas Fitch, Jr., Joseph Fenn, John Gregory, Jr., Jakin Greggorie, Samuel Haies, Ephraim Lockwood, Joseph Ketchum, John Keeler, James Pickett, Joseph Platt, Mark Sention, Robert Stewart, Samuel Smith, Thomas Taylor, Thomas Ward.

The following notices of the first settlers of Norwalk are from Hinman's "Catalogue of the Names of the First Puritan Settlers of the Colony of Connecticut:"

"Abbott, George, 1648."

"Beckwith, Stephen, 1649.

"Belling, John (son of John, of Wethersfield, who died 1677).

"Benedict, Thomas, 1662.

"Betts, Thomas, Guilford, 1650 †

"Campfield (or Campfield), Matthew, a magistrate and judge, not only a leading man there, but in the colony. One of the signers of the petition to King Charles II. for the colony; in 1662 appointed with Gold and Sherman to hold courts at Fairfield.

"Ely, Nathaniel, Hartford, 1635; constable, 1639; one of the settlers of Norwalk, but afterwards removed to Springfield, Mass.

"Fitch, Thomas, a brother of Rev. James, at Saybrook, and of Joseph, of Windsor.

"Gregory, John, a deputy, 1662-63.

"Hoyt, Walter, Windsor, 1640.

"Keeler, Ralph, Hartford, 1639, viewer of chimneys in 1645.

"Marvin, Matthew, surveyor of highways in 1639 and 1647, an original proprietor and settler in Hartford before 1639; removed to Norwalk; deputy to the General Court from Norwalk in 1661.

"Olmsted, Richard, Hartford, 1640, constable 1646, fence-viewer 1649, deputy in 1662-63; moved to Norwalk and was made a military officer. In 1661 was appointed with John Banks and Joseph Judson, who were appointed by the General Court to run the lines between Fairfield and Stratford.

"Richards, Nathaniel, of Hartford, in the colony in 1639; constable in 1641 and 1639; orderer of the town in 1641, deputy in 1645.

"Sention, or St. John, Matthias, 1640.

"Seymour, Richard, Hartford, 1639, chimney-viewer in 1646.

"Webb, Richard, Hartford, 1639, on the first grand jury at the General Court in the colony in 1645. Also a juror in 1645-46, sole tithing man in 1648, surveyor of highways in 1649. He soon after removed to Stratford; was made free there in 1662."

The following list of first settlers is taken from the first book of grants and deeds:

"Elizabeth Webb, relict of Richard Webb, in 1677, employed her 'Beloved brother John Gregory to make an agreement with Thomas Butler of Hartford, and his wife, they 'laying claime to the estate of my deere husband, Richard Webb, deceased.' (Vol. 51.)

"Richard Homes, of Stratford, Oct. 12, 1657, bought of Alexander Bryan, of Milford, the home-lot which was Thomas Smith's, and March, 1663, the lands of Stephen Beckwith, planter, of Norwalk.

"Matthew Campfield, late of Norwake, now resident in Nowarke, in the colony of New Jersey, (gave a deed) to his son Samuel, April 1, 1669.

"Samuel Hales, now of Weathersfield, late of Norwake, sold to John Platt, May 11, 1669.

"Thomas Barnum, of Fairfield, had a grant before 1663.

"Joseph Smith, late of Long Island, bought of Samuel Campfield the north part of his home-lot in 1675.

"Samuel Smith, in 1672, a parcel of land in Indianfield.

"Samuel Belding, Feb. 28, 1674, bought two parcels of land in the Neck planting-field.

"James Pickett, in 1674.

"Thomas Betts, Jr. (fol. 53), in 1677, bought of Benjamin Fenn, of Milford, the house and home-lot formerly belonging to his brother, Joseph Fenn.

"Richard Raymond removed to Saybrooke, gave a deed to his son John; in 1677 empowered his 'well-beloved brother Thomas Betts, of Norwalk,' to record all his divisions, etc.; and in 1676 gave by will all his lands in Norwalk 'unto those children which my son John Raymond already have or may have by Mary Raymond, his present wife.'

"John Reede, 'of Ry,' bought of Richard Homes.

"James Miller and Martha his wife, of Ry, in the county of Fairfield,' Dec. 26, 1681.

"Andrew Messenger, June 28, 1686 (fol. 85), bought land of Walter Hoyt.

"Samuel Campfield's house and four acres, between Thomas Betts and Ephraim Lockwood, Dec. 17, 1681.

"Thomas Hyatt, in 1679, bought land of James Miller (James Miller and Martha his wife, of Ry, Dec. 26, 1681).

"Jonathan Perkins bought of Nathaniel Richards, Feb. 23, 1677."

* Date of the first mention in the colony records.

† Mr. Hinman refers to Widow Betts, 1639, and John Betts, 1648.

FORT POINT.

"In 1689, John Gregory gave a deed to his son Thomas of a piece of land 'Lying on the West side of Norwalke Towne plott, 2 acres, bounded East by the common land banck; West, Norwalk river; South by the poynt of common land where the Indian Fort formerly stood; North by Thomas Betts' Marsh Meadow.'"

ORIGINAL GRANTS OF HOME-LOTS.

"Richard Web, four acres. Bounded east by common land adjoining the neck, west by town highway, north by Thomas Seamer's home-lot, south by John Raymond's home-lot, that was Ralph Keeler's.

"Daniel Kellogg, four acres. Bounded east by Matthew Marvin, Jr.'s, Matthew Marvin, Sr.'s, and Thomas Fitch, Sr.'s, home-lots, west by Joseph Fenn's home-lot and a bank of common land, north partly by Nathaniel Richards' home-lot, and by the 'coafe-bancke,' south by town highway.

"Matthew Marvin, Jr., three acres two roods. Bounded east by 'meeting-house greens,' west by Daniel Kellogg's home-lot, north by Matthew Marvin, Sr.'s, home-lot, south by town highway.

"Christopher Comstock, Jan. 27, 1661 (then of Fairfield), bought of Thomas Betts, 'being then a planter inhabiting in Norwalke,' his 'house, home-lot, etc., with halfe the land lying to the said house, laid out to said Betts, or belonging to the accomodation of Nathaniel Eli' (folio 43), four acres. See 'Nathaniel Eli,' who sold this lot to Thomas Betts, which Thomas Betts, in 1661, sold to Christopher Comstock.

"Ephraim Lockwood, Dec. 30, 1661 (folio 13), bought the home-lot of Jonathan Marsh, 'For and in consideration of one mare and sucking colt,' his house with the shelves, dress boards, etc., also 'the yards, hovells, and ten fruit-trees growing upon the orchard; and also the home-lot containing one acre more or less.' For boundaries see Jonathan Marsh.

"Thomas Betts (bought Nathaniel Eli's home-lot; sold half to Christopher Comstock; also bought house and home-lot of Ralph Keeler; recorded about 1660), four acres. Bounded east by common upland, west by common highway, north by John Keeler's home-lot, south by Samuel Canfield's home-lot.

"Thomas Ward, of Norwalk (Sept. 1, 1665, sold to Ralph Keeler his 'dwelling house and houses, etc., reserving' the workshop for the abode of his wife, if she shall have occasion, till the 27th of September, 1666,' said Ward reserving to himself 'to take away at his pleasure, the locks upon the dwelling house doores, and the younger-nursery trees, and two boards lying upon the collar beames.' Folio 2). Boundaries not given save on the north, which is bounded by Jonathan Marsh.

"Thomas Benediek, Jr. (bought of Joseph Fenn, 1671, 'now home-lot, lying by the side of the creeke or river called the Coafe,' four acres. Bounded east by highway, leading to the point, west by 'Bancke of the coafe,' north by Joseph Fenn's land adjoining to his home-lot, south by cartway leading out of Daniel Kellogg's meadow.

"Richard Raimond (inhabitant of Salem, in the jurisdiction of Massachusetts Bay, bought of Ralph Keeler, Oct. 20, 1662, 'My howsing, contained at present in my home-lott, or cow yard,' etc., 'the howse, doores, glasse windows, shelves, or ought else necessarily fastened together', four acres. Bounded east by John Gregorie's lot that was George Abbott's, west by common land, north of John Benediek's, that was George Abbott's, south by 'A highway running to the sea bancke.'

"Jakin Greggorie (in 1666, grant of home-lot upland and lowland), four acres. Bounded east by common upland, west by common highway, north by common upland, south by Thomas Taylor's home-lot.

"John Platt, of Norwalk (bought of Thomas Lupton, March 9, 1665, sold in 1674, to John Bowten), four acres. Bounded east by 'Reere of Thomas Lupton's home-lot and Richard Homes', west by Mathias Sention's land, north by John Bowten's land, south by George Abbott's land.

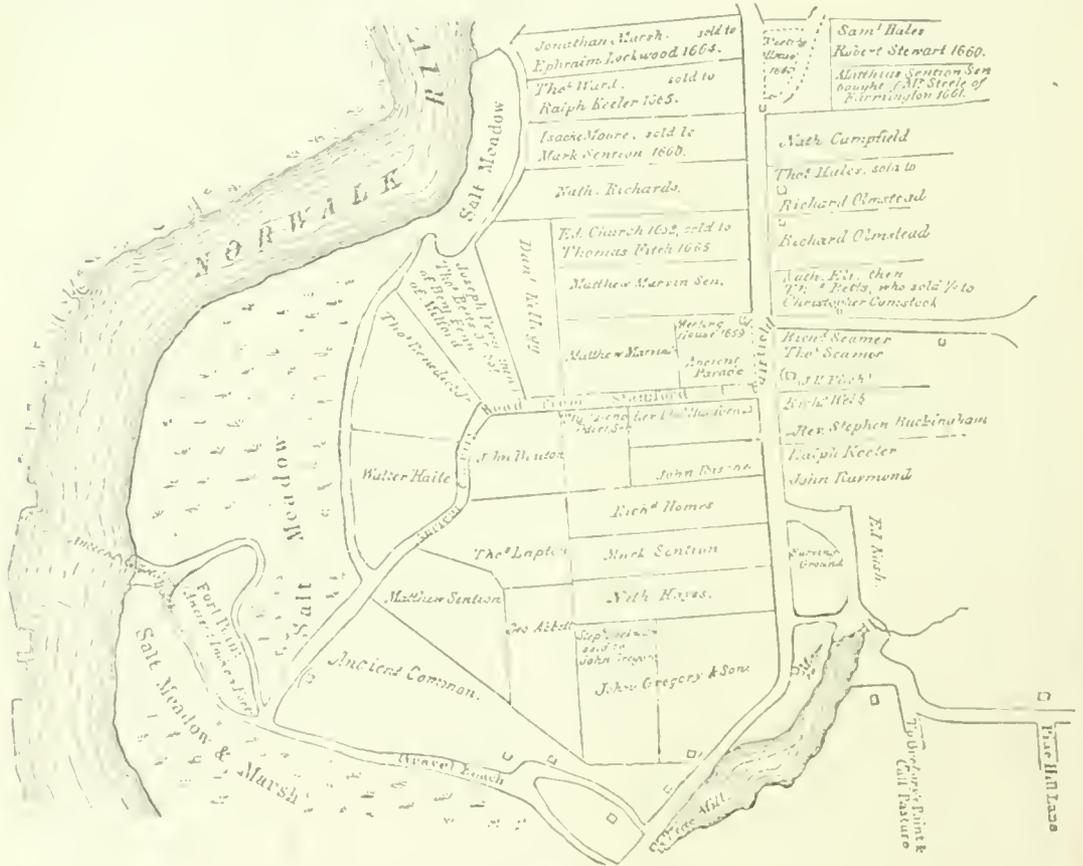

"John Crumpton (because he was a soldier in the late Indian war,' 1679), three acres. Bounded east by highway, west by Samuel Benediek's home-lot, north by Thomas Betts, Sr.'s, home-lot, south by James Miller's home-lot.

CHAPTER XLIX.
NORWALK (Continued).

GEORGE ABBOTT, whose name heads the list of the first white settlers of Norwalk, probably emigrated from Dorchester, England, with his master. Doubtless he was a French refugee and a relative of the Abbots of Andover, Mass. He was one of the first Puritan settlers of Hartford. His name is not in the catalogue of emigrants to America. It first appears in the colonial records of Connecticut, 1649, as a ser-restrictions imposed by the British government upon those who had been in rebellion against kingly authority. In 1648 he was at Ipswich, Mass.; in 1651 he was an inhabitant of Norwalk. Here he resided ten years, and removed to Fairfield; and the court gave the inhabitants of that place liberty "to take in a cohabitant with them, Robert Beacham, who lately lived in Norwalk." March 29, 1655, he was appointed by the people of this town field-gate keeper for the year ensuing. Feb. 5, 1657, the town voted that he should enjoy that parcel of land lying between his home-lot and "Coafe Bancke" as his own, under a vant residing in Windsor. There he was fined for selling a "pystoll and powder to the Indians, and bound to his good behavior." Eleven years later he was an inhabitant of Norwalk. In 1672 he was the father of seven children. He never held office. In 1690 he had an estate of one hundred and twenty pounds. As his name disappeared from the town records after 1644, he probably died about that date, aged about seventy-four.

Robert Beacham, or Beauchamp, was in Ipswich, Mass., 1648. Probably he left England, as many others did, under an assumed name, to avoid the condition. In the first property list he was taxed on one hundred and seventy-three pounds. He was not made an elector in Fairfield until 1664.

Stephen Beckwith,—or Beckett, as Hutton has it,—aged eleven, was the youth pointed out as S. B. in the records, who was brought to the colony of Massachusetts in the ship "Francis," Cutting, master, 1634. His name appears in the colonial records in 1649, at which date he was twenty-six years of age, and a resident of Hartford, from whence he emigrated to Norwalk. The town records do not show that he owned a home-lot. His estate in 1673 was set in the tax-list at five pounds; in 1690 he had increased the same to fifty pounds. It is believed that a portion of his estate was situated in the town of Fairfield. Probably he removed there with Beacham.

John Bouton, or Bowton, was one of the first original inhabitants of Norwalk. His name is found in Hutton's "History of Emigrants from 1600 to 1700." He, with about nine or ten others of the first settlers of the town, though they came from England, were French refugees. April, 1635, at the age of twenty, he embarked from Gravesend for the Massachusetts colony, in the ship "Assurance," and landed in Boston the following December. He resided in Newtown and Watertown nearly sixteen years, and then went to Hartford; thence to Norwalk. His ancestors are authentically traced back to the latter part of the twelfth century. He was a lineal descendant of the Boutons of Chantilly, France, and a brother of Noel, born 1636, who was the son of Nicholas, born 1598, who was a descendant of Jean Bouton, whose name often appears in the French annals.

John Bouton was married when he came to Norwalk, and was the father of Richard and Bridget Bouton. His wife died soon after his arrival here. His second wife was Abigail Marvin, daughter of Mathew, by whom he had at least five children,—viz.: John, Mathew, Rachel, Abigail, and Mary. His third wife was the Widow Stevens, whose first husband was killed in the "direful swamp-fight." By her he had two sons,—Richard and Thomas, Richard by the second wife being dead.

John Bouton was made freeman in 1664. He was selectman in 1671, 1674, 1675, and 1679, and surveyor also in 1669. In 1686 he was elected one of a committee to settle all differences between Fairfield and Norwalk about the "head-lynes," and elected to represent the town in the General Assembly from 1671 to 1683, and also in 1685. He was living in 1703 or 1704. He died at the age of about ninety.

Thomas Betts' name first appears in the records of Norwalk in 1656. Probably he arrived here about 1651 or 1652. He was living in Guilford in 1650. Without doubt he was a brother of John, whose name is also in the records of Guilford in 1648. At the date of settlement in this town the brothers had been in the colonies about twenty years, having arrived about 1636 or 1637. There is a family tradition that they came from Buckingham, England. The late G. W. Betts had a Bible said to have been owned by the family in England, brought here by Thomas or John. Thomas Betts was a representative from Norwalk to the General Assembly in 1692, 1694, 1704, 1705, and 1707. He was an efficient member of the First Church, and his descendants have always been noted for their puritanical proclivities. His estate was set in the list of 1687 at one hundred and ninety-six pounds.

* He advanced the honors of his house, and was created Marquis of Chamilly and, 1703, marshal of France. See Dictionnaire des Généraux Français, in the Astor Library, city of New York.

Benedict,—the order of the Benedicts, or benediction, a blessing. Thomas Benedict, Sr., was a lineal descendant of William Benedict, who resided in Nottingham, England, in the year 1500. Thomas Benedict, of Norwalk, of the fourth generation, from William, was also born in Nottingham in 1617. He emigrated to New England at the age of twenty-one, and settled in Massachusetts. From thence he removed to Southhold, L. I. In 1665, Thomas Benedict and family crossed Long Island Sound and settled in Norwalk. He was thrice chosen town clerk, and for several years selectman. He represented his adopted town in the colonial Legislature in 1670 and 1675. He was elected deacon of "ye Prime Society" of Norwalk. Thomas Benedict, Sr., of Norwalk, is the progenitor of the numerous family of that name in this country. He died in 1690, aged seventy-three; his widow lived to the age of one hundred and six.

Francis Bushnell was a carpenter. At the age of twenty-six he left England in the ship "Planter," for New England with his wife, aged twenty-six, and one child, aged one year, April 4, 1635. He carried with him to the port from whence he sailed a certificate that he was no "subseyd man." In 1653 he arrived in Norwalk. Oct. 12, 1675, he married Hannah Leyman, daughter of Thomas, for his second wife, by whom he had at least two children,—viz., Hannah and Mary. His estate in 1693 was nominal. He seems not to have been a member of the church, and never held office.

Matthew Canfield, or Campfield, was in New Haven in 1646. His name is not in the history of emigrants, nor is it known at what date he came to North America. Probably he did not arrive until 1643 or 1644. He was a magistrate and judge in Hartford, and a prominent man in all official business. He was one of the signers of a petition to King Charles II. of England for the colony. In 1662 he was appointed one of three to hold courts in Fairfield. He was made a citizen of Norwalk in 1654, and elected a deputy in 1654-56, assistant in 1658-63, deputy in 1664, and deputy commissioner. He removed from Norwalk to New Jersey in 1669.

Christopher Comstock was a resident of Fairfield, about ten years after the settlement of Norwalk. Probably he came from Hartford to Fairfield, though it is evident that he was not one of the colony who founded that settlement. It is not now known when he arrived in America, or where he resided in old England. He probably, on his way from Boston or its vicinity, tarried a short time in the Hartford colony to prospect. From thence he proceeded to Fairfield, and after spending a few years in that town removed to Norwalk, for on Jan. 27, 1664, Christopher Comstock, then living in the former place, bought of "Thomas Betts land laid out to said Betts or belonging to the accommodation of Nathaniel Ely." Later, in 1663, he married Hannah, daughter of Richard Platt, of the town of Milford, by whom he had six children. In 1673 his estate was rated at one hundred and forty-six pounds and in 1690 at two hundred and one pounds. He was approved of to "kepe an ordinary for the entertaining of strangers." He was a sergeant of the town militia, was of puritanic stock, and his descendants have ever been noted for their attachment to the religious principles of their ancestors. He died Dec. 28, 1702.

John Crompton was also one of those who came to Norwalk after the settlement of the town. He came to America from England between 1623 and 1638. He came here about 1655 or 1656, and married Sarah Rockwell, of Stamford, Oct. 8, 1676, by whom he had three children, viz., Sarah, Abigail, and John, born Jan. 7, 1682. In 1679 he was voted three acres of land "because he was a souldier in the late Indian war." He was the owner of but a small property. He never held office in the town.

Joseph Fenn came to Norwalk probably in 1654 or 1655. March 27, 1665, in "town-meeting it was voted unto M^{str} Ffenn that home-lot lyine by Will Rascoe's home-lot, which Thomas Betts hath resigned up." Joseph probably was a brother of Richard, who was living "over the river at ye Plantacion ag't James Cittle," Virginia.

Several emigrants named Ely came to the British colonies as early as 1622. In the parish record of "St. Michael's, Barbadoes," appear the names of James Ely and wife, with three children and thirteen slaves. February, 1623, Walter Ely was living in Virginia. The parish muster shows that he and wife settled there in 1622. One Eelie, aged fourteen, came to Virginia, which then included New England, in the "Primrose," having been examined as to his "conformitic to the Church of England." The name in the records is also spelt Ella, Eeles. All of them embarked at Gravesend, England, and were doubtless all branches of the same family. It has been thought that Nathaniel Ely was an offspring of one of the families named, and that he was born in America. But this is a mistake, for Nathaniel did not emigrate to this country until 1635, while the other persons of the name arrived in the colonies from ten to fifteen years prior to the latter date.

Nathaniel Ely's name first appears in the colonial records of New England as a resident of Hartford in 1635. He landed in Boston, probably late in the fall of that year, and went directly to Hartford, where he remained about sixteen years, and was constable in 1639. From thence he removed to Norwalk in 1650, having been one of the fourteen persons who agreed with Rodger Ludlow for the "settlement and planting" of the town, the agreement being dated June 19, 1650. He removed from Norwalk to Springfield, Mass., about 1660. His estate was set in the tax-list at two hundred and ninety-three pounds,—no mean sum for those times.

Thomas Fitch probably came to America with his brothers Joseph and James, who crossed the ocean in the ship "Defense," which sailed from the port of London, England, in July, 1635. Although his name does not appear in the list of emigrants with those of Joseph and James, it is conjectured that he came to the colonies, as others did, under an assumed name. He was a follower of Cromwell in the civil war against Charles I., and after the accession of Charles II. was proscribed for his disloyalty towards his government. Dr. Nathaniel Bouton says Thomas was a younger brother of Joseph and James, but it is a mistake. Joseph was the youngest of the three brothers. His name is set in the register as being only fourteen when he embarked for North America. Joseph settled in Widdson, and James (the minister) was pastor of the church in Saybrook, and afterwards was settled over the church in Norwich.

There were a numerous family of the Fitches, or Pittz, in Buching and vicinity, Essex Co., England. Five or six of the name emigrated to James City, Va., as early as 1618 or 1620.

Thomas Fitch was not among the first settlers of Norwalk. He was made freeman in 1657, in 1659 selectman, and town-clerk or recorder of lands in 1656. He represented the town in the General Assembly but once before he was seventy, after which age he served in 1726, 1727, 1729, and 1730. He was the largest tax-payer in the town in 1673. His estate was assessed at three hundred and fourteen pounds.

Three brothers by the name of Gregory, or Gregorie, sailed from London for Virginia,—viz., Benjamin, Alexander, and Thomas. The latter two are recorded as being respectively twenty-four years of age. They may have been cousins, but it is more probable that they were twin-brothers. Benjamin was but fifteen when he left Gravesend, England, in the ship "Globe," in August, 1635. Alexander embarked from the same port in October, 1631, and Benjamin in 1635. Others of the name are found in the colonial records. John was a brother, if I am not mistaken, of the above named. It is not known when he left the mother-country. His name first appears in the annals of this town as one of the original inhabitants. He represented Norwalk nine times in the Legislature at its May sessions, and eight times at its October sessions.

Nathaniel Haise, of Norwalk, of whom the records are almost silent, was among the original settlers of the town. His origin, or from whence he came to this country heretofore, was unknown to the historians of Norwalk. The record of emigrants shows that "Anto" Haies, aged twenty-four, embarked from England, August, 1635, in the ship "Safety," for the British colonies in North America. James, aged twenty-eight, left the same place, October, 1635, in the "Constance." John, aged thirty, sailed in the "Hopewell," June, 1634; and Robert, aged nineteen, March, 1635. William Haise, aged twenty-four, who left Gravesend in April, 1635, in the ship "Paul," of London, probably was a cousin of the above named, all of whom were inhabitants of St. Katherine and vicinity.

Nathaniel Haise was a man of good estate. In 1687 he was taxed on two hundred and fifteen pounds. He held no public office, but Samuel, his oldest son, represented the town in the General Assembly from 1686 to 1703,—in all fifteen times.

Walter Hoyt, or Hait, was descended from a not very numerous family of that name in "Hminster or Curry-Rivel, county of Somerset, England." The family history claims that he was a son of Simon, whose name first appeared in this country in 1629, as being in Salem, Mass. It is also found in the records of Dorchester of 1630, in those of Scituate of 1634, and in those of Windsor of 1639, where it is recorded as deacon of the church in that place. Walter could not have been the son of Simon; he must have been his younger brother. It cannot be shown that Walter came to America before 1639 or 1649, at which date Simon had been in the Massachusetts colony ten years or more. Walter was living in Windsor with his wife and three children in 1640, at which date he could not have been more than twenty-two years of age. Simon came here quite young; so it is concluded that he could not have had a son at that date old enough to be the father of three children.

Walter Hoyt removed from Windsor to Hartford, thence to Fairfield, and settled in this town in 1652 or 1653. He was deputy from Norwalk to the General Assembly of Connecticut twelve times, and held various offices in the gift of the people of the town. He was, in 1690, the possessor of an estate taxed at two hundred and forty pounds. He died in Norwalk, aged about seventy-seven.

Samuel and Thomas Hales, brothers, left England for this country in 1633. Samuel, before he removed to Norwalk, resided for a period in Roxbury, Mass. He went thence to Hartford, Conn., thence to Norwalk. He represented the town in the General Assembly in 1650, 1657, and 1660. Thomas left no official record whatever. The brothers were owners of considerable real estate in 1655. In 1673 they are not mentioned as having any estate. Probably they removed from the town some time before the assessment of 1673 was laid.

Between 1623 and 1635 eighteen of the name of Homes, or Holmes, emigrated from England to the British colonies in America. Of this number was Richard Holmes, who left the port of London in February, 1734, in the ship "Hopewell," Thomas Wood, master, and in the year 1657 settled in Norwalk. October 12th of this year Holmes came from Stratford to this town, and bought of Alexander Bryan, of Milford, the home-lot formerly owned by Thomas Smith. In March, 1663, Holmes bought all the property of Stephen Beckwith in Norwalk. His estate was taxed in 1673 at one hundred and fifty pounds. In 1676 he was the father of two children. In 1678 the town granted him liberty to erect a saw-mill upon Five-Mile River. He never held any official position in the town.

Heretofore it has been uncertain from what part of England the Rev. Mr. Hanford emigrated. In April, 1635, a person named Eglin Hanford, aged forty-six, with two daughters, embarked on the ship "Planter" for New England. He carried with him to the port of departure a "certificate of the minister of Ludburie, in Suffolk County, of his conformitie to the orders and disciplin of the Church of England, and that he is no subtedy man, and that he hath taken the oath of Allegiance supreme." It is very probable that Rev. Mr. Hanford was the son of Eglin. As there were no educational institutions of learning of a higher order in this country at the date of his emigration, may he not have left his son Thomas in Old England to finish his education, or until they were provided here? Cotton Mather says Rev. Mr. Hanford was one of the class of ministers who, not having finished their education at home, came over here to perfect it before our college was come to maturity to bestow its laurels. Probably he did not arrive in America until 1638-39.

Mr. Hanford completed his course under Rev. Mr. Charles Chauncey, of Scituate, second president of Harvard College, about 1643. The same year his name stands in the list of all those persons able to bear arms in the Plymouth colony, and this year also he witnessed the will of Edward Foster, of Scituate. He was made freeman in Massachusetts, May 22, 1650. Two years later he commenced to preach in this town. In 1653 the selectmen contracted for the building of his house, and in 1656 the inhabitants voted to pay him as their minister "threescore pounds,—viz., thirty pounds in wheat, peas, and barley, at four shillings per bushel, eight pounds in —, and the other twenty-two pounds in beefe and pork." In 1670 the town voted to "hire a man to make a comely cover for Mr. Hanford's desk in the meeting-house at the town's expense." In his advanced age (1686) the people voted that they "desire Mr. Hanford to proceed, though grown old in the work of the ministry, until the Lord shall dispose of him." "Winnepauk, an Indian, of Norwalk, in 1697 deeded to his friend Thomas Hanford, minister, his island against Rowerton." The name of his wife is now unknown. He married the second time in New Haven, Oct. 22, 1661. Mr. Hanford had the largest estate of any of the inhabitants of the town. He died in Norwalk in 1693, aged about seventy-three or seventy-four.

Daniel Kellogg was one of the first inhabitants of this town, though he may not have arrived until the spring of 1651. His home-lot adjoined Matthew Marvin's, Thomas Fitch's, and Joseph Fern's. In 1655, he "took to wife Bridget Bouton," daughter of John Bouton, Sr., by his first wife, by whom he had four daughters and two sons at least, David and Samuel. He was chosen townsman several times, and represented Norwalk eight years in the General Assembly, between 1670 and 1683. His estate in 1673 was listed at one hundred and twenty-five pounds. It is more than probable that Daniel Kellogg was a brother of Nathaniel Kellock and Joseph Keldy, both of whom were living in Farmington in 1649 and 1654.

Thomas Lupton was assigned a home-lot with the first emigrants of Norwalk, but did not arrive until a year later. It is not known whom he married. He was the father of two children, and probably had others. He was selected in 1668 to "look after the young people in the meeting-house" on the Sabbath. Doubtless he was a brother of Davie, who left England, October, 1635, and Joseph, who sailed July, 1635. His estate was listed in 1687 at one hundred and fifty pounds.

Ephraim Lockwood was without doubt a brother or other relative of Capt. Nicholas, who made several trips to Virginia. It is not impossible that Ephraim came to America as a hand on the ship commanded by the captain. He married, June 8, 1665, Mercie Sention, daughter of Mathias Sr., of Norwalk, by whom he had five sons, viz., John, Daniel, Ephraim, Joseph, and Eliphalet. His estate was set in the list of 1687 at one hundred and twenty pounds.

Ralph Keeler and his brother Walter came from the port of London, England, to the colonies in 1635 or 1636. Ralph was in Hartford in 1639, and a viewer of chimneys there in 1645. In September, 1665, Thomas Hand sold him his "dwelling-house and houses, reserving the workshop for the abode of his wife till the 27th of September, 1666, also reserving the locks upon the dwelling-house doares, and the younger nursery trees, and two boards lying upon the collar beams." Dec. 18, 1653, he was one of the contractors to build Rev. Mr. Hanford's house. He was to "fell all the timber and hewe what is to be hewe." His estate in 1673 was set in the list at fifty-three pounds.

Mr. Savage doubts if there was such a person as Walter, but the name occurs in the list of the first emigrants to Norwalk. If Mr. Savage had been the possessor of the records of this and other towns, he would not have had so many doubts about those whom it was his business to have known.

Mathew Marvin, Maryyn, or Maryynn, came to New England with his family in the fall of 1635, having left Gravesend in April of that year. The record of his family is given by Hutton, viz., Mathew, aged thirty-five, Elizabeth, aged thirty-one, husband and wife; children, Elizabeth, aged thirteen; Mathew, eight; Maria, six; Sarah, three; Hannah, six months. All of them came in the ship "Increase," Lea, master, the husband having taken the oath of "Allgeance and Supremacie" "conformable to the government and disciplin of the Church of England." Mathew Marvin was in Hartford in 1639, and seems to have been one of the early proprietors. He had other children born in Hartford,—viz., Abigail, Samuel, Rachel. While a resident of that place he was plaintiff in a case against Mathew Beckwith for defamation of character, and recovered damages in the sum of fifty pounds. The same was remitted by the court and plaintiff on Beckwith's making a public retraction of the slander.

Marvin and family, it seems, came to Norwalk in 1651, having followed the first emigrants, and may be said to have been of the original number. His home-lot joined the meeting-house yard and Daniel Kellogg's and Thomas Fitch's. He was deputy from Norwalk in 1654, and assistant magistrate in 1659. He was the possessor of a large estate in 1673, which had doubled in 1687.

Isaac More sailed from Gravesend, England, at the age of thirteen, in the "Increase," Lea, master, under the guardianship of Mathew Marvin, with whom he went to Hartford, and from thence removed to Norwalk. In 1660 he sold his home-lot to Mark Sention. April, 1654, Goodman More was chosen townsman for the ensuing year. In 1657, Isaac More, with three others, provided a good and sufficient "wolfe-pit." Whom he married and when he died are not now known. He owned and resided on property on what is known as Marshall Street, in this city, and was a lineal descendant of Danver, who settled in this town in 1651.

Isaac More was living in Farmington in 1649, and was presented to the court "for sergeant by the souldgers," and was approved. In 1665 the court "frees More from training, he having been formerly chief-officer of the Train Band" of that place.

Widow Morgan's name is in the list of the first emigrants, and this is all that is known of her, if the statements of others are to be taken. Savage, in his history of emigrants, says she was a myth. She may have been to him, for he doubts if her name is to be found anywhere in the records of Norwalk. But it is there, and Mr. Savage or anybody else may read, if he be disposed to. Widow Morgan probably married after her settlement here, but whom is not known, as the old church records were destroyed in the Revolutionary war. Or she may have died in the town soon after its settlement.

Jonathan Marsh,—or as it is in list of emigrants, Jno. aged twenty-six, embarked in the "Plain Joan," Bucham master, for Virginia in May, 1635. He was probably from the parish of Benendon, county of Kent. He brought "Attestacon of his conformitie to the order and disciplin of the Church of England." No trace of him is to be found after his arrival here until he appears in Norwalk. In 1657 he owned real estate here, situated and bounded by the river; and engaged to build a corn-mill; and he was to have upland adjoining the mill. In 1658, Goodman Marsh "agreed to attend the town 3 days in the week. These days he is to attend that he may fetch and carry corn to the mill." This is all that is known of his history in England and America at present.

Richard and John Olmstedd were the brother and nephew of James. James came to New England "Plantacon there p Cert: from Capten Mason, have tendred and taken the oath of allegiance according to the Statute." Both emigrated from Braintree, county of Essex, England, June, 1632. Richard and his brother John probably came to the colonies under assumed names, as the name of neither is found in the catalogue of emigrants in which that of James appears. After the death of James his executors, desirous to carry out that which they conceived to be his wish, gave to his "kynsman," Richard and John Olmstedd, five pounds each.

Richard was one of the petitioners for the planting of Norwalk. He was prominent in all the public affairs, and was the first representative of the town in the General Assembly, having been fourteen times elected to that position. He was a sergeant of the militia in 1653, and lieutenant of the company in 1659. He was in Hartford in 1640, constable in 1646, and deputy in 1662 and 1663. He removed to this plantation in 1650, and was one of three appointed by the court to run the lines between Stamford and Stratford. His home-lot was bounded by land of Thomas Hale and Nathaniel Ely. He was appointed, Feb. 21, 1670, selectman of the town. In 1673 he was the possessor of a moderate estate taxed one hundred and nineteen pounds.

Joseph Platt was a French refugee. He did not settle in Norwalk until about 1699, at which date he received a grant of sixteen acres lying at West Rocks. Feb. 21, 1698, the town "Granted unto Joseph Platt, as he was a souldier out in the service against the common enemy, the town, as a gratification for his good service, do give and grant unto him ten acres of land, to take it up a mile from the town, and wheare it lyes free nor yet pitcht upon by any other persons." Dec. 16, 1713, "Capt. Joseph Platt was one of a committee to make a settlement of a highway or road to Ridgefield. He had only one son,—viz., John.

Joseph Platt represented Norwalk in the General Assembly a period of sixty-five years, or from 1705 to 1790. He has no list of property, either in 1673 or 1687. As he was styled the "Worshipful," the inference might be drawn that he was exempt from taxation, in view of services rendered to his constituents.

Nathaniel Richards sailed from the mother-country for New England in the same ship in which James and Richard Olmstedd crossed the Atlantic, June, 1632, he also having a certificate from "Capten Mason" that he had taken the oath according to the statute. He was of Mr. Hooker's company at Newtown, Cambridge, 1632. He was one of the proprietors of the Hartford company, as his name appears in the records of that town in 1635. He was jurymen there in 1643, 1644, and 1646, and constable in 1641 and 1649, orderer of the town in 1644, and a deputy to the General Assembly in 1643. He probably came to the Norwalk colony some time during 1651. In 1664,

Mr. Richards bought Jonathan Marsh's mill and all the land adjoining it. He was elected selectman Feb. 21, 1670. He never represented this town in the colonial Legislature. He had an estate in 1673 of two hundred and sixty-eight pounds. In 1687 his name is not in the table of estates; hence it is concluded that he died between 1673 and 1687, aged about sixty-two years. His descendants have always been noted for their steady and industrious habits.

John Rusco, son of William and Rebecca Rusco, husband and wife and four children—viz., Sara, Maria, Samuel, and William (aged one year)—"imbarcked in ye 'Increase' from London, April, 1635, for New England. They were certificated as from Billerway, county of Essex, by the Minister of ye first that William Rusco, husbandman, was no Subsidy man." After due investigation it is concluded that John Rusco was a son of William, born in this country within a year or two after their arrival in Boston, early in the fall of 1635. Although John's name stands in the catalogue of the first emigrants, he could not have been over thirteen or fourteen years of age. Probably he came to this town with the older settlers. As his home-lot was not set off to him, but had transferred to him that which was formerly set off to another, his grant was not one of the original few,—it was not recorded until 1683, while the other original grants were recorded about 1665 or 1670.

William Rusco, at this date, lived in Norwalk, as Mr. Fenn's home-lot was next William Rusco's. From 1673 to 1687 his estate had increased from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty pounds.

Richard Raymond's name first appears in the records of Norwalk in 1654. He was, no doubt, a French refugee, and may have come to North America under an assumed name, as there is no record of his departure from England. August, 1655, one Arthur Raymond, aged twenty, sailed from London in the "Lofty," Graunt, master, for Virginia. It is conjectured that Arthur was a brother of Richard, whose name appears in the records as an inhabitant of this town. He removed to Norwalk from Salem, Mass., and from here to Saybrook. In 1662 he was living at Massachusetts Bay, at which date he "bought of Ralph Keeler his housings, home-lott, or barn-yard, and the house, flores, doars, glasse windows, shelves, everything fastened together,—four acres." It seems he returned to Norwalk, as in 1677 he empowered Thomas Betts to record all his lands to the children of his son John by Mary Raymond, his present wife, the year before this transaction. John, his son, seems to have borne all the family honors. His estate was taxed (1690) at two hundred pounds. He "tooke to wiffe," Dec. 10, 1661, Mary, daughter of Thomas Betts, by whom he had two sons,—John, who died when a child, and John (2d), born nine years later.

* See Hull, page 29.

St. John, Matthias, and Matthew Sension probably emigrated from Huntingdon, England. It seems that Matthias came to Norwalk a short time previous to the arrival of Matthew. It is conjectured that the St. Johns of Norwalk were descendants of Attorney-General St. John, who married a relative of Oliver Cromwell and followed his fortunes during his reign. The only ground for the conjecture is the fact that the attorney was of the same name. When the brothers settled in America is not known, though it is believed they preceded Nicholas Sension, aged thirteen, who sailed from London, April, 1635, in the "Elizabeth and Ann Roger," Cooper, master, under the protection of Jo. Whitney, who came in the same ship with his five children, aged respectively eleven, nine, eight, six, and one, all of whom brought with them a certificate that they were "no subsidy" men.

Matthias' name is among the original settlers of the town, and March 5, 1657, he was one of them "to make a sufficient wolf-pett." Matthias, Savage thinks, was a myth; but he was in Dorechester in 1639 and a jurymen at Hartford in 1643 and 1644. Otherwise the brothers were not prominent in public affairs.

Several of the Webb family emigrated to this country in the early part of the sixteenth century. Richard embarked for Virginia from Gravesend, England, in the "Primrose," July, 1635. He was of the number of more than one hundred who took the oaths of "Allegeance and Supremacie," and "fetch off by Mr. Secretary Windebanks' warrant." Probably the men were political rebels, and were obliged to take a special oath to the home government. He is reputed to have been living at Cambridge in 1632. The date of his departure from England disproves that he was in the country in that year. His name appears in the records as jurymen at Hartford in 1643 and 1644, and selectman in 1643 and 1644. About this time he was fined for not appearing at the appointed hour for the sitting of the court. In 1640 he was one of the executors of the will of James Olmstead, and was deputy from Norwalk fourteen times, from 1653 to 1679.

When or how Thomas Seamer, or Seymore, came to the colonies, or his origin in the old country, is not now known. There is a good reason for the prevalent opinion that he was a French refugee who escaped into England, and soon thereafter emigrated to North America and was a member of the Hartford colony, as it appears that Richard, a brother, was located there in 1639 to 1646 at least. In 1690 he possessed an estate set in the list at one hundred and eighty-four pounds. He was never honored by his fellow-townsmen with responsible official positions.

NORWALK (Continued).

UNPUBLISHED TRADITIONAL FACTS IN THE HISTORY OF NORWALK.*

Traditions—Reminiscences—One Hundred Years Ago—The Burning of Norwalk—The Indian City of Saramake and its Founders—Pampuckoshank—Incidents of the Revolution—The Norwalk Indians—Indian Cemeteries—The Cannibals of Norwalk.

THE first white emigrants to New England, though educated under despotic laws in the Old World, in the New adopted a system of town organizations, simple, pure, and natural, relative to property, education, and equal rights. Those town republics sowed the seed which brought forth republican government on this continent. Their codes of laws are the votes found upon the records of those ancient towns, and framed to maintain the peace and union of those local republics, and to preserve the "liberty of civil affairs." The first ancestors of Norwalk established one of those republics in this town in 1651.

The tourist, to fully appreciate the scenery of this locality, should sail down Long Island Sound and traverse the range of hills stretching from the Rocks, north, to the country "buted on the sea" south. These outlooks are the most picturesque in Connecticut.

The first emigrants to Norwalk, in their journeyings hither, passed through the interior of the country, to avoid crossing the numerous deep rivers which empty into the Sound. From the rocks north of France Street they first beheld the land of their adoption, and were delighted with its hills and vales and running brooks. On the night of their arrival the company ate and slept beneath their shadows. At early morn they proceeded southward to take possession of the rude log houses built by the few pioneers who had preceded them. The early emigrants were not without some culture. The old town records show that every man of them could write well, and they had legislative, executive, and judicial capacity, and the ability to organize the town's finances and to marshal the people into "training-bands" for the common defense.

Three classes of emigrants from England settled in this town. The first were nonconformists; the second, "subsidy men;" the third, those who were distasteful to the ruling powers, and who were transported as rebels or left England under assumed names. Half the first colonists of the town were of the first; the remainder—excepting Richard Webb, who was carried on shipboard, "fetch'd off by Secretary Windebanks' warrants"—were of the second.

Though nearly all the early settlers of Norwalk embarked from England, yet they were not all of Anglo-Saxon blood. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes thousands of the best people of France fled to England, and the government received them with open arms and encouraged their emigration to her colonies in North America. Our first ancestors were about equally divided between the Gaul and Saxon, all of whom were imbued with the Saxon ideas of civil and religious liberty and an enlightened view of justice.

The ancient records of the town do not show a single instance of special or class legislation. Their every act was based upon the broadest principles of a government by and for the people. If the common land was to be apportioned, or the cattle to roam in the common fields, or the wheat-fields to be guarded or fenced, the rights of the poorest persons were as sacredly protected as those of Governor Fitch or the wealthiest man in the plantation. Our ancestors, in their difficulties with Fairfield and Stamford, instead of an armed defense, instructed their deputies to the General Court to come to a "loving and neighborly issue and agreement," and, if not accepted, then the cases were to be taken into the court. There may be powers that object to this sort of diplomacy because of its puritanical or scriptural origin.

REMINISCENCES.

The first white settlers of Norwalk located on the plain east of the river, near Old Fort Point, upon which they reared log houses and a block-house, or fort, for common defense. Our ancestors were often summoned from their labors in the fields to disperse the Indians, whose only object, apparently, was to purloin the Indian puddings which the women were making.

The savages found within the purchases made in 1640 and 1650 were only remnants of tribes which once inhabited the country around and east of the Connecticut River, and probably other localities. They had been overpowered and driven from the graves of their ancestors by other more numerous and more warlike tribes, portions of whom had taken up their abode about Norwalk River, and whom the first settlers named the Norwalk Indians. On this point we are not left entirely to tradition. That the Indians, probably less than a hundred, who lived here were from various tribes is evident from the facts that many of their implements found in the Old Indian Field were made of various kinds of stone, none of which are to be found within the limits of the town, that the rude earthen bowls found in some of their graves were made of red clay, and that their modes of burial were diverse.

The early colonists had not been very successful in bringing the aborigines into their views of government previous to the settlement of the town. But the members of the Norwalk colony, many of whom had been in the country from sixteen to thirty years, had learned much of the Indian character. As time passed they more fully comprehended the principle of liberty which they had manfully battled for in the Old World, and this made them more successful than others had been in their efforts to civilize the Indians.

Our ancestors partook of the uneasiness rife among the colonists in 1660, and appealed to the General Court to settle their "differences." They also disciplined the militia and appointed Thomas Fitch to watch the Indians; and that is about all there was of it, for the Norwalk Indians, though at times troublesome, were never warlike. We have searched the ancient records, and have not found an instance of a Norwalk Indian's injuring any of the white inhabitants. Nor is there any evidence that they were in the direful swamp-fight in 1677 as enemies, though there is indirect testimony that some of them accompanied those who enlisted for that service from this town.

The early fathers brought with them all the Anglo-Saxon traits of energy, perseverance, industry, patriotism, and indomitable will, controlled by the fear of God. Their mission was peace and good-will to all men; they warred only when necessity required. Their policy towards the red man was the same as that pursued by William Penn. They first taught them to plow and plant and reap the fruits of their labor, and made it an offense even to trespass upon their grounds. Then they taught them who that Great Spirit was whom their fathers had ignorantly worshipped.

Until this time our ancestors had generally enjoyed peace. But they were now called upon to face King Philip, a personal foe of the English, who had excited his own tribe and his neighbors to a general rising against the whites. The town now contained less than fifty white men, five of whom volunteered towards filling the quota pledged by the Connecticut colony to chastise the Narragansetts, who, in violation of their treaty obligations, were secretly assisting Philip to lay waste with fire and tomahawk all the settlements of the colonists. Only the suddenness of the blow saved the settlements from extermination.

In 1774 the Indians had nearly disappeared from the town; only nine remained. In 1790 there were none. Probably a few of them removed to other localities, but that nearly all the tribe died here is evident from the numerous shell-graves found in the Old Field.

Fifty years ago a descendant of the tribe came to view the graves of his ancestors. As he stood on Flax Hill his great height, broad shoulders, and Indian costume, in the absence of the men, frightened the women and children of the neighborhood. It was just before the close of day. He turned to the north, to the east, to the south, then towards the setting sun, as if to converse with the Great Spirit. Then he departed. Whence he came and whither he went no one could tell.

The charge, oft repeated, that our fathers were cruel and exacting in their dealings with the Indians of Norwalk is without foundation. All the facts in their history show that they were governed by Christian and patriotic principles in their intercourse with them. To be sure, they resented every encroachment upon their civil rights with patriotic fervor. And their mantles have fallen upon their descendants, as more than a hundred battle-fields in the history of the town during the past two hundred years bear witness.

In the French war there was no lack of patriotism on the part of the people of the town. Upon receiving information that a battalion of regulars was to be quartered here, the people in town-meeting voted to tax themselves for their support. Many of them joined the army and were at the reduction of Louisbourg, July 25, 1758.

In the Revolutionary war the inhabitants also met in town-meeting and called upon all the able-bodied men to exert themselves to fill up the battalions ordered by the Continental Congress; they provided for the support of the families of those who should enlist. They closed their appeal in the following quaint language: "That the virtuous sons of liberty cheerfully and readily engage in said service, so that peace and rest may once more be restored to the United States of America, by means whereof this meeting have reason, by the blessing of God, to expect the same may be effected."

The aged people are familiar with the name of Capt. Ketcham, who in the last war with England, at the battle of Niagara, captured Gens. Drummond and Rial, officers of the British troops, and their suites, and conducted them to the rear of the American lines, which event, more than any other, contributed to the success of our arms on that day. Who is not also familiar with the name of Frank Gregory, who Headley erroneously says was a native of New Haven, but who was born in Norwalk, where he resided until he entered the naval service in 1800? Here are the tombs of his ancestors. In the last war with the English he was taken prisoner and impressed into their service, but soon escaped. In the great Rebellion Com. Gregory hastened to Washington at seventy years of age and offered his services to his government; which fact alone is sufficient to immortalize his name.

When Tryon crossed from Long Island to destroy the town the patriotic, old and young, shouldered their muskets and met his forces with a determination unsurpassed in the annals of the Revolutionary war. From the moment the enemy landed they were assaulted with so much spirit at every step of their progress, by the town militia and the Continentals then quartered here, that he left, according to his official report, one hundred and ten killed, wounded, and missing behind him in his retreat.

The engagement at Norwalk may be said to have been a series of battles. The British were repulsed on Flax Hill, at Pudding Lane, and at France Street; they were beaten at every point of attack. The burning of the town was a great disaster to the people.

Historians have made this fact prominent, and have lost sight of the patriotism, zeal, and courage displayed by the few regulars and the town militia, and the successes gained by them on that memorable day over Gen. Tryon's soldiers and the Tories who led them through the town. We call it the battle of Norwalk, for such it really was. Ere this the event should have been commemorated by the erection of a monument to perpetuate the names of those who fell on that day in defense of the town and the cause of liberty. Who found fault in the Revolutionary war with the patriotism and the institutions founded by the first white ancestors of Norwalk? They were the "nullifiers," who opposed all taxation and paying any interest on obligations for raising funds to arm and equip Continental soldiers and for the support of their families. The Revolutionary fathers said they were "inimical persons, and riotous, and dangerous to the liberties and independence of the United States of America."

Norwalk in 1677 sent five men to the front; in the Rebellion six companies, being about a twenty-fourth part of its entire population.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

July 10, 1779, Gen. Tryon's fleet, which had been moored in Huntington Bay, L. I., was discovered by the coast-guard stationed at the cove headed, with all sail set, for the west shore. The guard sounded the alarm by firing three muskets, the signal being repeated from hill-top to hill-top until the inhabitants of the town were thoroughly aroused. After the women, children, and household goods had been placed in carts and started for the forest miles away, the men shouldered their muskets and proceeded to the parade-ground, where they were detailed by companies to various localities to watch the movements of the British.

On this date, at nine o'clock in the evening, Gen. Tryon landed at Cow Pasture with two thousand five hundred British troops. July 11, 1779, one hundred years ago, the battle or series of battles of Norwalk were fought and the town devastated by the British. There were in the town less than four hundred patriot troops to oppose the advance of the enemy, one hundred and fifty of whom were Continentals, commanded by Gen. Parsons, and the town militia and volunteers commanded by Capt. Betts and Richards.

All the particulars of Gen. Tryon's advance from Cow Pasture to Grammon's Hill and of his retreat have been fully given by the historian, but the incidents along the line of the advance of Garth's regiment of Tories, after landing at Old Well, have never become published facts in the history of the town.

Historians disagree as to the date of the battle of Norwalk. Barber erroneously asserts that it occurred on July 17, 1779, and he makes Capt. Betts, in his deposition before Justice Betts, say that it was on July 12th. Gen. Tryon's official report gives the correct date: he says July 10th. They crossed the Sound with a fleet of twenty-six sail and anchored near the mouth of Norwalk Harbor. The troops landed about nine o'clock in the evening, slept upon their arms at Cow Pasture that night, and early next morning, Sunday, the 11th, moved across to Fitch's Point, on the east side of Norwalk Harbor, where they were joined by the King's American Regiment, Tories, who were ordered to cross over in flat-boats to Old Well. They landed south of Washington Street, and Tryon ordered a house near the shore burned as a signal that he had disembarked and was ready to carry out the orders of his superior.

Gen. Garth, upon landing and seeing the people on the height above the plain, seems to have entertained the idea that the patriots were entrenched upon Flax Hill, and that it would be necessary to dislodge them before attempting to join Gen. Tryon at the bridge. So he divided his regiment, and its left wing, as a feint, charged through the fields, and the right filed into the shore road to Marshall and Ann Streets, thence to West Street, forming a junction with the left at the intersection of Spring with West Street, near the stone church. Here there was severe fighting, and the enemy became disconcerted, but succeeded in gaining the summit of the first hill. But at the foot of the second they became panic-stricken, so sharp and rapid was the fire of the patriots, commanded by Capt. Richards, secreted behind the stone walls on the eastern slope of the hill stretching from the main road to Round Hill. In this encounter the enemy lost three men, and several more were wounded. Here Garth massed his troops, as if expecting another attack from the volunteers, then filed his men into the field formerly the homestead of the late Deacon Nash, and repeated the manoeuvre, probably to conceal the place of burial of his dead. Their remains were disinterred when excavating for the foundation of the house now owned by L. H. Moor, Esq.

At this juncture of affairs a British officer appeared on the brow of Flax Hill. After surveying the situation a few moments he commenced to flourish his sword, as if giving orders to the enemy to advance. This he repeated several times, to the amusement of the patriots, who with deliberate aim fired their muskets, when he stretched himself upon his steed's neck and galloped out of sight, his cocked hat and tall plume appearing as if transferred from the head of the rider to that of the horse.

Having interred their dead, Garth resumed his line of advance through the field to Sound Hill, and on its summit placed a field-gun. Here he remained inactive about an hour, then filed his men into Cedar Street, thence down the hill by the old malt-house to Main Street, though some of the eye-witnesses claimed that the enemy passed through Garner Street. Probably both versions are correct, as in all his previous movements Garth divided his force.

From Main Street to the residence of Thomas Benedict, situated near the intersection of the turnpike road with West Street, the British paid no attention to the assaults of the patriots upon their rear and left flank, so intent were they upon crossing the ford north of the bridge in advance of the volunteers. But at the residence of Deacon Benedict a large number of Garth's men partook freely of the wine and cider placed on the front porch of his house for the patriots who had been on guard all night, as the story goes. The deacon never related the incident without smiling and remarking that a drunken person, bereft of the use of his limbs, was as harmless as a corpse. While the Tories were regaling themselves the volunteers, who had all the morning clung to the rear and flanks of Garth's troops, at double quick crossed the ford north of the present bridge and joined their comrades, who had held their own against Tryon's force for five hours, at the business centre of the town.

Gen. Tryon moved from Cow Pasture to Fitch's Point at three o'clock in the morning. Following the shore, about four o'clock he reached the down town road, where he met the Continental troops and militia, who slowly and in good order retreated to Grummon's Hill, thence to the business part of the town, still pursued by the enemy. Nor were they dislodged until the junction of Garth's and Tryon's divisions north of the bridge, when the patriots retreated in excellent order to the rocks, where some hasty preparations had been made for the final battle.

At ten o'clock in the forenoon the battle of the rocks on France Street commenced, lasting till twelve noon, at which hour Tryon ordered his army to retreat. As it did so it was pursued by the Continentals and a portion of the volunteers and town militia, who clung to his rear until he was in sight of the place of disembarkation the previous evening. With the order to retreat came also the order to complete the devastation by fire of the remainder of the dwellings of the people, which order was mercilessly executed. Six houses only were left standing on their line of advance and retreat, — four on the east and two on the west side of the harbor. These were spared through the interposition of women who claimed the protection of the British on account of the loyalty of their husbands to King George. The enemy destroyed all the salt-pans of the people along the shore, and towed to their fleet every whale-boat in the harbor, with the magazine and stores gathered in the town for the army. All the whaling and other vessels moored at the docks or in the river were burned.

Tryon's official report of the battle of Norwalk says he retired his men in two columns to the place of his first debarkation unassailed. This is not the fact. The patriots who participated in the battle ever claimed that the British were harassed from the moment of their advance until they left our shores, and that Gen. Garth's force was beaten on Flax Hill, and the combined forces of the enemy at France Street after two hours' severe fighting. This was the verdict of the old people of fifty years ago, who were eye-witnesses of all that transpired on that memorable day. Barber is again in error when he says six houses only were left undestroyed by the British: there was only that number spared on the line of their advance and retreat. Tryon's official report says the greater part of the dwelling-houses were set in flames. There were more than thirty houses which were not burned, having been situated principally off the roads over which the enemy passed on the day of battle. The British and Tories burned, all told, on July 11, 1779, eighty dwellings, two churches, eighty-seven barns, seventeen shops, and four mills, in addition to the property heretofore enumerated.

At the date of the battle of Norwalk the town had been settled about one hundred and twenty-five years, and its taxable property had increased from a few hundred pounds to three hundred thousand dollars in 1779. The damage done by the sacking of the town was estimated, by a committee appointed by the General Assembly of the State, at about one hundred and sixteen thousand dollars, in consideration of which the general government awarded to Connecticut a large tract of land in Northern Ohio, which was partly settled by emigrants from Norwalk.

Historians tell but half the truth when they designate July 11, 1779, as the date of the burning and not of the battle of Norwalk. The enemy were repelled or held in check at every point of attack. It took, according to Tryon's report, five hours for his troops to dislodge the patriots at the business centre. So far as we know, but two men were killed and but one wounded or captured on our side, while the British, according to Tryon's official report, lost twenty killed, ninety-six wounded, and thirty-two missing or unaccounted for.

Gen. Washington, at the date of the invasion of Norwalk by the British, was encamped with his army on the banks of the Hudson River. On or about July 9th he dispatched Gen. Parsons to Norwalk to assume command of and "give confidence to the militia and guide their movements." One day's ride brought Gen. Parsons here, giving him a day or two to marshal his troops for the defense of the town. But, finding the force present inadequate in numbers and discipline to cope with Gen. Tryon's experienced troops and Hessians, he placed in position, on the hill near the rocks, the battery of six cannon brought from Salisbury by Thaddeus Betts two years previous.

Gen. Parsons, with the few troops at his command, determined to meet the enemy in ambushes, the objective point being the rocks; the line of retreat of all the patriot troops engaged was in that direction. There nearly all the volunteers, militia, and Continental troops united for the final conflict. The result of the fight with Tryon's troops on France Street, sent to dislodge Gen. Parsons's and Walcott's command, shows that the plan of battle was skillfully laid, and that it was no ordinary affair, considering that there were less than four hundred patriot soldiers opposed to at least three-quarters of Tryon's force of two thousand five hundred trained troops landed at Cow Pasture and Fitch's Point the night of the 10th of July.

The late Dr. N. Bouton was good authority in our local historical matters. He was personally acquainted with all the Revolutionary sires of his time, and was very particular to note all the authenticated facts and incidents communicated by them. In his two hundredth anniversary discourse of the settlement of Norwalk he says that the militia and Continental troops, headed by Gens. Parsons and Walcott, were on the hill near the rocks, whence they fired on the enemy at Grummon's Hill. To drive the former from their position Tryon dispatched a large body of troops, who were met by our soldiers in France Street, and greeted them with so warm a reception that their progress was checked, and ere noon they were on the retreat.

Gen. Walcott came to Norwalk in advance of his command. Gen. Parsons came here to direct the movements of the militia. Probably the former came to assume the supervision of the Continental troops of Gen. Butler's brigade stationed in the town. It is very doubtful if Gen. Walcott's command arrived in Norwalk after the battle. The greater probability is that as soon as the British were on ship-board Gen. Walcott retraced his steps with a view of intercepting his command. If any troops arrived, they were the remainder of Gen. Butler's brigade. If there are any well-authenticated facts as to the arrival of patriot troops the day following the battle, we have to the present time been unable to find them.

The following quotation from Gen. Parsons' letter to Governor Trumbull, dated at Stamford, July 17, 1779, is conclusive on the point. The general says, "The depredations of the enemy upon the sea-coast of the State Gen. Walcott has doubtless particularly informed you of;" then adds, "The destruction of Norwalk is what I have been a witness of."

Those historians who have given July 12th as the date of the destruction of Norwalk were probably misled by Barber, from the fact that he makes Tryon say that he landed on the 12th.

Dr. Hall and nearly all the modern historians of Connecticut have given the same date as being that of the burning of the town. Even the Norwalk Gazette, Aunt Phebe, and the omnipresent Onesimus, who was always in the wood-pile when anything was about to transpire, and upon whose assertions much of the history of the event is based, also say that it occurred on the 12th. If Aunt Phebe and Onesimus in this instance failed to be correct, it is not impossible that other portions of their statements are also incorrect,—at least somewhat colored, as both had the name of having been rather visionary and superstitious withal.

The date of the burning of the town was settled by Dr. Nathaniel Bouton in his historical discourse delivered in Norwalk in 1851, in which he says, "On Saturday, the 10th, the British fleet appeared in our harbor," and "as the morning of the Sabbath dawned the British troops were seen concentrating from both sides of our harbor at Grummon's Hill, and the roar of cannon and fire of muskets, in strange contrast with the usual stillness of the Sabbath, deepened the terror of the scene." The doctor fixed the date of the event with no dispute in view.

Whatever we have or may say in relating the reminiscences of Norwalk which have gained credence and been incorporated into its local history will be in no spirit of unjust criticism, but with a view to arrive at the truth and to show the improbability of some of the stories which for more than a quarter of a century have been supposed to be facts. Every statement in the history of the town not sustained by at least a probability should at once be discarded from it, the mystical features of which have obtained credit since the death of those who participated in the engagement of July 11, 1779, and sanctioned by Dr. Hall's history, made up in part by interviewing the very aged people of the town. Some of these reminiscences were incredible, as were some of the incidents related of Gen. Washington and of Dr. Franklin when they were said to be journeying through Norwalk.

Gen. Washington may or may not have passed through the town on or about June 26, 1775, soon after his appointment by Congress commander-in-chief of the Continental army. He made the tour of the Northern States very soon after the adjournment of the first session of the first Congress, with the view of harmonizing the discordant elements rife in the country, and of observing the material growth and condition of the people since the close of the Revolutionary war. James Seymour, Sr., related that Gen. Washington passed through the town soon after he was inaugurated President of the new republic, and when opposite his residence he saw an improved plow by the roadside and alighted from his carriage, seized its handles, and examined it closely, making many inquiries as to its efficiency.

It is important to know on which of these occasions Miss Phebe Comstock saw Gen. Washington, in order to prove her reminiscences of him correct and worthy a place in the annals of the town.

It will be necessary to examine one of Miss Phebe's stories of an earlier date in order to test her memory relating to those given by her concerning the burning of the town in 1779.

At the age of sixteen she and her slave O'ne, it is said, rode into town on horseback to see Dr. Franklin, the philosopher and sage. In the summer of 1773, Dr. Franklin was in the northern counties of England, and while at the Lake of Derwent, it is said, for the gratification of the persons with him, he smoothed its ruffled surface with oil, which he carried in the head of his cane. Perhaps this story preceded his return to America, and as he passed through the country the children were eager to see the man who had performed so wonderful a feat in the old country. Hence the story of his smoothing the rippled waters in Norwalk.

October, 1723, Benjamin Franklin left Boston to seek his fortune. He visited it three times from that date, making the journey each time by water. During 1763 he planned a tour of the northern colonies to examine the post-offices. This is the only time that he was in Norwalk. So there should be no credence given to her story as to her seeing Dr. Franklin quieting the rippled waters on the church green in the town with spirits of turpentine. The story was a creation of her childish dreams. She or O'ne never saw him, for the very good reason that they were both born about 1763, the year Dr. Franklin inspected the post-offices.

The true accounts of the events of the battle of Norwalk were corroborated by all those engaged. When Thomas Benedict, Nathaniel Raymond, Thomas Walter, and Daniel Hoyt, Joseph and Major Warren, Samuel Richards, and many others, related incidents of the Revolution and the burning of Norwalk, each confirmed the story of the others as to time, place, and the nature of the occurrences, thus establishing the facts beyond controversy.

This is not the case when Miss Comstock and Onesimus related their adventures during the same period. Their words stand upon their naked assertions. They never had the credit among their contemporaries of seeing a tittle of what they claimed they saw, particularly during the 10th and 11th of July, 1779. It is not to be presumed even that Dr. Hall, when questioning Miss Phebe Comstock, did not understand what she said. He gave her statements just as he received them from her lips, and was well aware that the lady was giving an account of her own acts, not those of her mother. So Dr. Hall did not get the affair of raking salt-hay mixed or muddled, for he was remarkable in comprehending the ideas of others in conversation, and noted for exactness of statement.

When it is said that Miss Comstock and her slave were on the meadows raking salt-hay when the British fleet anchored in the harbor in 1779, the critical reader knows that it was not the fact,—first, for the good reason that when Norwalk was laid in ashes the inhabitants were in the midst of their grain harvest; second, our people were never in the practice of cutting salt-hay until the grain was stored. August and September have from time immemorial been the months for cutting and stacking salt-grass. The statement, then, that Onesimus and his mistress gave the first alarm when the British were about to invade the town is simply a canard.

The British shipping was seen by the coast-guard, early on the morning of the 10th of July, advancing towards the north shore, and they gave the usual alarm. Can there be a probability even that the twain, after the commotion caused by the morning alarm, went down to the meadow to gather grass and stayed there all day? Who believes that this colored oracle looked up about sundown and beheld the British fleet in the harbor?

Neither were they on the meadows after the town was burnt. If they were, and the people rallied and captured two "red-coats," where is the history of the event recorded? Who ever heard the account except from the lips of these persons? The whole story is an improbability. The statement of Onesimus that he saw the harbor full of British vessels manned by red-coats gives a positive denial to the assertion of the colored oracle, for the enemy were never in the harbor in force after July 10, 1779. No doubt but he had a great scare, and mounted his horse and rode home, but it was long after the war. But, as the statement appears, Onesimus, when he reached his home, tells the elder Phebe that the British had come. Here Miss Phebe is lost sight of, and the slave and Mrs. Phebe proceed to the hill, and she climbs into an apple-tree,—sweet, of course,—and from her lookout sees the red-coats carrying their dead and wounded to their boats; which supposes they may have been moored on Grummon's Hill. But it so happened that they were anchored at Cow Pasture and Fitch's Point. Who is so simple as to believe that Mrs. Comstock from her perch saw the river, or Grummon's Hill even? It is about six miles from the hill where she sat to Cow Pasture; even with a powerful eye-glass she could not see either. Which are we to believe? Miss Phebe says she got into the apple-tree and saw the enemy; Onesimus says that it was the elder Phebe who climbed the tree the red-coats to see. Doubtless the statements are the result of impressions derived from conversation of older people heard at so early an age that the listeners were finally led to believe that they had really seen all which they related of the events of 1779.

With these facts before us, their reminiscences of the British landing and burning of the town should no longer have a place in the history of Norwalk.

REMINISCENCES OF THE INDIAN CITY OF SARAKMAKE AND ITS FOUNDERS, AND OF THE PAMPASKESHANK—INCIDENTS OF THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR IN THEIR LOCALITIES.

One mile south of the city of South Norwalk, and midway between it and Five-Mile River landing is an inlet or arm of the Sound, now known as "The Cove," which from the commencement of commerce between New Amsterdam and the New England colonies has been a safe anchorage for vessels in the carrying trade from the northeasters which at certain seasons of the year sweep across it. This inlet, or the stream which empties into it, was known by the Indians as the Pampaskeshank. Later the inhabitants called it Hoof and Horn Creek, from the fact that cattle often perished in the brook at the crossing of the highway. The Pampaskeshank was the west bound of the purchase by Richard Webb, Nathaniel Ely, and others, of the Indians, Feb. 15, 1651, which said, "Brook and passage the bounds west extendeth up into the country by marked trees; and the aforesaid land bounded on the south with the sea, and on the north with the Mohakes' Country." As the Mohegan Indians possessed the country bordering on the Hudson River, probably the purchase from the Norwalk Indians by Webb and Ely extended to Byram River.

The first white settlers of Norwalk named this stream Rooton Brook, Rooton being the name of the territory bordering upon it on the west. Its course from the cove is due north through Ely's Neck, and it forms the west bound of this city from Springwood to the west corner of Bouton Lane and the old Boston Turnpike. This country, "budded on the sea," is the territory over which the "Cow-Boys" and Tories raided in 1778 and 1779, and is one of the most picturesque localities in Norwalk. It is surrounded on the north and west by promontories covered with oak, chestnut, walnut, maple, and the North American cedar, the slopes of which and the plain west and south in olden times yielded good crops of the cereals and pasture of large herds of cattle, which were exchanged for merchandise with masters of vessels coasting between "Manhattan Island" and the settlements on the Connecticut River. One mile west of this locality is situated the "Cove in the Rocks," though now partially obliterated. In 1781 it was in the parish of Middlesex, and in the town of Stamford, over which the Rev. Dr. Mather presided as its pastor.

I never visit the "country budded on the sea" without reviving the thoughts and emotions experienced on my first visit to it in boyhood, when from cliff and tree came audible sounds, making the hairs to stand on end, questioning, "From whence and whither going?" And as the sun sank behind the hills the shadows of objects animate and inanimate would lengthen into fantastic forms. If I ran or walked the phantoms were present whispering, "This is sacred ground. Here are the graves of the sachems and the tribe over whom they ruled, whose spirits for two hundred years have made this place their abode. Tread lightly on their graves. If the tomahawks, arrows, mortars, pestles, wampum, or bones are disturbed, rebury them so deep that they shall never be molested again by sacrilegious hands. The avarice of the white race robbed us of the right to life, liberty, and country. For a few valueless trinkets it took from us our heritage. By war and the introduction of fire-water it depopulated our village as with the besom of destruction. The implements and the human bones buried here are the seals that the title of the red man to the soil is still unrevoked."

Upon the point of land lying between the Pampaskeshank and Norwalk Rivers are the remains of the ruins of an Indian city of no mean dimensions of the Naramakes, a clan of the once-powerful Mohegan nation, a remnant of which were in existence after the settlement of Norwalk in 1651. Winnepaque,—who sold to Rev. Mr. Hanford, in 1690, his island "Lying against Rooton,"—Cachenoës, and Naramake were sachems of independent clans of the Mohegans, after whom their respective villages and the territory possessed by them were named. Mahackems, Matouwacks, Swanoy's, and other clans who held sway over the country between Norwalk and Manhattan Island were also independent clans of the same nation. The "Mahackems," or "Makentons," sold their lands to Capt. Patrick, as did Naramake a portion of his, all of which was conveyed in the same deed. The first named lay west of the Pampaskeelunk, and the latter east of it. These various clans, though independent, seem to have been under a sort of federal government, similar to that of the United States of America, for the common defense. Bancroft the historian says that the "country between the banks of the Connecticut and the Hudson was possessed by independent villages of the Mohegans." The Indian city referred to, without the least doubt, was one of those independent villages, and was named after Naramake, its founder, a descendant of whom was one of the signers of the deed to Patrick. Hence, may not Norruck, Northwalk, and Norwalk—names by which the river and adjacent country were known by our ancestors—have been a perversion of Naramake? It is an error which those unacquainted with the Indian dialect might naturally have fallen into. Tradition says that Naramake, whose name stands second in the deed conveying to "Daniell Patrick" certain lands in 1640, was a descendant of a chief of the same name, whose possessions had been reduced by conquest to the small territory purchased by Patrick.

There is a reasonable certainty that the Indian name of the land "bitted on the sea," at the date of the settlement of the town by the whites, was Naramake. Trumbull says that the Indians often named places after their principal men. But De Forrest denies that they did so. Nevertheless it was a fact as to certain localities in this town. For instance, Mamachimon's and Chashenoc's Islands still retain the names of those sachems who sold them to the "Inhabitants of Norwalk." No historian has ever intimated that the Norwalk River derived its name from any peculiarity in the color or in the ebb and flow of its waters into Long Island Sound, or the beautiful islands which guard its mouth, or the natural scenery of the country bordering upon it, has any significance from which it could have derived its name. Hence we conclude that the Indian name of this town was Naramake, and that it was named after the ancestor of one of the sachems who deeded to Capt. Patrick "the ground called Sacuntyenapueke, Meeanworth, Asmmsowis, and all the land adjoining to the aforementioned, as far up in the country as an Indian can go in a day;" probably to the south bound of the land possessed by the Rampoos at Ridgefield, lying west of the Naramake River. Naramake, after disposing of his lands to Capt. Patrick, removed to Ridgefield and joined the tribe known in history as the Rampoos. When this tribe, in 1708, sold its possessions to a company of settlers from Norwalk and Millford, he went to the far West and was lost sight of.

The Indian city of Naramake was situated upon Belden's or Wilson's Point. Its boundaries can now be more easily traced than many of the landmarks of the first settlers of the town. East of the residence of the late Mrs. Wilson is a plot of land of several acres known as Platt's Meadow, upon which were located the wigwams of the tribe, beneath the soil of which are found fragments of earthenware, shells, stone hatchets, mortars, pestles, arrow-heads, and stones laid by human hands. South of this is another plot of land, which must have been used by the tribe as a feasting-ground, beneath the surface of which are the bones of animals and birds and oyster-shells from two to six feet deep. To the left of this is a piece of arable land used by them as a garden, in which they cultivated every species of herbs for medical purposes. The elder Dr. McLane's attention having been called to this field, he said that there was no disease to which the human race was subject but a remedy could there be found. Grasses and weeds cannot thrive in the soil, as it is thoroughly impregnated with shell-lime.

The remainder of the land in this locality has the appearance of having been a common field for the sepulchre of their dead. Probably each head of a family had apportioned to him a certain quantity of land for cultivation, which was also used as a family burying-ground. Numerous skeletons of the Naramakes have been exhumed, all of which were found in the same position, with the head elevated and facing to the east. That this tribe was distinct from those buried in the Old Indian Field is evident from the fact that in the latter the skeletons are found in various positions and facing north, south, east, and west. From this fact the inference is that previous to the time when our ancestors settled here Naramake was a sort of city of refuge for the disaffected of the tribes in the surrounding country. The bones discovered in the vicinity of this ancient city indicate that they were of large stature, and their skulls that they were of larger brain than the average of savages.

There were indeed giants in the land. The bones of an Indian taken from a shell-grave on this field a few years since, when set up, measured seven feet five inches. Though it may seem incredible, we have for it the word of C. E. Wilson, who says that Dr. McLane also saw the skeleton. It may be asked, From whence came this people? No doubt they descended from the Five Nations, as both buried their dead facing the east. Further, the implements found in the shell-graves of Naramake are more elaborately wrought than those found in the graves on the Indian Field. As the Five Nations were superior to other tribes in artistic skill, in government, war, and the knowledge of the geography of the country, so it may be implied that the inhabitants of this Indian city, who showed equal skill particularly in the finish of their implements, were of the same blood. Mr. C. E. Wilson presented to the writer several Indian relics found at Naramake. The arrows and spear-heads formed from basalt are superior to anything of the kind yet discovered in the Old Indian Field or any other locality in this town.

Upon the heights above the west bank of the Pampaskeshank are also the ruins of two lesser villages of the same clan. As there is no feasting- or burial-place in the vicinity, it may be inferred that they were places of defense or outposts of the main city. These promontories still indicate that they have been at some period fortified, from which is an outlook towards the east, south, and west of unsurpassed grandeur, from which also is seen the entrance into Norwalk Harbor, around which stand as sentinels 'Caekenoos', 'Mamaehimons', 'Chaekanenoes', and numerous other islands. Further to the east is "Caekenoos de Long Island Sea," over which the Indians passed in their frail canoes, but which is now studded with every species of vessel in the carrying trade between centres of commerce. Still further on is seen "Caekenoos or Long Island," which may also be seen on a cloudless day with the naked eye, its banks of pure white sand in contrast with its verdure of forest and cultivated fields, together with the church-spires of the town of Huntington and Eden's Neck Lighthouse, the headquarters of Governor Tryon in 1779, at which date a personage of large frame and energetic will resided at the base of the outlook described, who, though a professed religious character, rode several miles just to say to a relative, "Ask your wife if you may be rich." Indeed, he was literally lord of about all he surveyed. His possessions were bounded east by the Pampaskeshank, south and west by Long Island Sound and Rooton River. In the year 1769 he reared a new domicile on a rise of ground sloping towards the river, the chimney of which for more than a hundred years has been one of the ranges to designate "Great Rocks," and not unknown in these days to persons who angle in the deep waters of the Sound, and to the harbor-masters who pilot vessels through the "Middle Passage." This house was well protected from the cold winds of winter by the hills and forests on the north and west, and fanned by the gentle breezes of midsummer from the "Caekenoos de Long Island Sea." Its locality is one of the pleasantest and most desirable places for a residence within the purchase made by Daniel Patrick of the chiefs of the country in 1640. It will be necessary to describe that new house. It was a two-story frame building, with a long steep roof in its rear. The main timbers were oak, fourteen inches square and covered with chestnut shingles, with the butts fourteen inches to the weather. The chimney was situated in the centre of the building and constructed of rough stone, with cross-sticks of oak. Its inside was plastered with lime made of clam- and oyster-shells found in the Indian graves in the vicinity of the city of Naramake. The windows were few and small. The main fireplace faced one of the front windows, from which its owner could see Long Island and the waters intervening, and the movements of any friendly or piratical vessels sailing up or down the coast. We have thus particularized this house and its owner, as both have a history in connection with the Revolutionary war. Ten years later Tryon's headquarters were in the vicinity of Huntington, L. I., from whence his army raided upon the defenseless inhabitants on the west shore from Greenwich to Fairfield, destroying their dwellings and carrying away their produce and running off their cattle to replenish his commissariat.

Though the dweller of Pampaskeshank had frequently been in communication with Tryon's commissary, yet he had not had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the British commander. His introduction to him was as follows: He was the owner of a trading-vessel. When returning from Boston with a cargo of general merchandise, he was met by Tryon's fleet midway of the Sound and his vessel captured and himself made a prisoner, whereupon he commanded his captors to take him before Tryon, the result, it is said, being he was soon released, but not till the enemy had unloaded his cargo. Tradition says that he received therefor in British gold more than it was worth. This incident brought the dweller of Pampaskeshank and Tryon's commissary into more intimate business relations, which the former used to his pecuniary advantage. When foraging upon the inhabitants of Long Island failed to furnish subsistence to the British army, Tryon sent to the main land trading-parties who usually landed at midnight at Wilson's or Belden's Point, and the house at Pampaskeshank became their rendezvous. But they were exceedingly cautious when approaching the shore. Unless the signal indicated that the coast-guard were at a respectful distance they remained in the offing. But if a light from the fireplace reflected through the window, they ventured to land and entered the house, when its owner proceeded to drive sharp and profitable bargains for produce and cattle from his domain, which could only be designated by his mark, that of a "crop of the left ear." Tryon found in his new-made friend a loyal subject of the British crown. So he instructed his commissary not to molest his friend's property or run off cattle upon which his mark was found. It may be inferred from what has been said that the dweller of Pampaskeshank was no friend of the patriots of the Revolution. He stood in the same attitude towards them and the government that many stood in the late Rebellion, neutral or indifferent, but used every device to procure contracts, or became blockade-runners, by which means they became suddenly wealthy at the expense of the blood of the patriots of the government. The personage referred to was not really an enemy of the country, as his eldest son served in the Continental army.

The following is a copy of an order, in Tryon's own handwriting, found by workmen, when repairing his house in 1798, between the roof-boards and rafters, and decides his status in the Revolutionary war:

"Deliver the beef, grain, and vegetables, previously ordered, to my commissary. Send them to the usual place of shipment.

"GEN. TRYON."

Upon the territory lying between the Pampaske-shank River and "Rooton Point" resided in the Revolution certain persons whose sympathies were with the British government, and whose residences were the rendezvous of the Tories, Cow-Boys, and the foraging-parties from Tryon's army. Here congregated the Tories and the disaffected towards the patriots for several miles south and west of it. This was the centre from which radiated the parties which plundered the inhabitants of the main land. Here originated the frequent false alarms that excited the fears of the patriots. Here also congregated after nightfall disloyal men from Cranberry Plain and from the thickly-settled part of the town and from the parish of Middlesex, whose plottings made the patriots feel that their lives and property were insecure. This state of affairs led the inhabitants of the town, at a special meeting, February, 1782, to devise measures to meet the exigency. The meeting voted to raise ninety men to serve six months, who were distributed as follows: Eighteen east of Norwalk River, eighteen at the going on of Stephens Island, eighteen at Old Well, eighteen at Flax Hill, and eighteen at Middlesex, the allotment of which shows that the objective point was not only to guard the coast, but to keep in subjection the disaffected persons residing within the territory purchased by Capt. Patrick of the Indians. The men for this special duty were enrolled in their respective localities by men appointed for that particular duty. But said rolls were never put upon the town records, but were left in the hands of the commanders of the companies and were lost. The writer, when a lad, saw in the garret of the house in which he resided a roll of the guard stationed on Flax Hill, —viz.: Walter, Thomas, Daniel, and John Hoyt, Elishah, George, Hezekiah, John, and Nathaniel Raymond, Elishah Smith and Elishah, Jr., Hopkins and Moses Byxbee, Joseph, Joshua, and William Bouton, Nathan Knapp, and Stephen Wood. The following are the names of the guard of Middlesex, as rehearsed to the writer by old people who died fifty years ago: Daniel, Eli, and Moses M. Warren, John and William Reed, Nathan, Nathaniel, and Josiah Hoyt, Elishah, Joseph, Nathan, Joseph, Jr., Warren, David, Gershom, and Samuel Richards, Nathaniel Street, and Paul Raymond. The occupation of the coast between the Pampaske-shank and Rooton Point by the British army from Long Island was for strategic reasons, as they were not only able to gather supplies for their army, but to communicate with their main force on the line of the Hudson River by relays.

Fifty years ago, Thomas, Daniel, and Walter Hoyt, William Bouton, and Stephen Wood, aged residents of Flax Hill, used to rehearse to the children of the neighborhood their exploits with the red-coats and Tories of the Revolution. They having on one occasion received reliable information that the British and Tories had arranged to meet at midnight at a certain house between the Pampaske-shank and Rooton Point to organize a raid to capture some of the patriots, the guard of Flax Hill and Middlesex rallied and proceeded to capture the would-be captors. They surrounded the house in which the Tories had congregated. They watched for the enemy till morning without avail. When at a respectful distance towards their homes, the enemy emerged from their concealment and ran for their boats; but those left in charge of them, having become alarmed at the prolonged absence of their comrades, recrossed the Sound, upon which the enemy fled into the forest and the guard gave up the pursuit. On another occasion the guards started in the night to arrest several persons near the coast who were charged with the crime of piloting Tryon's raiding-parties through the country, but upon their approach they fled, as usual, and could not be found. One of the Tories whom the guard was very desirous to capture did not return to his family until the close of the war. He was reported as having fled to Canada. But very soon after the surrender of the British army at Yorktown he returned to his family. A short time previous to the burning of Norwalk was heard in quick succession the report of three muskets, the signal that the enemy were landing, which brought every patriot in the town to the coast. The affair, however, was but a ruse of the Tories for the purpose of seeing what would be the effect upon the people, that Tryon might judge if it would be practicable to cope with the rebels when he was prepared to land his army. Finding that they had been deceived, they pursued the Tories, and were about making them prisoners when they passed from view.

Sunday morning, July 22, 1781, a company of British troops landed on the west shore of the Pampaske-shank, and, with a few disaffected persons, proceeded to the parish church of Middlesex for the purpose of making prisoners of the congregation. But those members most obnoxious to the troops and Tories being absent from the morning service, the enemy hid behind the fences until the afternoon services began, when they emerged from their concealment, environed the church, and doubly guarded the door with bayonets crossed to prevent egress, over which, it is said, Dr. Marther leaped into the arms of the enemy. The men were all taken out of the church and tied in couples, with their pastor at the head of the column, and marched down to the coast and conveyed to Long Island, thence to New York, where they were confined in the old Provost prison for several weeks. As soon as the information of the capture of Dr. Marther and his people was known, the inhabitants and the coast-guard rallied, and pursued and exchanged several shots with the enemy, some of whom were seen to fall.

For several years after this transaction it was supposed that the enemy carried away their dead. Nor were they undeceived until about 1790. A party while in pursuit of game found a cave in the rocks in the southern part of the parish of Middlesex, the exploration of which satisfied them that it had been the hiding-place of the British and Tories in the Revolution. The party were surprised to find in it the remains of several human beings, probably the skeletons of the enemy who were seen to fall when retreating from Middlesex church, whom their comrades secreted until a favorable opportunity should offer for their removal to Long Island, but which the vigilance of the patriots prevented them from doing. So this cave became their sepulchre. Among the articles found by the explorers of the cave were an axe, a toot-horn, several heads of spears, parts of one or two old king's arms, pieces of iron hoop, and stones placed for a fireplace beneath crevices in the rocks, through which the smoke escaped. Also were found large quantities of bones of fowls, cattle, sheep, and pigs. The Indians were not unfamiliar with the location of this cave, as many of the implements used by them were discovered within and about it.

The Revolutionary war was now near its end, leaving the people in extreme poverty and in unpleasant relations towards those of their neighbors who had been the instruments of despoiling them of their hard earnings to enrich themselves and keep the British army from starving. There should, though, be some distinction made between the Tories and Cow-Boys who infested Norwalk in the Revolution. The former usually were men of property,—substantial men. They were charged with the crime of giving "aid and comfort to the enemy" by disposing of the products of their farms for British gold. It was indeed a crime. The Cow-Boys were men of little or no means,—adventurers, thieves,—who raided through the country to plunder the inhabitants of their cattle, grain, and other products, which were taken to the country "butted on the sea," shipped in flat-boats, and towed by the enemy to Long Island. They were not only guilty of theft, but they were guilty of murder also.

During and for several years after the Revolution there resided in the country "butted on the sea" persons who sympathized with the English. They were deeply imbued with the principles of a constitutional monarchy for the United Colonies, to be presided over by some member of the royal household of King George. They were members of a secret society organized in the colony, the object of which was to establish a monarchy, not only for the United Colonies, but for all the British provinces of North America. Of this class of persons was the resident of Pampaskeshank, who was a firm friend and patron of the Church of England, to which he gave of his means to extend the gospel into new settlements, and was one of the chief supporters of that church in Norwalk and a warm friend of Rev. Mr. Leaming, its pastor. He reasoned, "I have sworn allegiance to the King of England. That oath is as binding upon my conscience as the vow to serve my Maker." The house in which he died was demolished twenty-five years ago, the chimney of which was suffered to remain standing for the purposes heretofore stated, a drawing of which was taken in 1845 for Graham's Magazine, and at the time excited a lively interest in the minds of those who were familiar with its history and its surroundings. The drawing exhibited its two fireplaces, the flues of which, it has been asserted, are united into one above the cross-sticks, leaving a jog or set-off, upon which two persons can stand unperceived, and that there was a trap-door leading to a recess in the cellar of ample dimensions to accommodate several persons, used as a hiding-place by the Tories and Cow-Boys in the Revolution. It is said that one Miles Capstie, who resided in this old house, whom the sheriff of the county wanted, evaded him for several months by concealment in the places described. There is not the least truth in these statements. An examination of the old chimney stamps the whole as a creation of the imagination. Though the lone dweller of Pampaskeshank was no friend of the patriots, yet it would perhaps be far from the truth to assert that he was not a good man in other respects. He contributed to sustain the cause of morality and the church, and was ever kind to the poor. He departed this life in 1821, aged ninety, and his remains were buried in the northeast corner of his farm, near the road leading to Middlesex, over which the British marched when proceeding to capture Dr. Mathers and his people, in a locality selected by himself in vigorous manhood. The plat of ground, triangular in shape, was a fit representative of his character, and its surroundings in harmony with its rough points. His grave is protected by ledges of rock in the midst of a forest of cedars, through which the winds sing a perpetual requiem over the remains of the departed.

THE NORWALK INDIANS.

The Norwalk Indians, when selecting sites for settlement, invariably had an eye to the beautiful in nature. They sought for some promontory from which they might have an extended outlook over the surrounding country. On the southern exposure, near its base, contiguous to a bountiful supply of wood and water, they arranged their villages. This gave them good drainage and protection from the north winds, leaving the plains beneath for cultivation and burial-purposes.

The form and extent of those villages may be easily determined whenever the fields on which they were situated are plowed. By following the line and extent of their shell-heaps south of and parallel with the wigwams or streets, we arrive at their length and may reckon the number of their houses upon each line.

Most all the villages of the Mohawks in this town were built upon straight and parallel lines, each line containing an even number of wigwams, excepting the first, on which appears to have been an odd number, which probably was the residence of the chief of the tribe or the council-chamber in which they discussed measures of war or peace. Though their tombs were several yards south of their tenements, they showed a due regard for the line upon which they were established, and in almost every instance they are found to have been parallel with the streets of their villages.

Upon the settlement of the town by the whites, the Indian trails were fenced by the owners of the land which they bounded, and they became the "king's highways." On the lines of the principal Mohawk village west of Meadow Street, on the land owned by the writer, is a ledge of loose and solid granite, upon which, probably, in the time of the tribe, was situated a factory for mortar-pestles and stone hatchets. The writer, when quarrying stone for the foundation of the house on the premises, found several pestles, some in an unfinished state, and three hatchets. Within a few rods of this workshop the writer in 1867 unearthed a cubical dish or tray formed of red clay. A survey of the Indian village at Ely's Neck shows that the rules were observed in the arrangement of their graves, shell-heaps, excepting that the village was situated upon a half-circle, the ends of which rested upon a straight line running north and south.

Several years ago the present owner of Ely's Neck plowed up a curious specimen of the handiwork of the Indians, which was taken away by some person. Probably it now adorns some relic-hunter's cabinet. Its length was thrice its width, and it was two inches thick, and appeared to have been composed of some sort of cement. Its face was divided by grooves into squares upon which were inscriptions. The proportions of their manufactured articles show that they may have been familiar with numbers on quantity.

INDIAN CEMETERIES.

West of Norwalk River and south of Perie Island Creek are three old Indian cemeteries, all within natural boundaries. The first is situated between Pine and Judy's Creeks; the second, between Judy's and Village Creeks; the third, between Village Creek and the Pampaskeshank Brook, each plot being bounded east by Norwalk River and west by the range of hills encompassing the city of South Norwalk and extending to the cove. Each tract was probably the patrimony of a sachem of the Mohawk Nation.

The skeletons of the aborigines exhumed in the centre and south cemeteries are invariably found beneath clam- and oyster-shells, with their war-implements, and facing towards the morning sun, the shells having been deposited there for the same purpose that their implements were. Probably it was in part an honorary custom, and for the men only. It appears that at the death of a male of the tribe the living held a sort of a wake over his remains around his grave by feasting upon clams and oysters, the shells of which, and those uneaten, they tossed into the pit, with the idea that the occupant would not only need his bow and arrow to bring down game in the other world, but to remind him to hunt for shell-fish along the shores beyond. Not all the Indian graves are filled with shells. Those found to be so held the remains of a sachem or chief, or other honored members of the tribe, the death and burial of whom attracted larger numbers than usual to the feast. Hence it is concluded that the quantity of shells in any particular grave denotes the man's standing in his tribe.

THE CANNIBALS OF NORWALK.

Within the limits of the old Indian cemetery, lying between Washington and Concord Streets, in this city, graves have been uncovered, of which over thirty were found to contain mutilated human bones. The writer has carefully examined more than twenty of the number. The shells in these graves are of unusual pearly whiteness, which cannot now be accounted for. Every one of these graves is filled to the surface with shells and mutilated bones. Doubtless at the feast of human flesh large numbers were in attendance, and, as these graves also are filled to the surface, they were occasions of especial interest and numerously attended by those who enjoyed a chowder of human flesh and shell-fish, the refuse of which they threw promiscuously into the place prepared for its reception. In this class of graves no Indian implements have ever been found.

This is indeed a mysterious subject, and can be solved only upon the hypothesis that Norwalk, before the advent of our ancestors, in 1650, was inhabited at some time in the past by a race of cannibals, probably the ancestors of the class whom they found in possession of the country at that date. We are not ready to believe that they ate their kith and kin, though there is one fact which might be construed that they did so, which we will notice hereafter.

The great Mohawk Nation in the height of their glory were cruel and oppressive, particularly towards those against whom they warred. They exacted tribute from those whom they had conquered, and when they entered the country of their enemies to demand its payment they sent out runners in advance who cried aloud, "We have come to suck your blood!" The historian gives an instance when those of the same nation ate their fellow-beings. After the burning of Schenectady by the French and Indians, in the winter of 1693, they were pursued and overtaken by the English and Mohawks, and after the engagement the Indians, under Col. Schuyler, burned about thirty corpses of the enemy which they scalped and roasted and ate.

A critical examination of this kind of tombs has not brought to light the remains of a single Indian woman or child. This fact seems to indicate that they were either eaten or that they were cremated. The writer inclines to the belief that it was their custom to burn them. Most of Chestnut Street was a large flat rock, but now removed, which bore the appearance of having been cracked and sealed by excessive heat. It is now thought that it was an altar upon which the savages roasted their victims or cremated their women and children.

CHAPTER LI.

NORWALK (Continued).

THE REVOLUTION.

The first reference to the war of the Revolution which appears in the town records is under date Dec. 5, 1774, and is as follows:

"Dec. 5, 1774. Whereas, This meeting have taken into consideration the matters contained in the association come into by the Continental Congress held at Philadelphia the 5th day of September, 1774, and approved of by the lower house of assembly, and recommended by them to the several towns in this colony, to appoint committees for the purposes in the eleventh article in sd association contained. Do approve of the same, and in pursuance thereof do appoint Eliakim Raymond, John Cannon, Thaddeus Betts, Stephen St. John 2d, Lemuel Brooks, Eliphalet Lockwood, Nathl. Benedict, Samuel Graman, Goold Hoyt, Thos. Betts, Ozias Merwine, Phineas Hanford, Daniel Betts, jr., Blackleach Jesup, Ezra Gregory, John Carter, James Richards, Samuel Richards, Gershom Raymond, Asa Hoyt, a committee for the purpose in s^d Eleventh Article contained, during the pleasure of the town."

Feb. 6, 1775, it was voted, "That those persons which have been warned by the committee of inspection, to bring in their arms, shall not vote in choosing a committee of inspection at this meeting."

At the same meeting were chosen Messrs. Phineas Hanford, Stephen St. John (2), Thaddeus Betts, Nathaniel Benedict, Ozias Merwine, Lemuel Brooks, Thomas Fitch, Uriah Rogers, Jabez Gregory, Seth Seymour, Timothy Fitch, Daniel St. John, Blackleach Jesup, Daniel Betts, Jr., Clap Raymond, Ezra Gregory, James Richards, Moses Comstock, Samuel Cook Silliman, Samuel Richards, and Jesse Raymond, a committee of inspection during the pleasure of the town.

At the same meeting it was voted, that they disapprove of ye unnecessary use of Gun-powder, and recommend it to the committee of inspection to take care of the matter.

Oct. 14, 1776, it was "Voted, That the select men give a proper reward, to the persons appointed and ordered by the authority to set the watches, for their service, and draw an order on the town treasurer for the payment thereof.

"Also voted, That the select men make such provision for the watches as they shall think proper in regard to lonsing."

Dec. 2, same year:

"The select men are directed to transport six cannon such as they shall judge best for the defense of this town, from Salisbury; and provide carriages for the same, and also, a sufficient quantity of ball for the security of the town."

During this period the oppressions of those who had the control of the sale of breadstuffs and other necessaries of life, became too tyrannical to be borne with patience by the citizens, and under date of March 12, 1777, the town voted that,

"The inhabitants by vote agree that they will assist the officers of this town in carrying into execution one certain law of this State, entitled an act to prevent monopolies and oppressions, by excessive and unreasonable prices for many of ye necessaries and conveniences of life."

At the same meeting

"The inhabitants by major vote approve of what the authority and select men have done, in regard to hiring seventy-five men as a watch or guard to this town."

RECRUITING FOR THE CONTINENTAL ARMY.

Under this date the following record also appears concerning the enlistment of men for the Continental service:

"Whereas, The slow progress made in filling up the continental Battalions to be raised by this State, and the vast importance of their being immediately completed, etc., was on the 18th day of March, 1777, taken into consideration by his Honor the Governor and the Council of Safety; and thereon voted and resolved by said board, to ascertain the quota or proportion of each town to complete s^d battalions and to promote and encourage said enlistment. Lest any should be embarrassed by a prospect of leaving their families without a security of their being properly provided for, it is by said board earnestly recommended to the several towns in this State to engage and promise such soldiers as shall undertake in sd service, and have not time and opportunity to lay out their money and make provision for their families (such as have any), that their said families on their reasonable request, shall be supplied in their absence with necessaries at the prices stated by law; and that each town severally appoint a committee for that purpose, to see them provided for and supplied accordingly, on such soldiers lodging, or from time to time remitting money to said committee for that purpose, and without any additional expense; and the necessary expense attending the same, to be borne by the town respectively, etc.; It is therefore recommended by this meeting that all the inhabitants, of every rank and condition, vigorously exert themselves in encouraging, promoting, and forwarding the filling up the quota or proportion ascertained by said board for this town, in order to complete said Battalions; and also voted, that Messrs. Stephen St. John 2d, Thomas Benedict, Phineas Hanford, Jesse Raymond, Thaddeus Hubbard, Oliver Whitlock, James Richards, and Nehemiah Benedict be a committee for the purposes contained in said resolves, with full power and authority to engage and promise to such soldiers as shall inhat in sd service that all matters and things contained in sd resolve respecting them shall be punctually performed agreeably thereto, and it is recommended by this meeting that the virtuous sons of liberty cheerfully and readily engage in sd service at this critical time, so that peace and rest may once more be restored to the United States of America; by means whereof this meeting have reason, by the blessing of God, to expect the same may be effected.

"Messrs. Eli Reed, Asa Hoyt, John Gregory, Jr., Levi Taylor, Nathan Hubbard, and Moses Comstock are appointed a committee to endeavor to find the number of soldiers enlisted in the continental army in this town, and report to this meeting.

"This meeting is adjourned to meet Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

"Met according to the foregoing adjournment. Doct. Thaddeus Betts, Moderator, present.

"Voted, That it is the desire of this meeting that the recruiting officers in the Continental service request the several Captains of the military companies in this place to warn their respective companies and Household-ers to muster as soon as may be, to heat up for volunteers; and the inhabitants are desired to encourage the enlistment by their liberality. The companies and inhabitants of the first society are desired to muster together on the parade of the first company."

At the same meeting,

"Hezekiah Hanford, John Lockwood, Jr., Hooker St. John, Levi Taylor, Thaddeus Hubbell, Abijah Betts, James Olmsted, Samuel Gates, Abijah Comstock, Timothy Reed, Levi Hanford, James Lockwood, and Gershom Richards were appointed a committee to procure and collect such articles of clothing as is requested by a resolve of the Governor and Council of Safety for the use of the soldiers in the Continental army, and deliver the same to the select men in order that the same may be forwarded according to said resolve."

At the same meeting,

"Voted that the Committee formerly appointed to procure provisions for the families of those soldiers which are gone into the army from this town go on and procure the same for such families, at the rate set by law; and in case they are obliged to give more, the select men to order the treasurer to pay the overplus.

"Dec. 1, 1777. Matthew Marvin added to the Committee for providing for the families of those that are in the army."

The following action was taken in regard to the Articles of Confederation:

"Voted, Messrs. Thomas Fitch, Thaddeus Betts, Stephen St. John, David Comstock, Joseph Chapman, Nehemiah Mead, and Samuel Guman are appointed a committee to revise the articles of Confederation published by Congress, and make report to this meeting, which is to be adjourned."

"Jan. 13, 1778, at one of the clock, Met according to the foregoing adjournment.

"Blackleach Jesup was chosen to supply the families of ye soldiers of the Continental army, in addition to the former committee.

"Whereas, His Excellency the Governor, on receipt of the articles of the confederation published by Congress, for the approbation of the several assemblies of the United States, sent a copy of the same to this town, in order for the town to show their sense relative thereto,

"It is voted by this town that they are sensible of the great difficulty of concerting any plan of union with so many different States, under so many different circumstances, free from objection, and without being liable to exceptions; yet the articles contained in said confederation generally appear to this town to be well framed, and calculated to form a union for the general benefit of the whole; yet, notwithstanding, this town beg leave to submit to ye consideration of the General Assembly whether the method of supplying the common treasury, contained in the eighth article, and the mode of raising a continental army, in the ninth article, is so just and equitable as may be devised.

"Voted, also, that a copy of this be sent forthwith to the General Assembly to show the sense of the town in the premises."

"Aug. 10, 1778.—Voted, That the committee heretofore appointed to procure clothing for the officers and soldiers in the Continental army are desired to procure money on interest, to purchase said clothing as soon as may be; and the select men are ordered to pay the interest and cost of procuring the said money, out of the town treasury."

"Aug. 10, 1778.—Whereas, On a division of salt belonging to the town, there is yet a small part remains on hand, and the inhabitants agree and vote that the select men shall pay the expense that has arisen on said salt out of the said remainder; and if there is still any remains, to deliver the same to ye families of such soldiers belonging to this town as are in the army."

"2d Monday in March, 1779.—Dr. Betts not being present, Capt. James Richards chosen Moderator.

"Voted and agreed, That all fines and forfeitures that shall be collected out of the alarm list, and militia companies, and light horse, in this town, for neglecting to turn out at the time the enemy landed at Tarry Town last Decr., and at the time the enemy came to Horseneck last Feb., and shall hereafter neglect to turn out, shall be delivered by the town treasurer to the Captain of the company from which the same shall be collected, and this vote to continue in force during the pleasure of the town."

"3d Monday in June, 1779, at 4 o'clock, Col. Thomas Fitch, Capt. Ephraim Lockwood, and Samuel C. Silliman, Esq., were chosen committee to meet a County Convention at Fairfield, to consult the address from the Continental Congress respecting the depreciation of the Continental currency, &c.

At the same meeting,

"Voted, That the inhabitants of this town shall be put into as many classes as their cotra of soldiers in the Continental Army, and each class to provide clothing for one soldier."

TOWN-HOUSE.

At the same meeting (1st Monday of August, 1779),

"Voted, To have a town-house built as soon as conveniently may be.
"The dimensions to be forty-five feet by thirty, posts sixteen feet; lower story twelve feet in height, a convenient chimney at each end and to be set on the Westery part of the Town House Hill."

Aug. 16, 1779,

"Voted, That we will strictly and punctually adhere to the recommendation of sd convention of the County with respect to putting a stop to the depreciation of the Continental Currency; and also abide by any such measure as sd convention shall hereafter adopt for such purpose."

"27th Day of June, 1780. Doct. Thaddeus Betts chosen moderator.
"Voted, That we will tax ourselves to raise money to hire the number of Soldiers to complete the quota of this town for the Continental Army.

"Voted, That Col. Matthew Mead, Capt. Nathan Gilbert, Capt. Samuel Kerler, Lt. James Betts, Capt. Solomon Morehouse, Lt. Jer. B. Ellis, and Capt. Danl. Richards be a committee with full power to enlist such a number of able-bodied men as shall be sufficient to complete the quota of this town for the Continental Service during the war, or three years resolved by the General Assembly last May; and that they engage such sums, and in such a way as their discretion and judgment shall direct, to such as shall appear to engage in said service; and that the same be done forthwith, and a report thereof be made to this meeting at their adjournment."

At the same meeting,

"Voted, That we will take the late emission of paper money emitted by this state, equal to silver and gold in all payments whatsoever."

"Nov. 13th, 1780. The inhabitants grant a tax of sixpence lawful money on the pound, in silver and gold equivalent, upon the polls and ratable estate of the inhabitants of this town, on the list for the year 1779 to be paid in beef, pork, wheat, flour, or money; the beef to be delivered before the 16th day of December next, and the pork and flour before the 15th of January next, to the person or persons that may be appointed to receive the same or the money; the beef, pork, and flour at the prices mentioned in one certain statute Law of this State, intitled an Act for Collecting and Storing a quantity of Provisions for the use of the Continental Army, and the forces for the defense of this State.

"4th day of Decr., 1781. The select men are directed to deliver the sum of ninety pounds in State money, which they have now in their hands to the collectors and receivers of provisions, for them to lay out in purchasing casks and beef.

"The Select men are desired to hire money to procure this town's quota of Soldiers for the Continental Army, and the town engages to indemnify them in doing the same.

"The inhabitants grant a tax of one penny on the pound, on the list of 1779, to be paid in wheat & rye flour and Indian corn, agreeable to one certain statute, &c."

The following action was taken concerning inimical persons:

"The authority and select men are directed to send for the committee respecting inimical persons, at the expense of this town."

The committee reported as follows:

"On Aug. 25, 1779, they had levied a tax of two shillings and sixpence on the pound to defray the charges arisen and arising on the town.

"On the 13th of March, 1780, they had laid a tax of twopence on the pound to hire soldiers for the continental army.—HALL.

"We the subscribers, agreeable to an act and appointment of the Honorable Gen^l Assembly, having been called upon and requested by the Civil authority and select men of the Town of Norwalk, to enquire into the character and conduct of a number of persons whose names are contained in a list or roll by them presented to us as inimical and Dangerous to the Liberties and Independence of the United States of America, and we, having duly examined into the premises, are of opinion that the following persons whose names are hereafter expressed are inimical and dangerous as aforesaid, and therefore give judgment and order that their names be enrolled in the town clerk's office in s^d town of Norwalk as dangerous and inimical as aforesaid for the purposes mentioned in an act of the Gen^l Assembly of this State, entitled, An Act more effectually to prevent robberies and plunders from our open and secret enemies, vizt.: Obadiah Wright, Nathan Burwell, Jr., Thomas Hanford, Nathan Jarvis, Thomas Fairweather, David Bolt, Peter White, Hezekiah Whitney 2d), Nathan Gregory, Philip Scribner, Hezekiah Belden, John Beldin, Edward Nash, Gershom Raymond, James Tilio, William Bolt, Ebenezer Church, David Lambert, Gould Hoyt, Abraham Whitney, John Saunders, Jr., Garner Olmsted, Richard Patrick, Nathan Fitch, all of Norwalk aforesaid; each of the above named persons having first been duly notified and cited to appear before us at time and place by us appointed for that purpose,—to shew reason if any they had, why their names should not be enrolled as aforesaid.

"Done at Norwalk, this 20th Day of April, A.D. 1771.

"By us,

"DANIEL SHERMAN,

"BENJA. HEMMAN,

"ANDW. ADAMS,

"INCREASE MOSELEY."

"To the Town Clerk of Norwalk."

"Dec. 4, 1781. James Sellock, Thos. Benedict, Eli Reed, Ezra Benedict, David St. John, Aaron C. Comstock, & Matthew Merwine, are chosen a committee to purchase clothing for the soldiers belonging to this town in the Continental Army; ——— and directed to hire money on interest to purchase the same; and the town engages that the same shall be made good to them with interest, as the same was at the time of hiring."

"At the same meeting the select men and military officers are to look into the affair of the Continental soldiers; and the select men are to class the inhabitants for such a number as they shall find wanted for the quota of this town; and also to class the inhabitants for such a number of soldiers as shall be wanted in a State regiment at Horse-neck for one year."

THE BURNING OF NORWALK.

Norwalk, together with Fairfield, Danbury, and other towns, suffered severely during the war of the Revolution. Its proximity to New York, then in the possession of Governor Tryon, rendered its situation hazardous in the extreme. On the evening of the 11th of July, 1779, Governor Tryon appeared with his fleet before Norwalk, and immediately ordered the British torch to be applied to the town; and not much time elapsed ere the dwellings of the colonists, the public stores and magazines, vessels in the harbor, and other combustible property were a mass of smouldering ruins. Various opinions have been advanced as to the real animus which prompted this wholesale destruction by Governor Tyron of an unguarded* town, but the most reasonable would seem to be that it was in retaliation for the plunders committed on Long Island—which was then in possession of the British—by Long Island refugees then in Connecticut and the Americans. These refugees would pilot the whale-boats of the Americans to the Long Island shore for plunder, and the people of Connecticut, it is said, were repeatedly warned by the English Governor that this unlawful plundering and robbing must cease or he would burn its coast-towns.

* The principal male portion of the town was serving in the Continental army in other sections of the country.

The inhabitants in whose minds was still fresh the ravages of that July night when the torch of the invaders reduced these defenseless towns to ashes, were slow to open their doors to the return of their Tory neighbors, as the following vote, under date Feb. 24, 1783, shows:

"Put to vote whether these persons which have gone off and joined themselves with the enemy should return back and inhabit in this town.
"Past in the Negative."

At an adjourned meeting, a fortnight from the above date,

"Eli Reed, Danl. Betts, Jr., James Benedict, Justus Hayt, Saml. Seymour, Lt. Joseph Rockwell, Thomas Betts, Jr., & Enoch Scribner, were appointed a committee to assist the civil authority and select men, in keeping out of this town any suspected or transient persons who shall attempt to reside within the limits thereof; and make information of such persons to the authority and select men; & take their direction in all proceedings with them."

"Dec. 1, 1783. Hezekiah Rogers, Job Bartram, Isaac Keeler, Saml. Deforest, Justus Hayt, Matthew Gregory, Saml. Comstock, Stephen Betts, Eli Reed, were appointed a committee to take directions from the select men of this town, and deal with those persons who have been to the enemy and returned, according to their directions."

"Last Monday in December, 1783. Tobd. That the select men and Committee are to act their discretion respecting those persons which have joined the enemy, notwithstanding any former votes."

DEFENSE OF NORWALK.

The people, alarmed lest at any time their town might be invaded and again plundered by the British, under date Feb. 18, 1782, voted as follows:

"That a sufficient number of men be raised, by enlistment, for a sufficient guard in this town.

"Col. Thos. Fitch, Col. Matthew Mead, Capt. James Richards, Capt. Eliph. Lockwood, & Mr. Hooker St. John are chosen a committee to ascertain the number of men wanted for a guard, and lay a plan for raising the same.

"To the inhabitants of the town of Norwalk now assembled in town meeting: We the subscribers being appointed to lay a plan for raising a number of guards sufficient to defend this town, with a sum of twelve hundred and forty pounds lawful money granted to this town by the General Assembly for that purpose, beg leave to Report: That there be forthwith raised by enlistment for the town, of six months unless sooner discharged, ninety men including corporals; and that there be appointed one Captain, and one Ensign for the purpose of defending this town; and that a Captain have £6 lawful money per month; an Ensign £3 5 0 per month, a Corporal £2 4 0, and a Private £2 0 0 per month; and that we find that the said sum will amount, for six months, to the sum of Eleven Hundred and fifty-three pounds Ten Shillings; and that be stationed at the lower end of the town on the East side of the river; and 18 at Ketchum's, one-half thereof to keep centry at the going on at Stephens Island; and 18 at the Old Well, and 18 at Flax Hill, and 18 at Middlesex; and that officers or privates, at their election, have one-half of their wages in provisions at the following prices, viz.: fresh beef, 3^d 4^d; salt beef, 4^d; flour, at 2^d 6^d per pound; and that there be a Corporal to each class; and that the officers be appointed by the authority and select men; and of which is submitted by your most obed^t humble servants."

"Aug. 1, 1782. Whereas the wages given by this town to the Guard to serve for the defense of this town for the term of five months unless sooner discharged, are found insufficient to induce a sufficient number to engage in s^d service, it is therefore voted and agreed by this town, that the officers already engaged in said service receive, in addition to the wages given, the usual rations for such officers hereafter; and that the soldiers already engaged, receive from this time, in addition, rations as usual, and that those who shall hereafter enlist into s^d service to the 20th of August next, shall receive 40s per month to that time, unless sooner discharged, and rations; and that such a number of s^d guard to duty, in the day time, as the Captain shall judge proper; and at all times when he shall judge it necessary for the safety and defence of the town.

"The authority and select men to maintain a Lieutenant to serve in the guard & in this town; and to have his pay and rations in proportion to the other officers."

At the same meeting,

Voted, That on a complaint being made to the authority and select men of this town, against any officer or soldier in the guard, of his or their not being faithful in doing their duty, the said authority and select men shall cause the said officer or soldier to be called before them and examine into their conduct, and on proof of their misconduct, may dismiss them from service."

May 6, 1782,

Voted, That there shall be a committee appointed to hire three soldiers to serve in the continental army for the term of one year."

The following application for relief in consequence of the burning of the town was made under date Aug. 11, 1783:

"This town taking into consideration the many and great distresses, difficulties, and losses a number of the inhabitants have sustained, met with, and are reduced to, by means of the enemy's burning up, destroying and plundering them of their most necessary property during the late war with Great Britain; and the very great injury and damage done to the town by means thereof; and that the same was brought on the town during the course of war undertaken by the detraction and order of the inhabitants of this State united with the other States, and the common consent of the inhabitants of this State, for the defense and security of the common liberties, privileges, and freedom of this State; in which war it was then understood and fully expected the misfortunes, accidentally thrown on any particular part during the course of the war, as it was undertaken for the defense and security of the whole, and considering that it is altogether just, equitable, and righteous so to be, have thereupon agreed and voted that Col. Stephen St. John, Esq., be agent for the town make use of such measures as he shall judge proper, by memorial in conjunction with other suffering towns, or separately, to the General Assembly, or otherwise, in order to obtain redress of the town's grievances sustained and met with during the course of the war, and for a repair of the damages done by the enemy, to be made to the individual sufferers, excepting to those sufferers who are known to be inimical to the liberties and independence of the United States of America."

In 1792 the Legislature allowed these sufferers the sum of £26,066 0s. 1d. in lands in the present State of Ohio, known as the "Connecticut Reserve."

REMINISCENCES.

The following reminiscences of the burning of Norwalk are taken from Hall's "Norwalk:"

"Thomas Benedict, who was aged eighty-two, March 14, 1847, says, 'After the burning of Fairfield the enemy was expected here. They came Saturday, while the people were harvesting. While he was driving the team, John Saunders, one of the Tories, came along and said, 'Oh, boys, you are too late to harvest.' Saunders had finished his harvest. The sun was about two hours high, and Saunders was in high spirits at the coming of the enemy, as one of his sons was with the enemy, and he expected his property would be spared. But it was all burnt; and the other son with his negro went off with the enemy.

"Our soldiers were collecting fast, and stopped at his father's house, which stood where Mrs. Phillips now lives. A tub of wine and a bowl stood on the stoop; as they came along they stopped and drank, and were very merry. His father's family hastily packed up what goods they could, put them on the cart, which he drove that night up to Belden's Hill, to Thomas St. John's. He and the oxen had worked hard that day, and were very tired. At Mr. St. John's a party of light-horse came in the night. He fell asleep; some of them took out his silver brooch and carried it off. Saw the first smoke of the burning of Norwalk in the morning. Heard the guns "pop, pop, pop, a good while." The first house burned was where George Day now lives. The house where Mr. Benedict now lives was occupied by the British as a hospital for the wounded, and therefore was not burnt at first. When the British retreated they set it on fire, but our people rallied soon enough to put it out. The house was built by Mr. Benedict's grandfather. On his return to Norwalk saw a British soldier that had been killed; Seth Abbott shot him as he was getting over a wall. "Now," says Abbott before he fired, "if I kill him, it will go right through his heart." He fired, and the soldier fell backward, dead. The British, when they landed on the west side, marched up to near where Capt. Daniel K. Nash now lives. A tall British soldier was shot there.

"Mr. Leaming used to preach on the wickedness of resisting the king, and most of the Tories were of his congregation. According to his creed and preaching, we "were only a parcel of rebels." There would not have been so many Tories but for his preaching up such doctrine. He went off with the British.'

"Mrs. Benedict, wife of Thomas, aged eighty-one, November, 1846, daughter of Phineas Waterbury, lived at Rooton River, at the head of the pond; saw the British fleet when they came from Long Island to the burning of Norwalk. There were twenty-six sail,—sloops. The enemy used to come every little while to the place where she lived to drive off cattle. One night she heard the cows low and the dogs bark and some one hallooing, 'The Tories are after the cattle;' 'The Tories have got all our cows,' Her mother raised the window and called out, 'Turn out the guard! Turn out the Guard!' so loud that people a mile distant heard her in two places. One of the Tories called to her to be still, or he would shoot her. 'I am not afraid of you,' she answered; and called out again, 'Turn out the guard! Turn out the guard!' The man fired, and Mrs. Benedict heard the ball whistle; but the Tories ran for their lives, frightened off by her mother's call for the guard.

"A month after this, one night while her brother, aged twenty years, was on guard with others, she heard the dogs bark, and then a challenge of 'Who comes there?' The answer was, with an oath, 'A friend to King George;' and immediately guns were fired and there was a trampling of steps down the road. One came and said that her brother was wounded, and presently he was brought in dead, shot through the head. Three were killed, who were all in their twentieth year, two wounded.

"One night the enemy entered her father's house when they were in bed, seized her father, and carried him a prisoner to New York; they would not stop to let him dress. They came into her room; she told them they were only children there. 'D—n her!' said one; 'lift up the bed.' They thrust their bayonets under the bed and went off.

"Daniel Nash, aged seventy-seven, son of Daniel, son of Micajah, was told by his grandfather that his grandfather was the first male child born in the town. What his name was he does not know. (It is among the genealogical records, John Nash.) His sons' names were John and Nathan. From the last John proceeded all the Nash families in this region. Nathan had no children. He was the first churchman in the family. This account Daniel Nash had from his grandfather, who was brought up by said Nathan. The reason of his change was this: he had been brought up in great abhorrence of religious forms, and when at a meeting of ministers one of them read a portion of the Bible, Nathan much disliked it, and so resented it that he went occasionally to church, saying that they might just as well read prayers as read the Bible, and so turned churchman.

"When the Revolution broke out Daniel Nash was a boy, about four years old, at Patchogue, L. I. Remembers the time when the tea was thrown overboard at Boston. Remembers hearing, before Norwalk was burnt and afterwards, what was the reason why Governor Tryon burned it. Some of the Long Island people were refugees on the Connecticut shore (Long Island was in possession of the British). These refugees used to pilot the Americans when they went in whale-boats to Long Island for plunder. Governor Tryon said if the people on this side did not stop that, he would come over and burn the town; and he did burn it.

"Nathaniel Raymond, aged ninety-four, May 1, 1847. Has lived near the Old Well wharf all his days; was a corporal in the guard; a Revolutionary pensioner; lay often on the rocks at Belden's Point; was at New York among the Connecticut troops when the British landed at Flatbush, and in the lines across the island after the British crossed into New York. When the British came to burn the town they landed at Fitch's Point Saturday night. He carried such of his household effects as he could down near the pottery called the village and hid them in a swamp, then carried his father and mother and some of their effects back some three miles in a cart; returned, and with fourteen others, volunteers, under their own command, took arms, and went up to the hill where John Raymond lived. In the night the British fired a ball at them at random. It struck the ground near them. Sunday morning the harbor was full of boats. They landed at the Old Well; chased the fifteen volunteers over John Raymond's hill, by where Capt. D. K. Nash now lives, and so over to Round Hill, dragging a field-piece, which they fired at the volunteers from the top of Round Hill. When the British landed, the volunteers fired at them from John Raymond's hill. Saw Grummon's Hill 'all red' with the British; there was 'old Tryon and all his tribe.' The two parties of the enemy met near Grummon's Hill and went up to France Street, where was a skirmish. There were about thirty American regular soldiers in town. Jacob Nash (the grandfather of Capt. Daniel K. Nash) was killed there. He was a regular soldier, at home on a furlough. Our men had an old iron four-pounder at the rocks, which the British took and spiked. The Rev. Mr. Leaming was 'as big a Tory as ever there could be on earth.' He continued praying for the king in public worship till the inhabitants forbade him. Very many of his congregation were Tories, but the people never molested such as did not commit any hostile act. The violent Tories were seized and shut up in Pudding Lane, some carried to jail. The Tories were the informers and pilots of the enemy, and those who went off often came back with parties, plundering, driving off cattle, and carrying away such men as they were able to lay their hands on.

"Mrs. Mary Esther St. John (widow of William), aged ninety-four in November, 1846. When Fairfield was burnt her father was harvesting down in the Neck. Expecting the British to come here immediately, they left the harvest; but when the British crossed to Long Island her father rallied hands and went down to his harvesting. Saturday, near night, the alarm-guns fired. Her husband rode down to the Neck and returned; his horse was wet with sweat, as though he had been in the water. She was about putting some bread in the oven. A woman who lived with Mr. Belden came running in and asked, 'Are you going to stay?' 'No, I am going out of the way.' 'Well,' said the woman, 'I shall stay; I will go to Governor Tryon and plead for the house. When he was governor he stayed with us one night, with his attendants and horses. I will tell him of that, and we are friends to the government.' Mrs. St. John said, 'If you are going to stay, take my dough.' She took it, and presently came running for the oven-wood. Mrs. St. John and her husband and family, with what effects they could carry, went up into the woods at the East Rocks. They had a bedstead, which they set up; milked the cows which they drove with them, drank the milk, and stayed there that night. In the morning the guns were firing; the smoke of the burning houses rose. Her husband said, 'The work is begun; they are burning the town.' The woman succeeded in saving Mr. Belden's house. She told Mrs. St. John that she went up to Grummon's Hill, where Governor Tryon sat, with chairs and a table, writing his orders. She begged for the house; he wrote her a protection, and sent with her a file of soldiers. When she reached the house it had already been set on fire in two places, but the soldiers put it out.

"The town-house, which stood where the present one stands, was in the Revolution occupied as a guard-house. The troops, on their passage to New York, used to lodge there. She saw many of them not more than fifteen or sixteen years old. Mr. Leaning she knew well. She attended his church. He continued to pray for the king as long as he dared to. He went away with the British. It was sad to live in the midst of war, but what was the most unpleasant of all was the difference of sentiments among neighbors and kindred. Mrs. St. John lived, in the Revolution, on the old St. John place, nearly opposite Governor Bissell's. Her house that was burnt in the Revolution stood between the site of the present house and the widow Buckingham St. John's, at the foot of Grummon's Hill. The latter place was then occupied by a family named Grummon."

The following from the columns of the Norwalk Gazette are valuable contributions to the historic literature of the town. The first article is editorial, and the latter is from the pen of Rev. Dr. T. S. Childs:

"Dr. Hall, in giving the narrative of Miss Phebe Comstock and of her colored servant Onesimus, has mixed two different incidents, both of which were related to us many score times during our childhood by 'Miss Phebe' and 'O-ne,' as both used to be familiarly known and called.

"On the landing of the red-coats, as the British troops were always called, O-ne was raking salt hay on what for more than a century has been known as the Comstock Salt-Hay plat, near the present Keyser Island. He saw the British fleet make its way up past Smith's Island and come to anchor between Keyser's and Calf Pasture. A yawl-boat filled with soldiers was rowed up to near where he was, when, seeing the decks of all the vessels, or 'sloops,' as O-ne termed them, covered with soldiers, he ran for his horse, which stood saddled under a tree, and, mounting, put the animal to his fastest paces till he reached Old Well, where he gave the alarm, then ran his horse to the bridge, where the general alarm was sounded by firing guns, etc. He then rode as hastily as possible to his home, then with the elder Miss Phebe on the crest of the hill northeast from the present residence of William L. Waring, Esq., of New Canaan. On reaching home, all the cattle, including the horses, oxen, and cows, were hastily driven off and into the Whortleberry Hills woods, where the modern Miss Phebe, whom Dr. Hall interviewed, and her elder sister stayed out all night watching them so they should neither fall into the hands of their Tory neighbors (who used to steal cattle for the British, and who were their greatest dread) nor stray away. Next forenoon the younger Miss Phebe returned home for food, leaving her sister still in the woods with the cattle, where they had watched all night.

"On gaining the crest of the hill at her home she saw the smoke from the burning of Norwalk. She climbed an apple-tree and could plainly see the soldiers—red-coats—moving about and houses burning. She watched the meeting-house, then standing at or near the present home of Charles S. Lockwood, on East Avenue, and saw the steeple fall in. It was the 'dreadfullest day' she ever experienced, she oft repeated. Her father and four brothers and O-ne had gone down and taken their guns to assist in the defense, and the women were left all alone at home. The men-folks were all enrolled in what was called the 'guard.' Miss Phebe and O-ne never varied in their story to us that the larger portion of the British forces landed on Calf Pasture Beach and marched up past the late William Marvin's residence. This body was joined by a smaller force, which had rowed to Fitch's Point before landing, and formed a junction with the main body just below the present railroad bridge on lower East Avenue. A third smaller detachment rowed up in their small boats and landed at Old Well (South Norwalk), on the flats just below and very near the present Raymond Brothers' coal-docks. This body, whose progress was resolutely resisted, marched around by Flax Hill to West Avenue, and ultimately formed a junction with Tryon, who had established his headquarters on the crest of Grummon's Hill. Rev. C. M. Sellick now has the chair which the Phebe Comstock traditions say Tryon sat in on that occasion. All testimony agrees in that he sat there coolly viewing and enjoying the devastation of the town, in full sight of the terror-stricken women and children, whose male guardians were all engaged in harassing the enemy from every possible place of concealment and safety. The only regular fight of the day amounting even to the dignity of a skirmish was, according to Aunt Phebe and O-ne, in the rear of the present house of William B. E. Lockwood, Esq. The main body of the little band of our town's defenders were retreating towards the Rocks, heavily pressed by the red-coats, but contesting every rod of the way by concealing themselves behind stone fences, trees, and bushes, but on reaching the rear of the Lockwood place they made a stand, and quite a lively engagement ensued. But, overwhelmed with the opposing numbers, they continued their retreat up the Rocks road. The bullets and splintering done by the musket-fire may yet be seen in some of the rear portions of Mr. Lockwood's house, which is still preserved.

"Many of the British soldiers got wine and cider and were very drunk. The houses were robbed before being set fire to, but 'up town' the people had moved their valuables to Silver Mine, Belden's Hill, or the Rocks, and buried all their silver and small things. Some few had delayed, or having sympathized with their Tory minister, Rev. Mr. Leaning, supposed they would be safe from molestation; but, finding the red-coats as alert to rob them as the colonists, had to throw their silverware and small valuables into the well and flee. Six houses only were saved in the town. One stood where the Rev. S. B. S. Bissell now resides. One was the old Horace Taylor house, on West Avenue, and where George Washington subsequently stopped and stayed all night on his trip to Boston.

This house was removed from the site of James H. Knapp's residence, but is now standing on the hill west of A. J. Crofut's. Another one was the old 'Tommy Benedict' house, still standing next below Mrs. Dr. Lyles'. The Benedict family traditions say that this house was so old then that a new house had been built, into which the family had moved, leaving the colored servants (slaves) to occupy the old house, which is now standing. This was attempted to be burned by setting fire to a straw bed, but one of the colored men who had hid away, seeing the smoke, got back into the house, threw the burning bed back into the yard, and saved the house, and later in the day they brought two wounded red coats there to be treated by their army surgeon, and the following winter twelve families were crowded into it for shelter. This property had continued in possession of the Benedict family from the first settlement of Norwalk down to within the last dozen or twenty years. When George Washington stayed at the old Taylor house all night the news spread rapidly around, and Miss Phebe heard of it and rode down on a pillion behind O-ne to get a sight of him. She told us that he had just started to continue his coach ride to Boston. He had four horses with outriders. When he got opposite Tommy Benedict's cider mill he had his carriage stopped and asked for a drink of the new cider they were then making. A pail was brought him, and, as no dipper was handy, he stood up in his coach and drank the cider out of the pail. So she had a real good look at him, and felt well paid for her horseback-ride down from the country to see the great George Washington. Another house that escaped the conflagration was on the northeast side of Pudding Lane, now Main Street, and formerly known as the old Whitney place. A great many houses belonging to the Tories were also burned, which so filled them with indignation that many afterwards joined the colonists in resistance to the British rule. Another was the ancient homestead of the earliest Mott family, and which came into the possession of the writer some thirty years ago and was our residence down to the period of the late war. This house was quite a pretentious structure for those days, and the red-coats set fire to it—as the family legends run—on the broad shelves of the unfloored milk pantry. These burned into and dropped to the ground, and the fire went out. The colonists from near this house poured a lively musket fire on the red coats coming up West Avenue, and this led to several shots being fired from the field-piece, the artillery had in position close by Tryon on top of Grummon's Hill. One of these English solid shot was subsequently dug up nearly ten feet below the surface adjoining this house, and is now in our possession. It is an English 9-pound solid shot. From the Mott house they crossed the river at the ford (now Brady's Bridge) on their way to Grummon's Hill. Several sloops and small sailing-craft in the harbor were also captured and burned before the enemy reshipped and set sail for their rendezvous again for Huntington Harbor.

From Long Island the enemy made frequent incursions all along our Connecticut shore, being furnished with information by Tory residents as to where cattle, stores, and supplies might be stolen. It was one of these small raids that surprised Aunt Phoebe and O-ne, as related by Dr. Hall, and an account of which we have repeatedly heard both relate. The writer has in his possession the veritable side-saddle upon which Aunt Phoebe rode that famous race from the salt meadow to town. It was a gift from her to his mother. Aunt Phoebe's father always kept good horses, and she could mount and ride a horse either with or without a saddle as good as any of her brothers.

The first notice of the landing of the British forces, at the time of the town's destruction, was undoubtedly given, as related, by O-ne. It was on Saturday, July 11, 1779. The fleet, as it lazily sailed into the outer mouth of our harbor from Long Island, must have been observed by many, but it was always conceded by our old people that O-ne was entitled to the credit of running his horse to the bridge and giving the first information to the people and guard that a large force of the enemy were disembarking. O-ne was also a servant to the Rev. Mr. Burnett, pastor of the Congregational Church, and who also acted as chaplain to the Continental troops during various periods of the Revolutionary war, and used to accompany the 'fighting parson' whenever he went away with the troops. O-ne was a slave owned by the Comstocks, and they loaned him to their minister for this service. He was purchased by the father of Aunt Phoebe when he was four years old, and one English pound was paid for every pound avoirdupois of his physical weight. Mr. William L. Waring, of New Canaan, who has recently administered on the Comstock estate, has this curious document now in his keeping. Parson Burnett resided on East Avenue, in the first place north of the present home of Town Treasurer E. B. Burnett, and set out the stately and venerable elms which at this late period constitute the chief attraction of the old homestead.

An interesting and instructive lesson is afforded by the attitude and positions taken by the two leading clergymen of the town at that period, and the potent influence exerted by either upon the minds of the people. The Episcopal clergyman remained loyal to the king's cause, and was accused of having been the cause of so many of his parishioners joining the Tories, so great and active was his personal influence among his people. The Congregational, on the other hand, in season and out of season, preached, prayed, talked, walked, and fought against what he believed to be unwarranted British usurpations, and his people unitedly followed his teachings and practices. The Norwalk minister, Rev. Mr. Burnett, the Darien minister (then Muddlessex), Rev. Dr. Moses Maher, and

"The memorials before alluded to represent 'that many of the inhabitants of Norwalk went over to the enemy' during the war. Their estates were confiscated. Some trouble arose about these afterwards, necessitating the interference of the General Assembly. The disposition made of a part of one of them will be seen in the action of the Assembly on the petition of Abraham Benedict, given below.

"The destruction of the town seems to have been finished by noon of Sunday. Tryon withdrew his forces and recrossed the Sound. The character of this raid may be judged from the following testimony and memorials copied from the originals in the State Library.

"The first is that of Capt. Betts himself:

"FAIRFIELD COUNTY,)
 "Norwalk, July 26, 1779. } 88.

"Capt. Stephen Betts, of Col. Z. Butler's Regt., in ye Continental service, personally appeared and made solemn oath 'that on the 11th inst., while ye enemy invaded Norwalk, he with about fifty Continental troops and some militia engaged a superior number of ye enemy, which obliged them to give way to unequal force. As they retreated, John Waters, a Continental soldier, fell into ye enemy's hands, delivered up his arms, and begged for life. But ye enemy, notwithstanding, assaulted him with a bayonet, with which they stabbed him in sundry places, and then one of them presented his Piece and aimed (as ye Captains supposed) at his Body, but missing that ye ball shattered his arm. Whereupon finding no Quarter he made a strong effort to escape, which he happily effected. Soon after ye above accident John Lick (Rich?), another Continental soldier, was shot so as to fall, and, as ye enemy were nigh and crowded fast on our People, he desired Capt. Betts to leave him, as they could not take him off without ye greatest Hazard. Capt. Betts saw Lick no more, but says Capt. Eels, of Col. Wylly's (?) Regt., told him he saw Lick after ye enemy had retreated, about two hours after Capt. Betts saw him. He was then dead and ye top of his skull torn off, supposed to be blown off by a musquet to dispatch him, and further saith not."

"Before me, Thaddens Betts, Justice of Peace."

"Abraham Benedict made a personal memorial that 'he had his dwelling-house burnt down and consumed by the cruel and barbarous enemy on the 11th day of July last past. That before that time he could but just support himself and his wife and a numerous family of small children, by reason of a slender constitution that he has labored under for many years past, and that . . . by means of having his house burnt up, and the loss of considerable part of his household furniture and all his provisions, has reduced him so low that he is altogether at present unable to build him a home, and that he finds it almost next to impossible (by means of so many dwelling-houses being burnt by the enemy in said Norwalk) to get a covering or shelter to screen himself and family from the inclemency of the approaching season. . . . That on the 11th day of July last past one Ebenezer Street, then in said Norwalk, joined the said enemy and went with them over to Long Island, and that on the said Ebenezer Street's homestead, in said Norwalk, there stands a small barn which your Honor's Distressed Memorialist is extremely desirous to obtain for the purpose of making a dwelling-house of it, to cover himself and family, and that said barn and the other estate of the said Ebenezer Street has lately been adjudged and declared forfeit to his State by a special County Court held at Fairfield,' etc.

"The memorialist goes on to say that he thinks he can so join the barn 'to his chimney,' which has been left standing, 'as to take advantage of it and of his cellar, and that he can so fix up said barn that he imagines he can tolerably well live through the approaching winter in it.' So he wants the barn appraised as confiscated property and sold to him, which the Assembly ordered to be done.

"Oct. 18, 1779, a memorial signed by one hundred and twenty-one persons was sent to the General Assembly asking relief, by exemption from taxes and in such other way as the Assembly should see meet, on account of the destruction of their property, etc. The names of the signers connect us with a large number of Norwalk's present families. They are such as Betts, Butler, Raymond, Mallory, Fitch, Hanford, Smith, Gregory, Graman, Seymour, Marvin, Benedict, St. John, Lockwood, Hoyt, Jarvis, Hyatt, Whitney, Comstock, Beers, Jennings, Quintard, 'Heirs Rev. Mr. Dickenson,' and many others.

"In answer to the memorial the Assembly appointed Col. Benjamin Hinman, Col. Nehemiah Beardslee, and Mr. William Heron to inquire into and estimate the losses of every individual in said town of Norwalk, in consequence of the late hostile invasion of the British troops.

"Later, in 1792, the Assembly voted to the sufferers by Tryon's raid half a million acres of land, owned by the State and lying south of Lake Erie,—the tract afterwards known as New Connecticut. The valuation allotted to Norwalk, as the greatest sufferer, was over twenty-six thousand pounds. There are families here, we believe, who are still enjoying the benefit of that apportionment.

"It is difficult to estimate the influence of Tryon's incursion during that memorable week, from the 5th to the 12th of July, on the future history of the war and of the country. Like the Indian barbarities, it tended to intensify and consolidate the hostility to England, and to strengthen the patriotism that had so little to expect from the success of its enemies. And so in the long outworking it is sure that the bitter losses of that day, so hard for us now to realize, were not a waste and the lives that went out were not lost. But those lives deserve a memorial that they have not received. Is there anything nobler in the history of war than the net of that Continental soldier whose very name is obscure,—John Lick or John Rich,—who, wounded and pressed by the enemy, 'desired Capt. Betts to leave him' and save his own life, and who was found by Capt. Eels, 'after the enemy had retreat'd,' with his skull blown off by a musket to dispatch him? Noble fellow! He deserves a monument. Let him have it."

ORIGIN OF "YANKEE DOODLE" IN AMERICA.

It is a sober fact in history that the now world-wide famous song of "Yankee Doodle" was composed in derision of the Connecticut troops which served the English army at Albany in 1758, in the war against the French and Indians. All the colonial troops were under the command of Col. Thomas Fitch, son of Governor Thomas Fitch, of Norwalk.

The dress, marching, accoutrements, and general appearance of the Connecticut troops greatly amused the officers of the English army, as well as the citizens of Albany. An Albany newspaper wrote of the newcomers that "some wore long coats, some wore short coats, and others were with no coats at all. Their dresses were as varied in color as the rainbow. Some of the men had their hair cropped like Cromwell's Roundheads, others were in wigs or wore curls in the style of the cavaliers."

Dr. Shackburg, attached to the English army, in derision of these motley-arrayed Connecticut regiments, composed the first four verses of the now famous song and called it "Yankee Doodle." The music was not original with Shackburg, but was an adaptation from a song composed upon a noted lady in the reign of Charles I. in England, preserved in nursery rhyme:

"Lucy Locket lost her pocket;
Kittie Fisher found it;
Nothing in it, nothing in it;
But the binding round it."

It is supposed to have been written to satirize Cromwell, and first appeared in his time beginning:

"Yankee Doodle came to town
Upon a Kentish pony;
He stuck a feather in his hat,
And called him Macaroni!"

JOHN BELDING, A SOULDIER.

"Dec. 12, 1676. Granted unto John Belding the remainder of the swamp that shall be left, when his Father Hales is laid out, and to be a part of the land that he is to have for his being a souldier."

JONATHAN STEVENSON, A SOULDIER IN THE DIREFUL SWAMP-FIGHT.

"Feb. 20, 1677. Granted by towne vote unto Jonathan Stevenson libberty to take up 4 acres of his twelve acres given him by the town for his being a souldier; and that against Tho. Hiet's home lot, on the East side of the aforesaid Hiet, joyning unto him; onely due care is to be taken by them that lay it out, that the towne be not deprived of the benefit of the springs for their cattel in the winter season."

THE DIREFUL SWAMP-FIGHT.

"This was in King Philip's war. After some successes of Philip there was a general rising of the Indians against the English for an extent of nearly three hundred miles. The Indians were perfectly acquainted with the situation of every English settlement. They lurked at every unguarded pass, crept by night into their barns, gardens, and out-houses, concealed themselves behind fences, laid in wait in the fields. The whole country, save some few towns, was a wilderness. Parties of Indians would plunder and burn a town, carry the inhabitants away captive, and then retire into the forests and swamps. Brookfield had been burnt; Hadley, Deerfield, and Northfield had been attacked, and numbers killed; Capt. Lathrop and ninety or a hundred men had been ambushed and slaughtered between Hadley and Deerfield; Springfield had been attacked and partly destroyed. The Narragansetts, who had made a treaty with the English, now harbored their enemies, and many of their warriors, after having been engaged in these marauding expeditions, had returned wounded. There was the clearest evidence that the Narragansetts were preparing to join openly in the war. They could muster two thousand warriors, and had a thousand muskets. Should the Indians all engage in the spring in such a warfare as they had hitherto carried on, there was scarcely any hope but that nearly all the English settlements must be cut off in detail without the possibility of successful resistance.

"It was therefore determined to attack them in the winter, though such an enterprise was full of hazard. Should any disaster befall the troops of the colonies, it might be difficult or impossible to send them succors or supplies, on account of the deep and pathless snows and the exposures of the winter and the wilderness, besides the danger from the Indians. But dreadful necessity compelled them to make the attempt.

“Massachusetts furnished five hundred and twenty-seven men, Plymouth one hundred and fifty-eight, and Connecticut three hundred men and one hundred and fifty Mohegan and Pequot Indians. The Connecticut troops had marched from Stonington to Pet-tysquamscot. Here they expected shelter, but the Indians had burned the buildings and killed the inhabitants only a day or two before. This was on December 17th. The weather was cold and stormy. The next day they marched, and formed a junction with the Massachusetts and Plymouth forces. Here again they were obliged to spend the night uncovered in the open field. The next morning, at break of day, the army marched towards the Narragansett fort, which was in a deep tangled swamp, fifteen miles distant. The snow was deep, and the weather extremely cold. At one o'clock they reached the enemy's fort. It was on rising ground, in the midst of the swamp, surrounded with palisades, and, outside of these, with a hedge of brush a rod thick. The only entrance which appeared practicable was over a log which lay five or six feet from the ground, and this entrance was defended in front by a fortress of logs ‘and on the left by a flanker.’ The Massachusetts troops, who were in front, mounted the log and rushed on. A few entered the fort. The fire from the log house and flanker was so hot that a sufficient number could not force their way through to support them, and those who had entered were cut down. The deep snow and the tangled thicket rendered it impossible for the whole body of troops to come up at once, and it was a considerable time before all could be brought into action. At length the Connecticut troops, who formed the rear, mounted over the log and rushed into the fort. Some others forced their way to the opposite side of the fort and succeeded in making good their entrance while the attention of the enemy was engaged in front. A long, bloody, and dubious conflict ensued, but the enemy were at length overcome, and what were not killed in the battle fled to the swamp. Three hundred Indian warriors perished on the spot. Many were wounded, and perished from their wounds and from the cold. Nearly the same number were taken prisoners. It was a dreadful day.

“The victory was dearly bought. Six captains fell in the action, and eighty men were killed or mortally wounded. One hundred and fifty were wounded, who afterwards recovered. After burning the fort and all that it contained, the little army, just at the setting of the sun, carrying about two hundred dead and wounded, marched back to their headquarters. The night was cold and stormy. It was midnight before they got in. None could have their wounds dressed till they reached their headquarters. Many died who might otherwise have recovered; many perished with cold and fatigue. Well might the fathers of this town call it ‘the direful swamp-fight.’”

* In Hinman's catalogue of names of Puritan settlers, under Matthew Griswold, is noticed "a severe lawsuit between said Griswold and Reinold Marvin." "The arbitrators awarded that one-half the horses should be equally divided between them, and that the other half should go to the colony, and Marvin should look them up, and appointed a committee to sell the horses and execute the award." Upon this Mr. Hinman remarks: "The arbitrators must at least have resided at Dutch Point, if they were not Dutch justicers." This record may explain the matter without the necessity of so uncharitable a supposition.

Andrew Lyon, John Fillio, Thomas Austin, to sitt upon ye seat joining to the Little pue, in ye North East corner of the meeting House, and their wives to sit on the opposite seat, joyning to y^e North West corner of y^e meeting house.

"Feb. 20, 1759. Voted that the Town shall provide fire wood, &c., for the Guard House and Hospital; and the select men for the time being are appointed to take care of the same, so far as it relates to the town."

* Book of Records from 1740 to 1747.

SAYBROOK PLATFORM.

"One Saybrook Platform given gratis to each minister in this town; the select men divide the remaining part according to list."

AGAINST RIOTOUS PROCEEDINGS.

"Nov. 12, 1765. Whereas there have been diverse routs and tumultuous and riotous assemblies of disorderly people in the land, and some in this colony; and there are diverse reports of many threatenings of such further tumults and riotous assemblies, to the intent of doing mischief to the persons and properties of diverse people, and especially against some in the principall places of rule and government; all of which are contrary to the peace, and to subvert all order and government; and whereas the inhabitants of the town of Norwalk, in general town meeting assembled, taking these matters into serious consideration, think it their indispensable duty to bear proper and publick testimony against such unlawfull proceedings; and accordingly do declare their utter abhorrence and detestation of all such routs, tumults, and riotous assemblies, and such alarming threatenings of mischiefs; and as they think themselves bound in loyalty to the King, and for the security of the privileges of the colony, and of the lives and properties of ye subjects, do hereby further declare, they will use their utmost endeavor, in all proper and legal ways, to prevent and suppress all such disorders, so far as appertains to them to be aiding and assisting therein."

BURYING-GROUND ON MILL HILL.

"Last Monday of Dec. 1767. At the same meeting the Inhabitants by major vote give and grant all their right and title to the burying place on Whitney's hill, so called, to ye inhabitants of the First Society."

MEETING OF POPLAR PLAIN AND NORFIELD CITIZENS.

"Jan. 8, 1776. Whereas, information hath this day been made to this meeting, that there are numbers of the inhabitants of this town, living at Poplar Plain and parts adjacent, have united with numbers of the inhabitants of Fairfield, living in Norfield Parish and the Western part of the town of Fairfield adjoining to this town, and have unwarrantably formed themselves into a body, and call themselves a committee, and determined that every person that is in debt shall not be liable to be sued for the same, nor be liable to pay any interest on obligations, but be discharged therefrom; and that justices of the peace shall not sign any writ, or grant any executions, and the officers shall not serve either writs or executions; and have also in case any creditor shall attempt to sue for his debt or require interest or obligations, or a justice sign a writ, or any officer serve the same, they will unitedly prevent and oppose with all the force and strength they can procure the same.—This meeting, taking into consideration the aforesaid matters of information, and the aforesaid illegal resolves and determinations, are of opinion that the same have a direct tendency to set aside all law, and leave us in the hands of a merciless set of men, and to throw us into confusion and distraction, and to deprive us of all our valuable and constitutional rights. We therefore do hereby vote and agree to use our utmost influence, power, and strength, to disapprove and to discountenance every such illegal measure; and do everything in our power, unitedly, to aid and assist the authority in suppressing the same in every proper and legal way."

SALTPETRE-WORKS.

"At the same meeting, the select men are directed to erect Salt Petre works, and carry on the making of Salt Petre at the expense of the town, agreeable to the law of this colony; unless some particular person or persons shall appear to do the same."

MAGAZINE.

"At the same meeting the selectmen are directed to erect a magazine to keep the warlike stores belonging to the town, 'and that on the hill between Mr. Leaming's house and Ebenezer Lockwood's,'"

COMMITTEE OF INSPECTION.

"May 20, 1776. Whereas, complaint is made to this meeting by the committee of inspection in this town, that some inconveniency has arisen on account of the difficulty of having the major part of said committee collected on sudden and special occasions, voted, that any seven of s^d committee shall have power to act in said capacity on any sudden and special occasion."

DONALD McAULEY'S SALT.

"Oct. 14, 1776. Whereas there has been great uneasiness among the inhabitants, with respect to the great rise of salt; and there being a large quantity in the possession of Donald McAuley of this place, which the inhabitants of this town are necessitated to have for their use at some price; the said Donald McAuley therefore came into this meeting, and agreed with the inhabitants, that he would not ask them more than twelve shillings, lawful money, per bushel, out of the said quantity, for their own consumption; and if the market price shall be less, any time hereafter, he will accept of the same. Upon which the inhabitants consent that any one person may purchase salt of him accordingly."

and supremacy, as also being conformable, &c., whereof they brought testimony per certifi from the justices and ministers where they abodes have lately been. The following names are included in said list:

husbandman,	Matthew Marvyn,	Age 35 yrs.
" Exor. Elizabeth Marvyn,		31
" Elizabeth Marvyn,		31
" Matthew Marvyn,		8
" Marie Marvyn,		6
" Sara Marvyn,		3
" Hanna Marvyn,		1 ²

" Reinold Marvia, who removed to Saybrook in 1639, and his brother, Matthew Marvin, were among the original settlers of Hartford, Conn. Matthew represented the town of Norwalk in the General Court in 1654

" The children of Matt. Marvin, Sr., were as follows:

" 1. Matthew, born in England, about 1627.

" 2. Mary, born in Eogland, about 1629, married to Richard Bushnell, of Saybrook, in 1648.

" 3. Sarah, born in England about 1632, married to William Goodridge, of Weathersfield, 1648.

" 4. Hannah, born in England about 1634, married to Thomas Seymour, of Norwalk, January, 1653.

" 5. Abigail, born at Hartford, Conn., married John Bouton, of Norwalk, January, 1656.

" 6. Samuel, born at Hartford, February, 1647-48.

" 7. Rachel, born at Hartford, 'close of 1649."

* * * The name of John Bouton appears on p. 17 as among the first settlers of Norwalk. At what time he came to this country the family have no record. He was a French Protestant, and it is said there are many of the same name still living in France and Germany, and that a great similarity exists between the families there and here. He had five children after his marriage as here recorded,—viz., John, Matthew, Rachel, Abigail, and Mary. He must also have had children by a previous marriage.

" His son John had two children, Jakin and Joseph, and perhaps more, although no others appear on the record.

" His grandson, Jakin, had two children by his first wife, Joseph and Sarah; and by his second wife, two sons, Esaius and Moses, and seven or eight daughters.

" Joseph, his great-grandson, married Susannah Raymond, Aug. 25, 1748, daughter of Joshua Raymond, and had eleven children, six sons and five daughters. The sons were William, Joshua, Joseph, Seth, Ira, and Aaron. The daughters were Rebeckah, Betty, Nancy, Susannah, and Delorah. He was an officer in the expedition sent against the French Provinces in 1758-59, and kept a journal of the service, which was unfortunately lost in pulling down the old family mansion, a few years since, which stood on the spot where Deacon John Bouton, his grandson now resides.

" William, the son of Joseph, the fifth descendant from the first John, was married to Sarah Benedict, Feb. 15, 1769, by whom he had fourteen children,—viz., Isaac (who died), Isaac, William, Betty, Esther, Sally, Clara, Seth, Joseph, Susannah, John, Mary, Ann, and Nathaniel.

" Joseph, the son of Joseph, was killed at Red Hook in the Revolutionary war. Seth, his brother, was killed by falling from a tree. Joshua listed in the army at the age of fourteen, as a drummer, was taken prisoner, and kept on board a man-of-war till the peace, and arrived home just in time to see his father before he died. He afterwards followed the sea, and was a skillful and able captain.

" The descendants of the fourteen children of William are very numerous.—Communicated by S. W. Benedict."

FAIRFIELD FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

was organized in South Norwalk in 1869, under the name of Fairfield County Fire Insurance Company, which was changed in 1871 by act of Legislature to its present title. The company has a full paid-up cash capital of two hundred thousand dollars, and has now and has had many of the leading capitalists of the town as its directors. It paid heavy loss claims by the Chicago fire of 1871, and contributed seventy-five thousand dollars on its policies to the great Boston calamity of the year following.

This company commenced paying dividends in 1872, and up to January, 1880, had paid eighty-two per cent. upon its capital stock in dividends to the stockholders.

E. A. Woodward, of South Norwalk, was first president of the company. Henry R. Treadwell, of Westport, was next, and W. S. Hanford has filled the presidential chair since July, 1872. The present directors are W. S. Hanford, F. W. Bruggerhof, H. R. Treadwell, L. Ingersoll, Tallmadge Baker, L. H. Biglow, John H. Knapp, H. E. Bowers, Alden Solmans, A. Bleakley, D. P. Ely, Winfield S. Moody, William W. Watson.

Present officers: President, W. S. Hanford; Vice-President, Tallmadge Baker; Secretary, H. R. Turner; Assistant Secretary, A. L. Frisby.

THE SOUTH NORWALK SENTINEL

was established Nov. 17, 1870, by E. A. Horton, who was also the founder of the Derby Transcript. The paper had run but a short time under Mr. Horton's sole proprietorship when a joint-stock company was organized under the firm-name of the "South Norwalk Printing Company," with D. P. Ely for president, and Mr. Horton as manager and superintendent.

The paper was subsequently edited by C. V. Arnold, and later by H. E. Wing. He was succeeded by Rev. H. N. Darney, pastor of the Congregational Church, who contributed the editorials up to the time when the joint-stock company was dissolved and the concern purchased by E. A. Horton and James Golden, the latter from New York City.

Up to this time the paper had not paid its expenses, but had lost money, and was almost bankrupt. This change was made in February, 1873, and with it came a change in the fortunes of the paper. Horton & Golden ran it a little over a year, when Mr. Horton retired, and R. H. Golden, a brother of James, took his interest. The firm then became Golden Brothers, and its business was successfully conducted by them till April, 1879, when another brother, John F. Golden, was added to the firm.

The office was at this time removed from its former location, opposite the railroad depot, to the building on Washington Street erected by Gen. Nelson Taylor, and known as the "Sentinel Building." At the same time the stationery and paper business was added to that of publishing, and has proved successful.

The paper is independent, published every Wednesday, and devoted mainly to giving the local news and considering matters and topics of local interest. It ranks well up among the weekly papers of the county, and is among the successful business concerns in the city in which it is published, where it has a strong influence and is considered one of the leading institutions of the place.

THE CITY OF SOUTH NORWALK.

This place has a population of about five thousand. It is situated on Norwalk River, one and a half miles from the head of navigation, and about two miles from Long Island Sound. The New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad runs through its centre. Its depot in the city is the terminus of the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad, and is only forty-two miles from the Grand Central depot in New York City, thirty from New Haven, and twenty-two miles to the Danbury depot. Its water-facilities are unsurpassed.

A large and commodious steamer leaves the dock at the foot of Washington Street every morning, except Sundays, for New York City, returning at six p. m. Two freight-steamers make tri-weekly trips between this city and New York. Within the city are ample dock accommodations for vessels drawing from ten to twelve feet of water, at which are constantly moored in the busy season sailing-crafts of every description discharging lumber, timber, and every kinds of building-materials, coal, and wood, and receiving cargoes of various sorts for other ports. Here the oyster-trade is a large factor of wealth. At certain seasons of the year the docks are crowded with vessels engaged in transporting oysters to New York City, Bridgeport, New Haven, Hartford, and to foreign countries. It is computed that at least two millions of dollars' worth of bivalves are planted in the waters of Norwalk, three-quarters of which are owned by citizens of South and East Norwalk.

The city of South Norwalk is really the entrepot of nearly all the commerce of Norwalk, Wilton, Ridgefield, Bethel, Danbury, and the southwestern portion of Litchfield County, from whence it is carried by the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad.

This city is the centre of an extensive and lucrative hat-manufacturing interest, giving employment, probably, to fifteen hundred operatives of both sexes, many of whom come from the surrounding towns by rail. For about seventy-five years South Norwalk has been noted throughout the country as one of the centres of this trade. The hats produced in this locality have found a ready market in all the States of the Union, Mexico, and the States of South America, because of their superior texture and styles.

There are in the city ten extensive hat-establishments, two fur-cutting, and one hat-body forming company: Crofut & Knapp (two factories), Adams Brothers, Swift & Palmer, A. Solomons, Benedict Brothers, Brown & Co., F. Volk, Crow, Brother & Volk.

Two large iron-foundries in full blast, one boiler, pump, and engine-works, one lock-factory, the largest in the country, whose goods find a market throughout the civilized world.

Two steam saw-mills for cutting up lumber and furnishing sash, windows, blinds, and doors for builders in all the surrounding country: Burr Knapp, H. R. Fitch.

One paper box and two wooden box factories: R. H. Rowen, W. Fitch, C. T. Tolles.

One shoe- and boot-manufactory, doing a large and thriving business, and giving employment to about seventy-five hands of both sexes: Lounsbury Bros. & Rockwell. The company had, till Ely's Hotel was built, the most attractive building in the city.

One corset establishment, but recently erected: Goldsmith & Co. When in order will give employment to three hundred hands.

One boat-building company and one marine railway company.

One factory for the manufacture of ink: J. Pennell.

Two carriage-establishments, which turn out the most stylish carriages to be found in the State: H. Tilly, C. A. Mulings.

Three cigar-factories and one cigar-box factory: C. Smarts, L. Lowder, Hoyt & Comstock.

One printing establishment,—the South Norwalk Printing Company,—doing a prosperous business under the management of the Golden Brothers.

SCHOOLS.

The schools of the South Norwalk Union School District rank among the best in the State.

CHURCHES.

Three live and prosperous churches exist within the bounds of the city, and in the outlying districts are two union chapels, occupied in turn by the pastors of the Congregational, Methodist, and Episcopal Churches. Combined, they have a membership of about twelve hundred.

STEAMBOATS.

In 1824 the first steamboat was put on the line from Norwalk to New York, called "John Marshall," in honor of the chief justice, and was about eighty feet long, with a capacity of thirty or forty passengers. Fare, one dollar. Three years later the late Com. Vanderbilt started an opposition boat called the "Nimrod," and the fare was reduced to one shilling, which continued about two years. The "Nimrod" was commanded by Capt. Brooks, of Bridgeport. The "John Marshall" was superseded by the "Fairfield," commanded by Capt. Peck. The steamer "Adelphi" now runs between Norwalk and New York.

ST. JOHN'S LODGE, NO. 6, F. AND A. M.

The original charter of this lodge was obtained from the Provincial Grand Lodge in New York, and bears the signature of R. W. George Harrison, Grand Master, dated May 23, 1765, appointing Benjamin Isaacs, Master, Stephen St. John, Senior Warden, and Jehiel Ketcham, Junior Warden, of said lodge, "to be held at Norwalk only, and that until such time as a Grand Master shall be appointed for the Colony of Connecticut." The records of the lodge previous to 1779 are supposed to have been destroyed when the town was burned, in July of that year. The records from Sept. 8, 1779, to the present are in regular order.

At the convention preliminary to forming the Grand Lodge, which was held in New Haven in 1783, this lodge was represented by David Lambert, but at the subsequent convention, when the constitution was adopted and signed, the name of a delegate from this lodge does not appear on the minutes. Their present charter was issued by the Grand Lodge of Connecticut, Oct. 17, 1793.

The following is a list of the first one hundred and thirty-two members of the lodge: Benjamin Isaacs, 1st W. M.; Stephen St. John, 1st S. W.; Jehiel Ketcham, 1st J. WASHINGTON COUNCIL, ROYAL AND SELECT MASTERS.

was chartered by the Grand Council of Connecticut, May 10, 1849, the first three officers being James Stevens, John A. McLean, and Henry W. Smith. It has always held its meetings in Norwalk.

OUR BROTHERS' LODGE, I. O. O. F.

The following history of this lodge is taken from an historical address delivered by Dr. Asa Hill in October, 1871:

"On the 19th of October, 1842, the R. W. G. D. M. George Walters, assisted by R. W. Grand Warden Gibson London, P. G. Wilson, P. G. Stevens, of the Grand Lodge of the State of Connecticut, together with a number of Brothers from Poquonoc Lodge, No. 4, of Bridgeport, proceeded to institute this lodge, under the name of 'Our Brothers' Lodge,' No. 10, I. O. O. F., and in ample form delivered to the lodge a charter for the same. The names of the charter members were as follows: Cholwell J. Gruman, Asa E. Smith, Stephen Olmstead, R. S. Pennoyer, and J. Taylor Hunt. The first officers of the lodge were as follows: C. J. Gruman, N. G.; Asa E. Smith, V. G.; Stephen Olmstead, Sec.; R. S. Pennoyer, Treas. The first batch of candidates initiated were as follows: Samuel R. Bunting, George W. Raymond, Eli K. Street, Wm. E. Bissell, Eli Curtis, R. Osborn, E. Donnelly, and H. Bay. These persons were severally appointed to fill the subordinate offices, and the lodge, thus duly officered, commenced a singularly prosperous career, the twentieth anniversary of which we this evening celebrate.

"The first lodge-room was but a small affair, located in Olmstead's Block, in Main Street, yet it answered the necessities of the case sufficiently well. The furniture was simple and plain, and the brothers, warm in their 'first love,' were content to work and wait until the accession of greater numbers and more ample means allowed them to improve and expand their borders.

"After a while the place became too strait for them, and the lodge-room was enlarged and to some extent embellished. This room served us for a number of years, and until the Gazette building was erected, when we transferred our headquarters to our present beautiful lodge-room. It is a matter of no little interest thus to recall the leading facts of our early history and mark the course of our onward progress. It was in this old lodge-room that many of our most substantial and worthy members were initiated into the order, and it is still fragrant with pleasant associations. It is within the memory of the speaker when the death of the first Odd-Fellow made our little band so sad and touched the springs of sympathy in all our hearts, and an Odd-Fellow's funeral was for the first time in this town witnessed by our people.

"Primarily to Brother C. J. Gruman more than to any other person are we indebted for the organization of this lodge. He expended his time and money lavishly to get the lodge in working order. His zeal was tireless, his attendance regular and uniform, and the ardent impulses of his nature found abundant room for their exercise in the growth and expansion of the brotherhood. Indeed, the very name of 'Our Brothers' Lodge,' at once so beautiful and suggestive, I believe, originated with him.

"We mention his name in this connection with special prominence because we are enjoined in that good old book that we all cherish as the guide of our lives to render 'honor to whom honor is due.'

"It is to him also, more than to any other member of our order, that we are indebted for the existence of an additional branch, known as Kabaosa Encampment, No. 9. The petitioners for this encampment charter were Cholwell J. Gruman, John G. Quigley, Wm. H. Cleveland, Henry W. Smith, James A. Quintard, and Peter L. Cunningham. Two of the persons whose names were appended to this petition have since deceased, to wit: John G. Quigley and Wm. H. Cleveland."

The present number of members (Sept. 27, 1880) is two hundred and seventy-eight; funds on hand, eleven thousand six hundred and sixty-four dollars.

THE NORWALK FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

This company has a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, and is officered as follows: President, William C. Street; Secretary, George R. Cowles; Treasurer, Samuel Lynes. The following is the board of directors: William C. Street, Asa Smith, G. G. Bishop, E. S. Tweedy, Samuel Lynes, M. D., Stiles Curtis, William S. Lockwood, E. B. Bennett, A. E. Smith, S. E. Olmstead, E. C. Bissell, John Osborn, F. S. Wildman, G. R. Cowles, D. P. Nichols, S. Y. St. John, D. M. Marvin, D. P. Ely, Henry I. Hoyt, and George B. St. John.

JUDGES OF PROBATE.

The following is a list of the judges of Probate of the district of Norwalk:

1802-15, Taylor Sherman; 1815-18, Clark Bissell; 1818-28, William M. Betts; 1828-35, Benjamin Isaacs; 1835-37, Stephen Smith; 1837-38, William St. John; 1838-42, Benjamin Isaacs; 1842-43, Cyrus A. Mead; 1843-44, George A. Davenport; 1844-45, Benjamin Isaacs; 1845-46, Sidney B. Beardsley; 1846-47, George A. Davenport; 1847-49, Thomas B. Butler; 1849-50, Orris S. Ferry; 1850-78, George A. Davenport; 1878, Asa B. Woodward.

BOROUGH OF NORWALK.

The borough of Norwalk was chartered on the first Wednesday in May in 1836. The first officers were elected July 11, 1836, as follows: Warden, Joseph W. Hubbell; Burgesses, William S. Street, Matthias Hubbell, Stephen T. Brewer, Stiles Curtis, Levi Clark, and Timothy T. Merwin; Treasurer, Charles Thomas; Bailiff, James Stevens; Haywards, Levi Clark, Jason Merrill, William Cleveland, Richard Camp, Daniel Nash, Robert Cameron, John Wasson, Lewis Whitney, and James S. Kellogg; Pound-Keepers, Eli Sanford, Nathan Jarvis, Matthias Hubbell, and Buckingham Lockwood; Inspector of Coal, Wood, and Hay, James Stevens; Inspector of Grain, Edwin Lockwood; Inspector of Butter, James Porter.

The present officers of the borough (elected Dec. 1, 1879) are as follows: Warden, James W. Hyatt; Burgesses, George B. Cowles, Charles C. Betts, Homer Merrill, Darius W. Couch, John Keena, and Frank Street; Borough Treasurer and Treasurer of Water Fund, Robert B. Crawford; Collector, Elbert Curtis; Bailiff, James Finney; Board of Registration, George N. Ells and Jacob Turk; Inspectors of Elections, Charles H. Wheeler, John A. Honncker; Water Commissioners, Augustus C. Golding, Winfield S. Moody, Isaac Selleck, Jr.;* Clerk, Joseph F. Foote;† Chief of Police, John O. Sullivan; Policemen, Daniel J. Bennett and William Sheldon.

* Appointed vice Carlyle T. Weeks, resigned.

† Officiated for nine successive years.

The first fire inspectors elected after the organization of the borough were Charles Isaacs, Henry Selleck, and Gould D. Jennings.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.*

The present fire department of the borough is a volunteer one, and consists of a chief engineer with two assistants, one engine, one hose, one hook-and-ladder, and one fire-police company. The apparatus consists of one steam fire-engine, one hose-carriage, one hose-crab, two hose-jumpers, one hook-and-ladder truck with all its appurtenances, and about nineteen hundred feet of good rubber hose. The companies and apparatus are all in good serviceable condition.

The formation of the department for 1880 is as follows: Chief-Engineer, Joseph B. Ellis; Assistants, Royal L. Adams, Frank S. Fancher.

The companies are:

PHENIX ENGINE COMPANY, No. 1, William Hands, foreman, with fifty members. This company was organized Dec. 15, 1858, and has been in continual active service ever since its formation. It first ran a second-class Sickles piano machine. In 1870 it was furnished with a second-class steam fire-engine of Cole Brothers' make, with which it has done much efficient and good service. At present the engine is held in reserve, by reason of the borough having a good and powerful supply of water through the public water-works; therefore at present the company runs a hose-crab on occasions of fire.

HOPE HOSE COMPANY, No. 3, F. McKeon, foreman, has about thirty members. The company was organized in the spring of 1859 as an auxiliary of Phenix Engine Company, and assumed the name of Phenix Hose Company, but changed its name to Hope Hose in 1877. The company run a handsome four-wheeled hose-carriage and two two-wheeled jumpers.

PIONEER HOOK-AND-LADDER COMPANY, No. 1, Edgar S. Wilcoxon, foreman, has thirty-two members. It was organized in January, 1861. It runs a fine and handsome truck well supplied with ladders, hooks, etc.

THE FIRE POLICE, Capt. A. J. Meeker, numbers thirty men. Is a comparatively new company, having been organized to fill a gap long felt in the department,—viz., to protect and prevent the active firemen from being interfered with or crowded by the idle persons usually attracted to a fire, and also to handle and care for any property necessarily removed from any burning building.

The department is a good and efficient one, and has proved its worth on many occasions. It is always prompt in answer to duty calls, and ever ready for hard, earnest work.

WATER-WORKS.

The movement to introduce a supply of pure and wholesome water into the borough of Norwalk was begun early in 1870. The General Assembly of the State, of that year, was petitioned to grant authority to the borough to introduce water, and the representatives of that year, and certain citizens of the borough, interested themselves in the procurement of a charter for that purpose. The charter was approved July 15, 1870, containing a proviso that it should not be binding upon the borough until accepted by a vote of the citizens of the borough at a meeting duly called for that purpose. A special meeting was held Aug. 24, 1870, and the charter for the introduction of water was accepted by a vote of three hundred and thirty-four yeas to sixty-five nays.

A special meeting of the borough was held Sept. 2, 1870, and Thomas H. Morison (re-elected Dec. 5, 1871), Samuel Lynes, M.D., and William K. James were elected commissioners, and Charles H. Street treasurer, of the water fund. At the same meeting, the borough, by vote, authorized the water commissioners to issue the bonds of the borough to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars to defray the expense of the introduction of water. It becoming evident to the commissioners that the above sum was insufficient, application was made to the borough for authority to issue the bonds of the borough to a larger amount, and on April 20, 1871, at a borough-meeting called for the purpose, it was voted to petition the General Assembly for power to issue the bonds of the borough to the amount of seventy-five thousand dollars additional. The Legislature, at its May session, 1871, accordingly amended the water charter of the borough, granting the necessary authority to issue the bonds of the borough to the amount of seventy-five thousand dollars additional, and the borough, in a special meeting called for that purpose July 1, 1871, voted to authorize the commissioners to do so. March 2, 1872, at a special meeting for that purpose, the borough voted to petition the General Assembly to pledge its credit for an additional twenty-five thousand dollars. Power was granted by the General Assembly at its May session, 1872, to do so, and the borough, in special meeting for that purpose Aug. 17, 1872, voted to authorize the commissioners to issue the bonds of the borough for an additional twenty-five thousand dollars, making in all the sum of two hundred thousand dollars.

The water is unusually pure and wholesome. It is taken from the Silver Mine Brook, in New Canaan.

HORSE RAILROADS.

This road was chartered in May, 1862, with the following members: Asa Hill, Le Grand Lockwood, Edwin Lockwood, Samuel G. Blackman, Edward C. Bissell, Charles Isaacs, and Chester N. Carr. The first officers were: President and Manager, Le Grand Lockwood; Asa Hill, Secretary. The first directors were Le Grand Lockwood, Edwin Lockwood, Thomas D. Richards, Asa Hill, Samuel G. Blackman, Edward C. Bissell, A. H. Byington, C. E. Lockwood, Levi Warner, elected September, 1862. The length

THE NORWALK GAZETTE.

In May, 1800, a printer named Picket came to Norwalk from Danbury and established the first newspaper in Southwestern Connecticut. His publication was about the size of a modern sheet of letter-paper. It was a great novelty in the section about Norwalk, and a subject of discussion and interest all over the State. It was printed upon an old-time Ben Franklin Ramage press, with wooden platen, and requiring four impression-pulls for each paper; so that, almost literally, the more subscribers the paper had the worse its owner was off. Its few stray numbers now in existence are curiosities indeed. The latest news from New York City averages ten days prior to date of publication. The latest intelligence from Washington is a full month old, and the latest news from Europe more than three months past its date.

In 1818, Roswell S. Nichols and Philo Price purchased the Picket concern. From that date to this the Gazette has been issued every week without a break, subject to frequent changes of proprietorship.

The new firm of Nichols & Price enlarged the Gazette to a paper nineteen by twenty-four, and continued its publication some four years, when it was sold to their young apprentice, Seth W. Benedict. Mr. Price went to New York and started the Christian Messenger, and Mr. Nichols to Bridgeport (then Newfield), to start or join in the publication of a paper there. Mr. Benedict, in 1832, sold it in turn to his apprentice, James Reed, and Benedict went to New York and started the Evangelist. Mr. Reed held it for about two years, and, desiring to go to New Orleans, disposed of his interest to Timothy T. Merwin. Merwin, then a prominent lawyer in Norwalk, soon wearied of editorial drudgery, and sold it to William G. Hyer. Mr. Hyer, subsequently becoming an Episcopal clergyman, sold the paper to J. U. Ammerman, a brother-in-law of P. T. Barnum. Ammerman soon sold to the late Judge Stephen Smith, and Smith sold, after a few months, to George Taylor. In 1839, Taylor sold it back to James Reed, who continued its proprietor till January, 1848, when he sold it to James H. Hoyt and A. Homer Byington. In July, 1849, Byington sold his interest to Hoyt, but in July, 1851, he repurchased the entire property, and soon after admitted Henry W. Hyatt to a part ownership. Hyatt was associated with Byington some three years, and then left the Gazette to assume the proprietorship of the Litchfield Enquirer. In April, 1858, Joseph B. Ells and George N. Ells became joint owners. From that date to the present (1880) the Gazette has been conducted under the firm-name of A. H. Byington & Co.

During the Gazette's long and eventful history, clergymen, lawyers, doctors, congressmen, and teachers have alternated as its editors. James Reed, now of the Ashabula (Ohio) Telegraph, during his first ownership, employed the then Dr. Thomas B. Butler, who subsequently became Chief Judge Butler, as his chief writer. Rev. Dr. Edwin Hall and his brother, Storrs Hall, gave the paper more or less editorial aid at different times. The late United States senator Orris S. Ferry and Dr. Asa Hill were practically editors of the Gazette during the ownership of Hoyt. From 1851 to date its editorial and business management has been conducted entirely by the present firm of A. H. Byington & Co.

The Gazette proudly numbers among its past and present contributors articles from time to time from many of the finest writers and best thinkers in the country. It has always maintained a high character for newspaper enterprise and ability, and is widely known as one of the leading and influential journals of the State.

THE NORWALK HOUR.

In 1869, B. W. Maples, a commuter on the New York and New Haven Railroad, was expelled from the cars of the company because he had mislaid his commutation ticket and refused to pay the single-trip fare demanded by the conductor under the regulations of the company. Because of such expulsion, he instituted proceedings against the company in the courts. The usual delays followed, and numerous newspaper articles favoring the company were published. Thinking there was something other than spontaneity to account for such articles appearing just previous to each time fixed for a hearing of his case, Mr. Maples determined, on his own part, to appeal to the press, and wrote a brief statement of the facts, which he sent to numerous newspapers; but all but one refused to print. He then decided to have a newspaper of his own, and tried to purchase one already established. Not succeeding in this, on May 6, 1871, he issued the first number of The Westport Hour. The paper was issued bi-weekly for ten months, and has since been published on Saturday of each week.

In December, 1871, Mr. Maples reached a favorable decision of his suit, and would have then discontinued the Hour had he not found, to his surprise, that its receipts exceeded the expenses.

In 1873 The Hour was removed to Norwalk, and in 1874 The Westport Advertiser was consolidated with it, and the paper has since carried both names and is dated at Norwalk and Westport. It has reached a large circulation. Mr. Maples is still its editor and manager. It is thoroughly independent, and through the able editorial management of Mr. Maples has reached a large circulation.

THE DEMOCRAT.

The Democrat was started Jan. 10, 1877, H. H. Barbour editor; it was published by B. W. Maples. Mr. Barbour disposed of it to Thomas Tohill, Oct. 27, 1877, and Otis R. Pickett was placed in the editorial chair.

Dec. 1, 1877, Mr. Tohill sold it to Charles V. Arnold, who consolidated it with The South Norwalk Champion. He continued it one week, when Mr. Tohill resumed the office and reinstated Mr. Pickett as editor.

Jan. 1, 1878, William R. Palmer became associated with Mr. Pickett by purchase of all of Tohill's interest, and the name of the publishers changed to Pickett & Palmer, Palmer being the local editor. The size of the paper was increased from sixteen by twenty-two, six columns, to eighteen by twenty-four, seven columns.

March 20, 1878, William R. Palmer assumed full charge of the paper, both as editor and proprietor.

The Democrat has a large circulation, and is uncompromisingly Democratic.

THE SCHULTE MURDER.

A murder was committed on Roton Hill, near South Norwalk, about 6.30 P.M., Dec. 27, 1878. The victim was John Schulte, a wealthy and eccentric German, who first came to South Norwalk in February, 1877, when he bought a farm of eight acres for the exorbitant price of eight thousand dollars. He came to his house to live in October, 1877. Here, together with his companion and servant, Wm. Bucholz, he occupied two poorly-furnished rooms. In the rest of the house the family of Mrs. Waring lived. Schulte furnished the provisions, which Mrs. Waring cooked for the two men, who ate them in the proprietor's bedroom. Bucholz was twenty-two years of age. He had a fair complexion, an intelligent expression, and some education. The old man lived the life of a recluse, busying himself chiefly in reading German books, playing on the violin, and making experiments in photography. He had the name of being wealthy and of carrying large sums about his person, having occasionally shown a pocket-book bursting with bank-notes. Common report did not err in attributing riches to him, as he owned property in Germany to the amount of over a quarter of a million dollars. The rumor that he carried large sums of money also received verification. There was about seventy-five thousand dollars on his person the night of the murder.

When Schulte came to New York from Germany he brought a young German man-servant, named Seigfried Greenewald, with him. At the Sun Hotel, in New York, Bucholz, also a German, met Greenewald, and learned from him that he intended to leave Schulte's employ. During this conversation they talked about Schulte's money, and Buchholz remarked that if he were in Greenewald's place he would run off with Schulte's coat. Very soon after this we find William Buchholz acting as companion and servant of the eccentric miser.

On the day of the murder Schulte went to New York. He returned at 6.11 p.m., and started to walk home, accompanied by Buchholz, who had met him at the depot. This was the last seen of Schulte alive. About seven o'clock Buchholz rushed excitedly into the house, and, falling, half fainting, on the floor, cried, "Schulte is dead, dead, down in the woods,—dead! The tramps have killed Schulte!"

The neighbors were aroused, and, with Buchholz, they went to the place where the body lay. They found Schulte lying on his face near the foot-path. There were two terrible wounds on his head, either of them fatal. They had the appearance of having been made with a hatchet or an axe. In his inside vest-pocket was found a package containing about twenty thousand dollars, mostly in German money.

At the hearing before the coroner's jury Buchholz had little to testify, save that he was walking ahead of Schulte, when, hearing a cry from him, he turned around and at the same time was struck a blow in the face. He then ran to the house. At first he was not the subject of any general suspicion, the murder being laid to tramps. The State Attorney, James H. Olmstead, however, suspected him from the first, and gave orders for his arrest, which took place Jan. 21, 1879. The testimony showed that he had given Paul Herscher, a saloon-keeper, four twenty-dollar bills to keep. These bills bore a series of numbers given in a memorandum found among Schulte's papers. In explanation of his possession of this money, Buchholz claimed that Schulte had paid it to him on the night of the murder. This and some minor circumstances gave the case against Buchholz a black look; the jury of inquest returned a verdict against him, and he was confined in the Fairfield County jail. A true bill was found against him by the grand jury. The first trial began at Bridgeport, Conn., on Tuesday, Sept. 9, 1879, Chief Justice Park and Judge Sanford on the bench.

Upon this trial evidence was brought out which produced great sensation. A witness named Ernest Stark, a German detective of Pinkerton's agency, Philadelphia, testified of having been arrested in the city of Bridgeport, under the name of Edward Somers, during the month of March, 1879, charged with the crime of forgery. At a preliminary hearing before the City Court he demurred, and was bound over to the Superior Court for trial under bonds, failing to obtain which he was committed to jail, where he soon ingratiated himself into the good graces and gained the confidence of William Buchholz.

In the course of a conversation with him Buchholz disclosed the hiding-place of some of Schulte's money, in the barn upon the Waring premises. Mr. Stark then procured bail, went to the Waring place, and found the money in the place designated. He then returned to Bridgeport and frequently visited Buchholz in prison. At one of these interviews Stark told him that some one was about to purchase the Waring premises, in hope of finding some of Schulte's money, whereupon Buchholz informed him where another pocket-book was concealed. Stark then, in company with Robert Pinkerton, proceeded to the place, and found it, together with several pieces of gold coin. All the money found hidden amounted to fifty-five thousand dollars. At no time did he admit to Stark of having murdered Schulte.

Buchholz in this, as well as on the two following trials, was defended by Gen. W. R. Smith and Alfred E. Austin, Esq., of Norwalk, and Charles Bollman, Esq., of New Haven, the State being represented by State Attorney Olmstead, of Stamford, and Nelson Taylor, Jr., of Norwalk.

At 4.15 p.m., on Friday, the 19th, Chief Justice Park finished his charge to the jury, and for the first time in the history of the Superior Court of Fairfield County the jury held an all-night session. At twelve o'clock on the following day they at last came out, and returned a verdict of murder in the first degree.

On Oct. 15, 1879, a new trial was granted for the following reason: Joseph R. Lockwood, one of the jurors, had conversed during the trial with one Thomas Bour concerning the case. For this offense both were arrested and fined in the City Court of Bridgeport.*

The second trial began Feb. 17, 1880, with Chief Justice Park and Judge Martin on the bench. The jury retired to their room at 1 p.m., Monday, March 15th, and after remaining until 8.30 a.m., Thursday, the 18th, reported a disagreement, and were discharged.

The third trial began April 13th of the same year, with Judge Beardsley and Judge Culver on the bench. The charge was given by Judge Beardsley, and on May 7th the jury returned a verdict of murder in the second degree. Buchholz was sentenced to State's prison for life.

THE DRAWBRIDGE DISASTER.

The following facts are gathered from the Bridgeport Farmer of May 16 and 17, 1853. The most disastrous railroad accident which ever occurred in this part of the country took place at the South Norwalk drawbridge on Friday morning, May 5, 1853. The train was the Boston express, which left New York at 8 a.m.

The New York and New Haven Railroad crosses the harbor of Norwalk at South Norwalk, one thousand and eighty-six feet east of the depot. On the bridge over the channel of the harbor, and one hundred and fifty-three feet from the next abutment, there is a draw, which revolves horizontally upon a central abutment, and leaves, when open, two passages of sixty feet each. The bridge was under the care of William Hartford, who was in the employ of the company as bridge-tender.

At the time of this occurrence the draw was open, and the draw-tender was just about to close it. It had been opened about fifteen minutes before for the passage of the steamer "Pacific."

The fact of the draw being open was communicated to the train by a signal, which consisted of a red ball elevated upon a pole. Unless this ball was in sight, the trains were forbidden to go upon the bridge.

The train did not stop at Norwalk, and, being about eight minutes late, was hurrying on its way to make up lost time. The engineer was at his post, the conductor in the second passenger-car, and unoccupied. The absence of the ball or signal was unnoticed, or, if noticed, was unheeded. The train passed the depot and around the curve at a rate of not less than twenty miles per hour. When it reached about three hundred feet of the draw, two sudden sharp alarms of the whistle were blown; the engineer, Edward W. Tucker, the fireman, and the brakeman leaped from the train, which rushed on into the open draw. The engine, tender, baggage-car, smoking-car, and two passenger-cars, together with about half of the next car, plunged some twenty feet into the watery pit below in one mass of wreck and ruin. Persons who were near and saw the catastrophe say that the noise of the crash and the wail of the struggling and dying passengers were heartrending to a degree which language is utterly inadequate to describe.

The water being at full tide, nearly all in the forward car were drowned. The number of lives lost was forty-four, and twenty-five were rescued from the wreck alive, but badly injured. Among the killed was Dr. Samuel Beach, of Bridgeport, of whom the Farmer of May 10, 1853, says: "He was a physician of acknowledged skill, and had an extensive practice. His loss will therefore be felt and mourned by a large circle who regarded him as holding a more intimate relation than that of a mere friend."

Several other physicians, who, with Dr. Beach, had been in attendance at a medical convention in New York, were killed also. These were Dr. W. C. Dwight, of Brooklyn; Dr. John O. Grey, one of the most prominent in Springfield, Mass.; Dr. Smith, also of Springfield; Dr. Abel S. Pierson, of Salem, Mass.; and Dr. Welsh, the leading physician of Hartford, Conn.

The calamity caused great excitement, and indignation-meetings were held, one at Norwalk, and another at New Haven. The Legislature took the matter into consideration, and adopted a resolution requiring all trains to stop at least one minute before passing any draw.

HON. CLARK BISSELL.

Hon. Clark Bissell was eighth in line from John Bissell, who was born in 1591, and came from England to Plymouth, Mass., in 1626 or 1628, removing from thence to Windsor, Conn., in 1636 or 1637. The traditions are that the ancestors of the Bissells were Huguenots who fled from France about the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew (1572) and settled in Somersetshire, England. There seems to have been a branch in Worcestershire. The name there was sometimes spelled Byssell and Bysell. The family coat-of-arms is thus described in "Burke's Complete Armory": "Gul on a bend or; three escallops sa; crest, a demi-eagle, with wings displayed, sa, charged on the neck with an escallop, sa; ten Lesants,—four, three, two, one."

Clark Bissell was born in Lebanon, Conn., Sept. 7, 1782. He was eldest of three sons. His father was a farmer in straitened circumstances, and was unable to afford his children any further advantages of education than were furnished by the district schools of almost a century ago. With these his eldest son was not content, and, the village clergyman offering to give him instruction if he could get time to learn, the lad obtained Latin and Greek grammars, and, in the intervals of labor, at morning, noon, and night, fitted himself for college. When he went to New Haven to commence his collegiate course, his parents gave him a "homespun" suit of clothes dyed with butter-nut, and made from the fleece by his mother's hands; and this was all they could give him.

Mr. Bissell maintained himself while in college by teaching in the schools about New Haven, and graduated with honor and four hundred dollars in debt. This was in 1806. In the autumn of that year he went to Maryland, and spent about a year there as tutor in the family of a Mr. Singleton, on the Eastern Shore. Returning to Connecticut, he taught school at Saugatuck (now Westport) for another year, pursuing, meanwhile, the study of law under the instruction of Hon. Samuel B. Sherwood. Having succeeded in paying off his debt, he entered the office of Hon. Roger M. Sherman, where he completed his preparation for the bar, and in 1809 was admitted to practice. In June of that year he removed to Norwalk, and the following extract from a letter written by Dr. Jonathan Knight, father of Prof. Knight, of Yale College, will show at once the manners of the times and the auspices under which Mr. Bissell commenced life in Norwalk:

"Mr. Clark Bissell, who was lately licensed as an attorney, came in town yesterday, and lives with me. He has the character of a reputable young man. R. M. Sherman, Esq., with whom he has last studied, has given him letters of recommendation to the civil authorities of the town."

In April, 1811, Mr. Bissell was married to Sally, daughter of Hon. Samuel B. Sherwood. For nearly half a century she was to her husband a loving wife, a faithful companion, and a sympathizing friend. She died Feb. 27, 1856.

Mr. Bissell, by unwearied industry and scrupulous fidelity, rose rapidly in his profession. In 1829 he was sent from Norwalk to the Legislature, and at the session of that year was elected a judge of the Supreme Court of Errors and Superior Court. He occupied this position till 1839, when he resigned, the salary of our highest judicial offices being at that time only about one-third of the income of a respectable lawyer, and entirely inadequate to the support of a growing family. In 1842 and 1843 he represented the Twelfth District in the Senate, and in 1847 and 1848 he was successively elected Governor of the State. While holding this office he accepted the appointment of Kent professor of law in Yale College, the duties of which position he continued to discharge till ill health and advancing infirmities of age compelled him to resign. In 1850 he represented Norwalk in the General Assembly, a controversy concerning the lower shire-town in Fairfield County, to which Norwalk was a party, and which was not terminated till 1853, being then pending. After his retirement from the law school, Mr. Bissell remained at his home in Norwalk, occupying himself mainly in reading and association with his children and grandchildren, till he sank peacefully to rest on Tuesday, Sept. 15, 1857, aged seventy-five years and eight days.

Such is a brief sketch of the life and public services of Governor Bissell. It is not too much to say of him that in every department of duty to which he was called his work was well and faithfully done. As chief magistrate of this Commonwealth his sound judgment, his purity of purpose, his unaffected demeanor, won the confidence and respect of all parties. As a member of our highest court of judicature, his learning, probity, strict impartiality, and uniform courtesy conferred additional lustre upon the dignity of the bench. In the Legislature, though he seldom mingled in debate, yet the breadth and solidity of his views, his good sense, his keen wit,—sparingly but, if needful, effectively used,—always placed him in the first rank. As a lawyer he deserved the high reputation which by common consent was assigned him. He was a most effective advocate before a jury. Ready of speech, earnest and impressive in manner, clear in arrangement, and possessed, withal, of a caustic humor, sometimes playful, but when directed against fraud or falsehood often withering, he had but few equals in forensic discussion. His industry was untiring. He prepared his arguments with great assiduity. He never forgot his client in himself. Those who secured his services were sure of his every honorable effort. And, at the same time, he was faithful to justice. He would not knowingly prosecute a fraudulent or unjust cause. An anecdote illustrating the estimation in which he was held in this respect by those who knew him best is this: An eminent lawyer was retiring from practice; among his clients was one individual a part of whose claim, there was reason to suspect, was tinged with conscious fraud. He went to his counsel and said, "As you are going out of practice, what other lawyer would you advise me to employ?" "Well," was the reply, "I have generally sent my clients to Judge Bissell; but there is this part of your case," and he mentioned the suspicious portion. "If you go to Judge Bissell, you hadn't better say anything to him about this."

His duties in the Law Department of Yale College were discharged with the same fidelity which characterized him in all other relations of life. His lectures to the senior class were of the highest order of that species of intellectual effort. A letter from one of the faculty says, "The lectures which he delivered to the senior class were, in my opinion, the best and most thorough ever given in this country. I wish they might be given to the public."

It is, however, as a citizen and a man that the memory of Governor Bissell is most highly cherished by his fellow-townsmen. For half a century he was ready with heart and hand in every good work. Was there a public improvement required? It was unnecessary to ask his assistance; every one counted on his assistance as a matter of course. Was aid sought for some one in misfortune? It was known beforehand that no meritorious appeal was made to him in vain. Were wise counsels needed in municipal affairs? From no source could they be obtained more surely than from him. And these things were rightly appreciated by the people of Norwalk. The gathering multitude, the closed stores, the suspension of business, the flags drooping at half-mast on the day of his funeral obsequies, testified to the common feeling of a public loss.

Governor Bissell's religious character was a matter peculiarly between his God and himself. He made no parade of piety. For many years a member of the Congregational Church, he adorned his profession with a consistent life and conversation. As a man he possessed the respect of all, the love of many. His integrity was unbending. He never sacrificed principle to expediency. He had no small arts to win popular favor, yet his character was full of winning traits. A defective vision, making it difficult to distinguish even members of his own family at the distance of a few feet, sometimes gave him an air of reserve to those who were unaware of the defect, and who would occasionally meet him without receiving the customary token of recognition; but to those who knew him well there was no reserve about him. To the younger members of his profession he was ever a friend, ready with counsel and kind words of encouragement. To his family he was all that a husband and father could be. In his social intercourse his courteous, unobtrusive manners, his fund of anecdote, his genial humor, made him always a very agreeable companion. He was especially fond of the society of very young persons, and we have heard that in his last sickness, when his mind, wandering from the scenes around him, yielded to the illusions of disease, he fancied he was playing with little children and tossing them in his arms. His memory is the memory of the just, and his rest is with God.

Mr. Bissell was the father of six children,—Samuel B. S., Edward C., George A., Mary E. (Mrs. C. C. Betts), Charlotte Charity (wife of Hon. O. S. Ferry), and Arthur H., who died in infancy.

CHAPTER LV.

NORWALK (Continued).

ECCLESIASTICAL.

First Congregational Church of Norwalk—First Congregational Church of South Norwalk—The Episcopal Church—Baptist Church—The First Methodist Episcopal Church—The Second Methodist Episcopal Church.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF NORWALK.

This church was organized in the year 1652, and as a society separate from the town in 1726. Its history prior to the organization of the society will be found in the town records elsewhere in this work.

The following is a copy of the call for organizing the society apart from the town.*

"To Lt. Matthew Seymond, in Norwalk, Greeting, &c.:

"Pursuant to an act of ye Generall Assembly, passed in October, 1726, entitled an act for directing how societies shall meet and form themselves after other societies are drawn off from them,

"In His Majesty's name you are hereby required to warn all ye inhabitants of ye Prime Ancient Society, in ye township of Norwalk, to meet together on ye first Friday of March next ensuing ye date hereof, at eight of ye clock in ye morning, then and there to act any thing proper and lawful for them to act when so met together.

"JOSEPH PLATT,

"Justice It.

"Dated at Norwalk, Feb. ye 27, Annoque Domini, 1726-77."

The society met and made choice of "ye Worshipful Joseph Platt, Esq.," as moderator.

At the same meeting it was voted that measures should at once be taken to supply "ye vacancy of our pulpit:":

"The society, considering ye awful frowns of heaven upon them for months past, and are still obvious, concludes it their incumbent duty to set apart a day for the humbling and abasing their souls before the Lord by fasting and prayer for redress, by their major vote do appoint Wednesday, ye 15th of this instant March, for that solemnity; and desire Rev. Mr. Davenport, Mr. Cook, Mr. Sackett, Mr. Hauley, and Mr. Sturgeon to grant us their presence and assistance in carrying on ye work of sd day."

Mr. Buckingham's rate due last year voted to be paid as heretofore, "any act of ye town to ye contrary notwithstanding."

The following extracts from the society records are given as showing the action taken at various times upon such subjects as came up for consideration:

"March 16, 1726. The society determines to have an Association Quorum, at least of ye Ministers of this county called, and to associate with us on Wednesday ye 23d of this instant, March, to advise, direct, and guide us in ye weighty affair before us."

"March 23, 1726. According to adjournment ye society met. The Revd Mr. Cook, Mr. Chapman, Mr. Sackett, & Mr. Hauley associated with the society.

* Extracts from Dr. Edwin Hall's Norwalk.

"The society, by major vote, desires ye Revd. Association to give them an answer to ye following question, viz., Whether it be proper or expedient that the Revd Mr. Buckingham be introduced into ye work of ye ministry in this society or not."

"The Prime Ancient Society in Norwalk moving this question for resolution to us ye subscribers associated at their desire in Norwalk, March 23, 1726-27, viz., Whether, &c.—We are of opinion that inasmuch as ye Revd Mr. Buckingham hath resigned his pastoral charge here, considering ye distressed circumstances of ye place, and that under the countenance of ye late Council in this place, who also have signified themselves persuaded that the interest of religion and edification of souls are the great ends of ye Gospel ministry, and sorrowfully affected with the consideration of those ends in this place being greatly obstructed and disadvantaged, We are of opinion that it is not proper or expedient that the sd Revd. Mr. Buckingham be introduced into ye work of ye ministry in this society, for ye reasons above alleged.

"There was nominated by some persons in the meeting, viz., Mr. John Curtice of Wethersfield, Mr. Gilbert Tenant in ye Jersey, Mr. Dunbar of Boston, and Mr. Chauncey, Jr., of Hadley; and ye Society craved of the Revd. Association their particular direction concerning them, or any other that they shall see meet to direct to us as a person to be applied to, with an invitation to a probationary improvement among us in ye ministry."

"We ye subscribers associate at Norwalk, March 23, 1726-27, being applied to by ye Prime Ancient Society in sd Norwalk for advice and direction, &c. . . . We are of opinion that as to Mr. Tenant now in the improvement in ye ministry in the New Jersey, it may not be so proper to make application to him for the supply of a vacancy here for this reason, viz., Because ye paucity of Gospel labourers in those parts; which requires us rather to wish their increase than to take any methods for ye decrease of their numbers; especially considering our ministry from time to time earnestly solicited to send Gospel labourers into those parts, more than we have been capable of supplying them with; and do advise that this society would soon as may be, endeavor to inform themselves whether there may be a probability of obtaining Mr. Dunbar of Boston; and upon such a probability attained, to make application to him for ye purpose afore sd; and if there shall not be a probability of obtaining the sd Mr. Dunbar, we advise that the society make application either to ye said Mr. Curtice or Mr. Chauncey, as upon consulting the ministers next neighbouring either of them, they may be encouraged.

"May 10, 1727. The Society . . . determines to send a meet person to Mr. Chauncey Jr. of Hadley, as upon consulting ye ministers neighbouring to him he may be encouraged; and in case Mr. Chauncey cannot be obtained, then to apply himself to ye sd ministers for advice to some other suitable person to apply to, and that he do his utmost endeavor to obtain one according to such direction, or to act about ye whole according to the best of his discretion, to supply ye vacancy in our pulpit, at least for a probationary improvement in the ministry among us.

" . . . Mr. James Brown to proceed upon ye business as above expressed."

"June 26, 1727. The Society by major vote agree to give the Revd. Mr. Moses Dickinson a call to supply the vacancy in our pulpit.

" . . . Made choice of Capt. Joseph Platt, Esq., to go to ye Revd. Gentleman, and endeavor to obtain him pursuant to sd vote.

"Made choice of Mr. John Bartlett, Capt. Joseph Platt, and Mr. Thos. Fitch Junr, to provide for, & to treat with ye sd gentleman when he comes."

"July 19, 1727. The Society having had report made from ye late Committee of ye circumstances of ye Revd. Mr. Moses Dickinson, who hath been with us upon a probationary improvement, with which report they are well satisfied as to the gentleman's circumstances; and do hereby give the sd Revd. Gentleman a call to ye work of ye ministry among us; provided ye Revd. Elders now convened in this place give their approbation therunto, voted in ye affirmative 75, Contra 39."

"The society determines to move to the Rev. Elders for a resolve respecting the circumstances of ye Revd. Mr. Dickinson, and whether they advise to the call above sd.

"There being severall persons of this Society under scruples respecting the relation they stand in to ye Revd. Mr. Buckingham, that is to say, whether the said gentleman be regularly discharged from his pastoral relation to ye Chh. and people of this place; the Society taking this matter into consideration, do move to ye Revd. Elders convened, that they would give their opinion in the premises, that such persons may receive satisfaction in that matter."

"July 20, 1727. The society receiving from ye Revd. Elders associated, an answer to ye foregoing matter of scruple, and it was read off as followeth:

"A Quorum of Fairfield Association Occasionally convened in Norwalk July 19th, 1727.

"Whereas it is Signified to us from ye records of ye Society that there are several persons of this Society under Scruples respecting the relation they stand in to ye Revd. Mr. Buckingham. That is to say whether ye said Gentleman be Regularly Discharged from his pastoral Relation to ye Church and people of this place, and that our opinion in this case is desired.

"In answer whereunto we Declare this to be our Opinion that the Revd. Mr. Buckingham hath been regularly Discharged from his pastoral Relation to ye Church and people of this place: And offer upon it as followeth; viz. (1) The Condition of this Church and people hath been for a considerable time grievously perplex'd & Divided; whereof a very great part have been so distanced in affection from their late pastor, that the Cure of it after a Considerable time of Tryall, hath appeared even to be Despaired of; Whereas also it appeared to us, that Saving Ends of ye Gospel Ministry here may not generally be attained, which in ye Judgment of late Counsel and in our Opinion is Cause Justifying ye pastor's Resigning his pastoral Office, as to ye Exercise of it in ye place of his Improvement; We propose the following Scriptures to be well Considered. Ephe. 4: 11, 12, Our ascended Lord gave ye gifts of ye Ministry to men for ye Edifying ye Body of Christ: Where ye Edifying ye Body is expressly Set down as a main End of Gospel Ministry. Now the principle End being Generally Obstructed, and that after a Convenient Time of Waiting, may be well interpreted as a call from above to ye Minister that hath been improved, Humbly to yield himself to ——— that Christ our Lord and ye interest of immortal Souls may increase and flourish; John 3d, 30th. We have also considered James 3d, 16th, Where envying and strife is, there Confusion and every evil work. Now this we have thought ye Malancholly Condition of this Place; & have been Ready to account the Method of ye Council in their late Doings accepting ye Revd. Gentleman's Resignation, & supplying the Sanction of their authority thereunto to be a proper and probable Remedy of ye unhappy Distemper of this place. (2) The Revd. Mr. Buckingham, as we understand, appearing in the late Council, affected with ye sorrowful state of ye place and ye improbability of his future service here, Did Seriously, Solemnly, & willingly resign his pastoral Relation to ye Church and people of the place; which was in his power to Do so far as Concerns an act of his. And the said Resignation being willingly made by him, we apprehend no injury Done him, because an injury to a willing mind cannot be Done. We propose John 3d, 30th, he must increase, but I must Decrease. Which example of that Great man, than whom a greater was not Born of Women, We do understand presidential even to ye ministers of ye Gospel in our Times, when this continuing in the exercise the Gospel ministry may be justly thought to interfere with the General Spiritual good of Precious Souls.

"3. The Resignation of ye Revd. Mr. Buckingham in ye presence of ye society's cou'ttee, before ye council, ye authority whereof we suppose not proper for ye good people of this place to question, who have come into our ecclesiastical constitution and accepted our articles of administering Chh. discipline; yet for ye satisfaction of any of our people of this place, we mention ye fifteenth Chapter of ye Acts; and thence observe, that ye council at Jerusalem (ye pattern for Chh. councils in Gospel times) in the difficulties that had arisen, in ye church of Antioch, &c, did undertake to determine that difference, in authoritative way. Acts 15: 2. 'To whom we gave no such commandment.' Now commandment is a word necessarily implying authority—see also verse 28. 'It seemed good to ye Holy Ghost & to us to lay no greater burden,' &c, which expression to us implies authority, carrying an obligation in it on ye Chh. and people that apply to ye council, see also verse 29; 'From which if ye keep yourselves ye shall do well,' whence followeth yt ye Chh., which applied to the council at Jerusalem, if they did not observe the order of council, they should not do well, for that ye conclusion of council were ye highest authority, not to be controlled or disputed.

"4. The Resignation of ye Revd. Mr. Buckingham being authorized by his proper judges, that is to say, ye council of ye elders & Chhs. of this county, the bond of his relation to this society, as pastor, is dissolved & ceaseth (whereupon it followeth that ye band of ye relation of this Chh. and every member thereof to ye said Mr. Buckingham, their late pastor, is also dissolved and ceaseth).

"Unto ye above we only add as ye Rev. Mr. Buckingham hath formally declared himself willing to be directed by ye ministers of this county, now then as we account it on his part a good observance of order, for the future to forbear the exercise of ye pastoral office, to say, preaching and administering any sacraments in this place, so also, ye good & Christian people of this place will, in our opinion, show themselves men of order to contribute their part to such a direction of our association.

"Our thoughts in relation to ye mention of this society to the Revd. Mr. Moses Dickinson, we offer as followeth, vizt.

"That we are all glad of an opportunity now to signify the great respect and value we have for ye Revd. Mr. Moses Dickinson, and the satisfying prospect we have of his well answering ye necessities of this destitute society, and with all cheerfulness assure ye good people thereof, of our good approbation of this society's having their eyes upon the Revd. and valuable gentleman for ye work of ye ministry here, whensoever it appears to us that ye condition or proviso of ye Presbytery releasing him from a pastoral relation to ye people of Maidenhead, &c, appears absolutely & in fact to be by judgment of that Presbytery completed.

"A true copy.

"SAMUEL COOK,

"The society by a vote of Eighty eight, none appearing in the negative, do invite and call ye Revd. gentleman to ye work and labor of ye ministry among them.

"Agreed and concluded to defray the charge of transportation of ye sd Mr. Dickinson and family, whensoever he may be obtained to move unto us."

A committee appointed for this purpose and to provide a house, etc.

"... Appointed ye Worshipfull Joseph Platt, Esq. to attend ye Revd. Mr. Dickinson home into ye Jersey, and also to endeavour the obtaining from ye Revd. Presbytery there, the Revd. Mr. Dickinson's discharge from ye Chh. and people of Maidenhead."

On the society book is recorded at length the minutes of the Fairfield Association, in a meeting at Wilton, Aug. 29, 1727, in which they approve of the doings of the council at Norwalk; and, it appearing that Mr. Dickinson was now dismissed by his Presbytery, the association advise the society of Norwalk to repeat their call, which they did in full form on Nov. 1, 1727.

"Jan. 10, 1727-28. The society grants ten pounds to Mr. James Brown for his service at ye General Court, in answering ye memorial against the select men, preferred at Now Haven in October last to the General Court by Mr. Stephen Buckingham. Also granted 20s. to Lieut. Samuel Cooatock, which he paid to Mr. Fowler, lawyer, to assist in ye cause above said.

"May 10, 1728. Made choice of Joseph Platt, Esq. to represent the inhabitants of ye said society, to answer ye memorial of Mr. Stephen Buckingham. Made choice of Thomas Fitch, Esq., Mr. James Brown, and John Copp, committee to prepare what is needful to be sent to Capt. Platt, who is now at ye said Assembly, by a safe hand, if such can be obtained, or else to send a man directly from hence to Capt. Platt.

"At a meeting of ye Prime ancient Society of ye Town of Norwalk, convened May 7, 1729. . . . Made choice of Mr. James Brown and Thos. Fitch, Esq. to appear in behalf of the society at the General Court, to be held at Hartford this present month; there to answer a Petition exhibited to sd court against the town of Norwalk by the Revd. Mr. Stephen Buckingham.

"The society impowers Mr. James Brown (that if he finds ye above named Mr. Fitch engaged on ye petitioner's side) to employ or improve (if he see it needful) an attorney at Hartford to aid and assist him in ye premises."

"Dec. 22, 1729. The society, by major vote, determines that a receipt from under the hand of ye Revd. Mr. Carter, brought by any of ye Church of England in this society (so declaring themselves, and intending as ye law in that case mentions), for so much paid him as he or they are

* At a General Assembly held in Hartford, May, 1727, it was enacted, . . . That, "If it so happen that there be a society of the Church of England where there is a person in orders according to the Canons of the Church of England settled and abiding among them, and performing divine service, so near to any person that hath declared himself of the assess by this society in the minister's rate of said society; which receipt or receipts, so delivered to ye collector of the minister's rate, shall be a sufficient discharge to ye said collector as if gathered by said collector and paid the said Mr. Coker, and thereby obtained his receipt for the same."

"At a meeting of ye Prime Society* in Norwalk with the Professors of the Church of England inhabitants of said society, legally warned and being convened at ye old school-house in said society, Feb. 2, 1746-47 . . . Grant a rate of one penny the pound on all polls and ratable estate of all the inhabitants within ye limits of said society, towards completing ye town-house; said house to be improved for school society's meetings of ye inhabitants in said society, as pr grant of ye town at their last annual meeting."

"Dec. 14, 1747. Voted, that Saml. Fitch, Esq., shall sit in ye pew next ye pulpit stairs, with the rest of ye authority."

"Dec. 17, 1750. Determine to glaze the meeting-house with sash-glass 7 & 9 inches . . . A committee appointed to perform the same; and are impowered to sell and dispose of ye glass and lead belonging to ye windows, in order to purchase glass and other materials for ye same."

"At a meeting of the Prime Ancient Society in Norwalk, assembled Dec. 25, 1751. . . . The society by vote manifest their willingness that his Honor the Governor should choose any place in ye meeting-house to erect a pew for himself and family. Ye society send 3 men to treat with his Honor in the affair."

"At the same meeting, ye said society grants the head of two fore seats in the meeting-house, on ye women's side, to erect a pew for his Honor the Governor to sit in; which is left to the discretion of David Benedict, Doct. Uriah Rogers, and Mr. Joseph Platt, a committee appointed to build said pew at ye society's charge."

"Dec. 10, 1755. The society by vote desire the Justices to remove and sit in the pew with their wives!"

At the same meeting the society desire the committee appointed to erect the Governor's pew to do what they shall think proper to adorn the pew where the Governor now sits, in lieu of building a pew.

In February, 1761, the society, with the concurrence of Mr. Dickinson, voted to take measures to procure Church of England, that he can conveniently and doth attend the public worship there, then the collector, having first indifferently levied the tax as aforesaid, shall deliver the taxes collected of such persons declaring their elves, and attending as aforesaid, unto the minister of the Church of England living near unto such persons; which minister shall have full power to receive and recover the same, in order to his support in the place assign'd to him."

The same act gave power to any society of the Church of England to levy on themselves greater taxes at their own discretion for the support of their minister.

"And the parishioners of the Church of England, attending as aforesaid, are hereby excused from paying any taxes for the building meeting houses for the present established churches of this government."

The General Assembly held at Hartford, May 8, 1727, enacted "That where there are such dissenters as are commonly called Quakers, who do attend the worship of God in such way as is allowed by said act [in the 7th of Queen Anne, A. D. 1708] within this colony, or are so situated that they may and do attend the service out of the limits of this government in any such meeting aforesaid, and shall produce a certificate from such a society of their having joined themselves to them, and that they do belong unto their society, that he or they shall be excused from contributing to the support of the established ministry, and from contributing or paying any tax levied for the building any meeting-house or houses in the society where they dwell."

The General Assembly held at New Haven, Oct. 9, 1729, also granted, "That for the future the same privilege and exemption from the charges aforesaid as was granted by this Assembly in May last unto the people called Quakers is hereby allowed unto them [the people called Baptists] under the like regulations, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

"At this time," says Prof. Kingsley, "there were in Connecticut but two or three congregations of Episcopalians and two of Baptists, all of which were small, and no congregation of Quakers."

* The schools were managed by the Prime Ancient Society; their votes concerning districts, school-houses, &c., at their annual meetings being put on record from time to time.

a colleague; provided that means for the support of such colleague could be furnished by subscription, without laying any burden upon the society as such. In March report was made to the society that such subscriptions were furnished.

Mr. Tennent having preached some Sabbaths on probation, the society, by vote, unanimously invited him to settle as colleague with Mr. Dickinson, Nov. 13, 1764.

"Dec. 17, 1764. Thomas Hamford appointed to collect Mr. Leaming's rate."

Mr. Tennent wished to retain his connection with the Presbytery, which the society, by mutual understanding, allowed, provided Mr. Tennent should "unite with us and with the Association in the Ecclesiastical constitution of the colony." The Presbytery, however, understood it otherwise, and appointed a time and a committee of their own for the installation. Whereupon, June 12, 1765, after a suitable preamble, the society voted thus:

"This society, by a copy from the minutes of the Presbytery, are informed that Mr. Tennent declared his acceptance of the call of the society, upon condition that he shall still continue a member of the synod of New York and Philadelphia, and of New Brunswick Presbytery; . . . but at the same time professed his desire and intention to hold communion, and be in connection, with the Revd. association aforesaid, as far as is consistent with his continuing in his relation to said synod; and that thereupon the said Presbytery had presumed that this church and society complied with the condition annexed by Mr. Tennent, to his acceptance of their call (which was made on very different terms); and accordingly have assumed to themselves a right to appoint and did appoint the time of installment, and a committee of their own to officiate therein. On consideration of all which, this society is of opinion, that the annexing the condition aforesaid to the acceptance of the call aforesaid, is a proposal subversive of the foundation on which the agreement and proceedings of the society were predicated; and the proceedings of the Presbytery in consequence thereof is an attempt to draw the church and society off from the constitution in which they are united, and to lead them to renounce the relations they stand in, and esteem it so sacred to be violated; and do also view such appointment of the time and persons for installment, as an imposition on the society; and therefore is to be treated with neglect. Therefore, the society do declare, that they cannot comply with the aforesaid conditions and appointment; but are obliged to look on Mr. Tennent's annexing such embarrassment to his acceptance, tantamount to a denial of the invitation made him, etc., etc."

In consequence of this the society appointed a committee to rent the house and land which they had purchased as a parsonage for the colleague pastor. An explanation followed: Mr. Tennent declared that he never expected or intended that the society should be under the power of the Presbytery; and signified his readiness to accept the call, if this explanation should prove satisfactory. Whereupon the society voted their approval and desired his settlement, adding, in their vote, June 19, 1765, that "Nevertheless, it is expected, that before his installment, a certificate be produced from the Revd. Presbytery aforesaid, of Mr. Tennent's being released from them, agreeably to the tenor of the above proposals, in order to make way for a regular settlement here, and a full union with the association here, on the constitution of this colony."

"Dec. 16, 1765. Nathan Burwell, Jr., to collect Mr. Leaming's rate."

"Dec. 1766. Ebenezer Church to collect Mr. Leaming's rate."

"Dec. 14, 1767. Gould Hoyt chosen collector of Mr. Leaning's last year's rate, likewise for the present year's rate.

"Dec. 20, 1768. Asa Hoyt chosen collector of ye Church of England professors.

"Dec. 11, 1769. Garner Olmsted to collect of the Church of England professors.

"Dec. 10, 1770. John Saunders to collect Mr. Leaning's rate.

"Dec. 15, 1771. Matthew Reed, collector of Mr. Leaning's rate.

"Dec. 21, 1772. Mirajah Nash chosen to collect Mr. Leaning's rate (afterwards excused and Isaac Camp chosen in his room).

"Dec. 13, 1773. Garner Olmsted chosen collector of tax on ye professors of ye Church of England.

"Dec. 14, 1774. Garner Olmsted collector of ye professors of ye Church of England.

"Dec. 11, 1775. Daniel Church collector of ye professors of ye Church of England.

"Dec. 9, 1776. Saml. White chosen collector of ye Church of England Professors.

"Dec. 8, 1777. Barnabas Merwine Collector of ye Church of England professors.

"Dec. 11, 1778. John Saunders collector of Mr. Leaning's rate."

Before the next annual meeting the town was burnt by the British, and Rev. Mr. Leaning retired with the invaders to their fleet.

"Dec. 11, 1769. Put to vote, whether the society will repair the meeting house according to the report of those persons desired to view the same; that is to say, to put on a new roof, and new side the house, and to make new window frames, so far as should be necessary. Passed in the affirmative."

"Dec. 15, 1771. The committee heretofore appointed to repair the meeting house, are requested to do the same in the month of May next, etc. . . . and then to colour ye sd house."

"Jan. 8, 1772. Whereas the Rev. Mr. Treat, of New York, applied to the committee of this society, desiring them to call the society together, that he might inform them that a call is presented to the Rev. Mr. Tenment in Charles Town in South Carolina, and to acquaint the society with the reasons for the application made to Mr. Tenment, and also to know whether the society will concur with Mr. Tenment in calling a council to deliberate upon the affairs of the call; and also further signified that it was the earnest desire of the Revd Mr. Tenment that the society should be convened for the purpose aforesaid; and whereas the society being now convened in consequence of sd requests; and the Revd. Mr. Treat having informed this meeting of the call from sd church in Charles Town, &c.

"The question was put whether this society will concur with the Revd. Mr. Tenment in calling a council for the purpose aforesd. The society having taken these matters into consideration, and seriously deliberated upon them, are of opinion, that as there doth not appear any cause arising in the society, or any matter subsisting between Mr. Tenment and the society that makes it necessary or expedient for the society to desire a council, Therefore the society Resolve the above question in the negative."

"Jan. 11, 1772. Whereas the Consociation of the Western District of Fairfield County, now met in this society to consider and determine a case of no less importance than the expediency of the Rev. Mr. Tenment's dismission from the pastoral relation to this church and society, in consequence of a call, etc. . . . have notified this society of sd meeting, so that they may have an opportunity to be heard if they have anything to offer in the case. . . . Voted and agreed by this society that the reasons offered for Mr. Tenment's dismission are altogether insufficient, etc. . . . and that they are entirely against Mr. Tenment's being dismissed, and do not consent to the sd Mr. Tenment's dismission from us; and that a copy of this vote be presented to sd council specially, to signify our minds in ye aforesaid case."

"Jan. 22, 1772. [The society considering at length the reasons offered by the Consociation; and] Having seriously weighed the several matters and proceedings with the effects and consequences which may probably follow a non-compliance, are of opinion that considering the same, and the steps taken to effect it, has rendered Mr. Tenment's usefulness in this society much less than it otherwise might have been, if not altogether at an end, Therefore, in compliance with his earnest request, and in deference to the opinion and advice of the venerable Council, etc. . . . do signify that if he desires the council to be convened, or shall convene the same for their approbation thereof, or for his discharge from any other relation or connexions, this society has nothing to object."

In October, 1773, Mr. Cotton was employed to preach till the next annual meeting, and on Dec. 13, 1773, "the committee appointed to look out for another minister to preach on probation are desired to return the society's thanks to Mr. Cotton for his good service here, and to pay him honorably for the same."

Dec. 6, 1776, Mr. Kittletass was preaching here. May 11, 1778, the society voted to invite Mr. Fenn to preach; in December, 1778, to invite Mr. Robinson. April, 1780, the committee were directed to hire Mr. Mourdoek; Aug. 27, 1782, to invite Mr. Tullar; Dec. 9, 1782, voted that Mr. Tullar shall be invited to settle here as a minister in this society; but Dec. 26, 1782, this vote was reconsidered and made void, "by reason there were but few people at the former meeting."

Sept. 5, 1783, desired the committee to invite Mr. William Lockwood to preach in the society. June 17, 1784, Mr. Spalding had been employed, and was desired to preach two or three months longer. Dec. 13, 1781, the committee were directed to invite Mr. Sherman to preach on probation.

Second Tuesday in October, 1785, the society called Rev. Mr. Burnet to be their minister, to be installed "on the second day of November next."

MINISTERS.

Thomas Hanford began to preach in 1652; ordained in 1654, and died in 1696, after laboring in the ministry here forty-one years.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The Episcopal Church of St. Paul's Parish was incorporated in 1737, and a small building erected, which was afterwards converted into a parsonage, and a larger one, fifty-five by forty feet, erected in 1743. In 1779 this was burnt, together with the town of Norwalk, by Gen. Tryon; but in 1780, when the people had been impoverished and scattered by this disaster and the removal of their pastor, the parish erected a temporary church edifice, and in 1785 rebuilt upon the former foundation. The building was consecrated by Bishop Seabury. In 1849 the society unanimously resolved to build the edifice now erected, seventy-seven by fifty-five feet; tower projecting nine feet; vestry in the rear, nine feet; height of the steeple, one hundred and fifty feet.

The following is a list of the clergy who have officiated in this parish since its incorporation: 1737, Rev. Henry Caner, a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; 1738, Rev. Richard Caner; 1749, Rev. John Ogilvie; 1751, Rev. John Fowle; 1756, Rev. Dr. Dibble, of Stamford; 1758, Rev. Dr. Jeremiah Leaming, who was removed by Gen. Tryon in 1779; 1780, Rev. Dr. Dibble, of Stamford; 1781, Rev. John Bowden, D.D.; 1789, Rev. Mr. Foot; 1790, Rev. George Ogilvie; 1797, Rev. William Smith, D.D.; 1800, Rev. Henry Whitlock; 1811, Rev. Bethel Judd; 1813, Rev. Mr. Johnson; 1814, Rev. Bethel Judd; 1816, Rev. Reuben Sherwood; 1830, Rev. Mr. Atwater; 1833, Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D.; 1835, Rev. James C. Richmond; 1836, Rev. William Cooper Mead, D.D. The present pastor is Rev. C. M. Selleck.

THE NORWALK BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was organized Aug. 31, 1837, in the First Congregational church, the council being composed of delegates from the churches in Weston, Danbury, Stamford, Stratfield, and Redding. The first officers of the church were: Deacons, Noah Weed, Andrew Turney; Clerk, Alonzo C. Arnold. The first pastor was Rev. William H. Card. The constituent members were Noah Weed, William Wakeman, Andrew Turney, Josiah Raymond, Jr., Alonzo C. Arnold, Mrs. Abby Fitch, Mrs. Betsey Gaylor, Mrs. Eliza Mills, Mrs. Sarah Stephens, Mrs. Catharine Fitch, Mrs. Charity Smallhorn, Mrs. Mary Knapp, Miss Emily Knapp, Miss Hannah Knapp, Miss Julia Burchard.

The church edifice was commenced in the spring of 1839, and dedicated March 11, 1840.

Name and term of service of each pastor: 1838-39, Rev. William H. Card; 1840-47, Rev. James J. Woolsey; 1847-50, Rev. J. Chaplin; 1850-51, Rev. N. Boughton; 1851-53, Rev. J. J. Woolsey; 1853-56, Rev. William C. Ulyat; 1856-59, Rev. L. D. Gowen; 1859-61, Rev. George W. Lasher; 1861-73, Rev. O. W. Gates; 1873, Rev. E. D. Bentley.

The present officers are: Pastor, Rev. E. D. Bentley; Deacons, A. Ambler, D. M. Fallow, C. P. Turney, R. A. Fallow, and S. Arlington; Clerk, J. L. Ambler; Treasurer, R. A. Fallow; Prudential Committee, pastor, deacons, and clerk. The number of present members is two hundred and fifty-four.

The church was originally composed in part of members of the Milton Baptist Church, which disbanded at the time this church was organized. It worshiped for a time in the academy, then standing on the green, afterwards in the town-house, until their church edifice was dedicated, in 1840. The pastorates of Revs. Woolsey, Gowen, and Gates were those in which the church made the most progress.

In 1870 the church building was entirely renovated and remodelled inside, and refurnished, the repairs costing about fourteen thousand dollars. The Sunday-school has a membership of two hundred and twenty-five, and has been fifteen years under the superintendency of J. L. Ambler.

FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH NORWALK.

The first Methodist sermon was preached in this place in 1787 by a young minister named Cornelius Cook, but Methodism was formally introduced into Norwalk—as, indeed, in New England—by Jesse Lee. Stevens, in his "History of Methodism," says, "On the 17th June, 1789, Jesse Lee preached his first sermon in New England at Norwalk, Conn." He was denied the use of either house or barn for this purpose; so, taking his stand on the public highway, under an apple-tree and surrounded by about twenty hearers, he says, "I preached on John iii. 7: 'Ye must be born again.'" In his diary he wrote, "After preaching I told the people that I intended being with them again in two weeks. Who knows but I shall yet have a place in this town where I may lay my head?"

The organization of a church occurred in 1790, and the services were held in the old red school-house that stood on the site now occupied by the store of Nash Brothers. Here a remarkable revival occurred in 1816. In this year the society felt strong enough to erect its first house of worship, on the site of the present church. This building remained until 1843, when a new one was substituted for it, capable of holding about four hundred and fifty persons, and in 1856 was enlarged, and is the one now occupied by the society.

One name stands conspicuous among the early members of the church,—viz., that of Absalom Day, a man of unusual ability. Devoted to all the interests of the church, he served it with great fidelity and success. Gideon Wilcox was also a prominent member and officer of the church in its early days, and gave to it three sons,—Noah, William, and Matthew, who each served the church faithfully and well.

Norwalk continued as a part of a circuit, served by two or more itinerant ministers, each preaching in regular turn, until 1834. Among these were Elijah Hebbard, Abram S. Francis, and others. The pastors that have served the church since it became a station are as follows: 1834, Luther Mead; 1835-36, Davis Stocking; 1837-38, Josiah L. Dickerson; 1839, Cyrus Foss; 1840, William Thatcher; 1841, Gad N. Smith; 1842, L. C. Cheney; 1843-44, Harvey Husted; 1845-46, William C. Hoyt; 1847, Jacob Shaw; 1848-49, Buel Goodsell; 1850-51, S. W. King; 1852-53, Morris Hill; 1854, L. A. Nickerson; 1855-56, F. Botome; 1857, George C. Crevy; 1858-59, Hart F. Pease; 1860-61, J. J. Woolley; 1862-63, Albert Nash; 1864-65, L. P. Perry; 1866-68, W. H. Simonson; 1869-71,

D. A. Goodsell; 1872-73, W. H. Thomas; 1874, F. P. Tower; 1875-77, W. H. Simonson (second term); 1878, W. H. Boole; 1879-80, J. V. Saunders, the present pastor.

Among the membership who have taken a deep interest in and rendered substantial aid to the church was the late Mr. Ebenezer Hill, who long and faithfully ministered to the temporal and spiritual welfare of the church until called to his heavenly reward, in the year 1875.

There is connected with the church a flourishing Sunday-school, of which Thomas I. Raymond is the superintendent. It has fifty-one officers and teachers, two hundred and eighty scholars, and four hundred and twenty-five books in its library.

Since the organization of the church three others have been formed from it,—viz., the Second Methodist Episcopal Church, at Norwalk, the Third Methodist Episcopal Church, at Rowayton, and the Fourth Methodist Episcopal Church, at East Norwalk, each of which, like the parent church, is in a flourishing condition. Thus, if ninety-three years ago Methodism was planted in Norwalk by the hand and heart of Jesse Lee, every door barred against him, and only the highway to receive him, it has grown and flourished until now it has four churches, over one thousand members, and an equal number of Sunday-school children. The prophecy of the old pioneer of Methodism has been fulfilled when almost a century ago he wrote, "Who knows but I may yet have a place in this town where I may lay my head?" for, were his return to earth a possible event, he would see that he had not labored in vain.

SECOND METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Although the congregation had met as an organization for some time previous to 1861, with Dr. Asa Hill, local elder, as preacher, it appeared for the first time on the minutes for that year, when the first Conference preacher was sent to them. No more definite history of the organization or of the first officers appears on record, nor any account of the number of members.

The church building was erected in 1860, and dedicated December 6th of that year by Bishop James. The pastors have been: 1861-62, Nathaniel Mead; 1863-65, Samuel H. Smith; 1866-68, John S. Breckuridge; 1869-72, I. Simmons; 1873, John Pegg, Jr.;

1874-76, Robert H. Jones; 1877-78, C. S. Williams; 1879 to date, C. S. Wing.

The above is all the information given by the meagre and miserably-kept church records. From other sources I have gathered the following:

Among the first members were Augusta Ambler, Eliza J. Ambler, Gerardus P. Adams, Sarah L. Adams, William S. Atherton, Mariette Atherton, John Austin, Samuel R. Bunting, Margaret Bunting, George T. Brady, Susan Brady, Theodore Brush, Cebelia Brush, David Betts, Jonathan Betts, Ann E. Betts, Addison Brown, Cordelia Brown, Oscar S. Brown, Clarissa M. Brown, Elizabeth Brotherton, Cynthia E. Beers, Rebecca A. Beers, Sherman Cole, Susan Cole, Eliza Cole, Mary A. Crowe, Eliza J. Chinery, Amanda Cook, Zilla A. Denney, George W. Downs, Daniel Fitch, Sarah E. Fitch, Rebecca Fitch, Edwin W. Fitch, Elmira Fitch, Ann E. Fitch, Susan Finney, Bradley Gilbert, Hannah Gilbert, Horace S. Gibbs, Asa Hill, Susan Hill, Zalmon Hoyt, Emily Hoyt, Garrett Haulenbeck, Catherine Haulenbeck, Edgar Jennings, Mary Jennings, Jemima Kellogg, Albert Morehouse, Laura B. Morehouse, Louise Morehouse, Sarah E. Mosier, Elizabeth Murray, Leah Murray, Caroline Murray, Silas B. Mecker, Rosina A. Mecker, Elizabeth Merrill, Mary E. Nash, David W. Nash, Eliza A. Nash, George Nash, Betsey Platt, Platt Price, Eliza A. Price, Joseph B. Scribner, Harriet Scribner, Mary F. Selleck, Phoebe A. Selleck, Lucretia Smith, Esther A. Westerfield, William B. Warren, and Sarah A. Warren. The present membership is five hundred and thirteen.

There is also a flourishing Roman Catholic Church, but we have been unable to obtain any material for its history.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

DUDLEY P. ELY.

Dudley P. Ely, of South Norwalk, Conn., was born in Simsbury, Hartford Co., Conn., Nov. 16, 1817, and was the youngest child of Benjamin Ely, a farmer in comfortable circumstances and a prominent man. He has a well-authenticated genealogy showing him of French ancestry. Richard Ely, his forefather, was the first American of the name. His great-uncle, Daniel Ely, was colonel in the American army during the Revolutionary war, and had the French coat of arms engraved on his sword hilt, undoubtedly to gratify a feeling of pride in his lineage. Mr. Ely descends on his mother's side from Bigot Eggleston, who was born in England about 1580, and came to America in 1630. He landed at Dorchester, Mass., and remained there until 1635, when he, with a company of sixty, removed to Windsor, Conn., and made the first settlement in Connecticut. In the records of the town of Windsor it is recorded that "He d. Sept. 1, 1674, nere 100 yeres of age."

Mr. Ely attended common school until he was about fourteen years old, when he was sent to Hartford, where he received two years' tuition at the school of Mr. Olney, the author of Olney's geography.

When he had completed his education he was not content to follow farming, but, as all his brothers had done, and despite all efforts and influence to persuade him otherwise, he resolved to leave home and take his chances for success. He first obtained employment in a store in his native town, which position he filled for about a year and a half, and then, being but a few months over eighteen years of age, he was engaged by a Mr. Toby to take the entire charge of a store in West Hartland, Conn., where he remained a year. Having fulfilled his engagement with Mr. Toby, Mr. Ely next turned his mind toward the great metropolis, and Jan. 13, 1837, found him in New York City. He went into the employ of his brother, Nathan C. Ely, as book-keeper, which position he filled four years, when he became his partner. Previous to this Mr. Ely had received no pecuniary aid from any source other than his salary. When he became partner with his brother he received, unsolicited, from his father two hundred and fifty dollars. Though unexpected, it was fully appreciated, and proved a kind help to him, and he has never forgotten this act of kindness. (This amount was accounted for in the settlement of his father's estate many years afterwards.) This was the only pecuniary aid he ever received other than usual mercantile credit.

He remained in partnership with his brother for several years, when, that gentleman retiring, Mr. Ely associated with him two gentlemen from Boston. He shortly after purchased their interests and conducted the business alone till 1867, when he ceased his connection therewith. Although he has passed through many panics and financial crises, he never failed to meet his obligations at maturity, and never asked special favors of his creditors. He was a heavy loser by the Rebellion, his losses thereby amounting to over $50,000.

Nov. 28, 1844, Mr. Ely married Miss Charlotte W., daughter of Jeffery O. Phelps, of Simsbury, Conn., a most estimable lady, who lived about fourteen years thereafter, and bore five children, all girls. She died Oct. 3, 1858, in Brooklyn.

Mr. Ely's father-in-law, Judge Phelps, was an officer in the war of 1812, and well known throughout the State. He died in 1879, aged eighty-eight years.

Mr. Ely removed to South Norwalk May 1, 1861.

April 25, 1865, Mr. Ely was elected President of the First National Bank of South Norwalk. He still holds the office.

Since Mr. Ely became a resident of South Norwalk he has held various offices of trust and honor. When the village of Old Well was transformed into the city of South Norwalk, he was elected mayor, and twice re-elected, and, after a time, was again elected, and re-elected, thus serving five terms. He is at the present time President of the First National Bank, President of the Norwalk Gas-light Company, President of the South Norwalk Savings Bank, Treasurer of the Alden Mining Company, and a director in several other institutions. He has always taken a lively interest in agriculture, and was for several years President of the Fairfield County Agricultural Society.

Mr. Ely owns considerable real estate in the city and town where he resides, including the elegant hotel recently completed at South Norwalk. He owns over half of the capital stock of the First National Bank, is the owner of a large amount of gas company, insurance, and other stocks.

Beginning with nothing, Mr. Ely to-day pays, and for some time has paid, the largest tax of any one in the city or town, the assessed valuation of his property being nearly $200,000. He was one of the original subscribers to the government for the first issue of bonds during the civil war, subscribing at the time when many were fearful as to the result of the contest, and consequently as to the payment of the bonds. He made a large amount of money in real estate operations in Brooklyn, N. Y., a few years since. In attendance upon business he is prompt and diligent; has no extravagant habits; is social in his disposition and unassuming in his manners.

Mr. Ely's mother died in 1850, aged seventy-three, and his father in 1852, aged eighty-five. He had five brothers and three sisters, all now being dead except one brother. His eldest daughter, the wife of Hon. J. E. Wheeler, of Westport, died in 1868, at the early age of twenty-two years.

We can only enumerate the more prominent business transactions in the life of Mr. Ely. Commencing at the lowest round of the ladder, by strict attention to business, and a scrupulous regard for square dealing, paying every cent of his just obligations, taking no advantage of the many opportunities that offer in a business career to make money by the technicalities of the law, he has risen to wealth and influence. His example illustrates what application, combined with business tact and honesty, can do. He has always taken a lively interest in the growth and prosperity of his town and city, and is ever ready to lend a helping hand and assist any enterprise that he can with a proper regard for his own interests and those of his fellow-townsmen.

EDWARD P. WEED.

Edward P. Weed, only son of John A. and Emeline (Chichester) Weed, was born in the town of Norwalk, Conn., April 7, 1834. He received his education in the private schools of Norwalk, attending among others the reputable one of Dr. Hall, and when a youth commenced clerking in the drug-store of his father, whom in time he succeeded in business, and which business he continued until his death.

Mr. Weed was at various times called to fill places of honor and trust: was twice elected member of the Legislature, was chosen warden for the borough several times, was chief engineer of Norwalk fire department, and intrusted with various other public positions. For many years he held the offices of president of Norwalk Savings Bank, and vice-president of the National Bank of Norwalk.

As a citizen he was quiet, unobtrusive, and unassuming, and in his pleasing way made many strong and loving friends.

As a business man his judgment, talents, and integrity were well known and appreciated, and his advice sought for, listened to, and heeded to advantage. Broad and liberal in his views, he had the utmost charity for those differing from him in opinion, and from the natural kindness of his disposition all benevolent objects found in him a ready respondent.

Mr. Weed was always frank and outspoken in politics, ever clinging to the constitution as the bulwark of our liberties, and cherishing the Democratic principles enunciated by Thomas Jefferson as the only means of perpetuating the American republic.

Mr. Weed was united in marriage, Dec. 19, 1865, to Miss Sophia Lynes, of an old and highly respected Norwalk family, which traces its ancestry to the early days of the commonwealth. This union was blessed with two children—Samuel Lynes and Edward Chichester.

Mr. Weed died suddenly, April 18, 1880. He received the three first degrees of Masonry in St. John's Lodge, No. 6, Norwalk, in 1856; was Junior Warden in 1857, Senior Warden in 1858, and Worshipful Master in 1859. He received the chapter degrees in Washington Chapter, No. 24, R. A. M., in the year 1856, and held the office of High Priest in 1863. He received the degrees of Royal and Select Master in Washington Council, No. 17, in 1858.

Special meetings of the directors of each of the banking institutions to which Mr. Weed belonged were held immediately after his death, and we can in no more fitting manner indicate the esteem in which his immediate associates and intimate friends held him than by transferring to these pages the resolutions following, which, among others, were passed at those meetings. The Directors of the National Bank of Norwalk said,—

"Resolved, That by the death of Mr. Weed, the Board of Directors of this Bank has lost one of its most faithful and trusted members, whose integrity of character, fidelity to the interests of the Bank, and sound business qualifications were fully recognized and valued; while, in the broader social and business relations of life, where his honorable principles, strict integrity, and kind and genial manners endeared him to all who knew him, his death will be most deeply felt and deplored."

The Directors of the Norwalk Savings Society passed this resolution:

"Resolved, That in recognition of his personal worth and faithful services as President and Director of this society, we hereby express our regrets and sorrow at this painful event. As a friend whose fidelity was never questioned; as a counselor whose wisdom commanded our respect; as a man whose name was synonymous with honor and integrity, we deplore his death as a great and irreparable loss."

HON. JAMES W. HYATT.

It is among the most pleasing tasks of the historian to place upon the pages of history for the perusal of coming generations the records of "self-made" men, and to show the results of the labor of those who, deprived in early life of those advantages which many claim to be necessary qualifications of success, of powerful friends, liberal education, and inherited wealth, yet, by their own ability, determined will, and persistency of purpose, have carved out a niche in the granite column of life, and won success where many possessed of those advantages have faltered and failed.

No better exemplar for the truth of this can be taken than the one of whom we now write. James William Hyatt was born at Norwalk, Conn., Sept. 19, 1837. He attended the common schools of the village until he was eleven years old, when he commenced the active business of life by entering the employ of A. N. Holly, of Stamford, Conn., and working in a lumber-yard at fifty cents a week. Step by step he rapidly and steadily rose, and we find him from 1860 to 1872 a trusted clerk: first, in the grocery house of Bishop & Waterbury, in Stamford, afterwards with Legrand Lockwood & Co., bankers in New York City. Here he displayed that skill in rapid calculation which to-day makes him one of the best accountants in the State.

Mr. Hyatt removed to Norwalk, Conn., in 1873, and has since made that his residence. From his return to Norwalk Mr. Hyatt has had positions of trust placed in his charge in rapid succession. The same year he was elected justice of the peace. January, 1874, he was elected vice-president of Danbury and Norwalk Railroad Company; in June, 1874, elected president of Norwalk Horse-Car Railroad Company; in October, 1874, elected selectman; in 1875, represented Norwalk in the State Legislature, and was appointed by Governor Hubbard bank commissioner to succeed Hon. G. H. Landers, resigned. In 1876, Mr. Hyatt was again elected representative, and in 1877 was chosen warden of the borough of Norwalk. He was appointed bank commissioner by Governor Hubbard for the term of two years in 1878, and received the same appointment from Governor Andrews in 1880. He was re-elected warden of Norwalk in the same year.

Mr. Hyatt was brought up under "old-line Whig" influences, and acted with the Republican party until 1872, when he supported Horace Greeley for President. He has since been identified with the Democratic party.

Mr. Hyatt is an attendant of the Episcopal church, and is a member of the Masonic fraternity; held one term the office of "Worshipful Master" of Sagamon Lodge, No. 371, F. and A. M., of New York city; was twice thereafter re-elected, but refused to serve.

Mr. Hyatt was united in marriage, Dec. 25, 1860, to Miss Jane M., daughter of George Hoyt, Esq., of an old Norwalk family. They have three children living,—John, Jane, and Harry,—aged respectively ten, six, and two and a half years.

Mr. Hyatt is of nervous temperament, active and of positive character, quick to resolve and to act. He is a discriminating student of human nature. Strong and loyal in his friendships, he is justly popular with all classes, and, as his record shows, a man who is trusted and held in high esteem. He is a hard worker, wastes no time in acting or speaking, but comes directly to the point, doing business in a clear, straightforward way, and accomplishing much, though, by his systematic habits, he is never in a hurry. Industry, economy, and perseverance are his guiding principles.

DR. ASA HILL.

Asa Hill was born in Norwalk, Conn., Nov. 20, 1815. He was the youngest of six children. His mother died when he was only three years old. Shortly after this event his father removed to Huntington, L. I., where Asa remained until about fourteen years old, when he went to live with his oldest brother at Danbury, Conn., and attended district school the next winter. This was his graduating course in school education, and at fifteen years of age he commenced the active care and duties of life.

His was an earnest nature, and feeling the necessity of a broader and deeper knowledge than his limited opportunities had given him, and desirous of becoming more intelligent that he might be more useful, he surrounded himself with books and mastered the contents of all that came in his way. Religious in his nature, his preference was works on divinity, but scientific and philosophical ones were also almost literally devoured. Before his twentieth birthday he was noted for his attention to business, his zeal and activity in religion, and his earnest search for knowledge.

About this time came the pivotal event of his life,—one that marked and opened a life-career. While acting as nurse to a dying brother, under treatment of Dr. Howell Rogers, of Colchester, Conn., he made the acquaintance and friendship of that celebrated physician, but was not a little astonished when the doctor proposed that he should come and study medicine with him. On reflection he accepted, and commenced at once the elementary studies with his accustomed energy. While thus assiduously working, Dr. David P. Knapp, who was practicing dentistry in Danbury, suggested to him its study, offering to give him instruction. Thinking it might aid him financially, Mr. Hill soon entered the office. Here he continued for several months, acquiring the use of tools, making and shaping his instruments. A love for the profession developed. In those days dentistry had not risen to the position it now occupies. There were no dental schools nor colleges, no dental magazines, and few text-books. With his steadiness of purpose Mr. Hill plodded on until he had acquired a superficial knowledge of dentistry, made a case of instruments, and returned to Colchester and his medical studies. By means of his new art he gained a scanty support, and, although there were times when money was all gone, he steadily persevered in his course of study.

After several months of earnest labor, and after much deliberation, he determined to give his whole time to dentistry, and, finding that Norwalk presented a good field, located there,—temporarily, as he supposed, but for life. At the first meeting of the American Dental Society, in Boston, Dr. Hill became a member and received the diploma of the society. Shortly after he became associate editor of the New York Dental Recorder. Continuing in this capacity for four years, he became for a time both editor and publisher. The subject of plastic fillings for teeth was at this time much agitated in dental circles, and to produce a substance fitted for the purpose was not only a great desideratum, but an exceedingly difficult thing to do. Many were the costly experiments, resulting in failure, made in all parts of the country. Dr. Hill early commenced to experiment, and after years of anxiety and trial brought out what has been since known to the profession as "Hill's Stopping." The first production was soon given a standard place in every dentist's office, and now, under a new and changed formula, the perfected work is kept as a most valuable secret. In 1847, Dr. Hill received the honorary degree of D.D.S. from the Baltimore Dental College. In the same year he was elected representative from Norwalk, and in 1856 was chosen to the same office. Up to the time of his death, which occurred Nov. 28, 1874, Dr. Hill was largely a contributor to dental journals. He built up a lucrative practice, and the proceeds of that, and his valuable invention, placed him in circumstances to gratify his taste for experiment and study. His marble-staining process was a novel and peculiar result of study. But would we do full justice to the many ramifications of this remarkable and versatile character, we would needs have to occupy much more space than can be afforded. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity, of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, and was active in the Order of Sons of Temperance, presiding officer of the Grand Division of the State, and representative to the National Division.

From early youth Dr. Hill was subject to deep religious convictions and a belief that he should preach the gospel. For many years he put off that duty, but at last was convinced it was a call from God, and was licensed as local preacher in the Methodist Episcopal church, and afterwards was ordained deacon and elder. While engaged in erecting a church edifice in Norwalk, he organized the Second Methodist Episcopal Society, serving them as pastor for three years, declining any compensation.

Dr. Hill was married in April, 1812, to Miss Susan, daughter of Hon. Charles Isaacs, of an old and honored Norwalk family. Their only child is Rebecca Isaacs, familiarly known to her circle of friends as Betta. She married Ira Cole, who was born in Wilton, Fairfield Co. All in all, Dr. Hill was a true type of the highest order of self-made men, at all times the staunch friend of those who, in any sphere, were striving for a higher good, and his generous nature and warm sympathies carried his benevolence into many a household, causing his name to be revered as a public benefactor and a lover of his kind. He despised all "shams," and whenever he was enlisted in anything gave it the best gifts of his earnest nature. His wonderful eloquence and skill in impromptu speaking was frequently called into exercise, and many will remember how his audiences hung spellbound as his beautiful language portrayed still more beautiful thoughts. With pen, as with tongue, he was wonderfully gifted, and, with his intense enjoyment and love of music, we see how he could and did produce some of as sweet gems of poetry as any author of his day. Perhaps no one in his broad acquaintance enjoyed a higher popularity, was more cherished, more dearly beloved, or of a higher Christian character than Dr. Hill. As a Christian, as a scholar, as a writer and speaker, as an inventor, as a friend, a husband and father, his memory will be fondly and tenderly remembered by all who knew him.

JACOB LOCKWOOD.

Jacob Lockwood, son of David Lockwood, was of an old Fairfield county family which located in Stamford. His grandfather, Timothy Lockwood, was a soldier in the Continental army, and was shot by the Cow-Boys, while acting as volunteer picket, during a visit home on a furlough. His maternal grandfather, Samuel Tryon, served through the French and Indian wars, was in the Revolution, and afterwards fought with Gen. Anthony Wayne against the Indians on the then Western frontier.

Mr. Lockwood was born Jan. 30, 1791, in Stamford, where he spent his childhood and acquired the education afforded by the schools of that place. When he had attained a suitable age, he varied his labor on the farm by teaching district school during the winter months. He married, on Feb. 11, 1822, Fanny Raymond, daughter of Stephen Raymond, who was born in Norwalk. For over forty years this worthy couple walked harmoniously together through life before they were separated by Mr. Lockwood's death.

Their only child, Wm. Raymond, was born Jan. 18, 1823. He married Mary E. Roberts, of an old family of Darien. Their children—William, Fannie, and George—are living.

Jacob Lockwood was an agriculturist, and, by judicious calculation, economy, and thrift, from a very humble beginning rose to have more than a competency and to have title-deeds of many a broad acre. He shrank from publicity, but was a selectman and filled various other town offices. He was appointed quartermaster-sergeant in the war of 1812, his commission dating April 21, 1814, but, through noncomplicity with some dishonorable transactions of a superior officer, was discharged September 20th of the same year. He was an honorable man in all business relations, and while he deemed himself entitled to his own, would not exact from a debtor a dollar more than was his due, and ever, under all circumstances, Jacob Lockwood's word was as good as his bond. In the family relation he was a kind husband and father, and his name among his associates was a synonym for worth, integrity, and justice. In his life he was called upon to administer on many estates, and was noted for his skill in unraveling the complicated conditions in which he found many of them involved. Mr. Lockwood died Dec. 26, 1863. His wife survives him.

was born in Norwalk, Conn., June 7, 1795. His ancestors for many years were leading citizens of the town, and originally, like other Puritan families, came to America from England. His father's name was Isaac S. Isaacs. His mother's maiden name was Susannah St. John. He could claim kindred not only with Gov. Thomas Fitch, from whom he was immediately descended, but with John Fitch, who preceded by some time Robert Fulton in the invention of the steamboat.

When but two years old he lost a most estimable mother, and at the age of ten years his father, who was wealthy, sent him to a boarding-school in Fairfield, in this county, where he remained several years. He was then sent to a school of higher grade in Cheshire, Conn., where he graduated. Mr. Isaacs then commenced for himself the work of life. The first position held by him was teacher, holding that place in the "Down Town" school of Norwalk as early as 1818. By his conduct he made the position both influential and honorable. From the files of the Norwalk Gazette we find that on Aug. 17, 1819, he entered into a copartnership with his oldest brother, Benjamin, in the grocery, drug, and medicine trade. This partnership lasted for a number of years. In the same files mention is made of his being collector of taxes in 1824, deputy sheriff in 1831 (which position he held several years), of his dealing alone in hardware and groceries in 1838, postmaster in 1841-1843, and member of Court of Burgesses in 1844.

In April, 1845, Mr. Isaacs was elected high sheriff on the Whig ticket, and in a strong Democratic county, by his personal popularity, received a majority of seven hundred. He was re-elected in 1848 by equally as decisive a vote, running far ahead of his ticket. When collector of taxes, if he found any who said "they could not pay up," he would quietly pay for them, and in all of his official relations he was very popular and made many staunch friends. Not less widely and favorably was he known as an officer of Fairfield County Bank, of which he was director for many years, under the presidency of Henry Belden, Esq., and president for full twenty years. In his business transactions, if perchance he offended any one by his blunt, off-hand ways, he always endeavored to make amends and bring about cordiality again.

Nowhere did Mr. Isaacs feel more at home, or distinguish himself more, than in his connection with the courts of justice when Fairfield County bar found no superior in any county in Connecticut. He was honored by the friendship and intrusted with the most important business of its best men. He was a strong and ardent politician, throwing all the energies of his intensely positive nature into the campaign, whether in town, county, State, or national contests. He knew no such thing as fear or defeat, and this applied to all the relations of life. One of the most distinguished men of the county, who knew him well, says, "Charles Isaacs was a Roman, and the noblest Roman of them all."

In social life he was lively, cheerful, and full of fun. He delighted in practical jokes, but his kindness of heart prevented his being severe in them. He was very fond of children, and, indeed, of all young people. Many a young man owes his financial prosperity to the generous aid furnished him, when starting business, by Mr. Isaacs; nor was his generosity confined to them, but reached, in some way, every circle of society.

In official relations firm and prompt to duty's call, in friendship true and loyal, a tender husband and loving father, in all circumstances and everywhere a high, chivalric gentleman, Charles Isaacs lived respected and loved, and died July 18, 1872, leaving an honest and unblemished name and life.

He married Rebecca, daughter of Henry and Rebecca (Fitch) Betts, Nov. 20, 1815. They had one child, Susan, born May 28, 1819. She married Dr. Asa Hill, whose portrait and biography are to be found elsewhere in the history of Norwalk.

THOMAS BENEDICT.

From a period dating back to at least 1500, it is said that the first son of the Benedict family has been christened Thomas, and the first American progenitor, Thomas, was the only son for three successive generations, and transplanted the name from old to New England. He was born in 1617, of reported Huguenot ancestry, and emigrated from England in 1638, marrying, shortly after his arrival, Mary Bridgum, his sister-in-law, who came over in the same vessel with him. Stopping not long in Massachusetts Bay colony, he went to the wild, and in winter inaccessible, shores of Long Island, where he was commissioned magistrate, or, to use the quaint old records, "empowered to act in point of government," and "invested with magisterial power on the island." "He was a pillar in the church, the arbiter of differences, civilized or savage." "All sorts of offices clustered around him, for set on him by the popular choice, and everywhere he wrought righteousness." After divers changes, this worthy pioneer settled permanently in Norwalk, Fairfield Co., Conn., about 1665, where all his children married. From them sprang a most numerous family. Mr. Benedict was at once chosen town clerk, and occupied thereafter almost continuously till his death some office of public trust. In the patent granted by the General Court in 1686, confirming the title of Norwalk to its territory, his name is inserted as a patentee. He died at Norwalk "aged aboute 73 years."

Thomas (2), born in Southold, L. I.; married Mary, daughter of Andrew Messenger, Esq.; moved to Norwalk in 1665-66; was made a freeman in 1669. He died at Norwalk in November, 1688-89.

Thomas (3) was born in Norwalk, Dec. 5, 1670; married Rachel, daughter of Samuel and Rachel (Marvin) Smith. He held many local offices, and was ensign; died May 10, 1743.

Thomas (4), born in Norwalk, Oct. 29, 1701; married Deborah Waters, of Jamaica, L. I. He held many local offices, was highly respected, and died Feb. 11, 1757.

Thomas (5) was born in Norwalk, Feb. 25, 1725; married Hannah, daughter of Capt. John Raymond, of Norwalk. Up to this time the Benedicts of this line seem to have devoted themselves to agriculture. But this Thomas was a merchant in Norwalk. His house, store, cider-mill, and distillery were destroyed July 11, 1779, when the British, under Gen. Tryon, burned the town. Died Feb. 21, 1802.

Thomas (6) was a lad of fourteen when this event occurred, and his reminiscences of it are recorded elsewhere in this history. He married, Oct. 8, 1795, Mary, daughter of Phineas Waterbury, and died Jan. 5, 1852, at the honorable age of eighty-seven years. His love of instrumental music amounted to a passion, and in many respects his memory is peculiarly remembered by his associates. He left the savor of a good name to his descendants, and a comfortable share of this world's goods.

Thomas (7) was born Oct. 7, 1797, on the old homestead, in the same house where his father and grandfather were born, now standing in the borough of Norwalk, Conn., and resided there until he was twenty-six years of age. He married, March 26, 1820, Susan, daughter of Henry and Rebecca (Fitch) Betts, of Norwalk. In 1823 he removed to the place now occupied by him at East Norwalk, where all his children were born, save Mary, whose birth occurred at the old home in 1821. His other children are Thomas (8), born June 27, 1821, married Cornelia A., sister of Hon. Smith M. Weed, and, although residing in Norwalk, is most of his time engaged in mining in Missouri; Elizabeth, born Jan. 5, 1827 (died in infancy); Sarah C. (Mrs. Richard Parmelee), born Feb. 10, 1832; Julia W. (Mrs. George O. Keeler), born Sept. 3, 1831; Edwin, who was born Oct. 24, 1839, married Sarah W. Raymond, of Southport, Conn. He enlisted during the late civil war in the Fifth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, and served four years. He now resides in Dakota Territory.

Mrs. Benedict died June 16, 1876. Dec. 10, 1876, Mr. Benedict married Betsey Ann Betts, of Wilton. She died Nov. 11, 1879.

Mr. Benedict is a man of originality of character, vivacious and pleasant in his social relations, and possessed of much kindness of heart. He was never "made a freedman," which is done by taking the oath of allegiance to Connecticut and the United States, and consequently has never exercised or possessed the right of suffrage. During his life Mr. Benedict has been engaged in milling, carpentering, farming, and other active pursuits. Always industrious, economical, and saving, he has added much to his handsome patrimony. The declining years of his life are cared for by his daughter, Mrs. Parmelee, and with as vigorous, clear, and active intellect as he has ever possessed, Mr. Benedict is at the present time (August, 1880) a remarkably good type of the sturdy New England race, which has placed its impress on the whole broad continent. Fertile in resources, prompt in action, with physical powers to carry into execution the plans of the mind, the children of this New England race are connected with and stand in the van of every progressive movement for the benefit of mankind. May he be long spared to fill his place in the town of his birth.

CAPT. JOSEPH W. HUBBELL.

Joseph W. Hubbell, son of Aaron and Sarah (Silliman) Hubbell, was born Oct. 22, 1800, in Fairfield, Conn. His grandfather, a farmer, was born in Fairfield County, was a member of the Legislature, and died in middle life, much respected.

Aaron Hubbell was also a farmer, and was born, spent his life, and died, at the advanced age of eighty-seven years, in Fairfield County.

Joseph W. was reared on the farm of his ancestors till his fifteenth birthday was passed, when, desirous of a more active life than the quiet seclusion of rural occupations, he entered the store of Benjamin Wheeler, of Bridgeport, as clerk. His new avocation continued four years, two of which were spent in the employ of Mr. Wheeler and two in that of Isaac Burroughs. Another and a more responsible position was awaiting our young merchant: he became captain of a vessel running from Bridgeport to New York. In this new sphere, navigation, he was engaged nine years. While occupied in this pursuit he married Mary Ann, daughter of Wm. Parrott, of Bridgeport, Dec. 23, 1823. In 1829, Capt. Hubbell ceased his mariner life, and on July 29th removed to Norwalk and formed a partnership in the milling and mercantile business with Thos. C. Wardin, of Bridgeport. This partnership proved a profitable one, and continued till the death of Mr. Wardin, in 1851, when Capt. Hubbell purchased the interest of his late partner, and continued both milling and merchandising till he lost both mill and the bulk of his property by a great freshet. After this he only continued the mercantile part of his business, building a store for that purpose. In 1856 he went out of merchandising and became the treasurer of the "Norwalk Savings Society." For fourteen years and over he transacted the duties of that position with care, frugality, and honesty, and to the entire satisfaction of his associates.

Capt. Hubbell has been a magistrate for a period covering many years, a selectman for eight years, an assessor for two terms, member of Connecticut Legislature, and was in early life a Whig, but since the organization of the Republican party an earnest supporter of its principles.

For forty years and upwards Capt. Hubbell has been a director of the Fairfield County Bank and its successor, the Fairfield County National Bank. At the present time (July, 1880) he is vice-president of the same. Both Capt. and Mrs. Hubbell became members of the Episcopal Church in 1823. He was vestryman for over thirty years, since then a warden, and is now a senior warden. Mrs. Hubbell died May 8, 1876, and was buried in Norwalk Cemetery. In disposition Capt. Hubbell is kind and genial, a hospitable friend and generous giver to a deserving cause. In business he was accommodating, but careful, economical, and conservative rather than prone to rush hastily into new schemes of brilliant promise. He is enabled, by the prudence of his earlier life, to have a competency of worldly possessions to cheer his latter days, and may well be happy in the esteem and confidence of his many friends of years.

ANSON RICHARDS.

One of the old-time families of Norwalk, Conn., is the Richards family. Most of its members have pursued the even tenor of their way as quiet agriculturalists, living to a hale old age.

Anson Richards, second son of Samuel and Mercy Richards, was born in Norwalk, June 2, 1794.

Samuel Richards, Sr., his paternal ancestor, was born April 27, 1770, and died Oct. 2, 1840, much respected.

Samuel Richards, Jr., older brother of Anson, was born Nov. 14, 1791, and died Dec. 6, 1871. He was a stirring, representative man, holding many and prominent positions.

Anson Richards remained with his father on the farm where he now (August, 1880) resides at the advanced age of eighty-six years. In the common schools of his early youth he was an apt scholar, and when about seventeen years of age went to New Canaan as clerk in the employ of Richards & St. John, in a general country store. Here he remained two years. Returning to his birthplace, he assisted his father in agriculture, and after his father's death carried on the farm.

Mr. Richards never sought or cared for office. The only one he ever held was secretary and treasurer of Union Cemetery Association, left vacant by the death of his brother Samuel.

Mr. Richards married Mrs. Azetta Perkins, daughter of Isaiah Smith, of Stamford, Conn. They had no offspring. Mrs. Richards was born in 1807, and died July 16, 1861.

With the same quietude and tranquillity as that in which his life has passed, Mr. Richards is awaiting the summons for his "going home," secure in the rectitude of a well-ordered life, which has dealt justly with all and held malice for none, and in possession of a competency more than sufficient to supply all the wants of his remaining years.

DAVID M. FILLow.

David M. Fillow was born in Wilton, Conn., Jan. 5, 1810. His great-grandfather, James, was of French ancestry, and was probably the first of the name ever in America. He died in 1717, at the advanced age of eighty years, in Westport, where he was buried. He had excellent health until a short time previous to his death. He was social in his manners and believed a laugh much better medicine than physic. He married Mary, daughter of Garner Olmstead. His two sons, Benjamin and Elijah, survived him. His old homestead has but recently passed out of the possession of his descendants.

Benjamin Fillow was born in Norwalk, and was a small boy at the commencement of the Revolution, of which he held vivid recollections. He was probably a soldier of 1812. He was a farmer, highly respected, was a consistent member of the Methodist Church. He never aspired to political distinction, was quiet in his tastes, preferring the home-life of the farm to any other station, but was held in high esteem in the community where he lived for his upright life. His latter years were passed in that portion of Norwalk now included in Westport. He married Clemons, daughter of Dutton Gregory. This union was blessed with four children, three of whom—Lewis P., Phoebe, and James—grew to maturity. His death occurred Jan. 6, 1852, aged eighty-six years.

Lewis P. was born Feb. 15, 1787. Like his father, he was a farmer, and a representative one. He was independent in politics. He married Lydia Moorehouse, daughter of Stephen Moorehouse. Their ten children—six sons and four daughters—all lived to maturity and married. In the relations of life he did well his part, and his memory is cherished by a large circle of descendants. Though poor in world's goods, he left an honest name, and passed away March 1, 1866, aged eighty years.

David Moorehouse Fillow was, as a lad, on the farm with his father, and had no such opportunity of acquiring education as the children of this generation, for David was the eldest son of a large family, and the work of earning a livelihood kept both father and son busy, and the only time of school he could get was in the three months' winter term, and never a day after he was fifteen years old. The winter he was fifteen, instead of going to school, he learned shoe-making, and worked at that trade winters thereafter, his father receiving his wages, until he was twenty-one.

Mr. Fillow married Jane, daughter of Thaddeus Waterbury, of Wilton, Dec. 5, 1830, but did not commence house-keeping until the next year, when the young couple commenced the new home life in what is now Westport. Here they lived eight years. At that time he removed to his present place, which was purchased from his father. For almost forty-one years he has kept his residence here, acting well his part, enjoying much happiness and enduring many sorrows, and in his way doing much to make the history of that part of the town. His first wife died Nov. 9, 1866. She was mother of six, four of whom—Lydia Ann (Mrs. Thaddeus Waterbury), Lewis Burr, William F., and David A.—are living.

Nov. 25, 1868, Mr. Fillow married Mrs. Nancy J. Whitney, daughter of Reuben Blake, of Greenwich.

Mr. Fillow has for years been a member of the First Baptist Church of Norwalk, and from his consistent walk, honesty of purpose, and steady following of Christian principles was called to the position of deacon, which office he has held for the last four years.

In politics Mr. Fillow is a Democrat, and is always loyal to his principles, and, from his conscientiousness, would vote that ticket as well alone as if every one else in town voted it.

CHAPTER LVI.

REDDING.

Organization—Topographical—The Indians—Chicken Warrups—The First Grant of Lands—Subsequent Grants—Capt. Samuel Couch's Purchase.

THE town of Redding is an interior town, lying near the geographical centre of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Danbury and Bethel; on the east by Newtown and Easton; on the south by Easton, Weston, and Wilton; and on the west by Wilton and Ridgefield. It is watered by the Saugatuck, Aspetuck, and Norwalk Rivers, and their tributaries, all of which flow in a southerly direction, mingling their waters with Long Island Sound. The surface is hilly and the soil is generally good, particularly on the ridges, which are very fertile.

INDIANS.

The tract of land embraced within the bounds of the present town of Redding was claimed by a small and unimportant tribe of Indians, composed of a few stragglers or disaffected members of the Potatucks of Newtown, the Paugussetts of Milford, and the Mohawks of New York. This motley tribe had their village near the present residence of Mr. John Read, and was presided over by a chief bearing the euphonious name of Chicken Warrups, or Sam Mohawk, as he was sometimes called. It is supposed that he was a sagamore or under-chief of the powerful Mohawks, one of the tribes of the celebrated league of the Iroquois, which inhabited New York, and who for some reason fled from his tribe, and settled on Greenfield Hill. Here he killed an Indian, and fled to Redding. He was a shrewd, cunning, and important character in the early history of the town, and the original deeds were executed by him and one Naseco, a subordinate chief.

Their signatures were as follows:

THE FIRST GRANT OF LANDS.

The first grant of lands was made to Mr. Cyprian Nichols in 1687, in that part of the town now known as Lontown. The following is a copy of the grant and survey:

"At a General Court held at Hartford, Oct. 13, 1687.

"This Court grants Mr. Cyprian Nichols two hundred acres of land where he can find it, provided he take it up where it may not prejudice any former grant to any particular person or plantation; and the surveyors of the next plantation are hereby appointed to lay out the same, he paying for it.

"CALEB STANLEY."

Capt. Nichols "took up" his grant in that part of the "obling" which is now Lontown, as is shown by the following document:

"MARCH 1, A.D. 1711.

"Then laid out ye Grant of two hundred acres of land granted by ye General Court to Capt. Cyprian Nichols, Oct. 13, 1687, as follows,—viz., beginning at a great Chestnut tree marked on ye south and west side, and J. B. set upon it, standing at ye south end of Woolf Ridge, a little below Danbury bounds, thence running west one hundred rods to a Walnut tree marked on two sides, then running south one mile to a red oak tree marked, then running east one hundred rods to a black oak tree marked, then running north one mile to the Chestnut tree first mentioned. A heap of stones lying at ye root of each ye trees. We say then thus laid out by us, SUBSEQUENT GRANTS.

The next grant of land in this locality was made to Daniel Hilton, May 7, 1700, of two hundred acres, and on the 10th of October, 1706, a grant was made to Richard Hubbell, of one hundred acres, as follows:

"MARCH 1ST, A.D. 1711.

"Then laid out ye Grant of two hundred acres of land made by ye General Court to Mr. Daniel Hilton, May 7, 1700, and ye Grant of one hundred acres, granted October 10th, 1706, by ye General Court to Mr. Richard Hubbell, all in one piece as followeth,—viz., Beginning at a Walnut tree marked, and J. R. upon it, standing a little way North East from ye Hog Ridge between Danbury and Fairfield, thence running two hundred and eighty rods northerly to a Red Oak tree marked, on ye West side of Studdy Ridge, thence running easterly one hundred and eighty-four rods to the Little River at two Elm Stables and a Red Oak, marked, thence running Southerly, west of ye river, and bounded upon it, two hundred and eighty rods to a bitter Walnut tree marked, thence running one hundred and sixty rods westerly to the Walnut tree first mentioned, thus and then laid out by us,

"THOMAS HOYT,
"DANIEL TAYLOR,
"Surveyors of the Town of Danbury."

Mr. Todd in his "History of Redding" says, "These grants were purchased, probably before they were laid out, by Mr. John Read, one of the earliest actual settlers of Redding."

CAPTAIN SAMUEL COUCH'S PURCHASE.

In 1712 it was ordered by the General Court that all lands lying between Fairfield and Danbury, not already "taken up" by settlers, should be sold at public auction in the town of Fairfield. This, however, was not sold until August, 1722, when it was bid off by Capt. Couch for himself and Nathan Gold. The inhabitants of Redding claimed that no notice of the sale had been given, and the result was that they grew very indignant, and in the following year presented the following protest and petition to the General Court then convened at New Haven:

"TO THE HONORABLE THE GENERAL COURT:

"John Read, in behalf of himself and the rest of the farmers or proprietors of farms between Danbury and Fairfield, humbly sheweth,

"That the Hon'ble Nathan Gold, Esq., late deceased, and Peter Burr, Esq., as Agents for ye Colony, held a Vendue lately at Fairfield late ye time of ye Superior Courts sitting yr in August last, and sold to Capt. Samuel Couch, who bid for himself and for s'd Nathan Gold, Esq., all ye land between Fairfield and Danbury not before disposed of for the sum of ———. Ye humble pet'rs conceive the same ought not to be ratified, because ye same was done so unexpectedly and without sufficient notice, none of us most nearly concerned knew any thing of it; if ye order of ye General Court had been freshly passed, ye less notice was need full, but lying ten or twelve years, sufficient notice was not given, and well considered it can't be good. The inconveniences are intolerable, the place is now growing to be a village apiece. Ye lands purchased are but ye ——— over and over for farms.

"The remaining Scraps will be a very lean and scanty allowance for a common, and rare) absolutely necessary to accommodate the place with highways, and some strips left on purpose for ye use and ye surveying of the farms. Several farms interfere through mistakes, and such interferences must be supplied elsewhere, now in such circumstances it was never the hard fate of any poor place to have ye shady Rock at their door and ye path out of town or about town sold away from them by ye General Court. Therefore humbly praying ye Hon'ble Court to grant ye same to ye proprietors of farms there in proportion for a common and highways, or if the same seem too much, since some persons have bid a sum for our highways, we pray to buy them at first hands, and will pay this Hon'ble Court for the same as much as ye Court shall set upon, and remain your honor's most obedient servants.

"JNO. READ."

When the matter came before the court Mr. Jonathan Sturges deposed as follows:

"Some of the Company began to bid for s'd land, and some of the Company desired that Mr. Stone, who was there present, would pull out his watch and that the time for bidding should be but ten minutes, and the watch was laid down on the table. For a little time the people bid but slowly; but when they perceived the ten minutes to be near out, they began to bid very briskly, and when it came to the last minute the people bid more quickly, and at the last they bid so quick after one another that it was hard to distinguish whose bid it was. At the very minute the tenth minute ended; but I, standing near the watch spoke and said, 'The time is out, and it's Capt. Couch's bid, but I am certain Thomas Hill bid twenty shillings more.'"

Mr. Read, however, did not succeed in his attempt to have the sale set aside, and the lands were adjudged to the purchasers. Capt. Couch seems to have disposed of an interest in a part of his purchase to Thomas Nash, of Fairfield, and in 1723 the two received a joint patent for the same. This patent is a curious and valuable document and is given entire:

"Whereas, the Governor and Company of the English Colony of Connecticut, in General Court assembled at Hartford the 8th day of May, Anno Domini, 1712, did order and enact that all those lands lying within the said Colony between Danbury on the north, and the towns of Fairfield and Norwalk on the south, should be sold at Public Vendue, and by said act did fully authorize and empower the Hon'ble Nathan Gold and Peter Burr, Esq., both of the town of Fairfield aforesaid, to make sale and dispose of the s'd same lands accordingly and whereas the s'd Nathan Gold and Peter Burr, in pursuance and by force and virtue of the aforesaid act, did by their deed in writing, executed in due form, bearing date this first day of May, Anno Domini 1723, for a valuable sum of money paid by Samuel Couch and Thomas Nash, both of the town aforesaid, Grant, sell, and convey unto them the s'd Samuel Couch and Thomas Nash, one hundred acres of s'd land bounded and litted as follows, that is to say, lying within six rods of the north bounds line of the townships aforesaid, and on both sides of the road that leads from Norwalk to Danbury, and lying the whole length of the one hundred acres formerly laid out to s'd Thomas Nash, and bounded westerly by the s'd Thomas Nash, and from the northeast corner of s'd Nash, his bound being a black-oak stump that stands on the land and a small box-wood tree marked in course, running northerly sixty-eight degrees, eastwardly thirty-two rods to a white-oak stubble; thence South forty-three degrees and thirty minutes, eastwardly fifty rods to a rock, and stones on the same, that stands on the eastward side of a brook that runs by the southerly end of Unpawaug Hill, between the s'd brook and Danbury road, and from s'd Rock to run North sixty-eight degrees, Eastwardly eighty-six rods to a mass of stones, then South twenty-two degrees, Eastwardly one hundred and thirteen rods to a white-oak sapling, marked, standing on the aforesaid North bounds line of Fairfield; then by s'd line one hundred and forty rods up to the South-East corner of s'd Nash, his one hundred acres, Danbury road being allowed in above measure of six rods wide, and the highway by the Township's line of six rods wide, and whereas the s'd Samuel Couch and Thomas Nash have humbly desired that they may have a particular grant of s'd Governor and Company made (by Patent) unto them, their heirs, and assigns, for the same land bounded, litted, and described, under the seal of the s'd Colony, know ye, therefore, that the Governor and Company of the s'd Colony, in pursuance and by virtue of the powers granted unto them by our late Sovereign Lord, King Charles the Second of blessed memory, in and by his Majesty's letters-patent under the great seal of England, bearing date the threescore-and-twentieth day of April, in the fourteenth year of his s'd Majesty's Reign, have given and granted, and by these presents, for them, their heirs, and successors, do give, grant, ratify, and confirm unto them the s'd Samuel Couch and Thomas Nash, their heirs and assigns forever, all the s'd piece or parcel of land, containing one hundred acres, be the same more or less, litted and bounded as aforesaid, and all and singular the woods, timber, underwoods, lands, waters, brooks, ponds, fishings, lowlings, mines, minerals, and precious stones upon or within the s'd piece or parcel of land here by granted or mentioned, or intended to be granted as aforesaid, and all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments, and appurtenances of the same, and the reversion or reversions, remainder or remainders, profits, privileges whatsoever, of and in the s'd piece or parcel of land or every or any part thereof. To have and to hold the s'd one hundred acres of land hereby granted, with all and singular its appurtenances, unto them the s'd Samuel Couch and Thomas Nash, their heirs and assigns, to and for their own proper use, benefit, and behoof from the day of the date hereof, and from time to time and at all times forever here after as a good, sure, lawful, absolute, indefeasible estate of Inheritance in Fee simple, without any condition, limitation, use, or other thing to alter, change, or make void the same. To be holden of our Sovereign Lord, King George, his heirs and successors, as of his Majesty's Manor of East Greenwich, in the county of Kent, in the Kingdom of England, in free and common socage and not in capitee, nor by Knight service; they yielding and paying therefor to our Sovereign Lord the King, his heirs and successors forever, only the fifth part of all the our of Gold and Silver, which, from time to time and at all times hereafter, shall be gotten, had, or otherwise obtained, in lieu of all rents, services, duties, and demands whatsoever, according to charter. In witness whereof, we the said Governor and Company have caused the Seal of the said Colony to be hereunto affixed the fourteenth day of May, Anno George, Magna Britannie, &c., Annoque Domini 1723.

"G. SALTONSTALL,
Governor.

"By order of the Governor:
HEZEKIAH WELLS,
Secretary."

Subsequently Capt. Couch purchased of the Indians a tract of land lying in Lontown, contiguous to the estate of Mr. John Read, and which a few years later he sold to that gentleman. The deed was given by Chickens, and some of its provisions caused considerable trouble to the colonists in later years. This deed is as follows:

"Know all men whom it may concern that I Chicken an Indian Sagamore living between Fairfield, Danbury, Ridgefield, and Newtown, at a place called Lontown in the county of Fairfield in the Colony of Connecticut, in New England, for and in consideration of twelve pounds, six shillings, already paid unto me by Samuel Couch of Fairfield, husbandman, have given, granted, bargained, sold, confirmed, and firmly made over unto said Samuel Couch, his heirs and assigns forever, all the lands, lying, being and situate between the aforesaid towns of Danbury, Fairfield, Newtown, and Ridgefield, except what has been by letters patent from the Governor and Company of this Colony of Connecticut made over unto any person or persons or for any particular or public use. To have and to hold unto the said Samuel Couch, and to his heirs and assigns forever the aforesaid granted and described lands or unpatented premises, with all the privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or any manner of way appertaining, affirming myself to be the true owner, and sole proprietor of said land and have just, firm, and only right to dispose of the same. Reserving in the whole of the same, liberty for myself and my heirs to hunt, fish, and fowl upon the land and in the waters, and further reserving for myself, my children, and grandchildren and their posterity the use of so much land by my present dwelling-house or wigwam as the General Assembly of the Colony by themselves or a Committee differently appointed shall judge necessary for my or their personal improvement, that is to say my Children, children's children and posterity, furthermore I the said Chickens do covenant, promise, and agree, to and with the said Samuel Couch, that I the said Chickens, my heirs, executors, and administrators, the said described lands and bargained premises, unto the said Samuel Couch his heirs, etc., against the claims and demands of all manner of persons whatever, to warrant and forever by these presents defend. In confirmation of the above premises I the said Chickens set to my hand and seal this 15th day of February Anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and twenty four five Annoque Regis, etc.

Although the lands were adjudged to the purchasers, the people did not submit quietly, and in 1725 presented the following unsuccessful petition to the General Court:

"To the Honorable the General Court to be holden at Hartford on the Second Thursday of May, 1725.

THE FABLEST PRAYER

Of the Inhabitants, and of those that have farms in a certain tract of land lying between Fairfield and Danbury, Newtown and Ridgefield, with whom the Proprietory of a certain division of Land in Fairfield importunately joins—

"When as the Honorable General Assembly of this Colony hath in several of their Sessions, been pleased out of their great goodness & generosity to give unto some of your humble Petitioners & to others of them to sell certain Parcels of Land between the aforesaid towns & many of your Petitioners that they might get a comfortable maintenance & thereby be better able to serve their country have removed from their former habitations with great families of Children unto sd Land where we by ye blessing of God on our Industry have (passed) through (the) many difficulties that generally attend such new & Wooden Habitations and have now yet to go through, which are by us insuperable—but reflecting upon your Honor's accustomed Goodness, ready protection, and willing encouragement towards all such that have been under ye like circumstances as we now are, makes us far from despairing of living like rational Creatures and Christians in a very few years, and under our present Circumstances we have often the neighboring Ministers preaching ye word of God to us, and when your Honors shall be pleased to grant this our earnest & necessary request our number of Inhabitants will immediately be greatly renewed & we soon able to obtain a Minister & give him an honorable support—and that is to grant the vacant land that lies in slips and pieces between ye Land already given and sold to your Petitioners to lye for a perpetual Common for ye good of ye Parish: otherwise your poor Petitioners living at a great distance from any place where the public worship of God is attended, must be oblige'd and their Posterity after them to be soon as the Heathen are—without the outward and ordinary means of Salvation, the Thought of which makes us now most importunately address your Honors with this our Request making no doubt but yt ye desire your Honors have & the great care you have always taken to promote & encourage Religion—will also now be moved to grant your poor Petitioners their Request, it being no more than your Honors have often done even unto every new Plantation, many of which are not nor never will be comparable unto this. Your Honors, granting us this our Request, and it will be as we humbly conceive the most profitable way for ye good of this Colony to dispose of ye land for a perpetual common, for ye good of a Parish than any other way whatsoever: for a flourishing and large Parish such as we are assured this will make will soon pay more into ye Public Treasury than the whole of the Land would do if it were now to be sold: and not only so, but your poor Petitioners & their Posterity preserved from Heathenism & Infidelity: for if your Honors should not grant the Land for a common for the good of a Parish your poor Petitioners—the most of us at least, must be shut within the compass of our own land, & cant possibly get off unless we trespass, or gain the shift yt the Lords of the air have, neither to market nor meeting & we & our Posterity forever unable to have a settled Minister & your Honors may easily conceive how greatly disadvantageous to our Temporal Interest, which is so great an act of cruelty and hardship that never yet was experienced from your Honors & your Petitioners humbly beg they may not, but yt they may be sharers with their neighbors in your Honor's thoughtful care and regard for them—

"And if your Honors in their Prudence and Wisdom shall think it best to sell the aforesaid Land your Petitioners humbly beg they may have the first offer of it, who are always ready to give as much as any shall or will let it lye for a perpetual Common, & your humble Petitioners beg and most earnestly desire the Land may not be sold from their doors or confirmed to any yt pretend they have bought it: for whatever pretended sale there has been made thereof already we humbly conceive that it was not with the proper power & Legality that it ought to be confirmed: and as for its being purchased of the Indian (who both English and Indian acknowledge has a good Indian title to it viz. Chickens, is by what we can learn by the Indian himself & ye circumstances of, a slight piece of policy & we fear Deceit, ye latter of which the Indian constantly affirms it to be, for his design as he saith, and being well acquainted with him, living many of us near him have great reason to believe him, was to sell but a small quantity, about two or three hundred acres, but in ye deed ye whole of the land is comprehended, which when the Indian heard of it he was greatly enraged, and your Petitioners humbly beg yt such a sale may not be confirm'd, lest it prove greatly & disadvantageous to this Colony & cause much bloodshed, as instances of ye like nature have in all Probability in our neighboring Provinces—

"Your Petitioners most earnestly & heartily beg that your Honors would think on them & grant them their request, & your Petitioners as in duty bound shall ever pray—

The First Dwellings—Sketches of the Various Families— Adams, Banks, Barlow, Bartlett, Bartram, Bates, Beach, Benedict, Betts, Berr, Burditt, Burton, Chatfield, Couch, Darling, Fairfield, Foster, Gold, Gorham, Gray, Griffen, Hall, Hawley, Hill, Heron, Hull, Jackson, Lee, Lyon, Lord, Mallory, Meade, Meeker, Merchant, Morehouse, Perry, Platt, Read, Rogers, Rumsey, Sanford, Smith, Stowe, etc.

THE PIONEERS.

THERE is a tradition that the first three dwellings in this town were built at about the same period,—one in the Boston District, on the site of the present residence of Noah Lee; one in the centre, on the site of Capt. Davis' present residence; and the third in Lonetown, built by John Read, on the place now occupied by Aaron Treadwell's residence.

Although the settlement increased gradually and gave evidence of a healthy growth, still there is no authentic record of the inhabitants until 1723, when we find the following names: Nathan Pickett, Gershom Morehouse, John Hall, Francis Hall, Robert Chauncey, Wolcott Chauncey, Daniel ———, William Hill, Jr., Philip Judd, Nathan Adams, Stephen Morehouse, Benjamin Fayerweather, Thomas Bailey, Thomas Williams, Asa Hall, Joshua Hall, David Crofut, John Read, Isaiah Hull, Moses Knapp, Benjamin Sturges, Samuel Hall, John Read (2d), Burgess Hall, Isaac Hall.

The following sketches of the early families of Redding are taken substantially from Mr. Charles Burr Todd's excellent "History of Redding." Some additions and corrections are made by Thomas Sanford, Esq., of Redding, and Mr. A. B. Hull, of Danbury.

THE EARLY FAMILIES OF REDDING.†

Joseph Adams removed when a young man from Boston to Fairfield, and married, soon after, Joanna Dishrow, of Fairfield. About 1760 he removed to Redding, and settled in Lonetown, on the farm now owned by his grandson, Stephen. His children were Stephen, baptized Aug. 15, 1762; Hezekiah, baptized Sept. 30, 1764; Ellen, baptized Nov. 1765; Abigail, baptized March 6, 1768; Joseph, baptized April 28, 1771; Israel, baptized Jan. 10, 1773; Aaron, baptized July 16, 1775; Nathan, baptized Sept. 6, 1778. Of these children, Stephen enlisted in the Continental army and never returned. Hezekiah married Betty Parsons, and had children; Betsey, who married John Gray and settled in Norwalk; Stephen, now living in Redding, at the age of eighty-nine; Lemuel, now living in Redding, aged eighty-six; Aaron, who removed to the West; and Elinor, who married Hawley Judd. It is related of Hezekiah Adams that, too young to enlist as a soldier in the Revolutionary army, he entered the service as a teamster, and on one occasion drove a wagon loaded with Spanish milled dollars to Baltimore.

Abraham Adams, brother of Joseph, was contemporary with him in Redding. His wife was Sarah ———. Their children were Ann, baptized March 6, 1768; Deborah, baptized April 28, 1771; Sarah, baptized July 31, 1774 (died in infancy); Sarah, baptized Oct. 20, 1776; Eli, baptized Jan. 30, 1780. Family record mentions a son Abraham.

Jesse Banks, a son of Joseph Banks, of Fairfield, removed to Redding at an early day; married, June 11, 1763, Mabel Wheeler (town record says Mehitable Wheeler). Their children were Hyatt, born Dec. 9, 1764; Jesse, born Oct. 29, 1766; Joanna, born July 27, 1768; Mabel, born Oct. 2, 1772 (died in infancy); Mary, born June 23, 1774; Mabel, born Nov. 17, 1776.

Jesse married, Dec. 15, 1787, Martha Summers; Mabel married Ebenezer Foot, Aug. 29, 1797. Seth Banks also appears in Redding contemporary with Jesse; married Sarah Pickett, Nov. 20, 1776, and had children: Mehitable, born Jan. 15, 1778, and Thomas; and perhaps others.

The Barlow family in Redding is descended from John Barlow, who appears in Fairfield as early as 1668, and died in 1674. Samuel Barlow, son of Samuel Barlow, of Fairfield, grandson of John Barlow, he a son of the first settler of that name, removed to Redding about 1740, and settled in what is now Boston District, near the present residence of Bradley Hill. He married, first, Eunice, daughter of Daniel Bradley, of Fairfield, Aug. 2, 1731. Their children were Daniel, born Nov. 21, 1734; Ruhamah, born Jan. 22, 1737; James, born Jan. 29, 1739; Jabez, born March 21, 1742. After the death of his first wife, Samuel Barlow married Esther, daughter of Nathaniel Hull, of Redding, Aug. 7, 1774; she died Aug. 28, 1775, aged fifty-four years. Their children were Nathaniel, born May 13, 1745; Aaron, born Feb. 11, 1759; Samuel, born April 3, 1752; Joel, the poet, born March 21, 1754; Huldah, born —.

Mr. Samuel Barlow purchased his farm of James Bradley for two thousand five hundred pounds. It consisted of one hundred and seventy acres, with "buildings thereon," and was bounded on the north by the first cross highway from the rear of the long lots,—without doubt the road leading from Boston through the centre to Redding Ridge. "This northern boundary," says Mr. Hill, "together with the familiar names of the old owners of property on the other side of the farm, and also the names of such familiar localities on the farm as 'the boggs,' and the 'flat ridge,' and the 'up-and-down road,' leading to each from the main road, mark this farm purchased by Samuel Barlow as being unmistakably the present property of Bradley Hill and the heirs of Gershom Hill. There was on it at the time a good substantial dwelling-house of respectable size, erected by a previous owner, and which stood about four hundred feet west of the present residence of Bradley Hill, on the same side of the street. The house was demolished in 1823. Having purchased this property, Jan. 2, 1749, he undoubtedly located his family on it the following spring, as in subsequent deeds he is recognized as a resident of the 'Parish of Reading.' It was here that Aaron, Samuel, Joel, and Huldah were born. It was here he lived and died, and from here he was buried in the old cemetery west of the Congregational church in Redding Centre."

Of the children of Samuel Barlow, Daniel and Ruhamah died early. James settled in Ridgefield, on a farm of one hundred and thirty acres conveyed to him by his father March 30, 1770. He had four children: Samuel, who removed to the South, Lewis, Abigail, and James, who settled in Vermont. Jabez, the youngest son by the first wife, settled in Ohio.

Nathaniel Barlow married Jane Bradley, who was born May, 1741. Their children were Gershom, born Oct. 21, 1765, died of consumption, Sept. 24, 1794; Esther, born Sept. 30, 1767 (a deaf-mute), died May 19, 1783; Sarah, born Jan. 16, 1770, died April 11, 1845; Jonathan, born April 14, 1772, died Aug. 28, 1775; Betsey, born Aug. 2, 1778, died Sept. 9, 1864; Huldah, born April 3, 1780 (a deaf-mute), died Aug. 29, 1787. Mr. Nathaniel Barlow died Dec. 26, 1782.

Aaron Barlow settled in Redding, on Umpawaug Hill, on a farm purchased by his father several years before. He was a man of ability, tall and of imposing bearing, and served in the capacity of a colonel in the Revolution. He removed to Norfolk, Va., and died there of yellow fever. His children were Elnathan, who died young; Elnathan, died in the war of 1812; Samuel, removed to Ohio; Stephen, a lawyer in Ohio; Daniel, lived and died in Redding; Aaron, died at sea; Esther, died at Norfolk, of yellow fever; Joel, died in Redding; Rebecca, lived and died in Redding; and Thomas, called after Thomas Paine by his Uncle Joel.

Thomas was educated and adopted by his uncle, the poet, and accompanied him to France as his private secretary. He was also his companion on the fatal journey to Wilna. After the death of his uncle Thomas returned to America and established himself as a lawyer in Pittsburgh, Pa., and died there.

Samuel Barlow, the third son by the second wife, was a soldier in the Revolutionary army, and died at Rhinebeck, N. Y., on his return from the expedition against Ticonderoga. A stone to his memory was erected in the old cemetery in Redding, near the Congregational church, and which is still standing.

Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett, second pastor of the Congregational Church in Redding, became a resident in 1753, and so remained until his death, in 1810. He married, June 13, 1753, Mrs. Eunice Russell, of Branford, Conn. Their children were Russell, baptized June 9, 1754; Daniel C., baptized Jan. 16, 1757; Anne, Feb. 25, 1759; Eunice, April 26, 1761; Jonathan, Oct. 14, 1764; Lucretia, March 27, 1768. Russell married, Feb. 28, 1776, Rachel Taylor, and had children: Clare, baptized March 30, 1777, and Flora, baptized Aug. 29, 1779. Daniel C. married Esther Read, Jan. 7, 1778, and settled in Amenia, N. Y., where some of his descendants now reside. Rev. Jonathan married, first, Roda, daughter of Lemuel Sanford; second, Betsey Marvin, of Wilton; and third, Abigail, daughter of Lemuel Sanford. He had no children.

David Bartram removed from Fairfield to Redding as early as 1733, in which year he appears as surveyor of highways. He was a farmer, and settled in Lontown. He had five sons and three daughters born in Fairfield,—viz., David, Paul, James, Daniel, born Oct. 23, 1745, John, Mabel, Hannah, and Betsey. All the sons settled in Redding. David married, April 30, 1762, Phebe Morehouse, by whom he had Joel, David, John, Jonathan, Hulda, Hepsy, and Phebe. (Family record.) Paul married, Sept. 19, 1756, Mary Hawley. Their children were Joseph, born Jan. 28, 1758, died in infancy; Mary, born May 12, 1760; Sarah, born Aug. 6, 1762; Eunice, born Jan. 3, 1765; Eli, born March 30, 1767; Ruth, born Jan. 7, 1769; Ezekiel, born July 9, 1770 (town records); Ezra, baptized May 9, 1773; Joseph, baptized March 19, 1776. Family record mentions a daughter Olive.)

Of these children, Mary married Jabez Burr, and removed to Clarendon, Vt.; Sarah married Milo Palmer, and removed to the same place; Eunice married Daniel Parsons, of Redding; Eli married Dolly Lyon, of Redding, and about 1804 removed to Delaware Co., N. Y. His children were William, Belinda, Phebe, and Lodena. Ezekiel married Esther, daughter of Jonathan Parsons, of Redding. Their children were Mary, Jared, Milo, Clarissa, Elizabeth, Jehu, Sarah, Elias, Ezra, Phebe, and Noah. One of his sons, Jehu, studied law and rose to eminence in the profession; was judge, representative, and senator. Ezekiel moved to Ohio at an early day and settled in Marion, where he resided until his death, March 15, 1845. Ezra was a sailor; married Elinor, daughter of Chauncey Merchant, of Redding, and, quitting the sea, removed to Delaware Co., N. Y., where he died shortly after, leaving children: Joel M., Ezra, Uriah, and Lucy. Joseph removed first to Vermont, and afterwards to Tioga Co., N. Y. Olive married Justus Stillson, of Redding, and removed to Groton, N. Y.

James Bartram, son of David, settled in Redding; was a private in the Revolution; married Hannah Morehouse, who became the mother of twenty-one children, ten only of whom survived. These were Isaac, born April 15, 1758; Noah, born 1760; James, born 1770; Aaron, born Feb. 21, 1784; Lucy, Hannah, Betsey, Irena, and Anna.

Of these children, Isaac settled in Redding; married Molly Hamilton, by whom he had children as follows: Isaac, Harry, David, Willis, Chasie, Lucy, Polly, and Huldah. Aaron also settled in Redding, married Eunice Jenkins, and raised a large family of children.

Daniel, fourth son of David, also settled in Redding, was a tanner and carrier by trade, and built the first works of the kind in the town, on the ground now occupied by Walter M. Edmonds for the same purpose. He married, Oct. 10, 1768, Ann Merchant, of Redding. Their children were Esther, born April 16, 1770; Gurdon, born Oct. 25, 1771 (died in infancy); Anna, born Jan. 23, 1773 (died in infancy); Elinor, born March 1, 1774 (died in infancy); Gurdon, born Sept. 21, 1776; Anna, born Aug. 10, 1778 (married — Mead; settled in Ridgefield); Elinor, born Feb. 4, 1780 (died in infancy); Uriah, born Jan. 9, 1782; Elinor, born Oct. 28, 1783 (married — Nash; settled in Marion); Julilla, born Nov. 12, 1785 (married — Bangs; settled in Central New York); Levi, born Nov. 26, 1787; Phebe, born Sept. 19, 1790 (married — Curtin); David, born June 5, 1795.

At the time of Tryon's invasion, with nearly every other man in the town capable of bearing arms, Daniel Bartram joined the militia and marched to the defense of Danbury. Being absent several days, he sent word to his wife that she must get some one to take the hides from the vats or they would spoil. There was not a man to be found; and so the brave woman, leaving her four small children to amuse one another, caught her horse, hitched him to the bark-mill, ground the bark, took the hides out, turned and re-packed them, and had just seated herself at the dinner-table when her husband rode up, having gained leave of absence for the purpose of attending to the matter.

John Bartram, son of David the first, married, Sept. 19, 1756, Charity Bulkley. Family record mentions two children,—Sally and Samuel.

Elias Bates was received to church-membership in Redding Jan. 19, 1745; his wife, Sarah, March 4, 1748. There is no hint of his previous residence, and he probably came here direct from England. His children recorded in Redding were Justus, baptized July 26, 1747, and Sarah, baptized Feb. 2, 1752; by a second wife, Tabitha —, Walker, baptized Jan. 6, 1760, Elias, baptized Feb. 16, 1761, died in infancy.

John Bates, probably son of Elias, married Esther —. Their children were Ezra, baptized March 23, 1760 (died in infancy); John, baptized July 25, 1762; Sarah, baptized May 5, 1764; Esther, baptized Aug. 23, 1767; Nathan, baptized March 25, 1770; Aaron, July 1, 1772; Martha and Slawson, Jan. 26, 1778.

Justus Bates, son of Elias, married Hannah Coley, May 23, 1770. They had one child, Elias, baptized Oct. 4, 1772, who married, Nov. 9, 1793, Lydia Andrews, of Redding, and was the father of three children: Walker, born June 4, 1796; Amaziah, born May 17, 1801; Harriet, born May 21, 1801.

John Beach, missionary of the Church of England in Redding, was born in Stratford, Conn., Oct. 6, 1700. His father was Isaac Beach, son of the John Beach who came from England in 1643. He graduated from Yale College in 1721. He married, first, Sarah —, who died in 1756, and, second, Abigail Holbrook, who after his death returned to Derby. He had in all nine children. Those who had families were Joseph, born Sept. 26, 1727; Phebe, born 1729 (married Daniel Hill, of Redding; died 1751, leaving a son Abel); John, born 1734 (married Phebe Curtis; died in 1791); Lazarus, born 1736; had two children,—viz., Lazarus, born 1760, and Isaac, born 1773.

Lazarus inherited his father's land in Redding, at Hopewell, near which he built his house. Lazarus Beach, Jr., was of a literary turn, and edited a paper at Bridgeport, and afterwards at Washington, D. C. On his journey to the latter place he lost his trunk or valise, containing the Beach manuscripts and all his materials gathered for the purpose of writing a memoir of his distinguished grandfather. He built the house now standing near Mr. Godfrey's. Isaac Beach built the house now occupied by Hull B. Bradley. The Rev. John Beach lived about thirty to forty rods south of the church, probably on the site of the old Capt. Munger house, which has long since disappeared; the well is still used by Mr. E. P. Shaw. Lucy, daughter of the Rev. John Beach, married Rev. Mr. Townsend, and was lost at sea on her passage to Nova Scotia, probably at the time of the great exodus of loyalists after the Revolution. The mother of James Sanford, Sr., was the daughter of Lazarus and granddaughter of Rev. John Beach.

The Benedicts were a Norwalk family, and settled quite largely in Ridgefield. The first of the name found in Redding was Thaddeus Benedict, who was a lawyer and town clerk for a term of years. His house stood in the lot adjoining the Congregational parsonage, near the site of the present residence of Joseph Squire. His law-office was under the great elm in front of his house. He married Deborah Read, July 12, 1775, daughter of Col. John Read, who bore him several children.

Lieut. Stephen Betts, a prominent character in the Revolution, lived on Redding Ridge, in a house that stood on the corner, nearly opposite the former residence of Francis A. Sanford. He was an active Whig, and was taken prisoner by the British on their march to Danbury, in 1777. He had a son Daniel and two or three daughters, of whom there is no record. His son Daniel was a merchant for a while in Redding Ridge, and then removed to New Haven, where some of his children are now living.

Among the earliest settlers of Redding were Jehu, Stephen, and Peter Burr, sons of Daniel Burr, of Fairfield, and brothers of the Rev. Aaron Burr, president of Princeton College. They all appear at about the same time,—viz., 1739. In October of that year Stephen Burr was elected a member of the First Society committee of the parish. He married Elizabeth Hull June 8, 1721. Children: Grace, born Dec. 12, 1724; Elizabeth, born Jan. 17, 1728; Hezekiah, born Sept. 1, 1730; Sarah, born Nov. 9, 1732; Martha, born March 24, 1735; Esther, born Feb. 5, 1743; Rebecca. He married, second, Abigail Hall, of New Jersey. He lived in a house that stood where Dr. Gorham later built his residence. His only son, Hezekiah, died December, 1785, unmarried. Of the daughters, Grace married Daniel Gold, Elizabeth married Reuben Squire, Sarah married Joseph Jackson, Martha married Zaariah Summers. Esther married Antony Angevine, and Rebecca married Seth Sanford. Deacon Stephen Burr died in 1779. Of him Col. Aaron Burr wrote in his journal in Paris: "My uncle Stephen lived on milk-punch, and at the age of eighty-six mounted by the stirrup a very gay horse and galloped off with me twelve miles without stopping, and was, I thought, less fatigued than I."

Peter Burr first appears in Redding as clerk of a society-meeting held Oct. 11, 1739. His children were Ellen, baptized Sept. 19, 1734; Sarah, baptized Feb. 21, 1736; Ezra, baptized Jan. 2, 1737; Edmund, baptized Sept. 28, 1761. Peter Burr died in August, 1779; his children shortly after removed to Virginia.

Jehu Burr and wife were admitted to church-membership in Redding Dec. 21, 1738. None of his children were recorded in Redding, and none, so far as known, settled there. He owned property in Fairfield, and probably spent the last years of his life there.

Jabez Burr, son of Joseph Burr, of Fairfield, and his wife Elizabeth appear in Redding as early as 1743. Their children were Elijah, baptized May 15, 1743; Nathan, born Jan. 1, 1745; Jabez —; Ezekiel, born March 23, 1755; Stephen, born Jan. 16, 1757; Joel, born Sept. 9, 1759; Eunice, Huldah, and Hannah. Jabez Burr died in 1770. He is said to have settled in the Sangatuck Valley, near the present residence of Stephen Burr, and to have built there the first grist-mill in the town. Of his children, Elijah married Roda Sanford, April 2, 1767, and had children,—Lemuel and Elizabeth,—and by a second wife, Eunice Hawley, married April 27, 1773, Joseph, Roda, John, who died of yellow fever in the West Indies, and Lucy, who married Jonathan Knapp, of Redding. Nathan, the second son, removed to Pawlings, Dutchess Co., N. Y., in 1792, and there founded a numerous and wealthy family. Jabez, the third son, married Mary, daughter of Paul Bartram, and removed to Clarendon, Vt., in 1786. He had one son, Aaron. Ezekiel married Huldah Merchant, of Redding, who bore him three children: Aaron, who lived and died in the house now owned by Capt. Davis; William, who removed to Kentucky in 1816; and Huldah, who married Daniel Mallory in 1806 and removed to the West.

A son of William Burr is now president of the St. Louis National Bank. Another son, George, a teller in the same institution, was the companion of Prof. Wise in his late fatal balloon expedition, and shared the fate of the aeronaut. Stephen Burr married Mary Griffin, of Redding. His children were Clara, Mary, Stephen, and Ezekiel. Joel Burr married Elizabeth Gold, and settled in Ballston Springs, N. Y.

William Burritt and wife were admitted members of the church Dec. 9, 1739. No hint of their previous residence is given. Their children recorded at Redding were Mary, baptized Dec. 16, 1739; Abijah, Jan. 18, 1741; Roda, Oct. 24, 1742; Sybil, Feb. 19, 1744. Gershom Burritt appears at the same time. His son Solomon was baptized Aug. 5, 1739; Noah, Jan. 31, 1842; Nathaniel, Oct. 17, 1743; Isaac, July 21, 1745.

Benjamin Burton, son of Solomon, was baptized Dec. 19, 1742. Ruth, a daughter, was baptized Oct. 7, 1744. Solomon Burton and his wife were church-members July 5, 1741.

Samuel Chatfield and wife were admitted church-members July 29, 1733. Their children recorded were Samuel, baptized July 29, 1733; Daniel, baptized Aug. 31, 1735; Sarah, April 17, 1737; Martha, baptized May 20, 1739.

Capt. Samuel Couch, of Fairfield, was one of the largest landholders in Redding at one time, and was largely instrumental in its settlement. He was, however, never resident here. Ebenezer Couch appears here as early as 1739. His children recorded were Daniel, baptized July 29, 1739; Adea, baptized Sept. 19, 1742; Elijah, baptized July 26, 1747; Thesde, Jan. 26, 1755.

The following children of John Couch and his wife Elizabeth are recorded: John, baptized March 20, 1748; Stephen, Jan. 21, 1753; Adria, baptized April 20, 1755; Elizabeth, baptized July 17, 1757; Samuel, baptized Aug. 30, 1758.

At an early day nearly the entire district of Couch's Hill was purchased by Mr. Simon Couch, of Fairfield, who gave his name to the district purchased. His wife was Abigail Hall, a member of a notable Fairfield family. His will, dated March 2, 1712-13, is still in the possession of Mr. Nash Couch, of Couch's Hill, who is a lineal descendant. In this will he gives his "Negro man Jack" and "negro maid Jinne" to his wife, in addition to other bequests. His children mentioned in the will were Simon, Jr., Thomas, Abigail, Hannah, Sarah, Isabel, and Deborah. Thomas was lost at sea while on a voyage to England. Simon settled on his father's estate in Redding; married, Jan. 27, 1753, Rebecca, daughter of Capt. Thomas Nash, of Fairfield. Their children, as given in the genealogy of the Nash family, were Abigail, baptized Feb. 10, 1754 (died young); Simon, born May 18, 1755 (settled at Green's Farms); Thomas Nash, born April 18, 1758 (settled at Redding); Rebecca, born Jan. 31, 1761; Abigail, baptized Jan. 27, 1765; Lydia, born Oct. 20, 1767. Deacon Simon Couch died April 25, 1809.

Thomas Couch, of Fairfield, removed to Redding prior to the Revolution, and settled on Umpawaug Hill. He married, April 2, 1772, Sarah, daughter of Jonathan Nash, of Fairfield. Their children were Sarah, born Aug. 9, 1773 (died young); Thomas, born Sept. 23, 1774; Jonathan, born Feb. 13, 1777 (father of Maj.-Gen. Couch, distinguished in the war of the Rebellion); Sarah, born Sept. 18, 1779; Nathan, born Sept. 25, 1781; Esther, born Dec. 14, 1783; Moses, born Oct. 2, 1786; Edward, born March 7, 1789; Hezekiah, born March 14, 1791; Mary, born April 21, 1793; John, born July 28, 1795. Mr. Thomas Couch died in Redding in 1817.

At the outbreak of the Revolution, Thomas Couch enlisted in the patriot army, and was one of the band of heroes who were present with Montgomery at the siege of Quebec. He left his wife with their young children in Fairfield. When Tryon moved on that town, Mrs. Couch had what furniture and grain she could gather put into an ox-cart, drawn by two yoke of oxen, and started for Redding, where she owned land in her own right. She followed on horseback, carrying her two children in her arms. At the close of the war Thomas joined his wife in Redding, where they continued to reside until death.

Simon Couch, brother of Thomas, settled in Redding, on Umpawaug Hill, about the same time. He married, Jan. 7, 1776, Eleanor, daughter of Jonathan Nash, of Fairfield. Their children were Elizabeth, born Oct. 9, 1776; Jessup, born Aug. 3, 1778; Seth, born Aug. 31, 1780; Eleanor, born Aug. 26, 1782; Simon, born Dec. 1, 1784; Nash, born April 23, 1787; Priscilla, born June 27, 1790; Edward, born July 14, 1792; Simon A., born Dec. 6, 1794; Caroline, born June 23, 1801. Simon Couch died April 16, 1829. Of the children, Simon and Jessup graduated at Yale College. Jessup graduated in 1802, and in 1804 removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he practiced law until his appointment as judge of the Superior Court of Ohio in 1815; this office he continued to hold until his death, in 1821. In the war of 1812 he was also aide-de-camp to Governor Meigs, of Ohio, and bearer of dispatches to Gen. Hull.

Simon Couch, his brother, settled at Marion, Ohio, where he practiced medicine until his death, in 1826.

Eunice Darling, daughter of Joseph Darling, was baptized Jan. 25, 1736; Benjamin was baptized April 13, 1738; Martha, Jan. 11, 1741; Joseph, November, 1743.

Thomas Fairchild removed to Redding from Norwalk in 1733; was one of the original members of the church. His wife, Mary, was admitted Jan. 29, 1738. Their children recorded were Timothy and William, baptized Oct. 22, 1738; Sarah, April 12, 1741; Abigail, May 27, 1744; Mary, Oct. 27, 1745.

Abraham Fairchild, probably brother of above, came from Norwalk in 1746, and built the first fulling-mill in the town, near the site later occupied by Deacon Foster's woolen-mill. His wife was Sarah Scribner, of Norwalk. Their children were Abraham, born Jan. 1, 1745 (died aged seventeen); Ezekiel, born Oct. 26, 1746; Daniel, born Dec. 26, 1748; Isaac, born March 4, 1751; David, born June 5, 1753; Samuel, born July 9, 1755; Stephen, born March 7, 1758; Rachel, born Feb. 2, 1761; John, born March 15, 1764; Ellen, born Oct. 16, 1767. Six of these brothers were in the Revolutionary army at one time. David was captured by the British, and confined in Trinity church, New York. The smallpox was communicated to the prisoners,—it is said with design,—and he with many others died of the disease. Stephen was wounded at Ridgfield, but recovered; married Lizzie Fitch, of Wilton. Their children were Daniel, Kier, Isaac, Ellen, and Stephen. Ezekiel married Eunice Andrews and had four children,—Abraham, Sarah, Abigail, and Burr; Daniel married Betsey Mead, and removed to the West; Isaac married Rachel Banks, and removed to Liberty, N. Y.; Samuel married Nabby Platt, of Redding, and had two children,—Aaron and Betsey; John married Abigail Wakeman, of Weston, and had children: Eli, David, Rachel, Moses, Henry, and Eliza; David married Charlotte Guyer, of Weston, and had children: Eli, William, David, Mary, and John. Rachel married Seth Andrews, of Redding; Ellen married Minott Thomas, a Baptist clergyman.

Stephen, Samuel, and John built a grist-mill at an early day on the site of the one later known as Treadwell's mill. It was carried off by the great freshet of 1807, and the large stock of grain it contained was scattered over the meadows below. They also owned a saw-mill just below, and sawed plank for the soldiers' huts in the Revolution.

Reginald Foster, the founder of the family in America, came to this country in 1638 with his five sons,—Abraham, Reginald, William, Isaac, and Jacob,—and settled at Ipswich, Essex Co., Mass. Jacob Foster was the ancestor of the Redding family. Jonah Foster settled in Redding about 1775; married Hannah Benedict, of Ridgefield, and shortly after removed to that town, and there resided until his death, in 1815. His son, Joel Foster, was born in Redding Nov. 8, 1789, and lived in Ridgefield with his parents until his marriage with Esther Seymour, in 1802. In 1803 he removed to Redding, and bought of Moses Fox a small place on which was a fulling-mill and other conveniences for cheapening cloths. This mill stood a little below the present bridge over Nobb's Crook Brook, and the ruins of its dam are still to be seen. In 1804, Mr. Foster built an addition to his fulling-mill building, which was leased to Zalmon Toucey, of Newtown, and in which Toucey erected a carding-machine, paying a yearly rent of twenty dollars.

How long Mr. Toucey's lease continued is not known, but he probably soon relinquished it to Joel Foster, as the latter continued the business until about the time of the opening of the war of 1812, when a company was formed, styled Comstock, Foster & Co., who built a woolen-factory a few rods below the old fulling-mill, and continued the manufacture of woolen goods during the entire period of the war, being very successful. The company, a few years after the war, was bought out by Joel Foster, who continued the business until the burning of his factory, in 1843 or 1844, when he retired. Mr. Foster died in 1854, aged seventy-four years. He had four children, all born in Redding: Daniel, Betsey, Eliza, and Charles F.

Daniel, Samuel, and Stephen Gold (now written Gould), brothers, members of a Fairfield family that had been prominent in Church and State for several generations, were among the early settlers of the town, though none of their descendants are now found among us. Daniel appears first; he married Grace, daughter of Deacon Stephen Burr, and lives where James Lord now lives. His children, as named in the will of Deacon Burr, were Abigail, who married Richard Nichols; Esther, who married Nathaniel Northrop; Sarah, who married David Turney; Mary, who married Seth Price; and Elizabeth.

Samuel Gold settled in Lonetown, and built the house now owned by Seth Todd. He was a soldier in the Revolution, and was wounded at the skirmish in Ridgefield. Some of the officers of Putnam's command had their quarters at Mr. Gold's during their encampment in Redding. He married Sarah Platt, of Redding. Their children were Hezekiah, Daniel, Burr, Aaron, Sarah, Polly, and Grace. Stephen Gold settled on the farm later owned by Timothy Platt in Lonetown. He is called captain in the records. He did not long remain a resident of Redding, but returned, it is said, to Greenfield.

Isaac Gorham and his wife, Ann, first appear on the parish records Jan. 25, 1762, when their son Isaac was baptized. There is no hint of their former residence, but they were probably from Fairfield. There is no further record of children.

Daniel Gray and wife were admitted church-members Dec. 5, 1742; John Gray and wife, Feb. 9, 1744, on the recommendation of Rev. Mr. Dickinson, of Norwalk.

The only child of Daniel Gray recorded was James, baptized May 8, 1743. The children of John Gray were Hannah, baptized July 1, 1744; Joseph, July 15, 1753; Eunice, Jan. 2, 1755; and (by a second wife, Ruamah) Eunice, baptized April 13, 1760, and Joel, Sept. 11, 1763.

Stephen, son of Stephen and Sarah Gray, was baptized May 10, 1747; also Huldah, a daughter, Dec. 11, 1760; Hannah, Oct. 3, 1762; Sarah, June 17, 1764. James Gray, only son of Daniel, married Mabel Phinney, Feb. 9, 1764. Their children were Jesse, baptized April 14, 1765; perhaps others.

John Griffin appears in Redding as early as 1736. His children were Sarah, baptized May 9, 1736; Annie, baptized Oct. 22, 1738; Jonathan, baptized Nov. 23, 1746. He settled in West Redding, near the Danbury line.

The Halls were among the earliest settlers in Redding, the name appearing on the earliest petitions from the parish. In 1730, at the distribution of the estate of Samuel Hall, he is said to be of Chestnut Ridge, in Reading. His children, as given, were Ebenezer, Johannah, Jemima, and Rebecca. Isaac Hall, whose farm lay contiguous to Samuel's, was one of the original church-members, and was recommended by Rev. Mr. Chapman; he died in 1741. Asa Hall and Rachel, his wife, were admitted March 23, 1736, on the same recommendation. There is no mention of children.

Joseph Hawley and wife were admitted church-members in December, 1740, on recommendation of Rev. Mr. Gold of Stratford. Their children recorded were Mary, baptized Feb. 7, 1742; Ruth, Nov. 5, 1746; Eunice, Oct. 25, 1750. Joseph Hawley died Dec. 12, 1771, aged sixty-six years. William Hawley, who appears in Redding as early as 1762, was probably his son. He lived where James Miller now lives; married Lydia, daughter of Capt. Thomas Nash, of Fairfield, July 12, 1758. Their children were Lydia (died in infancy); Joseph, born June 23, 1762 (settled in Redding); Lydia, born Dec. 13, 1763 (married Aaron Sanford, of Redding); William (died in infancy); Bille, born Feb. 9, 1767 (removed to the West); Hezekiah (died in infancy); Hezekiah, born March 10, 1772; Lemuel (died young, of smallpox). William Hawley died Feb. 16, 1797; Mrs. Lydia Hawley died April 26, 1812.

The founder in America of the Hill family was William Hill, who on his arrival here, about 1632, settled first at Dorchester, Mass., and shortly after removed to Windsor, on the Connecticut River, where he bought land and set out an orchard. At an early day he removed to Fairfield, and was among the early settlers of that town. He died in 1650. His children were Sarah, William, Joseph, Ignatius, James, and Elizabeth. William, the second child, married Elizabeth ——. Their children were Sarah, William, Joseph, John, Eliphalet, Ignatius, and James. William, the third, married ——, and had children,— Sarah, William, Joseph, and David. William Hill, the fourth, married Sarah ——. Their children were Joseph, William, and David. Deacon Joseph Hill, born April 1, 1699, married Abigail Dimon March 30, 1731. The children of this marriage were Abigail, born March 21, 1732; Sarah, born Aug. 21, 1733; David, born April 22, 1737; Ebenezer, born Feb. 26, 1742; Jabez, born June 17, 1744; Moses, born Jan. 11, 1748. Of the sons, only Ebenezer, Jabez, and Moses married. Ebenezer married Mabel Sherwood, Jan. 17, 1765. Their children were David, Ebenezer, Seth, Dimon, Joseph, Mabel, Eleanor, Jabez, and Esther. Ebenezer, his second son, married Sarah, daughter of Nathaniel Barlow, brother of the poet, in May, 1791. He removed to Redding early in life, and settled in Boston District. His children were Mabel, Nathaniel B., Gershom, Ebenezer, Moses, and Jabez. Jabez Hill, son of Deacon Joseph Hill, settled in Weston; was a major in the army of the Revolution; married Sarah, daughter of Col. John Read, of Redding. The children of this marriage were Sarah, John Read, and Moses. Sarah married Timothy Platt, of Redding. John Read settled in Redding at an early day, and became one of its wealthiest and best-known residents. He began his business career by engaging in the manufacture of lime, and on his retirement, in 1823, purchased the "manor" of his grandfather, Col. John Read, where he continued to reside until his death, in 1851. He married, March 23, 1799, Betsy, daughter of Aaron Sanford, of Redding. Their children were Aaron Sanford, Moses, William Hawley, Betsy, John Lee, Morris, Lydia, and Joseph.

Moses Hill, a son of Deacon Joseph Hill, married Esther, daughter of Ebenezer Burr, of Fairfield, June 17, 1773. The children by this marriage were William, Abigail, and Esther. William married Betsey, daughter of Nathaniel Barlow, brother of the poet, and had children,—Bradley, Abigail, Horace, Burr, and William.

In Revolutionary days, and before, Squire Heron lived in the now ancient house on Redding Ridge, just south of the Episcopal church. He was a native of Cork, Ireland, a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, and a man of much ability and force of character.

It is said that he had taught the academy in Greenfield Hill before coming to Redding, and had also surveyed the old stage-route from New York to Boston. I cannot determine the precise date of his arrival here, but it was some time prior to the Revolution. In that memorable struggle he sided with the king, and was the recognized leader of the company of Tories on Redding Ridge. At the time of Tryon's invasion he openly gave aid and comfort to the enemy. After the war he became a prominent character in the town, and, although somewhat bigoted and imbued with the Old-World notions of caste and social distinctions, is said to have exercised a great deal of influence in public affairs, especially at town-meetings. "We must keep down the underbrush" was a favorite remark of his in speaking of the common people. The following story, illustrating in a marked manner the customs of the day, is related of him:

At one of the annual town-meetings Mr. Hezekiah Morgan, a somewhat illiterate man, was nominated for grand juror. Squire Heron, in laced waistcoat, ruffles, and velvet breeches, and aiding himself with his gold-headed cane, arose to oppose the motion. "Mr. Moderator," said he, "who is this Kier Morgan? Why, a man brought up in Hopewell Woods; he fears neither God, man, nor the devil. If elected, who will be responsible for his acts? Will you, Mr. Moderator? or I? Why, sir, he can arrest anybody; he can arrest Your Honor, or even myself;" and with like cogent reasons succeeded in defeating the obnoxious candidate.

Squire Heron died Jan. 8, 1819, aged seventy-seven years, and is buried in the old Episcopal churchyard on Redding Ridge. His children were William, Maurice, Elizabeth, Lucy, Elosia, Margaret, and Susan. William never married. He lived on the old homestead in Redding all his days, and was a man much respected in the community. His brother Maurice graduated at Yale College, and shortly after was killed by a steamboat explosion on the Connecticut River, near Essex.

George Hull, the ancestor of the Hulls of Fairfield County, appears in Dorchester, Mass., in 1630. He died in Fairfield in 1659. His will, dated Aug. 25, 1659, mentions sons, Josias and Cornelius, and several daughters. His son Cornelius married Rebecca, daughter of Rev. John Jones, the first minister of Fairfield, evidently Nov. 29, 1653, as that is the date he is given a homestead by his father on the occasion of his marriage. His will, of the date Sept. 16, 1695, names three sons—Samuel, Cornelius, and Theophilus—and three daughters,—Rebecca, Sarah, the wife of Robert Silliman, and Martha, wife of Cornelius Stratton. Robert Silliman was the father of Ebenezer Silliman, and grandfather of Gen. Gold Sellick Silliman, of Revolutionary fame, and great-grandfather of Benjamin Silliman, LL.D., the distinguished professor of chemistry and mineralogy in Yale College.

Cornelius, second son of Cornelius Hull (1st), married Sarah, daughter of the first Ezekiel Sanford. Their children were George, Sarah, Rebecca, Nathaniel, Ebenezer, Elizabeth, Martha, John, Eleanor, and Cornelius. Deacon George Hull was prominent in the first settlement of Redding, particularly in the formation of the church. He was moderator of the first parish-meeting, a member of the first parish committee, and first deacon of the church. He also appears on numerous committees. He and his wife, Ebenezer and wife, and Theophilus and wife were among the original church-members in 1733. John Hull was admitted April 18, 1736. All of them removed from Greenfield Hill. Cornelius, George, and Ebenezer were commended to the church at Greenfield Hill from the first church in Fairfield, and Theophilus from the church in Green's Farms in 1726.

Deacon George Hull married Martha, daughter of Samuel Gregory, of Stratfield. His children recorded in Reading are Seth, baptized July 29, 1733, and Rebecca, May 25, 1735. He died Feb. 9, 1769, aged eighty-three. Seth Hull married Elizabeth Mallory. His children recorded in Reading are Abigail, born Jan. 28, 1762; Jonathan, Oct. 25, 1763; Eliphalet, Dec. 18, 1765; Walter, Nov. 21, 1767; Lazarus, Jan. 16, 1770; Hezekiah, March 24, 1792; Martha, April 28, 1794. Besides these were Elizabeth and Sarah. Jonathan married Eunice Beach, granddaughter of Rev. John Beach, and was the father of Rev. Lemuel Beach Hull, former rector of Christ Church in Redding. Martha married David Belden, an Episcopal clergyman. Seth Hull died April 5, 1795.

Nathaniel Hull was born in 1695, and reared Sarah, Elizabeth, Esther, Stephen, Nathaniel, Peter, Ezekiel, David, Aaron, Silas, and Hannah. Silas married Huldah Goodsell, Nov. 26, 1761; she died young, leaving two daughters,—Hannah and Huldah. He married Ellen Bradley, Dec. 25, 1765; their children were Bradley and David. His third wife was — Smith, of Ridgefield, who died leaving no children. His fourth wife was Elizabeth Hoyt, who had a daughter, Sally. Silas Hull died in 1803. Bradley Hull, son of Silas and his second wife, Ellen Bradley, married Mary Chapman, daughter of Jedediah Hull. Their children were Burr, Pamela, Charry, Silas, Aaron B., Mary Chapman (who died in the third year of her age), Mary (who also died young), and Charles R. Bradley Hull's second wife was Susan Hubbell. Their children were Bradley H., Moses Chapman, Le Grand, and Cornelia.

The children of Ebenezer were Daniel, Ebenezer, Nehemiah, and Abigail. Daniel married Mary, daughter of Stephen Betts, Nov. 10, 1748, and removed from Redding to Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., in 1770; he was one of the first settlers of that town. He died Aug. 26, 1811, aged eighty-nine years. He had ten children,—viz., Martha, Hezekiah, Justus, Abigail, Peter, Esther, Daniel, Stephen, Harry, and Ebenezer. Justus was one of the first ministers of the Second Baptist Church in Danbury, and is reputed to have been a preacher of more than ordinary ability. He was in the ministry fifty-six years, and died in Berlin, N. Y., May 29, 1833, at the age of seventy-eight. His children were Justus P., Emmer-son, Polly Ann, and Alonzo Grandison. The last named is a physician, and resides in New York. He was a successful practitioner in London for twelve years. Ebenezer married and emigrated to the West.

John Hull removed to Redding when in middle life. He went with the provincial troops in the expedition against Cuba in 1741, and died of what the historian terms an "extraordinary sickness" which broke out among the troops, represented to have been "nearly as mortal as the plague. Of nearly one thousand men from New England not one hundred returned." He directed that his musket carried in the wars should be sent home to his eldest son, Timothy; he to leave it to his eldest son, and that it should descend in this manner to the eldest son as long as it existed. Thus it has fallen in regular descent to Mr. Aaron B. Hull, of Danbury, the great-grandson of the original owner. Before enlisting Mr. Hull made his will, dated Sept. 16, 1749, in which he mentions sons—Timothy, James, and John—and daughters,—Anna, Abigail, and Esther. Timothy was born Sept. 4, 1726, and married Anna, daughter of John Gray, Dec. 14, 1749. He died April 29, 1800. His children were Hannah, born July 27, 1751, married Samuel Mallory, and died in Danbury, Sept. 4, 1836; Sarah, born Feb. 5, 1754, married John Fairchild, and removed West; Ezra, born April 5, 1756, and died in Redding, March 5, 1837. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Onesimus Coley. His children were Eunice, born July 6, 1785, married Hiram Jackson, died in Kingston, N. Y., May 3, 1862; Laura, born Aug. 4, 1788, married John Eckert, and died in Springfield, Otsego Co., N. Y., Nov. 17, 1865; Polly, born Nov. 29, 1798, died in Kingston, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1876. Elizabeth, the wife of Ezra Hull, died Feb. 28, 1809.

He married widow Mary Bradley, daughter of Gershom Banks, of Fairfield, June 20, 1810; she died in Wilton, April 17, 1854. The children of this marriage were Ezra Bradley and Charles, who both died young, and Aaron B. Ezra Hull served in the Revolutionary war, and participated in those events which transpired during Governor Tryon's expedition to and the burning of Danbury. Eunice, fourth child of Timothy Hull, was born Aug. 26, 1757; married George Perry, and emigrated to Kentucky; John, born June 26, 1759, married Sarah Fairchild, died in Redding, April 7, 1838 (his children were Aaron, Ezekiel, Hezekiah, Abraham, and Polly); Abraham, born March 30, 1761, married Lois Starr, died in Danbury, Oct. 29, 1831 (his children were Betsey, Annis, Lucy, and Maria); David, born March 22, 1763, died in Redding, March 19, 1847 (he married Chloe Lee, and had children,—Daniel, Harry, and Lucy); Samuel, born June 22, 1766 (he married Anna Wakeman, and had one child, a daughter Eliza; he died in Redding, July 19, 1846; Hezekiah, born Oct. 22, 1769, died in Danbury, July 26, 1852 (he married Hannah Starr, and had an only child, a daughter, named Eliza); Anna, born Dec. 7, 1771, married Lemuel Burr, died in Redding, Dec. 20, 1840; Abigail, eleventh, and youngest child of Timothy Hull, born Nov. 17, 1775, married Timothy Perry, died in Miamisburg, Ohio, March 16, 1844.

The will of James, the second son of John Hull, of the date of April 26, 1799, mentions no children. He died Feb. 20, 1805, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. John married Molly Andrews, Feb. 3, 1763. His children recorded are Eleanor and Molly. His will, bearing date June 24, 1815, mentions no children, but names his grandson, John Goodyear, and the son of his grandson, Hull Goodyear, and two others, names not given, but which were undoubtedly Munson Goodyear and Ellen, wife of Harry Meeker.

Cornelius, the youngest son of Cornelius Hull (2d), and Abigail, daughter of Robert Rumsey, were married Aug. 24, 1731. Their children were Jedediah, Eunice, Grace, Eliphalet, Abigail, Sarah, and Rucy. Jedediah Hull was second lieutenant under Col. David Wooster in the army which invaded Canada in 1758. He married Mary Chapman, May 2, 1761. He died Feb. 14, 1796. His children were Denny, Eunice, Chapman, Mary Chapman, and Cornelius, and, by a second wife, Jedediah. Denny and Chapman settled in Redding. The children of the first-named were Mary, Denny, Isaac Platt, and Eunice. Chapman's were Morris, Henry C., and George.

The Redding records contain the marriage of Nehemiah Hull and Grizzle Perry, Feb. 5, 1767. Nehemiah, probably his son, married Sarah Jackson. Twin daughters were born to them, Dec. 7, 1792, and were named Sally Betsy and Betsy Sally. The first-named married Theophilus B., son of Zalmon Hull, and the other Morris, son of Chapman Hull.

Theophilus Hull, of Fairfield, youngest son of Cornelius Hull (1st), married Mary, daughter of Ezekiel Sanford (1st). His will, dated June 4, 1719, gives the names of sons—Theophilus, Eliphalet, John, and Jubesh—and daughters,—Mary and Ann. His oldest son, Theophilus, removed to Redding, and was one of the first deacons of the church there. From him descended Zalmon, Sarah, and Lydia Hull. Zalmon's sons were Hezekiah, Theophilus B., and Henry L., and his daughters Lydia and Sally. The descendants of Cornelius and Theophilus Hull, once so numerous in Redding, are now, especially those of the latter, scarcely represented there, having removed to other localities.

Ephraim Jackson and his wife, Martha, removed to Redding from Green's Farms, Fairfield, in 1748, and were admitted church-members the same year. He died April 28, 1765, aged sixty-five years. The children of his son, Ephraim Jackson, were as follows: Aaron, baptized Nov. 12, 1767; Mollie, baptized July 23, 1769; Peter, Sept. 8, 1771; Hezekiah, Feb. 27, 1774. David Jackson appears in Redding as early as 1763; was probably son of Ephraim; married, Nov. 18, 1762, Anna Sanford. Their children were Ezekiel, baptized Oct. 23, 1763; David, Feb. 2, 1766; Anna, Sept. 30, 1770 (died in infancy); Anna, Sept. 14, 1772; and, by a second wife, Esther, Moses, baptized Dec. 11, 1774; perhaps others. Ezekiel, son of David, married Hannah Gray, April 30, 1786 (town record). Their children were Anna, born Dec. 21, 1786; Hiram, born April 22, 1788; Samuel, born Dec. 29, 1789; Clarissa, born Dec. 25, 1792; Laura, born Feb. 28, 1794; Harriet, born Dec. 18, 1795. Harriet married Gideon H. Hollister, of Woodbury, and became the mother of Judge Gideon H. Hollister, the historian of Connecticut.

William Lee and wife were admitted church-members May 23, 1742. Their children recorded were Daniel, baptized Jan. 8, 1744; Abijah, baptized Sept. 21, 1745; Abigail, baptized May 5, 1748; William, baptized April 5, 1753; Seth, baptized March 23, 1755.

Joseph Lee and wife were admitted May 8, 1737. Their daughter Mary was baptized May 8, 1743.

Among the original members of the church at its organization in 1733 appear the names of Daniel Lion and wife, of Benjamin Lion and wife (recommended by Rev. Mr. Gay), and Richard Lion and wife. All settled in the southeastern part of the town, near what is now the Easton line. The record of their families is as follows: Child of Daniel: Jonathan, baptized April 12, 1741. Children of Benjamin: Bethel, baptized May 29, 1733; John, baptized Aug. 22, 1736; Samuel, baptized Aug. 29, 1738; Phebe, baptized Feb. 24, 1749. Richard Lion died in January, 1740, aged eighty-seven years.

David Lord was admitted church-member in 1744, recommended by Rev. Mr. Parsons, of Lyme. His children were David, baptized July 8, 1744; Elizabeth, baptized March 5, 1749; perhaps others.

Jonathan Mallory and wife were admitted church-members Dec. 22, 1735, on recommendation of Rev. Mr. Chapman. She was Elizabeth Adams. They were married April 10, 1735. Their children were Jonathan, baptized Jan. 11, 1736; Eliza, baptized Dec. 17, 1738; perhaps others. Peter Mallory married Joanna Hall, Feb. 28, 1737. Children: Rebecca, baptized Feb. 5, 1738 (died in infancy); Rebecca, baptized Jan. 13, 1739. Ebenezer Mallory and Hannah Keys were married Feb. 6, 1744; no children found. Daniel Mallory and Sarah Lee were married Nov. 30, 1748. Their children were Daniel, baptized Oct. 25, 1750; Nathan, Aug. 25, 1754; Abigail, April 24, 1757; Sarah, May 15, 1763; Joseph, baptized Feb. 12, 1767. Eunice, daughter of Daniel Mallory, Jr., and his wife Rachel, were baptized Sept. 5, 1779. Samuel and Charles Mallory were born April 6, 1780. The names of the parents are not given. Charles Mallory was the father of Stephen Mallory, United States senator from Florida, and later Secretary of the Confederate Navy.

Stephen Meade, the first of the name in Redding, appears as early as 1755. He married Rachel Sanford, daughter of Ephraim Sanford. Their children were Jeremiah, born March 22, 1752; Ezra, baptized Jan. 19, 1755; Hannah, baptized May 9, 1756; Esther, baptized Aug. 17, 1760; Thaddeus, baptized Oct. 25, 1761; Stephen, baptized Jan. 24, 1768. Stephen Meade is called lieutenant and captain in the records. He was a man quite prominent in town affairs; was elected the first clerk of the town at its organization, in 1767, and held other important offices. He lived in the centre, on the site of the present residence of Thomas Sanford.

Benjamin Meeker and wife were admitted church-members June 4, 1747. She was Catharine Burr. They were married July 20, 1745. Their children were Witely, baptized June 7, 1747; Esther and Eunice, baptized Aug. 13, 1755; Azariah, baptized Feb. 5, 1769. Daniel Meeker married Sarah Johnson, July 10, 1744. Their children were Elnathan, baptized July 26, 1747; Jared, baptized Jan. 29, 1749; Rebecca, baptized Jan. 20, 1751; Louis, baptized March 28, 1753; Josiah, baptized July 17, 1757.

About the same time appear David Meeker and Robert Meeker. The former married Hannah Hill, Oct. 31, 1744; the latter, Rebecca Morehouse, Sept. 19, 1746. No record of children. Joseph Meeker appears as early as May 4, 1735, when his son Isaac was baptized.

Gurdon Morehant married Elinor Chauncey (probably of Fairfield), Dec. 9, 1747. Their children were Amelia, baptized Feb. 5, 1749; Chauncey, Feb. 25, 1753; John, baptized Aug. 31, 1755; Elinor, Jan. 8, 1758; Gurdon, March 16, 1760; Joel, June 6, 1762; Phebe, May 20, 1764; Silas, May 8, 1766. Gurdon Morehant was the first town treasurer, and held other offices of trust. The family figures quite prominently in the later history of the town.

Gershom Morehouse and wife were admitted members of the church May 8, 1737, on recommendation of Rev. Mr. Hobart, of Fairfield; also Jonathan Morehouse, July 5, 1741. There are no children of Gershom Morehouse recorded in Redding. The Gershom Morehouse who married Anna Sanford, Jan. 18, 1748, was probably his son. The children of the second Gershom Morehouse were Ezra, baptized April 28, 1754; Bille, baptized July 18, 1756; Aaron, baptized June 4, 1758; Jane, baptized Nov. 4, 1760; Ann, baptized June 19, 1764; Hill, baptized May 5, 1765; Lucy, baptized July 12, 1767; Betty, baptized Aug. 6, 1769; Elizabeth Ruth, baptized Nov. 10, 1771; Polly, May 15, 1774; Polly, baptized May 4, 1777. The children of Jonathan Morehouse were Joanna and Mary, baptized April 13, 1738; Hannah, baptized June 3, 1739; Elijah, baptized March 11, 1742; Phebe, baptized May 27, 1744; Ruth, baptized June 14, 1747.

Ebenezer Perry removed to Redding, probably from Stratford, in 1735, in which year he was admitted church-member. His children were John, baptized May 10, 1741; Ebenezer, June 12, 1743; probably others.

Daniel Perry, son of Joseph Perry and Deborah Burr, of Fairfield, removed to Redding about 1770 and settled in the southwestern part of the town. He married, first, Mary, daughter of Peter Sturgis, of Fairfield, and, second, Sarah Wilson. His children, all by the second wife, were Grissel, born Feb. 10, 1745-46; Daniel, born April 15, 1747; John, born Dec. 30, 1748; Deborah, born Oct. 8, 1750; George, born Nov. 26, 1752; Isaac, born Nov. 3, 1754; Thomas, born Feb. 21, 1757. Of the sons, two at least, Daniel and John, settled in Redding. Daniel married, Feb. 19, 1772, Elizabeth Gorham, of Greenfield. His children were Timothy, baptized Jan. 10, 1773; Isaac, baptized Aug. 23, 1778; perhaps others.

Timothy Platt was admitted a church-member May 10, 1741, on recommendation of Rev. Mr. Chapman. But one child is found,—Abigail, baptized April 8, 1736; married Nathaniel Hill, May 28, 1754. He was probably father of the Timothy Platt who married the sister of John R. Hill and settled in Lontown, on the farm now owned by Henry Adams. Obadiah Platt, who appears in Redding as early as 1737, and Jonas Platt, who, with his wife Elizabeth, was admitted church-member Feb. 5, 1749, were probably his brothers. Timothy Platt died Dec. 5, 1769, aged sixty-two years. The children of Obadiah Platt were Mary, baptized Feb. 20, 1737; Elizabeth, May 15, 1739. Jonas Platt married Elizabeth Sanford, Oct. 17, 1747. Their children were John, baptized Feb. 5, 1752; Daniel, Aug. 11, 1754; Eunice, May 30, 1756. He removed to New York.

Hezekiah Platt appears in Redding as early as April 4, 1762, when his son Justus was baptized. His other children recorded were Hezekiah, Jan. 16, 1764; William, May 18, 1766; Griswold, Dec. 1, 1767; Robert, Sept. 1, 1771.

John Read, perhaps the earliest settler of Redding, was one of the most eminent men of his day. He was born in Connecticut in 1680, graduated from Harvard College in 1697, studied for the ministry, and preached for some time at Waterbury, Hartford, and Stratford. He afterwards studied law, and was admitted an attorney at the bar in 1708, and in 1712 was appointed queen's attorney for the colony. In 1714 he bought of the Indians a large tract of land in Lontown and settled there. He continued to reside in Redding until 1722, when he removed to Boston, and soon became known as the most eminent lawyer in the colonies. He was attorney-general of Massachusetts for several years, and also a member of the Governor's council. He died in February, 1749, leaving a large estate. His wife was Ruth Talcott, daughter of Lieut.-Col. John Talcott, of Hartford, and sister of Governor Joseph Talcott. They had six children: Ruth, born (probably) in Hartford in 1700, died in Redding, Aug. 8, 1766 (she was the wife of Rev. Nathaniel Hunn, first pastor of the church in Redding; they were married Sept. 14, 1737); John, born in Hartford in 1701, lived in Redding at the "Lone-town Manor," and was a leading man in his day in the colony; was much in public life, both civil and military, and was noted for his public spirit, patriotism and piety. He married twice. His first wife was Mary —, a Milford lady; his second wife was Sarah Bradley, of Greenfield Hill. His children were William, who married Sarah Hawley, of Redding; Zadmon, who married Hulda Bradley, of Greenfield; Hezekiah, who married Anna Gorham; John, who married Zoa Hilliard; Mary, wife of John Harpin; Sarah, wife of Jabez Hill, and afterwards of Theodore Monson; Ruth, wife of Jeremiah Mead; Deborah, wife of Thomas Benedict, a lawyer; Mabel, wife of Levi Starr; and Esther, wife of Daniel C. Bartlett, son of Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett. One of his children, a lad of four years, fell into a burning coal-pit in 1739, and was so badly burned that he survived but a few hours. His father wrote a letter to his father in Boston, informing him of the melancholy event, and his father sent back a letter in reply. Both of the letters are yet preserved, after a period of one hundred and forty years, and are both remarkable for the piety and Christian resignation manifested in them. The other children of John Read were William, born in Connecticut about 1710 (was a lawyer in Boston, and afterwards a judge in several of the courts there; he lived a bachelor, and died in 1780, aged seventy years); Mary, born (probably) in Reading, Conn., April 14, 1716 (married Captain Charles Morris, of Boston, afterwards of Halifax, Nova Scotia, where he was for many years chief justice of the courts; they had nine sons and two daughters); Abigail, married Joseph Miller, of Boston; Deborah, married a Mr. Willstead, and, afterwards, Henry Paget, of Smithfield, Rhode Island.

To the above sketch we add that Col. John Read, son of the Mr. John Read mentioned, appears as one of the original members of the First Society in 1729, and was the Col. John Read so often referred to in the town records. His "manour" comprised nearly all of what is now Lonetown, and his manor-house stood on the exact site of Mr. Aaron Treadwell's present residence. He had a fenced park, in which he kept deer, nearly opposite the present residence of William Sherwood.

Mr. George Read, of Redding Centre, has a very interesting collection of old papers belonging to the colonel, such as wills, deeds, account-books, etc. In one of them directions are given his men about feeding the deer, letting the cattle into the long meadow, etc. Another is Mr. Read's commission as colonel, and is of sufficient interest to warrant its insertion here. It is as follows:

"THOMAS FITCH Esq., Governor and Commander in chief of his Majesty's Colony of Connecticut in New England, to John Read Esq., Greeting:

"Whereas you are appointed by the General Assembly of said Colony to be Colonel of the Fourth Regiment of Horse in said Colony—Reposing special trust and confidence in your Loyalty, courage, and good conduct, I do by these presents constitute and appoint you to be Colonel of said Regiment. You are therefore to take the said Regiment into your Care and charge as their Colonel; and carefully and diligently to discharge that Care and Trust in Ordering and Exercising of them, both Officers and Soldiers in Arms according to the Rules and Discipline of War, keeping them in good Order and Government, and commanding them to obey you as their Colonel for his Majesty's service, and they are commanded to obey you accordingly, and you are to conduct and lead forth the said Regiment, or such part of them as you shall from time to time receive orders for from me, or from the Governor of this Colony for the time being, to Encounter, Repel, Pursue, and Destroy by force of Arms, and by all fitting ways and means, all his Majesty's Enemies who shall at any time hereafter in a Hostile manner, attempt or enterprize the Invasion, Detriment or Annoyance of this Colony. And you are to observe and obey such Orders and Instructions as from time to time you from Me, or other your Superior Officers, pursuant to the trust hereby Reposed in you and the laws of this Colony.

"Given under my hand and the seal of this Colony, in New Haven, the 31^d Day of November, in the 31st year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord George the Second, King of Great Britain &c. Annoque Domini, 1757.

"By His Honor's Command.

"THOS. FITCH.

"GEORGE WATKINS, Secy."

James Rogers was a prominent man in his day, and filled many responsible offices in town. He appears as early as 1762. His children were Joseph, born Oct. 31, 1762; Chloe, born Oct. 24, 1766; James, born April 28, 1763; Haron, born Aug. 22, 1770 (town record).

Joseph Rumsey appears in Redding as early as 1747. His will, dated Dec. 27, 1754, mentions his wife, Sarah —, and children, Isaac, Sarah, Joseph, Daniel, William, and Ephraim.

The will of Daniel Rumsey, of Reading, probated March 10, 1761, mentions his father, Robert, and brothers, John Rumsey and Seth Hull.

John Rumsey settled in Redding. His children by wife Esther were Abigail, baptized Feb. 19, 1751; Rachel, baptized Feb. 25, 1753; Mary, June 5, 1755; Nathan, Aug. 8, 1756; David, Jan. 28, 1759; Mary, June 15, 1761; Esther, May 13, 1764; Eben, Feb. 4, 1768.

Isaac Rumsey married Abigail St. John, May 23, 1761. Children: Abigail, born Dec. 25, 1761; Jeremiah, born May 23, 1762; Ruth, born Dec. 29, 1763; Noah, born March 28, 1768.

The Sanford family is one of the oldest and most numerous in the town, having been founded by four persons of the name, who removed here from Fairfield when the country was first opened to settlers. The names of these four settlers were Nathaniel, Lemuel, Samuel, and Ephraim.

The first two were original members of the church; the last two joined it during the first year of its existence,—viz., in 1734. According to Savage, Ephraim Sanford, who settled in Milford, and married Mary Powell, of New Haven, in 1669, had children, Mary, Samuel, Ephraim, Thomas, Nathaniel, and Zacariah.

Samuel, Ephraim, and Nathaniel are no doubt identical with those who settled in Redding, as they were elderly men with families when they removed here.

According to the above-named authority, Ezekiel, eldest son of the above Thomas Sanford, was freeman in 1669 and died in 1683, leaving a widow, Rebecca, and children, Ezekiel, Thomas, Sarah, Mary, Rebecca, Martha, and Elizabeth. Ezekiel,* eldest son, settled in Fairfield, and in his will, dated Jan. 29, 1729, mentions two sons, Lemuel and Ezekiel. Lemuel settled in Redding, as above stated. Thomas Sanford, father of Ezekiel and Ephraim, was the first of the name in America.

We shall trace the families of these ancestors in Redding in the order of their arrival here. Nathaniel Sanford settled in Umpawaug. His children recorded were Abel H., baptized March 25, 1733; Ruth, baptized May 12, 1737; Esther, baptized May 27, 1744.

We have no further record of this family.

Lemuel Sanford settled in the centre. He was one of the first committee-men of the society, and prominent in public affairs. He married — Squire, of Fairfield. Their children were Hezekiah, probably born in Fairfield; Sarah, baptized Sept. 19, 1734; Anne, baptized Nov. 1, 1736; Lydia, baptized June 4, 1738; Lemuel, baptized April 20, 1740; Ezekiel, baptized July 4, 1742; Anne, baptized Oct. 7, 1744; Roda, baptized Feb. 26, 1749.

Hezekiah married Hannah —, and settled in the centre, on the farm now owned by Mr. Delavan. His children were Aaron, baptized May 29, 1757; Hannah, baptized Aug. 26, 1759; William, baptized Oct. 14, 1764; Eunice, baptized June 7, 1772; Huldah, baptized May 18, 1777.

Aaron, his eldest son, settled in the centre, and lived in the house now owned by Mrs. Connors. He was the first male member of the Methodist Church in New England, and was the leader of the little class organized in Redding in 1790. The Methodist preachers in their rounds always found a home with him, and often held their meetings in his house. Later in life he became an acceptable local preacher in that church. He married Lydia Hawley, daughter of William Hawley, Nov. 2, 1780. Their children were Betsey, born Oct. 5, 1781; Hannah, born May 31, 1784; Aaron, born July 8, 1786; Hawley, born July 16, 1789; Jesse Lee, born July 27, 1791; Eunice, born Aug. 10, 1793; Walter, born Feb. 18, 1796; Charlotte, born Jan. 8, 1800; Lydia, born Sept. 23, 1803; William A., born Jan. 15, 1807.

Aaron Sanford, Jr., settled on Redding Ridge, in the eastern part of the town. He married, Dec. 19, 1813, Fanny Hill, daughter of Andrew L. Hill. Their children were eleven in number: Andrew H., Daniel, Mary, Clara, Henry, Aaron, Fanny, Jesse L., Mary, Elizabeth, John, and Julia H.

Hawley, the second son, married Betsey Stow, Nov. 2, 1814, by whom he had two children, Russell and Betsey. On the death of his wife he married, second, Sarah Ketchum, Nov. 20, 1823. The children of this marriage were Francis A., Aaron K. (now presiding elder on the Poughkeepsie District), Hawley, Lydia, David, Morris, and Mary. Walter, the third son, married, Dec. 6, 1821, Harriet M. Booth. They had one son, Charles. Walter Sanford married, second, Emily Gorham. William Sanford, the fourth son, married Harriet Tuttle, May 2, 1832. Of the daughters, Betsey married John R. Hill. Hannah married the Rev. Aaron Hunt, a Methodist clergyman, celebrated in his day as being the first to successfully contest the old colonial law which forbade all ministers except those of the "standing order" to perform the marriage ceremony. Mr. Hunt was at one time located and resided for several years in Redding. Charlotte married Thomas B. Fenton; Lydia married Aaron Sanford Hyatt.

Lemuel Sanford, second son of Lemuel Sanford, settled in the centre, near his father. He married, Sept. 29, 1768, Mary Russell, of North Branford, Conn. The circumstances attending his marriage are thus narrated: He left Redding on horseback early on the morning of his wedding-day, but was delayed on the road, and did not reach Branford until midnight. By that time the wedding-guests had dispersed and the family had retired; but he roused them up, collected the guests, and the ceremony was performed. The next day bride and groom returned to Redding, traveling on horseback. The children of Lemuel and Mary Sanford were Lemuel, born July 18, 1769; Rhoda, born March 4, 1773; Mary, born May 18, 1776, married Dr. Thomas Peck; Abigail, born 1779 (died in infancy); Jonathan R., born Feb. 11, 1782; Abigail, born April 18, 1784; Lucretia, born May 4, 1786.

Mr. Lemuel Sanford died March 12, 1803, at Danbury, in the performance of his duties as judge of the County Court, leaving a most honorable record. He had filled all the positions of honor and trust in his native town, and during the Revolution had been a member of the committee of supply, the duties of which kept him absent in Danbury and Fairfield nearly the whole period of the war. He several times represented the town in the General Assembly, and also held the office of associate judge of the County Court.

Lemuel Sanford, eldest son of Judge Sanford, after being educated at President Dwight's famous academy on Greenfield Hill, returned to Redding, married Mary Heron, daughter of Squire Heron, and settled in the centre, on the farm now owned by Albert Gorham. He was a man of much ability, and quite prominent in town affairs. He had but two children, Julia and Mary. The eldest, Julia, married Rev. Thomas F. Davies, who for a time was settled in Green's Farms as a Congregational minister. Mary married Dr. Nehemiah Perry, of Ridgefield, the father of the present physician of that place.

* Mr. E. J. Sanford, of Knoxville, Tenn., sends me the following account of Ezekiel Sanford, which he derived from Rev. Thomas F. Davies: Ezekiel Sanford was an English engineer, and had charge of the erection of the stockade fort at Saybrook, at the mouth of the Connecticut River, for protection against Indians. He afterwards removed to Fairfield and built the first mill in the county, at Mill River, for which he received a large grant of land from the English government.—TENN.

Jonathan R., the second son, married Maria, daughter of Dr. Thomas Davies, Oct. 17, 1808. Their children were Amanda, Maria (who died in infancy), Lemuel, Jonathan R., and Thomas. Mr. Jonathan Sanford died Aug. 20, 1858.

In an account of the death of Jonathan R. Sanford, published in Crosby's "Obituary Notices" (1858), the writer says of the deceased, "Through a long life the deceased enjoyed in an eminent degree the confidence and respect of his fellow-citizens. In 1808 he was appointed to fill the office of town clerk and treasurer of his native town, and held those offices by consecutive annual appointment from that time to his death, — a period of half a century, — besides filling for several years the office of judge of Probate for the District of Redding. Representing at different periods his native town in the State Legislature, he discharged the duties of various trusts, both of a public and private nature, exhibiting in all his acts a sternness of integrity and purity of purpose seldom equaled. The consolations of that religion which cheered and comforted him through life were his solace and comfort in death."

The children of Jonathan R. Sanford now living are Lemuel, Jonathan R., and Thomas. Lemuel married Abby M. Hill, daughter of Bradley Hill; their children are Mary Russell, Lillia, Abby, Martha, Alice Lulu, and Jonathan B. Jonathan R. married Clarissa, youngest daughter of Deacon Samuel Read; their only child, Hannah Maria, died at the age of twenty-four. Thomas married Charlotte A. Hewitt, of Cornwall, Litchfield Co.; their children are Thomas F. and Mary A.

Ezekiel, third son of Lemuel Sanford the first, married Abigail Starr, Nov. 21, 1773, and settled in Boston District, in the western part of the town. His children were Mollie, baptized Dec. 18, 1774; Rebecca, baptized April 24, 1777; Ezekiel, baptized Nov. 1, 1778; Abigail, baptized March 19, 1780; perhaps others. He is called captain in the old records. Some of his descendants are now living in Amenia, N. Y.

Samuel Sanford the first settled in Umpawaug. He is called captain in the records. His children were Daniel, baptized April 22, 1734; Seth, baptized Aug. 23, 1735; Mary, March 19, 1738; David, Dec. 2, 1739; Abigail, Jan. 30, 1743; Samuel, May 5, 1745; Sarah, May 10, 1747; Esther, April 16, 1749; Ezra, March 25, 1751; Rachel, Feb. 25, 1753; Peter, May 23, 1756. Capt. Samuel Sanford died Nov. 6, 1768, aged sixty-two years.

Daniel married Esther Hull, April 18, 1758. Children: Eli, baptized Aug. 16, 1761; Chloe, July 5, 1767; and others. Seth married Rebecca, daughter of Deacon Stephen Burr, April 25, 1759. Her children, as named in Deacon Burr's will, 1776, were Elias, Ebenezer, Joel, Elijah, Samuel, and Seth. Mary married Timothy Sanford, son of Joseph; Abigail married John Hawley, Dec. 21, 1762; Samuel, Jr., married Sarah Olmsted, July 23, 1767 (town record). His children recorded were Uriah, baptized Feb. 14, 1768; Thomas, Dec. 17, 1769. Peter married Abigail Keeler, June 1, 1780.

Ephraim Sanford the first settled in Sanfords town and was a large landowner there, as is shown by several deeds now in the possession of his descendants, some of which date back as far as 1733. His children by his wife, Elizabeth Mix, according to the parish record, were Rachel, baptized July 29, 1733; Abigail, baptized May 18, 1735; John, April 29, 1739; Oliver, Sept. 20, 1741; Lois, Sept. 17, 1743; Huldah, May 5, 1748; Augustus, July 15, 1753; Esther, April 27, 1755. His will, dated Jan. 30, 1761, mentions also Ephraim, Elizabeth, and Tabitha.

Ephraim Sanford, according to the family tradition, was the first man having a store of goods in Redding. His goods were brought from Boston. Of his children, Abigail married Daniel Jackson, Oct. 2, 1755. John married — —, and settled in the Foundry District, in Redding. His children were James, Stephen, Ephraim, John, Eli, Huldah, Lois, Betty, Elizabeth, and Annie. James, the eldest son, settled in the Foundry District, near his father. He was a teamster in the Revolutionary army, and was present at the execution of Jones and Smith on Gallows Hill. He married Sarah, daughter of John Beach, and granddaughter of Rev. John Beach, the faithful missionary of the Church of England. He was the father of Squire James Sanford. John, Jr., the fourth son of John Sanford, settled in Redding, and was the father of John W. Sanford, a well-known citizen.

Oliver Sanford, son of Ephraim, married, in April, 1767, Rachel, daughter of Deacon David Coley, of Weston. Their children were Mary, baptized July 31, 1768; David, Aug. 20, 1769; Ephraim, Sept. 15, 1771; Abigail, May 29, 1774; Enoch A., April 28, 1776; Levi, Dec. 14, 1777; Oliver C., Abigail, Mary, Betsey, and Loraine.

Anna Smith, daughter of Samuel Smith, of Redding, was baptized July 6, 1749, and Seth Samuel, son of Samuel and Lydia Smith, Sept. 28, 1760. The latter was the first lawyer who located in Redding. He had an office in the centre, where also he kept a select school. He was town clerk for a term of years, and wrote a most elegant hand, as will be remembered by those familiar with the records of his times. He also filled many other important positions in the town. He married Huldah — —. Their children were Zalmon, baptized Feb. 3, 1780, and probably others.

Robert Stow, the first of the name in Redding, settled in Lonetown, on the farm now owned by his grandson, Sumner Stowe. He married Anne Darrow, Jan. 26, 1775. Their children were Daniel, born July 4, 1779; Abigail, born April 11, 1776, married Israel Adams; Sarah, born Oct. 1, 1777; Sarah, born Aug. 11, 1781; Sumner, born Sept. 17, 1783; Huldah, born Feb. 6, 1787, married Andrew Andrus, of Danbury; Abraham, born March 4, 1792; Polly, born Sept. 20, 1794, married Moses Parsons, of Newtown. Robert Stow died Nov. 5, 1795. Daniel Stow married Lucy Hoyt, of Bethel, and settled in Redding, near his father. His children were Robert, Almira, Sarah, Harriet, Lucy, Sumner, Mary, and Polly. Abraham settled in Bethel; Sumner died when a young man.

Other settlers in the town at an early date, but who do not appear to have been permanent residents, were Daniel Bradley, Thomas Williams, Thomas and William Squire (of Fairfield), Ebenezer Ferry, George Cowden, Nathaniel Booth, Edmund Sherman, Jonathan Squire, John Whitlock, John Truesdale, Frederick Dikeman, and John. The families of Byington, Chapman, Hamilton, Knapp, Osborne, Dennison, Bennett, St. John, Gilbert, Johnson, Abbott, Duncomb, Edmonds, Olmstead, Rider, Treadwell, and Todd figure in later records of the town.

Benjamin and Isaac Rumsey were early settlers at Georgetown. In 1721, Robert Rumsey, of Fairfield, purchased a tract of land where now is located the village, and subsequently willed it to his three sons, Benjamin, Isaac, and Robert, the two former of whom became actual settlers.

THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

THE first reference in the town records to the war of the Revolution is under date April 2, 1777, when a committee was appointed "to hire a number of soldiers to serve in the Continental Army." At the same meeting "Hezekiah Sanford, Seth Sanford, Daniel Mallory, S. Samuel Smith, William Hawley, Stephen Betts, Jr., Jonathan Couch, Stephen Gold, and Hezekiah Read are appointed a committee to take care of the families of those soldiers that are in the service of their country." May 5, 1777, "David Jackson, Seth Sanford, Thaddeus Benedict, and John Gray are chosen Selectmen, in addition to and to supply the place of Stephen Betts and James Rogers, taken prisoners by the enemy in their expedition to Danbury." Dec. 17, 1778, the following committee was appointed to care for soldiers' families: Nehemiah Hull for Nathan Coley's, Elijah Burr for Stephen Mecker's, Ebenezer Couch for Elias Bixby's, Nehemiah Sherwood and John Read for Jeremiah Ryan, and William Hawley for Samuel Remong. April 16, 1781, it was voted "to divide the people into eight classes, according to their several lists, in order to raise seven soldiers and one Light Horseman to serve for one year as coast-guards." Voted "that the sixth class (for procuring men to serve in the guards at Horse Neck till ye first of March next) shall procure a light-horseman and horse, and that the town shall pay said class all it shall cost them more to procure a man and horse than it shall cost the other seven classes on a medium."

Aug. 11, 1783, the following vote appears, and Seth Sanford, James Rogers, Stephen Betts, Hezekiah Sanford, and John Gray, the selectmen at the time, were instructed to carry it into effect:

"Voted, That the select men of this town be desired to move out of this town all those persons that have been over and joined the enemy, and have returned into this town, and that they pursue the business as fast as they conveniently can according to law."

The following Revolutionary history and incidents is taken chiefly from Todd's "History of Redding":

"Two years had passed since the opening of the War of Independence,—years of alternate victory and defeat to the colonists,—when a hostile armament of twenty-five vessels bearing two thousand men, the flower of the British army, appeared off Compo, in Westport, on the Connecticut shore. It was the 26th of April, 1777. A few days before, news had come to Lord Howe, commanding in New York, that a magazine of munitions of war had been formed by the rebels in Danbury, which afforded him a pretext for a descent on Connecticut,—a step which he had long meditated. The region of country covered by the proposed campaign had been swept of its able-bodied men, who were in the Continental ranks keeping a careful watch on His Lordship's regulars, but that there might be no balk in the operations an overwhelming force of two thousand picked men was detailed for the expedition. For commanders, Howe chose a nondescript genius, one Governor Tryon, and two military men of ability, Gen. Agnew and Sir William Erskine. Tryon had been Governor of New York; he had the further merit of being intimately acquainted with Connecticut, and of being consumed with an inveterate hatred for, and thirst for revenge on, the Yankees; he had a special grudge, too, against Connecticut, the sturdy little colony having thwarted him in a variety of ways. Her dragoons had scattered the types of his newspaper organ through the streets of New York; her 'Sons of Liberty' had plotted against him even in his own city; and she had treated with contempt his proclamations inviting her to return to her allegiance, even printing them in her gazettes as specimens of the Governor's pleasant humor.

"Furthermore, he was well acquainted with the country to be traversed. He had been as far inland as Litchfield, had probably visited Danbury, and had been dined and fêted at Norwalk, Fairfield, and New Haven. He seems to have acted as a guide to the expedition, while his two advisers attended to its military details. The troops disembarked at Compo at four in the afternoon, and the same day marched to Weston, about eight miles distant, where they encamped for the night. To oppose these troops there was only a militia corps of old men and boys, not equal in number to one-half the invading force.

"Col. Cook was in command at Danbury with a company of unarmed militia. Gen. Silliman at Fairfield, Gen. Wooster at Stratford, and Gen. Arnold at Norwalk, could not muster, all told, more than eight hundred raw, undisciplined men. Under these circumstances Tryon's expedition can only be viewed as a picnic-excursion into the country; and as such, no doubt, he regarded it.

"On the morning of the 26th his army was early astir, and reached Redding Ridge, where the first halt was made, about the time that the inhabitants had concluded their morning meal. What transpired here is thus narrated by Mr. Hollister in his admirable 'History of Connecticut,' vol. ii. chap. 12:

"On the morning of the 26th, at a very seasonable hour, Tryon arrived at Redding Ridge, where was a small hamlet of peaceful inhabitants, almost every one of them patriots and most of them farmers, who had crowned the high hill where they had chosen to build their Zion with a tall, gaunt church, which drew to its aisles one day in seven the people that dwelt upon the sides of the hills and in the bosom of the valleys within the range of the summons that sounded from its belfry. By way of satisfying his hunger with a morning lunch until he could provide a more substantial meal, he drew up his artillery in front of the weatherbeaten edifice that had before defied everything save the grace of God and the supplications of his worshipers, and gave it a good round of grape and canister that pierced its sides through and shattered its small-paned windows into fragments. The only spectators to this heroic demonstration were a few women and little children, some of whom ran away at the sight of the red-coats, and others faced the invaders with a menacing stare."

"Mr. Hollister is in the main a careful and accurate historian, but a due regard for the truth of history compels us to say that he was misinformed in regard to the above facts. The following account is believed to be correct, our principal informant being an aged inhabitant of Redding, and a competent authority:

"During the halt the main body of the troops remained under arms on the green in front of the church. Tryon, Agnew, and Erskine were invited into Esquire Heron's, who lived in the first house south of the church, and which is still standing, though in a ruinous condition. Here they were hospitably entertained with cake and wine, and with many hopeful prognostications of the speedy collapse of the 'rebellion.' Across the street from the church, in a house a few yards south of the one now occupied by Thomas Ryan, lived Lieut. Stephen Betts, a prominent patriot, and at whose house, it will be remembered, the County Convention was held in 1779. A file of soldiers entered the house, seized him, and he was taken with them on their march. James Rogers, another prominent patriot, and Jeremiah Sanford, a lad of ten years, son of Mr. Daniel Sanford, met a like fate. The lad, we may remark, was carried to New York and died in the prison-ships, June 28, 1777. Shortly before the army resumed its march a horseman was observed spurring rapidly down the Couch's Hill road towards them, and approached within musket-shot before discovering their presence; he then turned to fly, but was shot and severely wounded in the attempt. He proved to be a messenger from Col. Cook, in Danbury, bearing dispatches to Gen. Silliman, by name Lambert Lockwood. Tryon had formerly known him in Norwalk, where Lockwood had rendered him a service, and seems to have acted on this occasion with some approach to magnanimity, as he released him on parole and allowed him to be taken into a house that his wounds might be dressed.

"The statement concerning the firing into the church is a mistake, and I am assured that the reverse is true. It is said that the church was not molested at all (except that a soldier with a well-directed ball brought down the gilded weathercock from the spire); and the fact that the pastor, the Rev. John Beach, as well as several of its most prominent members, among them the 'Esquire Heron' above referred to, was a most pronounced loyalist, strengthens the assertion.

"The British army, after halting an hour or two in the village, resumed its march to Danbury, with the capture and burning of which the reader is, no doubt, acquainted.

"Meanwhile, the patriots in Redding anxiously waited the approach of the Continental army in pursuit. At length it came in view, marching wearily with dusty and disordered ranks,—a little army of five hundred men and boys, led by Brig.-Gen. Silliman in person. They had marched from Fairfield that day, and were fully twenty-eight hours behind the foe, who was then lying drunken and disorganized at Danbury. A muster-roll of the little band would have shown a most pathetic exhibition of weakness. There were parts of the companies of Col. Lamb's battalion of artillery, with three rusty cannon, a field-piece, and part of the artillery company of Fairfield and sixty Continentals; the rest were raw levies, chiefly old men and boys. It was eight o'clock in the evening when the troops arrived at Redding Ridge,—an evening as disagreeable as a northeast rain-storm with its attendant darkness could make it. Here the troops halted an hour for rest and refreshment. At the expiration of that time a bugle sounded far down the street; then the tramp of horsemen was heard, and presently Maj.-Gen. Wooster and Brig.-Gen. Arnold, at the head of a squadron of cavalry, dashed into the village.

"On hearing that the British were so far ahead, it is said that Arnold became so enraged that he could scarcely keep his seat, and his terrible oaths fell on his auditors' ears like thunderclaps. Wooster at once assumed command, and the column moved forward through the mud as far as Bethel, where it halted for the night. At Danbury, but three miles distant, Tryon's force was sleeping in drunken security, and might have been annihilated by a determined effort, but the command was too much exhausted for the attempt.

"Tryon the next morning was early astir, being aware that the militia were closing in on him on all sides, and commenced a retreat to his ships, taking the circuitous route through Ridgefield. On learning this move, Gen. Wooster, at Bethel, divided his command, one detachment, under Gens. Arnold and Silliman, marching rapidly across the country and taking post at Ridgefield, while the other, commanded by himself, pressed closely on Tryon's rear. The succeeding fortunes of the patriots—how they met the foe at Ridgefield, how Wooster fell gallantly leading on his men, how Arnold performed prodigies of valor, and how the enemy were pursued and harassed until they gained the cover of their ships—have become a part of our national history, and need no recounting.

"News that the British had landed at Compo, that they were encamped at Weston and would march through Redding the next day, was conveyed to this town at an early hour, and occasioned the greatest consternation and excitement.

"Money and valuables were hastily secreted in wells and other places of concealment; horses and cattle were driven into the forests, and the inhabitants along the enemy's probable route held themselves in readiness for instant flight. Herod's emissaries could not have excited livelier emotions of terror in the hearts of Judean mothers than did Tryon's invasion in the breasts of the mothers of Redding. He seems to have warred pre-eminently on women and boys. The latter especially he made prisoners of and consigned to the horrible prison-ships, holding them either as hostages or on the plea that they 'would very soon grow into rebels.' The women of Redding had heard of this propensity, and at his approach gathered all the boys of thirteen and under—the older ones were away under arms—and conveyed them to a secluded place near the Forge, where they were left under the charge of one Gershom Barlow; here they remained until the invader had regained his ships, provisions being cooked and sent in to them daily.

"Many other incidents of the invasion are current in the town.

"On receiving intelligence of the landing at Compo, Capt. Read mustered his company of militia and forthwith marched to intercept the invaders. At a place called Couch's Rock, in Weston, they came suddenly upon the entire force of the enemy and were taken prisoners. Timothy Parsons, one of the militiamen, had a fine musket, which he particularly valued; this a grenadier took and dashed to pieces on the stones, saying it should waste no more rebel bullets.

"Mrs. Thankful Bradley, living in Weston, near the Redding line, was milking by the roadside when the troops surprised her. An officer told her to remain quiet and they would not molest her. She followed his advice, and continued milking while the entire army filed by. With the exception of kidnapping the lad Sanford, the British behaved with praiseworthy moderation during their march through Redding. No buildings were burned, and no such enormities committed as marked their descent on Fairfield and New Haven, two years later.

"After their departure nothing further of a warlike nature occurred in the town until the encampment in Redding, in the winter of 1778-79, of Gen. Putnam's division of the Continental army. This division comprised Gen. Poor's brigade of New Hampshire troops, the two brigades of Connecticut troops, the corps of infantry commanded by Hazen, and that of cavalry by Sheldon. This division had been operating along the Hudson during the fall, and as winter approached it was decided that it should go into winter-quarters at Redding, as from this position it could support the important fortress of West Point in case of attack, overawe the Cow-Boys and Skinners of Westchester County, and cover the country adjacent to the Sound. Accordingly, early in November, Gen. Putnam arrived with several of his general officers to select sites for the proposed camps. Three were marked out,—the first in the northeastern part of Lonetown, near the Bethel line, on land now owned by Aaron Treadwell; the second also in Lonetown, about a mile and a half west, on the farm of the late Sherlock Todd, a short distance southwest of his dwelling-house; the third in West Redding, on the ridge lying east of Uriah Griffin's, on land now owned by him, and about a quarter of a mile north of Redding Station. The sites of all three camps may be easily distinguished by the ruins of the stone chimneys which formed one side of the log huts in which the troops were sheltered. The ruins of the first camp are most distinct, and form perhaps one of the best preserved, as well as most interesting, relics of the Revolution within the reach of the antiquary. This camp was laid out with admirable judgment at the foot of the rocky bluff which fence in on the west the valley of the Little River. The barracks were so disposed as to form an avenue nearly a quarter of a mile in length and several yards in width. At the west end of the camp was a mountain-brook, which furnished a plentiful supply of water; near the brook is a heap of cinders, which probably marks the spot where a forge was erected. The camp was until recently covered with heavy forests, which explains, perhaps, the secret of its preservation. The present owner is clearing up the underbrush which has overgrown the ruins, rendering it easy of access to visitors, and it will in time, no doubt, become a favorite place of resort. Only a few heaps of stone mark the site of the second camp, which was also laid out on the southerly slope of a hill, with a stream of running water at its base. The same may be said of the camp at Long Ridge.

"As to the exact location of Putnam's headquarters at this time authorities differ, but all agree in placing it on Umpawang Hill. Mr. Barber, in his 'Historical Collections,' says it was the old house that stood until recently on the corner of the road leading down to Sanford's Station, a short distance north of Andrew Perry's present residence. Mr. Lossing, in his 'Field-Book of the Revolution,' makes the same statement; but I am informed by an aged resident whose father was an officer in the Revolutionary army, and visited Gen. Putnam at his headquarters, that they were in an old house that then stood between the residence of the late Barr Meeker and that now occupied by Mr. Brady, and that the first-named was his guard-house. The question is one of little importance, perhaps, except to those who demand the utmost possible accuracy in the statement of fact.

"Some of the officers were quartered in the house now occupied by Seth Todd, then owned by Samuel Gould; others in a house that stood on the site of the one recently occupied by Sherlock Todd. Gen. Parson's headquarters were on Redding Ridge.

"While the army lay at Redding several events of importance occurred which are worthy of narrating with some degree of particularity. The troops went into winter-quarters this year in no pleasant humor, and almost in the spirit of insubordination. This was peculiarly the case with the Connecticut troops. They had endured privations that many men would have sunk under,—the horrors of battle, the weariness of the march, cold, hunger, and nakedness. What was worse, they had been paid in the depreciated currency of the times, which had scarcely any purchasing power, and their devoted families at home were reduced to the lowest extremity of want and wretchedness.

"The forced inactivity of the camp gave them time to brood over their wrongs, until at length they formed the bold resolve of marching to Hartford and presenting their grievances in person to the Legislature then sitting. The two brigades were under arms for this purpose before news of the revolt was brought to Putnam. He, with his usual intrepidity and decision of character, threw himself upon his horse and dashed down the road leading to his camps, never slackening rein until he drew up in the presence of the disaffected troops. 'My brave lads,' cried he, 'whither are you going? Do you intend to desert your officers, and to invite the enemy to follow you into the country? Whose cause have you been fighting and suffering so long in? Is it not your own? Have you no property, no parents, wives, or children? You have behaved like men so far; all the world is full of your praises and posterity will stand astonished at your deeds, but not if you spoil all at last. Don't you consider how much the country is distressed by the war, and that your officers have not been any better paid than yourselves? But we all expect better times, and that the country will do us ample justice. Let us all stand by one another, then, and fight it out like brave soldiers. Think what a shame it would be for Connecticut men to run away from their officers!' When he had finished this stirring speech, he directed the acting major of brigades to give the word for them to shoulder, march to their regimental parades, and lodge arms, which was done. One soldier only, a ringleader in the affair, was confined in the guard-house, from which he attempted to escape, but was shot dead by the sentinel on duty, himself one of the mutineers. Thus ended the affair, and no further trouble was experienced with the Connecticut troops.

"Nothing had so much annoyed Putnam and his officers during the campaign of the preceding summer on the Hudson than the desertions which had thinned his ranks and the Tory spies who frequented his camps under every variety of pretext, and forthwith conveyed the information thus gathered to the enemy. To put a stop to this it had been determined that the next offender of either sort captured should suffer death as an example, and according to the usages of war. The time for putting this determination into execution soon arrived. One day some scouts from Putnam's outposts in Westchester County captured a man lurking within their lines, and, as he could give no satisfactory account of himself, he was at once haled over the borders and into the presence of the commander-in-chief. In answer to his queries, the prisoner said that his name was Jones, that he was a Welshman by birth, and had settled in Ridgefield a few years before the war had commenced; that he had never faltered in his allegiance to the king, and that at the outbreak of hostilities he had fled to the British army and had been made a butcher in the camp; a few weeks before, he had been sent into Westchester County to buy bees for the army, and had been captured as above narrated. He was remanded to the guard-house and a court-martial at once ordered for his trial. The result is to be found in the following document, found among the papers of the late Lieut. Samuel Richards, paymaster in Col. Wylly's regiment:

"Feb. 4, 1779. Was tried at a General Court-Martial Edward Jones for Going to and serving the enemy, and coming out as a spy; found guilty of each and every charge Exhibited against him, and according to Law and the Usages of Nations was sentenced to suffer Death.

"The General approves the sentence and orders it to be put in Execution between the hours of ten and eleven A.M. by hanging him by the neck till he be Dead.'

"Two days after, another court-martial was held for a similar offense, as the following proves:

"Feb. 6, 1779. At a Gen'l Court-Martial was tried John Smith of the 1st Connecticut Regiment for desertion and attempting to go to the Enemy; found guilty; and further persisting in saying that he will go to the Enemy if ever he has an opportunity, Sentenced to be shot to death, and orders that it be put in Execution between the hours of ten and twelve A.M."

"General Putnam, having two prisoners under sentence of death, determined to execute them both at once, or, as he expressed it, 'make a double job of it,' and at the same time make the spectacle as terrible and impressive as the circumstances demanded. The lofty hill dominating the valley and the camps (known to this day as Gallows Hill) was chosen as the scene of the execution, the instrument of death being erected on its highest pinnacle. The details of the execution, for reasons which will appear, I prefer to give in the words of the three different historians who have chronicled it. Mr. Barber, in his 'Historical Collections of Connecticut,' p. 399, says,—

"The scene which took place at the execution of these men is described as shocking and bloody. The man on whom the duty of hangman devolved left the camp, and on the day of execution could not be found. A couple of boys about the age of twelve years were ordered by Gen. Putnam to perform the duties of the absconding hangman. The gallows was about twenty feet from the ground. Jones was compelled to ascend the ladder, and the rope around his neck was attached to the cross-beam. Gen. Putnam then ordered Jones to jump from the ladder. "No, General Putnam," said Jones, "I am innocent of the crime laid to my charge; I shall not do it." Putnam then ordered the boys before mentioned to turn the ladder over. These boys were deeply affected by the trying scene; they cried and sobbed loudly, and earnestly entreated to be excused from doing anything on this distressing occasion. Putnam, drawing his sword, ordered them forward, and compelled them at the sword's point to obey his orders. The soldier that was shot for desertion was but a youth of sixteen or seventeen years of age. Three balls were shot through his breast: he fell on his face, but immediately turned over on his back; a soldier then advanced, and, putting the muzzle of his gun near the convulsive body of the youth, discharged its contents into his forehead. The body was then taken up and put into a coffin; the soldiers had fired their pieces so near that they set the boy's clothes on fire, which continued burning. An officer with a drawn sword stood by, while every soldier of the three brigades who were out on the occasion was ordered to march by and look at the mangled remains.'

"Mr. Barber says in a foot-note that the above particulars were derived from an aged inhabitant of Redding who was present on the occasion and stood but a few feet from Jones when he was executed.

"Mr. Hollister, in his 'History of Connecticut,' takes exception to the above account. In vol. ii. page 375 of his work he has the following note:

"The Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett, who was pastor of the Congregational Church in Redding for a period of fifty years, officiated as chaplain to the encampment during the winter, and was present at the execution. He interceded with Gen. Putnam to defer the execution of Smith until Washington could be consulted, the offender being a youth of seventeen years, but the commander assured him that a reprieve could not be granted. Mr. Bartlett was an earnest and fearless Whig, and openly talked and preached "rebellion,"—so much so that the Tories, who were numerous in the eastern part of the town, threatened to hang him if they could catch him. In consequence of these threats he often carried a loaded musket with him when on his parochial visits. His son and successor in the ministry at Redding—the Rev. Jonathan Bartlett, now (1855) in his ninety-first year—well remembers the Revolutionary encampment at Redding, and frequently visited it. He is sure that the story in Barber's "Historical Collections" about Putnam's inhumanity at the execution of Smith and Jones is incorrect. Though not present himself, he has often heard his father relate the incidents of the occasion; and furthermore, he once called the attention of Col. Asahel Salmon (who died in 1848, aged ninety-one), who was a sergeant in attendance upon the execution, to the statement, and he declared that nothing of the kind took place.'

"Another historian, Rev. Thomas F. Davies, in an historical sermon delivered at Green's Farms in 1839, also takes exception to Mr. Barber's statement. He says,—

"Mr. Barber must have been misinformed. Redding is my native town, and from my boyhood I have heard the history of the proceedings on the occasion referred to, and was much surprised at the statements in the "Historical Collections." The Rev. Mr. Bartlett, whose father was chaplain on that occasion, informs me that Gen. Putnam could not have been guilty of the acts there charged.

"That Mr. Barber may have something to substitute for the narrative to which I object, I give the following:

"When General Putnam occupied the house of which Mr. Barber has given an engraving, a scene occurred which presents the general in a very amiable light. A poor man with a family needing support, and who lived in the neighboring town of Ridgefield, was told by one acquainted with his wants that if he would visit General Putnam and hold a conversation with him, he would on his return, and on proof of the fact, give him a bushel of wheat. The temptation in that time of scarcity and taxes was great, and so also was the fear of intruding upon so distinguished an individual; but the stern necessities of his condition at length induced the poor man to venture. He accordingly presented himself at headquarters, and requested the servant to solicit for him an interview with the general. Putnam promptly summoned the man to his presence, directed him to be seated, and listened with interest while the man with great trepidation gave the statement which accounted for the liberty he had taken. The general directed the servant to bring some wine, conversed for a time very pleasantly with his needy visitor, and then, calling for pen and ink, wrote a certificate, in which he gave the name of the individual and stated that he had visited and conversed with Gen. Putnam, who signed it in his official character. Thus furnished with the means of giving bread to his family, the distressed individual returned to his humble roof; and this anecdote, which I have on the very best authority, is proof that Putnam was not destitute of those kind and gentle affections which are so desirable an ornament of the most heroic character.'

"This diversity of statements has led the writer to investigate the matter more thoroughly than he would otherwise have done, and the weight of proof seems to be in favor of the correctness of Mr. Barber's statement. His version of the affair is the one generally prevalent in the town, with the exception of Putnam's foreing the boys to become executioners. Nor is there anything in the story inconsistent with Putnam's known character and temperament. He had been a man of war from his youth, in perils often from wild beasts, the elements, the wilderness, and the Indians. Long service in the bloody French and Indian wars had scarcely taught him amiability. Boldness, firmness, promptness, decision,—these were the chief elements of his character; and at this particular crisis all were needed. There was disaffection and insubordination in the army, as has been seen. Desertions were frequent, and spying by the Tories was almost openly practiced. To put a stop to these practices was vitally necessary to the safety of the army; and, as the prisoners had been tried and sentenced to death by a competent tribunal, it was Putnam's duty to see that the sentence was carried into effect. If the execution was bunglingly done, the fault was with the executioners, and not with the general.

"As was to be expected, the citizens of Redding felt quite honored by the selection of their town for the army's winter-quarters, and welcomed heartily the dusty battalions as they filed into camp; but a few months' acquaintance opened their eyes to some of the ways of soldiers, and caused them to speed the army in the spring as heartily as they had welcomed it in the autumn. The soldiers argued that, as they were fighting the country's battles, it devolved on the latter to furnish the sinews of war, and plundered the neighboring farmers, whether Whig or Tory, with the utmost impartiality. To them a well-stocked poultry-yard or a pen of fat porkers offered irresistible inducements. A milch-cow never failed of a circle of devoted admirers, while bands of merry rovers occasionally stole over the borders into the neighboring towns and harried in under cover of night droves of fat cattle, which were killed and eaten with as little formality as they were taken. With the morning would come the owner complaining of these little peccadilloes, but, as he could never prove property or identify the rogues, they usually escaped punishment. After a time, however, the wary farmers foiled the depredators by herding their live-stock over night in the cellars of their houses and in other secure places.

"The ringleader in all these forays was Tom Warrups, an Indian, grandson of the chief Chickens, and one of Putnam's most valued scouts and messengers. Tom possessed a great deal of individuality, and impressed himself on a succeeding generation to the extent that numberless anecdotes are remembered and told about him to this day. Some of these, illustrating the Indian character, are worthy the attention of the grave historian. Tom had a weakness for liquor, which would have caused his expulsion from the camp had it not been for his services as scout and guide. One day he was seen deplorably drunk, and the officer of the day in disgust ordered him to be ridden out of the camp. A stout rail was brought, Tom was placed astride of it, four men hoisted it upon their shoulders, and the cavalcade started. On their way they met Gen. Putnam with his aids making the rounds of the camp. 'Tom,' said the general, sternly, 'how's this? Aren't you ashamed to be seen riding out of camp in this way?'—'Yes,' replied Tom, with drunken gravity. 'Tom is ashamed—vera mooch ashamed—to see poor Indian ride and the general he go afoot.'

"Tom had a house on the high ridge back of Capt. Isaac Hamilton's, now owned by William Sherwood. It was built, it is said, in primitive Indian style, of poles set firmly in the ground, then bent and fastened together at the top. This framework was covered with bark and roofed with reeds and rushes. Its furniture consisted of framework bedsteads, with bedding of skins, wooden bowls fashioned from pepperage-knots, huge wooden spoons, baskets made of rushes or long grass, pails of birch-bark, and an iron pot and skillet begged or borrowed from the settlers. His sister Eunice was his house-keeper. Except in war he was a worthless, shiftless fellow, and lived chiefly by begging; hunting and trapping were his recreations. He would often absent himself from his hut for weeks at a time, sleeping in barns or in the forest. A huge overhanging rock about a mile north of Georgetown often sheltered him on these occasions, and is still known as Warrups' Rock.

"Tom's neighbor and landlord before the war was Col. John Read, son of the early settler of that name. On one occasion the colonel had a company of gentlemen from Boston to visit him, and planned a grand hunt in their honor. Tom was always master of the revels at such times, and piloted the party on this occasion. In their rambles through the forests they came to a spring, and, being thirsty, one of the party lamented that they had left their hunting-cups behind. Tom at once slipped off his shoe, and, filling it with water, offered it to the guest to drink; whereupon Col. Read reproved him sharply for his ill breeding. Tom drank from the vessel while the homily was being delivered, and then replaced the shoe, observing, with the haughtiness of a king, 'Good enough for Indian, good enough for white man too.'

"After the war Capt. Zalmon Read and Tom were near neighbors, and the former had a cornfield in dangerous proximity to Tom's cabin; he missed the corn and suspected Tom, and, watching, not only discovered him to be the thief, but also his ingenious plan of procedure. About midnight the Indian would come, basket in hand, and, seated on the top rail of the fence, would thus address the field: 'Lot, can Tom have some corn?'—'Yes, Tom,' the lot would reply; 'take all you want;' whereupon Tom would fill his basket with ears and march off. The next night, as the story goes, the captain armed himself with a grievous hickory club and lay in wait behind the fence. Presently Tom came, repeated his formula, and proceeded to fill his basket; but when he returned to the fence, it was occupied by the captain, who proceeded to repeat Tom's formula with a variation: 'Lot, can I beat Tom?'—'Yes,' the lot replied; 'beat him all he deserves;' whereupon the fun-loving captain fell upon the culprit and gave him the thorough beating which his roguery deserved.

"One more anecdote of Tom must suffice. One day he went to a neighbor's house and demanded whisky. No, the neighbor was of the opinion that whisky was bad for Tom. 'Rum, then?'—'No.'—'Cider?'—'No; cider was bad too; food he might have to keep him from starving, but no fire-water.' Tom ruminated. 'Well,' said he at length, 'give me toast and cider,'—a favorite dish in those days,—and in this way won the desired stimulant.

"Some years after, when age was creeping on, Tom and his sister removed to the Indian reservation at Schaticook, in Kent, whither his tribe had preceded him, and the time and manner of his death were unknown to his white brethren in Reading.

"This is a long digression, pardonable in this connection only because its subject was one of the brave defenders of his country.

"Among the papers in the 'Richards Collection' are some that are interesting as detailing little episodes of camp-life, as well as some that possess considerable historic value. They are as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS, READING, May 28, 1779.

"Daniel Vaughn and Jonathan Gore of the 8th Connecticut Regt Tryd by a Brigade C. M. where of Lt. C. L. Sumner was President, For Stealing a Cup from Capt. Zalmon Read of Reading, The Court are of Opinion the charges against Vaughn and Gore are not supported.

"CAMP, 2ND HILL, Nov. 14, 1778.

"The General having obtained permission of the Commander In Chief to be Absent a few days from the Division, the Command will devolve upon Brigadier Gen'l Huntington. Gen'l McDougal is happy that it falls upon a Gentleman in whose care for and attention to the Troops he has the utmost Confidence. The Orders will be issued as usual at the Headquarters of the Division."

"READING, Dec. 18, 1778.

"Lieut. Col. Butler of Wyll's Reg. is promoted to the command of the 2nd Company Battalion and is to be obeyed as such. Col. Meigs is appointed Inspector to the Division and to do the duty of Adjt. General for the same until further Orders—Quartermaster Belding of the First Conn. Brigade is appointed Quartermaster of the Division and is to do that duty until further Orders. David Humphrey Esq. late Brigade Major to Gen'l Parsons is appointed aide de camp to Gen'l Putnam till further Orders."

"As the Division is now at Rest, Let us not . . . Who has appeared for us and America in innumerable instances in the hour of our Distress let prayers be attended, Both Morning and Evening, in fair Weather, at such times As the Commanding Officers of Brigades shall Direct. This order Constantly to be observed when the Division is Encamped. Gen'l McDougal flatters himself his officers Will give the Troops the virtuous Example of Attending at all times Divine Service. The Gen'l will be obliged to the officers to Desire any persons whom they know going to head Qr. or to Hartford to call upon him."

"Dec. 18, 1778.

"Quarter Master Belding of the First Conn. Brigade is appointed Qr. Master of the Division, and is to Do that Duty till further orders. David Humphrey, Esq. late Brigade Major to Gen. Parsons, is appointed A De Camp to Maj. Gen. Putnam Till further orders (Capt. Champion of Col. Wyll's Regt. is to do the Duty of B1 Major till further orders, and is to be Obeyed accordingly."

"Feb. 13, 1779.

"The Gen'l Directs that no person be permitted to visit the Prisoners under sentence of Death Unless at their Request as frequent Complaints have been made that they are interrupted in their Private Devotions by persons who came for no other Purpose but to Insult them."

"At a Gen'l Court-Martial held at Bedford Oct. 3, 1778, By order of Gen. Scott whereof Lt. Col. Blaisden was President.

"Elisha Smith a private in Capt. Stoddard's Co. 21 Regt. Light Dragoons was tried for Deserting to the Enemy last August and Piloting them into and against the troops of this State Defrauding the publick, by selling his horse and Accouterments in a Treasonable Manner to the Enemy and for Mousing and Insulting his officers while a Prisoner, found Guilty, and Sentence him to Suffer the pains of Death—His Excellency the Commander in Chief Approves the Sentence and Orders sd Elisha Smith to be Executed next Monday the 12th Inst. at 11 O Clock A M. at or near Bedford as Gen. Scott shall Direct."

No date: "Divine Service will be performed to morrow at the Church, to begin at 11 O Clock A M. Those of Duty are to March from Camp so as to be at the Church by that time."

"The 'Church' was the Congregational, at the centre, and the preacher the Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett.

"HEADQUARTERS, May 27, 1779.

"Major General Putnam being about to take command of one of the Wings of the Grand Army, before he leaves the Troops who have served under him the winter past, thinks it his Duty to Signify to them his entire approbation of their Regular and Soldier like Conduct, and wishes them (wherever they may happen to be out) a Successful and Glorious Campaign."

"Hazen's command seems to have been the first to break camp in the spring, as the following proves:

"HEADQUARTERS, READING, March 21, 1779.

"Col. Hazen's Regt. will march to Springfield in 3 Divisions by the shortest notice: the first Division will march on Monday next, and the other two will follow on Thursday and Friday next. Weather permitting, and in case the detached parties join the Regt. Col. Hazen will take with him one piece of Cannon and a proportionable Number of Artillery men."

"April 11th the following order was issued:

"* HEAD QUARTERS, APR. 11th, 1779.

"* The officers are Requested to lose no time in Preparing for the field, that they may be ready to leave their present Quarters at the Shortest Notice. The Q. M. Gen'l.—as far as it is in his power will supply those with Portmanteaus, who have not been furnished before, and those who have or shall be provided are on no account to carry chests or Boxes into the field. The portmanteaus are given by the publick to supersede those of such Cumbersome articles in order to contract the Baggage of the Army and lessen the Number of Waggons, which besides saving the Expense, is attended with many obvious and most Important Military Advantages. The General also thinks it necessary to give explicit notice in time with a view to have the army as little Encumbered as possible in all its movements, and to prevent burthening the publick and the farmers more than can be avoided. No officer whose Duty does not Really require him to be on horseback—will be permitted to keep horses with the Army—it might be the pride of an officer to share the fatigues, as well as the Dangers to which his men are exposed on foot. Marching by their sides he will lessen every inconvenience and Excite in them a spirit of patience and perseverance. Inability alone can justify a Deviation from this necessary practice. Gen. Washington strongly recommends to the officers to Divest themselves as much as possible of everything Superfluous—Taking to the field only what is Essential for Dining and Comfort. Such as have not particular friends within reach with whom they would choose to confide their Baggage, will apply to the Q. M. Gen'l. who will appoint a place for their Reception and furnish Means of Transportation."

"* REDDING, May 21, 1779.

"* Gen. Parsons orders the Brigade to be Ready to March to Morrow at 6 o'Clock A.M. Complot for Action."

"This brigade seems to have returned to the Highlands via Ridgefield and Bedford, as Gen. Parsons dates his next order at Ridgefield, May 30th:

"* That Col. Wyllis furnish a Sergt. Corp. and 12 privates to be posted as a Guard this Night one quarter of a Mile in front of where his Regt. is quartered on the road leading to Bedford. That Col. Meigs furnish a Guard of the Same Number and Distance on the road leading to Norwalk. The Reveille to be beat to-morrow morning at the Dawn of Day, the troops to parade at 1 o'clock half a mile below the meeting house, on the road leading to Bedford, for which place they will march immediately after in the same order as this day."

"* BEDFORD, May 31st, 1779.

"* The troops of Gen. Parson's Brigade to have two Days . . . per man from Capt. Townsend . . . refresh themselves, and be ready to march in two hours to Parade near the Meeting house."

"* FISHKILL, June 2, 1779.

"* Gen. Parsons orders that Com'st Storm deliver one gill of Rum per man, and two Days provision to the troops of his Brigade, this Day. The Qr. master to make return for the same."

"* Hd. QUARTERS, HIGHLANDS, June 6, 1779.

"* General McDougall Orders a Detachment of 150 Men Properly Ordered from Gen. Parson's and Huntington's Brigades to parade at 12 o'clock, with arms, ammunition, accoutrements, Blankets and three days Provisions in front of Gen. Hu. Bd. (Huntington's Brigade.)

"* Hd. Qr. June 7th, 1779.

"* The Grand Parade in front of Gen. Hu. Bd. 100 men properly Ordered from Hu. Bd. will parade for piquet at 3 o'clock for the future. The Relief will parade at 8 o'clock in the morning. No person will pass the piquet who cannot give a Good Account of himself."

"* The Signal of Alarm will be three cannon fired Distinctly by the Artillery in the front line."

"The following orders show the route taken by the army in the fall of 1778 from the Highlands to Redding:

"* HEAD QUARTERS, FREDERICKSBURG, Oct. 16, 1778.

"* To-morrow being the Anniversary of the Surrender of Gen'l Burgoyne and his Troops to the Arms of America under the Command of Major Gen'l Gates, it will be Commemorated by the firing of thirteen cannon from the Park of Artillery at 12 o. Clock."

"* HEAD QUARTERS, OCT. 22, 1778.

"* Nixon's, Parson's and Huntington's Brigades are to march to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock from the Line under the command of Major Gen'l McDougall—Orders of March—Gen'l Nixon's Brigade leads, Huntington's follows, Parson's brings up the Rear, Commanding Officers of Corps will be answerable for the conduct of the men while on the March. Artillery to March in Centre of each Brigade—the Baggage of Gen'l Officers to March in Rear of the Troops, the other Baggage will march in the same order. Forage and Commissary Waggons in the rear of the Whole."

"* NEW MILFORD, NOV. 5, 1778.

"* The Honorable, the Continental Congress having on the 12th of October passed a Resolution to discourage prophaneness in the Army it is inserted in this Division for the information of Officers, and Gen. McDougall hopes for their aid and Countenance in Discouraging and Suppressing a Vice so Dishonorable to human Nature, to the commission of which there is no Temptation enough."

"* CAMP, NEW MILFORD, Oct. 26, 1778.

"* His Excellency the Commander in Chief has Directed the Troops to remain here till further orders—and be in Readiness to March at the shortest notice as Circumstances shall require. While the Division is Reposed, two days bread will be on store Continually, Baked."

"These interesting extracts might fitly conclude the story of the army's encampment in Redding. There are, however, some entries in the parish records, proving that amid the horrors of war sly Cupid found a chance to inflict his wounds, that are worthy of insertion. They are given as entered by the Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett:

"* Feb. 7, 1779. I joined together in marriage James Gibbons a soldier in the Army and Ann Sullivan.

"* March 18th, 1779. I joined together in marriage John Lines, a soldier in the Army, and Mary Hendrick.

"* March 30, 1779. I joined in marriage Daniel Everts a soldier, and Mary Rowland.

"* Apr. 15, 1779. I joined in marriage Isaac Obusted a soldier, and Mary Parsons.

"* Apr. 28, 1779. I joined in marriage Jesse Belknap an artificer in the army, and Eunice Hall.

"* May 4, 1779. I joined in marriage William Little, Steward to Gen. Parsons, and Phebe Merchant.

"* May 23, 1779. I joined in marriage Giles Gilbert an artificer in the army, and Deborah Hall.

"* March 9, 1780. I joined in marriage William Darrow a soldier and Ruth Bateman."

"In the month of June, 1781, Count de Rochambeau and the Duke de Lauzun marched a column of French troops across Connecticut and took post in Ridgefield, within supporting distance of Washington's army on the Hudson.

"They passed through Redding on the march, and encamped over night, it is said, on the old parade-ground.

"Their supply-train numbered eight hundred and ten wagons, most of them drawn by two yoke of oxen and a horse. The column attracted much attention as it moved, with flashing arms and soldierly precision, over the hills and through the valleys on its way to Ridgefield.

"No complete list of the soldiers furnished by Redding to the Continental army can be prepared. The following names appear on the town list of Revolutionary pensioners: Col. Asahel Salmons, Capt. Zalmon Read, Capt. John Davis, Joel Merchant, Ezra Bates, Calvin Jenkins, Ezra Hull, Stephen Batterson, Jacob Patchen, and Abraham Parsons; and in the town records those whose families were aided were Nathan Coley, Stephen Meeker, Elias Bixby, Jeremiah Ryan, and Samuel Remong."

CAPT. WILLIAM JUDD'S COMPANY.

The following is the pay-roll of Capt. William Judd's company, Col. Wyllis's regiment, which was encamped at Redding in 1778-79: Asa Chapman, Sergt., Homer Phelps, Joel Smith, Sergt., Thomas Peck, Elijah Porter, William Lee, fifer, Eleazer Porter, D. Adams, Timothy Keeler, Levi Hamlin, Elisha Hollstein, Stephen Chapman, John Oakley, Conor Dunham, Jr., Ebenezer Park, Samuel Hotchkiss, Ephraim Taylor, Amos Barnes, — Shaw, Joseph Hill, Benjamin Potts, David Heydon, Ebenezer Park, Abel Scipio, Thomas Swift, and Luther Atkins.

REVOLUTIONARY ACCOUNTS.*

The following accounts are interesting from the fact that they give the names of some of the soldiers, and also the prices of clothing at the time a part of the army was encamped at Redding in 1778-79:

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

William Lynes was a native of Redding; when a boy was bound out at Roxbury, Conn., to learn the trade of a blacksmith. A journeyman in the shop induced him to run away and go to Canada, where he was promised large wages at peeling bark. The British had press-gangs out, and he was pressed into the service. He was at sea about five years without being allowed to go on shore for fear he would run away. He refused all inducements given to enlist in the service. He was fourteen years in the British navy, and was stationed at St. Helena about seven years; was there when Bonaparte died, and shod his horses. The emperor, learning that he was an American, took frequent opportunities to talk with him about this country. Mr. Lynes was in the merchant service about fourteen years. He was for a number of years a charge to the town of Redding, and died on Gallows Hill, in Redding.

Bernhard—or, as he was commonly called, "Uncle Barney"—Keeler was a Hessian, and left the British army when Governor Tryon marched through Redding to Danbury. He married and settled at Redding. He had been a gardener to a nobleman in his country. He often used to boast that King George would have to pay his sovereign for him, for King George had to pay a certain sum to the ruler of Hesse for all the soldiers who did not return.

On the leaf of an old account-book kept in Redding in 1815-16 is a charge made by the selectmen against the State for boarding Eunice Warrups, as follows:

"To paid Lewis Deane for boarding her from 1st Nov. 1815, to 16th Jan'y, 1816, being 11 wks, $1.25, 1375."

There is on another leaf the following:

"Eunice Warrups, an Indian woman, was born in this town; is upwards of seventy years old; has been absent fifty years; came from New Milford, she says, 1st day of Nov.; came to this town; was warned to depart."

BOSTON SCHOOL DISTRICT.*

In the early part of the present century Boston School District was an important part of Redding. It was on the main road, the great thoroughfare between Danbury and Norwalk, over which most of the travel and traffic between the two places passed. In those days the old Danbury turnpike was a road of consequence. It was nothing unusual for half a dozen heavily-loaded wagons to be seen at a time passing over it. A daily stage was run to convey passengers to Norwalk, who went to and returned from New York by way of sloop, and afterwards by steamboat. The old lumbering stage-coach, with its four, and frequent six, horses, and good-natured, accommodating driver, has been superseded by the steam-cars and the equally good-natured conductor; and the sound of the stage-horn, which, when blown by the strong-lunged driver, reverberated over the hill and through the valleys, has given way to the shriek of the steam-whistle, while rapid transit has made the old-fashioned taverns by the roadside no longer a necessity. The old turnpike-gates have also been set aside by modern innovation.

At the Corners, in Boston, was located the earliest post-office in town. There was an extensive hat-factory conducted by Billy Comstock, afterwards by his son Andrew, who was succeeded by the Shelton Brothers, N. H. Lindley, and others. In addition to the various trades necessary to a country hamlet was a ring cider-mill, owned by Daniel Malloy, where the farmers occupied a liberal portion of the time in autumn grinding their apples into cider, and storing their cellars with it. He also owned a distillery, where some of this cider was converted into whisky. There was a store where large quantities of goods were disposed of, and a hotel where in after-years the stage-horses were kept for relays. "Breakneck Hill," a mile above this tavern, was the dread of teamsters, who frequently had to be helped over it by the neighboring farmers. Subsequently a road was constructed farther west to avoid "Breakneck." By the liberality of S. Smith Gray, this formidable elevation was made quite passable by being cut down at the top and filled at the bottom, so that it is no longer a terror to the traveler.

In this district Joel Barlow, the poet and statesman, was born; here he attended the common school, received the rudiments of his education, and laid the foundation of his knowledge, which afterwards made him famous. Elias Bennett, the veteran post-rider, resided in this district, and for a period of thirty-three years, in whatever state of the weather, made weekly trips to Bridgeport and delivered the newspapers to his patrons. Here also resided Jack Freeman, an aged colored man, better known as "Governor,"—a title which he received from the fact of his being the acknowledged governor of the colored inhabitants of the State. He every summer, on the recurrence of Saint Cuffee's day, called out his subjects for inspection and review. Jack had been a slave, and was manumitted by the laws of the State when the act took effect.

In those days the merchants exchanged their goods for grain, flax, butter, eggs, and other produce, and teams were constantly on the road conveying this produce to Norwalk and other seaport-towns and returning with merchandise. Among those engaged in the business between Boston District and the seaport was Jack Sturges, an old colored man. He, on his way from Norwalk on that day, fell asleep in the cart, and his team, which consisted of a yoke of oxen and one of steers, stopped at the foot of "Steep Pitch," in the woods just below Georgetown. Some waggish persons, happening along, unhitched the steers, drove them into the woods, and secreted themselves under the cart. A few well-directed thrusts from a sharp stick soon awakened Jack, who raised himself up, and, seeing the steers gone, thus soliloquized: "Am I Jack, or am I not Jack? If I'm Jack, I've lost a pair of steers; and if I'm not Jack, I've found a pair of oxen and a cart."

Many stories are told of Hiram Barnes, the old stage-proprietor of Danbury, and an inveterate joker. It was not uncommon, in the hot days of summer, for the stage-horses to become exhausted, and sometimes they died in the harness. On a certain occasion one of the horses fell, and was removed to the roadside, where he soon died. The driver proceeded to Danbury with three horses. Barnes inquired about the missing horse, and was told that he fell in the harness and died. "You fool," said Barnes; "why did you stop? Why didn't you keep him going? He would have come through all right if you hadn't stopped."

During the time the horses were changed here an acquaintance of Barnes from Danbury, who was returning from his wedding-tour with his wife in a carriage, stopped at the tavern. Barnes soon got into an animated conversation with him about the speed of their horses. After driving about for some time Barnes offered to bet that he could drive to Danbury the quickest. The gentleman had become oblivious to everything but horse-racing, and at once fell in with the proposition. After going about two-thirds of the distance Barnes said to him, "Didn't you have a woman with you when you was at the tavern?"—"O Lord, yes," said the gentleman, and immediately drove back for the lady.

At one time a sleighing-party stopped at the tavern and called for refreshments, which consisted in part of eider and doughnuts, for which the landlord made repeated visits to the cellar, and on each return put down the amount on a sheet of paper, which for convenience he put into a Bible near at hand. When about to leave the party called for the bill, and, on seeing the amount, were dissatisfied, and declared they would not pay it. An appeal was made to Barnes. "Pay it, boys," said he. "Don't you see it's in the Bible? and it must be true." The bill was paid without further dispute.

REDDING (Continued).

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.*

The Congregational Church—Christ Church—Methodist Episcopal Church—Methodist Episcopal Church of Long Ridge—Baptist Church, Georgetown—The Congregational Church, Georgetown.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

"THE Congregational Church was the first religious body organized in the town. As early as August, 1729, but three months after they had wrung a reluctant consent from the mother-town to assume parish privileges, we find them providing for the settlement of a minister among them in the following manner:

"At a Society Meeting held in the Society of Redding, Deacon George Hull chosen Moderator. It was voted that s'd Society would give for the settlement of a minister in s'd society the sum of seventy pounds, and a house, and his wood, and bring it up, and the next year eighty pounds, and raise five pounds a year till it comes to one hundred pounds a year. It was voted, that Edmond Luis, esquire, shall decide the matter as to setting the meeting-hous, it was voted that s'd Mr. Luis should come the first week in October to decide the matter afores'd."

"No minister was settled, however, until 1733; the first church edifice was erected early in 1732. It stood a few yards west of the present Methodist church, and nearly in the centre of the public square or common.† It was two stories high, lathed and plastered, and furnished with galleries, and windows of imported glass. All that is to be found in the church records concerning the building is contained in the following extracts:

"November 12th, 1730. It was voted, That we will build a meeting-house in said society for the worship of God in the Presbyterian way. Voted, That the meeting-hous shall be thirty feet long, twenty-eight feet wide, and two stories high. Voted, That Lemuel Sanford, Thomas Wilkins, and Daniel Lion, (he) chosen committee for (building) s'd meeting-hous."

"Feb. 23d, 1730-31. You that are of the minds that all those persons that do, or hereafter may inhabit in this parish, which profess themselves to be of the Church of England, shall have free liberty to come into this meeting-hous that is now in building, and attend the Publick worship of God there, according to the articles of faith agreed upon by the assembly of Divines at Seabrook, and established by the laws of this Government, and be seated in s'd hous according to their estates.

"November 3d, 1732. Stephen Burr hath undertaken to cart stones and clay for the underpinning the meeting-hous for 1*l*. 10*s*. 00*d*. Daniel Lion hath undertaken to underpan the meeting-hous and tend himself for 2*l*. 4*s*. 0*d*. Daniel Lion hath undertaken to get the lath and lay them on for 3*l*. 0*s*. 0*d*. Stephen Burr and Theophilus Hull are chosen committee to take care of the pars'nage probably to secure a parsonage for the expected preacher, as it is not likely that one was then built.

"It was as yet, however, a church without a pastor. Mr. Elisha Kent had been called in October, 1730, but had declined, as we infer from the silence of the records on the subject. A society-meeting held May 8, 1732, extended a similar call to the Rev. Timothy Mix, and deputed Deacon George Hull 'to go to the Association at Stamford to ask advice concerning the settlement of Mr. Mix;' but this call, as in the case of Mr. Kent, seems to have been declined. At length a unanimous call was made to the Rev. Nathaniel Hunn, as follows:

* The following history of the churches was compiled by Mr. Charles Burr Todd, and published in his "History of Redding," issued in 1880.

† The corner-stone of the old church may still be seen on the common, a little south of a line drawn from Deacon Abbot's to the store lately occupied by Mr. Mandeville.

"Jan. 31, 1732-33. At a society meeting held in the parish (of) Redding, George Hull chosen Moderator for s'd meeting, Mr. Nathaniel Hunn by a voit unanime contradictoire was made chois of for the minister of s'd parish, furthermore it was voted at s'd meeting to settle upon the s'd Mr. Hunn's yearly salary as followeth, that is, for the first year of his administration, seventy pounds current money or bills of Public Credit in New England, the second year, seventy-five pounds, for the third year, eighty pounds, for the fourth year, eighty-five pounds, the fifth year, ninety pounds, the sixth year, ninety-five pounds, the seventh year, a hundred pounds, all in current money as afores'd, and so on a hundred pounds a year during the term of his continuance in the ministry in s'd parish, and also to give the s'd Mr. Hunn the whole and sole privilege of all the parsonage land belonging to s'd parish, and to provide him his firewood, during the term afores'd, also to find him a convenient dwelling-house for the first five years, also to give the s'd Mr. Hunn, a hundred acres of land on or before the day of his ordination."

"Feb. 20, 1732-33, 'it was voted that the ordination of Mr. Hunn shall be on the 21st day of March next,' and John Read and George Hull were chosen a committee 'to represent the parish concerning the ordination of Mr. Hunn.'

"The Rev. Sidney G. Law, in his Centennial Sermon, delivered at Redding, July 6, 1876, thus speaks of Mr. Hunn's pastorate:

"His first record is very brief for so important a matter,—viz., "March 21st, 1733, I was separated to the work of the ministry by prayer and fasting, and the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery." The next record gives the choice of deacons, viz.: "At a church meeting, March 29, 1733, we made choice of Stephen Barr for a deacon, and some time after we chose Theo. Hall to the same service. . . ." The next records relate to the adoption of Tate and Brady's version of the Psalms, first for one month, and then for the indefinite future.

"The first members of the church enumerated by Mr. Hunn were as follows: Col. John Read and wife, Theophilus Hull and wife, George Hull and wife, Peter Barr and wife, Daniel Lion and wife, Daniel Bradley and wife, Stephen Barr and wife, Ebenezer Hull and wife, John Griffen, Nathaniel Sanford, Thomas Fairchild, Lemuel Sanford, Benjamin Lion and wife, Mary wife of Richard Lion, Isaac Hull, Esther wife of Thomas Williams, Esther wife of Benjamin Hamilton. Thus it appears that the church was organized with twenty-six members, including the two deacons, about the time that Mr. Hunn was ordained,—viz., the 21st of March, 1733.

"Mr. Hunn married Ruth, a sister of Col. Read.* He was pastor of the church sixteen years. During this time he received about ninety-two members into the church, the most of them by letter of recommendation from neighboring churches. He performed thirty-five marriages and one hundred and ninety-two baptisms. He died while on a journey, and was buried in Boston in 1749. His widow, Ruth Hunn, died in 1766, and was buried near her brother, Col. John Read, in the cemetery west of the parsonage."

"Mr. Hunn's administration seems to have been a happy and prosperous one, and few events of importance occurred during its continuance.

"In 1738 it was voted 'to finish glassing the meeting house, and to finish seating the meeting house as is begun, and do something to the pulpit.' In 1739, 'Voted, That Sergt. Joseph Lee shall get Mr. Hunn's wood, and have seven pounds for it.' 'Voted, That the place for putting up warnings for society meetings be changed from Umpawang to the mill door.' In 1740, 'Voted, To rectify the meeting house in the following articles,—viz., to put in new glass where it is wanting, and to mend the old. To lay some beams in the gallery and double floor. To fasten the meeting house doors; to make stairs up the gallery; to put a rail on the fore side of the gallery;' and 'that the place for parish meeting shall be at the school house, by the meeting house for the future.' In 1741, 'Voted, To seat the meeting house in the lower part with plain strong seats.' In 1742, 'Voted, To empower the parish committee to agree with a person to beat the drum as a signal to call the people together on the sabbath.' Again Feb. 15, 1743-44, it was 'Voted, That the timber and boards provided for seating the meeting-house shall be improved to that end for the use of the Parish.'

"Mr. Hunn died in the summer or fall of 1749, and for the four following years the church was without a pastor. A call was extended to Mr. Solomon Mead in March, 1751, without success, and in November of the same year to the Rev. Izrahiah Wetmore, with a like result. The interim was improved by the people, however, in building a new church, which stood nearly on the site of the present edifice.

"It was probably completed and ready for use early in the summer of 1752, as on the 22d of June of that year a call was extended to the Rev. Mr. Tammage to be their preacher, and the old meeting-house was sold to Jehu Burr for thirty-four pounds. The copy is from the records of a society meeting held at Widow Sanford's, June 23, 1763:

"Put to vote whether the meeting-house of s'd society shall be seated in ye form following viz. a com'te being appointed to Dignify ye pews and other seats in s'd Meeting House the Respective members of s'd society shall sit in s'd pews and seats according to their Rank and Degree to be computed by their several lists and age, viz. upon ye two last years lists, and to allow three pound per year to be added to a persons List for his advancement in a seat, and all at ye discretion of s'd com'te who shall be appointed to Dignify s'd pews and seats, and to inspect the Respective lists and ages of s'd members."

"The committee appointed was Joseph Sanford, Ebenezer Couch, and Stephen Burr; but, Messrs. Sanford and Burr declining to act, Ephraim Jackson and Joseph Banks were chosen in their place. This committee was unable to settle the question satisfactorily, and a meeting was held Aug. 11, 1763, at which the following action was taken:

"It was put to vote whether the Dignity of ye pews and seats in ye meeting-house should be in the following manner viz. Ye pew adjoining ye pulpit stairs first in Dignity ye Pew adjoining the grant doors, west side, second in dignity the fore seat third in Dignity, the second pew west of ye pulpit, fourth, the second seat, fifth: the second pew north from the west door sixth: the fifth pew north of ye west door, seventh: the third pew north of the west door, eighth: the second pew west of ye grant doors, ninth: the first pew south of ye west door, tenth: the third seat, eleventh: the second pew south of the west door, twelfth: the fourth seat, thirteenth: the front seat in ye gallery, fourteenth: the fore seat on ye side of the gallery, fifteenth: the pews and seats upon ye east end of ye meeting-house of Equal Dignity with those upon the west side in the same manner and order as they are above mentioned. Passed in the negative."

* She was a daughter of the Hon. John Read, who settled at Lunetown in 1714. Both Mr. Law and Mr. Barber are in error in supposing that the original John Read lived and died in Redding. He removed to Boston in 1722, and his son John succeeded to his title and to the manor at Lunetown. The latter is the one mentioned in these records.

"Three months later another meeting was called, and adopted the following plan :

"The respective members of the society shall sit in ye pews and seats of the meeting house of s'd society according to their rank or degree, to be computed by their respective lists and ages, viz. upon the lists given in upon the years 1751 and 1761 and 1792, and to allow three pounds per year to be added to a person's list for his advancement in a seat or pew the Respective lists and ages of s'd members are to be inspected, also to give the committee chosen at this meeting power to seat those that are new comers, and have not . . . in s'd society, to seat them at said committee's dis. resion.

"Likewise to seat ye Widows in s'd Society at the best of ye Committee's judgment, whi h method of seating s'd meeting house shall continue until s'd Society at their meeting shall order otherwise.

"Also voted, That s'd com'te shall seat those women whose husbands belong to the Church of England at their discretion."

"The Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett, the second pastor of the church, was ordained May 23, 1753, the next year after the church was built.

"Mr. Bartlett came to Redding when a young man, and continued pastor of the church for fifty-seven years. In the War of Independence Mr. Bartlett's sympathies were entirely with the patriot cause; two of his sons entered the army, munitions of war were stored in his house, and he himself frequently officiated as chaplain during the encampment of Putnam's division in the town in the winter of 1779. Mr. Bartlett died Jan. 11, 1810, and was buried in the old cemetery west of the church. The inscription upon his tombstone reads as follows :

"THE REV. NATHANIEL BARTLETT,

"Died January 11, 1810, aged 83 years.

"I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.—JESUS CHRIST."

"During the entire period of Mr. Bartlett's ministry we have in the church records but one entry of importance, and that is of interest as marking the organization of the Episcopal Society in the town. This entry is as follows :

"To Seth S. Smith of Redding, in Fairfield Co. Greeting, Whereas by law the Episcopal Church in said Redding is become a distinct society whereby the members of the Presbyterian church in said Redding have become the first society in said town. These are therefore by authority of the State of Connecticut to command you to warn and give notice to all the members of said first society, and all others who by law are obliged to contribute towards the support, and the worship, and the ministry with the same, to meet at the meeting-house in said Redding on Monday the 20th of December at 12 in order to choose a moderator and necessary officers.

"Witness, December 14, 1785."

"The Rev. Jonathan Bartlett, third minister of the church, was ordained as colleague with his father, Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett, in 1796. The first of the church records in his handwriting is as follows :

"Feb. 3, 1796. I was separated to the work of the ministry and ordained as colleague with my father Nathaniel Bartlett over the Congregational Church in Redding in Gospel order and form. The ministers who performed the work were as follows, viz. — the Rev. Israhel Wetmore chosen Moderator, R. de B. Ross made the ordaining prayer, Elsha Rexford made the introductory prayer, David Ely preached the sermon. Imposition of hands by S. Bartlett, B. Ross, and Rexford. John Ely gave the right hand of fellowship, Samuel W. Stebbins made the concluding prayer."

"Rev. Daniel Crocker, of Bedford, N. Y., was called in August, 1809, as colleague with Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett. He was a good man and a successful pastor, and served the church fifteen years, being dismissed in 1824. The Rev. Charles De Witt Tappan was called, but not settled. The next pastor chosen was Mr. William C. Kniffen, in 1825; he was dismissed in 1828. The Rev. Burr Baldwin was next called, but not settled. The next pastor was the Rev. William L. Strong, formerly pastor at Somers, Tolland Co., Conn.; he was installed June 23, 1830, and dismissed Feb. 26, 1835. In September, 1835, following Mr. Strong's dismissal, a subscription was commenced for the erection of the present church edifice, which was built in 1836. The expense was not to exceed two thousand five hundred dollars, with the old meeting-house. In December of the same year a unanimous call was extended to the Rev. David C. Comstock, but was not accepted at that time. In March, 1837, Rev. Daniel E. Manton was called, but not settled. In June of the same year the Rev. Jeremiah Miller was called, and was installed July 12, 1837; Mr. Miller was dismissed in 1839. In the following year, 1840, Mr. David C. Comstock was ordained and installed pastor of the church; he was dismissed in 1845. After him Daniel D. Frost, after preaching as stated supply for eighteen months, was ordained Dec. 30, 1845; he continued pastor ten years, being dismissed Oct. 13, 1856. In 1857 the pulpit was supplied by the Rev. Mr. Root. In 1858 the Rev. Enoch S. Huntington supplied the pulpit one year; he presented the communion-service to the church, for which he received its thanks. In 1859 the church was remodeled and painted, receiving the beautiful fresco which still adorns it. In 1860, Rev. W. D. Herrick became pastor, and so continued until 1864. After him Rev. E. B. Huntington, and also Rev. Mr. Barnum, preached for a short time. Rev. S. F. Farmer supplied in 1865. Rev. K. B. Glidden was installed Sept. 12, 1866; resigned December, 1868. In 1869 the Rev. Charles Chamberlain became acting pastor. He resigned in September, 1871.

"Rev. Sidney G. Law, acting pastor, June 1, 1872, and after a prosperous ministry of six years resigned in 1878.

"Rev. W. J. Jennings, the present pastor, was installed Dec. 17, 1879.

"The complete list of those who have served it as pastors, with the date of their ordination and dismissal, is as follows: Nathaniel Hunn, settled March 21, 1733, died 1749; Nathaniel Bartlett, settled May 23, 1753, died Jan. 11, 1810; Jonathan Bartlett, settled Feb. 3, 1796, dismissed June 7, 1809, died March 22, 1858; Daniel Crocker, settled Oct. 4, 1809, dismissed Oct. 24, 1821; William C. CHRIST CHURCH.*

"The present town of Redding is one of the few places in the old colony of Connecticut where the Episcopal ministry is entitled to the distinction of having been first on the ground, laying foundations and not building upon those already laid. The Church of England was not planted in New England without strenuous and bitter opposition from the Puritans, who were first in the field. By old English law, indeed, that church was established in all the plantations; yet it is manifest from the records of the colonial legislation of the charter government of Connecticut that previously to 1727 the church of which the king was a member was not recognized as having a right to exist. Congregationalism was the established religion, 'in opposition to which there could be no ministry or church administration entertained or attended by the inhabitants of any town or plantation, upon penalty of fifty pounds for every breach of this act;' and every person in the colony was obliged to pay taxes for the support of this establishment.

"In this uncongenial soil the Anglican Church of Connecticut was planted,—strange to say, not by foreign-born missionaries, but by seceders from the ministry of the Congregationalists. The pioneers in this movement were Timothy Cutler, rector of Yale College; Daniel Brown, tutor; James Wetmore, of North Haven; and Samuel Johnson, of West Haven, a former tutor in the college. These gentlemen, after a professedly careful and prayerful examination of the subject of church order, discipline, and worship, which resulted in a conviction that the English Church followed most closely the teaching of the Scriptures and the practice of the church of the first ages, sent to the trustees of the college a formal statement of their views and declared for Episcopacy,—to the no small surprise and consternation of their colleagues in the college and church. The four went to England for episcopal ordination, where Brown died. The three survivors returned in 1722, as missionaries of the 'Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts,' Johnson only being sent to Connecticut. The ante-Revolutionary history of the church at Redding Ridge is mostly to be found in the archives of this society, as published in the 'Documentary History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Connecticut,' and the Rev. Dr. Beardsley's 'History of the Episcopal Church in Connecticut,' from which sources, mainly, this sketch has been compiled.

"A letter was addressed to the secretary of the S. P. G., dated Oct. 19, 1722, signed by John Glover and twelve other heads of families in Newtown, Thomas Wheeler, of Woodbury, and Moses Knapp, of Chestnut Ridge, thanking the society for the services of the Rev. George Pigot, missionary at Stratford, and earnestly soliciting the appointment of a missionary for themselves at Newtown.

"The next year, 1723, Mr. Pigot was transferred to Newport, R. I., and the Rev. Samuel Johnson, his successor at Stratford, 'accepted all his missionary duties in Connecticut.'

"In 1727 the Rev. Henry Caner [pronounce Can-ner] was sent to Fairfield, of which town Chestnut Ridge was a part. After having named in his report the several villages or hamlets in the vicinity of his station, he says, 'Besides these, there is a village northward from Fairfield about eighteen miles, containing near twenty families, where there is no minister at all, of any denomination whatsoever; the name of it is Chestnut Ridge, and where I usually preach or lecture once in three weeks.' In 1728 he says there are four villages 'about Fairfield,'—Green Farms, Greenfield, Poquannuck, and Chestnut Ridge, three of them about four miles distant, the last about sixteen. The same year the name of Moses Knapp appears as a vestryman of the church at Fairfield.

"In 1729, 'Moses Knapp, Nathan Lyon, and Daniel Crofoot' objected, in a meeting of the [Presbyterian] 'Society of Redding' 'against' the 'hiring' any other than a minister of the Church of England. These three names appear again in the list of Mr. Beach's parishioners in 1738. The Rev. Dr. Burhans [Churchman's Magazine, 1823] says, 'The first churchman in Reading was a Mr. Richard Lyon, from Ireland, who died as early as 1735.' He also says, on the authority of 'an aged member of the Church in Reading,' that 'Messrs. [Richard?] Lyon, [Stephen] Morehouse, [Moses] Knapp, [Joshua] Hall, [William] Hill, [Daniel] Crofoot, and [Lieut. Samuel] Fairchild appear to have composed the first Church in Reading.' Nathan Lyon died in 1757, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. Mr. Caner reported in 1728 seven families at Chestnut Ridge, the number reminding us of the 'House of Wisdom' with its 'Seven Pillars,' as the first Puritan organization at New Haven was named.

"Mr. Caner was succeeded at Chestnut Ridge, in 1732, by the Rev. John Beach, a pupil of Johnson in Yale College, and afterwards Presbyterian minister at Newtown for several years. As Mr. Beach was a resident of East Redding for about twenty years, and pastor of this church full half a century, his history is substantially that of the parish, or mission, over which he presided. His pastorate was the longest of all the ante-Revolutionary clergy. He was born in Stratford, Oct. 6, 1700; graduated from Yale at the age of twenty-one, and licensed to preach soon afterwards. He is said to have been selected for the Presbyterian pastorate at Newtown as a 'popular and insinuating young man,' well fitted to check the growth of Episcopacy, which was there thriving under the ministry of Caner and Johnson. Many churchmen must have 'joined in settling him with Presbyterian ordination,' for in 1722 they claimed to be a majority of the population, whereas, for some time after his 'settlement,' Mr. Johnson ministered to only about five families. 'From these visits . . . frequent and earnest discussions resulted between the two teachers, the influence of which was soon evident to Mr. Beach's congregation.' After two or three years of patient study and meditation he alarmed his congregation by his frequent use of the Lord's Prayer, and still more by reading whole chapters from the Word of God. Next he ventured to condemn a custom, common in their meetings, of rising and bowing to the minister as he came in among them, and instead of which he begged them to kneel down and worship God. At length (in January, 1731), 'after he had been a preacher more than eight years, he told them from the pulpit that "from a serious and prayerful examination of the Scriptures, and of the records of the early ages of the church, and from the universal acknowledgment of Episcopal government for fifteen hundred years, compared with the recent establishment of Presbyterian and Congregational discipline," he was fully persuaded of the invalidity of his ordination, and of the unscriptural method of organizing and governing congregations as by them practiced. He therefore, "In the face of Almighty God," had made up his mind to 'conform to the Church of England, as being apostolical in her ministry and discipline, orthodox in her doctrine, and primitive in her worship.' He affectionately exhorted them to weigh the subject well, engaged to provide for the due administration of the sacraments while absent from them, and spoke of his intended return from England in holy orders. So greatly was he beloved that a large proportion of his people seemed ready to acquiesce in his determination. But the others, in evident alarm and consternation at this 'threatened defection from their ranks,' held a town-meeting 'to consult' as to 'what was possible to be done with the Rev. Mr. John Beach, under present difficulties;' 'voted to have a (day of) solemn fasting and prayer; . . . to call in the Ecclesiastical Council of Fairfield to direct and do what they shall think proper, under the . . . difficult circumstances respecting the Rev. Mr. Beach, and the inhabitants of the town of Newtown; also that the first Wednesday of February (1732) be appointed for the fast.'

"The council met, and in spite of Mr. Beach's remonstrances proceeded to depose him from the ministry. 'From this resulted a printed discussion' between him and his deponents, which ultimately helped rather than hindered the Church of England.

"Mr. Beach returned from England in Episcopal orders, and took charge of the Newtown and Redding mission in the autumn of 1732. From this period his history and that of his mission may be more accurately told in the language of his own letters to the secretary of the S. P. G.

"NEWTOWN, IN CONNECTICUT, August 7th, 1735.

"REVEREND SIR: I think it my duty to acquaint the venerable Society with the present state of my parish, although the alteration since my last has not been very considerable. I have baptized twenty-nine children and admitted twenty-five persons more to the communion, so that the number . . . now at Newtown, Reading, and the places adjacent is ninety-five. I preach frequently and administer the Sacrament at Ridgefield, . . . about eighteen miles distant, . . . where there are about fourteen or eighteen families of very serious and religious people who have a just esteem of the Church of England, and are very desirous to have the opportunity of worshipping God in that way. I have constantly preached one Sunday at Newtown, and the other at Reading; and after I have preached at Reading in the day-time, I . . . preach at Newtown in the evening; and although I have not that success I could wish for, yet I do, and hope I always shall, faithfully endeavor (as far as my poor ability will allow) to promote that good work that the venerable Society sent and maintained for me. I am, Rev. Sir,

"Your most humble servant,
"JOHN BEACH."

"As a specimen of his manner of defending himself against personal attacks we have the following from a controversial pamphlet, in reply to John Dickinson, of New Jersey, in 1736:

"I have evened the scale of my judgment as much as possibly I could, and to the best of my knowledge I have not allowed one grain of worldly motive on either side. I have supposed myself on the brink of eternity, just going into the other world to give up my account to my great Judge; and must I be branded for an anti-christ or heretic, or apostate, because my judgment determines that the Church of England is most agreeable to the Word of God? I can speak in the presence of God, who knows my heart better than you do, that I would willingly turn Dissenter again, if you or any man living will show me reason for it. But it must be reason (whereby I exclude not the Word of God, which is the highest reason), and not seducy and calumny, as you have hitherto used, that will convince a lover of truth and right."

"In 1739 he says,—

"I have one hundred and twenty-three communicants, but they live so far distant from each other that commonly I can administer to no more than about fifty at once, which occasions my administering it the more frequently, and, though I meet with many discouragements, yet I have this satisfaction, that all my communicants (one or two excepted) do adorn their profession by a sober, righteous, and godly life."

"In 1743, some three years after Whitefield began his famous 'revival of Puritanism,' Mr. Beach says,—

"My people are not at all shaken, but rather confirmed, in their principles by the spirit of enthusiasm that rages among the Independents round about us; and many of the Dissenters, observing how steadfast our people are, . . . while those of their own denomination are easily carried away with every kind of doctrine, have conceived a much better opinion of our Church than they formerly had, and a considerable number in this colony have lately conformed, and several churches are now building where they have no minister. . . . Were there in this country but one of the Episcopal order to whom young men might apply for ordination without the expense and danger of a voyage to England, many of our towns might be supplied which must now remain destitute.* My people are poor, and have but few negro slaves, but all they have, I have, after instruction, baptized, and some of them are communicants.'

"In October of the same year he says,—

"I beg the venerable Society's direction in an affair I am just now perplexed with. There are about twenty families . . . at New Milford and New Fairfield, which are about fifteen miles hence. I preach to them several times a year, but seldom on the Lord's day. They frequently come to church at Newtown; but, by reason of the distance, they can't attend constantly, and their families very sick, and when they can't come to church they meet together in their own town, and one of their number reads some part of the common prayer and a sermon. They are now building a church . . . But the Independents, to suppress the design in its infancy, . . . have lately presented and sued them for their meeting to worship God according to the common prayer . . . The case of these poor people is very hard; if, on the Lord's day, they continue at home, they must be punished, if they meet to worship God according to the Church of England in the best manner they can, the malice is much greater; and if they go to the Independent meeting, . . . they must endure the mortification of hearing the Church vilified.'

"After the death of the Rev. Joshua Honeyman, missionary at Newport, R. I., in 1750, the church of which he had the care petitioned the society that Mr. Beach might be sent to them as their minister. The petition was granted, but Mr. Beach felt constrained, on account of feeble health, to decline the appointment, fearing, as he said, that 'the people might complain that a worn-out man was imposed upon them.'

"The first church on Redding Ridge, which was built in 1733 and was quite small, was in 1750 replaced by another on the same site, fifty feet long and thirty-six wide, surmounted by a turret, which in 1797 was replaced by a steeple, in which was placed the first bell. This church, according to the style of the period, was furnished with square, high-backed pews, with seats on their four sides; so that some of their occupants had to sit with their backs to the minister. And though others doubtless besides Bishop Jarvis 'could see no necessary connection between piety and freezing,' there was no heating-apparatus in the churches until considerably past the beginning of the present century. 'Trinity church, New Haven, had no means of being warmed until 1822, and none of the rural churches were supplied with stoves until a much later period.' Many persons in the rural districts were in the habit of walking several miles, barefooted, to church in summer, and probably did not feel the lack of shoes a great privation. So common was it for men to go to church without their coats that the first time Bishop Seabury preached in New Haven a dissenting hearer reported that 'he preached in his shirt-sleeves.' Often the family was mounted, the parents with a child in arms to be christened, upon one horse, and the older children upon another. Sometimes the whole family were clustered together upon the ox-cart or sled, and thus they went up to the house of God.

* This letter is dated at "Reading, in New England," as all his published reports are, between 1740 and 1760.

"In 1759, three years after the breaking out of the 'Old French War,' Mr. Beach, writing from 'Reading, Connecticut, in N. England,' says,— "My parish is in a flourishing condition, in all respects, excepting that we have lost some of our young men in the army; more, indeed, by sickness than by the sword, for this countrymen do not bear a campaign so well as Europeans.'

"Dr. Johnson's playful remark to his son, that 'Mr. Beach had always these seeming inconsistencies, to be always dying, and yet relishing mundane things,' would seem to indicate that his friend was not really so near death's door as he often imagined himself; for example, in 1761, when he says, 'My painful and weak state of body admonishes me that, although this may not be the last time of my writing, yet the last cannot be far off;' and he had supposed himself a 'worn-out man' several years before.

"Writing from 'New-Town, Oct. 3, 1764,' he reports,—

"My congregation at Reading has increased very little for some years past, by reason that many who were wont to attend there, though living at a distance of 6, 8, or 10 miles, have lately built [each] a small church near them, where they can more conveniently meet; viz. at Danbury, Ridgely, North Fairfield, and North Stratford; which has very much retarded the growth of the congregation at Reading, which . . . now consists of about 300 hearers at one time.'

Under date of April, 1765, he says,—

"I am now engaged in a controversy with some of the Independent Ministers about these absurd doctrines, the sum of which is contained in a thesis published by New Haven College last September . . . They expressly deny that there is any law of Grace, which promises eternal life upon the condition of faith, repentance, and sincere obedience; and assert justification only by the law of innocence and sinless obedience. Though my health is small, and my abilities less, I make it a rule never to enter into any dispute with them unless they begin, yet now they have made the assault, and advocate such monstrous errors as do subvert the Gospel, I think myself obliged by my ordination vow to guard the people as well as I can against such strange doctrines.'

"Again he writes in October of the same year, after the publication of that precursor of Revolution, the memorable 'Stamp Act' of 1765,—

"My parishes continue much in the same condition as in my last. I have of late, taken pains to warn my people against having any concern with seditious tumults with relation to the stamp duty enjoined upon us by the Legislature at home, and I can with truth and pleasure say, that I cannot discover the least inclination towards rebellious conduct in any of the Church people.'

"A year later he says,—

"For some time past I have not been without fear of being abused by a lawless set of men who style themselves the Sons of Liberty, for no other reason than that of endeavoring to cherish in my people a quiet submission to the civil government. . . . It is very remarkable that in part of this Colony, in which many missions and Church people abound, there the people are vastly more peaceable and ready to render obedience to the Government of England; but where there is no mission and few or no Church people, they are continually caballing, and will spill the last drop of blood rather than submit to the late Act of Parliament.'

"In 1767 he says,—

"It is some satisfaction to me to observe that in this town [Newtown] of late, in our elections, the Church people make the major vote, which is the first instance of this kind in this Colony, if not in all New England.'

"Again in 1769,—

"There are in these two parishes about 2400 souls, of whom a little more than half profess the Church of England. Here are about fifty negroes, most of whom after proper instruction have been baptized. . . .

Here are no heathens or infidels. I commonly baptize about 100 children in one year, among them some black children. My actual communicants are 312. Here are no Papists or Deists."

"In 1771 he writes,—

"In Reading, my hearers at once are about 300. There is a meeting of Presbyterians about two and an half miles from our Church, in which the congregation is not so large as ours. In a manner all . . . who live near the Church, join with us; scarce any go by the Church to meeting.' 'The Church' (he says in 1774) 'stands not in the centre of the town, but on one side to accommodate the Church people, who live near, though out of the bounds of Reading.'

"One of the most interesting of his reports is that of May 5, 1772:

"It is now forty years since I have had the advantage of being the venerable Society's Missionary in this place. . . . Every Sunday I have performed divine service, and preached twice at New Town and Reading alternately; and in these forty years I have lost only two Sundays through sickness, although in all that time I have been afflicted with a constant cholic which has not allowed me one day's ease, or freedom from pain. The distance between the Church . . . is between eight and nine miles, and no very good road; yet I have never failed . . . to attend at each place according to custom, through the badness of the weather, but have rode it in the severest rains and snow-storms, even when there has been no track, and my horse near sinking down in the snow-banks, which has had this good effect on my parishioners, that they are ashamed to stay from Church on account of bad weather. . . . I have performed divine service in many towns where the Common Prayer had never been heard, nor the Holy Scriptures read in public, and where now are flourishing congregations of the Church of England; and in some places where there never had been any public worship at all, nor sermon preached by any teacher, of any denomination.

"In my traveling to preach the Gospel, once was my life remarkably preserved, in passing a deep and rapid river. The retrospect of my fatigues, lying on straw, &c., gives me pleasure; while I flatter myself that my labor has not been quite in vain; for the Church of England people are increased more than 20 to 1, and, what is infinitely more pleasing, many of them remarkable for piety and virtue; and the Independents here are more knowing in matters of religion than they who live at a distance from the Church. We live in harmony and peace with each other, and the rising generation of Independents seem to be entirely free from every pique and prejudice against the Church."

"In a previous report he said,—

"They who set up the worship of God according to our Liturgy, at Lanesboro', at Sobleketown, and Arlington, proceed chiefly from my parishes. But notwithstanding these frequent emigrations, my congregations increase."

"His last report, which was made about six months before his death, is dated Oct. 31, 1781, and is as follows:

"It is a long time since I have done my duty in writing to the venerable Society, not owing to my carelessness, but to the impossibility of conveyance from here. And now I do it sparingly. A narrative of my troubles I dare not now give. My two congregations are growing, that at Reading being commonly about 300 and at New Town about 600. I baptized about 130 children in one year, and lately 2 adults. New Town and the Church of England part of Reading are, I believe, the only parts of New England that have refused to comply with the doings of Congress, and for that reason have been the butt of general hatred. But God has preserved us from entire destruction.

"I am now in the 82d year of my age; yet do constantly, alternately, perform and preach at New Town and Reading. I have been 60 years a public preacher, and, of or conversion, in the Church of England 50 years; but had I been sensible of my inefficiency, I should not have undertaken it. But now I rejoice in that I think I have done more good towards men's eternal happiness, than I should have done in any other calling.

"I do most heartily thank the venerable Society for their liberal support, and beg that they will accept of this, which is, I believe, my last bill, viz.: £325, which, according to former custom, is due.* At this age I cannot well hope for it, but I pray God I may have an opportunity to explain myself with safety; but must conclude now with Job's expression: "Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends!"

* Probably at £50 per annum for six years and a half, or from 1775.

"Tradition has preserved a few incidents in his experience during the war of Independence.

"In the autumn of 1775 several officers of the militia, having collected a number of soldiers and volunteers from the different towns in Western Connecticut, undertook to subdue the Tories. They went first to Newtown, where they put Mr. Beach, the selectmen, and other principal inhabitants under strict guard, and urged them to sign the Articles of Association prescribed by the Congress at Philadelphia. When they could prevail upon them neither by persuasion nor by threats, they accepted a bond from them, with a large pecuniary penalty, not to take up arms against the colonies, and not to discourage enlistments into the American forces.

"Shortly after the declaration of independence—i. e., July 23, 1776—the Episcopal clergy of the colony, fearing to continue the use of the Liturgy as it then stood,—praying for the king and royal family,—and conscientiously scrupulous about violating their oaths and subscriptions, resolved to suspend the public exercise of their ministry. 'All the churches were thus for a time closed, except those under the care of Mr. Beach. . . . He continued to officiate as usual' (as himself testifies) during the war. 'Though gentle as a lamb in the intercourse of private life, he was bold as a lion in the discharge of public duty; and when warned of personal violence if he persisted, he declared that he would do his duty, preach, and pray for the king till the rebels cut out his tongue.'

"Whether the following were separate incidents, or are but different versions of one and the same, is uncertain. It is related that a squad of soldiers marched into his church in Newtown and threatened to shoot him if he prayed for the king; but when, regardless of their threats, he went on, without so much as a tremor in his voice, to offer the forbidden supplications, they were so struck with admiration for his courage that they stacked their arms and remained to listen to the sermon.

"A band of soldiers entered his church during service, seized him, and declared that they would kill him. He entreated that, if his blood must be shed, it might not be in the house of God. Thereupon they took him into the street, where an ax and block were soon prepared. 'Now, you old sinner,' said one, 'say your last prayer.' He knelt down and prayed: 'God bless King George, and forgive all his enemies and mine, for Christ's sake.' One of the mob then pleaded to 'let the old fellow go, and take some younger man instead.'

"The following is familiar to the people of Redding Ridge parish. The old church of 1750 had a single door in the centre, and the pulpit and chancel were at the west end, opposite the door. A squad of soldiers, seven in number (hire), it is said, by 'Squire Betts, with a gallon of French brandy to shoot Mr. Beach, gathered before the open door of the church, and from one of them a bullet was fired which lodged in one of the ribs of the sounding-board, a foot or more above the head of the venerable preacher. As the congregation sprang to their feet in unfeigned consternation to rush from the church, he quieted them by saying, 'Don't be alarmed, brethren. Fear not them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell;' and then proceeded with his discourse as if nothing had happened.

"The 'History of the Episcopal Church in Connecticut' informs us that 'the Redding Association of Loyalists was a strong body whose secret influence was felt throughout the mission of the venerable pastor;' but how or in what way that influence was exerted does not appear. The 'Sons of Liberty' have been already mentioned in Mr. Beach's reports.

"After the death of Mr. Beach, in 1782, the Revs. Richard Samuel Clarke and Andrew Fowler officiated here alternately for a short time. Clarke emigrated to Nova Scotia with others of the missionaries, and many of the members of their flocks, in 1784 or 1785. He returned on a visit in October, 1786. The discontinuance of the stipends of the missionaries by the S. P. G., whose charter restricted its benefactions to the British provinces and plantations, was a severe blow to the Episcopal churches, which had been already greatly weakened by the effects of the war of the Revolution. Mr. Beach's congregations were exceptions to the general rule, in that they increased while others diminished in numbers; but whether few or many of the Redding churchmen formed a part of the thirty thousand loyalists who, Hawkins says, emigrated to the British provinces from New England and New York, it is impossible to ascertain. It is not probable, however, that there were half that number of churchmen in all New England at the close of the war.

"The next name on the list of ministers of this parish is that of Truman Marsh, in 1785, who 'visited the Parish every third Sunday;' but, as he was not ordained till 1790, he must have been only a licensed lay-reader, though it is not improbable that he preached, as some of that class did in those days, when there was a dearth of ordained ministers. In 1794 the Rev. David Perry, M.D., minister of the parishes of Redding, Ridgefield, and Danbury, in consequence of some reports to his disadvantage as a clergyman and of some errors in regard to baptism, was suspended from the ministry, and the next year, at his own request, deposed. He returned to the practice of medicine in Ridgefield.

"The revenues of the church were gathered after the Revolution much as they were before. 'The Episcopal parishes were taxed to build churches and to sustain religious services, and the Diocesan Convention assessed the parishes to provide for the bishop's fund. Each parish was required to make an annual return of what was called the 'grand levy,'—that is, its taxable list according to its last enrollment,—and upon this return rested the right of a lay delegate to his seat in the Convention. The resolution which fixed this rule was adopted in 1803. The first published grand levy appeared in the journal of 1806, and from that time onward for fifteen years the roll of the lay delegates was accompanied by the taxable list of the several parishes which they represented. If the list of any parish exceeded ten thousand dollars, such parish was entitled to . . . two delegates.' The grand levy of the Redding parish in 1806 was twelve thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars.

"It is interesting to note the changes since that period in the relative wealth of the church in Connecticut. In those early days, as reported, Litchfield was stronger than Waterbury or Hartford, Woodbridge was stronger than Meriden, Huntington than Derby, Redding than Bridgeport, and Newtown than New Haven.'

"The longest pastorate since Mr. Beach was that of his great-grandson, the Rev. Lemuel B. Hull, who resigned his charge in 1836, after twelve years' service. 'In 1815 a fund of a little more than three thousand dollars was raised.'

"On the second Tuesday in October, 1833,—the year in which the present church edifice was built,—the Annual Convention of the diocese at Norwich failed to organize for want of two more lay delegates to form a quorum. 'On the morning of that day, at three o'clock, the steamboat "New England," on her passage from New York to Hartford, having on board seventy-one persons, burst both her boilers near Essex, and eight persons were immediately killed and thirteen seriously injured. Among those who were fatally injured were Mr. John M. Heron and Dr. Samuel B. Whiting, lay delegates from Christ Church, Redding; and they were within a mile of their landing-place at the time of the accident.'

"In the spring of that year several members of the parish withdrew by certificate; among these was John Meeker, clerk.

"At a parish meeting, Oct. 25, 1834, the vestry were instructed 'to take proper [legal] steps to procure the Records of the Parish from the hands of the late Clerk, without delay.' At another meeting in December following, the agents of the parish (James Sanford, Jr., and Charles Beach) were authorized to 'prosecute to final judgment such suits as they should deem necessary for the recovery of the books, records, funds, or other property of the Society, before any Court proper to try the same.'

"In October, 1835, fifty dollars were appropriated from the parish treasury 'to enable the agents to carry on the suit commenced against the heirs of John Meeker, deceased.' Some money was thus recovered, but the records have never yet been found.

"In 1847 the old parish debt of eight hundred and seventy dollars (incurred in the building of the church in 1833) was paid by subscription.

"In 1850 the parish fund, about two thousand seven hundred dollars, which before had been held as a loan by members of the parish, was by a considerable effort, and against the desire and judgment of the minority, collected and invested in the stock of the Fairfield County Bank. The same year the church edifice was altered and repaired at an expense of three hundred and eighty dollars and twenty-five cents.

"On Advent Sunday' of this year, 'the last Sunday of my ministry' (says the Rev. Joseph P. Taylor), 'the sum of six hundred dollars was collected at the offertory for the purpose of building a new parsonage.'

"The above-named sum,' says the Rev. Orsamus H. Smith, his successor, 'having been put upon the plate in written pledges, there remains of them unredeemed in April, 1853, from fifty to one hundred dollars,' which being 'part of the money relied upon for the building, . . . the Vestry were obliged to borrow it, and it remains a debt upon the parish.' The new house was finished in October, 1851, and immediately occupied by the family of Mr. Smith.

"In 1858 says the Rev. W. W. Bronson, 'The glebe lot was very much improved by the purchase of a strip of land [on the west side] and the erection of a suitable fence, mainly through the exertions of the ladies of the parish.'

"In 1863 the organ was repaired, and the broken bell replaced by a new one of a similar tone, from Menecey's, at Troy.

"In 1873 the church-spire was repaired, and the old [English] weathercock, a relic of colonial times (one of whose legs had been shot off by one of Tryon's soldiers in 1777), having persistently refused to remain upon his perch, was excused from further duty, and a gilded cross erected in his place. The venerable bird, however, is still to be seen on one of the outbuildings of the great-grandson of the Rev. John Beach, in East Redding. The parsonage was adorned in 1874 with a new and spacious veranda, in 1876 with a set of blinds.

"The noticeable incidents of the present year (1879) are the destruction of the church-sheds by fire on the evening of the 12th of May, and the acquisition of a baptismal font of Italian marble, purchased with contributions of the Sunday-school and other members of the parish, collected during the rectorship of the Rev. Mr. Kelley. The number of nominal communicants is sixty-five; of baptized persons, about one hundred and twenty.

"The following is a list of ministers officiating in the parish of Christ Church, Redding: Rev. Henry Caner, 1727 to 1732; Rev. John Beach, October, 1732, to March 19, 1782; Rev. R. S. Clarke, Rev. Andrew Fowler (alternates), 1782; Rev. Truman Marsh, 1785; Rev. David Belden, 1786;* Rev. Ambrose Hull, 1789 to 1791; Rev. David Perry, M.D., 1791;† Rev. David Butler, Jan. 20, 1799, to 1804; Rev. Elijah G. Plumb, Jan. 30, 1806, to 1811; Rev. Reuben Hubbard, 1812 to 1818; Rev. Ambrose S. Todd, D.D., 1820 to 1823; Rev. Lemuel B. Hull, 1824 to Feb. 23, 1836; Rev. Edward J. Darken, M.D., August, 1836, to Dec. 25, 1837; Rev. Charles Jarvis Todd, June, 1838, to Easter, 1842; Rev. William Atwill, May 8, 1842, to 1845; Rev. David H. Short, D.D., Easter, 1845, to 1846; Rev. Abel Nichols, 1846 to 1847; Rev. Joseph P. Taylor, Easter, 1847, to December, 1850; Rev. Orsamus H. Smith, Nov. 29, 1850, to March 31, 1853; Rev. Abel Ogden, July 10, 1853;‡ Rev. James Adams, autumn, 1854, to October, 1856; Rev. Wm. White Bronson, 1857 to 1860; Rev. Alfred Londerback, May 25, 1861, to Aug. 5, 1862; Rev. Henry Zell, March 12, 1863;§ Rev. Wm. L. Bostwick, Easter, 1864, to June 15, 1867; Rev. John W. Hoffman, Dec. 6, 1868, to Nov. 30, 1871; Rev. Charles W. Kelley, Jan. 5, 1873, to April 30, 1876; Rev. Xenemus Alanson Welton, July 1, 1877.

"The number of communicants belonging to Christ Church, Redding, as reported at different periods, was: 1809, 55; 1810, 63; 1811, 67; 1815, 61; 1817, 61; 1845, 42; 1851, 60; 1854, 56; 1856, 57; 1858, 58; 1859, 56; 1860, 47; 1863, 55; 1866, 45; 1869, 37; 1873, 49; 1874, 55; 1875, 61; 1877, 59; 1878, 64; 1879, 65."

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

"When Jesse Lee left New York on the mission which was to quicken and vitalize the New England churches, his first resting-place was at Norwalk, where he preached on the highway under a spreading elm, no house being opened to him. From Norwalk he proceeded to Fairfield and New Haven, and from the latter place to Redding. He reached this town on Wednesday, the 24th of June, 1789, and from this period we are to date the origin of the Methodist Church in Redding, although some six months elapsed before it was formally organized. Mr. Lee thus narrates some of the incidents of this first visit:

"I traveled a stony road to Redding, and according to directions called on Esquire Benefield, but he was not at home; so I got my horse and rode to Mr. Rogers to consult him about the matter. While I was talking to him Mr. Bartlett, a Congregational minister, rode by, and, being informed who I was, asked me home with him. After I had been there a while he asked me some questions relative to doctrines, and endeavored to inform him what kind of doctrines we preached. He said he could not invite me into the meeting-house, because I held what his thought was contrary to the gospel. I told him I did not expect an invitation to preach in the meeting-house, but if I was asked I should not refuse. However, Mr. Rogers sent his son down in a little time to let me know that there was a school-house that I should preach in, so I made the appointment for the people at six o'clock. Having met at that hour, I preached on Isa. lv. 6: "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found," etc. "Praise God that I had some liberty in preaching."

* Officiated a short time only, on account of ill health.

† Suspended November, 1794. ‡ Died May 8, 1851.

§ Died Nov. 5, 1863.

"The school-house where this first sermon was delivered probably stood on the common, near the old meeting-house. The few and simple doctrines that Mr. Lee preached were the witness of the Spirit, the entire efficacy of the atonement, and the possibility of falling from grace, and they were presented with so much force and earnestness as to produce a deep impression on those who heard them; yet he had no time to remain and note the effect produced, but rode away the next day, carrying his tidings to other communities. Twice again Lee visited Redding—July 8th and September 16th of the same year—without seeing any fruits of his efforts; for, although many were impressed with the truth of his doctrines, they hesitated about coming out openly and joining the new sect. At length, on his fourth visit, Dec. 28, 1789, he 'joined two in society for a beginning. A man who has lately received a witness of his being in favor with the Lord led the way, and a woman who I hope was lately converted followed.' This was the second Methodist society organized in New England, the first being at Stratford. The two first members mentioned above were Aaron Sanford and his mother-in-law, Mrs. William Hawley. Mr. Sanford by this act became the first male member of the Methodist Church in New England. He was at once appointed leader of the class thus formed, and its meetings were held for years at his house. After its organization the growth of the society was very rapid, chiefly through the class-meeting, and that agency so effectively used by Methodism, the lay-preachers.

"It is unfortunate that, owing to the loss of the early records of the church, we can give the names of but few of its original members. From the records of the First Society I copy the following certificate, dated Dec. 15, 1789:

"I hereby certify that Aaron Sanford, of Redding, has constantly attended the Methodist meetings in this town, and pays his part towards my support as a minister of the gospel.

—JESSE LEE."

"Similar certificates were given, Feb. 9, 1790, to Hezekiah Sanford, and August 6th of the same year to Isaac Sherwood and S. Samuel Smith.

"From the church book of baptisms, which has been preserved, we learn that prior to 1794 the early preachers had baptized children of Daniel and Anna Bartram, Silas and Huldah Merchant, Jonas and Lucy Platt, Paul and Mary Bartram, Jabez and Sarah Gorham, Elijah and Menoma Elder, Aaron and Mary Odle, John and Sarah Sherman, Uriah and Hannah Mead, Benjamin and Elizabeth Knap, Chester and Elizabeth Mecker, Charles and Lucy Morgan, Ezekiel and Easter Bartram, Jesse and Martha Banks, Isaac and Betty Platt, and Aaron and Eunice Hunt, and we may safely reckon on as members of the church at that time.

"Early in 1790, Lee organized his first circuit in New England; it was called the 'Fairfield Circuit,' and embraced Norwalk, Fairfield, Stratford, Milford, Redding, Danbury, Canaan, and intermediate places. The first regularly-appointed minister whose name appears on the society records was John Bloodgood, who was here as early as Jan. 21, 1791,—perhaps earlier. He was a native of the South, and after serving on the Fairfield Circuit one year was transferred to the Baltimore Conference, to which his ministerial labors were chiefly confined. He died in 1810. Like most of his colleagues, he preached in the school-houses, under trees, sometimes in the barns, but always so fervently, and with such native eloquence, that multitudes flocked to hear him. He was succeeded at the May (1791) session of the Conference by Nathaniel B. Mills and Aaron Hunt.

"Mr. Mills is described by his colleague, Mr. Hunt, as 'a man small in stature, intelligent, sound, an able preacher, and rather inclined to dejection.' He was born in New Castle Co., Del., Feb. 23, 1766. He entered the Baltimore Conference in the spring of 1787, and after a laborious ministry of forty-two years, both in New England and the South, was compelled in 1835 to retire to the ranks of the superannuated, where he remained until his death, in 1844. His colleague, Rev. Aaron Hunt, was born in Eastchester, Westchester Co., N. Y., March 28, 1768, and entered the Methodist ministry in 1791, making some of his first essays at preaching on the Redding Circuit.

"In 1793, while preaching in Redding, he married Miss Hannah Sanford, daughter of the Mr. Aaron Sanford before mentioned, and shortly after 'located' in Redding, where he continued to reside for many years, and where most of his large family of children were born. Mr. Hunt was prominent among the early Methodist preachers, and was well known throughout the State. During his pastorate the church had been encouraged by a visit from the eminent Bishop Asbury, who passed through Redding in June, 1791, during his hasty tour through New England, and preached here 'with much satisfaction,' as he remarks in his journal. The church received another and longer visit from him in September, 1796. 'The society in that village,' says Mr. Stevens, the historian of Methodism, 'had been gradually gathering strength. They assembled to greet him at Mr. Sanford's, where he gave them an encouraging discourse from 1 Peter i. 13-15.' From this time until 1811 the record of the church is one of continued growth and prosperity; revivals were frequent and accessions many; classes were early formed at Lontown, Redding Ridge, Sanfordtown, Boston, and at Long Ridge, the latter some years later becoming a separate church organization.

"Still the society was without a house of worship, and the want was beginning to be severely felt. In 1803 they first leased the town-hall for a place of public worship, as appears by the following extract from the town records: 'At a town-meeting held Dec. 12, 1803, it was voted "that the Town House be leased to the Methodist Society for $15 per year, to be used as often and as much as they please for public worship, and said Society to repair all damage done to the Town House while they are assembled therein for public worship." This lease was continued from year to year at varying rates, until the erection of the first church, in 1811. Of the building of this edifice we have no data except such as is contained in this extract from the society records:

"At a Society meeting of the Methodists, duly warned and held at the house of William Sanford in Redding, on Tuesday the 30th day of October, 1810, "Vtd., That Seth Andrews, William Sanford, and John R. Hill be a committee to said society for the ensuing year, to do and transact all temporal business.

"Vtd., That our said committee carry around a subscription paper immediately to raise money for the purpose of building a Meeting-House in said Redding, for the purpose of Divine Worship.

"AMRON SANFORD,

"Clerk."

"The church was built the succeeding summer. It stood on the site of the present residence of Deacon Charles Smith, on land purchased of Jonathan R. Sanford, Esq. His deed conveying the land, dated June 6, 1811, was given to Seth Andrews, William Sanford, and John R. Hill, trustees for the Methodist Church and Society in Redding, the consideration being one hundred and thirty dollars. No actual description of the first church is preserved to us, except that it was built after the usual fashion of Methodist churches in those days. It had no steeple or tower, no ceiling except the roof, and there were no means of warming it except by foot-stoves carried in by the female worshipers. With the above exceptions, the following description of an early Methodist church would probably apply to this in every particular:

"The building was unpolluted by paint within and without as when its timbers were standing in their native forest. A gallery extended around three sides. At the extreme end of the left gallery was a small room partitioned off for class-meetings. The pulpit was elevated about six feet above the floor, and in form resembled a large dry-goods box, the breastwork so high as almost to conceal the preacher, if small of stature, from view. From the pulpit extended a staircase conducting to the class-room in the gallery, to which the preacher and the members repaired at the close of the public services.*

"None of the incidents in the history of the old church are so vividly remembered and described as the Quarterly Meetings which were held there. The Quarterly Meeting to the early Methodist was the most important of all the institutions of the church, and those held in Redding were especially noteworthy; it was a sort of home-coming to the mother-church, and at such times all the Methodist homes in town were open to the brethren from abroad. The presiding elder and the two preachers on the 'circuit' were always present on these occasions, and the membership was gathered from Danbury, Ridgefield, Easton, and Newtown, as well as from places more remote. The exercises on these occasions began at nine o'clock on Sabbath morning with the 'love-feast' and the passing of bread and water, of which all partook, as a token of their brotherhood in Christ. At half-past ten a sermon was preached by the elder. At twelve M. the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered. At one P.M. another sermon was preached, generally by one of the preachers in charge. At the conclusion of this discourse the genial elder would proceed to designate to the guests their respective places of entertainment. The day was usually concluded by a series of prayer-meetings, held in the different districts and conducted with great warmth and fervor.

"The old church seems to have been intended for a temporary structure, and was succeeded in 1837 by the present neat and commodious edifice. A brief account of the erection of the present building will be interesting and probably new to many, though little more than forty years have elapsed since its timbers were standing in the forest.

"We find on the society records the following entries:

"The members of the Methodist Episcopal Society of Redding are hereby notified and warned that a society's meeting for said society will be held on Tuesday, the 26th day of Instant January, at one o'clock P.M. at the Methodist Church in said Redding, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of building a new church in said society, and locating the same near the intersection of the roads near the town-house, appointing a building committee to superintend and carry said object into effect, make arrangements to dispose of the old house if thought proper, and to do any other business proper to be done at said meeting.

"SHERLOCK TODD,

"JESSE BANKS,

"AMRON MAULETT,

"Trustees.

"REDDING, Jan. 20, 1836."

"A society-meeting was held at the appointed time, Rev. H. Humphreys being chairman, and Thomas B. Fenton clerk. It was then voted 'to approve of the proposed plan in the caption of the subscription paper to raise subscriptions and build a new house. . . .'

"It was also further provided 'that the said House shall be located somewhere near the four corners that intersect at Redding Town House, but the said object not to take effect unless the sum of Two thousand Five hundred Dollars be subscribed, and the said House be built within eighteen months from the date hereof.'

"Voted, To build a House agreeable to the above caption, provided a place be obtained that is approved by the committee appointed for that purpose.

"Voted, To appoint a Building Committee of three persons to superintend, and take charge, and contract for the same House, viz.: Thomas B. Fenton, John R. Hill, and Gershom Sherwood.

"Voted, To add two more to the building Committee,—Jesse Banks and David Duncomb.

"Resolved, To adjourn the meeting two weeks from this day at one P.M.

"THOMAS B. FENTON,

"Clerk."

"No account of the adjourned meeting is to be found in the society records. The twenty-five hundred dollars needed was specially subscribed, and the building was erected in the summer of 1837 and dedicated in December of the same year, Rev. C. K. True preaching the dedication sermon.

"In 1868, during the pastorate of Rev. William T. Hill, the church was thoroughly remodeled and refurnished. The pulpit was cut down and the antique pews exchanged for the present neat and comfortable ones. The rededication service at this time was perhaps the most interesting occasion in the history of the church. Bishop James was present, and preached the dedication sermon to an audience that filled every nook and corner of the building, and many old pastors and friends of the church added by their presence to the interest of the occasion.

"In September, 1870, Rev. Aaron Sanford Hill gave to the church some ten acres of land lying in the northerly part of the town, the income from which was to be appropriated to the use of the church. This gift Mr. Hill supplemented by another of four thousand dollars in 1871, of which the interest only was to be used in meeting the expenses of the church. This fund is known as the Sanford Hill Fund. In 1877 another benefaction of five hundred dollars was given by William A. Sanford, Esq., to be applied in the same manner as the preceding.

"Revivals in the church have been frequent and attended with gratifying results,—notably in 1815, under the preaching of Rev. Reuben Harris; in 1822, during the pastorate of Aaron Hunt; in 1838, under that of Rev. John Crawford; in 1855, under Rev. E. S. Hibbard; and in 1857, under Rev. William T. Hill.

"According to the minutes of the Annual Conferences, the following ministers were appointed to Fairfield Circuit (which included Redding), beginning with its organization, in 1790: 1790, John Bloodgood; 1791, Nathaniel B. Mills, Aaron Hunt; 1792, Joshua Taylor, Smith Weeks; 1793, James Coleman, Aaron Hunt; 1794, Zebulon Kankey, Nicholas Snetten.

"Those appointed to Redding Circuit were: 1795, Daniel Dennis, Timothy Dewey; 1796, Elijah Woolsey, Robert Leeds; 1797, David Buck, Augustus Jocelyn; 1798, William Lyon; 1799, David Brown; 1800, Augustus Jocelyn; 1801, Samuel Merwin, Isaac Candee; 1802, James Coleman, Isaac Candee; 1803, James Campbell, N. P. Tompkins; 1804, Peter Moriarty, Sylvester Foster; 1805, Peter Moriarty, Samuel Merwin; 1806, Nathan Felch, Oliver Sykes; 1807, James M. Smith, Zalmon Lyon; 1808, Noble W. Thomas, Jonathan Lyon; 1809, Billy Hibbard, Isaac Candee; 1810, Nathan Emory, John Russell; 1811, Aaron Hunt, Oliver Sykes, and John Reynolds; 1812, Seth Crowel, Gilbert Lyon, S. Beach; 1813, Aaron Hunt, Henry Eames; 1814, Ebenezer Washburne, Reuben Harris; 1815, Elijah Woolsey, Reuben Harris; 1816, Samuel Bushnell, John Boyd; 1817, Samuel Bushnell, Theodocius Clarke; 1818, James M. Smith, Theodocius Clarke; 1819, J. S. Smith, Phineas Cook; 1820, Laban Clark, Phineas Cook; 1821, Laban Clark, Aaron Hunt; 1822, Samuel Cochrane, Aaron Hunt; 1823, Samuel Cochrane, John Reynolds; 1824, Elijah Woolsey, John Reynolds.

"To Redding and Bridgeport Circuit: 1825, Marvin Richardson, H. Humphreys, Frederic W. Siger; 1826, Marvin Richardson, H. Humphreys; 1827, Henry Stead, John Lovejoy, J. C. Bontecou.

"To Redding Circuit: 1828, Henry Stead, Gershom Pearce; 1829, Ebenezer Washburn, Gershom Pearce; 1830, Ebenezer Washburn, Oliver V. Ammerman; 1831, James Young, Josiah Bowen; 1832, Nicholas White, Jesse Hunt; 1833, Jesse Hunt, John B. Beach; 1834, Josiah Bowen, John B. Beach.

"To Redding and Newtown Circuit: 1835, Humphrey Humphries, Josiah L. Dickerson, John Davies; 1836, Humphrey Humphries.

"March 28th, 1837, the society, 'after due deliberation, existing circumstances being considered, voted to try a station the ensuing year,' which was accordingly done, and the Rev. Humphrey Humphries became the first stated pastor. Since then the church has enjoyed the undivided care of its pastors, and has been generally prosperous and aggressive.

"The list of pastors since 1837 comprises many well-known names and will be read with interest. They are as follows: 1838, John Crawford (2d), Morris Hill; 1839-40, Paul R. Brown; 1841-42, Daniel Smith; 1843, Phillip L. Hoyt; 1844-45, William F. Collins; 1846-47, Joseph D. Marshall; 1848-49, Jacob Shaw; 1850-51, John L. Gilder; 1852-53, Friend W. Smith; 1854-55, E. S. Hibbard; 1856-57, Hart F. Pease; 1858, George C. Crevey; 1859, William H. Gilder; 1860-61, John W. Horne; 1862-63, George Hollis; 1864-66, David Nash; 1867-68, William T. Hill; 1869, Alexander Graham; 1870-72, Theodore C. Beach; 1873, William R. Webster; 1874-76, Joseph Smith; 1877-78, John Dickinson; 1879, John Haugh.

"Of the above list, but one, Rev. Jacob Shaw, died and was buried in Redding. Of the laymen who nobly aided these clergymen in their ministry many will be held in grateful remembrance by the church.

"The names most familiar to the early membership, perhaps, were those of the lay-preachers, Aaron Sanford, Hawley Sanford, Rory Starr, and Walter Sanford; the class-leaders, John R. Hill, Abraham Couch, Errai Meade, Sherlock Todd, and Bradley Burr; and the official members, Thomas B. Fanton, David S. Duncomb, Aaron Sanford, Jr., Charles Gorham, Eben Treadwell, and John Edmonds.

"The present membership of the church is 149,—males, 57; females, 92."

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT LONG RIDGE.

"The origin of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Long Ridge, as narrated by Rev. Paul R. Brown, pastor of the church in 1842, was as follows:

"One evening, as Father Coleman (a Methodist preacher) was passing through Starr's Plain on his way to Danbury, he saw a man sitting on the fence by the way-side, and inquired the distance to town. The man told him, and added, "Are you a doctor?"—"No, sir."—"Are you a lawyer?"—"No, sir."—"Then," said the man, following up the question, "what are you?"—Father Coleman answered, "I am a Methodist preacher."—"Methodist preacher! What's that?" replied the man.—"If you will open your house and invite in your neighbors, I will let you hear a Methodist preacher the next time I come this way," was the reply. The offer was accepted, and Father Coleman preached to them on his next visit. He soon organized a class, and among the members of that class was the man who sat upon the fence and questioned the preacher. After that the class grew into a society, and in due time a small church was built in Long Ridge, which gave way to a larger edifice in the course of a few years.*

"The first church was built when the society consisted of but eleven members, under the following circumstances: They were assembled for the weekly class-meeting at the house of one of their number, and were speaking of their need of a church, when Uriah Griffin remarked that if he had a hundred dollars in hand he would build them a church. David Osborne, the youngest member present, at once agreed to furnish the required sum, and the church was built the same year. This was in 1820-21, during the pastorate of Rev. Laban Clark. The little society at once became connected with Redding Station as an auxiliary, the preacher in charge there having the care of its temporal concerns and filling its pulpit once in four weeks. In the interim the pulpit was supplied by the lay-preachers, Aaron Sanford, Morris Hill, Aaron S. Hill, of Redding, Rory Starr, of Danbury, and others. The society's connection with Redding ceased in 1848, and the same relation was formed with the church in Bethel. For several years past it has been a separate station. The pastors of the church from 1820 to 1848 were the same as those of Redding, and are given in the history of the Redding Church. The pastors since 1848 have been as follows: 1848-49, Morris Hill; 1850, Elias Gilbert; 1851-52, Charles Bartlett; 1853-54, George Stillman; 1855-56, Samuel H. Smith; 1857-58, John Crawford; 1859, David Osborn; 1860-61, Sherman D. Barnes, local preacher; 1862-63, Elias Gilbert; 1864, William H. Adams; 1865, J. W. Bramblee; 1866-67, G. W. Polley, local; 1868, Stephen J. Stebbins; 1869, James H. Crofut, local; 1870, Frank F. Jordan, local; 1871, William P. Armstrong, local; 1872, Frank F. Jordan, local; 1873, Joseph W. Pattison, local; 1874-75, William Cogswell, local; 1876, Joseph W. Pattison, local; 1877-78, Charles A. Wilson, local; 1879, Henry A. Van Dalsem.

"The membership at present is sixty.*

"A few yards from Redding Station, on the banks of the Saugatuck River, is situated the old camp-ground, noted for being the place where the first camp-meeting of the Methodists in New England was held. Just when this event occurred we are unable to state, but it was about 1810, probably under the leadership of Nathan Bangs. The tents of this first assemblage were of the most primitive kind, many of them being constructed of the branches of trees, and others of blankets stretched over a frame-work of poles. Meetings continued to be held in this grove every year for over sixty years.

"About 1860, owing to some difficulty in leasing the grounds and from other causes, the meetings here were discontinued, and another camp-ground opened at Milford, Conn., on the line of the Naugatuck Railroad.

"This grove was, however, soon abandoned, never having been popular with the Methodist public. In 1878, after the lapse of nearly twenty years, the old camp-ground at Redding was reopened, and that year a very successful and well-attended meeting was held there.

"It was supposed then that the grove would be purchased and continue to be used for camp-meeting purposes, but this desirable consummation was not effected."

THE BAPTIST CHURCH IN GEORGETOWN (NOW EXTINCT).

"That there was a society of Baptists in Redding as early as 1785 appears from an entry in the records of the First Society, dated Dec. 9, 1785, wherein Michael Wood has a certificate given him by John Lee, deacon, as a member of the Baptist Church in Redding.

"Similar certificates were given to John Couch, Micayah Starr, and Jabez Wakeman, but we have no evidence of the existence of a church here until 1833. On the 28th of January of that year an ecclesiastical council was held at the house of Timothy Wakeman, in Redding, and a church formally organized. The record of the proceedings of this meeting constitutes the first entry in the church book of records, and is as follows:

"Chose Elder Thomas Lascombe, Moderator, and Elder Nathan Wildman Clerk. Invited Brethren present to a seat with the Council. Proceeded to hear the Articles and Covenant, also reasons why they wished to be constituted into a Church. The Council unanimously voted to proceed to the constitution. Repaired to the meeting-house. Introductory prayer and sermon by Elder Nathan Wildman. Right hand of fellowship in behalf of the Council, and closing prayer by Elder Thomas Lascombe.

"NATHAN WILDMAN,

"Clerk."

"There were but eighteen original members,—four males and fourteen females. For some years there was no settled pastor, and the pulpit was supplied alternately, once in four weeks, by Elders S. Ambler, of Danbury, and Stephen B. Bray, a licentiate, from Southbury, Conn. Elders N. Wildman, of Weston, Erastus Doty, of Colebrook, Conn., and Chandler Curtis also preached occasionally. June 3, 1837, the church extended a unanimous call to Rev. William Bowen, of Mansfield, Conn., which was accepted, and he became the first pastor of the church. He continued to sustain this relation to the church until November, 1838, when he was dismissed, owing to the inability of the society to meet his salary. The same month the church edifice was nearly destroyed by mob-violence,—the only instance of the kind that ever occurred in this staid and conservative town.

"It was 1838, the period of the slavery excitement, when abolitionist and pro-slavery men engaged in almost daily conflict, and men thought to stifle with shot-gun and bludgeon the first faint stirrings of the national conscience. A few pithy entries in the church records thus refer to the affair:

"Nov. 26th. Rev Nathaniel Colver lectured on slavery in our meeting-house; was disturbed by unruly persons.

"27th. Another lecture on Slavery modest as night before.

"28th. Meeting-house blown up by a mob, but not entirely destroyed."

"This is all the information the church records give us on the subject, but from the files of the Norwalk Gazette for that year we glean a full account of the affair. This article is interesting, as showing the manner in which even the Whigs handled the question of slavery at that time:

"HIGH-HANDLED OUTRAGE.—We learn that Judge Lynch has been executing his summary proceedings in this vicinity within the week past. Colver, the abolitionist lecturer, has been holding forth, as we understand, for a number of evenings, on the subject of immediate emancipation, in the Baptist church in Redding, and in the course of his lectures had taken occasion to exhibit before his audience the practical abolitionism of the Vice-President of the United States, the Hon. Richard M. Johnson. We are informed that he accused this distinguished personage of making merchandise of the offspring of his own sons, and selling his own sons and daughters into slavery. This so enraged some of his political partisans that they determined to abolish the walls which had echoed the nefarious libel upon "Di k the Teemisch-Killer." So, after the lecture was concluded, a keg of gunpowder was deposited under the church which had been profaned by these abolition orgies, and about two o'clock on the morning of the 29th ult. the church was blown "sky-high," as John Randolph used to say. It was a small building of one story, and not worth more than five hundred dollars. But notwithstanding the provocation, and notwithstanding the comparatively trifling amount of damage occasioned by this wanton outrage, we most sincerely deprecate the prevalence of a spirit which does violence to the dearest rights of every freeman in the land,—the freedom of speech and of opinion. We are no apologists for the intemperate and fanatic zeal of the abolitionists, but we deem it the duty of every press in the land to cry out against such violations of the Constitution and laws. And though we would denounce in the severest terms the exasperating conduct of the abolitionists, we would at the same time do our utmost to bring the trespassers upon the rights which the Constitution guarantees to every citizen and the violators of the public peace to condign punishment."

"This action of the mob, with the dissensions engendered by it, proved a sad blow to the church, one from which it never fully recovered, although it continued in existence for several years. Elder John H. Waterbury served the church as pastor for some months in 1839, and was succeeded in 1841 by Elder John Noyes, of North Haven.

"Mr. Noyes' letter of dismissal from the Baptist Church in North Haven is as follows:

* A resident of Georgetown at the time gives the following additional particulars: About two o'clock on the morning following Mr. Colver's lecture the inhabitants of Georgetown were startled by a tremendous report and rumbling noise, which jarred the houses and broke the windows in the immediate neighborhood. In the morning this unusual disturbance was found to have been caused by the explosion of a keg of powder which had been placed directly under the pulpit, a portion of the underpinning of the church having been removed for that purpose. The pulpit was demolished, the front of the building displaced several feet, the windows broken out, and the walls destroyed.

"The Baptist Church in North Haven to the Baptist Church in Redding:

"DEAR BRETHREN,—This certifies that Rev. John Noyes and his wife Ann are members of this church in good standing, and as such we commend them to your Christian affection and fellowship. We have voted that when they are received by you, we shall consider their connection with us dissolved.

"In behalf of the church in North Haven.

"M. F. RAMSBOY,

"Clerk.

"May 1, 1841."

"April 2, 1842, Mr. Noyes was dismissed to Philipstown, N. Y. Rev. George Crocker, of Danbury, supplied the pulpit for the succeeding twelve months. Elder David Pease was the next preacher, he being called Feb. 11, 1841. His connection with the church was short and uneventful. There is no record of any other preacher being called; in fact, the society was becoming too weak to support an organization, and shortly after, in October, 1847, was dissolved by the unanimous vote of its members."

THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH IN GEORGETOWN (NOW THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH).

"The Methodist Protestant Church in Georgetown had its origin in a small schism in the Methodist Episcopal Church, commencing about 1818, in the New York Conference.

"Among the ministers who seceded from the church at this time was the Rev. William M. Stillwell, who in 1820 organized a small class of persons in Georgetown, sharers in his peculiar ideas of church polity, but who still retained the name of Methodist, though called by their opponents Stillwellites. In 1829 a convention was held and adopted the name of Methodist Protestant, and in 1839 the church at Georgetown was formally organized as the Methodist Protestant Church and Society of Wilton Circuit. The first members of the class, so far as can be ascertained, were Ebenezer Hill, Banks Sherwood, David Nichols, Isaac Osborne, and Benjamin Gilbert and wife. The first minister was Rev. William M. Stillwell. The first entry in the church records is as follows:

"The first Methodist Protestant church in Redding was organized in the year of our Lord 1839, on the 15th of the 9th month, at a regular warned meeting held at the house of Stunges Bennett. The following officers were chosen: David Nichols, chairman; John O. St. John, secretary. John O. St. John was duly elected clerk of said society, and the oath was administered by Walker Bates, Esq. John O. St. John was also elected treasurer of said society."

"Aaron Osborne was the first sexton. He was to open the church thirty minutes before service, sweep the house, make the fires, and attend to the lights, for a yearly salary of six dollars.

"The present house of worship had been built in 1839, prior to the organization of the church, by John O. St. John and Charles Scribner. For a number of years the church records show only the ordinary routine of business. In 1851, March 10th, a society's meeting passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, 1st, That we take into consideration the amount of damage sustained by the society, by the Danbury and Norwalk R. R. crossing the society's grounds near this house of worship. 2nd, That the assessment of damages by crossing the society's grounds be left to three men, —one chosen by the trustees, one by the Rail Road contractors, and those two to choose a third. 3ed, That the trustees be instructed to hold the contractors or Rail Road Company responsible for all damage to the society's house of worship.

"To these resolutions a meeting held Dec. 27, 1851, added the following: 'Resolved, by vote of this meeting, that the society's committee be authorized to give by deed to the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad Company a right of way across said society's ground, for the consideration of one hundred and fifty dollars.' At a meeting held Feb. 19, 1853, 'on motion, S. M. Main and Hiram St. John were appointed a committee to circulate a subscription to raise money to build a parsonage-house.' A meeting held Nov. 17, 1853, voted 'that the society's committee be authorized to circulate a subscription-paper, to raise money to the amount of six hundred dollars for the purpose of purchasing Mr. Weed's house for a parsonage; and at a subsequent meeting, held November 26th, the committee were authorized to purchase Mr. Weed's house so soon as six hundred dollars is pledged for that purpose.' It was also voted that the 'horse-sheds be located 40 feet south of the butternut tree in the yard, provided the ground can be obtained for one dollar.'

"At a meeting held Dec. 7, 1867, Messrs. John R. Sturges, J. O. St. John, and Sturges Bennett were appointed a committee to ascertain the denominational preferences of all the members of the church, 'with a view to a change of name to that of Congregational, or that of letting it be the Methodist Protestant Meeting.'

"This committee reported to an adjourned meeting, held December 14th, in favor of a change of name, and by a unanimous vote the name of the church was changed from Methodist Protestant to Congregational. It was also voted to petition the next Legislature to change the name of the society in accordance with the above vote, and to secure to the Congregational Society the property now held by the Methodist Protestant Society. The committee appointed for this purpose were Messrs. David E. Smith, Hiram St. John, and E. G. Bennett.

"From October, 1865, to May, 1875, the church was supplied by Rev. Samuel St. John, of Georgetown. He was succeeded by Rev. Albert H. Thompson, of Yale Theological Seminary, who supplied the pulpit until November, 1876. Mr. Thompson's successor was Rev. C. B. Strong, of Hartford Seminary, who remained until the close of 1877. The present pastor, Rev. C. A. Northrop, began his labors with the church Jan. 6, 1878, and was ordained and installed as pastor Oct. 2, 1878.

"The present membership of the church is 79,—males, 30; females, 49.

"The records of the Methodist Protestant Church give no data of the settlement or dismissal of pastors. From old members of the church, however, I gain the following names of those who served the church in this capacity (the list is probably complete, though the names are not given in the order of succession): William M. Stillwell, Stephen Treadwell, Abram Glasgow, Stephen Remington, — Shemeall, — Vredenburgh, James Summerbell, Aaron G. Brewer, Richard K. Diossy, James Rolliston, William Mc'utecheon, William H. Bosely, William Cliff, Samuel M. Henderson, Jacob Timberman, — Wade, Elizur W. Griswold, Merwin Lent, William H. Johnson, John L. Ambler, Joseph J. Smith, Joshua Hudson, Thomas K. Witsel, John H. Painter, M. E. Rude, William C. Clarke."

MASONIC.

ARK LODGE, NO. 39, F. AND A. M.

THE first Masonic body organized in this town was Ark Lodge, No. 39, F. and A. M. The petition for the lodge was presented Oct. 19, 1796, but the prayer of its petition was not granted until May 17, 1797. The first Master was William Heron. The lodge continued to work until May 12, 1839, when its charter was surrendered. It was reorganized Dec. 23, 1869, with the following charter members: David H. Miller, Charles A. Jennings, Charles H. Canfield, Lewis Northrup, Charles O. Olmstead, David E. Smith, H. R. Osborn, E. Thompson, Aaron H. Davis, Tuzon Jelliff, Seth P. Beers, and Waterman Bates.

The present officers of the lodge are as follows: Mervin D. Keeler, W. M.; Augustus W. Merwin, S. W.; Henry M. Taylor, J. W.; Aaron H. Davis, Treas.; David H. Miller, Sec.; Rev. Edward L. Bray, Chap.; Nathan Perry, S. D.; Henry Hohman, J. D.; Lewis Quien, S. Stew.; Eli B. Godfrey, J. Stew.; Waterman Bates, Tiler.

LYNCH CHAPTER, R. A. M.

On Aug. 8, 1801, a meeting of sundry Royal Arch Masons was held at the residence of Andrew L. Hills, when it was voted to present a petition to the Grand Chapter in New York praying for a warrant to hold a chapter of Royal Arch Masons in the towns of Redding and Weston. Said petition was heard and a warrant granted. The name "Lynch Chapter and Heron Mark Lodge" was adopted. The following officers were installed: High Priest, Jesse Beach; King, William Heron; Scribe, Nathan Wheeler. This chapter met alternately in Redding and Weston, and continued its labors until Feb. 1, 1828, when its charter was surrendered.

The following names appear on the record; Joshua Adams, Jr., Jesse Beach, William Bennett, Platt Bennett, Gabriel Baldwin, Henry Bardsley, Eli Bardsley, Ebenezer Beach, Noah W. Bradley, Hyatt Banks, Ezra Bennett, Isaac Beach, Burr Davis, Thomas N. Couch, Nathan Couch, Jonathan Couch, Isaac Coley, Hezekiah Couch, Simon A. Couch, Edward Couch, Jonathan Croffut, Preston Durant, Andrew Fairchild, Sturges Fanton, Lemuel Judson, Beach Jennings, Ezra Lewis, Samuel M. Munson, Enoch Merchant, Daniel Marsh, Ebenezer Merritt (2d), John B. Merritt, David A. Marsh, William Morrows, Benjamin Meeker, Jos. Oakley, Jr., Peter C. Oakley, Daniel Odle, G. H. Osborn, Charles Dart, Hezekiah Read, Jr., John R. Read, Hezekiah Summers, Eli Sanford, Silas M. Shepard, Jos. S. Shelton, Asabel Sanford, Samuel Thorp, Wakeman Thorp, Turney Roberts, Nathan Wheeler, Squire Winton, Levi Wheeler, Calvin Wheeler, Jr., Ephraim Wheeler, Seth Wheeler, Alden Winton, Jos. D. Winton, Edwin Wheeler.

A lodge of Odd-Fellows was at one time in operation at Redding Ridge, but was long since disbanded.

ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

One of the earliest anti-slavery societies in the State was organized in Georgetown in December, 1838. Dr. Erasmus Hudson and Rev. Nathaniel Colver were appointed by the Connecticut Anti-Slavery Society agents for the evangelization of the State, and in October, 1838, entered Fairfield County in the furtherance of their mission. They lectured at Sherman, Danbury, Redding, Georgetown, and Norwalk, being driven from each place in succession by mobs, who abused and threatened, and in some cases stoned, them. At Norwalk they were burnt in effigy and assailed with brickbats and all manner of missiles. At Weston they organized the first society in the county. In November a call was issued for a convention to be held in Redding (Georgetown), Dec. 12, 1838. On November 29th, Messrs. Colver and Hudson went to Georgetown to hold meetings. They met on Monday night in the Baptist church, but the mob was so violent that the meeting was adjourned until Tuesday evening. All through Tuesday there was great commotion among the enemies of the cause, and this culminated in the evening, when a mob composed of men and boys, some with painted faces and some wearing masks, surrounded the church and assailed it with stones, clubs, and hideous outcries. Being dispersed by the citizens, the band betook itself to quieter forms of mischief. Dr. Hudson drove to the meeting a beautiful milk-white horse, and on that night his tail was sheared so closely that it resembled a corn-cob, and other outrages were committed. At this meeting a society was organized, called the Georgetown Anti-Slavery Society. The constitution of this Society bears date Dec. 4, 1838; its officers were: President, Eben Hill; Secretary, William Wakeman; Treasurer, John O. St. John.

SCHOOLS.

The first reference in the town records in regard to schools is under date Dec. 26, 1737, when it was voted to have a parish school. It was also voted that said school be divided into three parts, that is to say, "five months in that quarter called the Ridge, five months on the west side of the parish near the mill, and two months at Lonetowne, understanding that the centre of division is the meeting-house, and that Stephen Burr belongs to the west side." The first school committee consisted of John Read, Joseph Lee, Joseph Sanford, John Hull, Nathan Lion, Stephen Morchouse, and Daniel Lyon.

Dec. 19, 1792, appears the following vote: "That the school money be lodged with the treasurer, and he to collect the interest arising on the school-bonds annually by the first day of April, the interest already arisen and unpaid to be collected forthwith; and in failure of payment of back interest, he to send the bond, or bonds, and collect principal and interest, and to conduct in the same manner on neglect of annual payment of interest on said bonds, and to pay said interest and school money to the school committee as it may be appropriated by the committee of the districts annually."

"As to the source or origin of these school bonds," says Mr. Todd, "or by whom taken, I am unable to give a positive answer. The town of Redding has a school fund of four hundred dollars, distinct from the State fund, and which dates back to a period beyond the reach of memory or tradition. It is more than probable, however, that it was the sum realized from the sale of lands in Litchfield County in 1733, called western lands, and which was divided among the several towns in proportion to their poll-list and ratable estate for that year, and to be secured and forever improved for the use of the schools kept in said towns according to law. Redding, unlike most of her sister towns, has preserved this fund inviolate, and still uses its proceeds in support of her schools. In 1795 came the sale of the Western Reserve and Connecticut's munificent grant to her common schools, which has put them in the front rank of educational forces and contributed so much to the material prosperity of the State. In October of that year the inhabitants of Redding met and formed themselves into a school society, in order that they 'might have the advantage of the moneys arising from the sale of western lands.' Peter Sanford, James Rogers, and Simeon Munger were the first committee chosen by this society. Prior to 1870 the cost of supporting the schools above that derived from the school funds was borne by the parents or guardians of the scholars, but in that year the Legislature passed a law compelling the towns to maintain free schools, and this plan has since been pursued."

The town is organized into school districts as follows: District No. 1, Centre; District No. 2, Ridge; District No. 3, Couch's Hill; District No. 4, Diamond

Hill; District No. 5, Boston; District No. 6, Hull; District No. 7, Umpawaug; District No. 8, Lonctown; District No. 9, Pickett's Ridge; District No. 10, Foundry; District No. 11 (half-district), Georgetown; District No. 12 (half-district), Florida; District No. 13 (half-district), Rock House.

For present condition of schools, see General History.

The Hill Academy was incorporated in 1878 with the following trustees: Francis A. Sanford, Aaron Treadwell, John Todd, X. Alanson Welton, Stephen Sanford, Thaddeus M. Abbott, and Arthur B. Hill. The officers of the corporation are as follows: President, Francis A. Sanford; Vice-President, T. M. Abbott; Secretary, Arthur B. Hill; Treasurer, Aaron Treadwell; Auditor, Stephen Sanford. This school was founded by Rev. Aaron S. Hill, of New Haven, who donated the sum of five thousand dollars for its endowment. The first principal was T. M. W. George, of Hartford, who remained until July 1, 1879. At present no school is being held, and the fund is left to accumulate.

SELECT SCHOOLS.

From a very early period to the present time Redding has had many very excellent select schools. Among the earliest were those kept by S. Samuel Smith, Esq., at the centre, and Rev. Jonathan Bartlett, in the present dwelling of Mr. Lemuel Sanford. This latter school attained a high reputation. The first boarding-school was opened by Mr. Walker Bates in about 1825. A few years later a school was commenced at the centre by Eli Gilbert, and in 1836 two schools were established at Redding Ridge,—one by John Osborne, and the other by Aaron B. Wilson.

The Redding Institute was founded by Daniel Sanford, A.M., in 1847. It was a successful school, and Mr. Sanford remained in charge until 1867, when he retired, and Edward P. Shaw became principal, remaining as such until 1873, when the institution was discontinued. A boarding-school was opened by Burton Bradley in 1850, and also one by Miss Polly Selleck in 1844 for young ladies, both of which were quite successful.

The Misses Sanford's School.—The school for young children conducted by the Misses Sanford is the only select school now in the town. This is an excellent and very successful school, where not only young children but more advanced scholars are pupils.

MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

Although Redding is an inland town, and prior to 1850 was crossed by no railway, still some of the earliest manufacturing establishments in the county were located here. Here were the iron-smelting works of Oliver Sanford, at Sanfordtown, which were destroyed by the great fire-het in 1805. Abraham Fairchild had a fulling-mill as early as 1742, on the Saugatuck, near Nobb's Crook. Comstock, Foster & Co. erected a woollen-mill in 1812, near the site of the old fullingmill; this was burned in 1843 or 1844. Ephraim Sanford commenced the manufacture of carriages in about 1800, which was continued by various persons with varying success and finally discontinued.

"Subsequently," says Todd's "History," "Mr. E. A. Sanford formed a partnership with Charles Duncomb, and later with G. A. Sanford, by whom the business was conducted with varying success. In its palmiest days this firm did a large business, employing from twenty-five to thirty men, and maintaining a depot for their goods in New York. Mr. Aaron Bartram built a carriage-factory in 1849 (now standing), and in company with Mr. Eben Wilson did a large business for a term of years. Mr. Bradley Sanford began the manufacture of carriage-axes in Sanfordtown in 1833, and continued it until 1838, when he was succeeded by Mr. G. A. Sanford.*

"Hat-making was at one time a prominent industry in Redding. To Mr. Billy Comstock is due the credit of erecting the first hat-manufactory, which stood near his house in the Boston District. Mr. Daniel Gould had a large hat-shop in Lonctown, and later Mr. Jesse Banks carried on the business somewhat extensively in Sanfordtown. He employed at one time from twenty-five to thirty men, and supplied the Southern and West India market. Mr. Milo Lee also carried on the business for a number of years, first with Mr. Banks, and afterwards in a factory near his house. Bricks were made at one time by Mr. Alanson Lyon on Redding Ridge, and in the same district a large shirt-manufactory was once in successful operation under the management of Mr. Curtis Fanton and his son, Henry Fanton. In 1856 the Redding Manufacturing Company was organized in Sanfordtown for the manufacture of pins and other small articles in brass. The large building in Sanfordtown still known as the pin-factory was built by this company; for a time its prospects for a successful career were excellent, but, owing to some mismanagement on the part of the directors, it soon proved a failure.

"The Hill Limekiln in Lonctown is perhaps the oldest lime-burning establishment in the State. It was probably opened at an early day by Col. John Read, who was the owner of the tract of land in which the quarry is situated. In 1810 it came into the possession of John R. Hill, a grandson of Col. Read, who conducted an extensive business and acquired a fortune. Mr. Hill retired in 1823, and was succeeded at different periods by his sons Aaron S. Hill, Moses Hill, William Hill, and John L. Hill. These gentlemen conducted the business with the same energy and success that had characterized their father's management. Since Mr. John L. Hill's retirement the business has been conducted successively by Messrs. Ames & Osborne, Barnes, Smith, and Philo Wood.†

* This branch of business is discontinued.

† It is now conducted by Mr. Wood, and is an extensive business.

"In 1842, Squire James Sanford built a foundry on the Aspetuck River, in the Foundry District, and entered largely into the manufacture of agricultural implements. He had before invented an improved hay-cutting machine, in which the cutting was done by revolving cylinders furnished with knives, which he manufactured here, and which had an extensive sale throughout the country. This foundry is almost the only one of the old-time industries of Redding that remains in successful operation to this day.

"The Aspetuck River, dashing through a gorge in this district, furnishes abundant water-power, and this the skill and energy of the Sanford brothers has utilized in the manufacture of buttons. Their three button-factories have a capacity of between three hundred and four hundred gross of buttons per day. They employ twenty-eight hands, and have made this district one of the busiest and most prosperous localities in the town."

THE GILBERT & BENNETT MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The works of the Gilbert & Bennett Manufacturing Company are located partly in this and partly in the adjoining town of Wilton, in the village of Georgetown. They manufacture iron and galvanized wire, iron, brass, galvanized, and painted wire-cloth, sieves, riddles, coal-screens, cheese- and meat-safes, ox-muzzles, galvanized twist wire netting, etc.

This concern is one of the oldest in its line in the country. The business was established by Benjamin Gilbert in 1818. Some years after, a copartnership was formed by Wm. J. Gilbert, Sturges Bennett, E. O. Hurlbutt, and E. Gilbert, under the name of Gilbert, Bennett & Co., under which name the business was conducted until May, 1874, when the upper mills were destroyed by fire, causing a loss to the concern of over one hundred thousand dollars. At this time there were one hundred and twenty-five persons employed by the company. Immediately after the fire the concern was incorporated under the name of the Gilbert & Bennett Manufacturing Company (capital, one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars), with Sturges Bennett as president, David H. Miller secretary, and W. W. Beers treasurer.

The main factory, situated in Redding, and built on the ground formerly occupied by the one destroyed by fire, is a stone and brick building three hundred and thirteen by fifty-six and a half feet, three stories high, with a galvanized iron roof. The power used is a fifty horse-power water-wheel and a seventy-five horse-power steam-engine. In this building are the power-looms for weaving shade wire-cloth, twisting-machines for making wire netting and fencing. In the centre of the building is a powerful saw-mill, where all the lumber used in the manufacture of sieves, safes, etc., is cut up and prepared.

The two mills owned by the company situated in the town of Wilton are used for drawing wire, weaving wire, and galvanizing. The power is improved by two water-wheels of seventy horse-power. The force of mechanics employed at present is one hundred.

The officers are: President, Sturges Bennett; Secretary, David H. Miller; Treasurer, E. Gilbert; Superintendent, Samuel J. Miller.

BIOGRAPHICAL, Etc."

"John Barlow, the poet and statesman, was born in Redding, March 24, 1754. He received his early education first from the Rev. Mr. Bartlett, pastor of the Congregational Church in Redding, and second at Moor's preparatory school for boys, near Hanover, N. H. He entered Dartmouth College in 1774, at the age of twenty, and shortly after removed to New Haven and was entered at Yale. His college course was a highly creditable one in many respects. During the college terms he was a faithful student, especially winning distinction for literary attainments; and during the long summer vacations he joined the Continental army as a volunteer and aided in fighting the battles of his country. He graduated in 1778. From 1779 to 1783 he was chaplain of one of the Connecticut regiments in the Revolutionary army. Shortly after leaving the army, in 1783, he married Miss Ruth Baldwin, daughter of Michael Baldwin, Esq., of New Haven, and in 1785 settled as a lawyer in Hartford, Conn.

"In Hartford, Mr. Barlow appears as lawyer, journalist (editor of the American Mercury), bookseller, and poet. In the latter capacity he produced a revision of Dr. Watts' 'Imitation' of the Psalms, and also, in 1787, his famous poem, 'The Vision of Columbus.'

"In 1789 he accepted from the Sciota Land Company the position of foreign agent for the sale of their lands in Europe, and went to England, and later to France, for this purpose; but shortly after his arrival the company made a disgraceful failure, and he was again thrown on his own resources. Fortunately, his literary reputation had made him quite a lion in the French capital, and he easily succeeded in obtaining work on the French journals. Later he embarked in some mercantile ventures, which proved successful and brought him a competence. He at first participated actively in the French Revolution, which broke out soon after his arrival in France, but, becoming disgusted with the atrocities of the Jacobins, he withdrew and went over to England.

"In London, in 1791, he published his 'Advice to the Privileged Orders,'—a work which drew out a formal eulogium from Fox in the House of Commons. This was succeeded in 1792 by his 'Conspiracy of Kings,' a poem so bitterly hostile to royalty that he found it prudent to leave England for France immediately on its publication. On his return to France at this time the privileges of French citizenship were conferred on him, before accorded to but two Americans, Washington and Hamilton.

* The following is chiefly from Todd's "History of Redding."

"In 1793 he accompanied Gregorie, former Bishop of Blois, and other dignitaries, to Savoy, and aided in organizing that country into a department of the republic. While here he wrote his 'Hasty Pudding,' the mock-heroic, half-didactic poem which has chiefly endeared him to his countrymen.

"In 1795, President Washington appointed him consul to Algiers, with instructions to ratify the long-pending treaty with the Dey and to liberate the American prisoners there. Col. Humphreys, American minister to Portugal, an old friend of Mr. Barlow, himself came to Paris to urge him to accept; and, proving successful, the two friends left Paris on the 12th of September, 1795, for Lisbon. From Lisbon, Mr. Barlow proceeded to Algiers via Alicant, and after a year and a half of effort succeeded in ratifying the treaty and in liberating the captives. He then returned to France. During the succeeding eight years he resided in an elegant villa near Paris, formerly the property of the Count Clermont Tonnerre, enjoying the friendship of the chief men of the nation, as well as that of all Americans of eminence who visited the capital.

"But in 1805 the desire to once more revisit the land he had left seventeen years before became too strong to be resisted longer, and, disposing of his estates in France, he returned in July of this year to America. He was warmly received in his native land, and after an extensive tour, extending into the Western country, he returned to Washington, where he built an elegant mansion called 'Kalorama,' and which was widely famed in its day for its beauty and elegance and as being the resort of all the famous men of the times. At Kalorama, Barlow gave his chief attention to the cultivation of the Muses and to philosophical studies. Here, in 1808, he finished his great poem, 'The Columbiad,' which was printed at Philadelphia, and was one of the most elegant volumes ever issued from the American press. He also busied himself with collecting materials for a general history of the United States.

"In 1811, President Madison offered him the responsible position of minister to France, in the hope that his reputation and his influence with the French government might secure for us a treaty giving indemnity for past spoliation on our commerce and security from further depredations. Barlow accepted the position from motives of the purest patriotism, in the belief that his talents and position might be made useful to his country. He sailed from Annapolis in July, 1811, in the historic frigate 'Constitution,' Capt. Hull, which had been placed at his disposal by the government. His negotiations with Napoleon while on this mission were conducted through the Duke de Bassano, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and covered a space of nearly a year and a half. Napoleon acknowledged the justice of the claims of the United States, and expressed a willingness to ratify a treaty of indemnity; but he was so absorbed in directing the campaign against Russia, and in his other operations on the European field, that it was very difficult to bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion.

"At length, on the 25th of October, 1812, Mr. Barlow received a letter from the Duke de Bassano, written at Wilna, Poland, saying that the emperor had deputed the business of the treaty to him, and that if Mr. Barlow would come to Wilna he had no doubt but that the treaty might be speedily ratified. Barlow, on receipt of the note, at once set out, and, traveling night and day, reached Wilna about December 1st, only to find the village filled with fugitives from Napoleon's retreating army, while the duke was out on the frontiers hurrying forward reinforcements to cover the emperor's retreat. Disappointed in his mission, he hastened to retrace his steps; but at Zarniwica, an obscure village in Poland, he was seized with an acute attack of pneumonia, the result of privations and exposure, which terminated his life Dec. 26, 1812. He was buried in the little village where he died, and a marble pillar was erected by Mrs. Barlow to his memory. No friendly pen has ever written the poet's biography, and his memory has pretty much faded from the minds of his countrymen; but there were few men of his day more widely known, or who did deeds more worthy of grateful recognition by the American people.

"Stephen Russell Mallory, second son of Charles Mallory, of Redding, Conn., was born in the West Indies in 1814, and came to the United States when but three months old. In 1819 he accompanied his father to Florida, and was placed at an "old field school" near Mobile, from whence he was removed to the academy at Nazareth, Pa., where he spent several years. He returned to Florida in 1830, and established his residence at Key West, where he embraced the profession of law. Mr. Mallory has filled many important trusts under the State and general governments, and was collector of the customs and superintendent of the revenue at Key West under Mr. Polk. In 1850 he was elected to the United States Senate for the term of six years. The above is from Gleason's Pictorial Companion for 1853. Mr. Mallory's subsequent career as Secretary of the Confederate Navy is familiar to the reader.

"Dudley Sanford Gregory, mayor of Jersey City, N. J., and prominently identified with the early history of that city, was a native of Redding.

"Maj.-Gen. Darius Couch was born of Redding parents, in South East, New York, July 25, 1822. The following sketch of his career, taken largely from Cullum's 'History of the Officers and Graduates of the United States Military Academy,' will be read with interest:

"Darius N. Couch, born in New York, appointed from New York, cadet at United States Military Academy from July 1, 1842, to July 1, 1846, when he was graduated and promoted in the army to brevet second lieutenant, Fourth Artillery. Served in the war with Mexico in 1846-48, being engaged in the battle of Buena Vista, Mexico, as second lieutenant in Capt. Washington's Battery, light artillery, for which he was brevetted first lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct. Participating in occupation of the Seminoles country in 1852-53, he planned and executed at his own expense a scientific expedition into Central and Northern Mexico, the results of which were very creditable to his enterprise. He married, in 1854, a daughter of Hon. S. L. Crocker, of Taunton, Mass., and granddaughter of Isaiah Thomas, founder of the Antiquarian Society of Worcester, Mass., and author of the "History of Printing." The next year he resigned from the army. At the breaking out of the Rebellion, being settled in Taunton, Mass., he raised the Seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and proceeded to Washington in July, 1861. Was made brigadier-general in August, and assigned to the command of a brigade in the defense of that city. In McClellan's campaign on the Peninsula, Gen. Couch commanded the First Division, Fourth Army Corps, holding the left of the line at the siege of Yorktown. At the battle of Fair Oaks his brave division held their ground for more than two hours against the combined attack of the Confederate troops. With part of his division he reinforced Hooker in the hot action of Oak Grove, June 25, 1862, and was in various skirmishes during the Seven Days until July 1st, on which morning Gen. McClellan posted him on the main road leading to Richmond, where was fought the successful battle of Malvern Hill.

"Being promoted to the rank of major-general, July 4, 1862, he joined Pope with his division on the retreat from Manassas, in the Northern Virginia campaign. October, 1862, in command of the Second Army Corps, campaign of the Rappahannock. At Fredericksburg, December 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th, it fell upon Gen. Couch to assault Marye's Heights, in which desperate work that brave magnificent Second Army Corps lost more than four thousand men. The loss of his corps at the disastrous battle of Chancellorsville, where he was second in command, was very heavy. In November, 1864, he joined Thomas, who was besieged at Nashville, and was assigned by the commander to the command of an army corps. In the battle which followed he commanded a division, turned Hood's left, and captured several pieces of artillery and many prisoners. In North Carolina, March, April, and May, aiding Sherman in closing the war. Resigned in June, 1865, the Rebellion having been crushed out.

"The general has for several years resided at Norwalk, Conn., having been quartermaster-general at Hartford during the years 1877-78."

"Hon. Gideon H. Hollister, of Litchfield, is a descendant of two of our Redding families. He was born Dec. 14, 1818, in Washington, Conn., and graduated at Yale College in 1840; studied law in Litchfield, and was admitted to the bar in April, 1842. He practiced law in Litchfield until 1859, when he opened an office in New York. He went as United States chargé d'affaires to Hayti when that country was under the administration of Salnave. In 1855 he published a 'History of Connecticut' in two volumes, of which two editions, of two thousand copies each, have been exhausted. He is the author of three historical dramas, one of them bearing the title 'Thomas à Becket.' He has also written a legal treatise on the law of eminent domain. Mr. Hollister is now engaged in writing a history of Hayti.

"Attorney-Gen. Bates, of Missouri, was of Redding ancestry.

"Judge Strong, of the United States Supreme Court, spent his childhood and youth in Redding, and made his maiden plea here before a justice court.*

"Mrs. Dora Goodale, a writer for Scribner's, is a native of Redding, being a descendant of Col. John Read, one of the earliest settlers. She is the mother of Elaine and Dora Goodale, the child-poets, whose charming verses have been so warmly welcomed by the American public.

"In the several professions Redding has been well represented. Dr. Asabel Fitch, the first physician who settled in the town, is remembered in Fairfield County as a worthy man, and one of its most respectable practitioners of medicine. He was among the principal pioneers in the formation of the county society, but died soon after its organization. His death occurred in 1792, or about that period. I understand that he was the grandfather of Professor Knight, of Yale College.

"Among the physicians of Fairfield County who enjoyed a long and successful practice was Dr. Thomas Davies of Redding. He removed to Redding in 1793, on the decease of Dr. Fitch, and there continued in the duties of his profession until his death, which occurred in 1831. Mr. Davies possessed the reputation of being among the first of the physicians of the county who assumed regular obstetrical duties, and so successful were his labors that he became particularly eminent in that department.

"The doctor was once summoned as an important witness to appear before the court in Fairfield, and, not appearing, the sheriff was sent to compel his attendance. Being absent, and learning on his return that the officer was waiting at a public-house in the vicinity, he without notice to the official rode to Fairfield and appeared before the court. On the question occurring with the court regarding the costs attending the capias, he requested one or two of his legal friends to excuse the delinquency. The judge decided, notwithstanding, that the law must be observed, and that the doctor must bear the expenses. Dr. Davies then requested a hearing in his own behalf; which being granted, he remarked, 'May it please the court, I am a good citizen of the State, and since I was summoned to attend this court I have introduced three other good citizens into it.'

"The court replied that for so good a plea he would leave the parties to pay the expenses.

"Rev. Thomas F. Davies, Sr., formerly pastor of the Congregational Church at Huntington, Conn., now editor of the Christian Spectator, published in New Haven, and minister of the Congregational Church in Green's Farms, Conn., was his only son.

"L. Sanford Davies, Esq., who at one time was settled at Waterbury, was mayor of the city, and held the office of judge of Probate and other prominent positions, is a son of the Rev. Thomas F. Davies. Another son is the Rev. Thomas F. Davies, D.D., now of Philadelphia, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church in that city.

"Among the later practitioners of the town, Dr. Charles Gorham was very widely known and respected. He was the son of Meeker Gorham and Elizabeth Hubbell of Greenfield Hill, in the town of Fairfield. He began the study of medicine with Dr. Jehiel Williams, of New Milford, and afterwards pursued his studies at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York. He settled in Redding in 1816, at the age of twenty-one years, and practiced as a physician and surgeon in Fairfield County forty-two years. He married Mary, daughter of William King Comstock, of Danbury. Dr. Gorham is described as a man of more than ordinary strength of character, with a well-balanced mind and sound judgment. He was fond of scientific investigations, and was remarkable for close observation and power of analysis. He died at his residence, Redding Centre, Sept. 15, 1859.

"Dr. Moses H. Wakeman came to this place for the practice of his profession in 1858, and still continues here in the enjoyment of an extensive and lucrative practice. He has been, and is, considered one of the most successful and skillful physicians of the day.

"Anna M. Reed, who located a few years since at Redding Ridge, has a large and still-increasing practice not only in this but adjoining towns.

"Among clergymen may be enumerated the following: Rev. Justus Hull, Rev. Lemuel Hull; Rev. Thomas F. Davies, of Philadelphia; Rev. William T. Hill, presiding elder of New Haven District; Rev. Aaron K. Sanford, presiding elder of Poughkeepsie District, New York Conference; Rev. Aaron S. Hill, of New Haven; Rev. Morris Hill, of New Haven; Rev. Moses Hill, of Norwalk; Rev. Hawley Sanford, of Iowa; Rev. Morris Sanford, of Iowa; Rev. Platt Treadwell; Rev. Albert Miller, of Iowa; Rev. Leroy Stowe, of Milford, Conn.; and Rev. A. B. Sanford, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

"The following State senators have been natives or citizens of Redding: Thomas B. Fanton, elected in 1841; Lemuel Sanford, 1847; Cortes Merchant, 1855; Francis A. Sanford, 1865; James Sanford, 1870; Jonathan R. Sanford, 1877.

"Thomas Sanford, former high sheriff of the county, and at one time nominee of the Democratic party for comptroller of the State; Henry Sanford, of New York, superintendent of Adams' Express Company; Aaron Sanford, of Newtown, present high sheriff of Fairfield County; and Albert Hill, city engineer of New Haven, are natives of Redding."

CIVIL HISTORY.

THE PARISH.

In the year 1723 a petition was presented to the General Court praying that the settlement might be organized into a parish, but the opposition of Fairfield defeated the project, and, although the matter was agitated from time to time, it was not until 1729 that the parish of Redding was constituted.* The first meeting of the parish was held June 5, 1729.

THE TOWN.

The town was incorporated in May, 1767, and on the 15th of the following month the first town officers were chosen, as follows (Col. John Read was chosen moderator of the meeting, and Lieut. Stephen Mead was elected clerk for the ensuing year): Selectmen, Stephen Mead, Ephraim Jackson, Daniel Hill; Constables, David Lyon, Asahel Fitch, Daniel Hall; Fence-Viewers, Benjamin Hamilton, Zalmon Read; Listers, Peter Fairchild, Lemuel Sanford, Jr., David Jackson; Grand Jurymen, Thomas Fairchild, Jonathan Couch; Treasurer, Gurdon Merchant; Tithingmen, Paul Bartram, Thomas Fairchild, Eleazer Smith, Jr.; Pound-Keepers, Ebenezer Williams, Ebenezer Couch; Sealer of Leather, Gershom Morehouse; Sealer of Weights, Benjamin Meeker, Jonathan Mallory, Ephraim Jackson, Capt. Henry Lyon, and Gurdon Merchant were made a committee to take all proper and lawful methods to clear the highways. The town by vote made the pound by Elizabeth Sanford's the "town pound," and voted "to use the school-house by the old meeting-house for ye place for holding ye town-meetings in ye future."

PROBATE JUDGES.

The town was made a Probate district in 1839. The judges have been as follows: Thomas B. Fanton, Jonathan R. Sanford, Thaddeus M. Abbott, and Lemuel Sanford, present incumbent.

SELECTMEN.

The present selectmen are Samuel S. Osborn, Stephen Sanford, and George Coley; clerk and treasurer, Lemuel Sanford.

TOWN-HOUSE.

The first town-house was built in 1798, and stood in the centre of the common, near the present building. It was thirty-six feet long by thirty in width, "twelve-foot posts." It was "covered with long cedar shingles, the sides with pine." Peter, Ezekiel, and Aaron Sanford, Samuel Jarvis, Andrew L. Hill, and Simon Munger were chosen a committee "to receive proposals and contract for building the aforesaid town-house." The present town-house was erected in 1834.

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY.

The following extracts from the town records will prove of interest:

Oct. 6, 1768, it was voted to "present a memorial to the General Assembly praying that Redding be made a county town."

March 6, 1771, it was "voted and agreed, that whereas a Plan hath been proposed of moving to the General Assembly in May next for the erecting a new county, to consist of the towns of Danbury, Newtown, Ridgefield, Redding, and New Fairfield, we are willing and desirous that said towns shall be erected a county, and that we will assist them to endeavor to have said county established." The committee appointed for this purpose were David Lyon, Gershom Morehouse, and James Rogers.

In October, 1773, the General Assembly passed a resolution, "to assert, and in some proper way support their claim to those lands contained within the limits and bounds of the charter of this Colony westward of the Province of New York."

The voice of Redding on this matter is found under date of March 14, 1774: "Whereas it is the opinion of many of the freemen and other inhabitants of this Colony (and of this meeting in particular) that if the abovesaid Resolve be carried into execution it will inevitably involve the inhabitants of Connecticut in a long, expensive, and fruitless Litigation with Mr. Penn; therefore this meeting appoints as delegates Messrs. William Hawley and Peter Fairchild to attend a meeting to be held at Middletown on the last Wednesday of Instant March to concert some proper methods in order to put a stop to so disagreeable a procedure."

THE NAME OF THE TOWN.

A difference of opinion has prevailed for many years in regard to the origin and the proper way of spelling the name of this town. There can be no doubt but that the spelling was "Reading" when formed into a parish, and Mr. Hoadley, State librarian, who is good authority, says, "In the original bill for making the town, in 1667, the name seems to have been written 'Reading,' but altered to 'Redding.' In sundry editions of our statutes before 1849 the name has been spelled both ways,—one way when the name occurs as forming a part of the county, and the other as forming a part of a Probate district. Since 1849 the spelling in the statutes is 'Reading.'"

In the Eighteenth Connecticut Reports, in the trial of Sherwood against the town of Weston, where the name of Redding occurs, Mr. Day has the following foot-note: "I am glad of this opportunity, as I am of every opportunity that occurs, of restoring, as far as my example will have the effect, the original and correct orthography of the name of this town. The prevalent corruption (Redding) is not very flattering to the memory of Col. Read, whose contemporaries deemed his services and benefactions to the new corporation worthy of being held in grateful remembrance by giving it a name derived from him."

Whether, as Mr. Day, Mr. Barber, and others have asserted, and as tradition maintains, it derived its name from Col. John Read, or whether, as others suppose, it took its name from Reading, in Berkshire, England, it should be spelled "Reading."

Mr. Todd, in his "History of Redding," gives it as his opinion, after a thorough investigation, that "the original name of the town was Reading, and that if historical precedents are to be followed, it should be so named now." He also gives Rev. Moses Hill as authority, from information that he derived from his father, that "at the time of its incorporation a meeting was held, at which it was voted that the name of the new town should be Redding." This is confirmed by the statement of persons contemporary with Capt. Ebenezer Hill, who made this statement; but, as no record of such a vote is found, the doings of that asserted meeting cannot be considered valid.

Mr. Todd shows good judgment in spelling it Redding in his "History," because the people of the town prefer it, and it has been written that way so long that it would not be advisable to adopt the original spelling.

MILITARY RECORD.

Redding responded promptly to the call of our imperiled country during the late war of the Rebellion, and, from official returns in the adjutant-general's office, it appears that the town furnished one hundred and eight men for the service. The following is the list:

Feb. 4, 1862, a meeting was held in Georgetown for the purpose of electing officers for Company E, Eighth Regiment, Second Brigade, Connecticut State Militia, the company being known as Company E, National Guard.

David H. Miller, Redding, was elected captain; Hiram St. John, Wilton, first lieutenant; George M. Godfrey, Wilton, second lieutenant; John N. Main, Redding, first sergeant; James Corcoran, Wilton, second sergeant; Lewis Northrop, Weston, third sergeant; David S. Bartram, Redding, fourth sergeant; Aaron O. Scribner, Wilton, fifth sergeant; William D. Gilbert, Wilton, first corporal; Aaron H. Davis, Redding, second corporal; Alonzo Dickson, Redding, third corporal; Jeremiah K. Miller, Wilton, fourth corporal; Edward Thompson, Redding, fifth corporal; Seth P. Bates, Redding, sixth corporal; George W. Gould, Redding, seventh corporal; Albert D. Sturges, Wilton, eighth corporal.

Privates.—John W. Mead, Ridgefield; Moses Constock, Wilton; James Laddell, Wilton; James F. Jelliff, Weston; Hezekiah B. Osborn, Redding; Joseph R. Lockwood, Wilton; Henry Parsons, Redding; William H. Canfield, Redding; Minot S. Patrick, Redding; Charles A. Jennings, Wilton; Edwin Gilbert, Redding; David E. Smith, Redding; Hiram Cobbleigh, Redding; Samuel A. Main, Redding; Anton Stommel, Redding; George L. Dunn, Wilton; Jonathan Betts, Weston; Charles Olmsted, Wilton; Charles Albin, Redding; Frederick D. Chapman, Redding; Henry Hohman, Redding; William B. Smith, Redding; William E. Brothwell, Wilton; Azariah E. Meeker, Redding; Charles S. Gregory, Redding; Charles S. Meeker, Redding; Charles H. Downs, Redding; William Coley, Redding; Lorenzo Jones, Redding; Henry F. Burr, Redding; Obadiah P. Coleman, Redding; Charles H. Canfield, Redding; John L. Godfrey, Wilton; Sylvester Albin, Redding.

The company uniformed itself and drilled until August, 1862. When Governor Buckingham called for troops to serve for nine months, the entire command volunteered its services, and was accepted. The company was immediately recruited up to one hundred and eight men, and reported for duty at Camp Terry, New Haven, where it was mustered into the United States service as Company E, Twenty-third Regiment Connecticut Volunteers. On the formation of the Twenty-third Regiment, Capt. Miller was promoted to be major of the regiment. George M. Godfrey was elected captain of Company E, to fill the vacancy caused by the promotion of Capt. Miller, and John N. Main promoted to second lieutenant, to fill vacancy caused by the promotion of Lieut. Godfrey.

The company was sent with the regiment from New Haven to Camp Buckingham, on Long Island, and from thence by steamer "The Kiang" to New Orleans, where it was embodied in the Nineteenth Army Corps, under Gen. Banks. It was engaged at La Fourche Crossing, La., on June 21, 1863, with a superior force of the rebels, but came out victorious. It was mustered out of the service at New Haven, Sept. 3, 1863, after serving nearly thirteen months.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THOMAS SANFORD.

Thomas Sanford was born in Redding, Fairfield Co., Conn., Sept. 27, 1823. He is the youngest of the children of Jonathan R. Sanford, and was named for his grandfather, Thomas Davies, M.D., one of the early practitioners of medicine in Redding. His early educational advantages were very limited, being confined to an attendance upon the public schools of the town, and upon them, after an early age, only during the winter term; and two or three terms in a private school in his native place. It was his expect-tation to be a farmer, and it was thought that there was need of little study of books, but of much work for that pursuit. He followed his chosen business on the paternal estate till 1859, when he was appointed deputy sheriff, continuing in that office six years. In 1860 he was elected sheriff of the county. This office he held for three years to the great satisfaction of his constituents, being a favorite of the members of the bar of the county. At the expiration of his term he declined a renomination.

He represented the town in the State Legislature in 1856 and 1877. The latter time he was chairman of the committee on the part of the House on the school fund, and also served on other important committees. During this session he took some part in the debate upon measures under consideration, and was very favorably regarded by the members of both political parties in the Legislature. After its adjournment, the Hartford Courant, opposed to Mr. Sanford in politics, in an article remarking upon the leading members of the House, paid a tribute of respect to him as one of the foremost men of that body on the Democratic side. At this session he was appointed by the Legislature a member of the committee to take into consideration increased accommodations for the indigent insane.

Mr. Sanford has served on several important commissions appointed by the Governor. To one of these was committed the duty of revising and condensing the pauper laws of the State. The existing statutes on this subject are the work of this committee, in which he took a prominent part. He has also acted frequently as a member of a committee of the Superior Court in the trial of cases and in the assessment of damages where lands have been taken for railroads and other purposes.

He was one of the selectmen of the town for ten consecutive years until, in 1879, he declined a renomination. He was also at various times one of the assessors, and a member of the board of relief and agent of the town. At one time he received the nomination for comptroller of the State by the Democratic party, but failed of an election.

It is proper here to remark that Mr. Sanford never sought office. His extensive information, excellent knowledge of public affairs, sound judgment, sturdy honesty, kindly heart, and affable manners caused the offices to seek him, and he has never disappointed expectations.

Since his retirement from the sheriffalty, Mr. Sanford has been largely engaged in the settlement of estates. He has also held many funds in trust for children. While he has pursued the work of cultivating the ancestral acres, his time is mainly occupied in attending to business intrusted to him by his fellow-citizens, who have entire confidence in his ability and trustworthiness.

He resides in the old home in Redding where his father and grandfather dwelt. He is a member of the Congregational Church, and takes a lively interest and active part in the affairs of the Ecclesiastical Society therewith connected, and is an efficient supporter of the same.

Mr. Sanford has fine social qualities, is a good conversationalist and a genial companion, and has the esteem of a very extensive circle of acquaintances in the town, county, and State, and is a worthy descendant of an honored ancestry.

JUDGE LEMUEL SANFORD.

Judge Lemuel Sanford was born in Redding, Conn., Sept. 18, 1816.

His father, Jonathan R. Sanford, through a long life enjoyed in an eminent degree the confidence and respect of the community in which he lived. Having been appointed in 1808 to the office of town clerk and treasurer, he held them by consecutive annual appointment till his decease, in 1858. He frequently represented his town in the State Legislature, filled the office of Probate judge, and discharged the duties of various trusts, both of a private and public nature, and exhibited in all his acts a stern integrity and purity of purpose seldom equaled.

His mother, a woman of more than ordinary intelligence and strength of mind, was a daughter of Dr. Thomas Davis, long a leading physician of Fairfield County.

The early days of Lemuel Sanford were spent with his father, aiding him in the cultivation of his farm, and frequently assisting him in the discharge of his official duties. Laboring on the farm in summer for several seasons, he taught the winter school. While yet a young man he was elected a justice of the peace, and still holds that office. During the time his father was judge of Probate, Lemuel was Probate clerk, and when Mr. Sanford the elder reached the age of seventy, Lemuel was appointed to succeed him in the office of Probate judge in 1858, which office, with the exception of one year, he has held till the present time. At the annual town-meeting immediately succeeding his father's death he was appointed town clerk and treasurer, and has ever since held the same with the exception of one year. He served his district (Eleventh Senatorial), in the State Senate in 1847 with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. Since the retirement of his father, in 1856, he has been clerk and treasurer of the Congregational Society of Redding, having been appointed at that time. He has also filled the office of selectman and other town offices.

JAMES SANFORD.

James Sanford was born in 1799, in the town of Redding. His occupation was first that of a tanner, which he followed for some years, when he turned his attention to farming. Inventing a straw- and hay-enter in 1843, he built a foundry for their manufacture which he continued for about fifteen years. He married early in life Eliza, daughter of John French, of Easton. Their children have been eleven, nine of whom are still living, namely: Turney, Scenah, James, Sarah, Stephen, Betsey, Abbie, Henry, and Charles, John (deceased), and Perkins (deceased).

Mr. James Sanford has probably devoted more time to public service than any man now living, and quite as much as any man who has ever lived in the town of Redding. He has been State Senator, representative, and selectman. He has been a member of the Episcopal Church in Redding since a very young man, and its senior warden for a great many years.

Stephen Sanford, the fourth son, was born in Redding, Conn., March 28, 1835; received his education at the district school, after leaving which worked on his father's farm until he attained the age of twenty-two, when he engaged in business for himself, carrying on the foundry and machine-shop which up to this time had been conducted by his father. This business he sold at the end of five years to engage in the manufacture of horn buttons, which, with farming, has been his business ever since. His residence and factory are situated in the eastern part of the town of Redding, known as Sanfordville.

Mr. Sanford gives employment to about twenty operatives, and manufactures about fifteen thousand great gross of buttons annually. His establishment was burned in the winter of 1874, but was rebuilt the following spring. He was married Nov. 23, 1864, to Miss Mary S., eldest daughter of Francis B. and Almira Sherwood Banks, of Fairfield. Their children are Emory, Perkins, and Stephen Ernest.

Mr. Sanford united with the Episcopal Church when quite young, of which he has always been a consistent member and of which he is senior warden.

In politics he is a staunch Democrat; has been selectman a number of years and is one of the present board.

JONATHAN RUSSELL SANFORD.

Jonathan Russell Sanford, son of Jonathan R. Sanford, was born in the town of Redding, Oct. 25, 1819. What education he received was at the district school.

He was married May 16, 1847, to Charrissa, daughter of the late Deacon Samuel Read, a descendant of Col. John Read. But one child was born to them, a daughter, who died without a moment's warning at the age of twenty-five.

Mr. Sanford's occupation has always been that of farming, with the exception of two years in the earlier part of his life spent in mercantile pursuits.

He was a member of the Connecticut House of Representatives for the town of Redding in the years 1854, '70, '74, and senator from the Eleventh Senatorial District in 1878-79. He has repeatedly held the office of assessor, member of the board of relief of the town of Redding, and registrar of marriages, births, and deaths, retiring from the latter office in 1864. Mr. Sanford has often acted as appraiser and commissioner in estates, and holds at the present time the office of clerk of Probate for the district of Redding, having held the same continuously since 1851, with the exception of one year. He has also frequently held the office of selectman.

A Meriden paper, in commenting upon the Legislature, the qualifications of its members, etc., at the close of the first session of Mr. Sanford's service, although opposed to him in politics, paid him this tribute:

"Senator Sanford, representing the Eleventh District, is one of the most popular and deserving members of the upper House. He has represented the town of Redding three terms in the lower House, and has correct views regarding the duties of a legislator. He intuitively grapples with the most difficult problems of State legislation, and very readily comes to a correct conclusion whether a pending measure is for the public good, or whether it is being advanced by the lobby in the interest of a select few. He is an energetic worker in the committee room, and although modest and retiring in his manner, making no ostentatious display on the floor of the capitol, he exerts a wide influence in a quiet, effective way, and his vote is always given in the direction of the greatest good to the greatest number. This is Mr. Sanford's first term as senator, he holding over from last year under the new regimé. We hope to see him re-elected under biennial reform which is to be."

JOHN WHEELER SANFORD.

John Wheeler Sanford was born at Weston, Fairfield, Co., Conn., May 21, 1799. His father and grandfather were both named John. The former, a farmer by occupation, was a man possessed of considerable mechanical ingenuity, and was engaged at various times in the manufacture of lasts, plows, etc. He married Lydia Wheeler, daughter of John Wheeler, of Weston. His children were Betsey (now Mrs. Aaron Lyons, a widow, living in Redding, over ninety), Ruth (now Mrs. David Duncomb, over eighty-eight), Margaret (deceased), Sally (deceased), John W., Eli (deceased), and Lydia Ann (deceased). His mother dying when he was but eight years old, John W. remained with his father until he was eleven, when he was put out to labor with Daniel Holmes, of Weston, living with him four years. The next year he spent on a farm and the following he went to learn the carpenter's trade, serving an apprenticeship of five years. The next year he worked as journeyman in Orange Co., N. Y. In the spring of 1822, March 5th, he was married to Altha, daughter of Capt. Abel and Jerusha (Sturges) Fanton, of Weston. The children born to them have been Mary Ann, George W. (deceased), Harriet S. (deceased), Flora M., Edward J., and Georgiana.

For two years after Mr. Sanford's marriage he devoted himself exclusively to his trade. At this time he purchased the place on which he lives. At the time of its purchase by Mr. Sanford it consisted of an old house and out-buildings, and thirty acres of land. The contrast must, indeed, be striking between its appearance then, to those who remember its old tumble-down, unpainted buildings, its irregular stone fences carelessly thrown together, offering no barrier to the free ingress and egress of cattle and swine, and the rock- and stump-covered and ill-defined field, to its present thrifty appearance, its commodious, well-painted house and snug out-buildings, its regular fields protected by mathematically correct built walls, its well-tilled fields and luxuriant orchards; not a post of the original structures remains, and to the original purchase has been added from time to time until the farm contains one hundred acres of excellent land.

Mr. and Mrs. Sanford and all the children are members of the Episcopal church of Redding.

In politics Mr. Sanford was formerly Whig, now Republican. He represented his town in the Legislature in 1842. He is now living with his consort of fifty-eight years, both in the enjoyment of excellent general health. Their son Edward J. is of the firm of Sanford, Chamberlain & Allen, wholesale druggists of Knoxville, Tenn.

JESSE LEE SANFORD.

Jesse Lee Sanford was born Jan. 4, 1831, in Redding, Fairfield Co., Conn. His father, Aaron Sanford, was probably as prominent a man as the town of Redding has produced. For many years of his life he did virtually the town business. He held all the town offices at various times: was either selectman or justice of the peace for nearly fifty years. He died at the age of eighty-six.

Jesse L. Sanford was the fifth son of Aaron and Fanny (Hill) Sanford. His education was derived from the common school and Amenia Seminary, in Dutchess Co., N. Y., at which institution he spent a year and a half. He remained with his father on the home farm until his marriage, March 19, 1863, to Miss Fanny M., only daughter of George and Sarah (Goodsel) Osborn, of Redding, when he took up his residence on the farm joining his father's on the north, a portion of which consisted of a part of the homestead, and devoted his entire time to farming. His father-in-law, the late Mr. Osborn, was a prominent man in his town. An extensive farmer and cattle-dealer, he found time to do considerable business for his town, representing it in the Legislature during two sessions.

WILLIAM H. HILL.

William H. Hill was born May 1, 1845, in the town of Redding, Fairfield Co., Conn. He comes of a long line of ancestry, tracing his descent from William Hill, the name of his earliest ancestor in this country, who arrived here about 1632, twelve years after the "Mayflower." "He settled for a while at Dorchester, Mass., and then after a time removed to Windsor, on the Connecticut River, above Hartford, where he bought land and set out an orchard. From there he very early removed to Fairfield, where he lived and died, and his last will and testament is recorded in an ancient volume of the records of the 'Particular Court' for Fairfield County, in the above-named library." (From "Genealogy of the Hill Family.")

John L. Hill, father of the subject of this memoir, was born June 15, 1810, in Redding. He was married to Miss Harriet N., eldest daughter of David and Ruth (Sanford) Duncomb, of Redding, May 4, 1840. Their children were William H. and Josephine E. The latter married Rev. E. W. Burr, of the Newark Conference. Their children are Harriet and Eugene W. William H. Hill is married to Mary A., daughter of Frederick A. and Caroline (Parsons) Hotchkiss, of Sharon, and their children are John R., Carrie L. (deceased), Frederick H., and Ernest W.

John L. Hill carried on the business of lime-making for a number of years, but about ten years before his death he turned his attention to farming, purchasing the place on which his family now lives. The lime-kiln which the late Mr. Hill operated was probably the oldest in the State, having been built by Col. John Read, his great-grandfather. The farm purchased by the elder Hill was known as the Read place, and at the time of its purchase was in a most dilapidated condition; but before his death, by his energy, he brought it into the present snug and thrifty condition, which his son has since maintained. He also built the beautiful residence which still graces the place. He died in his seventieth year. His son, William H. Hill, had every advantage of district school and academic education, finishing his education at Mr. Selleck's, in Norwalk. On reaching his majority he took entire charge of the extensive farm, and enjoys the enviable reputation of being one of the best farmers of his town.

In politics he is Republican, and has filled many town offices. In 1869 he represented his town in the Legislature. His mother has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Redding for more than forty years, and to this church the family has attached itself as they have reached years of discretion.

WALKER BATES.

Walker Bates was born in Redding, Fairfield Co., Conn., June 4, 1796, and was the son of Elias Bates, an esteemed citizen of the town. He obtained his early education in the common school of his district and under the instruction of Rev. Jonathan Bartlett, who was a native of Redding and for thirteen years pastor of the Congregational Church there, and after his pastorate prepared many persons for the work of teaching. When still young Mr. Bates commenced teaching, and pursued that avocation for several years in the common schools of this and adjoining towns. In 1825 he opened a boarding- and day-school for boys, and continued it for many years. At the same time he engaged in agriculture on a somewhat scientific plan. His school was a great success, as he was well fitted for the work by his mental acquirements and discipline, and by an intense interest in the young, as well as by his genial manners and a happy faculty of imparting knowledge, thus stimulating the youthful mind for the work of an educator. Not a few who have occupied and are now filling important and honorable stations in life enjoyed his faithful tuition. He was an enthusiast in the pursuit of knowledge, and his pupils caught something of his spirit. His powers of conversation were so good and his manners so affable that the youth gathered around him with eager interest, and enjoyed greatly their intercourse with him. He was also an author, and wrote in poetic numbers. He had a Bible-class in the Sunday-school, and had no lack of members. He was a great favorite with the young.

Mr. Bates has filled most of the offices in the town, and was for a number of years the moderator of the town-meetings, over which he presided with efficiency. He often acted as executor and administrator in the settlement of estates, performing the various trusts reposed in him to the satisfaction of those concerned.

He represented the town in the General Assembly in 1832, 1835, 1840, 1854, 1862, and 1864, taking, too, quite a prominent part in the business of the Legislature. In several instances, when a member of that body, he was called by the Speaker to the chair during his absence.

It may be well said of him that in all the acts of his life, both public and private, he exhibited a sense of honor and integrity rarely surpassed.

Mr. Bates is a member of the Congregational Church in his native town, and for a number of years was the leading committee of the Ecclesiastical Society therewith connected.

He is now in his eighty-fifth year, confined mostly to the house, and is obliged generally to keep his bed, being a great sufferer from mental and physical disease.

CORTES MERCHANT.*

The first record we find of the Merchant family figuring to any extent in matters of public interest connected with the town of Redding appears in the person of Gurdon Merchant, who was the first town treasurer and held many other offices of local trust and importance. He married Eleanor Chauncey, a sister of Admiral Chauncey and daughter of the first Episcopal minister in Newtown. Joel Merchant was the sixth child of Gurdon and Eleanor Merchant. The first twenty years of his life was passed in dissipation and idleness. After squandering the whole of his patrimony he became disgusted with his mode of life, and making a resolve, as he said, never to return to Redding until he could bring back with him as much money as he had squandered, left his birth-place and went to New Jersey in pursuit of employment. He was so successful as to be able in a short time to return to his native town, his end accomplished.

He then erected the old stone house now standing near Redding Station, and within sight of the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad, fashioning it after the models of the early Dutch settlers which he had seen while laboring to replace his lost fortune in New Jersey.

He married Molly Sanford, daughter of David Sanford, an old Revolutionary soldier. They had eight children, of whom Cortes, the third child, was the eldest son.

Cortes Merchant was born June 9, 1797. His early education was obtained in the public schools which the town afforded; but having drunk to the dregs the cup of knowledge which they offered, he received instruction from the Rev. Daniel Crocher, then resident pastor of the Congregational Church.

Commodore Chauncey (when on a visit to his nephew, Joel Merchant) offered young Cortes, then fifteen years of age, a midshipman's berth on board the admiral's ship. This advantageous offer, though at first accepted, was declined by the young aspirant upon witnessing the excessive grief his mother evinced at parting from her eldest son.

Arrived at manhood, he, in partnership with his brother Orton, erected a factory for the manufacture of woollen goods. But a disastrous fire soon took possession of both building and stock, and the business was discontinued never to be resumed. He married Rebecca Rockwell, daughter of Thomas and Deborah Rockwell, of Ridgebury, Oct. 1, 1828, after which he purchased the farm on Umpawaug, where he resided at the time of his death.

He first figures in public matters in the year 1830, as selectman, which office he continued to hold at intervals, with various others of public trusts and importance, until the year 1866, when he was disqualified by age from office-holding.

He was elected by the Democratic party in 1854 to a seat in the State Senate. While there the Nebraska bill was pending, and he was the only member who cast a negative vote. The Republican Farmer of May 23, 1854, says, "All the members of the Connecticut Senate but five are Whigs. The Hon. Cortes Merchant, who gave the only negative vote, is a Democrat, from Redding, in Fairfield County,—a brave and noble man, we have no doubt. We wish we had the honor of his acquaintance. We would introduce him to another honest and good man who in the Massachusetts House of Representatives, a few years ago, gave the only No in opposition to a series of resolutions in favor of the Wilmot Proviso. The latter is proud of his vote to this day, and Mr. Merchant, we have no doubt, will feel a similar pleasure in reflecting upon the position he has now taken.”—Journal Courier.

“All that the Journal says of Mr. Merchant is true. He is ‘one of the men’ who stand firm when the timid waver in the presence of an unscrupulous majority. Mr. Denning, of Litchfield County, another senator, though not present when the vote was taken, afterwards recorded his name against the nullification doctrines avowed in the resolutions of the majority.”—New Haven Register.

The next year (1855) he was elected a member of the House of Representatives.

In politics he was an active worker and a staunch Democrat. It was his boast that he had never in his life cast any but a Democratic vote, and that he never “scratched” a ticket, however personally obnoxious or incompetent to fill the nomination he might deem the candidate to be.

Personally, we can, without exaggeration, call him a wonderful man. He was one of the few mighty who, step by step, inch by inch, fought and conquered in the battle of life, and, by vanquishing all of the follies and temptations which assail man in this world of ours, lived up to the golden rule. His word, once spoken, carried conviction with it as far as his name was known. He died Nov. 25, 1874, leaving a spotless name and sincerely mourned by all who knew him. He was what the poet Burns very correctly styles “the noblest work of God, an honest man.”

EDWARD MERCHANT.

Edward Merchant was born in the town of Redding, where he resided during a long life, and where he died Sept. 24, 1877, in his seventy-first year.

His father, Joel Merchant, was a farmer, but, besides tilling the soil, he carried on to some extent the manufacture of clothing. Edward Merchant received his education in the district school. He was married April 14, 1839, to Betsey, daughter of Azariah and Sarah (Coley) Andrews, of the town of Redding. The children of this union were Sarah J., Annie, and Elizabeth.

Edward Merchant followed the calling to which he was reared, that of a farmer, through a long and eventful life, enjoying in the fullest the respect of all who knew him.

THADDEUS M. ABBOTT.

Deacon Thaddeus M. Abbott is descended from George Abbott, who came from England, and was one of the first settlers of Norwalk. He was a land-owner, and his name is in the earliest town records of 1653. His will, made in 1689, was recorded March 11, 1690.

Deacon T. M. Abbott was born Sept. 3, 1812, in Redding. He was the youngest of a family of six. His father, also named Thaddeus, a blacksmith by trade, moved to Redding soon after his marriage, in 1788. His wife was Rebecca, daughter of — Marvin, of Norwalk. After thirty years Thaddeus, Sr., turned his attention to farming, which he followed during the remainder of his life. At his father's death, which occurred when he was in his twentieth year, young Abbott had attended only the district and select schools of his town. After the above-mentioned event he taught a district school in Ridgefield one term, and then attended Mr. S. S. St. John's school in Ridgefield for one year, when he taught a term in his native town. This was the last of his teaching, and he again turned his attention to farming.

In 1836 he was married to Miss Mary J. Frost, of Poughkeepsie. Their children have been Frances J. (deceased), Ezra M. (deceased), and Charles M. Soon after his marriage Mr. Abbott entered the mercantile business, in connection with his brother-in-law, E. M. Frost, in Redding. This he followed for five years, leaving it to engage in farming. About this time there occurred one of those incidents which seem to be pure accident, but which tend to shape our lives. Wanting a sleigh of peculiar make, such as he could not procure nor find any one to build, he determined to make one for himself. His first effort did not suit him exactly, and he made another. This was the beginning of a protracted apprenticeship to himself extending over a period of many years.

In politics Mr. Abbott started as a Whig, and by that party was elected to various town offices, besides representing his town in the State Legislature. In 1847 he was appointed to the office of Probate judge, filling it again in 1864, after it became an elective office. In 1852, Mr. Abbott united with the Congregational Church of Redding, his wife joining at the same time. In 1854 he became one of the deacons, which position he has since held.

NASH COUCH.

Nash Couch was born Oct. 17, 1794, in Redding, Fairfield Co., Conn., on the homestead purchased by his ancestors from the Indians. His grandfather, Simon Couch, and his father, Thomas Couch, were both farmers, and quite naturally young Nash was reared to the same pursuit, which he followed throughout a long life.

Nash Couch was married early in life to Polly, daughter of Isaac and Sarah (Morgan) Gorham, of Redding, and the children born to them were Henry, Jane A., and William.

Nash remained with his father, assisting in the tillage of the paternal acres, until the death of the latter, when he came into possession of the same. The district in which the family reside is known as Couch District, from the family. At the age of sixty-five Mr. Couch lost the use of his limbs and remained an invalid the remainder of his life. He was known and respected by his fellow-townsmen as an upright man and good citizen.

HARVEY BASSETT RUMSEY.

Harvey Bassett Rumsey was born in Monticello, Sullivan Co., N. Y., June 11, 1832.

His father, Lewis Rumsey, also a native of Monticello, was a farmer by occupation, was a Whig in politics, as were his ancestors before him, and was prominent in the politics of his town and county. He was married at the age of twenty-five to Nancy Bassett, of his town, but who was a native of Washington Co., N. Y. Their children were Harvey B. and S. Louisa.

The early life of our subject was spent in New York, assisting his father and attending school. He enjoyed educational advantages of the common school and academy, leaving the latter institution at the age of nineteen to go to the Sacramento valley under the following circumstances: His mother's youngest brother went to California among the earliest pioneers to that State. Losing his health in the mines, he was advised to cross the plains to recover it. He went to New Orleans, purchasing there four hundred and fifty head of cattle and about twenty horses. With these he started overland to California. Losing his foreman by drowning, he wrote to his nephew's parents asking that he be allowed to go by steamer and meet him at Sacramento, to assist him on his arrival there with the stock. The nephew, Harvey B., nothing loath, thus found himself, at a very tender age, in the then Eldorado of the world. He remained with his uncle two and a half years, returning only when his presence was imperatively demanded by the condition of affairs at home, caused by his father's death, which had occurred eighteen months before. During his uncle's mining career, he and a partner took from a place called Rattlesnake Bar eighty thousand dollars within a month. Mr. Rumsey resided with his mother until one year after his marriage, after his return from California, when he removed to Redding. He was married Jan. 10, 1867, to Adeline Briggs, daughter of George and Emeline Briggs, of Sherman. Mr. Briggs was a large farmer, and one of the most successful raisers and feeders of cattle in Connecticut. The children of Mr. Rumsey have been Emma and Louie C. Mr. Rumsey resides on what was formerly known as the Dudley Place, a farm of two hundred and sixty-six acres, and devotes himself to cattle-raising, feeding, and farming, also dealing in real estate. He is Republican in politics, and has represented Redding in the Legislature since taking up his residence in the town.

DR. MOSES H. WAKEMAN.

Dr. Moses H. Wakeman is of English descent, and his ancestors were among the earliest settlers of Fairfield and New Haven Counties.

His paternal grandfather, Asahel Wakeman, settled in the parish of Greenfield and followed the vocation of farming.

His maternal grandfather, Nathan Wheeler, also a native of Fairfield, was a militiaman in the Revolution, and was present at the burning of Fairfield. He barely escaped capture by the enemy, who attempted to decoy him by taking off their red coats and calling to him to come towards them, as he could have a better view from where they stood. Mr. Wheeler held the rank of sergeant.

Silas Wakeman, third son of Asahel, was born in 1804, in Fairfield. He was married early in life to Abbey, eldest daughter of Nathan and Clarine (Bradley) Wheeler, of Easton, Fairfield Co. Their children were Moses H., Polley (deceased), Betsey, Clarine (deceased), and Abbey B.

Dr. Moses H. Wakeman, then, was the eldest son, and was born in November, 1829. His childhood and youth were spent on his father's farm, attending district school during the winter months. At the age of seventeen he commenced a course of preparatory studies at the old Easton Academy. These he concluded in about three years, and at the suggestion of his uncle, Dr. Nathan Wheeler, of Patterson, N. Y., entered his office the following spring and began the study of medicine. He remained with his uncle three years, during which period he attended two full courses of lectures at the New Haven Medical College, receiving his diploma from that institution with the degree of M.D. Immediately on his graduation he began practicing with his uncle, and in the fall of that year removed to Milltown, Putnam Co., N. Y., where he practiced four years. On invitation of Dr. Charles Gorham, in the fall of 1858, Dr. Wakeman came to Redding and entered into partnership with him. This copartnership continued until the death of Dr. Gorham, in 1859.

May 31, 1864, Dr. Wakeman was married to Harriet White, youngest daughter of Samuel and Mary (Sanford) Collins, of Redding. The children born to them have been Mary Collins, Henry W. (deceased), and Harriet Wheeler. Mr. Collins was own cousin to Sir Garnet Wolseley, and during the latter years of his life was a merchant in Redding.

WILLIAM BURR HILL.

William Burr Hill was born Jan. 6, 1826, in Redding, Fairfield Co., Conn.

His father, Bradley Hill, was a native of Fairfield, coming to Redding when a very young man. He married Betsey, eldest daughter of Zalmon and Martha (Jackson) Banks, early in life, and the children born to them were Abbey M., William B., Mary E. (deceased), Martha (deceased), Albert B., Arthur B., and Sarah M.

William B., the eldest son, remained with his father until his twenty-eighth year, when he was married to Katy, only daughter of Nathaniel B. and Eunice (Hull) Selleck, of Danbury, after which event he moved on the farm next west of his father's, where he still resides engaged in farming. The children of Mr. and Mrs. William B. Hill are Helen S., Nathaniel B., Celia F., Eunice P., Mary E., and William B.; besides two deceased.

At the age of twenty-one Mr. Hill was elected constable and collector, serving three years, and after an interval of one year was re-elected to the same offices; he was elected justice of the peace for four consecutive years, and in 1864 he was elected to represent his town in the Legislature, and again two years after. In politics he has been Republican since the organization of that party, having previously been a Whig.

DANIEL C. RYDER.

Daniel C. Ryder was born in Redding, Feb. 16, 1819. His grandfather, John Ryder, a native of Danbury, was a carpenter by trade, and at the time of his death was a wealthy landowner. His wife was Mary Jarvis, and their children were nine, of whom Ralph, father of the subject of this sketch, also a carpenter, was the eldest. He was killed at the early age of forty-five, by falling from a building, leaving a large family of small children.

Daniel C. Ryder was the eldest of the family, and upon him devolved the entire support of the family. At the age of eighteen he began farming, which he followed but a short time, and then engaged in the business of lime-burning. This business he followed with varied success for some years, abandoning it finally and giving his whole attention to farming. In 1838 he was married to Charlotte A., youngest daughter of Charles and Sarah (Crane) Prindle, of Roxbury, Conn. Of their children, Charles C. is living in Brooklyn, and is married to Margaret Bennett, daughter of Burr and Sally A. Bennett, of Redding; James J., married to Mary E., daughter of Anson and Huldah Fields, of Redding; Charlotte A.; and Stella (deceased). Mr. Ryder lives on the farm which has been owned and on which have lived three generations of his mother's family named Chapman. His great-grandfather, Daniel Chapman, was a soldier in the Revolution; was at Fairfield during Tryon's invasion; was taken prisoner there and carried to New York and thrust into the prison-ship, where it is supposed he died, as his family never after heard of him. Daniel C. Ryder inherited the homestead from his grandfather, Daniel Chapman, having lived with him for many years previous to his death. Mr. Ryder has always been a Democrat, representing his town in the Legislature in 1849. He is a regular attendant at the Congregational Church of Redding, a member of its society, and contributes liberally to the support of the church.

EBENEZER F. FOSTER.

Ebenezer F. Foster was born in Ridgefield, Fairfield Co., Conn., March 8, 1826. His father, Jonah Foster, was a clothier, and followed his calling in his native town of Ridgefield. His wife was Timothy and Elizabeth (Whitney) Hunt's daughter Sally, and by her he had the following children: Mary, Elizabeth, Ebenezer F., Susan, Esther A., Joel G., John B. (deceased), Timothy H., and Martin W.

The youthful days of E. F. Foster were spent in Ridgefield, at the common school, at which place he laid the foundation of that education which found its superstructure in the school of the world. At the age of seventeen he went to learn the wheelwright trade of one Sunderland, of Sommerstown, N. Y. Here he remained three years, and then went to work for George Crofutt, of Danbury, in the same business, remaining with the latter gentleman more or less steadily for eight years, going thence to Birmingham, into the employ of the iron company of that place.

The next event in our subject's life was his marriage, in 1852, to Harriet, only daughter of David and Elizabeth (Keeler) Platt, of Redding. Mr. Foster, after his marriage, took up his residence in Redding, where he has since continued to live engaged in farming. In politics he is a Democrat, and has often been called to fill town offices. In 1871 he was elected to the Legislature, where he served with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of his constituents, and in 1874 he was elected county commissioner for three years.

RIDGEFIELD lies on the west border of the county of Fairfield, and is bounded as follows: On the north by the town of Danbury; on the east by the towns of Danbury and Redding; on the south by the town of Wilton and the county of Westchester, N. Y.; and on the west by Westchester and Putnam Counties, in the State of New York. Its surface is diversified by hills and valleys, and the soil is fertile.

ORIGINAL NAME.

Prior to 1708 the territory embraced within the present bounds of the town of Ridgefield was in the undisputed possession of the red man, and called by him Candatowa, meaning "high land."

In May of that year (1708) a petition was presented to the General Assembly by a number of the inhabitants of the town of Norwalk for the purchase of these lands. The petitioners asked "liberty to purchase of the Indians a certain tract of land bounded south on Norwalk bounds, north-east in Danbury, and west upon York-line."

The General Assembly granted the prayer of the petitioners, "provided it doth not prejudice any former grant; this Assembly reserving to themselves a power for the settlement and allotment of the land so to be purchased among the petitioners, and such others as the said General Assembly shall judge meet."

THE FIRST INDIAN DEED.

The tract was purchased for one hundred pounds, and on Sept. 30, 1708, a deed was executed by Catoonah, sachem of the Ramapoo Indians, of which the following is a copy:

"To all people to whom these presents shall Come Greeting, etc. Know ye that I Catoonah Sachem of Ramapoo Indians and Associates within her Majesties province of New York in America. THE SETTLEMENT.—NAMES OF PIONEERS.

The preliminary steps having now been taken, the pioneers were next to decide upon the location of their future home; and the first settlement was made upon the site of the present village of Ridgefield. A street running east and west, with the generous dimensions of six rods in width, was at once surveyed along the eastern declivity of the ridge. On either side of this street were located the home-lots, of two and one-half acres each. In the rear of these lots additional lots of five acres were laid out.

In the early days the lottery system was in vogue for almost all purposes of raising money for public improvement. Manufacturing establishments were founded in this way, money raised for churches, etc., and the good people of Ridgefield drew their home-lots in a lottery. In various records in New England it was styled "pitching for land."

ACTS RELATING TO HOME-LOTS.

The following interesting extracts are taken from the town records:

"The several Acts Relating to y^e Home Lots & the addition made to the Same is as followeth.

"Nov 1^o 1708 Voted by said proprietors that a Committee shall be chosen to Lay out the Town Plott.

"At the Said Meeting the said proprietors by a Major Vote appointed and made Chose of M^r Samuel Keeler Senr Matthew Seamer, Joseph Bouton with John Copp to Lay out the Town Plott.

"At the said Meeting Voted by said proprietors that the Home Lots now to be Lay'd out by said Committee shall be Two Acres and one half acre.

"At the said Meeting y^e Said Proprietors by a Major Vote Resolves and agrees that there shall be a Division of Land added to the Rear of the Home Lots to the Number of five acres to Each Division. And the said Committee is Impowered to act their best Skill & Judgement to Equalize the Want of quality by adding or allowing quantity to such Home Lots & Division of Addition as they in judgement may find wanting.

"At a Meeting of the said Proprietors Convened in Norwalk Nov y^e 8th 1708.

"The above said Committee makes a Return of their doings in and about the Home Lots & y^e addition made to y^e Rear of y^e same. With an account of such Disproportion of their quality, that by all that they had done in y^e matter of equalizing them there still needed a further Allowance to some Lots as they were by them Layd out with the Division added to y^e Rear of them.

"Upon which Return made by said Committee The said proprietors at y^e said meeting by a Major Vote Impower said Committee to Regulate that matter according to y^e best of their judgements to add to such Home Lots & Division annexed. Or to any other Division of Lands to be Lay'd out to any such proprietor, to whom such Home Lot with y^e annex Division shall fall to when Drawn, that by said Committee shall be Judged Wanting in quality with the Generality of y^e best of the Home Lots and annex Divisions.

"At a meeting of ye said Proprietors Convened in Norwalk November ye 25 1708, "Voted by Said proprietors that the Lotterie prepared for ye Distribution of the Home Lots with ye anex^t Division, unto the said proprietors Shall at this time be Drawn, Which Lottery is methodized as followeth:

"Beginning on the East Tear of Lots, ye southernmost Lott joining to the Land Lay'd out for a burying Yard Calling that Lott the first in Number, & successively Northward to the 12th Lott and then beginning at ye Northernmost Lott on the West tear numbering said Lott ye thirteenth Lott and so successively Southward to the Twenty fifth Lott.

"The Draught of which Lottery was as followeth.

The following location of the home-lots was made by the Rev. D. W. Teller:

Lot No. 1 was where Mr. John S. Keeler now resides.

No. 2 was immediately north of this, and lying between it and the corner south of Mr. Abraham Holmes'.

Nos. 3 and 4 extended from Mr. Abraham Holmes' to the present residence of Mrs. Mary Hatch.

No. 5 was the one now owned and occupied by Mrs. Irad Hawley.

No. 6 extended from the south side of Mr. Henry E. Hawley's residence to the north side of Mr. Joshua I. King's garden.

No. 7 extended from the north side of Mr. King's garden to the corner of the street north of Mr. Sereno Hurlbutt's residence.

No. 8 was the lot now owned and occupied by Phineas Lounsbury, Esq.

No. 9 is now occupied by Philip L. Barhite, Esq., and Dr. William S. Todd.

No. 10 extended from the fence south of Mrs. Hyatt's house to the fence north of Mr. Sannel J. Barlow.

No. 11 embraced the town-house lot, Mr. L. C. Seymour's house and store, and Mrs. Wescott's house.

No. 12 extended from the residence of the late Josiah Danchy, Esq., to the road north of Mr. Isaac Osborn's.

No. 13 included the present residences of Mr. Henry Mead, Mr. Elijah L. Thomas, and Mr. Keeler Danchy.

Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17 extended from the fence north of the Episcopal church to the corner south of the residence of J. Howard King, Esq.

Nos. 18, 19, 20, 21 extended from the road north of Mrs. Sarah Jewitt's to the one south of Mr. David K. Hoyt's.

Nos. 23, 24, 25 extended from the corner now occupied by the carriage-manufactory of Mr. Ebenezer

Jones to the fence south of the residence of Mr. William Benedict.

It will be observed that lot No. 22 is omitted in this reckoning, the reason for which is found in the fact that it nowhere appears on the town records after it was numbered and drawn. The inference is that it was thrown out, for we find Mr. Joseph Crampton, who drew the lot, located on the land now owned by Mrs. Shaw and Mr. L. O. Northrop.

The next spring, after the division of the home-lots, the proprietors proceeded to divide such parts of the outlying lands as would be most suitable for grazing, plowing, and mowing, sharing equally in each.

The following will show the method of such division:

"At a Meeting of said Proprietors Convened March 1st, 1708^o,

"The proprietors, by a Major Vote do agree upon a Division of Plow Land to be Lay'd out as soon as may be.

"At the said Meeting the Proprietors by a Major Vote have chosen Mr Samuel Keeler Senr Matthias Saint John and Samuel Smith for their Committee—To take a view of what Lands are suitable to Lay out for a Division of Plow Land within the Limits of One Mile and a half from the Center of the Town Platt, and Lay out what Land they so find into such Divisions as the Land will allow according to the number of proprietors."

"At a meeting Convened of said Proprietors March 28th, 1709,

"The said Committee make Return of their Doings on the Land found within ye limits stated in ye Vote passed March the 1st as above said, fixing upon six acres to a Division, and accordingly to their best skill and Judgement have Lay'd out a number of Divisions equal to the number of proprietors, allowing to some Divisions more measure than ye fixt quantity to equalize them with the better Divisions."

It will be observed in every instance that the quality of the land determined the quantity. No home-lot fell below two and one-half acres, but it might consist of three or three and one-half acres if it was deemed of poor quality. So also the five-acre lots in the rear might have five acres or more in them. Then there would be sections of land not reckoned, and these might lie between two divisions, afterwards to be appropriated to some new-comer. This would apply to the outlying lands rather than to the village lots.

In the spring of 1709, on the 22^d of April, Ebenezer Smith, of Milford, by a major vote of the proprietors, was permitted to come in and share equally with the twenty-five. He settled on the lot where George Smith, Esq., now resides. This property has never passed out of the Smith family.

Joseph Benedict, of Norwalk, was admitted in like manner on the 31st of the following October. He settled on the lot lying between Mr. William Benedict's and Mr. L. O. Northrup's, and, as originally designated, between Mr. Samuel Keeleins and Mr. Joseph Crampton's.

THE PIONEER BLACKSMITH.

The pioneers evidently anticipated the necessities of the little settlement, for under date of May 6, 1712, appears the following vote in relation to a blacksmith:

"At a meeting of the Proprietors of Bidgefield at Bidgefield May the 6th v. d. 1712

"The said proprietors by their Major Vote Do Grant to Mr Benjamin Burt now resident of Norwalk, a certain Right of Lands, Reserved by

Two other purchases were subsequently made of the Indians,—one on the 28th of February, 1738, and the other on the 6th of December, 1731,—but they were of lands lying within the limits of the State of New York, on the oblong; and although the deeds are recorded on the town records, they are not deemed of sufficient interest to be given a place here.

The eighth and last purchase of lands by the proprietors of the Indians was made on the 19th of December, 1739. The following is the deed then given:

"Know all men by these presents that we Betty ye mother of Jacob Turkey, Capt Jacob Turkey Mokquaroose, for and in consideration of ye sum of six pounds five shillings money to us in hand paid, or secured to be paid by Lt Eben Smith, Capt Daniel Olmsted, & Matthew Seamore of Ridgefield in ye County of Fairfield and Colony of Connecticut in New England and which is to our full Satisfaction, Do Give Grant Bargain Sell and by these presents Have Given Granted, Bargained Sold and fully confirm unto ye above sd Lt Eben Smith Capt Daniel Olmsted & Matthew Seamore and their associates, and to their heirs & assigns forever a certain parcel or tract of Lands Lying within ye new Patent Bounds Called in ye Township of Ridgefield, as it is Bitted & Bounded on ye east by Danbury Township, north by New Fairfield, on ye west by ye Government Line Southerly by Our former Purchase made of Jacob Turkey. This deed was also signed by other Indians, whose names and marks are fully recorded on the town records.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

Although the early settlers of Ridgefield were a hardy and industrious people, and exerted every effort to improve their store of worldly goods, still it is evident that their task was not any easy one, and that for many years the financial condition of the town was at a low ebb, for, in 1725, we find them petitioning the General Assembly for exemption from taxation, as the following shows:

"The Towns of Ashford, Hebron, Ridgefield, New Town, and New Milford shall proceed to take and make a list of all the polls and ratable estate by their listers, this present year, as other towns in this colony do. And if either of the said towns are destitute of listers as the law directs, to do the work, that then, in such case, such town so destitute shall some time in the month of June next meet together and choose a suitable number of their inhabitants to be listers, who shall be sworn to that office accordingly, who shall take the said list and transmit the same to this Assembly to be holden at New Haven in October next."

The petition exempting them for two years from public taxes was granted, with the provision that the town should draw no money out of the treasury for the schools nor send no representative to the Assembly during the exemption.

At the expiration of the two years they found it necessary to again request the same clemency, which was granted "for the term of two years next to come."

We find no repetition of this request, or anything that would seem to indicate financial depression, until 1749, when Ridgefield, together with Litchfield, was fined and censured for not sending "the sum total of the list of the polls and ratable estates" to the General Assembly. This doubtless may be attributed to neglect rather than financial depression.

The following is the act of the General Assembly:

"Forasmuch as by one law of the colony entitled, An Act directing listers in their duty and office, it is provided that if the listers in the respective towns in this colony shall not annually send the sum total of the list of the polls and ratable estates of the inhabitants of such towns to this Assembly at their sessions in October, such town shall be doomed by this Assembly; and whereas the listers of the Towns of Ridgefield and Litchfield respectively have not sent the sum total of such lists of the polls and ratable estates in the respective terms to the sessions of this Assembly in October last, according as it is in said act provided: this Assembly do sentence and doom the inhabitants of the town of Ridgefield to pay into the public treasury of this colony the sum of twenty-nine pounds fifteen shillings, and the inhabitants of the town of Litchfield the sum of twenty-seven pounds, six shillings, and four pence; and the Treasurer is ordered and directed to send forth his warrant to the constables of the said towns, respectively, to levy and collect the said sums of the inhabitants of the towns to which they belong, and to pay in the same to the public treasury; and the said constables are hereby impowered, respectively, to levy the said sums of the inhabitants, and required to pay in the same to the public treasury, as is by law required in cases where the lists are orderly returned to this Assembly."

THE PERRY FAMILY.

One of the old families of Ridgefield is the Perry family.

Dr. David Perry, son of Micah Perry, of Fairfield, practiced medicine in this town from 1772 to 1822, the time of his death. In 1791 he became ordained and filled the office as rector of St. Stephen's Parish for four years, on horseback with saddle-bags, practicing on week-days and preaching Sundays.

His son, Nehemiah Perry, M.D., succeeded him in the town, and practiced for the term of fifty-five years. His practice was extensive, being a circuit of forty to fifty miles. As a physician and surgeon he was one of the most eminent and skillful of his day, the last ten years of his life being exclusively consultation practice.

His son, the present Nehemiah Perry, M.D., succeeded him, and is the third of his family who have practiced here for the last one hundred and thirty years.

CHAPTER LXIII.

RIDGEFIELD (Continued).

RIDGEFIELD IN THE REVOLUTION.

Extracts from Town Records—Detailed History of the Invasion—The Battle at Ridgefield—Wooster Mortally Wounded—Revolutionary Incidents.

TRYON'S INVASION.

In the beginning of the Revolutionary struggle Ridgefield was inclined to remain true to the British standard, as will be seen by the following resolutions :

"First. Whereas application hath been made to the Select Men of the Town of Ridgefield in Connecticut Colony by several of the inhabitants of s^d Town, to call a Special Town Meeting in order to take into consideration the Resolution Entered into by the Late Continental Congress; and the Inhabitants being accordingly met the 30th day of January A. D. 1775 Mr. Nathan Olmstead was chosen Moderator. The Meeting then proceeded to take into Consideration the said Resolutions, and after mature Deliberation in said meeting the question was put, Whether this Town will adopt and Conform to the Resolves contained in y^e association of the Continental Congress or not. Resolved in the Negative 9 Desent.

"Second. Resolved, N C D That we do acknowledge his Most Sacred Majesty King George the 3^d to be our rightful Sovereign and do hereby publicly avow our allegiance to him & his Lawfull successors—And that we will to the utmost of our power, Support his throne & Dignity against Evry Combination in the Universe.

"Third. Resolved N C D, That we do acknowledge that the three branches of y^e Legislation (to wit) the King, the House of Lords and the House of Commons Convening and acting together have a constitutional Right of Government over the whole and Every part of the British Empire.

"Fourth. Resolved N C D that the Governour Council and Representatives of this Colony being Imbuled with and having an Established Right of Legislation (tho' restricted) in and over this Colony, We do hereby acknowledge & avow their Right of Government and Legislation in and over this Colony And are confident that they are the Rightfull & Constitutional Rulers Directors and Guardians of our persons, properties Rights Liberties and priviledges and We desire no other political Guides or Guardians than Said Assembly and the Officers Constitutionally appointed by them, to keep the peace & Order of y^e Colony and to Superintend the Execution of the Colony Laws.

"Fifth. Resolved N C D That it would be dangerous and hurtfull to the Inhabitants of this Town to adopt the said Congress measures; and we do hereby publicly disapprove of and protest against said Congress and the measures by them directed to as unconstitutional—as subversive of our real Liberties—and as countenancing Licentiousness Resolved N C D That the Town Clerk be directed to make out a true copy of y^e above s^d votes & transmit them to one or more of the printers in New York, that they may be published to the world.

" Test STEPHEN SMITH,
" Register."

"At a Town Meeting held in Ridgefield by adjournment April 10th 1775 from March 7 1775.

"The Question was put Whether y^e Town will Explain their resolves of the 30th of January Lasts, Resolved in the Negative, The above Meeting is dismissed.

" Test STEPHEN SMITH,
" Register."

A CHANGE OF SENTIMENT.

At a town-meeting held Dec. 17, 1775, the following action was taken :

"On Motion made Whether Said Meeting upon Reconsideration do disannul the resolves April 10th entered into and passed on the 30th Jan'y 1775, And adopt and approve of the Continental Congress and the measures Directed to in their association, for securing and Defending the Rights and Liberties of y^e United American Colonies.

" Resolved in the Affirmative Nem Con.

"Said Meeting voted that the Town Clerk make out a Copy of the above, Resolve and transmit the same to one of the printers in New York, in Order that the same may be made public in the News Papers.

" Question put Whether s^d Meeting will choose of a Committee of Inspections agreeably to the 11th article of y^e association of the Continental Congress.

" Resolved in the Affirmative.

"And Samuel Olmsted Esq' Col Philip Burr Bradley Daniel Coley Esq' Jacob Jones Stephen Smith Timothy Keeler, Capt Jonah Foster Nathan Olmsted William Forester, John Benedict James Scott, Ebenezer Jones Abraham Betts, Matthew Keeler, Timothy Benedict Nathan Stevens Samuel Gates David Platt Bartholomew Weed John Jones Daniel Smith, Ichabod Doolittle Abraham Gray Abraham Nash, Silas Hall and Azor Hurlbut were chosen Committee as above said.

" At a Town Meeting held in Ridgefield April 10th 1777 Timothy Keeler was chosen Moderator of said Meeting. Said Meeting by a Major Vote is adjourned to the Meeting House.

" Said Meeting Pursuant to a request and Resolve of the Governour and his Committee of Safety, Chose James Scott Matthew Keeler, Timothy Benedict & Samuel Gates, a Committee to provide for the families of such soldiers as shall enlist into the Continental Army with necessaries at the prices stated by Law.

" Voted also that this Town will give to each man that shall Enlist as a Soldier into the Continental Service (for three years or during the war being an Inhabitant of this Town, till the Quota of the Town to fill the Continental Army be Completed) Six pounds Lawfull money for every Year they are in said Service, to be paid as follows viz Six pounds at the time of their Indlistment.

" The next Six pounds to be paid within the second year & so on Yearly During their Continuance in Service.

The following account of the invasion of Connecticut by the British in 1777 is taken from "Hollister's History of Connecticut."

"Sir William Howe had been informed that the Americans had large depositories of military stores in Danbury and its neighborhood. He determined to destroy them without delay, and in casting about him for a faithful operator in this most invidious of all employments who would be remorseless in the use of the torch he hit readily upon His Excellency Governor Tryon, of New York. He could hardly have made a more admirable selection.

"Howe was a shrewd judge of character, and knew well that nothing so effectually calls out the latent energies of a man of genius as a sudden appeal to old and cherished recollections. Now, there was no part of the world that could awaken in the mind of William Tryon so many lively and searching associations as Connecticut. The name of the little republic made His Excellency's hair bristle with certain sensations that a soldier ought not to entertain. From the time when that irreverent company of Connecticut dragoons had scattered the type belonging to the administration's organ through the streets of New York, and driven one of his pets, Rivington, with hundreds of Tories that were worthy of being elevated to the dignity of governor's horse-guards, he had felt the liveliest emotions at the very sound of the word 'Connecticut.' In some way it was inseparably connected in his mind with that charming society called the 'Sons of Liberty.'

"Gen. Howe showed his shrewdness not only in selecting his agent for this work, but also in sending along with him, to see that he did not lose himself in his explorations into a land that was so dear to him, those excellent advisers, Gen. Agnew and Sir William Erskine. Those gentlemen furnished intellectual resources for the major-general, and he added the warmth of his nature to give soul to the enterprise. Accordingly, a detachment of two thousand men were selected from the choice spirits of the British army, and nominally placed under Tryon's command. They embarked at New York, and, under the convoy of a fine naval armament of twenty-five vessels, passed over the waters of Long Island Sound in such high spirits as the warmth of an April sun and the pleasing anticipations of the business that was to employ them were calculated to inspire. They had chosen a time when Connecticut was almost entirely deserted by her male population, who had gone out to defend the soil of other States and stay up the trailing banner of the noble Washington.

"They had left their homes to be guarded, with the exception of a few gallant troops, by the crutches of the grandfathers and the distaffs of the grandmothers who had two generations of descendants in the field hundreds of miles away. On this account His Excellency, who was the very antipode of Gunpowder Percy, had nothing to dampen his mood or cloud his brow. As the ships skimmed past the coast-towns of Western Connecticut the people gazed at them with mingled curiosity and anxiety. Perhaps some of them called to mind the doings of Wallace, master of the 'Rose,' at Stonington; but no particular alarm appears to have been excited until the heads of the ships began to point towards the island that stands out from the Norwalk shore.

"At about four o'clock they cast anchor in Saugatuck Harbor, and, with such haste as is consistent with a picnic-excursion into the country, two thousand men, consisting of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, went ashore in boats, and under the superintendence of Tryon, with two Tory guides to show them the way, moved forward towards Danbury. They marched about eight miles that night, and encamped in the township of Weston.

"On the morning of the 26th, at a very seasonable hour, Tryon arrived at Redding Ridge, where was a small hamlet of peaceful inhabitants, almost every one of them patriots and most of them farmers, who had crowned the high hill where they had chosen to build their Zion with a tall, gaunt church, which drew to its aisles, one day in seven, the people that dwelt upon the sides of the hills and in the bosom of the valleys within the range of the summons that sounded from its belfry. By way of satisfying his hunger with a morning lunch until he could provide a more substantial meal, he drew up his artillery in front of this weatherbeaten edifice, that had before defied everything save the grace of God and the supplications of his worshipers, and gave it a good round of canister and grape, that pierced its sides through and through and shattered its small-paned windows into fragments. The only spectators to this heroic demonstration were a few women and little children, some of whom ran away at the sight of the red-coats, and others faced the invaders with a menacing stare.

"The British commander now resumed his march for some distance without meeting with the least opposition, until he began to ascend Hoyt's Hill, when the figure of a single mounted horseman appeared upon the summit of the eminence, with his face turned backward, and his gestures and whole action indicating that he was issuing orders to a large army that was climbing the side of the hill. 'Halt!' shouted the leader of the opposition in a voice of thunder, while he flourished his sword in the air, 'Halt, the whole universe! Wheel into kingdoms!' Now, there was nothing that Gen. Tryon had such a dread of as dying. He prudently commanded his men to halt, in imitation of the order given by the leader of the supposed army that was advancing, and sent out detachments on the right and left to reconnoitre, and got his two field-pieces that were consecrated by the mutilation of the old church in readiness to give such feeble battle as he could to this more than Persian array. The reader can judge how much His Excellency was relieved when the videttes returned and informed him that the wretch who had thus disturbed his valor was the only mortal in sight, and that no part of him was visible except his back as he rode towards Danbury with the speed of a shooting-star.

"They arrived in Danbury about two o'clock. There were a few Continental soldiers in the place, but they could not make a stand against this large invading-party, and were obliged to withdraw. Gen. Tryon selected the house of one Dibble, a faithful Tory, for his headquarters, who lived at the south end of the main street, close by the spot where the military stores had been deposited. As Gens. Erskine and Agnew were advancing under the protection of a corps of light infantry to take up their quarters at the other end of the same street, the party was fired upon by four young men from the house of Maj. Starr. This brave but rash act cost the young patriots their lives. They were instantly pursued and shot. A poor negro who was caught near them without weapons in his hands was also murdered, and the five bodies were thrown into the house, which was instantly set on fire.

"A man named Hamilton had on deposit at a clothier's in the lower part of the village a piece of cloth, which he was determined at all hazards to rescue from sequestration. He accordingly rode to the shop, and, having secured one end of the cloth to the pommel of his saddle, galloped rapidly away. He was seen by the enemy's light-horsemen, who followed hard upon him, exclaiming, 'We'll have you, old daddy; we'll have you.'—'Not yet,' said Hamilton as he redoubled his speed. The troops gain upon their intended victim; the nearest one raises his sabre to strike, when fortunately the cloth unrolls, and, fluttering like a streamer far behind, so frightens the pursuing horses that they cannot be brought within striking-distance of the pursued. The chase continues through the whole extent of the village to the bridge, where finally the old gentleman and his cloth made good their escape.

"A large quantity of the public stores had been deposited in the Episcopal church, and the first work of the soldiers was to remove them into the street and burn them. Some of the provisions were also stored in a barn belonging to Dibble. This building was treated with the same respect, as its proprietor had the honor to entertain Gen. Tryon as a guest. Another barn, belonging to a friend of American liberty, which had been appropriated to the same use, was set on fire and consumed with its contents. In a few hours eighteen hundred barrels of pork and beef, seven hundred barrels of flour, two thousand bushels of wheat, rye, oats, and Indian corn, clothing for a regiment of troops, and seventeen hundred and ninety tents were burned. The smoke arising from the destruction of this property was strangulating and filled the whole air, while the streets ran with the melted pork and beef.

"There was also a large quantity of liquors in some of the buildings. These the soldiers were most reluctant to destroy, and did not do so until after they had drunk so freely of them that when the labors of the day were ended only a few hundred were fit for duty. While the imbruted soldiers piled the fuel around the flour and beef and stirred up the laggard flames to a fiercer glare, the women and little children could see by the fitful light the mark of the white cross that had been distinctly drawn upon the Tory dwellings to signify that the destroying angel about to go through the town would stay his hand at their door-posts and pass them by unharmed. The same dingy light now disclosed a scene of loathsome drunkenness that surpasses description. Hundreds lay scattered at random wherever the palsying demon had overtaken them,—some in the streets with their faces blackened with smoke and soiled with earth, others sprawling in the door-yards, and others still, wild with excitement, holding themselves up by fences and trees or grasping fast hold of each other, called loudly with oaths and curses to be led against the rebels.

"In this horrible condition the Revolutionary patriot of Danbury saw the shades of night gather around their dwellings, and in sleepless apprehension did they count the hours as they dragged slowly on. Nor did the brigand who led this band of incendiaries pass the night in sleep. The faithful few who had resisted the temptations of the cup were on the alert, and brought him from time to time the unwelcome intelligence that groups of patriot farmers were fast dropping in from the neighboring villages and towns, and were beginning to form into organized companies. What if Wooster or Parsons or Huntington or Arnold should prove to be at the head of them, and should steal upon him while his troops were in that defenseless condition? The thought was horrible!

"Thus heavily passed the watches of that gloomy Saturday night. At last the day began to approach, and reason, unsettled for a while in the dull brains of the British soldiers, returned to them again. The marks of the late dissipation still appeared in their swollen faces and bloodshot eyes, but they were now able to stand upright, to grasp a musket and defend themselves against the farmers who were gathering, ill-armed and undisciplined as they were, to oppose them. Then the British general began to breathe more easily and to exhibit in a more striking manner the remarkable traits of his genius. He drew up his forces in order of defense; he attended to all the arrangement, and presided over every detail of the preparations that he was making to usher in, with ceremonies worthy of the occasion, another Sabbath-day. On a sudden, as if by the pulling of a wire upon the stage, the curtains of darkness were withdrawn from the village, and like a will-o'-the-wisp, and wandering zigzag from street to street, from house to house, passed the flaming torch of the incendiary. The Congregational meeting-house, the largest and most expensive building in the place, is soon discovered to be on fire, and one after another the dwellings, stores, and barns of that peaceful community add their tributary lamps to that great centre beacon of the town, until every house, save those that have the mystic sign upon them, is in a broad blaze. Meanwhile, by the light of their own homes, mothers, screening their babies from the bleak air with the scanty clothing that they had snatched up in haste and denied to themselves, crippled old men and palsied women, and little boys and girls clinging to their feeble protectors, made such haste as they could to save their lives from the fire, taking care to avoid the jeers of their comfortable Tory neighbors, who looked out from the doors and windows where the white cross glared in mockery alike of God and of humanity, and to shun at the same time the unhalloved contact of the soldiers, they ran, crawled, or were carried upon their beds into lonely lanes, damp pastures, and leafless woods. Having witnessed the destruction of the meeting-house, nineteen dwelling-houses, twenty-two stores and barns, and great quantities of hay and grain that belonged to the inhabitants of the place, and having feasted his eyes with the fear and anguish of the women against whom he waged this glorious war, Maj.-Gen. Tryon, taking a last fond look of the scene of his exploits, and noting doubtless the artistic effect of the faint blue smoke-wreaths as they curled upward to stain the blushing forehead of the morning, withdrew his troops and resumed his march towards the sea-shore. When the invader was fairly out of sight, the poor fugitives from their several hiding-places returned, and, cowering over the charred timbers of the homes that they had fled from, warmed their shivering frames and trembling hands over the ruins of Danbury.

"In the mean time, the news of Tryon's arrival flew along the whole coast. Early on the morning of the 26th, Gen. Silliman with about five hundred militia—such as he had been able to gather upon a sudden call—pursued the enemy, and not long after the venerable Wooster, who had started off at a moment's warning to defend the soil of his native State from insult, joined him with Arnold and another handful of militia. A heavy rain retarded their movements so much that they did not reach Bethel till late at night. It was therefore decided to attack the enemy on their return.

"On the morning of the 27th the American troops were astir at a very early hour. Gen. Wooster detached Gens. Silliman and Arnold, with about five hundred men, to advance and intercept the enemy in front, while he undertook with the remainder, amounting to only two hundred half-armed militia, to attack them in the rear. About nine o'clock he overtook Tryon's army, some three miles above Ridgefield, on the Norwalk road, and, taking advantage of the uneven ground, fell upon a whole regiment with such impetuosity as to throw them into confusion and break their ranks. Before they could be restored to order he had succeeded in taking forty prisoners,—a number equal to one-fifth part of his whole force. He continued to hang upon their skirts and harass them for some time, waiting for another favorable opportunity to make an attack. A few miles from Ridgefield, where the hills appeared to offer a chance of breaking their ranks a second time, he again charged furiously upon them. The rear-guard, chagrined at the result of the former encounter, now faced about, and met him with a discharge of artillery and small-arms.

"His men returned their shot resolutely at first, but, as they were unused to battle, they soon began to fall back. Wooster, uniting all the fire of youth with the experience of an old soldier who had seen hard service in more than one field, sought to inspire them with his own courage. Turning his horse's head and waving his sword, he called out to them in a brisk tone, 'Come on, my boys; never mind such random shots.' Before he had time to turn his face again towards the enemy, a musket-ball aimed by a Tory marksman penetrated his back, breaking the spinal column and lodging in the fleshy parts of his body.

He instantly fell from his horse. His faithful friends stripped his sash from his person and bore him upon it from the field.

"Arnold and Silliman made a forced march to Ridgefield, and arrived there about eleven o'clock. They threw up a temporary barricade across the road on the rising ground, and stationed their little party in such a manner as to cover their right flank by a house and barn, and their left by a ledge of rocks. Here they quietly awaited the enemy. As soon as Agnew and Erskine saw what position the Americans had taken they advanced and received their fire, and, though they sustained considerable loss, they returned it with spirit. The action lasted about ten minutes, when the British gained the ledge of rocks, and the Americans were obliged to retreat. The American officers behaved with great spirit. Arnold was shot at by a whole platoon of soldiers, standing not more than thirty yards from him. His horse was killed under him, but no other ball took effect. Snatching his pistols, he shot dead a soldier who was making up to him to run him through with his bayonet, and thus made his escape. The Americans kept up a scattering fire till nearly night, when Gen. Tryon encamped at Ridgefield. In the morning he set fire to the church, but he probably did not superintend this piece of work himself, as it was so inartistically done that it proved to be a failure. He was more fortunate with four dwelling-houses, which he soon had the satisfaction to see wrapped in flames.

"He now resumed his march, but Arnold followed him up so closely that he soon crossed the Saugatuck River and marched on the east side of it, while the Americans kept pace with him on the left. Thus they advanced, cannonading each other whenever they could find a convenient opportunity. About three o'clock in the afternoon the gallant Col. Deming, with a little party of Continental troops, forded the river where it was about four feet deep, and, unperceived by the enemy, attacked them with desperate violence upon the rear and upon the left flank, pursuing them and keeping up a galling fire that did them very serious harm. Arnold pushed forward towards the mouth of the river, and, drawing his men up in good order upon a hill, opened a heavy fire upon the right flank of the enemy's rear. The Americans could follow them no further on account of the dangerous proximity of the ships. The British troops who were marching in the van immediately embarked, while the centre and rear formed on a hill. While Arnold was discharging his cannon at the boats, and while Deming was plying the major-general in the rear, Col. Lamb, who was from New York, and, of course, one of His Excellency's own subjects, crept with about two hundred men behind a stone wall, and gave him a parting salute at the distance of about one hundred yards.

"Glad enough was Tryon to get aboard his good ship once more, and it is believed that he cherished to his dying day the recollection of his first visit to Connecticut."

Rev. Mr. Tellers says,—

"It would be a matter of interest to many to know just what kind of a report was made of this raid by Gen. Tryon to his superior officers, and through them to the British government.

"In the June number of the Gentleman's Magazine, printed in London in 1777, we have the following:

"Gen. Howe has transmitted to Lord George Germaine the following particulars of a recent successful enterprise for the destruction of stores at the village of Danbury, in Connecticut.

"The troops landed without opposition in the afternoon of the 25th of April, about four miles to the eastward of Newwalk, and twenty miles from Danbury.

"In the afternoon of the 26th the detachment reached Danbury, meeting only small parties of the enemy on their march, but Gen. Tryon having intelligence that the whole force of the country was collecting to take every advantage of the strong ground he was to pass on his return to the shipping, and finding it impossible to procure carriages to bring off any part of the stores, they were effectually destroyed, in the execution of which the village was unavoidably burned.

"On the 27th, in the morning, the troops quitted Danbury, and met with little opposition until they came near to Ridgefield, which was occupied by Gen. Arnold, who had thrown up intrenchments to dispute the passage, while Gen. Wooster hung upon the rear with a separate corps. The village was forced, and the enemy drove back on all sides.

"Gen. Tryon lay that night at Ridgefield, and renewed his march on the morning of the 28th.

"The enemy, having been reinforced with troops and cannon, disputed every advantageous situation, keeping at the same time smaller parties to harass the rear until the general had formed his detachment upon a height within cannon-shot of the shipping, when, the enemy advancing seemingly with an intention to attack him, he ordered the troops to charge their bayonets, which was executed with such impetuosity that the rebels were totally put to flight, and the detachment embarked without further molestation.

"Return of the forces, ordnance, provisions, etc., as nearly as could be ascertained, found at the rebels' stores, and destroyed by the King's troops, at Danbury, etc., in Connecticut, April 27, 1777:

"A quantity of ordnance stores, with iron, etc., four thousand barrels of beef and pork, one thousand barrels of flour, one hundred large tierces of biscuit, eighty-nine barrels of rice, one hundred and twenty pouches of rum.

"Several large stores of wheat, oats, and Indian corn, in bulk the quantity thereof could not possibly be ascertained, thirty pipes of wine, one hundred hog-heads of sugar, fifty hog-heads of molasses, twenty casks of coffee, fifteen large casks filled with medicine of all kinds, ten barrels of saltpetre, one thousand and twenty tents and marquees, a large quantity of hospital bedding, etc.; engineers', pioneers', and carpenters' tools; a printing-press complete; tar, tallow, etc.; five thousand pairs of shoes and stockings.

"At a mill (Smith's mill) between Ridgebury and Ridgefield, 100 barrels of flour and a quantity of Indian corn.

"At the bridge at the west base of Norwalk River, and in the woods contiguous: 100 hog-heads of rum, several chests of arms; paper cartridges; field forges; 300 tents.

"Return of the killed, wounded, and missing:

"One drummer and fifer, 23 rank and file, killed; 3 field officers, 6 captains, 3 subalterns, 9 sergeants, 92 rank and file, wounded; one drummer and fifer, 27 rank and file missing.

"(Signed)

W. H. W.

"The following is an additional list of the wounded:

"Capt. Thorne, Capt. Burdick, Lieut. Hastings, Major Conran, Capt. Rutherford, Ensign Menchen, Second Lieut. Price, Volunteer Vale, Major Hope, Capt. Calder, Ensign Mercer, Prince of Wales, American volunteer, Col. Browne, Capt. Lyman, Capt. Secon, and Capt. Simon Frazer.

"Return of the rebels killed: General Wooster, Gen. Gould, Col. Lank, of the Artillery, Col. Herman, Dr. Atwater, a man of considerable influence, Capt. Cove, Lieut. Thompson, and 100 privates.

"List of rebel wounded: Col. Whiting, Capt. Benjamin, Lieut. Cove, and 250 privates.

"Taken prisoners, 50 privates, including several committee men."

REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENTS *

"There is a prevailing impression among the inhabitants of the town that Gen. Wooster's forces first attacked the rear of Gen. Tryon's army on the flat immediately north of Mr. Lewis C. Hunt's house. Facts will not justify this opinion. Gen. Wooster made his first attack on the enemy after they had ascended the hill commonly known as Scott's Ridge, and probably while a part were still engaged at their morning meal, for it was at this point that Tryon's army breakfasted.

"The battle was fought immediately north of Mr. Samuel Scott's house, and in front of the school-house. It was here that Gen. Wooster took forty prisoners, and it was doubtless here that the two Hessian soldiers were mortally wounded who died on their way to the village and were hastily buried in the sand-knoll north of Mr. Zalmon Main's.

"After securing and disposing of the prisoners taken, Gen. Wooster again overtook the British on the flat north of Mr. Lewis C. Hunt's, and about two miles north of the village of Ridgefield.

"It was here that the gallant general was wounded, at the very beginning of the engagement. Indeed, tradition says that Gen. Wooster was wounded by a Tory in ambush, and not by the enemy proper; however this may be, it is certain that the attack had but just commenced. We are not able to learn that a single life was lost.

"About this time in the morning, Gen. Arnold arrived at Ridgefield with five hundred men, and began at once to throw up a barricade across the road at the north end of the village, between the northwest corner of Miss Sarah Stebbins' door-yard and the ledge of rocks upon which the house of Mr. William Lee now stands. This was about eleven o'clock in the morning. An hour later, or at twelve o'clock, Gen. Tryon had reached the place, and a general engagement took place.

"An eye-witness says that sixteen British and eight Americans were killed in this engagement, and that they were buried in two graves near the hickory-tree which now stands just inside the fence, east of the road, in the open lot between Miss Sarah Stebbins' and Mr. Abner Gilbert's. The sixteen British were buried in one grave, and the eight Americans in another.

"The wounded were taken into the house now occupied by Miss Sarah Stebbins and tenderly cared for. The blood-stains are said to be still seen on the oaken floors. The house itself is a standing monument to the battle. The path of one or more cannon-balls is plainly traced.

"The bravery of Gen. Arnold in this engagement amounted almost to recklessness. After the enemy had broken through the temporary barricade, and all his own soldiers except Capt. Bell had deserted him, he still stood his ground, receiving the undivided fire of a whole company of the enemy.

"His horse fell under him, pierced by nine bullets, and at the moment of its fall his foot became entangled in the stirrup. A soldier, taking advantage of this moment of the general's disability, rushed up to him, exclaiming, 'You are my prisoner!'—'Not yet,' quickly replied Gen. Arnold, and, drawing a pistol from his holster, shot him dead; then, regaining his feet, he hastily retreated amid the repeated fire of the enemy. It is commonly reported that it was a Tory from Milford by the name of Coon who thus attempted to take Gen. Arnold prisoner, as also that Gen. Arnold said as the bullet sped on its fatal mission, 'One live man is worth ten dead ones.'

"Immediately after this action the British marched through the street, occasionally discharging their artillery, a terror to all but a few Tories, who felt that the long-delayed moment of their exaltation had come.

"Halting a little below the village, they proceeded to encamp for the night on the grounds of Mr. Samuel Olmsted, now owned and occupied by Mr. Hiram Seymour, a descendant of the family.

"The selectmen of the town, in their petition to the General Assembly dated May 26, 1777, stated that the enemy, in passing through the town, burned the grist-mill and saw-mill of Isaac Keeler, six dwellings, and two barns, and killed and carried off a number of horses, sheep, and cattle.

"During their stay they also plundered the inhabitants of nearly all their provisions and a large share of their clothing, by which many were reduced to poverty. The town, unable to relieve all the sufferers, applied to General Assembly for help. Nehemiah Beardsley, Increase Mosely, and Lemuel Sanford were appointed a committee to estimate the respective losses of the inhabitants. After a close investigation, the total amount was fixed at £2625 1s. 8d.

"On the exact spot where Gen. Arnold's horse was shot from under him a tamarack-tree now stands; it was placed there to commemorate the event. It is inside Mr. Lee's yard-fence, a little southeast of his house.

"On their way down the street the British soldiers planted a gun in front of the Episcopal church, and shot several balls into the house now owned and occupied by Mr. Abijah Resseguie, one of which was lodged in a post on the northeast corner, and is still to be seen imbedded deeply in the solid wood. Another ball passed between the feet of a man who at the time was ascending the stairs. Frightened by the close proximity of the unwelcome messenger, he exclaimed, 'I'm a dead man, I'm a dead man!' and tradition says that he actually rolled to the foot of the stairs. But upon examination it was found that he was not only not dead, but wholly unharmed. The reason for cannonading this particular house was to dislodge certain parties who were reported to be in the building making cartridges. The house was occupied by Mr. Timothy Keeler, a sturdy Federalist.

"The house a few rods south, on the site of the one now owned by Mr. Thaddeus Keeler, was then occupied by a loyalist by the name of Hoyt. It was through his interposition with Gen. Tryon that Mr. Keeler's house was rescued from the torch of the incendiary, the reason for it being attributed to purely selfish motives. The wind was blowing strongly from the northwest, and his own house would be greatly endangered.

"The story is told that Mr. Keeler's house was actually set on fire after he had retreated to the woods, and that Mr. Hoyt, fearing the effect of the fire on his own buildings, obtained permission from the British officers to extinguish the flames. After the enemy had left, Mr. Keeler, returning from the woods, was met by Mr. Hoyt, who greeted him with the exclamation, 'You may thank me that your house was not destroyed.'—'No, sir,' replied Keeler: 'I will not thank a Tory for anything. I would rather thank the Lord for the north wind.'

"Following close in the wake of the left wing of the enemy was a company of half-grown boys, Ebenezer Jones, the son of Capt. Jones, of the number. Coming up to a large rock standing on an eminence in a field now owned by Mr. David Hoyt, a little southeast of Mr. Henry Benedict's, they found a British soldier who had been mortally wounded. Young Jones returned home and related the circumstance to his father, who, in humanity to a fallen foe, saddled his horse, rode down to the spot, and brought the wounded soldier to his own house, where he was carefully nursed until he died. Then Mr. Jones with his own hands made for him a pine coffin, and buried him in the old yard east of Mr. Joel Benjamin's barn.

"Four of the six houses at this time burned by the enemy were as follows,—viz., the house of Isaac Keeler, near Mamasquag Pond; a house on the High Ridge north of Mr. W. O. Seymour's; the house of Benjamin Northrop, a short distance south of Mr. George Haight's, on the opposite side of the road; and a building used by the British for the care of their wounded over-night, previously occupied by Mr. Thomas Seymour. This house stood on the south side of the fair-ground, now owned by the Agricultural Society. The two buildings on High Ridge were probably burned in the evening, the one near Mamasquag Lake in the early part of the day, and the fourth—that on the present fair-ground—on the morning of their departure. The well standing near the house they filled with stones, which have never been removed. Their object in filling this well is not known. It may have been owing to the supposition that valuables were secreted there, or it may have been, as some suppose, that their own dead were thrown in it. This last supposition, however, is scarcely probable, for they are known to have buried those who had died during the night in the upper part of Flat Rock woods.

"Among those who witnessed this engagement between Gen. Tryon's forces and our own at the head of Ridgfield Street was a young man scarcely seventeen years of age, by the name of Jeremiah Keeler. The scene aroused all the patriotic fire within his soul, and determined his course for the future. At the solicitation of Col. Bradley he eagerly enlisted in the regular army, and by his courage and fidelity reflected great credit upon his native town. With the Connecticut line he shared the fatigues and dangers of the three memorable years that immediately followed; shortly after which, being selected by Baron Steuben, he joined the light infantry commanded by Gen. De la Fayette, under whom he held the post of orderly sergeant. He was frequently appointed to execute difficult and responsible duties; and on an occasion of this kind the marquis presented him with a sword and his thanks as a testimonial of his regard for a faithful and courageous soldier. At the memorable siege of Yorktown, when La Fayette's brigade was employed to storm one of the British forts, Sergt. Keeler was one of the first who in the midst of a murderous fire scaled the breastworks and compelled the enemy to yield. He witnessed the surrender of Cornwallis, which virtually terminated the war, but he remained faithfully at his post until the disbanding of the forces, in 1783. He was mustered out of the service in Virginia, and soon after, with the sword which Gen. La Fayette gave him, for a cane, he walked back to his native town. This sword is still to be seen at his late home in South Salem, N. Y., just over the State line. Mr. Keeler died February, 1853, aged nearly ninety-three years.

"The year following this incursion of the enemy, Gen. Putnam was ordered into this part of the State, just across the Redding line, for the winter, and fears of further invasions all subsided. An incident of his stay we allude to for the purpose of presenting a picture of army-life in that early day, as well as of correcting what seems to be a wrong statement:

"It was late in the autumn of 1778 when Gen. Putnam removed his army from White Plains and Peekskill to Redding, at which place he was to establish his headquarters for the winter. The position thus selected was in many respects an advantageous one. He was enabled to cover the country adjoining the Sound and the southwestern frontier, and at the same time to support the garrison at West Point, if necessary. The house which he occupied as his headquarters is still standing, although in a dilapidated condition, and is situated on the old Danbury and Norwalk road, about three miles west of the Congregational church, and is now owned by Mr. Meeker. The northeast room of the same house was also at one time occupied by Joel Barlow, LL.D., who was a native of this town. It was in this room that most of his poetry was written.

"Gen. Putnam had at this time under his orders Gen. Poor's New Hampshire brigade, two brigades of Connecticut troops, the corps of infantry commanded by Col. Hazen, and the corps of cavalry under Col. Sheldon.

"It was while at Redding that the soldiers suffering from the want of proper food and clothing were so strongly tempted to rebel against the authority of their commanding officers and, if necessary, at the point of the bayonet demand of General Assembly what they esteemed their rights.

"We must remember that they were not soldiers by profession; they were simply citizens armed for the defense of their country. They had known and appreciated the endearments of home and all the domestic enjoyments of life. They were men who had been always accustomed to think independently and speak out their thoughts without fear or favor. Therefore they were restless under the iron discipline of the camp and the privations which seemed to them needlessly severe. They were ready to suffer and die, if need be, for their country; there was no lack of courage or patriotism. No thought of insubordination probably ever entered their minds when actually engaged in battle or in the active duties of military life, but now their time was passing in comparative idleness, and they had abundant leisure to brood over their privations and their gloomy prospects. And, as if to fill to overflowing their cup of bitterness, they had thus far been paid off in the depreciated currency of the times, which had proven almost worthless not alone to them, but to their families, left in straitened circumstances behind them.

"It was under such circumstances that the Connecticut brigades formed the design of marching to Hartford, where the Legislature was then sitting, and demand redress. One of the brigades was actually under arms for this purpose when the news for the first reached the ears of Gen. Putnam. Springing into his saddle, he rode to the cantonment, and thus addressed them: 'My brave lads, whither are you going? Do you intend to desert your officers, and to invite the enemy to follow you into the country? Whose cause have you been fighting and suffering so long in? Is it not your own? Have you no property, no parents, wives, or children? You have behaved like men so far; all the world is full of your praises; and posterity will stand astonished at your deeds, but not if you spoil all at last. Don't you consider how much the country is distressed by the war, and that your officers have not been any better paid than yourselves? But we all expect better times, and that the country will do us ample justice. Let us stand by one another, then, and fight it out like brave soldiers. Think what a shame it would be for Connecticut men to run away from their officers?'

"Each regiment received the general with the usual salutations as he rode along the lines. When he had concluded his address he directed the acting major of brigade to give the word for them to shoulder arms, to march to their regimental parades, and there to lodge their guns. They obeyed with promptness and apparent good-humor. A single soldier only who had been most active in the affair was confined in the quarter-guard, and was shot dead by the sentinel while attempting to escape during the succeeding night.

"During Putnam's stay at Redding two persons were executed,—one a soldier, by the name of Smith, who was shot for desertion; the other a Mr. Jones, of Ridgefield, a royalist, who was hung as a spy: both suffered on the same day. These executions took place on Gallows Hill, a mile or more from Gen. Putnam's headquarters.

"The scene as described by Mr. Barber in his 'Historical Collections' is revolting to every feeling of humanity and degrading to the character of the general in command. He says (page 399), 'The man on whom the duty of hangman devolved left the camp, and on the day of execution could not be found. A couple of boys about the age of twelve years were ordered by Gen. Putnam to perform the duties of the absconding hangman. The gallows was about twenty feet from the ground. Jones was compelled to ascend the ladder, and the rope around his neck was attached to the cross-beam. Gen. Putnam then ordered Jones to jump from the ladder. "No, Gen. Putnam," said Jones, "I am innocent of the crime laid to my charge; I shall not do it." Putnam then ordered the boys before mentioned to turn the ladder over. The boys were deeply affected by the trying scene; they cried and sobbed loudly, and earnestly entreated to be excused from doing anything on this distressing occasion. Putnam, drawing his sword, ordered them forward, and compelled them at the sword's point to obey his orders. The soldier that was shot for desertion was but a youth of sixteen or seventeen years of age. Three balls were shot through his breast; he fell on his face, but immediately turned over on his back; a soldier then advanced, and, putting the muzzle of his gun near the convulsive body of the youth, discharged its contents into his forehead. The body was then taken up and put into a coffin. The soldiers had fired their pieces so near that they set the boy's clothing on fire, which continued burning. An officer with a drawn sword stood by, while every soldier of the three brigades which were out on the occasion was ordered to march by and look at the mangled remains.'

"Mr. Barber says, in a foot-note, that the particulars of the execution of these two persons were derived from an aged inhabitant of Redding who was present on the occasion, and stood but a few feet from Jones when he was executed.

"Mr. Hollister, however, in his 'History of Connecticut,' does not credit the account given by Mr. Barber. The following note, taken from vol. ii., page 375, will explain itself:

"The Rev. Nathaniel Bartlett, who was pastor of the Congregational Church in Redding for a period of fifty years, officiated as chaplain to the encampment during the winter, and was present at the execution. He interceded with Gen. Putnam to defer the execution of Smith until Washington could be consulted, the offender being a youth of seventeen years; but the commander assured him that a reprieve could not be granted.

"Mr. Bartlett was an earnest and fearless Whig, and openly talked and preached "rebellion," so much so that the Tories, who were numerous in the eastern part of the town, threatened to hang him if they could catch him. In consequence of these threats, he often carried a loaded musket with him when on his parochial visits. His son and successor in the ministry at Redding—the Rev. Jonathan Bartlett, now (1850) in his ninety-first year—well remembers the Revolutionary encampment at Redding, and frequently visited it. He is sure that the story in Barber's "Historical Collections" about Putnam's inhumanity at the execution of Smith and Jones is incorrect. Though not present himself, he has often heard his father relate the incidents of the occasion; and, furthermore, he once called the attention of Col. Ashbel Salmon (who died in 1848, aged ninety-one), who was a sergeant in attendance upon the execution, to the statement, and he declared that nothing of the kind took place."

"As further evidence of the incorrectness of Mr. Barber's statement, we would offer the following extract from the notes of a sermon preached in the Congregational church in Green's Farms by Rev. Thomas F. Davies (father of the present Dr. Davies, of Philadelphia), on March 29, 1839.

"Referring to this matter as related by Mr. Barber, he says,—

"Mr. Barber must have been mis-informed. Redding is my native town, and from my boyhood I have heard the history of the proceedings on the occasion referred to, and was much surprised at the statements in the "Historical Collections." The Rev. Mr. Bartlett, whose father was chaplain on that occasion, informs me that Gen. Putnam could not have been guilty of the acts there charged.

"That Mr. Barber may have something to substitute for the narrative to which I object, I give the following. When Gen. Putnam occupied the house of which Mr. Barber has given an engraving a scene occurred which presents the general in a very amiable light. A poor man with a family needing support, and who lived in the neighboring town of Ridgefield, was told by one acquainted with his wants that if he would visit Gen. Putnam and hold a conversation with him, he would, on his return and on proof of the fact, give him a bushel of wheat. The temptation in that time of scarcity and taxes was great, and so also was the fear of intruding upon so distinguished an individual, but the stern necessities of his condition at length induced the poor man to venture. He accordingly presented himself at headquarters and requested the servant to solicit for him an interview with the general. Putnam promptly summoned the man to his presence, directed him to be seated, and listened with interest while the man, with great trepidation, gave the statement which accounted for the liberty he had taken. The general directed the servant to bring some wine, conversed for a time very pleasantly with his needy visitor, and then, calling for pen and ink, wrote a certificate, in which he gave the name of the individual and stated that he had visited and conversed with Gen. Putnam, who signed it in his official character. Thus furnished with the means of giving bread to his family, the distressed individual returned to his humble roof; and this anecdote, which I have on the very best authority, is proof that Putnam was not destitute of those kind and gentle affections which are so desirable an ornament of the most heroic character."

"Among the most familiar names in the town a half-century ago was that of Gen. Joshua King. He was the father of the present Hon. Joshua I. King, who in 1849 represented the Eleventh District in the State Senate, and of the late Rufus H. King, a well-known merchant of Albany.

"When Gen. King was but seventeen years of age he enlisted in the regular army, and served with great bravery and fidelity until the close of the war.

"At the time of Maj. Andre's capture, Gen. King (then lieutenant in the Second Regiment of Light Dragoons, under Col. Sheldon) was stationed in South Salem. The house which was occupied by Lieut. King, and which has been but recently removed, stood about one mile north of the Presbyterian church.

"The morning after the capture of Andre he was brought to Lieut. King's quarters. Lieut. King was at the moment being shaved. After his valet had finished the operation and had dressed his hair, Lieut. King turned to his prisoner and politely inquired if like services would not also be agreeable to him. Lieut. King did not at the time recognize in Maj. Andre so distinguished a personage, but was nevertheless impressed with the belief that, whatever his rank as a soldier might be, he was at all events a gentleman. His dusty and somewhat rusty garments, his soiled and travel-stained linen, could not effectually hide those distinctive marks which always betray refinement and culture.

"Maj. Andre readily accepted the kind offer, and was soon under the careful manipulations of the valet. As soon as the powder began to fly from the prisoner's hair the lieutenant was convinced that he was by no means an ordinary man.

"After being shaved and having his hair dressed, he courteously asked the privilege of retiring to his bed, that he might have his soiled linen washed. Lieut. King assured him that such a step would be unnecessary, as he himself would supply him with whatever change he might desire. The major, with many expressions of gratitude, availed himself of the lieutenant's hospitality, and soon appeared in a much improved condition. The most friendly relations consistent with their respective positions at once sprang up between the two; they walked and talked as inclined, and at night occupied the same bed.

"The lieutenant and two of his men were detailed to convey Maj. Andre to headquarters. While on their way a dispatch informed Lieut. King for the first who his illustrious prisoner was,—that he was no less a personage than the adjutant-general of the British army; that he was suspected of being a spy and holding a treasonable correspondence with Arnold for the surrender of West Point. So soon as the message was received, Maj. Andre eagerly inquired whether Arnold had actually succeeded in making his escape, evincing, seemingly, more interest in Arnold's safety than in his own.

"After they arrived at headquarters, Lieut. King's relations with the prisoner were no less intimate; although closely confined, he remained with him till his execution, even walking with him to the gallows.

"In relating the circumstances afterwards to a friend, Gen. King said that when Andre first caught sight of the fatal gibbet he gave a sudden start, and exclaimed, 'I am reconciled to death, but not to the mode,' and added, 'it will be but a momentary pang.'

"On arriving at the spot the brave and accomplished young officer mounted the cart, adjusted the rope to his neck with his own hands, and paid the penalty of his unsuccessful espionage.

"In the year 1817, Gen. King was written to by a friend who desired to know the exact facts in relation to Maj. Andre's capture, etc. The following letter was written by Gen. King in reply, and, although previously solicited for publication, is now for the first given to the public:

"RIDGEFIELD, June 17th, 1817.

"DEAR SIR: Yours of the 9th is before me. I have noted the contents and am sorry to express the indignation I feel at the idea of being obliged to translate a foreign language to obtain a true history of any part of our Revolution. The facts, so far as I am acquainted with them, I will state to the best of my ability or recollection. Paulding, Williams, and Van Wort I never saw before, or since, that event. I know nothing about them. The time and place where they stopped Major Andre seems to justify the character you have drawn of them. The truth is, to the impropriety of the man, and not the patriotism of any one, is to be ascribed the capture of Major Andre. I was the first and only officer who had charge of him whilst at the Headquarters of the 2^d Regiment of Light Dragoons, which was then at Esquire Gilbert's in South Salem. He was brought up by an adjutant and four men belonging to the Connecticut militia under the command of Lieut-Col. Jamison from the lines near Tarrytown, a character under the disguised name of John Anderson. He looked somewhat like a reduced gentleman. His small clothes were nankin, with long white top boots, in part, his dress military suit. His coat purple, with gold lace, worn somewhat threadbare, with a small brimmed tarnished beaver on his head. He wore his hair in a queue with long, black band and his clothes somewhat dirty. In this garb I took charge of him. After breakfast my Barber came in to dress me—after which, I requested him to undergo the same operation, which he did.

"When the ribbon was taken from his hair, I observed it full of powder. This circumstance, with others that occurred, induced me to believe I had no ordinary person in charge.

"He requested permission to take the bed, whilst his shirt and small clothes could be washed. I told him, that was needless, for a change was at his service,—which he accepted.

"We were close pent up in a bedroom with a guard at the door and window. There was a spacious yard before the door, which he desired he might be permitted to walk in with me. I accordingly disposed of my guard in such a manner as to prevent an escape. While walking together, he observed, he must make a confidant of somebody and he knew not a more proper person than myself, as I had appeared to befriend a stranger in distress. After settling the point between ourselves, he told me who he was, and gave me a short account of himself from the time he was taken at St. Johns in 1775 to that time. He requested pen and ink and wrote immediately to Genl Washington, declaring who he was. About midnight the express returned with orders from Genl Washington to Col Sheldon to send Major Andre immediately to Headquarters.

"I started with him and before I got to North Salem meeting-house met another express with a letter directed to the Officer who had Major Andre in charge, and which letter directed a circuitous route to Headquarters for fear of recapture, and gave an account of Arnold's desertion &c.—with directions to forward the letter to Col Sheldon. I did so, and before I got to the end of my journey, I was joined by Captain Hoodgers first, and after by Major Talmadge and Captain Rogers. Having given you this clue, I proceed with the major's own story. He said he came up the North river in the sloop of war Vulture for the purpose of seeing a person by flag of truce. That was not however accomplished. Of course he had to come ashore in a skiff, and after he had done his business, the wind was so high, the Dutchman who took him ashore dare not venture to return him on board. The night following the militia had lined the shore, so that no attempt would be made with safety, consequently he was furnished, after changing his clothes, with a continental horse and General Arnold's pass and was to take a route by Peekskill, Crumpond, Phesbridge, Sing Sing, Tarrytown, &c to New York.

"Nothing occurred to disturb him on his route until he arrived at the last place, except at Crumpond. He told me, his hair stood erect and his heart was in his mouth on meeting Col Samuel D. Webb of our army plump in the face. An acquaintance of his said that Col Stedder knew him and he thought that he was gone but they kept moving along and soon passed each other. He then thought himself past all langer and while ruminating on his good luck and hairbreadth escapes he was assailed by three bushmen near Tarrytown, who ordered him to stand. He said to them, "I hope gentlemen you belong to the lower party."—"We do," says one.—"So do I," says he, "and by the token of this ring and key you will let me pass. I am a British officer on business of importance and must not be detained." One of them took his watch from him and then ordered him to dismount. The moment that was done, he said he found he was mistaken, he must shift his tone. He says, "I am happy gentlemen to find I am mistaken—you belong to the upper party and so do I,—and to convince you of it here is Genl Arnold's pass," handing it to them. "Damn Arnold's pass," said they. "You said you were a British officer. Where is your money?"—"Gentlemen I have none about me," he replied.—"You a British officer with a gold watch and no money! let us search him!" They did so, but found none. Says one, "He has got his money in his boots, lets have them off and see." They took off his boots and there they found his papers, but no money. They then examined his saddle, but found none. He said he saw they had such a thirst for money, he would put them in the way to get it, if they would be directed by him. He asked them to name their sum to deliver him at King'sbridge. They answered him in this way, "If we deliver you at King'sbridge, we shall be sent to the sugar-house and you will save your money." He says, "If you will not trust my honor, two of you may stay with me and one shall go with the letter I will write, name your sum." The sum was agreed upon, but I cannot recollect whether it was 500 or 1000 guineas but the latter, I think, was the sum. They held a consultation a considerable time and finally they told him if he wrote, a party would be sent out and take them and then they should all be prisoners. They said they had concluded to take him to the commanding officer on the lines. They did so and retained the watch until Genl Washington sent for them to Tappan, when the watch was restored to Maj. Andre. Thus, you see, had money been at command, after the imprudent conclusion of Maj. Andre, or any security given that the British would have put confidence in, he might have passed on to Sir Henry Clinton's Headquarters with all his papers and Arnold's pass into the bargain. I do not recollect to have seen a true statement of this business in any history that has fallen into my hands. If my memory serves me, Arnold solicited and obtained the command of West Point in consequence of his being an invalid and the reason why his negotiation was not completed by flag of truce, I will state what Genl Washington told the French ambassador, Lucerne. He stated on his route to Hartford, that he dined with Genl Arnold at Haverstraw at Joshua Smith's, where Arnold and Andre met. Genl Arnold showed him a letter from Genl Robinson directed to Genl Israel Putnam, or Officer commanding West Point requesting an interview by flag on business of the first importance to the United States. Genl Arnold asked Genl Washington if he should go and hear what he had to say, Genl Washington replied that it would be very improper for the Commander in chief of a post to meet anybody himself—he could send a trusty hand if he thought proper. But, he added, I had no more suspicion of Arnold than I had of myself. This accounts for Maj. Andre's failure to negotiate by flag and his subsequent movements. I have thus complied with your request, giving you such facts, viz, what I had from the mouth of Maj. Andre and what I heard Genl Washington tell the French minister soon after the execution of Andre.

"J. Howard King, Esq., has in his possession the chair used by Maj. Andre while a prisoner in the hands of his grandfather, Gen. Joshua King. Maj. Andre in all probability occupied the chair when he penned his celebrated letter to Washington, for by reference to Irving's 'Life of Washington' it will be seen that this letter was written while at South Salem. Then it was that he was for the first made acquainted with the fact that the papers found secreted in his boots had been forwarded to Gen. Washington.

"He immediately sat down and wrote the following lines:

"I beg your Excellency will be persuaded that no alteration in the temper of my mind or apprehensions for my safety induces me to take the step of addressing you; but that it is to secure myself from the imputation of having assumed a mean character for treacherous purposes, or self-interest. It is to vindicate my fame that I speak, and not to solicit security.

"The person in your possession is Maj. John Andre, adjutant-general of the British army.

"The influence of one commander in the army of his adversary is an advantage taken in war. A correspondence for this purpose I held, as confidential (in the present instance) with his Excellency Sir Henry Clinton. To favor it, I agreed to meet upon ground not within the posts of either army, a person who was to give me intelligence. I came up in the 'Vulture' man-of-war for this effect, and was fetched from the shore to the beach. Being there, I was told that the approach of day would prevent my return, and that I must be concealed until the next night. I was in my regimentals and had fairly risked my person.

"Against my stipulation, my intention, and without my knowledge beforehand, I was conducted within one of your posts. Thus I betrayed into the vile condition of an enemy within your posts.

"Having avowed myself a British officer, I have nothing to reveal but what relates to myself, which is true, on the honor of an officer and a gentleman.

"The request I have made to your Excellency, and I am conscious that I address myself well, is, that in any rigor policy may dictate, a decency of conduct towards me may mark that, though unfortunate, I am branded with nothing dishonorable; as no motive could be mine but the service of my king, and as I was involuntarily an impostor."

"It was here also that, having a talent for caricature, he amused himself by making a ludicrous sketch of himself and his rustic escort under march, and, presenting it to an officer in the room (probably Lieut. King), said gayly, 'This will give you an idea of the style in which I have had the honor to be conducted to my present abode.'

"Although it is eminently fitting, it is none the less an illustration of the mysterious manner in which an overruling Providence arranges the affairs of this life, that the chair occupied by the illustrious prisoner of Lieut. King should, by mere accident seemingly, fall into the hands of his grandson, who a hundred years after the event recorded returns to make for himself a summer home on the exact spot where his grandfather had first resided after his marriage, and within a few miles of the house wherein Maj. Andre was confined.

"The parish of Ridgebury is situated in the northern extremity of the town, and is separated from the village of Ridgefield by a gorge or ravine and a range of rugged hills formerly known as the Asproom ledge. So distinct and well defined is this dividing-line that the two parishes present the appearance of two townships. This is the section granted the town as part compensation for the oblong which was set off to the State of New York.

"During the Revolutionary war a goodly number of the inhabitants of this part of the town took up arms in defense of the country. Upon the approach of the British troops under Gen. Tryon, on Sunday, April 27, 1777, after the burning of the military stores at Danbury, most of the people fled through the rain that at the time was falling to a hill about one and one-half miles northwest of the present Congregational church. From their position they could distinctly see the regulars, as they were termed, pass through the village. First came a rude body of light-horse, then three pieces of cannon, followed by the main body, said to be two thousand strong, with three pieces of cannon in the rear. As they passed the house of Capt. Timothy Benedict, standing on the corner of the road leading to Danbury, they fired two pistol-shots at some person looking out at a window, but without doing any harm.

"As the light-horsemen passed through the outskirts of the village on the west they fired at several persons near the New York State line. About 9.30 A.M., and within half an hour after Tryon's departure, Maj.-Gen. Wooster with a detachment of two hundred men pursued him on the road leading to Ridgefield Village.

"It appears that a raid had for some weeks been expected, and in consequence of a rumor circulated to that effect on Sunday, April 13th, just two weeks previous, the inhabitants, after secreting many of their valuables in wells and caves, fled with such articles as they could conveniently carry with them to a place of safety on a neighboring hill.

"The late Hon. Benjamin Lynes, then a lad of some sixteen years, and a resident of Redding, was taken prisoner by Gen. Tryon, and compelled to accompany him several miles towards Danbury, when, on account of his youth, he was set at liberty.

"In September, 1780, Gen. Washington having received a communication from Count de Rochambeau, commander-in-chief of the French forces then at Newport, requesting an interview at Hartford, Conn., he left Verplanck's Point, on the Hudson, on the 18th of the month, passed through Peekskill, and spent the night in Ridgebury, at the hotel of Ensign Samuel Keeler. Mrs. Rebecca Boughton, daughter of Daniel Coley, Esq., then about twelve years of age, often spoke of having seen him and his aid on that occasion.

"On the 23d of May, 1781, Washington again interviewed Count de Rochambeau,—this time at Wethersfield, Conn., for the purpose of settling upon a definite plan of campaign. It is probable that at this interview arrangements were made to remove the French army to a point in the State near the York State line, so that they could at short notice join the American army; for during the following month Rochambeau and Duke de Lauzun (Lauzun-Biron) marched from Newport across the State of Connecticut and took post at Ridgebury.

"During their stay in Ridgebury the main body of Rochambeau's army encamped on the ridge just east of the main street, on land now owned by Samuel S. St. John, Esq. One division took post on a hill about one mile south of the church, near the school-house. At this point the army was about equally distant from Long Island Sound and the Hudson River. Count de Rochambeau and suite are said to have made their headquarters at Ensign Keeler's hotel.

"Several carts loaded with specie were placed, under strong guard, on the premises and near the dwelling of Daniel Coley, Esq., midway between the two divisions. The supplies for the whole French army were transported in carts,—eight hundred and ten in number,—most of them drawn by two pairs of oxen and a horse, then designated as a five-cattle team.

"The late Thomas Boughton, at that time too young to join the regular army, hired as teamster to the French, driving his father's team. He accompanied the supply-train from Connecticut to Virginia, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. In after-years he often spoke of the magnificent display made by Rochambeau's army on that occasion.

"On the 2d of July, 1781, Duke de Lauzun left his encampment and marched his forces to East Chester, N. Y., where he arrived on the morning of the 3d, his purpose being the capture or destruction of DeLancey's corps of refugees at Morrisania.

"Count de Rochambeau, with the main body of his army, probably broke camp at Ridgebury on the 4th of July, 1781, as they joined Gen. Washington at Dobb's Ferry on the 6th.

"A liberty-pole erected by the Whigs about the commencement of the war was in the night cut down by the Tories. This exasperated the former, who at once raised another, filling it for several feet with spikes and pieces of old iron to protect it against a similar disaster. About the year 1860 some two feet of this pole was dug up by William M. Lynes, Esq. It was in a fair state of preservation, and still contained many of its iron protectors.

"During the war several families residing in Ridgebury improved every opportunity to aid King George in his efforts to subdue the colonies, or, in other and plainer words, were Tories. In some instances they converted their cellars into places of concealment and security, where such as had made themselves particularly obnoxious to the Whigs by their loyalty to the Crown could be safely secreted. These hiding-places were approached by trap-doors made in the floor beneath beds. Through these doors the occupants were supplied with food by the less objectionable Tories. In some instances they were arrested by the government officers and imprisoned. One went back to England, but returned after the war, and was supported by and buried at the expense of the town."

RIDGEFIELD IN 1800.

"In consequence of the exchange made by this State with the State of New York, in 1733, for part of Stamford and Greenwich, of what is commonly called the Oblong, one mile and three-quarters in width, the whole length of the first patent was cut off from Ridgefield; the whole town therefore contains but two located Societies, being the first or old society and Ridgebury. The town in its present form is nearly in the common figure of a coffin. The First Society contains about sixteen thousand acres, and Ridgebury Society, in this town, about eleven thousand. The whole township is about fifteen miles in length, the width at south end about three miles and three-quarters; at about one-third of the length northward it is about five miles wide, and at the north end only half a mile; bounded south by Norwalk, east by Redding and part of Danbury, north by Danbury and New Fairfield, and west by the State of New York. There were in the year 1799 ten schools kept in the First Society by masters in as many school-houses built for that purpose, and the number of scholars taken by the visiting committee were four hundred and thirty-three.

* The following is a highly-interesting sketch of Ridgefield as it appeared eighty years ago, and is from the pen of the Rev. Samuel Goodrich, being extracts from a manuscript work in the Hartford Athenaeum entitled, "A Statistical Account of Ridgefield, in the County of Fairfield, drawn up by Rev. Samuel Goodrich from Minutes furnished by a Number of his Parishioners, A. D. 1800."

"There are three foreigners in the town who are paupers,—viz., two men and one woman. One of the men, named Yabecomb, was from Wales; the other, named Jagger, is an old man about ninety-five years, an Englishman, who served under the Duke of Cumberland at the battle of Culloden in 1745, and was in Flanders with the regiment previous to that battle.

"There is the appearance of sundry Indian graves at a place commonly called Nooricus Ridge. There is one mountain which retains its Indian name, Asproom ('high or lofty'), and there are several ponds, as Mammensquah, Nisopack, Aokeets, and Umpewauge. There are no Indians at present living in the town, except one, who has learned the mason trade and has married a white woman. One died in the town about two years since at a great age, not certainly known, but supposed ninety-six or more.

"The general face of the land is gently swelling ridges, extending from north to south, though there are some broken, abrupt, rocky precipices and a considerable quantity of very stony land, which is yet, and probably will be, reserved to grow wood and timber upon. The soils on the ridges are generally composed of loam and clay, and there is a considerable quantity in some parts of the town of a light limestone soil, but little of gravel. The lowlands, or swamps, of which there are several, are generally a deep black soil, made by the fallen timber and leaves and the wash from the ridges, but they suffer much for the want of drainage. The soil was originally very fertile and produced plenty of excellent wheat, which has generally failed since the appearance of the Hessian fly, though now and then it does well in some favorite spots.

"It at present produces good rye and Indian corn,—a considerable more than for the consumption of the inhabitants,—flax, large quantities of oats, buckwheat, beans, and peas. Onions grow as well in some open gardens as in any part of the State. The land is very good for grass.

"The middle of the township lies about fourteen miles from the landing at Norwalk, and is equally distant on the highest land between the rivers Hudson and Ausatonuck, and in particular the hill or ridge lying west of and near the town street is by way of eminence called the High Ridge (Indian name, Candoto), from which, in clear weather, the mountains west of the Hudson, and the West Rock, near New Haven, may be clearly seen, and the Sound for fifty or sixty miles. The waters rise at the foot of this hill and run in different directions, discharging into the Sound at Fairfield, Norwalk, and Stamford, and into the river Hudson by the river Titicus, and through the river Croton. The waters also which rise in this town discharge into the Ousetomuck at the great falls in New Milford. There are, therefore, no streams of any considerable magnitude or consequence before they leave the limits of the town, and thus all are frequently during the summer months too small to carry mills. There are, however, some ponds in the town that have by improvement been made sufficient to answer the necessities of the inhabitants and more. The town, being a hilly country, furnishes a number of excellent small springs of water, which is light or heavy according to the soil from which they flow. Some of the springs have in the course of ten or fifteen years changed the quality of the water, and some few wells, from what cause is not certainly known; it is, however, in one well, attributed to its being not long used. The most remarkable spring is in the southerly part of the town, and is commonly called Silver Spring; the water is very cold and heavy. It discharges about one-fourth water sufficient to carry a grist-mill, and is not materially affected by the freshet or drought. The wells on the height of the ridges are commonly from thirty to forty feet, those in the valleys from twelve to thirty; but in time of severe drought many wells fail of water. There have been but two instances of aqueducts in the town, and those only to supply a single family each, which experiments have been made in the course of this summer, and are likely to answer their design. The expense by the rod is about four shillings. There are a great many small streams in all parts of the town, but most of them in a dry season fail, except near the springs which produce them.

"There are in most of the mountains, amongst the rocks and stones, appearances of sulphur and iron. There has not yet any bed been opened that promises to pay the expenses of working. There has been several attempts to dig after the precious metals, and a considerable quantity of the ore has been carried away; but to collect any quantity of the metal has proved impracticable. There are several beds of limestone of good qualities, and some quarries of a grayish and sky-blue stone which is serviceable in building, but no freestone.

"The original timber consisted of the several sorts of walnuts and oaks. Butternuts are plenty, with maple, beech, ash, dogwood, elm, sassafras, and a number of shrubs, as whortleberries, bayberries, etc., stately spruce-trees. In the first settlement of the town the inhabitants annually burnt over the high rough land for the benefit of the wild feed that grew on them, which was a great injury to the old trees and entirely prevented the young from growing; but since that practice has ceased our rough lands have a most beautiful thriving young growth coming on, which promises plenty of timber and fuel. There is a considerable number of the sugar-maple trees growing, but no more sugar made than is consumed by the makers. The common method of perforating the tree is either with a twist-auger or a narrow chisel. Our woods yield lumber for our maple-tubs, etc., and some small quantity for exportation, as heading, staves, and hoops. It is probable with prudent management this town will produce sufficient wood for fuel for the inhabitants for a century to come. The price of wood for fuel has not yet been more in the street than one dollar per load, containing half a cord. There have been several forges set up in the town and near it within a few years past, but it is probable that they will soon cease on account of the extraordinary consumption of wood, having in a short time more than doubled the price of woodland in the extremities of the town. There are five grist-mills in the town, two filling-mills, and several saw-mills carried by water, which answer for the inhabitants, but carry on no business on an extensive scale.

"The price of land has gradually increased since the first improvement, but is not so high as in the neighboring towns, for the reasons that there are no gatherings of the people for or on account of the public business in the town, and our rivers are so small, being at the head of them, that no water-works can be carried on to profit on an extensive plan. There are but few mechanics and manufacturers, traders, or men in the learned professions, to the number of people who follow agriculture, and most of the inhabitants raise provisions for their own consumption and some for exportation, for which reason the price of labor or provisions is not generally so high as it is in more populous places.

"The people generally manufacture their own linen and woolen cloths in their families, using all their wool and most of their flax.

"It is supposed that the quantity of flaxseed annually sent from this town is from five hundred to one thousand bushels, according as the season is more or less productive. The old people love turnips yet better than potatoes, and there are considerable quantities used every year,—from two thousand to four thousand bushels a year; they make good feed for sheep and cows that give milk. Potatoes are very much used, and increased attempts are making to raise them for market; but the distance from market is so great that it is not expected the practice will be general.

"Our teams used for transportation and the several branches of industry and husbandry have been generally composed of oxen and horses together, and our vehicles for carriage have been carts and sleds; but within a few years past wagons drawn by horses have greatly multiplied, and the cart, harrow, and plow are more frequently drawn by oxen alone. The increase of cattle is doubtless an advantage to so rough a country as ours, and the increase of horses, except for sale and exportation, a disadvantage to us, if not to every country.

"Pleasure-sleighs and those for lumber have greatly multiplied since the Revolution. Our grain is universally thrashed with flails and cleaned with a fan and riddled.

"The town being originally much covered with chestnut timber, that was for about fifty years chiefly used for fencing; since that time the post fences have gradually been replaced with stone, and at present there is but very little timber cut for that purpose except for posts and bars, and there is probably movable stone enough for the purpose of fencing.

"This town, by the mode of laying it out at first, was cut into small pieces or tracts of land, and, the people being generally husbandmen, scarce any man has more than he and his family want to improve, and of course we have no tenanted lands. There are some people who crop it, as is termed with us,—that is, plow and sow for a certain share; the common custom is to the labor two-thirds and to the land one.

"There has been for the last forty years a constant emigration of the people born in the town to the different parts of the United States.

"In our Revolution many of our young people left the town, and some of them now reside in the British dominion; some have returned, and several are dead. The people of this place have hitherto been so favored with the grace of God that there has never been one convicted of any crime punishable by laws of the land with death.

"There have been two instances of suicide, natives in the prime of life, one male and the other female; both were married and had families.

"Until about the year 1760 there was a considerable number of good sheep in the town, and they were kept by a shepherd in the summer months, and regularly twice in the week let to the highest bidder to lay on his plow-land during the night season, which method of manuring caused the worn land to produce excellent crops of wheat of the best quality, and great quantities of the land belonging to the proprietors was kept for the sheep to feed upon; but about that time (1760) the proprietors agreed to divide their interests in said several lands, and they were soon fenced up, since which time the sheep have gradually decreased, and would have become extinct but for the encouragement and protection of the Legislature.

"There are probably about half as many sheep in the town as there are people. It would be but a venture to guess the number of swine; there may be not far from fourteen hundred or fifteen hundred, and there are from one hundred and fifty to two hundred barrels of pork annually carried out of the town, and about as much beef. There may be from two hundred and fifty to three hundred firkins of butter exported and half the weight of cheese (nine thousand), and about one hundred head of fat cattle driven to market on their legs to New York.

"The making of butter has much increased within twenty years. As it can now be carried fresh to New York market, the price is more than three times than it was then.

"There is a good tan-work in this town, in which about fifty vats are occupied. It has, however, been the custom for almost all the farmers to tan their own leather, and do many other parts of mechanical business. There is also a hatting-manufactory, in which about five or six workmen are employed to good advantage; it furnishes the inhabitants with hats and sends abroad work to a handsome amount. There are likewise two boot- and shoe-factories, which will probably send abroad five thousand pairs of boots and shoes; the materials they work are chiefly brought from New York or abroad. Cabinet-work is done in town for the inhabitants and some of the neighboring towns. It has already been observed that the inhabitants manufacture all the wool they raise, and a considerable quantity is brought from abroad.

"A large quantity of ducking (not for sale, but for the Southern market), perhaps three thousand yards, at one shilling per yard, is annually made and sold. The great quantities of cotton cloths, as muslins, etc., imported and sold at a low price, has a tendency to discourage making American cloth, though many make linen and exchange with the shopkeepers for cotton goods.

"There are no breweries in this town, and the general custom, which used formerly be practiced, of making small-beer for family use, is almost entirely neglected, except for sake of the lees to make bread.

"There were formerly deer, bears, wolves, panthers, and wild-cats in our woods, and beaver in our ponds, but they are now extinct. We have red and gray foxes, some few raccoons, woodchucks, gray and striped squirrels. There were at the first settlement great numbers of rattlesnakes and snakes equally poisonous, but they are almost destroyed. One method for their destruction was the turning of swine among them, which devoured them. About the year 1780, and for several succeeding years, the canker-worm destroyed our apples and apple-trees in many of our orchards to a very alarming degree; but about the year 1794, in the spring season, soon after the leaves and worms made their appearance, there came into the orchards several flocks of uncommon birds, a little larger than a blue-bird, of a brown color, and picked the worms from the trees, as was also the case with a number of flocks of pigeons, which greatly checked them, and the frost which happens sometimes the latter end of May entirely destroyed them, so we have not one canker-worm since that has been heard of.

"Respecting the bird, it has never been seen with us since, except it be the one that appears in the winter, which, if it is the same, is considerably changed in its color.

"There were a few barberry-bushes in town that were for a long time kept for medical purposes; the great blast of wheat about the year 1775 induced people totally to destroy them.

"It is an undoubted fact that a bunch of those bushes, not more than an armful blasted several fields of wheat, so as totally to destroy some and much injure others, at half a mile's distance. As to the cause of their blasting, it is conjectured that it is their sourness, as it is observed that wheat delights in light sweet soils, which naturally produces the white and red clover. It has also been observed that wheat-fields lying near swamps producing cranberries have been blasted by them; but it is necessary, in order to produce this destructive effect, that the weather be moist and the wind blow in a direction from the bushes or swamp to the fields of grain, when the noxious effluvia which the bushes emit fills the air, and being of such a nature that as soon as it comes in contact with the straw it poisons it, and destroys it so as to afford no nourishment to the kernel.

"There are two places or houses built for public worship in the First Society and two in Ridgebury, one of which, the Episcopal, has gone to decay. One of the houses in the old society is used by the Congregationalists, and the other by the Episcopalians. Mr. Thomas Hawley, from Northampton, was settled in the first society soon after the town was settled, in the year 1714, and was their first pastor and continued till the year 1739, when he deceased in the prime of life. He was an able divine, a man of great frankness and sociability, an excellent scholar, and was very useful to the town, not only as a minister but in a civil capacity, serving them as their town clerk, and doing almost all their writing business until his death.

"As an encouragement for his settlement in the ministry, in the then infant state of the town, he received one twenty-ninth part of the land to himself and his heirs. Some of his descendants are now living in the town. His salary was small at first, but increased gradually as the people became more able; but it may be remarked as a capital error in the original proprietors of this town, as in many others, in giving away the right of soil. It is probable that had what was given to Mr. Hawley been appropriated to the ministry and for religious purposes, that the interest at this day would have defrayed all the expenses of the society. Some may perhaps think it best, and that it endears a people and their minister supporting him by tax. Mr. Jonathan Ingersoll succeeded Mr. Hawley in the ministry. He was from Milford. He was ordained in the year 1740, and fulfilled for many years his duty with ability, ingrafting himself in the affections of the people, and was universally beloved and esteemed. Some years before his decease a shock of the palsy weakened his body and mind, but he continued to do his duty in office until near the time of his death, which was on 2^d October, 1778, after which time there was a succession of temporary preachers until 6th of July, 1786, when Mr. Samuel Goodrich, of Durham, was ordained, and is the present pastor. It is worthy of remark that the people in this town have always been attached to their ministers, and great harmony and peace has subsisted between them.

"The Episcopalians built their first house of public worship in the year 1740; they never had a clergyman to themselves steadily, but have successively employed a number.—first, Mr. Camer, then Mr. Beach, Mr. Fowle, Mr. Townsend, Mr. De Lancey, Dr. Perry, and lastly Mr. Butler, who is esteemed a worthy man and gives good satisfaction to his people.

"Ridgebury Society was set off in the year 1763, and Mr. Samuel Camp was ordained to the pastorate care of the Congregational Church in the year, who till continues their minister. He is a man of a feeble bodily constitution, a critical scholar, a sound and orthodox divine, retentive memory, and great logical abilities. There has been in years past a number of people who call themselves Baptists, who showed much zeal in religion and met in private houses for worship. At the present they are much on the decline. A few have joined the Methodists, whose preachers, though very zealous, have made but little impression on the minds of the people in this town. Almost all the people attend public worship with the Congregationalists or Episcopalians, and there is and has been for a long time past the utmost harmony and friendship prevailing between the several denominations of Christians here, who frequently worship together and evince the efficacy of that spirit whose leading character is charity. A spirit of litigation has also greatly abated, and it is worthy of remark that at a late session of the County Court for this county there was not one man from the town during the whole term except one of the judges, and we never had any man living in the town who was a lawyer by profession.

"The church under the care of Mr. Goodrich consists of one hundred and thirty members.

"The whole number of inhabitants belonging to the congregations is eight hundred and fifty.

"There have been seventeen hundred and fifty baptisms since the year 1733, and one hundred and seventy pay taxes to the Congregationalists.

"About the time that Paine's 'Age of Reason' came abroad, Infidelity presented itself to view, and, like Milton's description of Death, 'Black it stood as night, fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell;' the horror of its features disgusted the people to such a degree that it has not yet had one advocate in this town.

"The salary given Mr. Ingersoll was seventy-five pounds; to Mr. Goodrich one hundred and fifteen pounds and twenty cords of wood annually. The list of the town, fifty-one thousand doll.; of the First Society twenty-two thousand doll. Public worship is here maintained by tax only.

"Schools in this town are maintained, 1st, in part by the produce of the sale of lands in Litchfield County by the State, and appropriated to the school; 2^d, by the produce of an excise duty laid on rum and tea, but the act, proving unpopular, was never carried into general execution. The money paid in by this town was returned and appropriated for the benefit of schools. 3^d, by the forty shillings on the thousand, as it is commonly called; 4th, by the produce of the sales of the Western lands; and lastly, in case of deficiency, by a tax on the scholars.

"The wages given to masters is from fifteen to eight dollars per month, according to number of scholars and the ability of the teachers. There is taught in our schools reading, writing, arithmetic, and grammar, some catechising, and a little manners. It has been remarked that since the visiting committee have attended to their duty, our schools are under better regulation and our scholars make greater proficiency. There are a number of young people who have been taught in our schools who have gone into other parts and taught with applause. Board for children is from seventy-five cents to one dollar per week, and tuition from fifty cents to one dollar per quarter.

"The number of poor who receive aid from the town do not exceed ten or twelve, of which number not more than two or three receive their whole support. Those that do are foreigners, being those mentioned before, one of which was a laborer and the other a soldier who wrought jet-work in cedar since he has been in this country till he was near eighty years old, and he will to this day, being in the ninety-sixth year of his age, sing a martial air he learned in Flanders and cry 'God save King George!' Those who receive partial aid do some work, and receive some assistance from relations and particular friends. The old soldier has been bid off to the lowest bidder for several years from seven shillings sixpence to six shillings per week. We have no poor that are chargeable but what became so by bodily imbecility.

"We had the last year not more than five taverns in town, though in years past we have had double that number; they are not much frequented by the inhabitants of the town. The grog-drinkers and brandy-tippers have found a way to be supplied at a cheaper rate than they can obtain at licensed inns, and it is necessary that they should be prudent.

"In regard to climate, the height of our situation in the atmosphere and the descent of the land to the north renders the air, though cold, exceedingly salubrious. Different disorders have prevailed in different seasons, owing to different causes. The main street in the town, being on the highest land or near it, has ever been healthy; near the lowlands and ponds in the skirts of the town the fever and ague and other fevers have prevailed. There are some instances of nervous fevers almost every year, which generally proves mortal. The dysentery sometimes visits us, but has never made great ravages. Symptoms of putridity have appeared in some fevers, and have in some instances proved suddenly fatal, yet never been alarming. The smallpox has been familiar, and has in a great measure left its terrors since the practice of inoculation, which has been generally adopted by almost all the inhabitants. Three or four hundred have had it in a season, out of which number from one to two have died; it is a very small expense. People here generally marry young, and are very prolific; in six families a number of years since, all living in one neighborhood, there were seventy-five children.

"The number of births greatly exceed the number of deaths. There may have been four thousand since the settlement of the town. The annual number of deaths, on an average for ten years past, will not exceed twenty,—about one in a hundred of the inhabitants. There has been one instance of a man who deceased in town one hundred and two years old; he was born at Eastchester, in the State of New York, and came into this town in his forty-fourth year, by name Richard Osborn. He was a very religious man, slender in body, had been a justice of the peace and deacon in the prime of life, was temperate in his habits and diet, but animated in his passions. There have been many instances of persons living over ninety, and great numbers who survive eighty, and considerably active. There are now living in the town three over ninety, and twenty who are eighty or more.

"In October a remarkable thunder-gust, tornado, or hurricane passed through the northerly part of this society and the south part of Ridgebury, destroying everything in its course in this and the neighboring towns. Eleven buildings were nearly destroyed, and three or four entirely. Several dwelling-houses were damaged in a surprising manner, but none of the inhabitants were destroyed or very materially injured.

"Our elevated situation occasions the earth to be covered much deeper and longer with snow than the neighboring towns, but we are not exposed to inundations, being so near the head of the streams. There have been for several years great swarms of insects (especially the rosebug) moving to the northward and northwest; some have supposed them to be the Hessian fly. For several years past a sort of caterpillar worm has prevailed upon the trees, both fruit-trees and forest-trees. In the latter part of summer, especially, the wild cherry-tree, many of the red and black ash-trees have been destroyed in the swamps and low grounds, and if not checked in their progress by Providence threaten wide destruction.

"Our little town has not much to boast of superior genius or intellects, though nature has been by no means niggardly to us in the distribution of her powers. The natives of the town are undoubtedly endued with as good natural capacities as any people on earth, though few of them have any great degree of acquired learning. The person who happens to be most employed by his fellow-freemen in public business soon claims and has the most notice. And we have many persons who never mounted the public stage of business, who only want to be called up and employed to exhibit talents which by experience would shine.

"Our various mechanics and artificers improve gradually in the beauty if not in the strength of their various manufactures. In regard to the vices of the people, though it might be prudent to draw a curtain to hide them, yet they will in one occasion or another become public. Robbing orchards and gardens in the season of fruit is the most prevalent, and other indulgence of fleshly appetites frequently cause repentance. The amusements commonly in vogue are ball, chess, quoits, and dancing. The people, by frequently stirring up, are attentive to their civil privileges and religious institutions. In liberality the people are not deficient, and have always furnished their quota for the public service. We have a small library of about one hundred and fifty volumes, established about five years since, and annually augmented."

SKETCH OF RIDGEFIELD IN 1855.

The following racy sketch of this town is from the pen of S. C. Goodrich, familiarly known as "Peter Parley," being a letter addressed to his brother:

"DEAR BROTHER,—I greatly regret that you could not continue your journey with us to Ridgefield. The weather was fine, and the season—crowning the earth with abundance—made every landscape beautiful. The woods which, as you know, abound along the route spread their intense shade over the land, thus mitigating the heat of the unclouded sun, and the frequent fields of Indian corn, with their long leaves and silken tassels, all fluttering in the breeze, gave a sort of holiday look to the scene. Of all agricultural crops this is the most picturesque and the most imposing. Let others magniloquize upon the vineyards of France and the olive-orchards of Italy; I patel with these scenes a few weeks since, and do not hesitate to say that, as a spectacle to the eye, our maize-fields are infinitely superior. Leaving New Haven by rail, we reached Norwalk in forty minutes; an hour after, we were at Ridgefield, having journeyed three miles by stage, from the Danbury and Norwalk station. Thus we performed a journey in less than two hours which cost a day's travel in our boyhood. You can well comprehend that we had a good time of it.

"As I approached the town I began to recognize localities,—roads, houses, and hills. I was in a glow of excitement, for it was nineteen years since I had visited the place, and there was a mixture of the strange and familiar all around which was at once pleasing and painful,—pleasing because it revived many cherished memories, and painful because it suggested that time is a tomb into which man and his works are ever plunging, like a stream flowing on only to disappear in an unfathomable gulf. The bright village of to-day is in fact the graveyard of the past generation. I was here like one risen from the dead, and come to look on the place which I once knew, but which I shall soon know no more. All seemed to me a kind of dream, half real and half imaginary,—now presenting some familiar and cherished remembrance, and now mocking me with strange and baffling revelations.

"Nevertheless, all things considered, I enjoyed the scene. The physiognomy of the town—a swelling mound of hills rising in a crescent of mountains—was all as I had learned it by heart in childhood. To the north the bending line of Aspen Ledge, to the east the Redding Hills, to the west the Highlands of the Hudson, to the south the sea of forest-crowned undulations sloping down to Long Island Sound, all in a cool but brilliant August sun, and all tinted with intense verdure, presented a scene to me—the pilgrim returning to his birthplace—of unrivaled interest.

"In general, the whole country seemed enshowered in trees,—fresh and exuberant, and strongly in contrast with the worn-out lands of the old countries,—with openings here and there upon hillside and valley, consisting of green meadow, or pasture, or blooming maize, or perhaps patches of yellow stubble, for the smaller grains had been already harvested. As I came within the precincts of the village I could not but admire the fields, as well on account of their evident richness of soil and excellent cultivation as their general neatness. The town, you know, was originally blessed or cursed, as the case may be, by a most abundant crop of stones. To clear the land of these was the Herculean task of the early settlers. For many generations they usurped the soil, obstructed the plow, dulled the scythe, and now, after ages of labor, they are formed into sturdy walls, neatly laid, giving to the entire landscape an aspect not only of comfort, but refinement. In our day these were rudely piled up with frequent breaches,—the tempting openings for vagrant sheep and loose yeacling cattle. No better evidence can be afforded of a general process and improvement than that most of these have been rebuilt with something of the art and nicety of mason-work. The Mat Olmsteads and Azor Smiths of the past half-century, who laid stone wall for Granther Bulwin and Gen. King at a dollar a rod, would be amazed to see that the succeeding generation has thrown their works aside in disgust and replaced them by constructions having somewhat of the solidity and exactitude of fortifications.

"As we passed along I observed that nearly all the houses which existed when we were boys had given place to new, and for the most part larger, structures. Here and there was an original dwelling. A general change had passed over the land—swamps had been converted into meadows; streams that sprawled across the path now flowed tidily beneath stone bridges; little shallow ponds, the haunts of muddling geese, had disappeared; the undergrowth of woods and copses had been cleared away; briars and brambles, once thick with fruit or abounding in birds' nests, or perchance the hiding-place of snakes, had been extirpated, and corn and potatoes flourished in their stead. In one place where I recollect to have unearthed a woodchuck I saw a garden, and among its red-hot pumpkins, cucumbers, and cabbages was a row of tomatoes,—a plant which in my early days was only known as a strange exotic producing little red balls which bore the enticing name of love-apples.

"At last we came into the main street. This is the same, yet not the same. All the distances seemed less than as I had marked them in my memory. From the meeting-house to Squire Keeler's, which I thought to be a quarter of a mile—it is but thirty rods. At the same time the undulations seemed more frequent and abrupt. The old houses are mostly gone, and more sumptuous ones are in their place. A certain neatness and elegance have succeeded to the plain and primitive characteristics of other days.

"The street, on the whole, is one of the most beautiful I know of. It is more than a mile in length and a hundred and twenty feet in width, ornamented with two continuous lines of trees,—elms, sycamores, and sugar-maples,—save only here and there a brief interval. Some of these, in front of the more imposing houses, are truly majestic. The entire street is carpeted with a green so soft as velvet to the feet. The high-road runs in the middle, with a footwalk on either side. These passages are not paved, but are covered with gravel, and so neatly cut that they appear like pleasure-grounds. All is so bright and so tasteful that you might expect to see some imperative sign-board warning you, on peril of the law, not to tread upon the grass. Yet, as I learned, all this embellishment flows spontaneously from the choice of the people, and not from police regulations.

"The general aspect of the street, however, let me observe, is not sumptuous, like Hartford and New Haven, or even Fairfield. There is still a certain quaintness and primness about the place. Here and there you see old respectable houses, showing the dim vestiges of ancient paint, while the contiguous gardens, growing with rich fruits and vegetables, and the stately rows of elms in front, declare it to be taste, and not necessity, that thus cherishes the reverend hue of unsophisticated clapboards and the venerable rust with which time baptizes unpolished shingles. There is a stillness about the town which lends favor to this characteristic of studied rusticity. There is no fast driving, no shouting, no railroad whistle; for you must remember that the station of the Danbury and Norwalk line is three miles off. Few people are to be seen in the streets, and those who do appear move with an air of leisure and tranquillity. It would seem dull and almost melancholy were it not that all around is so thrifty, so tidy, so really comfortable. Houses, white or brown, with green window-blinds, and embowered in lilacs and fruit-trees, and seen beneath the arches of wide-spreading Amei an elm,—the finest of the whole elm family,—can never be otherwise than cheerful.

"I went, of course, to the old Keeler tavern for lodgings. The sign was gone, and, though the house retained its ancient form, it was so neatly painted, and all around had such a look of repose, that I feared it had ceased from its ancient hospitalities. I, however, went to the door and rapped; it was locked. A bad sign, thought I. Ere long, however, a respectable dame appeared, turned the key, and let me in. It was Anne Keeler converted into Mrs. Bessique. Had it been her mother, I should only have said that she had grown a little taller and more dignified; as it was, the idea crossed my mind,

But it seems to me that her matronly graces fully compensated for all she might have lost of earlier pretensions. She looked at me gazingly, as if she half knew me. She was about inquiring my name, when I suggested that she might call me Smith, and begged her to tell me if she could give me lodgings. She replied that they did sometimes receive strangers, though they did not keep a tavern. I afterwards heard that the family was rich, and that it was courtesy more than cash which induced them to keep up the old habit of the place. I was kindly received, though at first as a stranger. After a short time I was found out, and welcomed as a friend. What fragrant butter, what white bread, what delicious succotash, they gave me! And as to the milk, it was just such as cows gave fifty years ago, and upon the slightest encouragement positively produced an envelope of golden cream. Alas! how cows have degenerated, especially in the great cities of the earth! In New York, London, or Paris, it is all the same. He who wishes to eat with a relish that the Astor House or Morley's or the Grand Hotel du Louvre cannot give should go to Ridgefield and put himself under the care of Mrs. Bessique. If he be served, as I was, by her daughter,—a thing, however, that I cannot promise, he may enjoy a lively and pleasant conversation while he discusses his meal. When you go there—as you must—do not forget to order ham and eggs, for they are such as we ate in our childhood, not a mass of red leather steeped in grease and covered with a tough, bluish gum, as is now the fashion in these things. As to blackberry- and huckleberry pies and similar good gifts, you will find them just such as our mother made fifty years ago, when these bonanities of Providence were included in the prayer, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' and were a worthy answer to such a petition.

"Immediately after my arrival, waiting only to deposit my carpet-bag in my room, I set out to visit our house,—our former home. As I came near I saw that the footpath we had worn across Deacon Bonaldi's lot to shorten the distance from the street had given place to a highway. I entered this, and was approaching the object of my visit, when I was overtaken by a young man walking with a long stride.

"Whose house is this on the hill?" said I.

"It is mine," was the reply.

"Indeed! You must have a fine view from your upper windows?"

"Yes, the view is famous, and the house itself is somewhat noted. It was built by Peter Parley, and here he lived many years."

"By this time we had reached the place. The stranger, after I had looked at the premises a few moments said, 'Perhaps you would like to ascend the hill to the north, from which the view is very extensive?' I gave assent, and we went thither, soon finding ourselves in the old Keeler lot, on the top of High Ridge, so familiar to our youthful rambles. With all the vividness of my early recollections, I really had no adequate idea of the beauty of the scene as now presented to us. The circle of view was indeed less than I had imagined, for I once thought it immense, but the objects were more striking, more vividly tinted, more picturesquely disposed. Long Island Sound, which extends for sixty miles before the eye, except as it is hidden here and there by intercepting hills and trees, seems nearer than it did to the inexperienced vision of my childhood. I could distinguish the different kinds of vessels on the water and the island itself, stretched out in a long blue line beyond, presented its cloud-like tissues of forest, alternating with patches of yellow sand-banks along the shore. I could distinctly mark the site of Norwalk, and the spires peering through the mass of trees to the eastward spoke suggestive of the beautiful towns and villages that line the northern banks of the Sound.

"West Mountain seemed nearer and less imposing than I had imagined, but the sea of mountains beyond, terminating in the Highlands of the Hudson, more than thrilled my remembrances. The scene has no abrupt and startling grandeur from this point of view, but in that kind of beauty which consists in blending the peace and quietude of cultivated valleys with the sublimity of mountains—all in the enchantment of distance, and all muffled with the vital hues of summer—it equals the finest scenes in Italy. The deep-blue velvet which is thrown over our Northern landscapes differs, indeed, from the reddish purple of the Apennines, but it is in all things as poetic, as stimulating to the imagination, as available to the painter, as suggestive to the poet,—to all, indeed, who feel and appreciate the truly beautiful. As I gazed upon this lovely scene, how did the memories of early days come back clothed in the romance of childhood! I had then no idea of distance beyond these mountains, no conception of landscape beauty, no idea of picturesque sublimity, that surpassed what was familiar to me here. Indeed, all my first measures of grandeur and beauty in nature were formed upon these glorious models now before me. How often have I stood upon this mound at the approach of sunset and gazed in speechless wonder upon yonder mountains, glowing as they were in the flood of sapphire which was then poured upon them? I pray you to excuse my constant reference to foreign lands, but as I have just left them, it is natural to make comparisons with these objects familiar to my childhood. Let me say, then, that no sunsets surpass our own in splendor, nor have I seen anything to equal them in brilliancy when the retiring orb of day, as if to shed glory upon his departure, pours his rays upon the outstretched flocks of clouds, and these reflect their blaze upon the mountain landscape below. Then for a brief space, as you know, the heavens seem a canopy of burnished gold, and the earth beneath a kingdom robed in purple velvet and crowned with rubies and sapphires. In Italy the sunset sky has its enchantments, but while these perhaps surpass the same exhibitions of nature in our climate in respect to a certain tranquil softness and exquisite blending of rainbow hues, they are still inferior in gorgeous splendor to the scenes which I have been describing.

"Having taken a hasty but earnest view of the grand panorama of High Ridge, I returned with my guide to the house. I feigned thirst and begged a glass of water. This was readily given, and I tasted once more the nectar of our 'old oaken bucket.' After glancing round and making a few observations, I thanked my attendant—who, by the way, had no suspicion that I knew the place as well as himself—for his courtesy, and took my leave and returned to the hotel. My emotions upon this visiting our early home, so full of the liveliest associations, it would be utterly in vain to attempt to describe.
