THE province of the historian is to gather the threads of the past ere they elude forever his grasp and weave them into a harmonious web to which the Art Preservative may give immortality. Therefore he who would rescue from fast-gathering oblivion the deeds of a community and send them on to futurity in an imperishable record should deliver "a plain, unvarnished tale,"—

" Nothing extenuate, Nor set down aught in malice."

In such a spirit have the compilers of the following pages approached the work of detailing the history of the county embodied herein, and trust they have been fairly faithful to the task imposed.

It has been our honest endeavor to trace the history of the development of this section from that period when it was in the undisputed possession of the red man to the present, and to place before the reader an authentic narrative of its rise and progress to the prominent position it now occupies among the counties of New England.

That such an undertaking is attended with no little difficulty and vexation none will deny. The aged pioneer relates events of the early settlements, while his neighbor sketches the same events with totally different outlines. Man's memory is ever at fault, while Time paints a different picture upon every mind. With these the historian has to contend; and, while it has been our aim to compile an accurate history, were it devoid of all inaccuracies that perfection would have been attained of which the writer had not the faintest conception, and which Lord Macaulay once said never could be reached.

From colonial and other documents in the State archives, from county, town, and village records, family manuscripts, printed publications, and innumerable private sources of information, we have endeavored to produce a history which should prove accurate, instructive, and in every respect worthy the county represented. How well we have succeeded in our task a generous public, jealous of its reputation and honor, of its traditions and memories, of its defeats and triumphs, must now be the judge.

We desire to acknowledge our sincere thanks to the editorial fraternity generally for much valuable information, which has greatly lessened our labor in the preparation of this work, and also to each and every one who has assisted us in its compilation, and would cheerfully make personal mention of each, but it is impracticable, as the number reaches over a thousand.

HISTORY

FAIRFIELD COUNTY, CONNECTICUT.

CHAPTER I.

GEOGRAPHICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE.

FAIRFIELD County is located in the southwestern part of the State of Connecticut and is bounded as follows: On the north by Westchester Co., N. Y., and the counties of Litchfield and New Haven, in Connecticut; on the east by Litchfield and New Haven Counties; on the south by Long Island Sound; and on the west by the counties of Westchester, Putnam, and Dutchess, in the State of New York. It is separated from New Haven County by the Housatonic River, which also separates it in part from Litchfield. The southern part is deeply indented by the waters of the Sound, which form some of the best harbors on the Connecticut coast. Oysters and clams of excellent quality are found in abundance along the coast.

The surface of the county along the Sound is level and very fertile. In the interior and northern parts it presents, chiefly, a bold outline of irregular hills and deep valleys. The soil is generally strong and fertile, and the county is one of the richest farming-districts in the State.

Fairfield County is not rich in minerals, for neither the useful nor the precious metals abound to any extent,—at least, not in paying quantities. About fifty years ago iron-ore was found in the southwestern part of Reading, near Branchville, but after being worked a short time was abandoned. Coal was dug for about thirty years ago near Georgetown, and a silver-mine was worked in 1765 in the northern part of Wilton. Silica and feldspar quartz have been found in large quantities in the eastern part of Ridgefield and the western part of Reading, which are now being worked quite extensively.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY.

Fairfield County was organized at a Court of Election held at Hartford May 10, 1666, at which time John Winthrop was Governor of the colony.

The bounds of the county were described as follows: "This court orders that from the east bounds of Stratford to y^e west bounds of Rye shalbe for future one county w^{ch} shalbe called the County of Fairfield. And it is ordered that the County Court shalbe held at Fairfield on the second Tuesday in March and the first Tuesday in November yearly."

At the date of organization of the county it embraced but five towns—viz., Fairfield, Stratford, Norwalk, Stamford, and Greenwich. As the population increased other towns were formed, until at the present time there are twenty-three civil subdivisions, as follows: Bethel, Bridgeport, Brookfield, Danbury, Darien, Easton, Fairfield, Greenwich, Huntington, Monroe, New Canaan, New Fairfield, Newtown, Norwalk, Redding, Ridgefield, Sherman, Stamford, Stratford, Trumbull, Weston, Westport, and Wilton.

In 1701 "Capⁿ Nathan Gold was appointed Judge of the Countie Court and Court of Probates in the countie of Fairfield."

"Justices of the Peace and Quorum appointed for the Countie of Fairfield are: M^r Richard Blackleech, M^r John Wakeman, M^r Mathew Sherwood, M^r Peter Burre. Justices of the Peace appointed for the Countie of Fairfield are: Captⁿ James Ohmsted, Captⁿ John Minor, Captⁿ James Judson, M^r Sam^l Hoyt, M^r Sam^l Peck, M^r James Beebe."

COURT-HOUSES AND JAILS.

Fairfield is a shire county, the courts being held alternately at Bridgeport and Danbury. The first courts were held in the town of Fairfield, and the first court-house was erected in 1720. This was destroyed by the British in 1779, and rebuilt in 1794. In 1853 the courts were removed from Fairfield to Bridgeport, and the jail, which was in process of construction in Fairfield at that time, now forms part of St. Paul's Church, Fairfield.

The present court-house in Bridgeport was first occupied in 1855, and is a neat and substantial brownstone structure, located on a public square which is bounded on three sides by the following streets, State, Broad, and Bank, and on its fourth side by private property. The jail is located on North Avenue, and is a substantial brick building.

The first court-house in Danbury was a small square building, two stories in height, surmounted with a small cupola. The present court-house was erected in 1820 or 1824, and repaired and beautified a few years since. In front of the old court-house stood the whipping-post and stocks. The late Aaron Seeley and Samuel Wildman, deputy-sheriffs, and Levi Starr, constable, were the last who presided at this "engine of torture."

The jail at Danbury is a neat and substantial brick building, located on Main Street.

CHAPTER II.

BENCH AND BAR.

AMONG the prominent agencies which give shape and order in the early development of the civil and social condition of society, the pulpit, press, and bar are perhaps the most potential in moulding the institutions of a new community; and where these are early planted, the school, academy, and college are not long in assuming their legitimate position, and the maintenance of these institutions secures at the start a social and moral foundation upon which we may safely rest the superstructure of the county, the State, and the nation. The establishment of courts and judicial tribunals, where society is protected in all its civil rights under the sanction of law, and wrong finds a ready redress in an enlightened and prompt administration of justice, is the first necessity of every civilized community, and without which the forces and press of society in its changeable developments, even under the teachings of the pulpit, the direction of the press, and the culture of the schools, are exposed to peril and disaster from the turbulence of passion and conflicts of interest; and hence the best and surest security that even the press, the school, or the pulpit can find for the peaceful performance of its highest functions is when protected by and intrenched behind the bulwarks of law, administered by a pure, independent, and uncorrupted judiciary.

The Fairfield County bar has from its beginning numbered among its members able jurists, talented advocates, and safe counselors. Here many have lived, flourished, and died, while others still are upon the stage of action who have been prominent in the advancement of the interests of the county and figured conspicuously in the councils of the State.

ROGER LUDLOW.—First in the galaxy of eminent attorneys who have practiced their profession in Fairfield County stands the name of Roger Ludlow, familiar to every student of the pioneer history of Connecticut. Among the various sketches of this intrepid and talented jurist and pioneer which have from time to time been written, the following, by the Hon. Gideon H. Hollister, is selected as thoroughly delineating the meteoric career of this impulsive man:

"He was a lawyer of good family, and resided in Dorsetshire, in the southern part of England. Feb. 13, 1630, he was chosen as assistant by the General Court of Massachusetts. In May following he sailed from Plymouth for America in the 'Mary and John,' and entered upon the discharge of his official duties at the first Assistant Court held at Charleston, in August of the same year; he continued to occupy this place for four years. In 1634 he was chosen Deputy Governor of the province, and hoped to have been raised to the rank of Governor, but was disappointed by the jealousy of the deputies, who appear to have taken offense at some impolitic remarks made by him, probably in relation to the growing strength and to the frequency of elections. To show him how well they could vindicate themselves, and perhaps to reciprocate his good advice by giving him a practical lesson upon exercising the Christian virtue of humility, they elected John Haynes Governor. Ludlow protested against this appointment in terms of severity. He alleged that the election was void for the reason that the delegates had agreed upon their candidate before they left their respective towns. By way of requital for making such an accusation, which was in all probability true, and as a further proof of the popular power, he was left out of the magistracy for that year. He had not learned the art, so common in our age, of telling the people precisely what he did not believe to be true.

"Discouraged at this decided expression of the popular displeasure, he removed to Connecticut during the summer or fall of the year 1635, and established himself at Windsor. Here he continued under the gentle ministrations of Mr. Wareham, and soon became one of the most conspicuous men in the colony.

"In the summer of 1637 he was sent by the General Court as one of the advisors of the Connecticut forces in the second stage of the Pequot war. He was probably the first lawyer who ever came into the colony, and one of the most gifted who have ever lived in it."

He took an active part in the framing of the constitution of 1639, and it was in all probability mainly his work. He was the first Deputy-Governor of the commonwealth, elected April 11, 1639. After his removal to Fairfield he still continued to perform important services for the government. In 1646 he was appointed by the General Court to reduce the crude and ill-defined laws to a system, which code was published at Cambridge in 1673. He was also several times a commissioner for the colony in the New England Congress. He remained in Fairfield until 1654, when he embarked at New Haven for Virginia, where the remainder of his days were passed.*

✓SAMUEL B. SHERWOOD was born Nov. 26, 1767. He graduated at Yale College in 1786, was admitted to the bar in or about 1790, and commenced the practice of his profession in Westport. He continued in the active practice of his profession until 1831. He was one of the leading members of the Fairfield bar, and had a large practice. He frequently represented the town in the Legislature, and for several years was one of the twelve councilors or upper House of the Legislature, answering to a Senate before the adoption of the Constitution of 1818, and was a member of the Fifteenth Congress of the United States. Probably no man in Connecticut had from 1810 to 1815 greater political influence than Samuel B. Sherwood. From a sound physical constitution and uniform good health Mr. Sherwood had doubtless calculated on long life, but on the 26th of April, 1833, he was prostrated by brain-fever, and died after a single day's suffering, universally regretted.

ELIPHALET SWIFT was an early practitioner in Westport. He was born in Windham Co., Conn., July 6, 1780. He graduated at Yale College in 1803, and, having been admitted to the bar, commenced the practice of his profession in Westport in 1806, where he continued it until within a year or two of his decease. He died Sept. 21, 1857.

THOMAS BERR OSBORNE was born in Easton, July 8, 1798. He graduated at Yale in 1817, studied law with the late S. P. Staples, and was admitted to the bar in 1820. In the same year he commenced the practice of his profession in Fairfield, where he resided until his death. He was clerk of the Superior and County Courts of Fairfield County in 1826, and held that office until 1839. He was a representative to the General Court in 1836 and 1841, and in 1839 was elected to Congress, and re-elected in 1841. He was State senator in 1844, and the same year was appointed judge of the County Court, which office he held several years. He removed to New Haven in 1855, and was appointed professor of law in Yale College, which position he held until 1865, when he resigned. His reputation as a judge was of the highest, and his qualities of mind and disposition, while they peculiarly fitted him for the bench, also caused him to enjoy its duties far more than the active vocation of the bar.

HENRY DUTTON was born in Watertown, Conn., Feb. 12, 1796. He graduated at Yale College in 1818, and commenced the study of the law with Roger Minott Sherman in Fairfield, at the same time teaching in the village academy at that place. He was subsequently tutor in Yale College two years, and in 1823 commenced the practice of law in Newtown. Here he remained until 1837, when he removed to Bridgeport, where he continued in the active practice of his profession. He held various offices; was State's attorney and representative to the General Court. In 1847 he removed to New Haven, and accepted the chair of Kent professor of law in the Yale Law School. In addition to the duties of the professorship he engaged in the active practice of his profession, and during this time also prepared and published his "Revision of Swift's Digest," and assisted in preparing the "Revision and Compilation of the Connecticut Statutes" in 1849, 1854, and 1866, and in 1854 was chosen Governor of the State by the Legislature, the people having failed to make a choice at the preceding election. In 1861 he was chosen a judge of the Supreme Court of Errors and of the Superior Court. He remained on the bench as associate judge of the Supreme Court until he reached the age of seventy years, Feb. 12, 1866. He died in 1869.

ISAAC TOUCEY was born in Newtown, Nov. 5, 1796, and studied law with Asa Chapman. He commenced the practice of his profession in Hartford in 1818, and subsequently held various offices of trust and responsibility. He was State's attorney for Hartford County from 1822 to 1835, and in the latter year was elected to Congress, where he served four years. He was elected Governor of the State in 1846, and during the latter year of President Polk's administration filled the office of Attorney-General; in 1850 was a member of the State Senate; in 1851 was elected to the United States Senate, and was Secretary of the Navy under Buchanan. Mr. Toucey was offered a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, which he declined. He was one of the ablest lawyers in the State. He died July 30, 1869.

THOMAS BILDEN BUTLER was born at Wethersfield, Aug. 22, 1806. He was prepared for college by his father, and entered Yale Medical School, where he remained two years, then went to Philadelphia, where he continued one year and completed his professional studies. He commenced the practice of his profession at Norwalk, and continued about eight years, when he abandoned the practice of medicine and commenced the study of law in the office of the late Judge Bissell, and was admitted to the bar in 1837. He soon after formed a copartnership with Thaddeus Betts, and upon his death entered into partnership with Orris S. Ferry. He was subsequently a partner with Josiah M. Carter. He was called to the bench of the Superior Court in 1855, and remained there until his election to the Supreme Court, in 1861. In May, 1870, he was appointed chief judge, which office he held until his resignation, in May, 1873. He was elected to Congress in 1849; was State senator in 1848, 1852, and 1853, and member of the General Assembly in 1832, 1833, 1837, 1843, and 1846. He died June 8, 1873, aged sixty-six.

NELSON L. WHITE was born in Danbury, April 7, 1812. He studied law in the office of the late Reuben Booth, and in 1840 was admitted to the bar. He was clerk of the State Senate in 1844 and 1845; judge of Probate in Danbury in 1847, 1848, and 1849. In 1856 he was a delegate to the first Republican National Convention, at Philadelphia. He was State's attorney for Fairfield County from 1868 to 1874. In 1861 he joined the Wooster Guards, at Danbury, but was rejected on account of his age. He was promptly commissioned by Governor Buckingham as a field-officer in the Fourth Connecticut Infantry. He was lieutenant-colonel, and also served as inspector-general.

In the words of Hon. Gideon H. Hollister, "he loved his profession ardently and always stood up in the defense of the right. He had peculiar power as an advocate, and sometimes spoke with a fervor that made him a dangerous antagonist before a jury.

"Col. White came of an old colonial family, and lived up to its record. He possessed great personal advantages and a peculiar style and manner, but at the same time seemed unconscious of them. The thought of himself found little place in his sympathetic and impulsive nature, while the kindness of his heart yielded only to his sense of justice and his fidelity to truth."

JOSIAH MASON CARTER was born in New Canaan, Jan. 19, 1813, and graduated at Yale College in 1836. He studied law with Hon. Thomas B. Osborne, of Fairfield, and was admitted to the bar in August, 1839. He commenced the practice of law in the city of New York in 1841, and in 1847 removed to Norwalk and formed a partnership with Hon. Thomas B. Butler, which continued until Mr. Butler's elevation to the bench, in 1855. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1856, 1861, and 1862, and the latter year was Speaker of the House. He was the candidate of the Whig party for lieutenant-governor in 1856. He was appointed State's attorney for Fairfield County in 1862, and held that office until his death. On two different occasions he declined to be a candidate for the judgeship of the Superior Court, as he never allowed politics to interfere with the practice of his profession. He died March 21, 1868.

GIDEON TOMLINSON.—The ancestors of Gideon Tomlinson, late Governor of the State of Connecticut, were distinguished for activity, firmness, and integrity. His father, Jabez Huntington Tomlinson, was born in 1760, and died Jan. 14, 1849, aged eighty-nine years. He was an officer in the Revolutionary war, and after the war followed the occupation of a practical farmer, residing in Stratford, Conn. He had three sons and three daughters, viz., Gideon, George, Huntington, Hannah, Nancy, and Sally.

Gideon was born at Stratford, in this State, Dec. 31, 1780, educated at Yale College, and graduated there in the year 1802. In June, 1805, he was admitted to the bar in New Haven County, and soon after commenced the practice of law at Fairfield, in this State (it was then the county-seat), where he continued to reside until his death. He married Sarah Bradley, daughter of William Bradley, of the parish of Greenfield Hill, Dec. 15, 1807. They had one son, Jabez H. Tomlinson, born June 28, 1818, died April 2, 1838, aged twenty years.

Gideon Tomlinson was a representative of the town of Fairfield in the General Assembly at the May session of 1817, and at the October session of the same year, when he was chosen clerk of that body. He was re-elected a member of the General Assembly from the same town at the two sessions of the year 1818. At the session in May he was chosen Speaker of the House, and at the October session in that year he was re-elected to the same office. He was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of this State, and gave to it his cordial approbation and effective support in the convention and before the people. In the year 1818 he was elected one of the representatives of Connecticut in Congress, and took his seat as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States in December, 1819. At the three successive elections of members of Congress from this State he was re-elected, and continued to serve in the House of Representatives of the United States until March, 1827, when the term expired for which he had been last elected. In April, 1827, he was chosen Governor of this State by the people, and was re-elected to the same distinguished and honorable station in the three succeeding years. Having been elected a senator in the Congress of the United States in May, 1830, for six years from the 4th of March, 1831, he resigned the office of Governor of Connecticut on the second day of March, 1831. At the commencement of Washington College, at Hartford, in the year 1827, the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by them. In December, 1831, he took his seat in the Senate of the United States, and served in that body until the 4th of March, 1837, when his senatorial term expired. After that time he did not resume the practice of law, but retired to his home in Greenfield Hill, Conn., where he died, Oct. 8, 1851, aged seventy-three years, eight months, and nine days.

JUDGE DAVID HILL also lived in Fairfield, and was a leading and influential man in the parish and town, where he held many important offices.

ABRAM BALDWIN was a distinguished lawyer, residing in Fairfield, and was United States senator from this State. He assisted in the formation of the Constitution of the United States, and died in office,

March 4, 1807, aged fifty-two years. His tombstone in the cemetery at Greenfield Hill bears the following inscription: "Abram Baldwin lies buried at Washington. His memory needs no marble. His country is his monument, her Constitution his greatest work."

ROGER MINOTT SHERMAN, son of Rev. Josiah and Martha Sherman, was one of the lights of the Fairfield bar. He was born at Woburn, Mass., May 22, 1773. His father was brother to the Hon. Roger Sherman, of Revolutionary celebrity. In 1789, when only sixteen years of age, he entered the sophomore class in Yale College. After the completion of his academic course he commenced the study of the law with the Hon. Oliver Ellsworth, and subsequently continued it with Judge Reeve at Litchfield, and later with Hon. Simeon Baldwin. He was admitted to the bar in New Haven, and commenced the practice of his profession in Norwalk. In 1807 he transferred his residence from Norwalk to Fairfield, where he remained till his death. In politics Mr. Sherman belonged to the school of Washington, Jay, Hamilton, Ellsworth, and his illustrious uncle, and held many prominent official positions, the last being associate judge of the Supreme Court. His high legal endowments raised him to an eminence almost peerless in every department of legal practice. He died Dec. 30, 1844, aged seventy-one years.

TAYLOR SHERMAN, a native of Woodbury, Conn., practiced law in Norwalk prior to 1812, contemporaneously with Roger Sherman, of whom, however, he was not a relative. He emigrated to Ohio, and was the grandfather of Gen. W. T. and the present Secretary of the United States Treasury, John Sherman.

Among other lawyers who resided in Fairfield are mentioned the names of John Banks, Jehu Burr, Thomas B. Wakeman, Daniel Wakeman, Burr Wakeman, Thomas B. Osborn, Thomas Robinson, George B. Kissam, George B. Murrey, E. H. Nichols, J. H. Bradley, Abram Wakeman, Edward B. and Frank C. Sturges.

JUDGE ASA CHAPMAN was a native of Saybrook, Conn., and a lineal descendant of Robert Chapman, of Whitby, Yorkshire, England, who was born in 1616, and came to this country in 1635, taking up his residence the following spring at Saybrook, where he served many sessions in the colonial legislature, finally dying on the estate he had settled upon, on Oct. 13, 1687, at the age of seventy-one years.

Judge Chapman was born Sept. 2, 1770, fitted for college with Rev. Frederick W. Hotchkiss, and graduated at Yale in the class of 1792, and shared the highest honors of his class with the Hon. Roger M. Sherman. After he graduated, he taught for a time in the academy of North Salem, and also at Norwalk, and continued to teach while in the practice of his profession. He studied his profession with the Hon. Tapping Reeve, of Litchfield, and was admitted to the bar in 1795, settled in the practice of the law at Newtown, and was repeatedly elected the representative of that town to the General Assembly of the State, and in 1817 was elected a member of the Governor's Council, comprising at that time twelve members. In 1818 he was elected judge of the Superior Court and Court of Errors, which office he held until his death, in New Haven, on Sept. 25, 1825, leaving a widow, who died in 1850, and three sons, the eldest of whom (Charles Chapman, the well-known lawyer of Hartford) had attained the years of manhood.

Judge Chapman married, at Newtown, Miss Mary Perry, a daughter of Bennet Perry, M.D., by whom he had five children (four sons and one daughter). He possessed a vigorous mind and was prompt in his official duties.

CHARLES CHAPMAN, his eldest son, died in Hartford in 1870, at the age of seventy years, and will be remembered by many of our readers as a lawyer of distinction and one of the most witty and genial men of his time. He studied law with Judge Williams, of Hartford, and subsequently with Judges Reeve and Gould, of Litchfield; was admitted to the bar in 1820. He several times represented the city of Hartford in the State Legislature, and represented his district in the Thirty-second Congress of the United States.

REUBEN BOOTH was born in Newtown, Conn., Nov. 26, 1794. While quite young his parents removed to Kent, in this State. He assisted his father at wool-carding until he was about seventeen years of age, when he commenced the preparatory studies for a collegiate course, and in 1813 entered the sophomore class in Yale College. Soon after, his father was drowned in the Housatonic River, and young Booth hastened home, expecting to abandon his collegiate course, as he was unwilling to reduce the slender means of his mother; but a few friends in Kent generously loaned him the amount requisite to complete his course, and he returned to college. He was graduated at the commencement in 1816, being the last at which President Dwight presided. Upon leaving college he entered the law-office of David S. Boardman, at New Milford, where he remained about a year, and then removed to Danbury and continued his studies with Moses Hatch, Esq. At the same time he was employed as an instructor in the academy at Danbury.

He was admitted to the bar in 1818, and immediately opened an office for the practice of his profession in Danbury. In 1822 he represented the town in the General Assembly, and in the same year was appointed judge of Probate of the district of Danbury. He continued in this office until 1835. He was elected State senator in 1830, and in 1844 and 1845 was lieutenant-governor of the State.

At the time of his death his practice was as large as that of any member of the bar in the county. He was distinguished for his industry; his cases were always thoroughly prepared, and his knowledge of the law was accurate. He was at once zealous for his client and courteous to his attorney.

He was well known in this State as a leading and active politician, but his policy was always conservative. During the two years that he was presiding officer of the Senate of this State, the members of that body who were his political opponents felt and acknowledged his liberality of sentiment and conduct. He was always firm in his principles, but when principles were not concerned he regarded and treated his political opponents as friends. He was a warm and generous-hearted man. Remembering that in early life he was indebted to others for aid, no deserving young man ever asked in vain for a loan from him which it was in his power to make. He was simple, unostentatious in his manner, and kind and benevolent in his disposition. He loved the young, and they never feared to approach him, as they knew that his sympathies were with them. He died at Danbury, Aug. 14, 1848, after a brief illness of about two days.

EPAPHRAS W. BULL came to Danbury from Hartford in about 1800, and removed to Ohio in 1841.

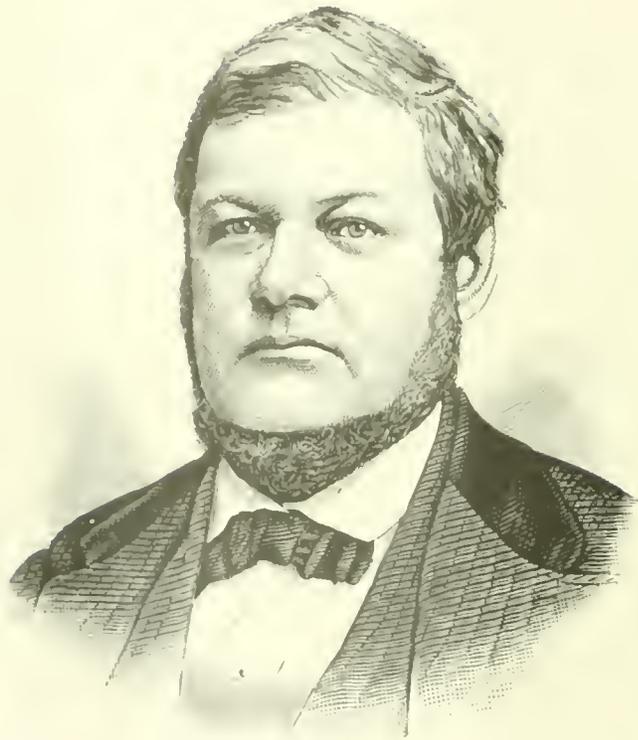

MOSES HATCH came to Danbury from Kent; was an able lawyer, and, with Asa Chapman, defended the negro Amos Adams, who was hanged at Danbury in 1817. He soon after removed to Kent, where he died.

ELISHA WHITTLESEY was also a prominent lawyer in Danbury at the close of the last century.

MATTHEW B. WHITTLESEY commenced practice in Danbury at about the beginning of the present century, and was a prominent and influential citizen. He held various official positions, among which were member of the Legislature and State's attorney.

LYMAN DENNISON BREWSTER was born in Salisbury, Conn., July 31, 1832. He entered the Freshman class of Yale College; graduated in the class of 1855; studied law with Hon. Roger Averill, of Danbury; was admitted to the bar Jan. 21, 1858, and has since practiced his profession in Danbury. He was judge of Probate in 1868, a member of the Legislature in 1870, judge of the Court of Common Pleas, Fairfield County, 1870-74; was elected State senator in 1879 for 1880-81. He was married, Jan. 1, 1868, to Miss Sarah A. Ives, of Danbury.

ROGER AVERILL was born in Salisbury, Conn., Aug. 14, 1809. He was educated at Union College, graduating in the class of 1832. He studied law with Chief Justice Samuel Church, of Salisbury, Conn. He was admitted to the Litchfield County bar, and practiced in Salisbury till, in 1849, he removed to Danbury, where he has since practiced. In 1843 he represented the town of Salisbury in the State Legislature, and was elected judge of Probate, District of Danbury, which position he held for three years; he also held the office of trustee of the State Normal School for thirteen consecutive years. He was elected Lieutenant-Governor in 1862-65, and represented Danbury in the Legislature in 1868. He was appointed commissioner for the State of Connecticut to the World's Fair to be held in New York in 1883, on the one hundredth anniversary of the treaty of peace and recognition of American independence.

Mr. Averill was twice married,—first to Miss Maria D. White, of Danbury. By this marriage he had four children,—Arthur H., a practicing lawyer with his father, in Danbury; John C., practicing with Jeremiah Halsey, of Norwich; Harriet E., and Minnie W. His second wife was Miss Mary A. Perry, of Southport, Conn.

DANIEL B. BOOTH, son of Reuben Booth, studied law in the office of his father, and is now a practicing attorney in Danbury. He has occupied various official positions; has been a representative several terms, judge of Probate, town clerk, etc.

In 1858 he was elected State senator, and has also been a candidate for Congress. In 1874 he was elected by the Legislature judge of the Superior Court, which term expires in 1882.

ORRIS S. FERRY was born at Bethel, Aug. 15, 1823. At the age of seventeen he entered Yale College, and graduated in 1844 with high honors. He commenced the study of the law with Judge Osborne, of Fairfield, and subsequently continued it with Hon. Thomas B. Butler, of Norwalk. He was admitted to the bar in 1846, and for a short time was in partnership with Judge Butler. He rose rapidly in his profession, and, in the language of Asa B. Woodward, Esq., "while yet a young man he ranked among the leaders of the bar in the amount of his business and the ability and success with which it was conducted." He was judge of Probate in Norwalk, in 1855 and 1856 was State senator, and from 1856 to 1859 was State's attorney for Fairfield County. He was elected to Congress in 1859. Being in Washington at the breaking out of the Rebellion, he enlisted in a volunteer battalion for the temporary defense of the capital, and served until troops were obtained from the North. He entered the United States service as colonel of the Fifth Connecticut Regiment, and served through the war. He was subsequently promoted to be brigadier-general. At the close of the war he returned to Norwalk, and in 1866 was elected to the United States Senate and re-elected in 1872, and was regarded as one of the ablest members of that body. He died Nov. 21, 1875.

DWIGHT MORRIS was born at Morris, Conn., Nov. 22, 1820. His father, James Morris, was a graduate of Yale, in the class of 1775, entered the army, and continued through the Revolution, and was a literary man, having published a history of Litchfield County and other meritorious contributions from his pen. Dwight Morris entered Yale and left about the close of the sophomore year and went to Union College, where he graduated in 1838. The honorary degree of A.M. was received by him in 1878 from Yale College.

He studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1840, and commenced practice in Bridgeport, where he has since resided. He represented Bridgeport in the General Assembly in 1845 and 1864; was judge of Probate in 1845, 1851, and 1852. He raised and commanded the Fourteenth Regiment, Connecticut Volunteers, 1862. Left the State with the regiment Aug. 25, 1862. September 7th was assigned to the command of the Second Brigade, French's Division, Second Army Corps; commanded the brigade, numbering two thousand men, at Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862; loss in killed and wounded, five hundred and twenty-nine. He continued the command until February, 1864, when he was mustered out. In 1864 he was nominated by President Lincoln judge of the Territory of Idaho, but declined the appointment, and in February, 1866, was appointed Consul-General to Havre, France, and remained such until Aug. 1, 1869. In November, 1876, was elected Secretary of State of Connecticut, and at present is a representative to the General Court.

JAMES C. LOOMIS was born in Windsor, Conn.,

April 24, 1807. He prepared for college at the grammar school in Hartford, and entered Yale College in 1824, then only seventeen years of age, and graduated with honor in the class of 1828. Among the members of his class were Rev. P. T. Holley, of this city; ex-Governor Hoppin, of Rhode Island; and Judge William Strong, of the United States Supreme Court. Having decided upon the law as a life-work, he commenced his studies at Charlottesville, Va., and completed them in the office of the late Hon. Clark Bissell, of Norwalk. He pursued his studies with diligence and attention, and was admitted to the bar in 1832, and commenced the practice of his profession in Westport, with the late Hon. Samuel B. Sherwood, one of the leaders of the Fairfield bar, which at that time was adorned by such brilliant legal luminaries as Roger Minot Sherman, Charles Hawley, Clark Bissell, T. B. Butler, Reuben Booth, Fitch Wheeler, Henry Dalton, etc.

Mr. Loomis rose rapidly in the profession, and, desiring a more promising field for successful practice, in 1840 removed to Bridgeport, where he at once entered into a large practice and participated actively in public affairs.

In 1848 he formed a copartnership with George W. Warner, which continued several years. He was for a number of years the city attorney and legal adviser of the city, and mayor for one term in 1843. His municipal service was at a period of much excitement, when important questions of finance, etc., had to be grappled with and settled.

The employment of a special steamboat to run in connection with the Housatonic Railroad in opposition to the old line at this period caused the exhibition of much bad blood between the partisans of the rival line, and Mayor Loomis was repeatedly called upon to appear with posse to keep the peace on the arrival of trains from Albany.

He twice represented his town in the lower house of the State Legislature, and once or twice the Tenth District as State's senator, and by virtue of this position became a member of the corporation of Yale College. The business and investments of Mr. Loomis were very successful financially, and he finally, a few years previous to his death, withdrew from the active practice of his profession, dividing his time between the cares of his private affairs and numerous public interests, with which he became identified. The most arduous and important public service of the later years of his life was in connection with the public schools of the town. In April, 1876, the town voted to consolidate the school districts, and elected a new board of education for the care and management of the schools, of which he was elected president. He at once entered with an interest and zest peculiar to himself upon the work of organization, involving an amount of thought, attention, and labor few can realize.

He was one of the first projectors of Seaside Park, was a commissioner thereon, and was very active and influential in its early improvement and management.

At the time of his decease he was president of the Bar Association of Fairfield County, of the board of education, of the Mountain Grove Cemetery, of the Bridgeport Library Association, and was also an active director in the City National Bank, and trustee of the People's Savings-Bank.

He manifested a decided interest in religious matters; was president of the stockholders' association for the erection of the present edifice of the First Congregational Society from 1849 to about 1860, when its interests became merged in and absorbed by the society, of which he was also a member and liberal supporter. He was a constant attendant upon public worship.

In 1833 he united in marriage with Miss Eliza Mitchell, of New Haven, who, together with their young son, died in 1841. In 1844 he married Mary B., daughter of Ira Sherman, Esq.; their family consisted of two children,—a son and a daughter,—both deceased, the former while a member of the senior class in Yale College, and the latter in early childhood.

Politically, Mr. Loomis was a conservative Democrat, and in 1861 and again in 1862 was the candidate of his party for Governor of the State against Mr. William A. Buckingham. Though he failed of gubernatorial honors at this period, during his long career almost any position, political or judicial, would seem to have been within his reach; but he was never sufficiently ambitious to strive very earnestly for such honors, or to accept them when proffered.

His death made a painful void in his home, in the family and social circle, in the church and society to which he was attached, in the legal profession, and in numerous boards in which he presided or participated. He died at South Egremont, Mass., Sept. 16, 1877.

AMOS SHERMAN TREAT was born in the town of Bridgewater, Litchfield Co., Conn., Feb. 5, 1816. He is a son of Daniel A. and Almira Sherman Treat, and is a lineal descendant of Richard Treat, one of the patentees in the colonial charter, and of his son Robert Treat, for many years Governor of Connecticut. On the maternal side he is descended from Samuel Sherman, one of the pioneers of Connecticut. His father owned a small farm in Bridgewater, and died when the subject of this sketch was twelve years of age, leaving a widow and five children. Having decided upon a collegiate course, he prepared for college in Hudson, Ohio, and entered Yale College. After leaving college he taught school in South Carolina, and still later in New Jersey. He commenced the study of the law with Hon. Jacob W. Miller, of Morristown, N. J., at one time United States Senator from that State, and completed his studies with C. R. Butler, Esq., of Plymouth, Conn. He was admitted to the bar in Litchfield in 1843, and commenced the practice of his profession in Newtown, Conn., where he remained until July 12, 1854, when he removed to Bridgeport, where he has since resided, except from May, 1870, to November, 1875, when he lived in Woodbridge, in this State. Although actively engaged in the practice of an arduous profession, Mr. Treat has been much in public life, and has manifested a genuine interest in public affairs and in all projects tending to advance the material interests of his adopted city and the county in general.

He was clerk of the Fairfield County Court from 1854 to 1859; member of the Peace Congress in 1861; represented Bridgeport in the Connecticut Legislature in 1858, 1862, 1869, and 1879; and Woodbridge in the same body in 1871, 1872, and 1873.

He was Speaker of the House in 1872, chosen to that position by the Republican party, of which he has been a member since its organization. He was a director in the Bridgeport and City National Banks; director in the Gas-Light Company many years; and its president for ten years. While a resident of Newtown he was a member of the board of education several years, and postmaster one year.

In the Masonic fraternity Mr. Treat has taken a prominent position. He was made a Mason in 1855, and has held nearly all the offices of the lodge, including Master. He has also held nearly all the offices in Hamilton Commandery, and has been its Eminent Commander, and was Grand Commander of the State Commandery in 1868 and 1869.

Dec. 15, 1869, he united in marriage with Mary A., only daughter of Treat Clark, of Woodbridge, Conn., and they have one daughter, Mary Clark, born Jan. 28, 1872. Mr. Treat attends the North Congregational Church.

JOSEPH F. FOOT has practiced law in Norwalk more than a quarter of a century, and has always been considered an excellent legal adviser. He was for several years one of the justices of Fairfield County.

The following list of Stamford lawyers is taken chiefly from Huntington's "History of Stamford":

JOHN DAVENPORT, the first child of Hon. Abraham and Elizabeth (Huntington) Davenport, was born in Stamford, Jan. 16, 1752. He graduated at Yale in 1770. His scholarship is indicated in his appointment to a tutorship in 1773. Entering on the legal profession, he was soon called to take an important place among the Revolutionary patriots of that day. With a major's commission he was employed in commissary department, and his duties here were often onerous and difficult. When the patriot cause was suffering for the want of a suitable public interest in the welfare of the new nation just ordained by the Declaration of Independence, he was appointed by the Assembly of the State as one of a commission to visit the principal towns and arouse the people to a just sense of their dangers and move them to corresponding exertions. On the death of his brother James, in 1799, he was chosen to take his place in the national Congress, and held his seat in the House of Representatives until 1817, when he declined a reelection. He was a member of the Congregational Church in Stamford, of which he was appointed deacon in 1795. This was the office in which his eminent goodness was best shown. He was, to his death, an example of earnest, living piety, whose fruits were ever manifest in the character of a benevolent, fervent, and exemplary Christian. His death occurred Nov. 28, 1830.

JOEL T. BENELECT, son of Rev. Mr. Benedict, of North Stamford, after a short practice of his legal profession became a preacher.

JAMES STEVENS was the youngest child of David and Mary (Talmage) Stevens, and was born July 4, 1768, in that part of Stamford—Ponus Street—which has since been incorporated with the town of New Canaan. He became a lawyer and opened an office in his native town, in the village of Stamford. He was a man of considerable native talent, and, joining heartily in the Democratic movement, then inaugurated, he won his way to a seat in the House of Representatives of our national Congress. He was in that famous Congress which passed the "Missouri Compromise," and gave his vote for that measure. He represented Stamford thirteen times in the State Legislature, and was much in public life until his death, which took place April 4, 1835. A brief obituary of him in the Sentinel of that date says, "Mr. Stevens has been extensively known as a kind neighbor and friend, as a politician of sterling integrity, and as an inflexible advocate of Democratic principles. He has represented this town in both branches of the Legislature of this State; was for some time a judge of the County Court; has been a representative from this State in the Congress of the United States."

SIMEON H. MINOR was son of ———, of Woodbury, where he was born, in 1777. He was descended from that Thomas Minor who was born at Chew Magna, England, April 23, 1608; came to New England in 1630, and settled in New London in 1645, where he died in 1690. He was a prominent man among the settlers in Eastern Connecticut. His family name dates back to about the middle of the fourteenth century, when the third Edward bestowed it upon Henry the Miner, of Mendippe Hills, Somersetshire, England, for his prompt efficiency in furnishing him an escort as he embarked on that famous invasion of France in which he won the battle of Crecy against so great odds.

John Minor, third son of John, of New London, was born in 1634 (so Cothren, in his "History of Woodbury," says), went to Stratford, and thence to Woodbury, and was a leading man for years. Simeon H., of Stamford, was probably a great-great-grandson of this second John. On being admitted to the bar, he settled in Stamford in 1831, and spent here the rest of his life. He rapidly won a high position at the Fairfield County bar, of which he was a promiment member until his death, Aug. 2, 1840. The Stamford Advocate of the same week pays a high tribute to his professional ability: "Possessed of a strong mind and sound legal judgment, no member of the bar commanded a greater share of practice, until his health began to fail him, than he. For fourteen years he discharged the office of State's attorney." He represented the town in six sessions of the Legislature, and was judge of Probate several years. In the discharge of all official duties he was prompt and efficient.

FREDERICK SCOFIELD, son of Benjamin and brother of Selleck Scofield, was born Aug. 13, 1778. He graduated at Yale in 1801, and entered the legal profession, and for a few years had an office here. He subsequently became a teacher in Philadelphia, where he died in 1841.

JOSEPH WOOD was a descendant, in the sixth generation, of Jonas Wood, one of the pioneers of the settlement in Stamford. Joseph Wood, second, a great-grandson of the pioneer, removed from Hempsted to Stanwich, where Joseph was born, March 24, 1779. His father, David, son of the above Joseph, second, was among the respectable farmers of Stanwich, a man of intelligence and piety. His mother, Sarah Ingersoll, was noted for her cheerful and amiable disposition. Brought up on his father's farm, he acquired habits of industry, and, being of an inquisitive turn of mind, he commenced in his seventeenth year fitting for college. He graduated at Yale in 1801, and devoted himself to the legal profession. His law-teacher was Judge Chauncey, of New Haven. He was admitted to the bar of New Haven, when he selected Stamford as the field for commencing his professional career. Here he opened an office in 1803, where he continued to practice until 1829. During his stay here he was held in esteem as a good citizen and honorable in his profession. He represented the town in the State Legislature, and was judge of Probate several years.

In 1826, Mr. Wood removed to Bridgeport, thence to New York City in 1837, and from this city, in 1841, to New Haven, where he spent the remainder of his life. Here he stood among the first citizens of the classic city in intelligence and social worth. After his removal to New Haven he was appointed judge of the County Court, in which office he showed eminent qualities as jurist. His stern and sterling integrity never forsook him here. He was still later chosen to the office of city clerk. His tastes were especially literary. While in New York he had edited an agricultural periodical. He had also gathered largely the materials for a memoir of his father-in-law, but never published it. He died Nov. 13, 1856, during a session of the literary club at the residence of Rev. Pres. Day, just after an interesting discussion in which he had taken part.

BENJAMIN T. SHELTON is reported as a practicing lawyer here in 1812.

CHARLES HAWLEY was born June 15, 1792, in what is now the town of Monroe, formerly Huntington, and still earlier Stratford. His ancestors were among the early settlers of that old town, and both on his father's and mother's side they were among the most respectable and honored of the settlers. Joseph Hawley, the progenitor of the family in this country, came to Stratford, probably with the pioneers of the town, and for many years was a leading man in the new colony. He represented the town several times in the State General Assembly. In his will in 1689 he gives to his son Samuel all his "buildings and lands in Parwidge, Derbyshire, in old England," indicating thus, no doubt, the early English locality of the family. On his mother's side Mr. Hawley was descended from William Curtiss, another of the prominent settlers of Stratford. He also numbered among his Stratford ancestors Henry de Forest, who fled from France on the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in 1655, and Richard Booth, the ancestor of another honored line. Thus Mr. Hawley is found to belong to the best names of which our country can boast. From a record of his ancestors, gathered by him with much pains and care, we learn the following facts: His great-great-grandmother, Bethia Booth, was born in 1658, and lived until 1759. At the time of her death, her grandson, Milton Hawley, the grandfather of Charles, was twenty-four years of age; and at the date of his death, in 1819, Charles was twenty-six. Thus it was made possible for Mr. Hawley, in 1865, to report from the lips of his grandfather the story which he had learned from the lips of his grandmother of events coming under her personal observation as far back as 1665. Possibly so rare an opportunity of learning the family story may account for one of the most marked characteristics of Mr. Hawley's later years,—his strong family affection.

Mr. Hawley graduated at Yale College in 1816, and entered on the study of law in the Litchfield Law School. On being admitted to the bar, he established himself in Stamford in 1819. From the first his diligence in business and his zeal in working won the confidence of the public. That he might fit himself locally for his profession, he made himself early familiar with the records and traditions of the town, and even became so much interested in these gleanings for professional use as to form a plan of the history of the town. But he rose so rapidly in his profession that he found himself obliged to abandon this attempt; and so the opportunity of preserving much of the material for such a history which then existed was forever lost to the town.

Giving himself wholly to his professional work, he soon placed himself among the first jurists of the State. From the very beginning of his professional career he was thorough, exact, and exhaustive in whatever cause he undertook. His sense of right and justice was as keen as his discriminations of falsehood and truth, and this made him one of the most persistent and inexorable of advocates. A cause accepted by him became a bond on his conscience, and he could do no less than his best in its management. He was never a politician, yet few men of the age had more carefully studied the whole science of government. Without seeking or wishing office, he represented his adopted town in seven sessions of the State Legislature, and once represented his senatorial district in the State Senate. Once, also, he served the State as its lieutenant-governor. But his tastes and aims were pre-eminently professional, and his success and reward, both in professional eminence and in substantial wealth, were very great. His estate was one of the largest ever gathered in the town, and it was as solid as it was large.

Of Mr. Hawley's fine literary tastes almost every plea he made for the last half of his professional career, and indeed his most ordinary conversation on ordinary topics, gave most abundant proofs. His language was exceedingly terse and exact, rising often, under the glow of earnest feeling, to a high degree of strong and fervid eloquence. In his religious experience Mr. Hawley's record is peculiarly one of the conscience and heart. Educated early in the faith of the Congregational Church, to the day of his death he accepted and cordially endorsed that faith. Without ever making a public profession of religion, few men have given better evidence of the control of religious principles, and both his lips and his life modestly yet unequivocally assured those who knew him best that his was the faith of Jesus.

Mr. Hawley was married Jan. 28, 1821, by the Rev. Jonathan Judd, rector of St. John's Church, in Stamford, to Mary S., daughter of David Holly, Esq., of Stamford.

ALFRED A. HOLLY, son of John William and Rebecca (Welles) Holly, of Stamford, graduated at Union College in 1818; was admitted to the bar, and began practice here. He soon left the profession, and since then has been connected with the Stamford and savings-banks of the town.

JOHN BISSEL was a student of law in the office of Charles Hawley, and, after being admitted to the bar, opened an office here, but soon went to New York City.

HON. TRUMAN SMITH, formerly United States senator, is also a resident of Stamford. When in practice he ranked among the sound and able lawyers of the Connecticut bar.

JOSHUA BEAL FERRIS, son of Joshua and Letitia (Lockwood) Ferris, was born in Greenwich, Conn., Jan. 13, 1804. The name Ferris is from Leicestershire, England, from Henry, son of Gualchelme de Feriers, house of Feriers, to whom William the Conqueror gave large grants of land in the three shires of Stafford, Derby, and Leicester. Thus the ancestry of Mr. Ferris is traced back through Jeffrey Ferris (spelled Firries in old records of Stamford) from America to England and to France.

Jeffrey Ferris, who was made freeman in Boston in 1635, came with the first settlers, helped pay for the first survey, and received ten acres of the first allotment of land. Savage says he was from Watertown, Mass., going from there to Wethersfield, thence with the first colony to this section. He was one of the eleven Greenwich men who petitioned to be accepted under the New Haven jurisdiction. He lived thereafter in Greenwich, and died in 1666.

During the many years the ancestors of Mr. Ferris have resided in Greenwich, they have been agriculturists, well-to-do, not rich, and in his early years Mr. Ferris attended the common schools, but while still young was placed under the tutelage of and prepared for college by Rev. Daniel Smith, of Stamford (who was pastor of the Congregational church for more than forty years), and entered Yale College in 1819, graduating there in 1823. Immediately thereafter Mr. Ferris began teaching a preparatory school for boys in Stamford, at the same time devoting every hour he could give to the reading of law, on which his mind constantly dwelt. He continued teaching until 1833, but was admitted to the bar in 1829. He spent some time in Hon. Charles Hawley's office as clerk of Probate for Mr. Hawley, who was Probate judge. In 1833, Mr. Ferris opened an office as a lawyer, and has been in active practice since. About 1870, Mr. Ferris admitted Calvin G. Child, and afterwards Samuel Fessenden, into partnership. Mr. Child, in 1875, opened an office for himself, and the firm has since been "Ferris & Fessenden."

Mr. Ferris married, in 1823, Sally H., daughter of William B. Peters, Esq., whose father was the celebrated Rev. Dr. Peters, of Hebron, Conn. She was born in Stamford. Their children have been: Harriet (deceased), Samuel J. (lost at sea), Isadore W., Joshua B. (who was drowned), Elizabeth J. (who married William R. Fosdick, of Stamford), Mary L. (who married Rev. E. O. Flagg, of New York), Samuel P. (now a major in the United States army), and Henry J. (now residing in New York).

Mr. Ferris represented Stamford in the State Legislature in 1836-38, and was a member of the State Senate during 1840-41 and 1849-50. He was appointed judge of Probate (to succeed Hon. Charles Hawley) by the General Assembly in 1838, and held that office many years. He was also State's attorney for several years. His politics, in early life, were in accord with the Whig party. Since the organization of the Republican party he has given that his support.

From the beginning of his practice, Mr. Ferris has taken rank with the ablest lawyers of his age in the county. His client's interests have always been his own, and he has shown great shrewdness in the management of his cases, and care in preparing the minute details on which success so often depends. As a counselor he is careful, far-seeing, and safe. His courteous demeanor and unaffected politeness render his companionship pleasing, and have tended to win him many friends. He has been engaged in many difficult and laborious cases in the highest courts of the State, and has a reputation for integrity, fidelity to the interests of his clients, indefatigable labor, and legal acumen second to no other lawyer in this section of the State. Many interesting and important cases in which he has participated might be cited had we space, and did it comport with the wishes of Mr. Ferris to publish them.

WILLIAM THOMAS MINOR, LL.D., the second son of Simeon H., of this town, graduated at Yale in 1834, and studied law with his father. After being admitted to the bar he commenced practice in his native town, where he has continued to reside. He has always been popular at home, and his townsmen from the first have looked to him as a leader for them in all local movements for the prosperity of the town. He has represented the town in the State Legislature seven times, and once his district in the State Senate. In 1855 he was chosen Governor of Connecticut, and re-elected the next year. He received in 1855 the honorary degree of LL.D. from the Wesleyan University at Middletown. In 1864 he was appointed by President Lincoln consul-general to Havana, which office he resigned in 1867. On returning to his native town he was chosen to represent the town in the State Legislature, and by the Legislature he was appointed judge of the Superior Court of the State.

HENRY A. MITCHELL, of New Canaan, was here in 1842 and 1843.

JAMES H. OLMSTEAD was born in Ridgefield, Conn., Nov. 24, 1830. He was educated at the district schools of his native town and Ridgefield Academy. He subsequently taught school in Tarrytown, N. Y., and other places, and finally, having decided upon the legal profession as a life-work, went to Stamford and commenced his studies in the office of the late Charles Hawley. He continued his studies with diligence and attention, and in October, 1854, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in his adopted town of Stamford, where he has since resided. He entered into the practice with vigor and persistency, and soon took a prominent position at the Fairfield bar. He was appointed State's attorney in 1874; was reappointed, and again received the appointment, but resigned the office July 1, 1889. He was judge of Probate five years, and member of the Legislature in 1874. During his official career as State's attorney he prosecuted ten trials for murder, the first being that of James Lattin, and the last the celebrated Buckholz case. He discharged his official duties fearlessly, and, in the language of a present judge of the Superior Court, "was one of the most vigorous prosecutors in the State."

Oct. 2, 1854, he united in marriage with Adelaide F., daughter of the late Col. Lorenzo Meeker, and their family has consisted of eight children, four of whom are living,—viz., Cora Montgomery Meeker, Irving, Fanny, and Mary.

FRANCIS M. HAWLEY, son of the Hon. Charles, a native of Stamford, graduated at Trinity College, studied law with his father, was admitted to the bar in 1864, and opened here a law-office.

JULIUS B. CURTIS was born at Newtown, Conn., Dec. 10, 1825. He was the only son of Nicholas and Sarah A. (Bennett) Curtis, and is a lineal descendant of William Curtis, one of the first settlers of Stratford, Conn. (The birthplace of Mr. Curtis is erroneously given in Huntington's "History of Stamford" as being at Stamford.)

Mr. Curtis received his early education at the public schools of his native town, supplemented by one year's attendance at the Newtown Academy and at a private school of academic character. But his education was largely obtained by studying alone without the aid of a teacher.

He commenced the study of law with Hon. Edward Hinman, of Southbury, Conn., in the summer of 1846, and afterwards continued his legal readings under Isaac M. Sturges, Esq., then of Newtown, and Hon. Amos S. Treat, completing his studies at the law school at Ballston Springs, Saratoga Co., N. Y., in the summer of 1850, and was admitted to the bar at Fairfield, Conn., at the session of County Court held in December, 1850.

Mr. Curtis commenced the practice of his profession at Greenwich, Conn., in the summer of 1851, and soon took high rank and established a fine practice. He was elected in 1858 and re-elected in 1860 as senator, to represent the Twelfth Senatorial District in the General Assembly of the State. He removed to Stamford in the fall of 1864 and opened an office for the practice of law.

In 1867, Mr. Curtis was elected judge of the court of Probate for the district of Stamford, and held the office by successive yearly elections until 1870. His practice as a lawyer is extensive. In his profession he is esteemed as acute, painstaking, and diligent; of perfect rectitude, one can intrust business to him without fear that his trust is misplaced. As a lawyer he is logical and argumentative, rests his case upon the law, and his presentation of it is apt to discover any technical defect in an opponent's case.

In politics he has ever been a pronounced Free-Soiler; voted for Martin Van Buren and Charles Francis Adams in 1848. Previously he was a Whig, and a Republican from the first nominations of that party.

Mr. Curtis married Mary Acker, daughter of Peter and Mary Acker, of Greenwich, Oct. 30, 1854. Their two children are Sarah, born March 9, 1866, and Louis J., born March 11, 1869.

Mr. Curtis is of positive character, independent thought, and close reasoning powers,—does not blindly follow the lead of any one, but must satisfy himself that his course is right. He is strong and loyal in his friendships, and would stand alone, if occasion demanded, to defend either a friend or a principle, and, in consequence, has to a large degree the respect and confidence of the community. He is pre-eminently the enemy of shams, wherever they exist, and nothing will sooner disgust him than hypocrisy, prevarication, or untruth. He has been a diligent and persistent worker in his chosen sphere, and has met with good reward financially and otherwise.

CALVIN G. CHILD, son of Asa Child, Esq., a native of Norwich, Conn., graduated at Yale in 1855, and practiced law in New York until 1866, when he removed to this place. He died Sept. 28, 1880.

SAMUEL FESSENDEN, the present State's attorney, is also a resident of Stamford.

JUDGE GEORGE A. DAVENPORT is of English descent, which may be traced through a long line of ancestry, reaching back, according to the "Davenport Genealogy" of Mr. A. B. Benedict, to the eleventh century. He was born in Wilton, Fairfield Co., Conn., Jan. 31, 1808. His father was a manufacturer of woolen fabrics in a small way, carrying on farming at the same time. His educational advantages were both common school and academic. At the conclusion of his studies he entered the profession of the law. Of his career as Probate judge, however, we wish more particularly to write, and we think we cannot do better than to quote entire an article appearing in the Norwalk Gazette, Jan. 8, 1878, upon the retirement of the judge from the office which for nearly thirty years he had filled so creditably:

"During the present month Judge George A. Davenport, who for a quarter of a century has administered the duties of the Orphans' Court of the district of Norwalk, will retire from further service by reason of the constitutional limitation of age. This is no trivial event in our local history. Few, if any, Probate districts in the country have been so highly favored with such exceptional capacity and fidelity to public trust, and we are sure that the regrets at Judge Davenport's retirement will be both universal and sincere. Differing as widely as the poles with him in many things, we all the more gladly bespeak the district's obligations and gratitude with the most hearty unreserve. Both parties have uniformly voted for him as the best possible candidate that could be chosen for the trying and responsible duties of Probate judge. The angry disputes he has quelled among those once friends, the jealousies and heart-burnings among members of the same families he has removed, the expensive lawsuits and vexatious litigations he has prevented by his own free and sound advice,—all are matters of conspicuous local history. Of all the wills he has drawn, settlements and decisions he has made, not one has ever been upset or reversed. His records are models of clerkly beauty and neatness, and marvels of legal accuracy.

"We trust we shall not yet lose the wisdom of his ripe experience and counsels, or the light of his presence among us for many years to come. Though relieved from official responsibility and drudgeries, he may yet serve his generation in many important ways, and he will not fail to do so.

"On the 31st of January, 1878, Judge Davenport reached his seventieth year, and was by legal limitation debarred from holding the office of judge of Probate."

Judge Davenport was married early in life to Miss Mary Sturges, of Wilton, Fairfield Co., Conn. Their children are Mary A., wife of Charles B. White, surgeon in the United States army; Julia A.; Benjamin, a graduate of the law school of the University of Georgetown, D. C., now practicing as an attorney and counselor-at-law in the city of Washington; Daniel, graduate of Yale, studied law in the office of Woodward & Perry, Norwalk, now attorney and counselor-at-law in Bridgeport, married Mary E. Jones; Timothy, graduate of Yale, and attended New Haven Law School; and Sarah.

ISAAC MOREHOUSE STURGES was born in Wilton, Fairfield Co., Conn., July 6, 1807, and died at his sister's residence in that town on the 30th day of October, 1877.

Admitted to the bar of Fairfield County in January, 1837, he at once commenced practice in Newtown, removing from that place to Bridgeport in 1848, where he soon obtained a large clientage and continued in the full discharge of his professional duties till the last. He had been engaged in the trial of a cause the day before his death, and left it unfinished at the close of the day, intending to continue the trial on the morrow, but died very suddenly from an attack of heart-disease before the morrow came.

His father, Erastus Sturges, a farmer living at Wilton, was a justice of the peace of the old school, fourteen times elected to the General Assembly, and a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1818; before him were tried many cases, and Betts, Bissell, and Sherwood, in their management of justice trials, furnished the student with examples of legal ability and models for emulation,—the only school of instruction open to him, for until his admission to the bar Mr. Sturges had never been present at a higher court.

Entering the profession somewhat late in life with limited educational advantages, being mainly those, aside from attendance at district schools in the winter months, derived from three years' instruction at the Wilton Academy, then under the charge of the late Mr. Hawley Olmstead, with his opportunity for literary culture circumscribed, he neglected nothing, but treasured everything of which he could avail himself, and brought to the chosen calling of his life a mind so matured and trained that he became not only an acknowledged leader of a bar where leadership carried with it deserved recognition of ability, but outside of professional studies he was one of the best read of our number,* and kept himself abreast of all that was new in literature and science. He thought earnestly, talked well, and applied with discrimination the thoughts and opinions of others. His chief characteristic was thoroughness. In the techniques of the profession he had hardly a superior; he elaborated every detail sometimes beyond apparent necessity, but he always had a precedent for every proposition suggested, and, with abiding faith in his own premises, he considered it his duty to force a recognition from the court by citing numerous authorities of the conclusions which he deemed established. He took nothing for granted in the court or in anything else, but developed his argument with syllogistic precision "Ab ovo usque ad mala." This minuteness of research characterized his professional life throughout. It was unsafe to disregard his law, for the motion in error was sure to follow, urged with dangerous persistency; it was unwise to be heedless of his facts, for each was claimed for a fixed and special purpose in the line of his argument; and as a result of such completeness few were employed in as many cases, none was more able as a practitioner, and so vigorous was he as an adversary that it was unsafe to meet him, with hope of success, having a single weak spot in armor, for his thrust was unerring with whatever weapon he went to battle, and he never asked nor gave quarter.

One eminent in our profession has called Judge Hosmer "a traveling index of the law." There was no safer digest for Fairfield County than Mr. Sturges, for his tenacious memory and diligent research enabled him to furnish information of some decision on almost every conceivable point,—information which he was always ready to impart.

Somewhat of a recluse in his habits, being unmarried, and living quite by himself in bachelor quarters till the last few years of his life, when he made his home with a sister in Wilton, going to his office at Bridgeport daily, he acquired a taste for a solitary life which at times made him appear unsocial; but his character when sought out and known was thoroughly cordial and kindly. He seemed to dread the first approach to companionship or intimacy, but after the friendship was formed he was loyal to it in word and deed. Possessed of a sensitiveness which at times almost mastered him, he seemed desirous to appear to the world as indifferent to criticism, censure, or praise. He aimed to be strictly just, but the equipoise of the scales which he prided himself in holding well balanced was not rarely disturbed by a genial kindness which he never admitted he possessed. Without being lavish in expenditure or in the least degree ostentatious, he showed in many ways, quietly and without publicity, a generosity which sprang from a large-hearted sympathy and thorough unselfishness. His ambition centred in his profession. He was, however, elected a representative from Wilton in 1837, from Newtown in 1844, and again from Wilton in 1876. He was judge of Probate of the district of Newtown in 1844, and judge of the City Court of Bridgeport in 1860-61.

"The annals of lawyers, like the annals of the poor, are brief and simple. No memorial can keep their memories from oblivion, even in the next generation, except the brief record of their forensic contests to be found in the Connecticut Reports." So wrote Mr. Sturges shortly before his death. Surely in that record, which shows to a certain extent what the lawyer is, few have a more prominent place.

And thus another passes from the brotherhood of the profession,—that brotherhood which amidst the contentions and emulation of forensic struggles admits a generous chivalry in its antagonisms and ends contests with the adjournment of court; which respects rivalry, buries animosity, and recognizes in the leadership earned by professional prominence the tribute due to patient effort in an honorable calling.

WILLIAM F. TAYLOR.

WM. F. TAYLOR was born in Augusta, Ga., Oct. 27, 1823. His father, Francis C. Taylor, for many years a merchant of that city, was a direct descendant of Thomas Taylor, one of the first settlers and patentees of Danbury. His mother, Hannah N. Church Taylor, was a native of the city of Dublin, Ireland, from which place, at the age of one year, she emigrated to the city of Baltimore, Md., where resided her relatives, the Pattersons, one of which family afterwards married Jerome Bonaparte. Mrs. Taylor and her mother's family afterwards removed to the State of Georgia, where they owned large tracts of land granted to them by the English government.

William F. Taylor removed to Danbury at about the age of eight, where he attended school, pursuing all the English and classical studies, until about sixteen years old, when he began the study of law in the office of Fish & Bridgeman, in the city of New York. Returning to Danbury in the year 1841, he entered the sophomore class of Trinity, then Washington College, Hartford, from which he graduated, taking one of the first honors of his class.

On leaving college he read law in the office of the late Gov. Charles Hawley, at Stamford, for one year, leaving this office to enter that of the late Hon. S. H. Hiekok, of Danbury, at the request of the latter-named gentleman. He remained here but a few months, being obliged to suspend his studies from prostration caused by severe hemorrhage of the lungs, afterwards finishing his preparation for the profession of the law under the instruction of the late Hon. Edward Taylor, then judge of Fairfield County. He was admitted to the bar in August, 1846.

Owing to the death of the late Hon. S. H. Hiekok, which occurred about this time, Mr. Taylor, from his connection with him, succeeded to nearly the whole of his practice, jumping, as it were, immediately into medias res, and from that moment his law business has been very great, extending into various other and sometimes distant States, and from the most inferior courts to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In 1848, Mr. Taylor received the degree of Master of Arts from Trinity College. In 1850 he was appointed State's attorney of Fairfield County, which office he held for a period of three years. In 1852 he was elected Democratic Presidential elector for the Fourth District of Connecticut, voting for Peirce and King. He was elected Democratic State senator for the Eleventh District of Connecticut, which was the only senatorial district that gave a majority to the Democracy at that election. In 1865 he received the Democratic nomination for Congress in the Fourth District, and, although defeated, ran some hundreds ahead of his ticket. Mr. Taylor has also been elected at various times treasurer of the town of Danbury, including school visitor, and for the past four years has been president of the board of education of that town.

He has also at various times been engaged in different public enterprises, and to his efforts, almost solely, the Pahquioque National Bank owes its origin, and for the most of the time since its incorporation he has been one of its directors and rendered it most valuable aid. He aided greatly in the creation of the Union Savings-Bank of Danbury, and is a charter member of the same.

On the 16th of September, 1856, Mr. Taylor was married to Miss Isabella Meeker, of Danbury. Their children are three in number, one son and two daughters. The son, a young man of much promise, is a member of the bar of Fairfield County, and is practicing law with his father.

Mr. Taylor is an Episcopalian, but attends regularly with his wife and family, a portion of every Sunday, the Congregational church, of which she is a member.

He is of a strong vital temperament, like that of his father's family. His ancestor Thomas Taylor was the father of eight children whose aggregate ages amounted to eight hundred and fifty-eight, two or three of them attaining to over one hundred years each. From this family was descended the late Dr. Nathaniel Taylor of the Yale Theological School, the father of the wife of President Porter of Yale College, also President Seely of Amherst College. P. T. Barnum is also one of the descendants.

The senior members of the bar of this county have many of them made up their records; those still left are soon to follow, and the juniors are to assume their places at the bar and on the bench; to them will soon be committed these great responsible trusts. The perpetuity of our free institutions is committed to the guardianship and keeping of the bar and judiciary of our free country, for the history of the world teaches, and all free governments illustrate, this truth,—treat the subject lightly as you will,—that to the profession of the law civil government is indebted for all the safeguards and intrenchments with which the liberties of the people are protected; that legislation is shaped, constitutions enlarged, amended, and adopted by the enlightened administration of the statesmen, both of England and the United States, who have been in both, and are in all free governments, educated for the bar, and, ascending by the inherent force of their disciplined professional life, they become the directors of the destinies of states and nations.

Military chieftains may spring into power; tyrants may for the hour dazzle, with the glamour of military parade and the pomp of war, an oppressed and frenzied people; but they turn, as the cannonade dies away, to the statesmanship of the country, and call to the parliaments and congressional halls for final debate the arbitrations of the liberties of the people.

From the days of King John to the present hour the bar and the bench have furnished the statesmen who have erected the bulwarks of constitutional law, and extorted from tyrants the Magna Charta which have secured to the oppressed the guarantees of free institutions.

Imbued with the historical traditions of their predecessors, and tracing the paths they have trod, emulating their good example, it should become more and more the resolute purpose of the Fairfield County bar to so walk in the light of their professional teachings that when they are called to follow them to that upper court, and file their judgment-roll of the great trial of life with that Supreme Judge from whose bar they can take no appeal,—

"Thou go not like the quarry-slave at night
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

CHAPTER III.

MEDICAL HISTORY.—THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

MEDICAL HISTORY.

THE records of the Fairfield County Medical Society, as they exist to-day, begin with the year 1825. No mention is made in them of any previous date, excepting that in 1826 it was "Noted, To pay the clerk for advertising medical notice for the last five years and a record-book for said society, amounting to six dollars and twenty-five cents." But the associations of the several counties in the State were formed at a much earlier period. The New Haven Medical Society was in existence in 1784 as "The Associated Faculty of New Haven." The movement which ended in chartering the Connecticut Medical Society was initiated by the New Haven society. The New London County Medical Society was then in existence, for a reply from it on the granting of a charter for the State society bears date "New London, April 20, 1784."

In Fairfield County, however, no medical society existed previous to the chartering of the Connecticut Medical Society. (See "Historical Account of the Origin of the Connecticut Medical Society," by Henry Bronson, M. D., "Proceedings Connecticut Medical Society," 1873, p. 199, and "Blakeman's Address," 1853.)

To give importance to the movement and weight to the appeal for the charter of the Connecticut society, which met with opposition from the State Legislature, several distinguished and influential physicians from other counties were admitted to membership in the New Haven County Society. Among these were Amos Mead, of Greenwich, Joseph Trowbridge, of Danbury, and James Clark, of Stratford ("Bronson's Address"). The desired charter was obtained in 1792, and this year may be regarded as the first of the existence of the Fairfield County Medical Society.

Dr. Rufus Blakeman, of Greenfield, president of the Connecticut Medical Society in 1853, made the subject of his address "The Early Physicians of Fairfield County." In this he states that the Fairfield County society united, with a commendable zeal, with those of the other counties in an application to the Legislature for the charter of the State society. Candor and consideration of all the statements found compel the assertion rather that several distinguished physicians of the county were among the petitioners, but not any organized society from this county. Dr. C. W. Chamberlain, of Hartford, secretary of the State Medical Society, has very kindly furnished a copy of the proceedings of the society for the year 1853, so that, fortunately, we are able to produce the interesting address of Dr. Blakeman in full.

* Contributed by N. E. Wordin, M.D., of Bridgeport.

The purpose in forming these several societies (for they must in a measure be considered together) was "to adopt such measures for the future regulation of our salutary art as shall effectually support and countenance merit and discountenance ignorance and presumption," "the encouragement of an accurate study in the theory and practice of physic and surgery," "to collect and preserve useful papers relative to the practice of medicine." It was their purpose then, as it is ours now, to keep our great and sacred ars medendi above the plane of an ordinary business which advertises and solicits trade, to protect and help its own members, and, so far as possible, to educate the public and protect them from charlatan-ism. They recognized the benefits to be derived from association and discussion, the contact of mind with mind. Individual influence is like the tap of a tack-hammer; a united society deals the ponderous blow of a sledge. Everything tended to encourage their coming together. Consultations could not be very frequent; libraries were small; there was no medical college in the State. The first meeting of which we have the records was held at the house of Silas Camp, in Bridgeport, on the third Monday of April, 1825. I can find no trace of the previous records by inquiry of the former secretaries. The meetings at that time were held annually at different towns in the county indiscriminately,—sometimes at the houses of persons who were not members, sometimes at inns. For instance, in 1826 they met at the house of Levi Edwards, Esq., in Monroe; in 1827 at the house of Ephraim Knapp, in Bridgeport (Knapp's Inn); in 1836 at the house of Widow Huldah Gregory, in Trumbull. The eastern part of the county had the greatest number of meetings, and Levi Edwards seems to have been the most popular host. Between 1826 and 1834 they assembled four times with him. From 1825 to 1859 the following places were favored respectively with gatherings of these men: Bridgeport, 14; Monroe, 6; Greenfield, 4; Fairfield, 3; Weston, 2; Norwalk, 2; Danbury, Westport, Redding Ridge, and Trumbull, each 1. In 1859 it was decided that the places for meeting should be confined to Danbury, Bridgeport, and Norwalk in order. This plan continued until, in 1878, Danbury not being considered sufficiently accessible, her name was left out and Bridgeport and Norwalk now divide the honors.

No list of members appears until 1856. A change in the manner of choosing delegates or fellows to represent them at the State Medical Society rendered necessary the making of a list at that time. Hitherto these delegates had been chosen or elected by the society. In 1856, at the City Hotel, Bridgeport, "Dr. Blakeman moved the following: Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to arrange the names of members in such order as they may judge proper, and that hereafter the names of five present at a meeting who stand first in the list be considered nominees or fellows in the year 1857 and the five subsequent for 1858; and so on, proceeding from year to year.'" Drs. Noyes, Blackman, and Hubbard were appointed, and they reported the names as here arranged: David H. Nash, John A. McLean, Joseph M. French, George Blackman, Samuel Sands, Lewis Hurlburt, S. P. V. R. Ten Broeck, Moses B. Pardee, Frederic Judson, W. B. Nash, Rufus Blakeman, George Dyer, N. D. Haight, E. P. Bennett, David S. Burr, Robert Hubbard, James Baldwin, H. L. W. Burritt, Ira Gregory, Noah A. Lacey, Samuel S. Noyes, H. N. Bennett, Elijah Middlebrook, Lewis Richards, Samuel Lynes, Justus Sherwood, Amos L. Williams. The same method of appointing fellows is still in vogue.

The by-laws of the Fairfield County Medical Society appear on the records as adopted April 17, 1826. As they indicate the sentiment of the men of that day, their purpose and their thought, it may be of interest to our readers to copy them entire. They are as follows:

"1st. That no person shall become a member of the Fairfield County Medical Society unless he receive two-thirds of the votes of the meeting before which he is proposed; except such as the law makes members, of course.

"2d. That the Moderator and Clerk be chosen by ballot; also the Delegates to the Convention.

"3d. That there shall be three members designated by vote to read dissertations at the succeeding meeting next after being appointed, and being so appointed, and having not declined, shall read a dissertation on penalty of one dollar to be forfeited to our Society and collected by the Clerk." (This was raised to five dollars in 1870, and in 1874 the by-law was repealed in toto.)

"4th. The first business after organizing shall be to hear a dissertation from one of the three appointed for that purpose.

"5th. No member of this Society shall (but by absolute necessity) meet with and consult a practitioner in medicine or surgery unless he is or has been a regular member of our Society and been honorably discharged; at any rate, in other respects being equal, a member of our Society shall always be preferred.

"6th. That a Standing Committee of three be appointed annually to report upon all crimes and misdemeanors that may be committed by any member of this Society against any article contained in their by-laws, and that the Society act upon it as they may deem expedient.

"7th. That any member shall have the liberty to file his accusation against another member to one or more of the Standing Committee, whose duty it shall be, if two of said Committee think it expedient, to summons the delinquent to appear and to notify the accused to meet the County Meeting, where the subject shall be tried and determined. A copy of said accusation and notification shall be left with the accused, or at his last usual place of abode, at least sixty days prior to the trial. The accuser shall also make, or cause to be made, service and return to the county of said accusation and notice.*

"8th. That any person in our Society who pretends to or uses any nostrum or secret medicine, and refuses to give a receipt in full to any member of this Society when requested, shall be expelled.

"9th. That when a new Clerk of our Society is chosen, it shall be the duty of his predecessor to deliver over to him all the records and papers appertaining to said office.

* Totid, That the foregoing articles be adopted as a code of by-laws for this Society this 17th day of April, A.D. 1826.

"Attest: JOHN JUDSON, Chairman, ELIJAH MIDDLEBROOK, Clerk."

The society was in part for the protection of its own members. At the meeting in which the by-laws

* "Violations of the by-laws of the Connecticut Medical Society, or of the rules and regulations passed by the county associations in conformity with the by-laws of the State society," are now tried according to rules of Sec. 7, ch. iv., by-laws of the Connecticut Medical Society.

were adopted, the following resolves were passed, which seem to have been for that purpose:

"Resolve first—That any physician who undercharges his neighbor in his neighbor's vicinity with a view to supplant said neighbor or otherwise to interrupt his business justly deserves to be disrespected by every member of our Society.

"Resolve second.—That opinions on cases of disease shall, unless otherwise agreed in consultations, be considered as sacred, not to be divulged.

"Resolve third.—That an uniform rate of charging be desirable, to which when established by vote of our Society, every member shall adhere, on penalty of being adjudged by the Standing Committee as to them shall be deemed just and proper."

They preserved the discipline laid down, expelling such members as they considered unworthy.

Dr. Blakeman, in his address of 1853, spoke of a repugnance to taxation at that time as somewhat characteristic, and as having been a development of their professional progenitors. It gave dissatisfaction in 1793, it was the cause for expulsion of members in the middle of the century, it is a magnum opprobrium in 1880.

At the meeting in Greenfield, April 18, 1849, it was

"Resolved, That members of the Fairfield County Medical Society who have refused, and persist in refusing, to pay their taxes and attendance on medical meetings are disregarding the true interests of the profession, are unworthy of membership, and this Society would instruct the Fellows to make application to the State Convention to be held in Hartford in May next for their discharge from this Society.

"Resolved, That if such discharge is procured for any such delinquent members, the Clerk be directed to notify each one so discharged, stating the cause of expulsion, and also that the Clerk transmit to each defaulting member a copy of the above resolutions."

"SAMUEL BEACH, Clerk."

In 1851 a list of the names of ten "non-paying members" was presented, and they were expelled, some of them being prominent in the society.

Their opinion of a newer sect—those who had climbed up some other way—is tersely expressed, April 10, 1850:

"Resolved, That Homeopathy be regarded as Quackery.

"Resolved, That the Clerk publish proceedings in several papers of this County."

Some of the members strayed from the fold and went over to the opposition. At the same meeting in which the ten "unworthy" members were proposed for discharge (April 10, 1851) it was

"Resolved, That Drs. Dennison, Ayres, and Northrop, reported to have practiced Homeopathy, if on investigation be so found to transgress the rules of the Medical Society by such irregular practice, be by the above committee [the Standing Committee] cited to appear at the next annual meeting of this Society and answer to said irregularity in practice."

At the next annual meeting the several cases were carefully considered. It was "unanimously voted that their names be, each of them, erased from the books of Fairfield County Medical Society and dismissed from the said Society."

At this meeting in 1851 there seems to have been much discipline to enforce. Besides non-payment of fines and irregular practice, there was undercharging. It was

"Resolved, That whereas, complaint having been made of undercharges by physicians practicing in neighborhood of other physicians with the apparent design to supplant their neighbors, therefore

"Resolved, That to the price commonly charged for a single visit be added for each visit twelve and one-half cents per mile for travel for each mile traveled after the first mile."

But discipline was only a casual thing forced on them by neglect of the laws which governed the body.

What was done at the gatherings of these men? The following "Rules of Order" were adopted April 14, 1853, from report of the committee appointed for that purpose:

"1st. The Meeting shall be called to order by the Clerk, and immediately thereafter the Chairman shall be chosen by ballot.

"2d. Election of Clerk.

"3d. Reading the Minutes of the last Session.

"4th. Admission of New Members.

"5th. Election of Fellows to the State Convention.

"6th. Election of Delegates to the American Medical Association.

"7th. Appointment of Committees.

"8th. Reading of Dissertations.

"9th. Unfinished Business.

"10th. Reports of Committees, which shall be made in the Order of Appointment.

"11th. New Business.

"12th. Appointment of Dissertator.

"13th. Appointment designating the Place of Adjournment for next Meeting."

Dissertations had been required from an early period in the history of the society (see By-Laws, Sec. 3). At the first meeting of which any record is extant Dr. Elijah Middlebrook, of Trumbull, read "A Case of Tetanus which proceeded from a Wound of a Nail, which was successfully treated by Opium and Wine." Dr. L. Seeley, of Weston, read a dissertation on "Hemorrhage in Typhus Fever." And so at every meeting for years one or more essays were read, to the profit and entertainment of the members. The subjects were sometimes assigned, sometimes left to the option of the writer. At the first meeting it was "Resolved, That Drs. Parruck, Simons, and Goulding read Dissertations on any subject they choose.

"Resolved, That Dr. Blakeman read a Dissertation on Constitutional Peculiarity."

But the sons gradually departed from the customs of their fathers. An exchange of good wishes all around, a general discussion of medical topics, the appointment of delegates and committees, the reading of papers voluntarily proffered, the discussion and disposal of questions of discipline, occupy now the hours, while a concluding dinner at the hotel sends each one home better acquainted with his neighboring brother and stronger for another year of service.

The fellows are the delegates sent to the State society as representatives. In Fairfield County these were at first chosen by ballot. In 1825 the men selected were Samuel Simons, of Bridgeport; William T. Shelton, of Stratford; Cyrenius H. Booth, of Newtown; and John Tomlinson, of Huntington. In 1792 they were James Potter, Thaddeus Betts, Hosea Hurlburt, James Clark, Amos Mead. A list of the fellows from Fairfield County from 1792 to our day may be found in the "Proceedings of the Connecticut Medical Society" for 1875, p. cxxxii.

In 1847 the county society sent a delegate to the American Medical Association, or, as the records have it, the National Convention. The choice fell upon Dr. Elijah Middlebrook, and the association met that year in Philadelphia in May. Appointments have been regularly made since. Delegates are appointed also to the society meetings of other States,—New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, five to the American Medical Association. The Connecticut Medical Society meets yearly, alternately in Hartford and New Haven.

The records of the society have always been well kept since the year 1825. In 1845 a vote was passed to publish the proceedings in the several papers printed in the county, but there is no evidence as to how long this custom was continued, or even whether it was ever in vogue.

A copy of the essays presented was always requested to be lodged with the clerk, to be placed on file. They would be interesting reading to-day, doubtless; but, unfortunately, not one of them can be found.

One is forced to smile at the absurdly small fees which these men received, and the nicety into which they divided the different departments of their business. Yet the table was one of their own making, and must have been in some degree satisfactory. It affords a pithy lesson of the progress of the times. At the annual meeting holden at the house of Levi Edwards, Esq., of Monroe, April 20, 1829, it was

Resolved, That the following services and medicines shall not be remunerated for less sums than are designated,—viz. Bleeding, 12 cts.; Cathartic, 12 cts.; Emetic, 10 cts.; Visit, 17 cts.; Travel, per Mile, 17 cts.; Obstetric Case, $2.50;—Instrumental, $1.00; Extracting Tooth, 12 cts.

The society has now no fee-table, the difference in the size of the towns having rendered such a plan very impracticable.

In the cities the local societies, which are entirely independent of the county organization, adopt such lists of prices, and in the more rural districts every man is a law unto himself.

They denounced all irregularities in practice. On the temperance question they gave a no less certain sound. At the Washington Hotel, in Bridgeport, on April 21, 1828, it was

Resolved, That the following preamble and resolutions be adopted,—

Whereas, in our opinion, intemperance is the most base, general, dangerous, and demoralizing evil in our country and its suppression the most to be desired, therefore,

Resolved, 1st. That we highly approve of the active and humane exertions of the American Temperance Society, made and now making, to effect the same.

Resolved, 2d. That in our opinion the use of ardent spirit does not prevent the invading contagious diseases, but generally the system is susceptible to their influence.

Resolved, 3d. That in our opinion the use of ardent spirit does not moderate the system and modify it to endure hardship or resist the effects of the extremes of heat and cold, as is too generally believed.

Resolved, 4th. That in our opinion the proserptions of physicians containing matters of ardent spirit is a fruitful source of intemperance, seldom necessary in practice, and when not so should be studiously avoided.

Resolved, 5th. That in our opinion water is the most natural and healthy drink for man, and always salutary when discreetly used.

Resolved, 6th. That ardent spirit at all our future meetings be discontinued.

Resolved, 7th. That the Clerk of this meeting be requested to transmit to the Secretary of the American Temperance Society the foregoing resolutions, with the assurance that we will cheerfully co-operate with him in the promotion of temperance."

Humanity and philanthropy combined in favoring the founding of a hospital in a neighboring county. In 1829 it was

Resolved, That we highly approve of the measure of establishing a general hospital at New Haven, and that we will use our best endeavors to promote the same by encouraging subscriptions in our respective neighborhoods."

Such was the Fairfield County Medical Society in its earlier days. The State society by degrees spread its hands out over it. The former became a tributary; it is simply a part of the Connecticut Medical Society. Without detailing the several steps of the change,—a process hardly called for in a sketch,—we may look at the county society as it stands to-day in its relation to the State Medical Society. This can be done by selections from the by-laws of the State society:

CHAPTER I.—Section 1. This Society shall be known by the name of The Connecticut Medical Society, and it shall be composed of the members of the county associations and of honorary members.

Sec. 2. The Connecticut Medical Society shall hold an annual convention on the Thursday following the fourth Wednesday in May. The annual convention shall assemble alternately at New Haven and Hartford. Ten members shall constitute a quorum.

Sec. 3. The President and Fellows shall hold an annual meeting.

Sec. 4. The county associations shall hold in their respective counties an annual meeting.

CHAPTER II.—Section 1. The officers of the Society shall consist of a President, Vice-President, Treasurer, Secretary, Committee on Matters of Professional Interest in the State, and the Presidents of the county associations, who shall be Vice-Presidents ex-officio.

CHAPTER III.—Section 1. There shall be an annual meeting of the Presidents and Fellows of the Connecticut Medical Society on the day preceding the annual convention of the Society, and in the same city where the convention is to be held.

CHAPTER IV.—Section 1. The members of the Connecticut Medical Society shall meet annually in their respective counties, and at such other times and places as have been or may hereafter be agreed upon by them. Provided, the annual meeting shall be at least four weeks before the fourth Wednesday in May. Each county association shall be known and called by the name of the county in which it exists, and shall choose from among themselves a President, Clerk, and such other officers as may be found necessary. At their annual meeting they shall elect by ballot, of their own number, in each county five—except in the county of Tolland, which shall elect three—Fellows, to have part in the superintendence and management of the Society.

Sec. 2. The county associations, in their respective counties, shall have power to adjourn meetings and to call special meetings from time to time as they shall deem expedient; and they may adopt such by-laws and regulations for their own government, and for the promotion of medical science, as they may think proper, not contrary to the laws of the State or the by-laws of the Connecticut Medical Society.

Sec. 3. Any person of good moral character, found to possess the qualifications prescribed by the charter and by-laws of this Society, may, by any county association, at any meeting legally holden, be admitted to membership by a major vote of the members present, by ballot. Provided, he is residing and practicing in said county, and makes application for that purpose.

Sec. 4. All persons so elected shall, within one year after such election, subscribe the by-laws of the Society, or otherwise declare in writing their assent to the same, or such election shall be void.

Sec. 5. Any county association may by a major vote dismiss from the Society any member who shall remove from the State or who shall leave the profession for other pursuits.

"Sec. 6. Any county association may, if it is deemed expedient, recommend to the President and Fellows, for dismissal from the Society, any member residing in that county who shall apply for such dismissal by a written request to that effect, delivered to the Clerk of said county association at least ten days before the time of holding any legal county meeting, and also any member who shall refuse or neglect to pay taxes; and upon the approval of such recommendation by the President and Fellows in annual meeting the connection between such member and the Society shall be dissolved. Provided, that no member shall be honorably dismissed from the Society until all his taxes shall have been paid.

"Sec. 7. All violation of the by-laws of the Connecticut Medical Society or of the Medical Police adopted by the Society, or of the rules and regulations passed by the county associations in conformity with the by-laws of the State society, may be prosecuted and tried in the respective county associations, under the following regulations. . . . Provided, that no sentence of expulsion shall be valid until confirmed by the President and Fellows in annual meeting.

"CHAPTER V.—Section 2. All the members of the Connecticut Medical Society have the privilege of attending all meetings of the President and Fellows and performing all the duties of Fellows except voting.

"Sec. 5. No member of the Society shall hold professional consultation or intercourse with any other than licensed physicians and surgeons in regular standing.

"CHAPTER VII.—The Society adopts the Code of Ethics of the American Medical Association as a part of the Constitution and by-laws.

"On the day of the annual convention a dinner shall be provided at the expense of those members partaking of it."

The presidents (or moderator and chairman, as they were formerly called) and secretaries,—the only two offices held in the Fairfield County Society,—have been as follows:

- 1825.—Gabriel Baldwin, Chairman; Elijah Middlebrook, Clerk.
- 1826.—John Judson, Chairman; Elijah Middlebrook, Clerk.
- 1827-28.—William T. Shelton, Moderator; Samuel Simons, Clerk.
- 1829.—Elijah Middlebrook, Moderator; Samuel Simons, Clerk.
- 1830.—John Judson, Moderator; Samuel Simons, Clerk.

Of these, Drs. D. H. Nash, of Bridgeport, A. L. Williams, of Brookfield, E. P. Bennett and James Baldwin, of Danbury, and N. D. Haight, of Stamford, are over sixty years of age. The records give no indication as to which is the oldest member of the society. The name of Dr. James Baldwin, however, appears earliest on the records. In the year 1833 he was appointed one of the delegates to attend the Medical Convention at Hartford. He must, therefore, have been a member for some years previous. He was the same year (1833) appointed, with Dr. A. L. Williams, "to read a dissertation at the next annual meeting." Their names appear frequently in the records of the society. In 1836, Dr. E. P. Bennett was appointed fellow of the State Medical Convention in New Haven, and to read a dissertation at the next annual meeting. In 1838, David H. Nash was appointed a fellow of the State Convention. In 1850 Nathaniel D. Haight was chosen one of the fellows for the ensuing year. It may be safe to estimate their respective ages as members from the above data.

Fairfield County has furnished from its members the following presidents for the State society: Elijah Middlebrook, 1841-42; Rufus Blakeman, 1851-52; Robert Hubbard, 1877.

So much time has been spent with the living that none is left for the virtues and memories of the dead who strove to keep and to improve the society and themselves. They labored, and we have entered into their labors. Only recently has it become customary to publish obituaries of deceased members. In 1854 a motion was passed "that the clerk notice the death of the members of this Society with a concise biography." If this was ever done, no record of it remains. The records contain but one obituary, which, on account of its tenderness and of the source whence it comes, I am constrained to give in full. April, 1856,

"Dr. Blakeman, committee on obituary of members deceased, reported on Dr. R. B. Botsford, dec'd of Danbury, the following letter, which was ordered to be included in the minutes:

"Dr. Russel B. Botsford was born at Newtown, May 7, 1794, and commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Shepard, of Newtown, during two years of his medical course. In New Haven he was in Dr. Gilbert's office. He received his diploma September, 1816. In the spring of 1817 he commenced the practice of medicine in the village of Danbury. In 1820 he was married, and his general health was such that for thirty-six years he was (when at home) never prevented from sitting at the table and enjoying the regular meals of his family. Being of a very depressed temperament and dyspeptic habits, and from too intense application to study and a very laborious practice, in 1832 he was afflicted with a rush of blood to the head, which in a few years resulted in attacks of an epileptic character, which continued with more or less frequency and severity until, Dec. 26, 1855, they terminated his life at the age of sixty-two. His habits of industry and system were such that to the day before his death he attended to all his domestic duties, keeping everything about and in his premises with perfect neatness and order. Perhaps it does not become the hand of affection to pen his eulogy, but allow me to say that for purity of character, untiring devotion to his profession, hospitality, and kindness to his friends, he had not his superior.

"Very respectfully,

"ELIZA W. BOTSFORD."

A few facts seemingly of interest may be added regarding the study of medicine and the granting of licenses. Dr. Blakeman states in his address: "Previous to the formation of the county society it is believed that the time devoted to medical qualification, even of the regular practitioner, was optional with the candidate for public favor. His reliance for a successful practice was more upon the popular decision regarding his skill than upon certificates of qualification which he might derive from his medical teachers." Yet this great must be handed over to Science or Knowledge for its highest, its complete attainment. "The grounds of every rule of art are to be found in the theorems of Science" (Mill's "Logic," vol. ii.), and the true physician (for there were many such in those earlier days) sought some place for the beginning of his medical career.

The sources for the acquisition of medical knowledge in the American colonies were few and scanty. A medical department was connected with King's—afterwards Columbia—College from 1767 to 1813. The Yale Medical School was not organized until 1813, and did not confer degrees until the following year. But very early in the century we learn of young men appealing for licenses to practice. Dr. George Sumner, in an address on "The Early Physicians of Connecticut," in 1851, says John Copp, styled school-master, obtained the recommendation of the selectmen of Norwalk and applied for a license to practice medicine in 1705. Dr. Uriah Rogers,* studied with Dr. Jonathan Bull, of Hartford, and was licensed by the General Court in 1733. Dr. David Rogers,³ born in 1741, studied medicine with his father, obtained a license to practice medicine in New York, and located at Greenfield Hill, Fairfield. It was the custom for the student, after having qualified as was thought sufficiently by study with a preceptor, to make application and appear before the physicians of the county or a committee appointed by them for examination and license. Thus were most permits granted until the establishment of the Connecticut Medical Society in 1792. "Among the earliest and most important of the duties of the State Medical Society was examining candidates for the practice of medicine and surgery by a board annually appointed from its members, and legally empowered to issue licenses to practice to such as they deemed properly qualified. It also thus early in its history established a standard of qualifications, making, on the part of the candidate, the attainment of his majority, the evidence of a good moral character, and certificate of three years' study with some reputable physician or surgeon, save in the case of college graduates (when two years were accepted), as prerequisite to examination. This method of qualifying students was in vogue until the establishment of the Medical Institution of Yale College" (address of President C. M. Carleton, of Norwich, "Proceedings Connecticut Medical Society, 1878," p. 8).

In closing this sketch, cursory and imperfect as it is, I cannot do better than by going back to the beginning of the Fairfield County Medical Society.

RUFUS BLAKEMAN, M.D., was a lineal descendant of the fifth generation from Rev. Adam Blakeman, who was born in Staffordshire, England, in 1598, entered Cambridge College May 23, 1617, from which he was graduated. He was ordained an Episcopal clergyman, and preached in Leicester, Derbyshire, England, came to America about 1630 or 1635, and was the first clergyman of Stratford, Conn. He died in 1665. He had a family of six children, the eldest of whom was named John, who married Dorothy, daughter of Rev. Henry Smith, of Wethersfield, and died in 1663. He had three children, the second of whom was named Ebenezer, who was twice married, first to Patience, daughter of John Wilcomen, of Stratford, Conn., second to Abigail Curtis, of Stratford, Conn. He had nine children, of whom the eighth, by his wife Abigail, was named Nathan, who was born Sept. 29, 1702, and married Sarah, daughter of Samuel Wills, in 1732, and had four children, of whom Ephraim was the second, born March 9, 1746, in Monroe, Fairfield Co., Conn. He was a farmer in the town of Monroe, married, and had a family of eleven children, of whom Rufus, the subject of this sketch, was the ninth. He died April 13, 1811, aged sixty-five years. His wife, Sarah, died Sept. 19, 1828, aged seventy-four years. Rufus Blakeman was born in Monroe, Fairfield Co., Conn., Jan. 12, 1795. He was graduated from Union College in 1817, and from the Medical University of the city of New York in 1821, and immediately commenced the practice of medicine on Greenfield Hill, Fairfield Co., Conn., in the year 1822, and continued to practice until his death, Feb. 27, 1870. His ride was very extensive, reaching far into the adjoining towns. He was a member of the Medical Board of Examiners of the New Haven Medical School for many years, and at one time was president of the Connecticut Medical Association. Besides attending to the various duties of his profession he often contributed articles on various subjects pertaining to his profession to the medical journals. He also published a work entitled "Credulity and Superstition," which met with a ready sale. In politics he was a staunch Whig and Republican, and as such was a magistrate of the town of Fairfield for many years, judge of Probate for more than twenty-four years, and member of the State Legislature. He was not a member of any church, but was a regular attendant and liberal supporter of the Congregational Church of Greenfield Hill, of which Rev. Thomas B. Sturges was pastor. He married Mahala, daughter of Nathan N. Walker, of Long Hill, Conn., in 1819. They had two children,—viz., Catharine A. and Rufus (deceased). Mrs. Dr. Blakeman is now, 1880, residing on the old homestead with her daughter.

The following is the address of Dr. Blakeman, delivered before the State Medical Society in 1853:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, RUFUS BLAKEMAN, M.D.

"GENTLEMEN,—It is known to you that my predecessor, Dr. Sumner, in his interesting address to this convention, furnished many interesting details relative to the early history of medicine in Connecticut, together with biographical sketches of some of the most eminent physicians who flourished in the early periods of its history. The address alluded to possesses great value, not only as affording data for noting the progress which our profession has made in the successive eras of its history, but likewise as a record for rescuing from progressing oblivion the names of individuals of worth and eminence to whose labors we are, in no small degree, indebted for the present advanced respectability which the medical profession in Connecticut sustains.

"There can be little doubt that in the early history of Connecticut, and probably that of our country generally, a large portion of medical practice was in its character empirical. For a considerable period subsequent to the first settlement of the several towns, for the largest part of medical prescription was dispensed by root and Indian doctors. Although the more considerable villages early possessed their so-called regular physicians, yet many of these did not blush boastfully to announce their paternity to nostrums and pretended specifics for particular or for all diseases, as interest might dictate; and this solely with a view of exciting public attention towards themselves and soothing patients from their professional neighbors.

"In such a condition of professional morals, it is little surprising that a state of hostility and antagonistic feeling should, generally, have existed, such as is well known to have characterized the medical society of former times. In the several counties of the State, however, exceptions were occasionally found of physicians of a more honorable and elevated character, who not only labored to reform the moral habits of the profession, but also to advance its scientific respectability and usefulness.

"Although a retrospect into our early medical history will present physicians of this description but as 'Ravi nantis in gurgite vasto' of popular empiricism then prevailing, yet fortunately such have existed, and many of these primary luminaries have been sufficiently fortunate to receive a notice from my predecessor in the address alluded to. Many others have flourished in the several counties, perhaps equal in professional talent and worth, though less known to general fame, whose names, by the demands of equal justice, ought to be rescued and registered with their co-laborers in support of legitimate medical science during the dark period of its history in the American colonies. In rendering such tribute of respect to the memories of our professional progenitors, we, who enjoy the fruits of their pioneer labors and difficulties, are not only discharging a debt of gratitude which is their due, but we are also furnishing for our successors data by which they may be enabled to trace past medical progress, and not inopportunistically may incite them to the performance of a like homage to the memory of the professional benefactors of the present period. There is no doubt, as stated, that all the counties have furnished many physicians of the character alluded to. But as the limits of an address due from me would be inadequate for their general notice, even were the materials readily accessible, I design only to select as subjects those who passed their professional lives in Fairfield County, leaving those of other sections for individuals possessing a similar interest for the memories of their deceased brethren, who from vicinity of location enjoy better facilities for obtaining their biographical histories.

"Few are the recorded data for biography which ordinarily survive the life of the practitioner of medicine in country districts. The uniform and familiar character of his vocation affords but scanty material for the adornment of general history. Being more familiar with prescription than the pen, or the more brilliant exploits of war or legislation, his fame is lamentably prone to expire with the memories and lives of those who have enjoyed the benefit of his professional labors.

"Individual exceptions, however, are not wanting of members of our profession who have left recorded testimonials of their character and fame. The fortuitous circumstances which often enstamp individual reputation on the page of history have been the possession of some physicians. The indulgence of political ambition, a devoted professional philanthropy, as well as the endowment of transcendent intellect, are no less likely historically to note the physician than his co-equals in general society. Most of these in Connecticut who have attained such fortune have been presented to your notice by my predecessor. Accessible records have supplied him with facts, by which to delineate the character of his subjects in a manner far more interesting and satisfactory than can be expected for those derived from further gleanings in the past professional field.

"It is my design in the portion of these papers devoted to biographical notice to select those who, if less distinguished by general fame, were perhaps of equal usefulness in the dispensation of the simple duties of the medical profession.

"Of the early physicians of Fairfield County, I have succeeded in obtaining but scanty information. More, doubtless, might have been derived from the early records concerning individuals, were the modern titular appendage added to their names as a guide to the investigation. This omission, so general, is probably to be explained from the fact that its degradation by its indiscriminate application to all the pretenders of the period caused the name 'chirurgien' to be considered an appellation more worthy the ambition of educated physicians.

"As stated, I have been able to derive but little, either from record or tradition, of the early physicians of Fairfield County. It is probable that few of note who made the practice of medicine an exclusive vocation left the larger central towns to locate in the inconsiderable villages of a border county. As in the State generally, many or most of the early clergy of the county united medical prescription with their clerical duties, and it is probable that most of the more regular prescription was in their hands. Of professional prescribers of the period may be enumerated the successive grades of root and Indian doctors; those who, originating in these, rose through rational observation, and the attention to existing medical literature, to the station of respectable practitioners, and those who by previous qualification entered the profession with more or less knowledge of the medical science of the period.

"The earliest physician of the latter description in the county, of whom I have obtained a knowledge, was Peter Bulkley, son of Rev. Peter Bulkley, of Concord, and brother of Rev.—afterwards Dr.—Goshom Bulkley, of Wethersfield. He resided and practiced in the town of Fairfield, but of his character as a physician I have been able to obtain no particular information. I infer from the probate of his will, contained on the probate records, dated March 25, 1691, that he died in that year. His age at the time of making his will, dated as above, he declares to be forty-nine years. After special devise of his principal estate, which appears to have been small, he adds, 'all the other estate I leave it wholly to my executor, whether physic or other household stuff, he knowing all ye concerns about it.' His 'medicines, simples and in composition,' are inventoried at twenty-five pounds. He constitutes his 'dearly beloved brother, Gershom Bulkley,' his executor, but he declined the trust.

"Isaac Hall was also a physician of Fairfield, who died in 1714, but regarding his reputation nothing special is to be obtained. In his nuncupative will on the probate record, he is styled Dr. Isaac Hall, but his inventory exhibits but a meagre amount of his professional remains, unless 'Colpepper's Last Legacy,' included in the list of his scanty miscellaneous library, may have been a repository of astrological mysteries, and therefore afford evidence that he was skilled in the science promulgated by the celebrated author of that name. Sylvester Judd, Esq., of Northampton, who is most conversant with the early records of Fairfield County, states regarding him 'he was a physician and especially a chirurgien. He was employed by the government in some warlike expedition, and my impression is, that he was somewhat distinguished.'

"James Laborie, according to such information as I have been able to obtain, was a French physician, a Huguenot, who emigrated to this country about the commencement of the last century. I am indebted to Rev. N. E. Cornwall's historical discourse on Trinity church, Fairfield, for the following: 'Doctor James Laborie, a French physician of eminence, who left his native country towards the close of the seventeenth century, and has been ordained by Mr. Kinglet antistes of the Canton of Zurich in Switzerland, taught and held service according to the usage of the Church of England in his own house in Fairfield.' In a letter preserved in the archives of the above-named church, the doctor informs that he 'came to this country as a teacher under the patronage of the Bishop of London, and, being disturbed by the Indians in the vicinity of Boston, came to the colony and county of Fairfield, and began by an introductory discourse to act as a missionary to the English and native inhabitants, but was interrupted immediately by one of the magistrates.' This announcement of his efforts in Connecticut was probably made at Stratford, where he seems to have resided from 1705 to 1717, but it appears from the records of Fairfield that he resided there as early as 1718. In forming an estimate of the doctor's character as a religious teacher, as shown above, in connection with the somewhat ludicrous notice which he has received as a physician, in the address of my predecessor, concerning his legal controversy with Mr. Lyon, of Milford, on the subject of his medical charges, a degree of embarrassment may possibly be encountered. For its removal, however, and in his justification in the latter capacity, it may perhaps be expedient to interpose the presumption that he had in a degree been indoctrinated in the Jesuitical principles recognized by the truly Catholic of his native France. Tenets thus imbibed may perhaps have prompted the doctor, in his evangelizing zeal, to devote his medical prerogative, so signally exercised upon Lyon's purse, as a subordinate for the promotion of the object of his Protestant mission among the heathen in the country of his adoption.

"His medical diploma, dated London, 1697, written in Latin, describing him as the son of a celebrated physician of France, was recorded by the clerk of Fairfield County Court in 1703. By his will on the Fairfield probate records of the date 1731, he devises to his son James, 'all my instruments of chirurgie and my French writings.' His death, according to the court proceedings, occurred about that period.

"Francis Fergue was also a French physician, who it is understood came to America as surgeon of the French forces engaged in the defense of Canada against the English, during the war which resulted in its conquest by the latter. The period at which he left the army, or the circumstances which led to such decision, are at present unknown. Instead, however, of returning to his native country, he located in Fairfield between the years 1753 and 1760, where he practiced as a physician of considerable distinction until his death. Tradition uniformly assigns to Dr. Fergue the character of a well-educated physician, possessing superior talents; of gentlemanly deportment, and in his social qualities affable and interesting. A friend who is remotely connected with the descendants of the doctor writes me that it is his 'impression that he was a skillful surgeon, and that he was employed in Washington's army as such. That he was polite, rather vague in his religious sentiments, perfectly honest and liberal, despising any kind of fraud or equivocation, and careless of his pecuniary concerns so long as he and his wife had enough.' Numerous anecdotes current concerning him confirm the above character. The following would appear to exhibit his religious sentiments as coinciding with those of the French school of theologians. Being in company where an animating discussion arose regarding the merits and final prospects of the several religious sects, an appeal was at length made to the doctor (who had taken no part in the dispute) for his opinion on the controverted subject, who jocosely responded: 'By and by Monsieur A. (one of the disputants) die; he appear before the judge, who say, Monsieur A., of what sect are you? Monsieur A. say, I be Presbyterian. Say the judge, Monsieur A., you take that apartment.' By and by Monsieur B. (another of the party) die, and go to the tribunal. 'Say the judge, Monsieur B., of what sect be you? Monsieur B. say, I be Episcopalian. Well, say the judge, Monsieur B., you take that apartment.' Thus disposing of the Methodist, Baptist, etc. the doctor adds: 'By and by Dr. Forgue he die, and make his appearance. Says the judge, Hah! doctor, you come, eh? Of what sect are you? I say, Oh, I be just nothing at all! Ah, very well, say the judge, you go where you please, doctor.'

Another anecdote well illustrates the doctor's frank and unequivocal qualities. He, with one Job Skeam and others, being arraigned before a magistrate for card-playing, for which he was passionately fond, and being asked their plea, his companions, as by legal parlance bound, plead not guilty! 'Bah!' says the more honest Frenchman, 'you be, Job! you be, guilt, I be, guilt, we all be, guilt! you know you, guilt! What the time, Monsieur Justice?' On learning the amount, the doctor promptly proffered the magistrate double the sum, globe-blunderingly remarking, 'Me play out the balance next time, Monsieur Justice,' leaving the remaining perplexed offenders of the law to heal it by reluctantly following the suit so frankly proffered by their more honest Gallic partner. 'Doctor Forgue's men' is an appellation, at the present time, often applied to persons of free religious faith.

It is said that he never acquired the fluent use of the English language, but ever kept his accounts and memorandums in his native dialect. His tombstone in Fairfield cemetery contains only the simple memorial of his name and time of his decease, with the further inscription that 'he was a respectable physician and useful citizen.' He died in 1783, aged fifty-four years.

It appears from Dr. Sumner's address that John Copp, style Esq. schoolmaster, obtained the recommendation of the selectmen of Norwalk, and applied for a license to practice medicine in 1705. Rev. Dr. Hall, who is familiar with the ancient records of that town, informs me that John Copp was a schoolmaster, surveyor, deacon, and town clerk, which last office he held from 1708 to 1749. Dr. Hall adds, 'whether he practiced medicine I have no means of ascertaining.' He died May 16, 1751, aged seventy-eight years.

Dr. — Thomas practiced medicine in Newtown, and died probably seventy or eighty years ago. He is said to have been a self-educated physician, and possessed of considerable ability. His widow married, I am told, Nehemiah Strong, formerly mathematical professor in Yale College.

Dr. Uriah Rogers, according to information I have obtained, was born at Braintree, Mass., in 1710, and was a near descendant of Nathaniel Rogers, also a physician, who emigrated to this country from Ayrton, England, in 1636, and succeeded President Oaks in the presidency of Harvard College in 1683. Dr. Rogers studied with Dr. Jonathan Bill, of Hartford, and was licensed by the General Court in 1733. He soon after located in Norwalk, where he pursued the practice of medicine until his death. He was hospital surgeon in the British army in the French war, so called, in 1758. At the burning of Norwalk, in 1779, by the British, a period subsequent to his death, his late mansion was destroyed with its effects, including his books and papers. The only articles preserved were his silver-headed cane, a present from Governor Fitzh, and his family coat-of-arms, which is said to be that of the descendants of John Rogers, the martyr.

Dr. Rogers is represented as being a distinguished physician, of strong and vigorous mind, and enjoying an extensive practice. He is also represented as being eminent for his piety, of a dignified deportment, and much respected in the community where he resided. He died in 1773, aged sixty-three years. He left six sons, three of whom—Uriah, Hezekiah, and David—were physicians. Uriah succeeded his father in the practice of medicine in Norwalk, but died early in life, in 1776, aged thirty-eight years.

Dr. David Rogers studied medicine with his father, obtained a license to practice medicine in New York, and treated at Greenfield Hill, Fairfield, where he practiced medicine until age incapacitated him for the active duties of his profession. He died at New York in 1790, aged eighty-eight years. He held a respectable rank in his profession, is said to have been gentlemanly and dignified in his manner, and was a active and efficient in the organization of the county society. He held a commission of surgeon in the army of the Revolution, and I am informed was by the side of Gen. Wooster when he fell at the battle of Red Bank. This family stock appears to have been in supplying branches of the medical profession; as of Dr. Rogers' five sons, three—viz., David, Charles, and Morris—studied and practiced medicine, and his only daughter married the late Professor Dewees, of Philadelphia. The son Dr. David Rogers, late of New York, was the father of Dr. David L. Rogers of that city, and also of Dr. James Rogers. Whether acquisitions to the profession from the other branches have been as numerous, I am not informed.

I am indebted to the politeness of William H. Holly, Esq., of Stamford, for the following notice of the elder physicians of that town, as well as of several of a more recent period, of whom my original design precludes a mention in these papers.

Dr. Nathaniel Hubbard died in Stamford, in the year 1772, at an advanced age. For forty or fifty years he was the principal physician in the place, and particularly eminent in his profession.

Dr. John Wilson commenced practice about the year 1760, and continued here until 1796, when he removed to the city of New York. He was a native of Stamford. He died about the year 1802, leaving four sons, all physicians,—viz., John (the father of Hon. John C. Wilson, now of Albany, but for many years a resident of Westport and judge of the County Court of Fairfield County), Stephen, James, and Henry. John and Stephen settled in the city of New York, James and Henry in the county of Westchester.

Dr. Samuel Webb, born in Stamford, March 7, 1760, son of Col. Charles Webb, a distinguished officer of the Revolutionary war, was a scion of the above Dr. John Wilson. He graduated at Yale College about the year 1779, and immediately commenced the study and practice of medicine with Dr. Wilson, and continued in a successful practice up to the day of his death, Dec. 29, 1826. Dr. Webb ever enjoyed the esteem and confidence of the community to a remarkable degree, not only in his profession, but in his civil relations. On several occasions he represented the town in the Legislature of the State, and for many years filled the office of a justice of the peace. He died very suddenly of enlargement of the heart, in his sixty-seventh year, having previously enjoyed during life uninterrupted good health. It is a remarkable fact, shown from entries upon his day-book, that for fourteen years previous to his death not a day passed but he made professional visits.

There were several physicians of the name of Tomlinson who formerly resided and practiced medicine in Stratford. Their respective names, as I learn, were Agur Tomlinson, William Agur Tomlinson, son of the above, Charles Tomlinson, nephew of Agur, and Hezekiah Tomlinson.

I have been able to obtain but little of their biographies, other than that they were highly respectable as citizens, and two or three of the number were of considerable eminence as physicians. The first graduated at Yale College in 1744, and died in 1776, aged fifty-three years. Hezekiah also graduated at the same institution in 1765, and died in 1781, aged thirty-four years.

Dr. William Agur Tomlinson is said to have been somewhat eminent in his profession. He, I am informed, espoused the cause of the king in the war of the Revolution, and retired with most of the American English patriots to Nova Scotia at its close, where he resided for a period. He subsequently returned to Stratford and resumed professional duties. He is stated to have applied to the State Legislature for and obtained a special act granting a restoration of his sequestered estate, and also the privilege of collecting his medical bills, contracted previous to his expatriation. He is reported to have exercised this indulgence oppressively on many of his debtors. He died in 1799.

Two gentlemen of the name of Clark, who were brothers,—viz., Joseph and James,—and also a physician by the name of Russel, practiced medicine at an early period in Stratford. The Clarks are reported as physicians of eminence for the period; but I am unable to state anything regarding Dr. Russel. Joseph Clark is reported as a physician of eminence, and much esteemed in his profession, a citizen of good principles, and a kind, affable, and gentlemanly man. He espoused the cause of the king during the Revolution, in consequence of which his family suffered much indignity from the zealous populace. He fled with his family to the British provinces, where he probably died.

Before proceeding to a notice of the later physicians of Fairfield County, such as were connected with the organization of its medical society, I will briefly allude to the general condition of medicine and medical literature in the county previous to its society organization, as far as accessible facts furnish information on the subject.

"Doubtless the medical history of this is similar to that of most other counties in this State; but as association, as well in medical as in civil relations, was more intimate between the population within the boundaries of each of these geographical sections, it is reasonable to suppose that influences would originate from such intercourse which would establish peculiarities not only in their ordinary domestic relations, but also in the sentiments and habits of practice among the physicians of each county.

"In the early periods of the settlement of the State intercourse among her physicians was circumscribed, and access to medical literature difficult. Medical morals therefore, as well as prescription, doubtless in a considerable degree, received modification from the character and qualification of individuals who were the administrators of the healing art. Hence it is probable that each county presented a medical character considerably deviating from that of its neighboring counties.

"Among the causes of such local peculiarities in the State of the medical profession, not the least was an unequal numerical possession, by its several counties, of physicians of a more refined and exalted education.

"It may readily be conceived that the medical character of each county would be elevated or depressed in a ratio proportionate to the enjoyment or absence of the salutary influence which such must exert upon the sentiments of the community in which they resided. In counties numbering but a limited portion of physicians of this description, it is to be presumed that the public sentiment regarding medicine would be moulded by and made conformable to the incursions of the empirical pretenders, while in sections enjoying the teachings of a greater portion of the honorable and educated, a more accurate and elevated estimate would be formed relative to the merits and claims of the various medical administrators within its precincts.

"In fields pre-occupied by the quackish pretenders who had cautiously entrenched themselves in the favor of a marvel-seeking public, by exhibiting the mysteries with which they ever envelop their art, the honorable and scientific physician could hardly be expected to seek his fortune. To such fields, therefore, would the various species of pretender, who ever shrink from the light of science, retire with the object not only of reaping the pecuniary harvests which they presented, but with the view also of escaping the dangers of a detection of his devices. In common with other border counties of the State, Fairfield County originally enjoyed less the counsels of the better educated physicians than counties more central and populous; consequently it experienced more and longer than those the evils of empiricism and quackery.

"Although in several larger and populous villages early possessed their so-called regular physicians, yet these were mostly derivations from the root and Indian doctors, whose professional habits had been formed in the schools whence they originated. A portion of the more rational of these might assiduously and gradually become assimilated in practical views with their systematically educated brethren; but while assuming such position they did not hesitate, from motives of enhancing their interests, to foster the popular notion shrewdly incidented in their Indian Notes, that diseases of peculiar location were of special and indigenous character, and that their specific remedies existed principally in the forests and fields in which they originated. Many of these practitioners, however, who possessed greater honesty of character, connected with a native talent for the science which they professed, in the emergencies occurring in their practice resorted to some 'practical guide to health,' and per chance to the works of Boerhaave or Sydenham, which not infrequently became their standard counsels in practice, and also their instructors in the leisure of their domestic retirement.

"By such discipline, aided by observation of the character of disease as well as by casual and consultations with better instructed physicians, many of this self-constituted class became elevated to a respectable rank as practitioners and useful in the community where they resided. By means of such improvement in the qualification of its professors, the healing art advanced in respectability, the absurdities of the medical impostor were exposed to the judgment of the reflecting; and the popular sentiment, which had been formed in the belief of its marvelous results, was gradually led to contemplate medical science in the view of the ordinary sciences, which, like these, being based on sensible and rational principles, was to be acquired but through a patient and careful investigation.

"It has been remarked that the more considerable villages usually enjoyed the advantages of the services of regularly educated physicians. By reason, however, of this scanty means afforded for the acquirement of medical knowledge in the early periods of our State's history, the remark may not be deemed injudicious, that far the larger portion of medical practitioners, at the commencement of their practice, probably possessed less theoretical medical literature than that acquired by the diligent student of medicine at the present time after a pupillage of a few months in the office of the private practitioner, exclusive of the instruction which he receives from a course of lectures in a public medical institution.

"Occasionally might be found in the more populous districts physicians who had received their education in European schools. Such were generally versed in the medical science of the period, and of course were important accessions, not only to the community which enjoyed the benefit of their skill, but also to the medical profession by the influence which they exerted in the elevation of the standard of its character and general qualification.

"The early source of medical knowledge in the New England colonies was only that of the private practitioner, and as most of these were versed only in the more immediate practical branches, such as materia medica, theory and practice, etc., a possible familiarity of the student with these was deemed adequate qualification for the exercise of his skill as a public practitioner. Extensive attainments in midwifery and surgery were deemed of secondary importance to the medical practitioner, for the reason that, while cases of the former were commonly presided over by the professional 'quackery' of the neighborhood, the important cases of the latter, as at the present time, were submitted to the skill of the professional operator in that department.

"As far as I have been able to obtain information, calls upon the physician to perform obstetrical duties were rare prior to 1800, or perhaps, in some locations, a few years previous. In periods considerably earlier than the date mentioned, it is believed that in no cases were their services required except perhaps in a few rare instances which were attended with circumstances of a difficult or untoward character. Previous to the formation of the county society, it is believed that the time devoted to medical qualification, even of the regular practitioner, was optional with the candidate for public favor. His reliance for a successful practice was more upon the popular decision regarding his skill than upon certificates of qualification which he might derive from his medical teacher. However short may have been the term devoted to the acquirement of medical science, those adopting the system of the then recognized regular practice were readily acknowledged and received into the ranks of the professional fraternity, with the members of which mutual consultations were held over their respective patients.

"In a condition of medical literature like that of the period under consideration, it might be expected that a preponderating ratio of empiricism would necessarily become blended with its elements as well as in the practice of its professors. Indeed, such is the view of the practice of the period, as contemplated by the modern observer, that its character is necessarily represented as partaking more of a systematic empiricism or charity than of an elevated scientific profession. In extenuation, however, of such professional state, it ought to be taken into consideration that the sources for the acquisition of medical knowledge in the American colonies were few and scanty, and the means for its attainment abroad were accessible to but few. The emergencies of disease ever existing wherever there was population, the public, therefore, were necessarily impelled to the employment of such professors of the art of healing as were attainable in the vicinity of its occurrence, and that often without the option of a selection between the better qualified physician and the dispensers of nostrums or Indian specifics.

"With alternatives thus urgent to influence a public possessing few of the present facilities for scientific acquirement adequate to direct its decisions, or, indeed, in most instances, of even judging by comparison of the qualification of medical claimants on their favor, it may readily be conceived that a limited discrimination would be exercised in the selection of a medical adviser. Nor did it present a new problem in the science of human nature for solution, when it was discovered that abundant unscrupulous candidates for popular favor should be found as adventurers upon their fortune in the profession, with but a medium of knowledge of the intricate sources of disease, or of the nature of the active agents of the Materia Medica adapted to their removal.

"As ignorance is the parent of quackery and empiricism, little else could be expected of the earlier professional character of the State than its history abundantly presents. But the fact that a considerable portion of society at the present period, enjoying the advantages of a general diffusion of education and scientific refinement, with the educated physician accessible to all, should with an eagerness and ready faith, worthy of former times, embrace such baseless and ephemeral novelties as the lectula, homoeopathy, and hydropathy, vagues, as well as the flood of popular nostrums which deluge community (and that not merely by its more ignorant members, but also embracing many of the better educated class), presents a psychological enigma of more difficult explanation. With such astounding credulity, thus manifested, relative to the healing art, we may cease to be surprised that in darker eras of our early history, embracing a marvel-loving public, and a medical profession whose members were irresponsible to codes, sanctioned by a majority of its constituents, the toils and pecuniary sacrifices incident to a competent medical education should be evaded for the more enticing embrace of the emoluments proffered by the immediate assumption of the office of physician.

"It certainly affords evidence that as conscientious rectitude and philanthropy are marked characteristics of the medical profession, since, with the fact so strikingly presented to the student of medicine that the quack will share with him his portion of public patronage, he notwithstanding, submits to the sacrifice attendant upon the acquirement of such education as alone can qualify him for the office of a competent physician. With a medical profession imperfectly educated, like that of former times, and a public sentiment schooled and disciplined in the belief of its mysterious resources, it might reasonably be anticipated that knavish pretenders, as well as the dishonest of the profession, would seek the promotion of their interests through announcements of various specifics, assumed as marvelous revelations of indigenous agencies, which were particularly adapted to the prevalent diseases of the same location; or that the mysterious manifestations of the Indian character, associated with his marvelous traditions, would be made available for the purpose of exciting the imagination of the credulous, and thereby beguiling them to devote both their health and interests at the shrine of their unhallowed and fiction.

"It is manifest that dishonorable arts and devices of this description, solely designed to inure to the profits of their inventors, especially when resorted to by members of the profession, could not fail to be prolific of discord among neighboring physicians, such as are too well known to have characterized and disgraced the medical society in Connecticut.

"In Fairfield, and probably in other counties, a melancholy disregard of professional etiquette characterized most of her physicians previous to the organization of her medical society; and I am compelled to add, that the confirmed habits of many practitioners protracted the evil for a considerable period subsequently, notwithstanding its salutary provisions of codes and by-laws, with the object of suppressing the evil. Friendly professional intercourse was rare among neighboring physicians. Many habitually visited and prescribed for patients in the absence of or without the knowledge of the regular attendant; and facts too clearly prove that often petty and dishonest devices were resorted to, with the object of supplanting an absent rival in the confidence of the patient or his friends. It was not uncommon, in such circumstances, for the recent attendant to denounce the treatment of his predecessor, or, after a summary consignment of his medicines either to the fire or through the window, to substitute from his own stores those, most likely, of the same or of a similar character.

"It is deplorable to contemplate such utter prostration of honorable deportment by men professing to be members of an ostensibly learned and honorable profession; by those too who, there is reason to believe, were sufficiently observant of a gentlemanly demeanor in their intercourse with other members of the community.

"Such being the view of medical society presented by a retrospect into its past history, it would be interesting to investigate and portray the causes which have effected its present comparatively elevated and improved condition. It would be equally interesting to note the different phases of melioration through which the medical society in Connecticut has passed in its progress to the superior moral and scientific position which it holds at the present time. But the discussion would be incompatible with the present design, even did the circumscribed limits of an address on this occasion afford adequate space. It cannot, however, be matter of doubt that the improvement has been effected by the unmitigated labors of a few of the master spirits of the profession who have lived in the different eras of our professional history. These, experiencing and deploring the existing evils and impressed with the conviction of the inadequacy of detached individual efforts for their correction, ultimately devised the remedy of society association, by means of which a concerted influence of the more respectable physicians of the State might more effectually be directed to the promotion and advancement of the interests as well as the respectability of the profession.

"No doubt much had been effected by individual assiduity previous to the establishment of medical associations. But such detached and limited efforts had been proved manifestly inadequate to effect a reform of an entire system, defective not only in its general scientific qualifications but also depressed in its moral character by the long established unsocial and unprofessional habits and practices of a large portion of its members.

It is manifest that to remedy the former an elevated and uniform standard of education was required by which the qualifications of aspirants to membership were to be tested, and their claims decided by a competent tribunal delegated with adequate authority to deny admission to the incompetent; while to effect the latter, such codes and regulations, promulgated by a no less potent authority, were demanded as might prove restraints on the propensities of such of its members as were then, as at the present time, unfortunately endowed with a pre-eminence of the selfish impulses over their honorable sentiments.

"With the laudable object of effecting a professional reform and improvement, the physicians of several towns and counties embraced the plan of society association as the most effective means for its accomplishment. Experience soon manifested the happy effects of the system, and that its greatest possible good might be attained, the plan of a general State association was conceived and ultimately adopted by the various county societies. This received incorporation by act of Legislature in 1792.

"The design of organization was not simultaneously embraced by the various sections of the State, but each with zeal successively adopted a measure, the happy effects of which were plainly manifested upon the medical society of the sections which had experienced its benefits. The city of Norwich and Litchfield County appear to have taken the initiative in medical organization; the first in 1792 or 1793, the last in 1765. Windham and New Haven Counties, a few years later, followed the example set by the first mentioned, and instituted their societies. Fairfield County appears to have been more tardy in the formation of her society, which was organized in 1792, being a few months subsequent to the incorporation, by the Legislature, of the State Medical Society, which was granted in the spring of that year.

"Although Fairfield was later in the movement of organization than its sister counties, yet I am led to infer that a no less active sentiment for reform existed in the minds of her physicians than that already manifested in the other sections of the State. This is shown from the fact that the society records exhibit, appended to the original articles of the association, the names of forty of her most respectable contemporary physicians, being probably about the number of regular practitioners in the county at the period of its organization.

"In view of this ready concurrence and support obtained for her society from so large a portion of the physicians of the county, it is with regret that I am compelled to the admission, that subsequently, and even at the present time, a large number of respectable practitioners of the county question its utility and withhold their influence and the pecuniary aid requisite to sustain its action for the attainment of the greatest good for which it might be made susceptible. I am happy, however, in being able to state that most of its repudiators virtually admit the salutary influence which it has effected, by their practice of a professional deportment accordant with its police established for the regulation of professional intercourse between its members.

"I learn from its records that the Fairfield County Society united with a commendable zeal with those of the other counties in an application to the Legislature for the charter of the State Society. At its first meeting at Redding, March, 1792, the following vote appears:—'Voted, that Drs. James Potter, John Lester, and David Rogers, be delegates to meet delegates from other counties in the State, at Hartford, in May next, in order to form a plan of general incorporation, to lay before the Hon. General Assembly at their next session.' The first delegates (so named) of the society to meet at convention in Middletown were appointed in September, 1792, and consisted of Drs. James Potter, Thaddeus Betts, Hezekiah Hartbut, James Clark, and Amos Mead. That the object of fellow at that time was one remunerated by love and patriotism only, would appear from a vote of the society, preceding the appointment of the gentlemen above named, as follows:—'Voted, that this meeting will make no compensation to the delegates to the Middletown Convention.'

"It also appears that the somewhat retroactive repugnance to taxation, at present existing with a portion of the physicians of Fairfield County, instead of being an infection of recent origin, is but the development of a predisposition, derived from their professional progenitors; as appears from the following vote passed at the county meeting in May, 1793:—'Voted, that whereas the Hon. General Convention of the Fellows of the Medical Society of Connecticut, at their session at Middletown in October last, voted, that they have power to levy and collect taxes for their own support and expenses while in Convention; it is the opinion of this meeting that said Convention of Fellows have not said powers, agreeable to the act of incorporation of the Medical Society; and that the delegates of this county give information of this vote to the adjourned convention to be holden at Hartford on the 16th day of May.'

'A reflective panacea, however, seems speedily to have suppressed the tendency to a development of the affection in the minds of those originally affected, while that of inheritance has, in some cases, proved obdurate and irremediable. It would appear from the following vote that the above was dictated rather by a constructive view of the act of incorporation as regards taxation, than of hostility to the principle. At a meeting of the County Society in 1796, it was voted, 'That the President and Fellows of the Connecticut Medical Society in legal convention, shall have full power to levy taxes on themselves, not exceeding one dollar on each member per annum.' Also it was voted, 'That the President and Fellows of said Society, in convention, shall have ample power to impose such pecuniary penalties on the members of said society, for a transgression of their By-Laws, as may be deemed necessary for the well ordering of said society, not exceeding the sum of $50.' It was also voted, 'That it is the wish of this meeting that the General Assembly be solicited by General Convention to absolve the members of the Medical Society of the State of Connecticut, from paying the moneys taxed for the support of the civil list; provided the like sum be yearly taxed, and collected, and appropriated for the sole purpose of diffusing medical knowledge,—voted, that the above vote be transmitted to the medical convention.' A vote similar to the above was repeated in 1798; but what action resulted, if any, does not appear.

'The following Preamble and Resolution, passed in 1794, exhibit a zeal in Fairfield County Society, for the cultivation and diffusion of medical knowledge, among its members, worthy of imitation by the present members of all medical societies,—viz., 'Whereas the material end, use, and design of the Medical Society of Connecticut was to diffuse and cultivate medical knowledge among the faculty; and as this noble purpose cannot be answered in any way so well as by the members mutually disclosing anything that occurs to their minds that may be in any way useful, either in the theory or practice of medicine—Resolved, that it shall be the duty of every member of this Medical Society to exhibit, at least once in two years, to the society, a dissertation on some medical subject, or relate an account of some cases in the course of his practice that may be marked with most peculiarities, together with his remarks there on. Resolved, That if any member shall refuse to comply with the foregoing resolution, he shall be considered as guilty of neglect of duty to this society and to mankind in general.' Though the requirements of the above resolution were probably not realized to its full extent, yet the records of the society and present experience prove that, through written and oral communication, elicited by the association, much has been effected in the dissemination of individual experience and observation among its members.

'By means of adequate police regulations, originally adopted and occasionally modified to meet existing emergencies, a salutary reformation has been effected of the existing habits formerly characterizing professional intercourse. Indeed, at the present time, such is the degree of professional civility generally observed by the physicians of Fairfield County, that even private complaints are rarely heard of its breach in the ordinary intercourse of neighboring physicians.

'It will probably be claimed by repudiators of medical societies that the improved condition of medical science is a necessary sequence of the advanced state of general literature characterizing the period; and that the improved moral and social habits of the profession have been the natural result of the superior refinement of modern society compared with that of preceding eras. While it is conceded that the cultivation of science tends to refine the taste, and to strengthen the honorable feelings of the few who are its devotees, yet it may admit of question whether, as regards the 'ultra modum' in the present age of activity of the selfish passions and propensities, society can justly boast a marked superiority of the social and honorable accomplishments over those of the past century.

'But to what cause, it may pertinently be asked, has medical science and the social improvements of the profession been indebted, more than to the efforts of its members which have originated and been promulgated by the authority of the various associations of the period? It is futile to pretend that the innate selfishness of some individuals in all professions can adequately be restrained, except by the force of a general public as well as professional sentiment, expressed by means of codes emanating from majorities of individuals in recognized association.

'It requires but a reference to the known tendencies of human nature to predict that should the existing system of medical association be abandoned, and the former comparatively secluded state of medical society be reintroduced, no existing regulations, whether social or scientific, would prove adequate to sustain unharmed its present advanced position. There is reason to apprehend that our professional system, with its centric influences thus unhappily discovered, and the affinities of interest remaining to assume their native sway over its detached and less responsible constituents, as in former periods, still contains a sufficient amount of discordant elements, not only essentially to derange its existing fraternity, but also greatly to endanger its scientific progress.

'It is therefore much to be desired that the repudiators of our medical organization, those who by their frequent interrogatory 'qui bono?' manifestly depreciate its character and importance, both in view of the public and many of the junior members of the profession, should institute a comparison between the present and past social and scientific history of the medical profession in the State, and then decide to what causes its present improved condition is to be attributed.

'It is presumed that such candid investigation will furnish sufficient evidence to convince the most-skeptical that it is through the emulation, stimulated by the fraternal intercourse of its members in the various public associations, that we have been enabled to realize the present improved moral and educational superiority of the profession over its past condition; and that it is through a continuance of the same agency that we may confidently hope for a progressive advancement of its respectability and importance in the estimation of the community far beyond its present position.

'It has been noticed that most of the respectable physicians of Fairfield County embraced with alacrity and zeal the plan of society organization. Also, the records of its society have been noticed to prove that their attention was early directed to professional improvement, by their adoption of measures for the diffusion of medical knowledge and experience among its members. A police system was also early established designed to remedy evils which had long interrupted the harmony and fraternity of the medical society in the county; an abuse indulged to such extent as not only to derogate the character and rank of the profession in the view of the community, but doubtless in many cases instead of its officiating as an agent of mercy it became rather a demon of evil to many a luckless subject whom disease had chained to prostrate on the arena of conflict of his medical attendants.

'Indeed, such was the existing emergency that had been induced by the indulgence of empirical habits by some of its physicians, that professional contention was rendered proverbially illustrative of disorders in society generally. Individual experience, whether real or assumed, was habitually vaunted with the object of beguiling the imagination of the credulous; and with many reputedly respectable physicians the art of abstracting the legitimate patients of neighboring rivals was paramount to that of healing their respective diseases. Indeed, self-interest, sought to be promoted by such dishonest means, appeared as the object that swayed many practitioners, rather than the honorable and liberal efforts adapted to the advancement of medical science and the public health for which they professed a special regard.

'To effect a reform of this depressed state of professional character, and to advance the scientific interests of the profession, was the object of those patriots who originated and by assiduity effected the medical organization of Fairfield County. They successfully encountered the herculean task, and by the continued efforts of their successors the hydra evils detrimental to the medical character have nearly disappeared from the field of their former influence. These worthy pioneers now all rest from their labors, but their invaluable works remain, and it is their due that their names be held in grateful remembrance by those who have succeeded them in the same field of professional toil.

'The names of the original subscribers of Fairfield County Society, who were contemporary practitioners in the county, are the following,—viz., Asahel Fitch, Jonathan Knight, Preservo Wood, Gabriel Baldwin, Ezra Curtis, David Hull, James E. Beach, Stephen Rockwell, William Shelton, Joseph Trowbridge, James Clark, Theodorus Betts, Thomas Davis, Elsha Belcher, James Potter, David Rogers, James Seefeld, Hosea Harbutt, Lewis Beers, Amos Mead, Jonathan Poor, Shadrach Mead, Gideon Shepard, Eljah Hawley, Oliver Benefitt, Amos Baker, Samuel Weld, John Lester, Bennett Perry, Eli Perry, Orange Benton, Benjamin Curtis, John Wood, Stephen Middlebrook, Augustin Merwin, John R. Gregory, Amos Botsford, William Beard, Daniel Beard, William Edson, Minor Higby, Gideon Bowsley.

'It would afford gratification, did the occasion admit, to bestow a particular notice of each individual whose names are appended to the foregoing list; but as this is denied, I shall select those only, who from their popular estimate as practitioners, or from their mental characteristics, enjoyed a more extensive reputation in the community in which they resided.

"As a tribute, however, due to those whom our limits forbid a more particular mention, I may generally state, that they were respectable and valued practitioners, many of their number possessing merit and qualification, as such, not inferior to others who, endowed with those fortunate characteristic traits which ever attract popular attention, enjoyed a more extended and prominent reputation.

"Dr. James Potter resided and practiced in Sherman, originally a part of New Fairfield, a town in the northwest part of Fairfield County. According to the best information I have obtained, his native place was Southington in this State. I have not been able to learn where or how he was educated. Rev. M. Guelston, of Sherman, thinks that he most probably obtained his medical education under the instruction of his relative, Dr. Potter, formerly a physician of Wallingford. Dr. Potter appears early to have united and become a member of the New Haven County Society previous to the organization of that of his own county, and was the third president of the Connecticut Medical Society. He was probably the prime agent in the institution of that of his own county, as its records show that its first meeting was assembled by his notification. Its honors were more frequently bestowed on him than on any other individual member. As a practitioner, however, I do not learn that he possessed scientific or practical qualification superior to many of his brethren of the county. His zeal was ardent in the promotion of the interests of the profession, and to its exercise is undoubtedly to be attributed the ready acquiescence obtained from so large a portion of her physicians for the proposed county organization. The notice which Dr. Potter has obtained from my predecessors supersedes the necessity of an extended mention of his public character. Rev. M. Guelston writes regarding him, 'As a physician he was highly esteemed here and in a wide circle around. No intruder could have encroached upon his business. In the political, civil, and religious community his agency and influence was great, and his memory has been cherished by all who knew him. He was a popular teacher, and instructed many students in the science of his profession.'

"He is said to have been of social habits, and so passionately fond of angling as frequently to resort to the waters of Long Island Sound—a distance of twenty or thirty miles from his place of residence—to indulge his favorite recreation. Of his personal appearance a friend writes, 'He was of a grave and venerable appearance, being one of the last who wore the small lilies and triangular (or Puritan) hat, dressing his tall figure with neatness and elegance. He was of a companionable temperament, and celebrated for telling anecdotes.' He died Feb. 10, 1804, aged sixty-seven years.

"Dr. Gibson Shepard was a practitioner and native of Newtown. I have learned that he studied medicine with Dr. Thomas, a professional predecessor in his native town, who is said to have been a reputable practitioner. I suspect that the early acquirements of Dr. Shepard were not extensive; but if such was the fact, he eminently compensated for the defect by an habitual devotion to the science of medicine and its observant application to the diseases which he treated. My early impressions of the doctor are, that he devoted greater attention to the occurring improvements in medical science than most of his contemporary brethren.

"Although not endowed with extraordinary intellectual powers, his talents were respectable and of a character calculated for usefulness rather than display or striking originality. If he did not attain eminence as a professional scholar, he was diligent in his efforts to acquire such portions of existing medical literature as were more immediately adapted to the emergencies of practice ordinarily presented to the notice of physicians. To his juniors in the profession, Dr. Shepard's department was ever urbane, and his counsels to them disinterested and parental. His professional covais in neighboring towns generally conceded to him a precedence as a consulting physician. The following vote from the records of Fairfield Medical Society sufficiently evince the estimation in which he was held by his brethren:

"Resolved, That Dr. Gibson Shepard receive the patronage of this society in consumption and chronic cases of disease, and that it be the duty of all members of this society to recommend him when counsel is deemed expedient, etc., and that it be his duty to report all cases of that description to which he may be called to attend, with their particular symptoms, the particular medicines, and the constitution of the several patients, together with the predispositions of their ancestry.'

"Although the existing generation of physicians may smile at such blending of professional opinion with popular belief regarding excellence of the skill of individuals in special classes of disease, yet the fact is undoubted that such were professional concessions as late as the close of the last and commencement of the present century. His mode of treatment of consumption, as I learn from his statement of cases left on the records of the society, was not peculiar, being in general mildly antiphlogistic and similar to the present treatment of phthisis. To meet occurring symptoms, local bleeding, counter-irritants, with anodyne and demulcent expectorants, were his general prescriptions.

"Dr. Shepard was somewhat eccentric in character, but social, instructive, and agreed to in his intercourse with society. In his religious sentiments he was a zealous Sanderonian. He ever sustained a reputation of great moral purity; and while he was highly esteemed by his friends, his enemies or traducers were rarely found. What few physicians can boast, he was the father of seventy children; thereby practically refuting the possible charge that, while enjoying the profits of a special branch of his profession as a prompt accessory in the accumulation of responsibilities on his friends, he was cautious in the assumption of similar burdens on himself.

"He is said to have been of an extremely charitable disposition and indulgent as to his pecuniary claims upon his poorer patients. This disposition, with the necessary demands for the support of his numerous family, ever kept him poor, though not indigent, as regarded a respectable living. Dr. Shepard was one of the most prominent of the originators and supporters of the Fairfield County Medical Society, and the records of this convention will show that he was one of its most frequent and active members. He died a few years since at Hunter, N. Y., where he resided with one of his daughters, when incapacitated from age for the practice of his profession, at the advanced period of eighty-nine years.

"Dr. Bennett Perry was a contemporary practitioner with Dr. Shepard in Newtown. He was a son of Dr. Nath. Perry, of Woodbury, a highly respectable physician of that town. The son probably acquired his profession with his father, when he located in Newtown, where he practiced medicine until his death, which occurred in 1822, aged sixty-six years. His reputation is that of a physician possessing superior talents, well developed by education, and an able, respectable, and highly accomplished practitioner and citizen.

"Dr. John Lester was, I have understood, a native of Massachusetts. He studied medicine with Dr. Nath. Perry, of Woodbury, who it would appear was among the most prominent medical teachers of the period. He commenced practice at the age of twenty-one, about 1789, at Huntington. Dr. Lester was one of the most respectable physicians of the county, and an active and efficient member of its medical society, in the organization of which he sustained a prominent part. His death occurred in 1802, aged about thirty-five years.

"Dr. William Shelton was a native of Huntington, a graduate of Yale College in 1788. He pursued his medical studies, I am informed, in part with Dr. Eneas Munson, and was for a time under the instruction of Dr. William Azur Tomlinson, of Stratford. He first located and practiced in Trumbull, but on the decease of Dr. Lester he removed to his native town, where he continued its principal physician until his death. Dr. Shelton was a talented, skillful, and most respected physician. He was an influential pioneer in the county society organization, and ever continued one of its principal supporters. He was the father of Mrs. William Shelton, of Stratford, and James H. Shelton, of Huntington. He died in 1819, aged fifty-two years.

"Dr. David Hull was a native of the town of Derby. He was the son of — Hull, a resident of that town, and brother of Gen. Hull of Detroit notority. He was also uncle to Com. Isaac Hull of the navy. He graduated at Yale College in 1785, and studied medicine with Dr. Titus Hull, of Bethlehem, a proprietor of the celebrated 'Hull's Physic.' He located and practiced his profession in Fairfield, where he continued a highly respectable and respected physician until his death, a period of nearly half a century. He enjoyed an extensive practice not only in Fairfield, but, especially in cases of colic, in the adjacent towns, where he was often called as a consulting physician. Dr. Hull acquired from his preceptor, who I believe was a distant relative, a knowledge of the composition of 'Hull's Physic' in consideration of his name. The composition of this nostrum was a secret which its inventor allowed to be imparted but to those of his name, and to those but with the condition that such only as enjoyed the family cognomen were to be admitted as candidates for a reception of the concealed treasure. Such was the position of Dr. David Hull in relation to this celebrated nostrum, for which he encountered the censorious remarks of his medical brethren abroad and not infrequently those of his own county, who were less familiar with the mostentations made in which he employed it.

"In justice to the professional memory of Dr. Hull, and in vindication of a friend whom I much esteemed, I am happy in being able to state, from personal knowledge, that without proclaiming the specific virtues of the pills in the cure of colic, on which disease its popularity was based, or in any degree adopting the mode of nostrum proprietors in announcing their bantlings for public attention, he unpretendingly employed them in his practice as a favorite laxative in that as well as various other diseases in which he deemed them appropriate, simply under the denomination of his Bothe pill. He was from its origin and ever continued a member of the county society, notwithstanding the existence of its stringent by-laws and the known de-stestation of empiricism which actuated its most prominent members. The tolerance which Dr. Hull experienced from his contemporary brethren under such circumstances might be deemed adequate evidence of their estimate of his character as a respectable and honorable member of the county society; but in addition the following vote on the society record exhibits positive proof that he was recognized as a valued and esteemed member, whose influence it was deemed desirable to secure and retain for the promotion of the object for which it was organized. Voted, 'that a committee be appointed to call on Dr. David Hull and inform him that by paying his taxes in arrears he will be considered an honorable member of this society without inquiry into the secret of the composition of Hull's Physic.' A committee of three of the most respectable members were, in accordance with the above vote, appointed, and Dr. Hull remained a most esteemed member of the society until his death, which occurred in 1831, aged sixty-eight years.

"I am indebted to the politeness of Professor Knight for the following notice of physicians who practiced in Norwalk, his native town.

"Dr. Knight, in reply to a communication on the subject, states, 'The oldest physician whom I knew and the only one of any distinction, when my father settled there, was Thaddeus Betts, M.D. He was, I believe, a native of the town, a graduate of Yale College in 1745, one of the original members of the Connecticut Medical Society, and received from it the degree of M.D. at an early period of its existence. He died in 1807. He was a man of great excellence of character, well informed in his profession, and a judicious practitioner. I think he made no pretensions to surgery. I recollect him as a cheerful, pleasant old gentleman, abounding in wit, and instructive in his conversation.

"My father, Dr. Jonathan Knight, was born in Lisbon, then a part of Norwich, Conn., Jan. 10, 1758. He studied medicine with Dr. Ladd, a physician of that neighborhood. In 1776 or 1777 he entered the army, and was surgeon's mate of the Connecticut Regiment, under the command of Col. Durkee or Durgoo. He was with the troops under Gen. Washington at Valley Forge during that most dispiriting period of the war. He left the army in 1780, and settled in Norwalk in 1781-82. For many years he was actively and extensively engaged in practice, principally as a physician, in that and the neighboring towns. He continued in the performance of the active duties of his profession until they were diminished by advancing years and increasing infirmities. He died March, 1829, in the seventy-second year of his age.'

"I would add to the above statement of Dr. Knight that Dr. T. Betts was the grandfather of H. M. Thaddeus Betts, late of the United States Senate. Dr. Knight, besides the esteemed writer of the above, had another son, Dr. James Knight, who located and practiced in Stamford, but died in early life, about the period 1818. Drs. Betts and Knight were among the most prominent and influential members who aided in the establishment and were zealous supporters of the Fairfield County Medical Society.

"Among the most eminent physicians of Fairfield County was Dr. Hester Hurlbut, of Greenfield Hill. He was a native of Berlin, Conn., and son of Samuel Hurlbut, of that town. He commenced the study of medicine with his celebrated and eccentric uncle, Dr. James Hurlbut, of Wethersfield. He was for a time a student in the office of Dr. Wolcott, of Litchfield, the elder Governor of that name. While there he numbered among his intimate associates Judge Reeve, Aaron Burr, John Allen, and Oliver Wolcott, Jr. Even among such intellectual associates he is said to have sustained a distinguished part, through the exercise of a marked original genius, as a ready, penetrating wit, and interesting conversational power. He subsequently commenced practice in the upper part of Middletown, from which place, after a short residence, he removed to Greenfield, in the town of Fairfield, where he resided until his decease, distinguished alike as a physician and man of generally cultivated and rare genius.

"Dr. Hurlbut possessed a high sense of the dignity of his profession, and ever observed propriety in all its forms. He despised like the medical quack—the legal peddler, and the small politician, who seldom fail to receive and sensibly to write under the castigation of his pungent shafts of witicism, by which, with acuteness, he rarely failed to mark his victims.

"In addition to his familiarity with the medical literature of the day, his attention was frequently given to belles-lettres—science that, with the aid of a remarkably retentive memory, many of the classic poets, as Milton, Dryden, Pope, Young, and Johnson, he was accustomed to repeat nearly entire from memory.

"The doctor himself possessed a rare poetic genius, which, however, was more employed in aid of occasions inviting the exercise of his masculine satirical powers than in the ordinary gentle effusions of the Muses. He rarely permitted the publication of his poetic pieces. One, however, entitled 'The Quack,' directed against the charity of a professional neighbor, he published anonymously, with scathful effect upon its unlucky victim.

"Such was the retentiveness of his memory, however, that most of his poetic compositions he could readily repeat. Several of these I have heard him recite, which in poetic gracefulness even surpassed, while the pungency of their satire was not inferior to that of Peter Pindar or McFingal.

"Among the many anecdotes which might be adduced to show the doctor's instant wit and ready application of quotation, the following is pertinent. Being in a company of attorneys, one of the number, with the design to rally a reporter, asked the doctor why perpetual unbrotherly feuds were so characteristic of the members of the medical profession, at the same time boastfully remarking, 'Not so with us lawyers; we ever live in neighborly harmony, quarrels hardly being known to exist among us.' Says the doctor promptly, in the language of Milton,—

"Devil with devil damn'd,
Firm concord holds—Men only disagree,
Of creatures rational,' etc.

"As a physician, Dr. Hurlbut was doubtless far in advance of the generality of his contemporaries. His views of the treatment of diseases approximated more to modern practice than the overdrugging which characterized the era in which he practiced his profession. He was opposed to polypharmacy, and ever directed his treatment with a view to aid the salutary efforts of the economy in its struggles against diseased action, rather than embarrass them by the burdensome influences of a great variety and excess of prescription. The chief object which he ever kept in view was a diet and regimen adapted to the condition of his patient, and the exhibition of such medicines as existing symptoms appeared to indicate. It was his marked disapprobation of the salutary practice pursued by most of his neighboring brethren, in connection with the pointedly expressed disgust of the petty arts practiced for procuring patients, which drew upon him an excess of their hostility, and caused him to be frequently denounced by them, as a cynic inimical to the interests of the profession.

"Dr. Hurlbut possessed a remarkably fine personal appearance. His form was commanding, dignified, and graceful. In conversation, his language was chaste and select. Vulgarisms, whether in sentiment or expression, met his frowning rebuke; and all acts of a mean and dishonorable character, which were subjects of his observation, ever met the flaying force of his satirical lash. He was scrupulously neat in his person and temperate in his habits. He was a regular reader and admirer of the Bible, and a firm believer in the truths of Christianity. He died April 25, 1825, aged eighty years, leaving a reputation that will long survive him throughout the community in which he lived.

"Being a neighbor and friend to the doctor in the early period of my professional life, I had the fortune of attending him in his last illness. An anecdote occurred at that time well illustrative of his character and of the force of the ruling passion in death. The disease which terminated his life was a paroxysmal and extremely painful affection of the stomach, of an obscure nature. For several days he retained an unclouded intellect. During the intermissions of the painful attacks he was as usual social and communicative. Being sensible of his approaching end, and having been for a long period on unsound terms with Dr. Hull, he expressed the commendable wish for an interview for the purpose of a reconciliation. Dr. Hull readily reciprocated the feeling, and an amicable adjustment was the result. During the interview, in the absence of his painful paroxysm, the doctor's favorite topic of medicine happened to be the subject of conversation; and 'Hull's Colic Pills,' which the invalid ever held in sneering contempt, became the object of a jocular rally upon his recent friend. Dr. Hull, prudently judging that the reconciliation might be hazarded by attempting defense, suffered the pleasantry to proceed till the embarrassment of his situation elicited the response, 'Yes, doctor, those pills are a favorite hobby of mine;—which thousands have rode to death'—was continuously supplied by the patient.

"Dr. Asahel Fitch was one of the early physicians of Redding, and is remembered in Fairfield County as a worthy man and one of its most respectable practitioners of medicine. He was among the principal pioneers in the formation of the County Society, but died soon after its organization. His death occurred in 1792, or about that period. I understand that he was the grandfather of Professor Knight, of Yale College.

"Among the physicians of Fairfield County who enjoyed a long and successful practice was Dr. Thomas Davis of Redding. He was a native of Washington, Litchfield Co. He commenced the study of medicine at the age of sixteen with Dr. Seth Hastings, of that town, a physician somewhat distinguished, I am informed, as a medical teacher. Dr. Davis, previous to the attainment of his majority, was admitted as a partner to the extensive practice of his preceptor. He subsequently removed and practiced medicine for a period in Sherman, in Fairfield County. In 1793, on the decease of Dr. Fitch, he removed to Redding, where he continued in the duties of his profession till his death, which occurred in 1831.

"Dr. Davis possesses the reputation of being among the first of the physicians of the county who assumed regularly obstetrical duties; and so successful were his labors that he became particularly eminent in that department. It is asserted of him that during the long period of his practice he never lost a parturient patient.

"The doctor being summoned as an important witness to appear before the court in Fairfield, and not appearing, the sheriff was sent to compel his attendance. Being absent, and learning on his return that the officer was awaiting at a public-house in the vicinity, he, without notice to the official, rode to Fairfield and appeared before the court. On the question occurring with the court regarding the costs attending the ex parte, he requested one or two of his legal friends to excuse his delinquency. The judge decided, notwithstanding, that the law must be observed and that the doctor must bear the expenses. Dr. Davis then requested a hearing in his own behalf, which being granted, remarked, 'May it please the court, I am a good citizen of the State, and since I was summoned to attend this court I have introduced three other good citizens into it.' The court replied that for so good a plea he would leave the parties to pay the expenses. The doctor received the congratulations of the bar for his successful defense.

"The following anecdote, as connected with another subject embraced in these biographical sketches, and also with a historical event occurring in this convention, I will take the liberty to relate:

"Dr. James Potter, of New Fairfield, when on his way to our annual convention, at which he was to deliver an address, called and spent a night with his friend Dr. Davis. The orator being elated with his anticipated exhibition, and several of his acquaintances, among whom was a County Court judge, calling on him in the evening, they united with his host in persuading him to rehearse before them his grandiloquent speech. After the family and domestics, including an African, had been summoned, with the view numerically to multiply the audience, the doctor, with oratorical pomp, mounted the rostrum (which being a large armed chair), and delighted himself and auditory by its rehearsal.

"The chair thus rendered memorable has been presented to a member of the medical society. Rev. Thomas E. Davis, one of our most respectable divines, is the only male descendant of Dr. Davis.

"The subject to which I have directed your attention has led to a retrospect into the darker eras of our professional history, when both physicians and the public enjoyed few of the advantages of mental culture that now exist. Credulity and ignorance, fostered by knavery, there appear as the prominent agents in misguiding the public mind in its estimate of medical science and the object and importance of its cultivation, as well as to lead it essentially to underestimate the character and object of the profession directing its legitimate administration.

"The undiminished influence which credulity still exerts over the public mind, in the present comparatively enlightened period, affords no small evidence in favor of the position, that it is an innate propensity, holding a no less important relation to the mind than that of one of its elementary constituents, which will probably manifest its activity in every condition of society, whatever may be the advantages enjoyed for its discipline and cultivation.

"In such view of the origin of credulity, it is true that the apprehension can but be indulged, that in some form of manifestation, it will long continue to counteract the teachings of reason and experience, and thus ever prove an obstacle that will be likely to obstruct our profession, in its efforts for the advancement of the sanative interests of the community.

"The hope, however, may be entertained, that among the many improvements of the age, such a system of culture for the mind will ultimately be devised, that its several faculties may be taught to act in their appropriate spheres, and a healthy rationality be substituted for the morbid exercises of reason which impostors in science originate and cherish, with the object of accomplishing their detestable designs. It is those who, at the present time, no less than formerly, distract the opinion which the public attempt to form regarding the value and importance of medical science, as well as that of theology and general spiritual agency.

"The professions of medicine and theology, as embracing within their confines a larger amount of perplexing and indefinite mysteries, the one of the organic, the other of the spiritual world, have ever been the prolific source whence impostors in science derive the alimant indispensable for the germination and growth of their baleful progeny of errors which distract and mislead public sentiment in its estimate of their respective merits. The professions of law and the common arts enjoy a comparative exemption for the reason that their principles are based upon sensible observation, and therefore are more readily comprehended and defined by the ordinary powers of sense and reason, which most persons possess. It is true that the offspring of evils which afflict the respective professions of medicine and theology are diversified in their forms, those of each being moulded by the varied alimant which they respectively supply; yet they are the product of an analogous germ of mental origin, and it is therefore undoubted that through the same remedy, a salutary inculcation of truth to the minds of the affected, the malady of each (if curable) is to be suppressed.

"It is manifest, therefore, that any efforts having reference to the suppression of evils flowing from credulity, that afflict the several professions, must be directed against the genus rather than the particular species or variety which each presents. The mental fountain must be clarified before the Protean errors which it emanates can be corrected. It is futile for the profession of medicine or theology, or even the political reformer, to attempt singly to combat the impostor or fanatic in the varied form which he assumes in their respective departments. He can alone successfully be encountered by the more rational of all the professions unitedly instructing the affected in a judicious exercise of their senses and reason, and the rejection of all such appeals made to their imagination, which are unsustained by evidence derived from these generally safe guides and faithful monitors.

"It would appear that evils thus identical in their character and origin ought to inspire a mutuality of interest in the suffering professions for their eradication. It is, however, a fact much to be regretted, that, whilst the influence of medical science, and generally the efforts of physicians, have been applied to counteract the common malady's originating from credulity, they have not received corresponding aid from the clerical profession, their joint sufferer from the evil. While the latter has been strenuous in its attempts to suppress the impostor and fanatic in religion, a large portion of its members have too frequently supplied their influence in aid of the quack in medicine, in his adventures for fortune upon the health and lives of the credulous in the community.

"It is a matter of regret that men of education and influence like these, who by their profession hold the exalted position of moral and religious instructors and conservators, should thus unintentionally be made instrumental in furtherance of the basely selfish designs of the knave and impostor in medicine. The explanation of the phenomenon may possibly be derived from the fact that their minds, though labors acquired in their investigation of the revealed mysteries of theology, and the habitual assent which they are accustomed to bestow, on evidence supplied by faith, upon the important truths which their profession requires them to teach, are more prone than others of equal mental discipline and understanding to yield their credence to the pretended marvelous revelations of the quack; especially when such are assumed as results of unwearied investigation into the mysteries embraced in the laws of organic structure, and its concomitant, the vital principle.

"I am gratified, however, in expressing my conviction, that far the larger portion of the more intelligent and influential of this most respectable and useful body of our fellow-citizens are in no degree chargeable with this error of judgment regarding the merits of the medical profession, of which we complain. Those have ever bestowed their individual influence in sustaining the claims which it holds upon the community for a just appreciation of its labors in its behalf. Could their powerful influence be made available in their several public bodies, the hopes of empiricism would be weakened in their most important intrenchments, and the lesser positions to which they would be compelled to resort would curtail their ability of inflicting the evils in which they have too long and too successfully revelled.

"I would therefore close this address, already extended beyond the limits originally designed, by the suggestion for your consideration, whether, by instituting annually joint measures (could such be effected) between clerical and medical public associations in reference to the emergency arising from the evils through which both are sufferers, they might not be essentially lessened, if not eradicated. Could such concerted action be effected, it is rational to hope, may it is morally certain, that their united influence would effect much in the correction of public sentiment in its erroneous views of the obscurities which the science of each embraces. By a salutary discipline thus forcibly inculcated, there can be no doubt that the success of the impostor, both in religion and medicine, would be materially checked and his influence curtailed, if not eradicated.

"Although the views suggested may be deemed too Utopian for human nature with its existing structure, yet permit me to express the belief, that by judiciously directed concurrent efforts of the two professions, aided by the intelligent of all classes, the hydra would be effectually suppressed, and its influence, hitherto so detrimental to the advancement of useful science and the public welfare, would be enfeebled and powerless, by thus exhausting the aliment required to sustain its growth.

"In retiring from this presidential seat which you have successively assigned me, accept, gentlemen, my thanks for the honor you have conferred, and for your indulgence of the imperfect ability which I am conscious of having displayed in the discharge of its responsible duties. During the period of my occupancy of this station, and a long previous experience as a member of this convention, it has been my good fortune uniformly to witness a manifestation of a most harmonious and fraternal feeling among its members, and I all the discussions of the various subjects of legislation that have been submitted to its action. While in most deliberative bodies party or sectional interests are too prone to originate unseemly passion, and to excite angry debate, no such exhibition has here been indulged. On the contrary, a unity of purpose, directed solely to the advancement of the medical profession in respectability and usefulness, has ever signally appeared as the actuating principle governing each of its members.

"Permit me, gentlemen, to express the hope that the same benevolent object will ever direct the deliberations of all your future convocations; and also my convictions that a continuance of the same course of prudent legislation, that has characterized the past, will not fail progressively to elevate the character of the medical profession of Connecticut, to a position unsurpassed by that of its brethren of other communities, or of either of the learned professions, and where it may survey unconcerned the puny assault of a reckless empiricism, which will, doubtless, long be sustained with the hope of inviting a novel-loving public to contribute aid for the promotion of its interest and aggrandizement.

"I cannot, gentlemen, in justice to my feelings, close without expressing the deep sense with which I am impressed by the recent event which has deprived the medical profession of several of its shining ornaments, as well as this society of two of its most active, respectable, and efficient members.

"I presume that, in common with myself, there are members of this body who anticipated a cordial and friendly greeting with our esteemed friends and colleagues, who have now retired from all earthly scenes, but whom a few days since we had apparent reason to believe little short of a grave providential dispensation would be likely to deprive us of their presence. Their viages in our hall of convocation have been, heretofore, nearly as familiar as its fixtures by which we are surrounded, and there are recollections thus made vivid, which are peculiarly calculated to add deeper poignancy to the event which we doubtless all in common deplore.

"From this one, Dr. Samuel Beach,* selected at our last annual meeting as Dissertator, we had the apparent good reason to expect an interesting and instructive communication. But in this our hopes are annihilated, and it is becoming in us devoutly to submit to the act of superior wisdom which has interposed and frustrated our cherished expectations. Of the character of Dr. Beach as a citizen, a physician, and friend, I cannot refrain from the remark that, during a long experience of friendly and intimate intercourse, I have ever found him uniform in the exercise of the qualities of an honest man, a gentleman, and a philanthropist, while as a member of the Medical Society and profession, it is no disparagement to any of its members to say that in zeal for the promotion of their interests and prosperity he was surpassed by none.

"Of Dr. Archibald Welch, surrounded as I am by his friends and neighboring brethren, and in consequence of the position which he has long held in this Convention as a member, as having fulfilled various official duties in its connection, including those of the occupancy of the chair, my attempt at his eulogy is rendered unnecessary. Personally, however, I am inclined to state that during an acquaintance of more than a quarter of a century, I have uniformly had occasion to admire his characteristic urbanity and gentlemanly deportment, and for a number of years, being officially associated with him in the discharge of public professional duties, I have experienced the benefits of his valuable friendship and more intimate social intercourse. Generally, I do not hesitate to add that as an example of zeal for the furtherance of the interests of the profession he has left no superior.

"But an afflictive Providence has interposed and the cherished hopes of future interviews with me, and with you, are thus abruptly terminated. It only remains therefore for us to emulate the worthy example which may be derived from the lives of the individuals whose career on earth has been so suddenly arrested.

"While, then, in common with their families and numerous circles of friends, we deplore the loss inflicted by the awful event, let us professionally improve the admonition, that the guardians of life are, alike with their charge, subject to the various forms of death which their vocation calls upon them to combat; and that on separating at the close of our annual convocations, no eye but that of an inscrutable Providence can designate those from our number, whose lineaments will cease to animate us in future assemblages, but in the reminiscence inspired by their virtues which survive them."

To Maj. L. N. Middlebrook, commissioner in bankruptcy for Fairfield County, the grandson of one of its "original subscribers" referred to by Dr. Blakeman, one whom it was his intention to memorialize in his address, I am indebted for the following sketches of three members of the Middlebrook family:

STEPHEN MIDDLEBROOK, M.D., a son of Stephen Middlebrook, a Revolutionary patriot and one of the Revolutionary Committee of Safety in Fairfield County, was born Dec. 8, 1755, in the parish of North Stratford, in the then town of Stratford, but now the village of Long Hill, town of Trumbull. He received his medical education, as was not unusually the custom in those days, through a due course of study and practice with other physicians of the county, being admitted to full practice on examination by, and a certificate of qualification from, a standing committee of reputable physicians constituted for that purpose, these being the only facilities available in Connecticut at that early day for instruction in and admission to the medical profession. His classical studies were pursued in part under the private tuition of the celebrated William Samuel Johnson, LL.D., of Stratford, and in part in the academical institutions of the county,—among others the academy at Easton. He established himself in his native town, and became one of the most successful practitioners of his day in this and the adjoining counties, accumulating therefrom what was regarded as a large fortune in those times. He manifested his love for the profession by training two of his three sons to the same honorable calling. He filled many positions of honor and trust in his town and county. He died Dec. 18, 1819, and is buried in the cemetery at Long Hill, Trumbull.

So great was his love for his chosen profession that he endeavored to have his three sons—Elijah, Stephen, and Robert—follow the path in which he had walked so long. He was only two-thirds successful, Robert rebelling and spending his life in farming. Elijah was one of those referred to by Dr. Blakeman in his address,—a master-spirit of the profession, by whose unremitting labors in his era of professional history the improvements in the profession were effected.

ELIJAH MIDDLEBROOK, M.D., eldest son of Dr. Stephen Middlebrook and Amer Beach Middlebrook, daughter of Elijah Beach, of Trumbull, an officer of the Revolutionary army, was born at Long Hill, now in the town of Trumbull, Oct. 20, 1785. He pursued his medical studies with his father, and was licensed to practice medicine by the Connecticut Medical Society in 1811. He afterwards took a further two years' course of instruction in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City, and graduated from that institution in 1813. He thereupon entered active practice in his native town in company with his father, and was an active practitioner for forty-five years, meeting with great success. He died Jan. 2, 1859, and is buried in the cemetery at Long Hill. For fifty-four years he edited and published annually his celebrated "Middlebrook's New England Almanac,"—a period of editorial labor, as devoted by the same individual to the same publication, believed to be wellnigh without a parallel in the history of periodical literature. He was fitted for this special work under the private tuition of Prof. Nehemiah Strong, of Yale College. He was among the most genial of men and an enthusiast in his profession. He always strove to elevate and dignify his calling, and was an active and zealous laborer in the various national and State organizations instituted to that end, always being present at their meetings. His name appears oftener than any other on the records of the Fairfield County Medical Society. He filled many civil and political offices of honor and trust. He was elected president of the Connecticut Medical Society in 1841, re-elected in 1842, and resigned the office in 1843. He was the first representative of the Fairfield County Medical Society to the National Medical Society.

Some idea of the extent of his practice may be formed when we know that his powers of curing were considered as almost infallible. So much was he sought that he regularly employed two or three younger physicians to assist him, making them proxies. One of them asserts that the average business done by himself alone while thus employed averaged three hundred dollars per month.

The following relic is left of the business-like way of his dealings. It is a bill of Dr. Hulbert's, of Fairfield, one of the "original subscribers," and explains itself:

"Israel Hearley to Hosca Hulbert, Dr.

"(at the request of Dr. Middlebrooks).

"1801, Sept. To Visit and Consultation with sd Doctor for your Son, $1
"Read the above Am^l of Dr. Middlebrook.

"HOSEA HULBERT."

The many subscribers to "Middlebrook's New England Almanac" will be more interested in this receipt from Prof. Nehemiah Strong:

"Received of Elijah Middlebrooks nine shillings in Part of 50 Shillings Due to me for instructing him in Astronomy 12 weeks at 1s per week.

"Received by me,

"Nehemiah Strong,

"BRIDGEPORT, DECEMBER, 5th, 1801"

On the opposite side of the slip is the acknowledgment of the remainder:

"Decr. 10th, 1801.

"Received twenty-seven shillings of Mr. Stephen Middlebrooks, which with the Nine Shillings I received on the other side is the whole of my demands for Teaching his Son in the Science of Astronomy.

"per me NHE. STRONG."

Professor Strong is buried in the old ground at Stratfield, near the entrance.

STEPHEN MIDDLEBROOK, M.D., another son of Dr. Stephen Middlebrook, first above named, was born in Long Hill, town of Trumbull, then in the town of Stratford. He was located by his father in the town of Monroe at Edwards' Four Corners, and there practiced medicine for about twenty-five years, and although a very skillful and popular physician, yet having a strong aversion to the discomforts necessarily incident to an active practice, he retired from the profession in middle life, and passed the remainder of his days in leisure, in his native village, where he died Oct. 18, 1859, aged fifty-four years, and was buried in the cemetery in Long Hill.

THE HOMŒOPATHY practice is also worthily represented in Fairfield County. The practitioners of this school are William B. Beebe, B. F. Bronson, L. H. Norton, Charles E. Sanford, and L. M. Benedict, Bridgeport; W. E. Bulkeley, S. Penfield, and A. Griffin, Danbury; James H. Brush and L. P. Jones, Greenwich; Theodore Roberts and Eli Acker, New Canaan; G. S. Comstock and Dexter Hitchcock, Norwalk; Chauncey M. Ayres, George F. Foote, and J. F. Griffin, Stamford; G. W. Collard, of Stratford.

ECLECTIC PHYSICIANS, J. W. King, T. A. Shattuck, J. D. S. Smith, Joseph Fanyon, Bridgeport; E. A. Brown, Danbury; Cooke, C. C., New Canaan; Henry L. Malloy, Sherman; George W. Rubey, of Westport.

BOTANICAL, H. M. Richardson, Bridgeport.

INDIAN, G. C. Richards, of Danbury.

DAVID HULL NASH.—It is always a pleasure for the historian to place upon his pages passing incidents in the life of one who has devoted his life-study to the advancement of a noble profession and to the amelioration of the human race. Such a one is Dr. David Hull Nash, the subject of this sketch. He was born on Greenfield Hill, in this county, March 21, 1811, and is the son of Dr. W. B. Nash and Rutha M. Elliott, daughter of the sterling old patriot, Andrew Elliott, who was pastor of the Congregational Church of Fairfield when the town was burned by the British in 1779.*

Dr. W. B. Nash was born in Westport, Conn., and commenced practice in Greenfield, and from there removed to Fairfield and formed a copartnership with the late David Hull. Here he remained until 1825, when he came to Bridgeport, and continued in practice until his death, which occurred Dec. 9, 1872, in the eighty-seventh year of his age.

David H. was educated at the Fairfield Academy and in the schools of this city, and commenced the study of his profession in the office of his father, who was then in active practice. He subsequently continued his studies under the instruction of Eli and N. B. Ives, leading physicians in the city of New Haven. He also attended medical college at New Haven, from which he graduated in 1834. In the following year, 1835, he commenced practice with his father, under the firm-name of William B. Nash & Son, which partnership continued until July 1, 1853, when he associated with him Dr. Robert Hubbard. The firm of Nash & Hubbard existed until Jan. 1, 1871, since which time he has continued in the practice alone. Hence it will be seen that Dr. Nash has been in the active practice of his profession for nearly half a century.

He has always taken a lively interest in every measure tending to advance the interest of the profession generally, and is a member of the county, State, and United States medical societies.

Politically, Dr. Nash is a Republican, and an earnest advocate of the principles of that party. He was previously a Whig. Religiously, the doctor is a Congregationalist, and a member of the North Church, in this city.

Jan. 6, 1836, he united in marriage with Susan E., daughter of the late Jesse Sterling, and their family consists of Andrew Eliot and Jesse S., both of whom reside in Bridgeport. The eldest son, William S., is deceased.

Dr. Nash has a large and lucrative practice, and ranks among the leading physicians in the State. Although now nearly seventy years of age, he retains in a remarkable degree the vigor and elasticity of youth, and daily may be seen visiting his numerous patients, his interest never waning in that noble profession to which he has devoted a long and active career.

AMBROSE BEARDSLEY, M.D.—The subject of this sketch was born in the town of Monroe, Oct. 23, 1811. His father, Elihu Beardsley, a thrifty farmer of his native town, was a descendant of William Beardsley, one of the first settlers of Stratford, in Fairfield Co., Conn. The Beardsley family were for many years very numerous in Monroe, where they wielded a good deal of influence in the affairs of the town. Ambrose had three brothers; one of whom—to wit, the Rev. E. E. Beardsley, D.D., LL.D.—is an author of considerable eminence in matters of church history. A fourth Beardsley is a farmer upon the homestead land, while Rufus, the fourth of the sons, is dead. There were also two girls in the family, both of whom are still living.

Ambrose, the subject of this sketch, "roughed it" on the farm until he was sixteen, when having, by an industrious economy of time and his naturally studious habits, fitted himself for school-teaching, he, at this early age, tried the hazardous experiment of playing the schoolmaster to his late companions in his native town, and with such success that he was engaged for several successive seasons in the neighboring town of Redding. When, at length, he decided to abandon the birch and the ferule, he had by odds and ends, in one way and another, managed to pick up a considerable knowledge of the classics (though with little or no instruction, for, in the days of our fathers, "book-larnin'" for farmers' sons was not held in high esteem), and becoming convinced that his pathway of life did not lie in the trail of the plow, he chose for his profession the study and the practice of medicine. Accordingly, after following a course of study under the eminent Dr. Willard Parker, now of New York, he entered the Pittsfield Medical College, where, in December, 1834, he graduated with the first honors of his class. Locating in Newtown, Conn., he practiced in his profession successfully until September, 1836, when he accepted an invitation to locate in the then infant village of Birmingham, in the town of Derby, where he has ever since devoted his time and his talents—of which he has many—to the sick and the suffering for many miles around, almost revered by many and greatly beloved by all. Courteous and affable in his manners, prepossessing in his personal presence, Dr. Beardsley has won for himself an enviable reputation as a physician and surgeon.

Not only has he been prominent in his profession, but our now venerable friend has filled many official positions in his adopted town. For twenty-five consecutive years he was the treasurer of the town of Derby; for four years president of the Derby Savings Bank; nine years warden of the borough of Birmingham; besides many other minor offices of profit and trust, all of which positions he has ever occupied with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of the people, as is evidenced by the fact that when nominated for any office in the gift of the people "the old doctor" is never beaten.

Dr. Beardsley, early in life, was fond of debate and controversy, and, being a young man of bright abilities, he was always foremost in lyceum debates, etc., and it is to this sort of training that he attributes his success as a fluent speaker, as he unquestionably is upon almost any topic that he chooses to take up. Upon almost every public occasion within the last forty-four years in Derby, Dr. Beardsley has been a conspicuous actor and speaker. Within the limits of the town there is no man living who has delivered so many orations, lectures, and impromptu addresses as he, and always to the acceptance and gratification of his audience.

Always too much in love with his profession and too faithful to his patients to engage in State politics, he has yet at home been prominent as a Republican (though never a candidate for outside honors, which he might easily have obtained had he so desired), up to the nomination of Horace Greeley, when, with that noble philosopher and excellent American, he "went West," politically, from which journey and its effects he seems not to have sufficiently recovered to enable him to again take part, to any great extent, in local politics. During the late civil war Dr. Beardsley was ever an ardent Unionist, contributing often far above his means to the support of the soldiers in the field. In 18— he was married to Mary Bassett, the daughter of Samuel Bassett, Esq., late of Seymour, Conn., by whom he had two children, one of whom, Capt. A. E. Beardsley,—still living,—was a brave and a valuable soldier in the "Twentieth Connecticut." The other, Mary, wife of Dr. T. B. Jewett, is now deceased.

The doctor is a fluent and graceful writer, as is evidenced by the pages of the History of Derby, lately published, of which he was a co-editor and the leading writer, to whom the book is largely indebted for its spice, vivacity, and local historical interest. The History of Derby will doubtless be regarded through many coming years, by generations yet to come, with affectionate interest as the crowning sheaf in the life-work of a wise counselor, a skilled physician, a kind, affectionate husband and father, a friend of humanity, and an honest man. Judged by his works, it can truthfully be said of him that, while of worse men there are many, yet of better men there are few. As a physician his services were as accessible to the poor as to the rich, the question of probable reward never being considered to deter from or prompt to the most arduous service.

Public-spirited and upright in his daily walk and conversation, Dr. Beardsley has won for himself an enviable name in the community where nearly half a century ago he pitched his tent, and went forth to enjoy, in the words of Goldsmith, "the luxury of doing good." A Fairfield County boy, he well deserves this place of honor in its history.

If to renown we give the soldier's name
Who swings the sword for country or for fame,
If he who saves, and not who doth destroy,
Before his Maker hath the best employ,
Then should we write our village doctor's name
High on the scroll of that undying fame
Which crumbles not within the burial-shroud
Nor waits the fickle plaudit of the crowd.

With tender hand the fainting one to save,
To starve the sexton, and to foil the grave;
To lift the shadow from the palace-door,
Or smooth the pillow of the dying poor;
By pleasant word to cheer the heart of woe,
Where Beardsley went but few are found to go,
What matter, then, if lofty stone or low
Shall lift above the ashes of his rest?
When we no more the kindly face shall know,
Its memory still shall fill the grateful breast,
And best who knew shall cherish it the best.

Courage, O youth! Though fortune thee disown,
Like Beardsley, snatch the laurel and the crown

Of that great man of which—th—metimes wrong—
Ends at the last with this triumphal song.
"He fought the fight, and ever, till he slept,
"Twixt man and man the faith he kept."

J. W. S.

EZRA P. BENNETT, M.D., one of the oldest physicians in the State, and one of the most widely known in this portion of it, has been in active practice in Danbury nearly fifty-three years. Like many other men who have become eminent in various avocations, his early days, spent on a farm, gave no promise of his future career. He was born in Weston, Conn., Aug. 31, 1806, the fourth of a family of seven. His father, Ezra Bennett, was descended from a Scotch family of the name that settled in Connecticut several generations earlier. The ancestors of his mother, Esther Godfrey, came from England.

The opportunities for obtaining an education in his native town were very meagre, but such as they were he made diligent use of them. According to the customs of rural communities he attended school in the winter and worked on the farm in summer, and up to his fifteenth year he enjoyed no other educational privileges. Even the newspaper, which has become such a universal medium of instruction, was then hardly circulated outside of the larger towns.

After leaving the public school young Bennett was able to attend a private school for two winters under the charge of a college graduate, where he succeeded in slightly enlarging his knowledge of the common branches and picking up a smattering of Latin. Thus equipped, at the age of seventeen he taught school in Weston during a winter term and the following summer in Redding. However small the wages for this latter service may have been, he has had reason for congratulation for one of its results, for during that auspicious season he met her who afterwards became his wife, and has been his faithful coadjutor for more than half a century.

When he was fourteen an injury to the knee, sustained in wrestling, incapacitated him for efficient work on the farm, and obliged him to seek employment more in accordance with his tastes. He entered the office of Dr. Charles Gorham, of Redding, paying in part for the privilege by making himself useful in doing chores. In 1826 the young student spent eight months in the medical school at Pittsfield, Mass. The next year, after a term of the same length, he was graduated a doctor of medicine.

With a fair education gained under such adverse circumstances and an indomitable spirit he began at once, in January, 1828, to practice in Bethel, then a part of the town of Danbury, and entered upon a struggle that proved long and severe. His worldly goods and professional equipments consisted of what books he could conveniently carry under his arm, a pocket-case of surgical instruments, a horse and saddle, a meagre wardrobe, and ten dollars in cash. He had thus no abundance of means to support him while he built up a practice, nor had he influential friends to open the way for him, but was entirely dependent on the knowledge and skill which increased with years, and on boldness and energy that have never failed him. During the ten years of his sojourn in Bethel he managed to lay aside about fifty dollars a year. The economy that secured this result was rigid, for in the early part of that period he added to his earthly possessions a wife, a dwelling, and barn. If the helpmeet did not come from his side, like the primeval woman from her husband, the real estate did come from his head and hands, the product of their cunning and industry.

June 21, 1829, he was married to Sarah Maria, daughter of Billy Comstock, Esq., of Redding.

Dr. Bennett's career in Bethel was as successful as its narrow sphere rendered possible, but when, in 1838, an opening encouraged him to remove to Danbury, he gladly improved the opportunity of entering on broader usefulness. He purchased the place on Deer Hill which has since been his home. Here his practice steadily increased, giving him all he could attend to even in ordinary circumstances. From the first he has been especially interested in surgery, and there he has won his fairest laurels. Beginning with the simple task of trephining he has performed operations worthy of the most eminent men in the profession. He was the pioneer in Connecticut in operating for ovarian tumor, vesico-vaginal fistula, and club-foot. He has performed lithotomy by the lateral method nine times successfully, save one, which was undertaken against overwhelming chances. Seven of his nine cases of ovariectomy have succeeded perfectly. His other capital operations have been numerous. He has tied the subclavian artery once and the femoral artery four times. The boldness and skill of his operations have given him a deserved place of honor in the minds of those who have been familiar with them, both in and out of the profession.

The necessity of rapid manipulation was a prerequisite to success before the discovery of anesthetics, and the rapidity with which Dr. Bennett worked was perfectly wonderful. He once amputated a thigh in thirty seconds, according to the testimony of bystanders, who timed him accurately, his celerity in operating being due, doubtless, in a measure, to the fact that he is ambidextrous. In 1850 he made a trip to England, with his two boys, to consult Dr. Marshall Hall respecting the health of one of them. He was absent, however, but a few months.

In a sketch of this kind, necessarily brief, it is impossible to do justice to the personal and professional characteristics of a man like Dr. Bennett. Moulded largely by the circumstances of his early-life struggles, which developed boldness, independence, and obstinate determination, he has made firm friends, and by his intelligence and skill has won respect even from enemies. A man that has his own way to make in the world, and makes it successfully, naturally feels some degree of self-complacency, and cannot be blamed for reviewing his career with considerable satisfaction. Dr. Bennett has done what he undertook, and done it well. How many have done less! In the course of his professional career he has met in consultation some of the most eminent physicians in the country, and they have invariably admired his talents and respected his opinions. He has always been remarkably quick and sure in his diagnosis, seeming at times to have an almost intuitive perception of disease, and his hand is still as steady in operating as it was fifty years ago, nor has he lost the zest of early ambition in his favorite department of surgery.

He has kept abreast the age in his profession, and his library, of a few books carried under the arm, has grown to contain all the works of authors of standing, and occupies two sides of a long room from floor to ceiling. June 24, 1879, the doctor celebrated his golden wedding. It was an enjoyable, impromptu affair, arranged during a ride the doctor was induced to take, at which many of the friends were present, and not the least pleasant feature of which was the presentation to him of a gold watch and chain, in a happy speech by Deacon E. T. Hoyt. The watch was inscribed as follows: "Dr. E. P. Bennett from his friends, in recognition of the faithfulness and skill with which, as surgeon and physician, he has long served them and honored his profession."

In 1875, Dr. Bennett was appointed one of the trustees of the State Lunatic Hospital for four years, and reappointed in 1879.

The doctor's children have been three: William Comstock and Andrew Comstock, twins, and Sarah L. One of the twins, Andrew, in the interest of whose health the trip to England was made, died on the return voyage. The surviving son, William, attended school at New Haven and Northampton, Mass., entered Yale College, and was graduated with the class of 1858. He received the degree of M.D. from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, in March, 1860; practiced medicine with his father until July, 1861, when he entered the army as assistant surgeon Fifth Connecticut Volunteers; afterwards surgeon of the regiment. Resigning this position, he received an appointment from the United States as surgeon of volunteers; was assigned to the Twentieth Army Corps as medical inspector, serving on the staffs of Slocum, Hooker, and Williams, successively. He was in the Army of the Shenandoah, Potomac, Cumberland, and Georgia, accompanying Sherman in his march to the sea. March, 1865, he was mustered out of service and returned to Danbury, where he has since practiced in company with his father.

The daughter, Sarah L., was married July 19, 1871, to Rev. John H. Lockwood, of Troy, N. Y., a descendant of several of the old families of Danbury. He was for two years after their marriage pastor of the Reformed Church of Canastota, N. Y. In 1873 he assumed the pastorate of the New England Congregational Church of Brooklyn, where he remained six years; went thence to Westfield, Mass., as pastor of the First Congregational Church,—a position he still occupies. They have one child, William Andrew.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The Fairfield County Agricultural Society purchased the grounds and held their fair on the present location in Norwalk, 1867, with the following officers: Jonathan Camp, President; Charles E. Plumb, Secretary.

The following is a list of the presidents and secretaries from 1868 to the present time:

1868-71.—Jonathan Camp, President; Charles E. Plumb, Secretary.

1872-73.—Dudley P. Ely, President; Charles E. Plumb, Secretary.

1874.—Dudley P. Ely, President; W. D. Gregory, Secretary.

1875-76.—John P. Beatty, President; W. D. Gregory, Secretary.

1877-80.—J. E. Wheeler, President; W. D. Gregory, Secretary.

In 1875 the society was reorganized under a charter from the Legislature as a joint-stock company, with a capital stock of thirty thousand dollars, divided into fifteen hundred shares of twenty dollars each.

The grounds of the society are beautifully located on the line of the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad, and contain about thirty acres; a good half-mile track, and a fine building containing about fifteen thousand square feet of floor-surface, capable of holding and affording perfect protection to all articles offered for competition or exhibition; also a large number of suitable stalls and yards for stock. The commodious permanent buildings erected on the grounds afford protection and provide unexcelled facilities for the proper classification of all articles sent for exhibition and competition.

The lightning had scarcely flashed the intelligence to the expectant North that Maj. Anderson and his gallant band had surrendered as prisoners of war to the Southern Confederacy ere the patriotic sons of Fairfield were rallying to the support of their imperiled country. Men and money were promptly raised, and the record of the county during the whole struggle is one of which her citizens may justly feel a patriotic pride.

THE FIRST REGIMENT.

The first regiment which was raised in the State of Connecticut for the service of the United States in the late Rebellion was known as the First Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and was recruited mainly from the volunteer militia, to serve three months. Company E was recruited from Danbury, and Company K from Bridgeport. Rifle Company B also had a number of men from Bridgeport.

The field- and staff-officers were as follows: Colonel, Daniel Tyler; lieutenant-colonel, George S. Burnham; major, John L. Chatfield; quartermaster, Justin Hodge; adjutant, Theodore C. Bacon; surgeon, Henry P. Stearns; surgeon's mate, F. L. Dibble; chaplain, George N. Webber; sergeant-major, John L. Spalding; quartermaster-sergeant, I. V. B. Williams; drum-major, William J. Skinner; hospital steward, Joseph Colton.

The officers of Company E, the Danbury company, were as follows: Captain, Eliakim E. Wildman; first lieutenant, Jesse D. Stevens; second lieutenant, John W. Bussing.

Company K, the Bridgeport company, was officered as follows: Captain, Richard Fitzgibbons; first lieutenant, Henry M. Hoyt; second lieutenant, William A. Lee.

The regiment was mustered into the service, seven hundred and eighty strong, April 24, 1861, and on the 9th of the following May left New Haven for the seat of war. It was armed with Sharp's rifles and Springfield muskets. It was the first regiment which ascended the Potomac. Upon arriving at the front it went into camp at Falls Church, where it remained until July 21st, when it was ordered to Bull Run, and participated in that disastrous and memorable struggle. Col. Tyler having been promoted to be a brigadier-general, the regiment, in this its baptism of fire, was commanded by Col. Burnham. During this contest, which resulted so disastrously to the Union forces, the regiment marched and countermarched until four o'clock P.M., being much of the time under severe fire. The First retreated to Centreville, having lost only eight wounded and nine captured. After a brief halt at Centreville it returned to camp, where it remained several days, and was then, its term of service having expired, sent North and mustered out at New Haven, July 3, 1861.

THE THIRD REGIMENT.

The Third Regiment was raised in Norwalk, Bridgeport, New Haven, Danbury, New Fairfield, Hartford, Meriden, Norwich, and Stamford. It embraced five rifle and four infantry companies, and was mustered into the service, seven hundred and fifty strong, May 14, 1861, for three months, with the following field- and staff-officers: Colonel, John Arnold; lieutenant-colonel, Allen G. Brady; major, Alexander Warner; adjutant, Frederick J. Peck; quartermaster, Richard E. Holcomb; surgeon, John McGregor; assistant surgeon, Mathew C. Newton; sergeant-major, William E. Brady; quartermaster-sergeant, J. H. Alexander; drum-major, L. B. Farren; file-major, William R. Miller; chaplain, Junius M. Willey (enlisted June 14th).

The line-officers were as follows:

Company A.—Captain, Douglass Fowler; first lieutenant, Gilbert Bogart; second lieutenant, Stephen D. Buxbee.

Company B.—Captain, Daniel Klein; first lieutenant, William K. Schmitt; second lieutenant, Charles Rose.

Company C.—Captain, James E. Moore; first lieutenant, Samuel G. Bailey; second lieutenant, Charles H. Hoyt.

Company D.—Captain, Frederick Frye; first lieutenant, S. H. Gray; second lieutenant, Elliot M. Curtis.

Rifle Company A.—Captain, George N. Lewis; first lieutenant, John Brennan; second lieutenant, L. S. Bolles.

Rifle Company B.—Captain, Jared R. Cook; first lieutenant, —; second lieutenant, A. S. Cowdry.

Rifle Company C.—Captain, S. J. Root; first lieutenant, L. C. Allen; second lieutenant, J. S. A. Baker.

Rifle Company D.—Captain, Edward Harland; first lieutenant, C. W. Spalding; second lieutenant, William W. Barnes.

Rifle Company E.—Captain, J. A. Nelson; first lieutenant, Henry Finnegus; second lieutenant, William Wright.

Rifle Company F.—Captain, Albert Stevens; first lieutenant, Wells Allis; second lieutenant, Isaac L. Hoyt.

Col. Arnold resigned before leaving the rendezvous in Hartford in consequence of ill health, and the command was given to John L. Chatfield, who enlisted May 31st, and became very popular with the regiment.

The Third left Hartford for the front May 19, 1861. Upon its arrival at Washington it went into camp at Camp Douglass, where it was put under vigorous drill until June 23d, when it was ordered to Camp Tyler, or Falls Church, where for several days it held this exposed position.

The regiment was first brigaded with the First and Second Connecticut and Eleventh Maine, July 15th, and placed under the command of Col. E. D. Keyes. On the following day Keyes' command moved forward, the Third in the advance. At Blackburn Ford they encountered Longstreet's division, and during two days the brigade held this advance post.

The Third participated in the memorable battle of Bull Run, Jan. 21, 1861, and their conduct in that disastrous field justly merited the many encomiums of praise bestowed by the commanding officers. Gen.

Keyes, in his official report, says, "The gallantry with which the Second Regiment of Maine and the Third of Connecticut Volunteers charged up the hill upon the enemy's artillery and infantry was never, in my opinion, surpassed." The Third was the last to leave the field, and it left it, not like the great mass of the Union army, in a rout, but in good order, protecting the retreating army from the victorious enemy.

Gen. Tyler said that it was these sons of Connecticut who "saved us not only a large amount of public property, but the mortification of having our standing camps fall into the hands of the enemy." In this battle Sergt. McGregor was captured, but released. The regiment had four killed, thirteen wounded, eighteen captured, and six missing. The muster out was at Hartford, Aug. 12, 1861.

THE FIFTH REGIMENT

was organized in the summer of 1861, and entered the service with Orris S. Ferry, of Norwalk, as colonel. He was subsequently United States senator. This regiment was originally recruited in Hartford as the First Connecticut Revolving Rifle Regiment, with Samuel Colt as colonel, but, some misunderstanding having occurred, Col. Colt's commission was revoked, and the regiment was reorganized as above.

There was only one company from Fairfield County in the regiment,—Company A,—commanded by Henry B. Stone, of Danbury, with James A. Betts as first lieutenant and William A. Daniels second lieutenant. William C. Bennett, M.D., of Danbury, was the first assistant surgeon.

The regiment participated in the following engagements: Winchester and Cedar Mountain, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Resaca, Dallas, Marietta, Peachtree Creek, Atlanta, Chesterfield Court-House, and Silver Run. Casualties: Killed, 93; died of wounds, 29; died of disease, 81. Several died in Andersonville prison. The regiment was mustered out July 19, 1865.

THE SIXTH REGIMENT.

The Sixth Regiment was organized in August, 1861, and in the following month was mustered into the United States service with the following field- and staff-officers: Colonel, John L. Chatfield; lieutenant-colonel, William G. Ely; major, John Speidel; adjutant, Redfield Duryee; quartermaster, I. V. B. Williams; surgeon, F. L. Dibble; first assistant surgeon, Edward Bulkley, Jr.; second assistant surgeon, R. E. Ensign; chaplain, Curtis T. Woodruff.

Fairfield County was represented in this regiment by two companies,—D, recruited in Stamford and Greenwich, and I, principally from Bridgeport, although other portions of the county were represented.

The officers of Company D were: Captain, Lorenzo Meeker; first lieutenant, Charles H. Nichols; second lieutenant, John Stottlar.

Company I was officered as follows: Captain,

Thomas Boudren; first lieutenant, Daniel J. West; second lieutenant, Stephen S. Stevens.

The regiment left New Haven September 17th, one thousand and eight strong, for the front. They remained in Washington until October 5th, when they went to Annapolis, from whence, October 25th, they embarked for South Carolina, having been assigned to the Department of the South. After the successful naval engagement of November 7th, when Forts Walker and Beauregard were captured, the honor was assigned to the Sixth and Seventh Connecticut Regiments of first landing on the enemy's soil.

In March, 1862, the regiment was sent over to Dawfuskie Island to assist in the capture of Fort Pulaski, and the following June found them in the battle of James' Island. They returned to Hilton Head, where they remained until October 21st, when the regiment joined the expedition to break up railroad communication between Charleston and Savannah, and on the following day participated in the sharp engagement at Pocotaligo, where both Col. Chatfield and Lieut. Col. Speidel were severely wounded.

During the winter of 1862-63, the regiment remained in camp at Beaufort and Hilton Head, and March, 1863, found it in Florida, but soon returned to Hilton Head. It was soon transferred to Folly Island, and participated in the operations against Charleston and in the assault on Morris Island in July. In the second assault on Fort Wagner its gallant colonel, Chatfield, was wounded, and died in the following month. It was a gallant and well-directed assault, but the decimated ranks of the various regiments at the close of the contest told only too well of the severity of the charge.

"In the spring of 1864 the regiment went to Fortress Monroe, and May 6th proceeded into the interior, where it was engaged in reconnoissances, destruction of the enemy's railroads, and harassing their forces generally. The regiment was engaged in the charge upon and capture of the enemy's rifle-pits near Chester Station on the 20th, and in the various operations lost one hundred and fifty-seven men during the months of May and June. From this time until January, 1865, the regiment was in various operations in Southern Virginia, and took part in the several engagements before Petersburg and Richmond. It was then ordered to North Carolina, and had its last fighting at the capture of Fort Fisher. In August the regiment was mustered out at New Haven."

The casualties were as follows: Killed, 42; died of wounds, 16; died of disease, 119; missing, 23. The rolls of the regiment bore the names of 1813 men. In December, 1863, 205 re-enlisted as veterans. The regiment saw some service, and it is an honor to say, "I belonged to the Sixth Connecticut!"

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT

was organized in the fall of 1861, and was composed mainly of three months' men who had returned from the field during the summer. It went to the front with Alfred H. Terry as colonel and Joseph R. Hawley as lieutenant-colonel.

Fairfield County was represented by one company, —D,—commanded by Benjamin E. Skinner, of Danbury, with Joseph S. Dunning first lieutenant and Thomas Horton second lieutenant.

The regiment saw severe service, and participated in the following engagements: Fort Pulaski, James' Island, Pocotaligo, Morris Island, Fort Wagner, siege of Charleston, Olustee, Bermuda Hundred, Chester Station, Drury's Bluff, Deep Bottom, Deep Run, siege of Petersburg, Chapin's Farm, New Market Road, Darbytown Road, Charles City Road, Fort Fisher, and Wilmington. There were 1735 men in its ranks at various times. Casualties: Killed, 90; died of wounds, 44; of disease, 179; missing, 40.

THE EIGHTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was mustered into the service in September and October, 1861, under the command of Edward Harland, of Norwich. Fairfield County was represented by only one company,—H,—which was officered as follows: Captain, Douglass Fowler; first lieutenant, James L. Russell; second lieutenant, Thomas S. Weed; all of Norwich. There were also a few men from this county in Company A. The first lieutenant of Company A was Henry M. Hoyt, who was subsequently promoted to captain, and at one time was in command of the regiment.* The regiment left Connecticut Oct. 17, 1861, one thousand and twenty-seven strong, and at Annapolis, Md., was joined to Burnside's corps. "Its earliest services were in the battles of Newbern, N. C., March 14, 1862, and the siege of Fort Macon the following month. It accompanied Gen. Burnside when he was ordered to join the Army of the Potomac, and subsequently went with the corps into Maryland. At Antietam, in September, 1862, the regiment lost: Killed, one officer—Lieut. Mason Wait, of Norwich—and 33 men; wounded, 10 officers and 129 men; missing, 21 men; total, 194.

"In December the Eighth was engaged at Fredericksburg, but suffered slightly, and in February, 1863, was sent to Southeastern Virginia. In April the regiment was in the fight at Fort Hagar, Va., and remained in Virginia until January, 1864. It then returned to Connecticut on veteran furlough, three hundred and ten men having re-enlisted as veterans. In March it returned to its old camp near Portsmouth, Va., and after outpost- and picket-duty at Deep Creek and vicinity was in the battle at Walthall Junction, May 9th, and lost eighty men. Col. Harland having been promoted to be a brigadier-general, the regiment was at this time in command of Col. John E. Ward, who was severely wounded by a shell at the battle named. A week later the regiment participated in the engagement at Fort Darling, and on the night of the 16th returned within the fortification, the men worn out with eight days' constant warfare. In this short time the Eighth lost one-third of its fighting strength. Early in June it was engaged with the enemy at Cold Harbor, and from June 16th to August 27th in skirmishes and siege-work around Petersburg, losing heavily. The following four weeks were spent on the James River, picketing the Bermuda Hundred post, and September 27th the regiment lost seventy-three men in the storming of Battery Harrison. This was the last general engagement of the regiment, which was mustered out Dec. 12, 1865."

The regiment saw severe service, and participated in the following engagements: Newbern, Fort Macon, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Fort Hagar, Walthall Junction, Fort Darling, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, Fort Harrison. There were killed, 72; died of wounds, 40; died of disease, 132; missing, 11.

THE NINTH REGIMENT

was mustered into the service in the fall of 1861 as the "Irish Regiment," under the command of Thomas W. Cahill, of Hartford, with Richard Fitzgibbons, of Bridgeport, lieutenant-colonel. It had one company from Bridgeport, mainly commanded by Thomas C. Coats, with R. A. Clancy first lieutenant and G. W. Morehouse second lieutenant.

Its principal engagements were Baton Rouge, Chackaloo Station, Deep Bottom, and Cedar Creek. Mustered out Aug. 3, 1865.

THE TENTH REGIMENT

was recruited in the fall of 1861, and mustered into the service during September and October of that year, with Charles L. Russell, of Derby, as colonel, and A. W. Drake, of Hartford, as lieutenant-colonel.

There were two companies from this county, G, from Stamford, New Canaan, Darien, Bridgeport, Wilton, and Norwalk, and I, from Greenwich. Company G was commanded by Isaac L. Hoyt, captain, George W. Smith, first lieutenant, and Thomas Miller, second lieutenant. The officers of Company I were, Captain, Daniel M. Mead; first lieutenant, Isaac O. Close; second lieutenant, Thomas R. Mead.

The regiment left for the seat of war in October, and was assigned to Gen. Burnside's command. The Tenth received its baptism of fire at the battle of Roanoke Island, where it fought nobly, and its gallant colonel, Russell, was killed while leading the charge.

A month later the regiment lost twenty-three killed and wounded in the battle of Newbern, and then had rest from close warfare until the 14th of December. It then participated in the sanguinary battle of Kingston, N. C., and lost one hundred and six officers and men, and only two days later was in another fight at Whitehall. March 28, 1863, after a winter's rest, the Tenth was in the battle of Seabrook Island, S. C., and spent the spring, summer, and fall before Charleston. December found the regiment in Florida, where twenty-two men were lost in a fight at St. Augustine.

"In the spring of 1864 the regiment went to Virginia, and suffered the loss of all the garrison and camp equipage and regimental and company records by the sinking at Norfolk of the transport on which they were stored. Its first fight in the Virginia campaign was at Whitehall Junction, May 7th, and from this time the history of the organization shows battle after battle clear through to the surrender of Appomattox, the Tenth being 'in at the death'" (Battle Flag Day).

A total of 2124 was credited to the organization during its existence, embracing the original 996; recruits, 848; re-enlisted veterans, 280. Casualties: Killed in action, 57; died of wounds, 59; died of disease, 152.

The regiment sustained a very heavy loss of officers by death and otherwise. It had four colonels during its first eighteen months of service.

The Tenth participated in the following engagements: Roanoke Island, siege of Charleston and St. Augustine, Walthall Junction, Drury's Bluff, Bermuda Hundred, Strawberry Plains, Deep Bottom, Deep Run, siege of Petersburg, Laurel Hill Church, New Market Road, Darbytown Road, Johnson's Plantation, Hatcher's Run, Fort Gregg, and Appomattox Court-House.

THE TWELFTH REGIMENT

was organized and mustered into the service in the winter of 1861-62, with Henry C. Deming as colonel and Ledyard Colburn as lieutenant-colonel. One company was from this county, raised principally in Norwalk, Brookfield, New Canaan, Westport, Ridgeport, Danbury, Weston, and Newtown. Stephen D. Byxbee was captain, Gilbert Bogart first lieutenant, and E. H. Nearing second lieutenant.

The regiment saw severe service, and in consequence of its heavy losses, which had nearly decimated the regiment, it was reorganized in October, 1863, as the Twelfth Battalion, under command of Lieut.-Col. Lewis. Casualties: Killed, 50; died of wounds, 16; of disease, 188.

It was in the following battles: Georgia Landing, Pattersonville, Berwick, Port Hudson, Winchester, Fisher's Hill, and Cedar Creek. Mustered out Aug. 12, 1865.

THE THIRTEENTH REGIMENT

was organized in November, 1861, and mustered into the service with Henry W. Birge as colonel, and Alexander Warner as lieutenant-colonel.

One company was enlisted from this county, of which Apollos Comstock was captain, William E. Bradley first lieutenant, and William C. Beecher second lieutenant.

The regiment enjoys the distinction of having been in the service longer than any other Connecticut organization. In January, 1864, the Thirteenth almost to a man re-enlisted. In the following December it was consolidated into five companies, called "The Veteran Battalion Thirteenth Connecticut Volunteers."

During the regiment's long service it participated in numerous hard-fought battles, a few of which are here enumerated: Georgia Landing, Irish Bend, siege of Port Hudson, Cane River, Mansura, Opequan, Winchester, and Fisher's Hill. It was mustered out April 25, 1866, and paid off May 5th following, having been in the service four years and six months.

THE FOURTEENTH REGIMENT.*

The Fourteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, the first response of the State to President Lincoln's call for three hundred thousand more troops, was mustered into the service of the United States at Camp Foote, Hartford, Aug. 23, 1862, and two days later, with ranks one thousand and fifteen strong, under command of Col. Dwight Morris, marched through the streets of Hartford and embarked for the seat of war. All the way out its journey was a kind of triumphal progress. At each landing upon the river flags fluttered from every house, and the regiment was greeted as it passed with waving handkerchiefs, cheers, and booming of guns; upon the Sound each passing steamer or tug-boat screamed a salutation, responded to by the cheers of the troops, and in passing through New Jersey and Pennsylvania every farmer would wave his hat and hurrah as the train shot by, while the houses were gay with bunting, and at the depots men and women crowded up to shake hands with the Union volunteers.

In marching across the city at Baltimore the regiment was reviewed by Gen. Wool, of the regular army, who spoke in high terms of the soldierly bearing of the command, and sent it forward at once to the front, instead of retaining it for drill and instruction, as had been originally intended.

After remaining for a few days near Washington the Fourteenth joined the Army of the Potomac, then under command of Gen. McClellan, near Rockville, Md., Sept. 10, 1862. It marched up through Maryland, arriving upon the battle-field at South Mountain just too late to participate in the engagement, and on Sept. 17, 1862, took part in the bloody battle of Antietam, in which the rebel forces were driven from the State. The loss of the regiment in this the first of its long series of engagements was one hundred and twenty-seven killed and wounded, and its behavior under trying circumstances was very creditable.

Three months of campaigning ensued, and then came the sanguinary battle of Fredericksburg,—a criminal waste of life upon the part of the commander of the Union army,—in which one hundred and twenty-one members of the Fourteenth were rendered hors du combat. The next great battle in which the regiment participated was at Chancellorsville, in May, 1863, and this was followed by the forced march through Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and in July, 1863, by the glorious victory at Gettysburg. On the morning of the third day of this battle the Fourteenth, by a spirited charge, captured a house and barn in the enemy's front, driving out a number of rebel sharpshooters, and after setting the building on fire returned to its original line. Later in the day, in common with the rest of the Second Corps, it endured a tremendous cannonade from over a hundred rebel guns, after which followed that wonderful charge of the enemy which is thus described by a member of the regiment who was an eye-witness:

"We rose from the ground, where we had been lying, stretched our cramped limbs, and at first thought that the battle was over. But Maj. Ellis was wiser than we. 'Now,' said he, 'they mean to charge with all their infantry. Fall in, Fourteenth!' and with a little delay the men took their places in line. 'Forward, guide right!' and in another moment we were in the place left vacant by the withdrawal of the battery. Exclusive of the men deployed as skirmishers in our front, we had only about a hundred muskets; so that we were obliged, in order to fill the vacant space, to extend the line until it consisted of but a single rank. Belts were now loosened, packages of cartridges taken out and laid upon the low stone wall in front of us, so that no time might be lost in reloading, when suddenly there was a hush for a moment, and every eye was turned to the front, where we could see the rebel infantry emerging from the woods about a mile away. It took good eyesight to discover them at first, but presently they are plainly visible advancing towards us. They come nearer and nearer, and we can see their three splendid lines of battle stretching away as far as the eye can reach and advancing in unbroken order across the open plain. Skirmishers are in their front and a few officers ride in the rear, though most have dismounted, knowing that there is hot work before them. Away down upon the left a solitary battery plays upon their advancing column, and an occasional gun is fired from our extreme right, but, with this exception, our batteries are silent, and their march is unopposed.

"Presently the crack of rifles is heard, and little puffs of smoke rising from the grassy field in our front show that their advance has come within range of our skirmishers. Their skirmish-line noisily replies, and still their lines of battle move steadily forward, the men carrying their guns at right shoulder shift, and the red battle-flags floating above their heads. There is no haste, no appearance of disorder, no swaying of the lines, and they give the spectator the sense of wonderful power kept in check by discipline: their advance seems as resistless as the incoming of the tide. In a few minutes our skirmishers clamber over the wall and join us. Townsend, the captain in command, had wished to collect his detachment and march it back in a compact body, but this the men did not see fit to do, so they came singly in open order, firing as they fell back.

"I thought of Bunker Hill and how our fathers repulsed the British, and wondered what would be our fortune this day. I felt no terror at all (a touch of which I had previously experienced when lying down exposed to the fire of all that artillery), only a kind of serious expectation and an anxiety for the enemy to move faster, so as to come within range of our weapons. None of our officers were at all wanting in their duty, but we were all officers this day, and passed low words of encouragement from one to another down the line. I remember telling those near me to reserve their fire, so as not to waste a shot, and to aim low, and asking them to pass the message along.

"The rebels had now approached very close; still, hardly a head could have been visible to them as we crouched behind the low stone wall. At a point about twenty rods from us their line was somewhat broken by the remaining portions of two fences that had bounded a narrow lane or farm-road which extended along our front. As they rose over the top of the first fence and sprang down into the lane, and again rose upon the top of the second, they were altogether too tempting a mark to be resisted, and, so far as I heard, without a word of command being given, a sheet of flame burst from our line. My own wish would have been to reserve our fire until they had come even nearer, but perhaps I was wrong. They still pressed on, however, for some distance, when they wavered and halted. Several of their color-bearers now advanced swiftly, apparently in obedience to previous orders, and, attended by their color-guards, planted their battle-flags in the ground, one in particular directly in front of the centre of our regiment and not ten rods away. Finding our fire too hot to be endured, these brave men threw themselves upon the ground around their flags, waiting for their comrades to advance and rally round them.

"On our part, we loaded and fired incessantly. It may seem extravagant, but it is the simple truth, that the enemy's line broke and commenced to fall back in front of the Fourteenth sooner than anywhere else, for the reason that most of us were armed with breech-loading guns, which could be loaded and fired with great rapidity, and which did terrible execution.

"Remembering their own tactics, we no sooner saw them commence to waver than we gave a tremendous yell,—not a hurrah, but a wild, fierce cry that was taken up all down our line. We now turned our aim with fearful effect upon their second line, already disordered by the retreating fragments of the first. Ammunition coming short, we begged, borrowed, and almost fought with each other for cartridges. We continued to yell and fire simultaneously. The rebel officers vainly strove to rally their men; their ranks were soon broken; all semblance of order ceased, and what had advanced as an army began falling back as a mob. Not all at once, or rapidly, however. They still turned and fired as they retreated, and here and there made a brief stand.

"We now became conscious of the voice of Maj. Ellis crying for us to fire 'left oblique,' and turned our aim in that direction; and indeed it was time, for the regiment upon our left had been hard pressed, and had almost given way. The rebels had advanced closer to them than at any other point, and had nearly pierced their line. Just as we turned a daring Southerner leaped lightly upon one of the guns which had been left behind when the battery retired for want of horses to remove it, and waved his hat or his hand for his comrades to follow him. He did not remain there a single instant, but fell riddled through, and, owing to our cross-fire, the rebels at this point also were soon in full retreat."

In this engagement the Fourteenth captured five rebel colors belonging to the following regiments,—First Tennessee, Fourteenth Tennessee, Sixteenth North Carolina, Fifty-second North Carolina, and the Fourth Virginia. Besides these trophies, it also captured more than its own number of rebel prisoners. Its loss in the action was sixty-six out of a force of about one hundred and sixty.

Not a few excellent men—among them Captains Hawley, Doten, Goddard, and Fiske—were taken from this regiment by generals of brigade and division in the Second Corps to serve as staff-officers, but comrades of theirs equally brave remained with the command.

However culpable in its temerity, it warms one's heart to remember the exploit of Lieut.-Col. Moore, when, upon a certain occasion, as "officer of the day," he inspected the division picket-line. In full regimentals, with crimson sash crossing his breast, he stepped boldly over the parapet of "Fort Hell," before Petersburg, and, disclaiming the shelter of intrenchments, walked erect down to the picket-line and began his rounds, owing his life solely to the admiration of the scores of rebel sharpshooters not two hundred yards away.

Better worthy of admiration, though, is the quiet heroism of gallant Maj. Broatch, who, at Morton's Ford, when his right hand was shattered by a bullet, caught up his sword with his left and continued to pursue the retreating enemy, or are some of the instances given by Capt. Goddard in his graceful "Memorial of the Deceased Officers of the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers."

Nor were such examples of courage found only among the commissioned officers. Time would fail to speak of instances like that of Sergt. Russell Glenn, thrice wounded, the last time just in the act of entering the enemy's works; or of Edwin Stroud, who amputated a part of his own shattered foot with his pocket-knife; or of the gallant fellows who, at Gettysburg and upon other fields, at the risk of their lives, ventured out under fire to relieve the sufferings of their wounded opponents.

It is impossible, also, to speak in detail here of the weary marches of the Fourteenth, or of each of its numerous engagements. Let two quotations conclude this very imperfect sketch,—the first an extract from the final official report of Col. Theodore G. Ellis, and the concluding one from a history of the regimental colors, published in connection with the exercises on "Battle-Flag Day," Sept. 17, 1879.

EXTRACT FROM OFFICIAL REPORT.

"It is worthy of note that this regiment, during the three years that it was in active service, was never taken away from the front. It participated in all the great battles fought by the Army of the Potomac after it went into the field in the latter part of August, 1862, until the fall of Richmond and the surrender of Lee. It has taken part in thirty-three (33) battles and skirmishes. The regiment has captured five colors and four guns from the enemy in fair fight, and more prisoners than the original number of the regiment, and at Reams' Station drew off part of McKnight's and part of the Third New Jersey Batteries, which had been left to the enemy. The actual loss in killed and wounded has been upwards of eight hundred, besides the many, counted as missing, who occupy unknown graves in the Wilderness and around Petersburg.

"In repeated instances the regimental commanders have earned and received commendation from their superior officers, but, from a feeling of modesty, have not recorded it. The character and standing of the regiment in the field was considered of the greatest importance, and little was done for reputation at home. A high state of discipline was always maintained; so that the regiment was called 'the Fourteenth Regulars,' and which obtained for it a reputation unsurpassed by any other. While under my command the regiment never, even under the hottest fire, gave way or fell back without orders, and often held its position with fixed bayonets after the ammunition was exhausted. The regimental band, which was second to none in the army, took its share of praise."

MEMORANDA RESPECTING THE COLORS OF THE FOURTEENTH REGIMENT CONNECTICUT VOLUNTEERS.

"Battle of Antietam.—The staff of the United States color was shot in two by a bullet, and the eagle's head knocked off by a piece of shell. The color-bearer, Sergt. Thomas J. Mills, of New London, who had been a lieutenant in the First Connecticut Heavy Artillery, was mortally wounded, when Sergt. George Augustus Foote, of Guilford, volunteered to take his place, and carried the flag the remainder of the day. Another member of the color-guard is said to have been killed in this engagement, but his name is unknown to the writer.

"Battle of Fredericksburg.—The regiment was badly cut up in the charge upon Marye's Heights, and Sergt. Charles E. Dart, of Rockville, who carried the State flag, was mortally wounded. Sergt. George Augustus Foote attempted to fill his place, but was shot in the leg and fell. His biographer, Capt. Goddard, says, 'After lying on the field a short time he tried to rise, but was instantly fired upon again by the rebels, wounding him slightly in the head and in the hip. All the rest of that awful day he lay still where he had fallen. Three times our men charged over him, of course trampling on his wounded leg, while he, half delirious, begged them to kill him to end his sufferings. But no one had time then to attend to one poor wounded fellow. That night he managed to crawl off to a little hut near the field, where some other wounded men had hung out a yellow flag. Here they lay with a little hard-tack, and still less water, till the third day after the fight, when they were visited by a rebel officer with a few men. He spoke roughly to them, asking what they were here for, and two or three began whining and saying they did not want to fight the South, but were drafted and obliged to come, when Foote coolly lifted his head and said, 'I came to fight rebels, and I have fought them; and if ever I get well I will come back and fight them again.' 'Bully for you,' said the officer; 'you are a boy that I like,' and at once gave him some water out of his own canteen, sent one of his men for more water, washed his leg and foot and bound it up as well as he could, paroled him, and helped him across the river to the Lacy House hospital. In fact, he and his men gave him a blanket and cheered him as the wagon drove off.'

"The State flag was picked up, not far from the famous sunken road held by the rebel infantry, by William B. Hincks and Frederick B. Doten, of Bridgeport. It remained in their keeping during the day, and they brought it safely from the field at the close of the engagement. Sergt. Dart died at St. Mary's Hospital, Washington, D. C., Jan. 6, 1863. The constitution of Sergt. (afterwards Lieut.) Foote was impaired by his wound, which was eventually the cause of his death.

"Battle of Chancellorsville.—Sergt. Samuel Webster, of Sprague, who carried the United States flag, was wounded in the arm, and was afterwards transferred to the Invalid Corps.

"Battle of Morton's Ford.—Sergt. Amory Allen, of Hartford, bearer of the United States flag, and Corp. Robert A. Chadwick, of East Lyme, one of the color-guard, were killed in charging upon the enemy. Corp. John Hirst, of Rockville, took the flag after Sergt. Allen fell, and carried it during the remainder of the engagement.

"Battle of Hatcher's Run.—Corp. Henry Hospodsky, of Rockville, was wounded while acting as color-guard.

"Battle of the Wilderness.—On the morning of the second day's fight the brigade to which the Fourteenth belonged drove back the rebel outposts for upwards of half a mile. The enemy was then heavily reinforced, and poured in upon us perhaps the most destructive fire we ever experienced. After a severe conflict the brigade, as an organization, including the general commanding and his staff, fell back nearly or quite to the cross-roads from whence we started in the morning. The colors of the Fourteenth, however, did not fall back more than about a hundred yards, and were the only ones which were not swept away by the deadly hail. It being almost impossible to hear an order in the horrible din, the adjutant took the color-bearer by the shoulder, and, pointing to the trunk of a fallen tree, shouted for him to kneel by it. Many officers and men of the Fourteenth then rallied around the colors, together with a handful from other regiments. Other members of the Fourteenth extended the line by deploying as skirmishers and fighting from behind trees, Indian fashion. They completely checked the rebel line of battle and caused it to fall back in disorder, and 'held the fort' for several hours, until relieved by fresh troops. Corp. Charles W. Norton, of Berlin, was severely wounded at this time while guarding the flag. Later in the day, during an attack by Longstreet's corps, Corp. Henry K. Lyon, of New Haven, a brave recruit who carried the United States color, was mortally wounded. Handing the flag to Lieut.-Col. Moore, he said, 'Take it, colonel; I have done my best.' Col. Moore gave it to John Hirst, of Rockville. The regiment at this time was almost surrounded and in danger of being captured, but Sergt. Hirst brought the flag safely from the field, and carried it from that time through every battle until he safely deposited it in Hartford after the regiment was mustered out. The State color had also a narrow escape from capture at this time, its bearer having planted it in the ground while attending to his wounded comrade, Corp. Lyon; but it was saved by the promptness and courage of Sergt. Thompson. Corp. Robert Wolfe, of Waterbury, a member of the color-guard, was wounded in this engagement, and subsequently at the battle of Reams' Station.

"Battle of Spotsylvania Court-House.—Following is an extract from Col. Ellis' official report:

"We captured a great number of prisoners, whom we sent to the rear in charge of Capt. Nickels. We pursued the flying enemy for about a quarter of a mile, when I found our men becoming scattered, our colors in advance of any other troops, and the fire from the enemy's second line of works becoming serious. I therefore ordered our men to fall back to the first line of works. In this line were the enemy's cannon, which were all captured. Many of these guns were turned on the enemy. Two of them were worked by men of the Fourteenth, under direction of Lieut.-Col. Moore and Lieut. Morgan. These guns were all drawn off by our men.

"The first State flag of the Fourteenth Regiment, becoming unfit for further use by reason of hard service, was sent home to Hartford in August, 1863, and its place supplied by another furnished by the State of Connecticut. This in turn, together with its companion, the United States flag, became at length very dilapidated, so that during the latter part of the war they were but seldom unfurled. Sergt. (afterwards Lieut.) Joseph F. Thompson, of Hartford, who carried the State color on many hard-fought fields, and always with credit to himself and regiment, had the good fortune to escape un wounded. Sergt. John Geatly, of Bridgeport, Corps. George C. Boomer, of Hartford, Fred. W. Beardley, of Orange, Andrew Flood, of Chatham, and Eugene Hart, of Hartford, were among their brave defenders, with others whose names the writer regrets that he cannot now remember. From the foregoing incidents, and by reference to the official reports, it will be seen that these colors passed through not only numerous minor actions, but also some of the severest battles of the war, such as Antietam, Fredericksburg, the Wilderness, etc. They were also present at Gettysburg, when five rebel colors were captured by the Fourteenth. When the enemy had burned the bridge over the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, the men of the Fourteenth forded the river and marched up through the city with flying colors, passing the ruins of the arsenal and the engine-house where Old John Brown had stood at bay against the State of Virginia. As they marched the band played and the battalion joined in the chorus,—

"John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave, His soul goes marching on!"

"The colors of the Fourteenth also witnessed the fall of Petersburg and the final surrender of Gen. Lee's army, and floated proudly upon the breeze on a certain memorable day in May, 1865, when the regiment, at the head of the Second Army Corps, marched through the city of Richmond in triumph, passing on the route Libby Prison, Castle Thunder, and Belle Island, where not a few of our men had been confined. A Union woman, rushing from the crowd, begged the color-sergeant for one of the tattered fragments of the United States flag as a relic. They were also unfurled at the grand review at Washington in 1865, and more recently on Battle-Flag Day at Hartford, Sept. 17, 1879. Many other incidents connected with their history might be narrated, and it is to be regretted that the names of some of those who fell in their immediate defense have escaped the memory of the writer. Perhaps the spirit which animated these men has never been better expressed than in the following lines by an anonymous writer in the Atlantic Monthly:

" "At dawn," he said, "I bid them all farewell,
To go where bugles call and rifles gleam,"
And with this latest thought he fell asleep
And glided into dream.

" "Before him lay a broad hot plain,
Through it a level river slowly drawn;
He moved with a vast host, and at its head
Streamed banners like the dawn.

" "There came a blinding flash, a deafening roar,
And dissonant cries of terror and dismay;
Blood trickled down the river's reedy shore,
And with the dead he lay.

* * * * *

" "The morn broke in upon his solemn dream,
Yet still with kindling eye,
"Where bugles call," he said, "and rifles gleam,
I follow though I die!"

" "Wise youth! by few is glory's wreath obtained,
But death or soon or late awaiteth all;
To fight in freedom's cause is something gained,
And nothing lost to fall!"

TWENTY-THIRD REGIMENT:

The Twenty-third Regiment was recruited mainly from Bridgeport, Danbury, Waterbury, Newtown, Fairfield, Georgetown, Bethel, Naugatuck, Ansonia, Trumbull, and Watertown, during the months of August, September, and October, 1862. It was designed as a nine-months' regiment, though every man served a year, and some two years before being mustered out of service.

The companies rendezvoused at Camp Terry, Oyster Point, New Haven, early in September, where they commenced the drill, and did guard duty until the 16th of November, when they embarked on the Sound steamer "Elm City" for "Camp Buckingham," at Centreville Race Course, near Jamaica, L. I.

This regiment was under the command of Col. Charles E. L. Holmes, of Waterbury, with Charles W. Wordin, of Bridgeport, for lieutenant-colonel, and David H. Miller, of Georgetown, as major.

Camp Buckingham was a mud-hole of the worst possible description, and the Twenty-third pitched tents in a rain-storm that lasted a week.

November 30th the regiment marched twelve miles to the foot of Atlantic Street, Brooklyn, thence on board the "Che Kiang," a river steamer, totally unfit for "outside" weather; and because of being overloaded, after three days, Companies H and I of the Twenty-third, with one company of the Twenty-eighth and another of the Twenty-fifth Connecticut Volunteers, were transferred to the barracks at Pier 1, New York. All but these companies left New York City for the Gulf of Mexico, on the "Che Kiang," Dec. 3, 1862. The steamer was nearly swamped in a terrific storm on the night of December 5th, and the suffering on board for several days was very great. They arrived at Ship Island on the 11th.

The portion of the regiment left in barracks at New York received orders, December 12th, to go on board the ship "Windermere," while the balance were dispatched on the ship "Planter," an old hulk that was wrecked off Florida Keys. A few stragglers reached Louisiana on the ship "Alice Counce."

These divisions arrived at New Orleans at long intervals apart, and when once there were assigned to guard duty along the eighty miles of the New Orleans, Opelousas and Great Western Railroad, and kept at such duty almost continuously till their term of service had expired, though they repeatedly asked that they might be relieved and sent to the front. The Twenty-third was never brigaded, but left to itself, shunned by paymasters for many months, kept a year instead of nine months in service, and its officers, most of them, confined nearly fourteen months in rebel prison-pens.

June 20, 1863, the rebels under Gen. Dick Taylor captured Terre Bonne, and on the 21st drove in the pickets of the Twenty-third at Lafourche Crossing. The same night the rebels made several attempts to capture Lafourche, but were repulsed with three hundred and seventy killed and wounded. Federal loss, thirty wounded and nine killed.

The rebels shelled Brashear City on the 23d, which being defended almost solely by convalescents was at last forced to surrender. The officers captured by Taylor were all marched to Tyler, Smith Co., Texas (Camp Ford), and held nearly fourteen months, while the men were paroled, and Aug. 9, 1863 (Sunday), at one o'clock p.m., left New Orleans on a Mississippi River steambot, "homeward bound." They arrived at New Haven, Conn., at six a.m. August 24th, and were welcomed with military and civic honors.

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was organized Oct. 11, 1862, at New Haven, and was mustered into the United States service November 15th, with the following officers: Colonel, Samuel P. Ferris; lieutenant-colonel, Wheelock T. Batcheller; major, William B. Wescome; adjutant, Charles H. Brown; quartermaster, Milton Bradley, Jr.; chaplain, Richard Wheatley; sergeant-major, William A. Bailey; quartermaster-sergeant, Wilfred H. Mattson; commissary-sergeant, N. B. Bennett; hospital steward, William E. Bissell; surgeon, Ransom P. Lyon; first assistant surgeon, Levi S. Pease; second assistant surgeon, Henry Rockwell.

LINE-OFFICERS.

Company A.—Captain, Francis R. Leeds; first lieutenant, Philip Lever; second lieutenant, F. R. Warner.

Company B.—Captain, Cyrus D. Jones; first lieutenant, Charles Durand; second lieutenant, Henry L. Wilmot.

Company C.—Captain, L. R. McDonough; first lieutenant, William M. Whitney; second lieutenant, J. C. Taylor.

Company D.—Captain, David D. Hoag; first lieutenant, Charles M. Booth; second lieutenant, Levi Hungerford.

Company E.—Captain, Charles B. Landon; first lieutenant, Joseph Bostwick; second lieutenant, Warren C. Dailey.

Company F.—Captain, L. B. Wheelock; first lieutenant, C. P. Newman; second lieutenant, Jabez Alford.

Company G.—Captain, T. L. Beckwith; first lieutenant, William Mitchell; second lieutenant, Henry Ayres.

Company H.—Captain, George W. Middleton; first lieutenant, James Kiley; second lieutenant, Thomas G. Bennett.

The regiment left New Haven November 18th, and proceeded to Camp Buckingham, L. I. Here it remained until the 28th, when, having been assigned to the Department of the South, it embarked on the "Che Kiang" for a Southern clime. The Twenty-third Connecticut also embarked in the same steamer, thus crowding fourteen hundred men in quarters which would comfortably accommodate about eight hundred.

The steamer weighed anchor at ten A.M., December 3d, with sealed orders, which finally assigned the regiments to Ship Island, La. During the voyage a storm arose, and for twelve hours the heavily-laden steamer battled with the angry waves which lashed in fury about it, seeming every moment to swallow it up in the awful abyss. During the night, while the storm was on, an officer sent the intelligence, "We shall never see another sunrise; the vessel cannot stand it much longer." The vessel, however, rode safely on, and the voyage was completed in safety.

December 12th the regiment disembarked on Ship Island. On the 17th it re-embarked for New Orleans, and after stopping a few hours in the city started for Camp Parapet, some seven miles up the river, where it landed and pitched tents, but was immediately ordered to re-embark for Pensacola, Fla. By eleven that night it was on board again and ready for starting. It reached Pensacola Monday morning, and stacked its arms on the Grand Plaza. On the 20th it was ordered to evacuate Pensacola and go to the Barrancas Navy-Yard, where it remained until May 20th, when it was ordered to take the steamer "Crescent" and proceed to Brashear City, La. On the 25th it was ordered to Fort Hudson, and at noon reached Springfield Landing, having now come within hearing distance of the strife of arms. Marching twelve miles towards the scene of conflict, it found itself now, by some oversight of the movement, right between the two contending armies. It fairly ran the gauntlet, escaping unharmed, and, the next day, after a march of about thirty miles, when four might have sufficed, it reached Grover's division, to which it had been assigned. Until June 3d it here suffered, as soldiers often do, for want of rest and food, when it was ordered to the front. At this time Col. Ferris was acting brigadier, with Maj. Wescome in charge of the regiment.

The regiment was now called upon to test the music of whistling balls, and there was for the present to be no more rest for it. June 4th it was ordered to be ready to go into the rifle-pits. In spite of blundering movements, Company A in advance, it at length reached the pits, where it spent the night. The next day until eight in the evening the men did their best, "firing fast and well" to harm the enemy, when they were ordered back to camp. This move was executed without loss, and the regiment next did good service in the trenches.

The regiment participated in the second assault on Port Hudson, when it lost fifty-nine killed, wounded, and missing. Among the killed were Capt. Hoag, of New Milford, and Lieut. Durand, of Stamford. This was one of the most desperate charges made during the Rebellion, but in that holocaust of fire not a man in that noble legion shrank from his duty.

After the surrender of the place the Twenty-eighth did garrison duty until the expiration of its term of service. The regiment lost,—killed, 9; died of wounds, 9; died of disease, 65. It was mustered out at New Haven, Aug. 28, 1863.

COMPANY D, FIRST REGIMENT OF CONNECTICUT CAVALRY.*

The First Connecticut Cavalry was first organized as a battalion of two squadrons of two companies each, the companies consisting each of three officers and seventy-six rank and file. There were also ten field-and staff-officers. It was ordered by the then Governor of Connecticut, His Excellency William A. Buckingham, to be recruited, one company from each of the four congressional districts of the State. He authorized L. N. Middlebrook, Esq., of Bridgeport, then lately a major of the Connecticut militia, to recruit the company for the congressional district comprising Fairfield and Litchfield Counties, he having volunteered his services for this purpose. The recruiting of this company, afterwards designated as Company D, was commenced by Maj. Middlebrook, Oct. 4, 1861, in the city of Bridgeport, and completed Oct. 22, 1861, Mr. Middlebrook having enlisted as a private with the other recruits, and borne all the expenses of recruiting the company from his private resources.

On the last-named date he took the company into camp at Meriden, Conn., where a cavalry camp of instruction was formed under the command of Maj. Boardman, of the First Governor's Horse-Guards, of Hartford. Maj. Middlebrook was appointed captain of Company D by Governor Buckingham, his commission dating from Oct. 18, 1861; William E. Morris, of Roxbury, Conn., and Richard R. Crawford, of Bridgeport, Conn., being at the same time appointed first and second lieutenants respectively.

Upon the retirement of Maj. Boardman from command of the camp, which occurred soon after, the command of the battalion was tendered to Capt. Middlebrook, who declined to accept that position, preferring to remain with his company. On Dec. 17, 1861, Judson M. Lyon, Esq., of Woodstock, Conn., was appointed by the Governor major of the battalion, and Capt. Middlebrook was designated first captain of the First Squadron, composed of Companies B and D.

The battalion remained in camp at Meriden until Feb. 20, 1862, when it took the field in the Department of West Virginia, then under the command of Maj.-Gen. W. S. Rosecrans. The battalion, under Maj. Lyon, was soon employed in active military operations in the mountain regions of this department, among which were leading the advance of Gen. Schenck's forced march from Moorefield to the relief of Gen. Milroy, at McDowell, West Va., and the consequent battles of McDowell, May 8, and of Franklin, May 11 and 12, 1862. It was also assigned the honorable post of rear-guard in the two days' retreat upon Franklin of Gen. Schenck's and Gen. Milroy's forces before Stonewall Jackson's pursuing army.

When Gen. J. C. Fremont assumed command of the Mountain Department the battalion became thereby a part of his forces, and under Maj. Lyon was assigned the post of advance-guard of his army during the principal part of his celebrated seven days' forced march through the mountains into the Shenandoah Valley to the relief of Gen. N. P. Banks, Capt. Middlebrook commanding his own squadron and a detachment from Gen. Fremont's body-guard, and being the first to encounter the enemy, at daylight, May 28th, charging and routing their cavalry posted at Wardensville, Va., at which point the Union army was seeking to deploy from the mountain-passes into the Shenandoah Valley.

In the eight days' retreat of Stonewall Jackson up the Shenandoah Valley, which immediately succeeded, the battalion, including Company D, was daily engaged, participating, under Capt. Middlebrook, acting as its major, among other engagements, in the desperate cavalry fight at Harrisonburg, Va., June 6th, in which the Confederate cavalry general Ashby was killed, and the battles of Cross-Knoys, June 8, and Port Republic, June 9, 1862.

Upon the resignation of the command of this department by Gen. Fremont, the battalion, with Company D, became a part of the forces of Maj.-Gen. Franz Sigel, commanding the First Army Corps of the Army of Virginia, under Gen. John Pope. Under this general this company, as a part of the battalion commanded by Capt. Middlebrook, acting major, participated in all the operations of the Army of Virginia in 1862, under Gen. Pope, including, among others, the battles of Cedar Mountain, Rappahannock Station, Groveton, Second Manassas, and Chantilly.

Soon after the close of the campaign under Pope, the battalion, including Company D, was relieved from active duty in the field, and assigned to duty as provost-guard, being stationed at the city of Baltimore, in the Middle Department. There it remained until Feb. 3, 1863, when it was attached to the Army of the Potomac and took the field again, having in the mean time been raised to a full regiment of twelve companies. Company D, as a part thereof, henceforth took part in all the operations of the Army of the Potomac, until Aug. 8, 1864, when it was transferred with the remainder of the regiment to the Army of the Shenandoah, under Gen. Phil Sheridan, and subsequently served under Gen. Sheridan in all the closing operations of the war, previous to and after the fall of Richmond, and was mustered out with its regiment, at Washington, D. C., Aug. 2, 1865.

This company was in many respects a remarkable company of men. With a single exception they were all of American nativity and of superior intelligence and education. As an evidence of this, it is sufficient to state that no less than seventeen commissioned officers were taken from its original ranks. Fifty-eight of its original number were enlisted from Fairfield County, of which number Bridgeport furnished thirty-one, Trumbull six, Fairfield six, Wilton five, Newtown four, Huntington three, Danbury two, and Stamford one. Of the remaining twenty-one, seven were enlisted from Litchfield County, and the balance from various places throughout the State. All of the original company but one were citizens and residents of Connecticut. The company received during its service in the field ninety-three recruits, all of whom were citizens of Connecticut, ten of them from Fairfield County, and the balance from different places throughout the State.

Among the engagements in which this company participated, in addition to those mentioned, were the battles of Spottsylvania Court-House, Hanover Court-House, Ashland, Winchester, Cedar Creek, Waynesboro', Five Forks, Harper's Farm, and very many other lesser battles, all in West Virginia and Virginia.

THE SECOND LIGHT BATTERY.

This battery was organized in August, 1862, when the glamour of military pomp had passed away and grim-visaged war in all its horrors stood out in awful vision before the people of this country. It was composed of two Bridgeport militia organizations, and was officered as follows: Captain, John W. Sterling; first lieutenants, Walter S. Hotchkiss and Philip B. Seege; second lieutenants, George Munger and Philo B. Sherman; quartermaster-sergeant, Frank H. Whiting (promoted to second lieutenant, April 1, 1864).

The battery left for the front Oct. 15, 1862, and was assigned to the Army of the Potomac. It was soon after assigned to the "Artillery Reserve," under Gen. R. O. Tyler, and participated in the memorable contest at Gettysburg, having three men wounded. After wearily traversing Maryland for a month the battery camped on Meridian Hill, near Washington. In August it was sent to New York during the draft troubles, and returned to Washington during December. February, 1864, found it transferred to the Department of the Gulf and stationed at Brashar City, and subsequently at Algiers, La., at Dauphin Island, Mobile Harbor. August 6th the battery took an active part in the engagement at Fort Gaines, and on the 19th in the reduction of Fort Morgan. September 8th it returned to Louisiana, and served until the following February. Then it was sent to Florida, served at Pensacola and elsewhere, and early in April was engaged with the enemy near Blakely, Ala., the 9th of the month witnessing the carrying of their works by assault. The battery soon after returned to Connecticut, and was mustered out at New Haven, Aug. 9, 1865. It lost one killed,—J. S. Mills, of Bridgeport; one died of wounds, and eighteen of disease.

THE FIRST REGIMENT HEAVY ARTILLERY.

This regiment was organized in the spring of 1861 as the Fourth Infantry, and after six months' service was changed to an artillery regiment of twelve companies, of one hundred and fifty men each. It was commanded by Levi Woodhouse, of Hartford, colonel, and Nelson L. White, of Danbury, lieutenant-colonel. Company M was recruited in this county, principally in Bridgeport. Uriah Wallace was captain, William H. Brown first lieutenant, and Charles W. Gleason second lieutenant.

The regiment remained in the fortifications around Washington for a short time, when, Col. Woodhouse having resigned, it was placed under the command of Gen. R. O. Tyler and entered the Peninsular campaign. This regiment had seventy-one guns in the siege-train. In November, 1862, Col. Tyler was promoted to be brigadier-general, and Capt. Henry L. Abbott was made colonel.

The regiment saw active service and participated in the following engagements: Siege of Yorktown, Hanover Court-House, Gaines' Mills, Malvern Hill, Siege of Fredericksburg, before Fredericksburg (December, 1862), before Fredericksburg (April 28 to June 13, 1863), Kelley's Ford, Orange Court-House, Siege of Petersburg, Siege of Richmond, Fort Fisher. Casualties: Killed, 26; died of wounds, 23; died of disease, 161. It was mustered out in September, 1865.

THE SEVENTEENTH REGIMENT.*

THE Seventeenth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers was organized in an hour of national gloom and disaster: from the commission of its colonel to its departure for the front no bright sky rifted the war-cloud; yet the youth who filled its ranks, and the people of the county who backed them, neither quailed nor halted.

The Seventeenth was the first localized regiment of the State. It was from the start known as the Fairfield County Regiment. With few exceptions, its ranks were filled by her sons. The people of the county made it their pride and the outlet of their affection and patriotic effort.

Our War-Governor, Buckingham, at first doubted whether Fairfield County alone could put a regiment into the field as rapidly as the greed for troops at the front demanded. It was a most trying hour. The soul of the whole North, unflinching before disheartening reverses, aroused to mightier effort.

The leading men of the county, who had asked the appointment of Col. Noble, and that the regiment might be made up of her sons, quieted the Governor's doubts; they at once turned all their energies to fill its ranks at the earliest moment. Towns and individuals devoted to this their time and resources. Their liberality and energy kept full abreast of their faith in the cause of the Union.

On July 23, 1862, William H. Noble, of Bridgeport, was commissioned as the colonel of the Seventeenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers. In less than thirty days therefrom, the regiment could have marched a thousand men to the front.

Their camp was on that lovely ground now forming the larger part of the Bridgeport Seaside Park. No more healthful or readily reached ground could have been found. Sea-bathing, fresh breezes, easy access from every point, vicinity, and town, and the railroad whose lines stretched through the county and State,—all made its choice a wise forethought. Its charming position, thus so widely made known, doubtless won its choice for a park.

NOTICES OF INDIVIDUAL OFFICERS.

In the formation of the Seventeenth all the towns of the county were represented, though some furnished only a few members. It was officered as follows:

Colonel, William H. Noble, of Bridgeport, commanding; brevetted brigadier-general on recommendation of Gen. Grant.

Lieutenant-colonel, Charles Walter, of Bridgeport. Born in Denmark; came to America when young; private in Capt. Speidel's Company of the First Connecticut; promoted to be first lieutenant and made aide-de-camp on Gen. Tyler's staff at the battle of Bull Run, where he was captured and spent a year afterwards in the rebel prisons; on his return was made lieutenant-colonel of the Seventeenth, and was killed at Chancellorsville, May 2, 1863. He was a man of high education, civil and military, and a speaker of several languages, a fine musician, and an accomplished artist.

Major, Allen G. Brady, who had seen service as lieutenant-colonel in the three months' regiments; enlisted and brought Company B to the regiment, and was made its major; was wounded at Gettysburg and transferred to the Veteran Reserves.

Adjutant, A. H. Wilcoxson, of Norwalk, who was in the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, where he distinguished himself by coolness and daring. He was promoted to be captain of Company I, and afterwards to be lieutenant-colonel of the regiment; was mortally wounded at Dunn's Lake, Fla., and died afterwards at Tallahassee while a prisoner.

First surgeon, Dr. Robert Hubbard, then and still a distinguished physician and surgeon of Bridgeport, who was soon promoted to be acting medical director of the Eleventh Corps, which distinguished position he held till failing health compelled his resignation.

First assistant surgeon, Dr. Robert D. McEwen, of Stratford, who remained with the regiment until he resigned, on Folly Island, S. C., November, 1863.

Second assistant surgeon, Dr. Elijah Gregory, of Bridgeport, who remained with the regiment till its muster out; since deceased.

Quartermaster, First Lieut. Hanford N. Hayes, of Bridgeport, who resigned his position, July 18, 1863.

Sergeant-major, Theodore Gray, of Bridgeport; afterwards promoted to be captain of Company K.

Quartermaster-sergeant, John S. Ward, of Bridgeport; afterwards promoted to be quartermaster, and mustered out with the regiment.

Commissary-sergeant, Josiah L. Day, of Danbury; discharged for disability, March 6, 1863; succeeded by Edwin D. Hurd, of Fairfield.

Hospital steward, Jesse S. Nash, of Bridgeport; discharged for disability, Dec. 29, 1862.

Assistant adjutant, Henry W. Chatfield, of Bridgeport; afterwards promoted to be sergeant-major, and for gallant conduct at Chancellorsville, in rallying and re-forming the regiment, promoted to be adjutant, serving with distinguished gallantry at Gettysburg, and killed in action at Dunn's Lake, Fla.

Captain of Company A, Douglas Fowler, of Norwalk; a captain in the three months' service, afterwards captain in the Eighth Connecticut; promoted to be lieutenant-colonel for gallantry at Chancellorsville, and killed in first day's battle at Gettysburg.

Captain of Company B, Charles A. Hobbie, of Darien, who was wounded at Chancellorsville, captured in Florida, and imprisoned at Andersonville.

Captain of Company C, James E. Moore; a soldier of the Mexican war, and a captain in the three months' service. A faithful officer, serving with distinguished gallantry at Chancellorsville, and killed in the first day's fight at Gettysburg.

Captain of Company D, William H. Lacy, of Bridgeport; wounded at Chancellorsville, and resigned in May, 1863. He was succeeded by Lieut. William L. Hubbell, of Bridgeport, who was successively promoted to be adjutant, captain of Company D, and major of the regiment.

Captain of Company E, Henry P. Burr, of Westport; served with distinguished gallantry at Chancellorsville (where he was taken for a short time prisoner) and afterwards at Gettysburg, where, at the close of the battle, he was in command of the regiment.

Captain of Company F, Enoch Ward, of Norwalk, who raised his company in three days from nothing to one hundred and two men; resigned in March, 1863, on account of ill health. He was succeeded by Lieut. Henry Allen, of Norwalk; afterwards promoted to be major and lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, which position he held at the close of the war, his three predecessors having been killed or mortally wounded in action.

Captain of Company G, James E. Dunham, of Bridgeport; in the winter of 1862 and 1863, promoted to be provost-marshal on the staff of Gen. Devens, First Division, Eleventh Corps; badly maimed at Chancellorsville by the fall of his horse, and unable to march as captain; resigned to accept the position of captain and provost-marshal of the Fourth District of Connecticut. He was succeeded by Lieut. Wilson French, of Stratford, who was on picket at Chancellorsville with his company, and met the first onslaught of Stonewall Jackson's assault; also wounded at Gettysburg, and for a short time a prisoner; afterwards provost-marshal of the Eastern District of Florida, and then captured and taken prisoner to Andersonville.

Captain of Company H, Enos Kellogg, of New Canaan; a gallant officer; in the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, and in the trenches on Morris Island. At Volusia, Fla., with only fifty men, seventy-five miles from any other Union force, he so fortified his position, aided by Lieut. Ruggles of Company K, that he frightened off the rebel captain Dickenson with his artillery and two hundred mounted riflemen.

Captain of Company I, D. O. Benson, of Greenwich, who died early in his service at Baltimore, and was succeeded by Adj. Wilcoxson, afterwards lieutenant-colonel.

Captain of Company K, J. J. McCarthy, of Fairfield; a very gallant officer; marked for his behavior as such at the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, and in the trenches on Morris Island; was specially selected to head any dangerous or difficult post on picket- or-skirmish-line; a bold and fearless officer; resigned at Folly Island in the winter of 1864.

The regiment had no chaplain at its organization, but the Rev. Alexander R. Thomson, D.D., of the Second Congregational Church of Bridgeport, while the regiment was in camp, filled the place of two or three chaplains, procured them a chapel tent and a library of five hundred volumes, and was most active in every work to promote the interests, spiritual and temporal, of the regiment. He would have gone out with the regiment as its chaplain could he have obtained leave of absence from his congregation; he afterwards visited them at Baltimore, and held there their first divine service and a grand temperance-meeting. The regiment, from its colonel down, reveres and loves him.

He was succeeded by the Rev. — Hall, who joined at Antioch Church, November, 1862, and continued with the regiment through the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg and until November, 1863.

THE REGIMENT IN THE SERVICE.

Aug. 28, 1862, the regiment was mustered into the United States service. On September 3d following it took rail for the front. A short time previous, Maj.-Gen. Franz Sigel, through Capt. Lyon, one of his staff, had asked consent of the regiment to join his Eleventh Corps. He was eager to swell his force, which then was without a Connecticut regiment. The officers of the Seventeenth gave their unanimous consent to be so assigned. When it broke camp at Seaside Park the members of the whole regiment felt, in the words of the refrain, that they should soon "fight mit Sigel."

The date of departure had been made known to the homes of the county; the friends and kindred of the regiment turned out a vast throng of anxious hearts and patriotic sympathy to say farewell. Outside of Bridgeport, whose citizens crowded en masse, there came thousands by rail and country road to bid adieu to brothers, fathers, and friends; there were many sad and many cheerful partings. As a whole, the soldiers were elated and hopeful. Youth, pride in such a service, and the novel duties and scenes in which they were soon to act gave the "enchantment of distance" to a life filled with hardship, danger, and death.

The regiment moved (except from New York to Amboy) from Bridgeport to Baltimore by rail, with orders to report to Gen. Wool, there commanding. It arrived in Baltimore on the next day, September 4th, about dark, and marched to the extensive railroad depot and store-shed of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, of which the colonel took possession for shelter, and refused to move until ordered by Gen. Wool.

On reporting to Gen. Wool late the night of arrival, the colonel was ordered to hold his command in readiness for orders from Washington. In the mean time the Union men of Baltimore, anxious for their city in the face of the disasters beyond, were fearful of some sudden raids of the enemy in force. They had looked over this regiment, so conspicuously quartered in the centre of their city, and expressed flattering admiration for its make-up and bearing. They soon hinted and "guessed" that we should not be allowed to go farther, and that they wanted such a regiment there as much as anywhere. They had evidently interviewed Gen. Wool in force or visited Washington. A few days afterwards he sent down orders to the regiment to shift quarters to Fort Marshall, a temporary earthwork on high ground east of the city, commanding the city, harbor, and surrounding country. It was to act as a reserve and supporting force to a New York artillery regiment, which formed its garrison.

Our position there was in every respect irksome and distasteful. The garrison was made up of very different material from the regiment. It had been recruited in New York and Brooklyn, and was held with a very lax rein of discipline. The association was bad. Besides, Col. Belger, the post quartermaster, refused the regiment the shelter which at a post and as a reserve to garrison they had a right to demand. He paid no heed to the remonstrances of the regimental quartermaster, Lieut. Hayes, or to those of the colonel. Every military man knows that regiments in the field and in active service can stand hardships and exposures which will sicken and thin out a force in the position of ours at Fort Marshall. Men make light of all sorts of things on forced marches or in action which tell heavily upon them in the quiet camp.

Under this state of things the colonel of the regiment, out of the regular channels of communication, wrote what he intended as a private letter to Gen. Sigel, stating the annoyances suffered and the insulting rebuffs of Col. Belger, reminding him of our original purpose to join his command, and asking his aid to effect that end. It was supposed that in some way, without following the lines of red tape and those regular channels, he would find means to cut the tape and get us into the field. Nothing was heard from him or about the matter for a month.

In this state of things, about Oct. 15, 1862, Col. Noble called upon Gen. Wool to lay before him the grievances of the regiment in regard to its camp equipage and Col. Belger's neglect of our military rights. He found that venerable officer very irate. He confronted the colonel with the letter to Gen. Sigel, which had just arrived in its travels through the regular channels, with due and ample "respectful reference." Nothing that Col. Noble could say at all cooled the general's wrath. He did not exhibit to the colonel his letter or its indorsements, one of which doubtless was for the regiment to report at Washington. At any rate, he immediately ordered the colonel to take his regiment by rail to Washington, and to leave Baltimore before the next day at noon. This was late at night, and in those days of ample apparel, equipage, and transportation it was not an easy task to land a thousand men and all their belongings early in the morning. The order was filled, however. By eleven o'clock next day everything was on board ready to move to Washington, and before twelve the regiment had moved from the city of Baltimore. But so crowded were the rails by army travel and transportation that the regiment only reached its destination about dusk. On application next morning at headquarters it was ordered to march through the city to Tenallytown and encamp at Fort Kearney, in the defenses of Washington.

At this post the regiment was immediately put to work in intrenchments. It expected to have been sent along to Sigel, and did not like the delay. It very likely worked with less will at its task of digging than it would have done except in face of its disappointment. At any rate, after several reports of its not being good diggers had been made, orders came for the regiment to embark at Georgetown on Nov. 5, 1862, and to proceed by the way of Alexandria and the Manassas Railroad, and to report to Gen. Sigel at Gainesville.

It reached this place on the third evening after its departure from Fort Kearney after dark. It first struck upon Gen. McLean's brigade. That gallant officer at once desired to take it into his command, and seemed very happy over the chance. It was made up of Ohio men, all but one regiment of whom were Americans, the One Hundred and Seventh Ohio of the brigade being mostly German. The Seventeenth now seemed well pleased with its fortune and at home; no more grumbling at any lot in its military life was ever afterwards heard from the command. But of its hardships in extent and variety the regiment had as large a share as falls to the lot of any command. Soon after we joined his corps Gen. Sigel rode into our camp with his staff, and accompanied by the beautiful wife of Prince Salm-Salm, to thank us for our persistence in joining his command.

The Eleventh Corps was at this time the reserve of the Army of the Potomac. The brigade and division in which the Seventeenth was were guarding Thorougfare Gap, in the Bull Run Mountains. After a stay at Gainesville of about two weeks, an order came at midnight—as such things usually came—to be ready to move at daylight in the morning. Our march was northward to Hopewell Gap and Antioch Church on same range. After some days here, like midnight orders were sent in to move in the morning. Our march that day was from Antioch Church towards Chantilly. Our first night was spent in the splendid winter quarters of the rebel force, and our destination was Chantilly. There, in the midst of wide plains and a very rich and fruitful country, the regiment held its camp with its brigade and corps, till orders again came to send to hospital all disabled, to be ready in the morning for march. This was the beginning of our seven days' march as reserve of Burnside's movement on Fredericksburg.

The regiment had by this time become pretty well seasoned to military duty in the field. The knapsacks, stuffed at first with photographs, writing material, and all sorts of home-traps, had wonderfully shrunken. On the previous marches the Ohio boys had shown them some pretty long legs, but on this seven days' march the Seventeenth made them stretch theirs, with interest added. As is known to most, the regiments alternate front and rear every day, the regiment at the front always having the brightest outlook and, somehow or another, marching the easiest; that in the rear seems to drag along with tiresome step, and often lags when at the front they make good time.

At Bacon's Race-Course Church, about two days' march from Falmouth, the terrible cannonade of the conflict of Fredericksburg was distinctly heard, and on the next day, at noon, the news of Burnside's repulse was announced to the regiments. The corps, however, kept on to Falmouth, after a night's rest at which place they were ordered back to camp at Stafford Court-House. This was the place where the Seventeenth, which had saved its rations in going down, gave a supper to an Ohio regiment, which had eaten up all its own. This brotherly act was never forgotten by the Ohio boys.

At Stafford Court-House, passed on our march to Falmouth, the regiment arrived back about December 16th and made camp in the woods. It was one of the most picturesque winter-camps that could be imagined. On each side of a street, running up a gentle slope of pine-forest, the regiment built huts, with camp-fires in front. The sight of their cheerful blaze step by step up that ascent was at night cheering and lovely.

About the 20th of February an order came to break camp and march to Belle Plain. This was again in reserve to Burnside's army, on what is known as the mud-march. Our movement was ordered to follow up a contemplated second attack on Fredericksburg, but which purpose the storm and the mire state of the roads thwarted.

At Belle Plain the regiment and division were ordered to occupy the huts of the force which had moved towards Fredericksburg. These were constructed, with great neatness and much ingenious architecture, along briuks and declivities of ravines. But such good quarters were only our lot for a very few days. The return of their former occupants from their unsuccessful move required our evacuation of their quarters. The regiment soon returned to Brooks' Station, near its old camp at Stafford Court-House, and huted for the winter.

Our camp was ordered into a forest of oak and beech and all the woods of Virginia. The ground was covered with snow, but axes were plenty, and the regiment soon sheltered itself in fine style. Here the time passed quietly in drill and camp-duties till, on the 26th of April, 1863, orders were issued to take in haversack seven days' rations, put everything in light marching order, and be in readiness for movement the next morning at daybreak. On that day the regiment marched westward to near Hartwood Church, and encamped for the night. This route was that of the Eleventh and Twelfth Corps. Early the next morning movement was made towards Barrett's Ford, on the Rappahannock. This river was then crossed on a pontoon-bridge by night, and the regiment bivouacked for a few hours' rest some mile or so beyond, in the adjacent woods. Here the Twelfth Corps passed it early in the morning, and all moved on towards Germania Ford of the Rapidan.

Some of the forces ahead of us had not so good luck as the Eleventh Corps, and many were forced to ford the river in a high state of the flood, which was strong and up to their necks. The Seventeenth, however, and most of the Eleventh Corps, passed on a temporary bridge, and bivouacked for the rest of the night some mile or two beyond. Early the next day the movement was resumed, and about five o'clock in the afternoon the battle-ground of Chancellorsville was reached, near the Hatch house, which was made the headquarters of our brigade and division. This was the home of a man formerly from Milford, Conn., but as arrant a rebel as if a native Virginian. Our camp for the night was at the west of this Hatch house.

The next morning the regiment was put in line along the Culpeper road to receive Gen. Hooker. The whole corps were placed in similar positions. About eleven o'clock the general, with a brilliant staff, rode down the lines in review.

In the afternoon of that day the commander of our brigade, Gen. McLean, ordered the right wing of the regiment to be posted around the west and south borders of the Hatch house garden, which was in rear of the Hatch house and south of the Culpeper road. This was to be under the immediate command of Lieut.-Col. Walter. The left wing of the regiment, under the immediate command of Maj. Brady, was ordered into position along the Culpeper road in support of Dykeman's Battery, which was stationed south of the road, and facing south. Col. Noble was ordered to take his position between the two wings, which were some rods apart, and to have oversight of the action and conduct of each.

The whole theory of the expected battle seemed to look for an attack from the south, and all the troops of the brigade and corps in sight of our position were aligned under that idea. Col. Noble was the next day, May 2d, appointed officer of the day for the division, and as such had inspection of the picket-lines thrown forward to the south of our position and to the west of the Hatch house, in the wilderness.

When on his rounds, a cavalry vidette rode up from the front, with information of heavy forces of the enemy passing along our front towards the rear. He was told to ride in to headquarters and give the information at the Hatch house, which was pointed out to him. Afterwards, during the day, another horseman rode up to our position with like information, and was again directed to report at the adjacent headquarters to Gen. Devens and Gen. McLean. He rode up to the front of the house, where they were seated.

At this time two companies of the regiment—Company G and Company I—were on picket in dense woods at our right, on the border of the wilderness. About five o'clock in the afternoon of May 2d sharp firing of some light cannon was heard on our right. It seemed to be light field-pieces, and was supposed to be what is called a jackass-battery. All was quiet for a while, and then came sharp, nervous firing on our right announcing an attack of the enemy driving in our pickets; this was the skirmish-line of Jackson's force. Large masses of the enemy soon poured down upon our flank, and the air seemed full of missiles. The shell fell among the horses of Dykeman's Battery and killed one; others screamed and burst fast over the battle-ground.

As, at this time, Col. Noble rode past Lieut.-Col. Walter to the front of the garden, where the right wing lay on their arms, as ordered, to inspect the coming in of his two companies on picket, Col. Walter, who, like the left wing, lay down at his proper position in the rear of his wing, rose as if to watch the progress of the action or perhaps out of respect to his commanding officer. As Col. Noble, having hailed those companies and directed them to our position, turned to take his position between the two wings as ordered, Col. Walter again, as was supposed, resumed his recumbent posture. But he was undoubtedly at this time shot, as the ball which killed him struck him in the forehead. When the colonel returned to his position, he found that Dykeman's Battery had limbered up and fled down the Culpeper road, and on looking farther to the front supposed he saw Maj. Brady with the left wing holding a corn-house at the north of the Hatch house and off the Culpeper road, firing at the enemy, but he was mistaken. Maj. Brady had retreated with the left wing soon after the battery which he supported had fled.

At this time the right wing of the regiment still held its position around the Hatch house garden. It continued to hold it till all the regiments and Union force at the right had passed to the rear, and towards our left.

The crushing force of Stonewall Jackson's attack was in such irresistible mass, with such steady and unabating fire, that the air seemed full of whizzing rifle-balls. Their advancing light artillery threw a storm of shells down the lines of retreat. At this time the right wing of the Seventeenth retreated from its position around the Hatch house, and met Col. Noble, who had been looking for his left wing, with the news of Col. Walter's death. The right and the two companies who were out on picket passed with him to the first lines of the Schurz division, of which the Ninety-fourth New York had changed its position from parallel to a right angle with the Culpeper road and facing the attack of the enemy. Whilst Col. Noble, with the aid of his adjutant, Lieut. Chatfield, and the captains of the right wing, was reforming this line in rear of said regiment, its colonel was shot dead, and his regiment, under a terrific fire, broke and threw the whole force in inevitable retreat. In fact, lingering any longer in such an unequal contest would have been madness, all troops to the right having long passed to the rear.

The Seventeenth moved along down the Culpeper road deliberately. While thus proceeding its colonel was shot through his left arm, severing the main artery, and, bleeding to exhaustion, he was guided and kept on his horse by two of his soldiers, after having given them his watch and money, and made ready to surrender himself, as he was unable to go on alone. They led him to a field-hospital in the rear of the Chancellorsville House. Here his horse, which had been wounded near the Hatch house and borne him so far, died.

The regiment after this fell under the command of Maj. Brady, and was the next day moved from the right to the left of the army's position.

In Greeley's "American Conflict," where he speaks of that "grand burst of Stonewall Jackson with twenty-five thousand men upon the exposed flank of the Eleventh Corps," the Seventeenth Connecticut is the only regiment specially noted and commended for its action. At page 357 of his second volume the tremendous result of that attack is thus noted: "In a moment the First Division, Gen. Devens, was overwhelmed, its commander being among the wounded, and one-third of his force, including every general and colonel, either disabled or captured. Driven back in wild rout down the Chancellorsville road, upon the position of Gen. Schurz, it was found that his division had already retreated, and an attempt made to rally and form here proved abortive. The Seventeenth Connecticut, which bore a resolute part in the effort, had its lieutenant-colonel killed and its colonel severely wounded."

The Seventeenth had a list of one hundred and twenty killed, wounded, and missing in this fight. That night it made a brave stand near headquarters, at Chancellorsville House, and remained there all night supporting a battery, while the Third Corps was flung into the gap. The regiment was not again in action during that battle. Col. Noble was sent home by Dr. Hubbard, the acting medical director of the corps, and was unable to leave home for thirty-four days.

The regiment, after the council of war had decided upon the transfer of our forces to the north side of the Rappahannock, was ordered into camp not far from its old quarters at Bowles Station. Here it remained till June, when, on Lee's invasion, the regiment followed the Army of the Potomac on parallel lines to the march of the enemy till their movements culminated in the battle of Gettysburg.

The regiment was in the midst of that first day's fight, on the other side of the town, and west of its final battle-ground. Lieut.-Col. Fowler, commanding regiment, and Capt. Moore, were instantly killed; Lieut. Chatfield, who was beside Col. Fowler, had his knapsack and uniform riddled, and his sword—a relic of Revolutionary history—broken in splinters, yet received not a scar. On that day, too, Capt. French was wounded in his right arm while gallantly commanding his company. Maj. Brady received a shell contusion upon his shoulder, which caused a disability, resulting in his transfer to the Veteran Reserve Corps. Capt. Allen was also slightly wounded; of the other officers it is needless to say more than that they conducted themselves with gallantry and without reproach. Gen. Ames, who then commanded the brigade, uttered to the colonel, when he rode upon the battle-field, on the third day, no word but of commendation of the conduct of the whole regiment.

The colonel, who had been at home recovering from his wound, was, when he reached Washington, unable to find first where the regiment was and then how to reach them. When a route was directed the crowded state of the one railroad which conducted all the army-supplies, and a forty-mile horseback-ride only enabled him to reach the battle-field on the afternoon of the third day. He found the regiment stationed at the north of the Cemetery Hill along a stone wall,—a position which it had held, under orders, since the first day's fight. By death and capture it had been reduced to a handful; not two hundred men could be put in line. The next morning the colonel found himself in command of the brigade, Gen. Ames having assumed command of the division, whose commander, Gen. Francis C. Barlow, had been severely wounded in the action.

It was very evident, on the morning of the 4th, that the enemy were in full retreat. The whole force of the division moved into Gettysburg and well out to the right, finding no indications of the enemy, except an occasional shot on the picket-line, which showed that they were feigning presence in force.

On the morning of the 5th the wagons of the enemy could be distinctly seen moving rapidly to the rear and southward. Everything betokened that they had left a strong picket-line in front only to make a show of resistance and to protect their retreat.

On the morning of the 6th the Eleventh Corps moved with the rest of the army in pursuit of Lee. The marches were not very rapid, and till we reached Hagerstown no portions of the enemy were encountered by our part of the Union army. At Hagerstown, Md., our division was within gunshot of the rebels' lines. It was evidently a weak sham. The earnest appeal of Col. Von Gilsa, who commanded a brigade of the division, to be allowed to attack their flimsy front, is well remembered. Permission was not accorded. All seemed hesitation and timidity as to any forward movement upon the retreating enemy, who were evidently penned up between the Potomac and our lines. After spending two days in the vicinity of the rebel outposts, and near the battle-field of Antietam, a march was made upon the enemy's lines, only to find him escaped across the Potomac.

On the march from Gettysburg down a large portion of the regiment was without shoes, the whole of it in a very sad and tattered condition, the result of continuous marching and constant exposure to the weather and rough soldiering.

But of its conduct throughout all this campaign too much cannot be said in praise. Fairfield County may be proud of her sons. Their conduct in the first day's fight at Gettysburg in striving to repel the onslaught of the enemy, and during the rest of the battle holding their post at foot of Cemetery Hill, was all that could be expected of any troops. Gen. Gordon, late senator from Georgia, who was in command of the enemy's troops which charged upon the lines of the regiment at Gettysburg, meeting Lieut.-Col. Allen during his late seat in the Senate, learning that the colonel was of the Seventeenth Connecticut, said to him that of all the trouble he ever had to force a retreat from any troops, he had the hardest work with the Seventeenth Connecticut at Gettysburg; that it didn't seem to know how to get away from its position, however strong the force attacking.

After the pursuit of Lee had ceased on his retreat from Gettysburg, and while the forces were marshaling for a new conflict, a sudden order came for the Ames and Von Gilsa brigades to take rail to Alexandria and embark for Fortress Monroe. After arrival there the brigades again took transport, and were landed about August 21st on Folly Island, S. C. They had hardly got into camp when a detail of a thousand men was ordered, under Col. Noble, into the siege-trenches on Morris Island, approaching Fort Wagner. This was a reserve force, and in protection of the artillerymen and of the siege-works. On this duty the regiment lay for forty-eight hours close under the fire of Wagner, and under shell showered from Forts James and Moultrie.

The brigade was afterwards quartered a short distance below the siege-works of Wagner. For about a fortnight on that island they were most of the time under fire from the enemy's batteries. While there they saw the first gun fired upon Sumter from the great siege-works guns of Gen. Gillmore, and remained there until the ruins of that fort looked like a sand-bank or the debris of some great brick edifice. Several of the regiment were killed and several others badly wounded by the bursting of shell and the breaking of solid shot down through the splinter-panels. Lying under these cannon-ball and shell protections, without the excitement of attack and real conflict, was about the most trying work the regiment ever did.

Before we left the island, Gen. Ames took the officers of his brigade up into the high tower of the lighthouse, a short distance below Fort Wagner, where a good view was obtained, through a telescope, of the condition and ruins of Sumter. He then said to them that it had been proposed that his brigade should organize for a night-attack upon said fort, and asked us if he should ask for us the duty. The officers unanimously desired Gen. Ames to solicit the place for us. But such was not to be our task. The navy claimed it as their prize, and made an abortive attempt to capture the fort. Although in ruins as to its walls, it was found to have been made stronger than ever by sand-bags and fallen masonry. The attack had been delayed too long; the right time was when we volunteered for the duty.

After the fall of Wagner till February only one military event deserving notice occurred to the regiment. About the middle of October there came by night an urgent order from Gen. Vodges, commanding the forces on Morris Island, saying that the enemy were about to make an attack in great force on its northern and western side by floats down from Secessionville, and ordering out the division to resist the attack. On this occasion the Seventeenth was under arms and in line of march twenty minutes before any other regiment reported. This was noted by Gen. Ames to the colonel of the regiment as highly complimentary to his command. But the alarm proved entirely false: no attack was made.

The remainder of the fall and winter was spent by the Seventeenth upon the island under drill and on a brief expedition under Gen. Schimmelpennig to John's Island as a diversion to hold in check the removal of the troops of the enemy farther north to meet and resist some movement of our own forces. There was only a small skirmish on our approach to John's Island, in which several of the regiment were wounded slightly. During a part of the winter Gen. Ames' absence at the North threw the command of the brigade upon Gen. Noble, whose principal task was drilling its six regiments in field-movements.

At Christmas and New Year's the Seventeenth received a heavy consignment from the people of Bridgeport and Fairfield County, who sent boxes to individuals and general stores for the hospital and for the good of the regiment. There came a large and varied supply, under the care of Lieut. Hayes, their former quartermaster, and Dr. L. H. Norton. It was welcome Christmas cheer to gladden the hearts of the soldiers.

On the 22d of February, 1864, orders came to strike our tents and make everything ready for Florida.

The next morning we took transport for Jacksonville. The repulse of Gen. Seymour's advance into Florida, at the battle of Olustee, where the Sharps' rifles of Hawley's regiment alone saved us from a terrible reverse, had called for this reinforcement of our brigade to Florida. On our arrival at Jacksonville general orders were issued creating two divisions, of which Gen. Ames and the forces under him constituted one, Gen. Noble commanding Ames' brigade. The forces advanced outside to the north and west of the town and intrenched. An attack from the enemy was felt to be possible from any quarter of that traversible country, and the forces were for a month aroused at three in the morning to prepare for an attack.

About April 15th the whole force at Jacksonville was broken up. Gen. Ames was ordered North to the Army of the Potomac, and his brigade left in Florida. The Seventeenth was ordered to relieve the Tenth Connecticut at St. Augustine, and took transport immediately for that ancient city. It seemed as if the regiment was to be laid up in lavender for the rest of its service in that lovely, quaint, old place. But the seeming did not prove the reality; the mass of the regiment never had harder or more taxing service than in Florida. The climate in the summer and fall is not particularly healthful. One of the companies of the regiment garrisoned the old Spanish Fort San Marco, the others were quartered in the old government barracks.

We had hardly got well settled in our quarters when an order came from Gen. Birney, then commanding in Florida, for Col. Noble to go with all his regiment, except one company, to Volusia, Fla. The regiment moved on the morning of the 25th of April, and made Volusia after a three days' march. Volusia is but a hamlet of a few houses on the St. John's River. After a few days the post was visited by Gen. Birney, who had proceeded up the St. John's River and disembarked near Pilatka with several regiments, and thus reached our post. At this place Gen. Birney ordered a company of the Seventeenth to be stationed in guard of the crossings of St. John's River at Welaka and Sanders. They had hardly been posted a week before all were gobbled up by the enemy, who crossed the river in strong force. They might just as easily have captured the fifty men left at Volusia, but were frightened away by the intrenchments made there under Capt. Kellogg and the track of an army-wagon, which they mistook for that of artillery.

Just after this Gen. Birney was relieved, and Gen. George H. Gordon placed in command of Florida. Under him Col. Noble was invested with the command of all the country east and south of the St. John's River, and of the forces within that area. These consisted of two colored regiments, the Seventy-fifth Ohio, and his own regiment.

About the 10th of June the Seventeenth, together with other regiments in Gen. Gordon's command, numbering about two thousand men, was organized at Jacksonville for a raid and flank march upon McGilet's Creek. The expedition started at midnight on transports under conduct of the navy gunboats, and landing was made about three in the morning and march commenced. During all that day, which was one of the hottest of the season, the regiments marched along the close roads of Florida, and late in the afternoon, after a very fatiguing flank march, the force under Gen. Noble joined that of Gen. Gordon, who had marched straight out from Jacksonville. The enemy's works were found to be of no great consequence, and, having destroyed its barracks and stores, the regiment moved, with the rest of the forces, back to Jacksonville, and thence to St. Augustine. Lieut.-Col. Wilcoxson commanded the regiment.

No sooner had we arrived at Jacksonville than an order came reversing things. Gen. Gordon was ordered to the Army of the Potomac, and Gen. Birney replaced in command of Florida.

About the 29th of July, Gen. Birney, still in command of Florida, ordered another raid on the enemy's unseen and insignificant works. Col. Noble was ordered with the Seventeenth, and all the force under his command, and all the horses in St. Augustine, and all the loyal Floridians, to rendezvous at Picolata, on the St. John's, there to take steamer and connect with Gen. Birney at a point upon the Black River. The force was gathered and the connection made, and proceeded with Gen. Birney to Baldwin, on the Cedar Keys Railroad. Col. Noble was at this time placed in command of Baldwin, and, having under his command a battery of Rhode Island artillery, two regiments of colored troops, and other forces, was ordered by Gen. Birney to hold and garrison that place and build a log fort. But Gen. Birney had hardly completed these orders and returned from Jacksonville to see our condition before news came that he was succeeded by Gen. Hatch.

Gen. Hatch withdrew the Seventeenth from Baldwin, and established it in post at Magnolia, to hold which post and construct a fort it was then ordered, Capt. Kellogg being in command of the portion of the Seventeenth Regiment at that place. But Col. Noble was ordered by him the next day to burn the few buildings and to make a raid with some cavalry, artillery, and three regiments, making a four days' march, and coming in at Magnolia, where he had established a post garrisoned by the Seventeenth, and awaited the arrival of the expedition. This was accomplished, and the Seventeenth relieved from duty at Magnolia and returned to St. Augustine.

Soon after, Gen. Hatch took command of Florida. While Col. Noble was at Magnolia he ascertained that heavy effort was being made in Lower and Middle Florida, east of St. John's, to recruit companies for the enemy. Orders were given to Col. Noble to detail part of his own regiment and the Seventy-fifth Mounted Rifles to proceed up the St. John's along its eastern bank, while Col. Noble, with artillery and several regiments and a detachment of Massachusetts cavalry, proceeded by steamer up the St. John's and Dunn's Lake, to follow up the expedition of said regiments. After landing on said lake on a day's march the Seventy-fifth was met returning to St. Augustine, having captured a captain and about twenty of his enrolled men, who were afterwards imprisoned in the fort at St. Augustine.

Soon after this Gen. Hatch was succeeded in command by Gen. Seammon, and all raids abandoned except a miserable one which resulted most disastrously to the regiment. Gen. Seammon had learned of a lot of cotton stored on the borders of Dunn's Lake, and directed Col. Wilcoxson, with teams and a sufficient force, to gather it in. The order was obeyed and the cotton gathered. The force was about starting on its return home when it was attacked by about two hundred of Dixon's Mounted Rifles. The attack was sudden and unexpected. They are easily made so in Florida, which is pretty much all oak pine wood. A summons to surrender was unheeded by Col. Wilcoxson, and fire opened. Seeing no hope of escape, Lieut.-Col. Wilcoxson and Adj. Chatfield attempted to cut their way through the enemy. Adj. Chatfield was instantly killed, and Col. Wilcoxson shot through the shoulder, of which wound he afterwards died at Tallahassee. The regiment in these officers lost two gallant and able men. Two captains and about fifty men were captured and sent to Andersonville.

Prior to this, Col. Noble, the day before Christmas, 1864, while crossing from Jacksonville to St. Augustine, in company with two officers of other commands, was captured by the enemy's scouts about half-way betwixt these places. He was taken across the St. John's River to Tallahassee, to Macon, Ga., and finally to Andersonville. While there the force of the 17th that had been captured at Dunn's Lake, and in a subsequent raid of the enemy in the rear of St. Augustine, was brought into that prison. The officers were Capt. French, Company G; Capt. Betts, Company F; Lieut. Ruggles, Company K; Capt. Quien, Company C.

After this cotton expedition and the captures, the regiment passed a quiet and uneventful winter and spring. About the 1st of June, 1865, it was ordered by Gen. Vodges, then commanding Florida, to Jacksonville. While there it was sent out on provost-duty in various places, and was employed in reconstructing the Baldwin and Jacksonville Railroad.

About the 1st of July it was ordered to take transports for Hilton Head, to be mustered out of the service, and at that post, on the 19th of July, 1865, ended its duties as part of the army of the republic during its great struggle.

On no occasion had the people of the county had reason to regret the exertions they had made to put it in the field. Its gallant service had been an honor to them and to the State; no charge ever was or could be made upon them of flinching from any truly military duty. In post at St. Augustine or in the field, it never failed to win the respect and affection of all with whom it came in contact. In this the Seventeenth stands alongside of the glorious record of all the Connecticut troops in the war.

The regiment, leaving unnamed the towns which contributed in small numbers, received its quota from the following sources:

Company A, all from Norwalk, excepting eighteen men from Wilton; Company B, all enlisted from Stamford and Darien; Company C received fifty-eight from Danbury, from Bethel sixteen, from Ridgefield twelve; Company D, forty-four from Bridgeport, seventeen from Monroe, from Huntington nine; Company E received fifty-one from Westport, twenty-five from Newtown, fourteen from Bridgeport, ten from Weston; Company F, almost all from Norwalk, except fourteen from Wilton; Company G, Ridgefield fifty-three, Bridgeport twenty-three, Redding twenty; Company H, mostly from New Canaan; Company I, mostly from Greenwich; Company K, thirty-five from Bridgeport, Fairfield thirty-five. In all these companies there were members from other towns, making up the quota of the regiment,—a thousand and one men.

There were individuals in every town most active in promoting the enlistment of this regiment whose services should not be forgotten. The distinguished inventor of the sewing-machine, Elias Howe, Jr., was very active in this service, himself enlisted as a private in its ranks, and on one occasion, by permission of the Secretary of War, advanced the pay due the regiment, about fourteen thousand dollars, on their march towards Fredericksburg.

The matériel of this regiment was of a character among the privates fit to have officered a dozen regiments. Wherever stationed they were commended for their morale and soldierly characteristics.

WILLIAM HENRY NOBLE, son of Rev. Birdsey G. Noble (Yale class of 17-1), was born in Newtown, Conn., Aug. 16, 1813. He lived at Middletown, Conn., with parents till fifteen years old; spent the last four years, from eleven to fifteen, at Partridge's Military School, Middletown, Conn.; thence to Trinity (then Washington) College, Hartford, 1828 to 1830; 1830 to 1832, Yale; graduated; taught a school one year and a half at Stamford, Conn. He then removed to Bridgeport, where he studied law, and in 1836 was admitted to the bar of Fairfield County; was for many years clerk of court and State's attorney for said county. In 1839 married Harriet J. Brooks, daughter of Benjamin Brooks, Esq., of Bridgeport; ran for Congress in 1850, and was defeated. In 1851 he laid out East Bridgeport, and in 1852 reorganized the operation with P. T. Barnum on a larger scale; built bridges, houses, factories, giving to Bridgeport the foundation of a great city. In 1860 helped organize the Union movement in Connecticut which spread through the country, and in July, 1862, was commissioned by Governor Buckingham colonel of the Seventeenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers; went out September 3d, destined to Eleventh Corps, Army of the Potomac; stopped by General Wool at Baltimore; stationed at Fort Marshall a month and a half; sent thence to defenses of Washington, Fort Kearney, and Tenthlytown; thence to Eleventh Corps at Gainesville; with Eleventh Corps in reserve moved on Fredericksburg at Burnside's attack; Stafford Court-House and Brook's Station, Va., winter of 1862 and 1863. At battle of Chancellorsville, under Howard (see "Greeley's Conflict," vol. ii., chap. xvi., page 350; only regiment named); wounded in left arm by minie-ball, severing main artery; ordered home by Surgeon Hubbard, medical director of the Eleventh Corps; forty days' leave; left to reach advance towards Gettysburg; at Gettysburg, Cemetery Hill, third day; fourth day, command of brigade; moved in pursuit of Lee; at Hagerstown, Md., in front of the rebel line when preparing to cross the Potomac; continued the march into Virginia; thence was sent with Ames' brigade, Eleventh Corps, to South Carolina; on Morris and Folly Islands about six months; at siege of Sumter and Wagner for a month; daily under fire; saw first gun fired on Sumter; walls powdered and Wagner surrendered; in trenches at Wagner, in command of reserves, and supporting force with and without regiment many days. In February, 1864, went with Ames' brigade to Jacksonville, Fla.; there put in command of brigade; at Jacksonville about a month and a half; assigned in April, 1864, to command of St. Augustine; placed in command of brigade and all the country east of the St. John's River; commanded brigade at capture and destruction of Baldwin, Fla.; sent in command of cavalry, artillery, and five regiments South to Sand Lakes, and to cripple Cedar Keys Railroad; returned to Magnolia, on St. John's; in command of Fort Construction and post at Magnolia, and force there, and of the posts and forces east of the St. John's, including St. Augustine, August and September, 1864; sent during September, 1864, with cavalry, infantry, and artillery, per land and steamer, up the St. John's River and Duns Lake, Fla., to break up Confederate recruiting-station, capturing a company and many disloyal Floridians; December 24th captured by enemy's scouts while returning across country from court-martial as a witness, between Jacksonville and St. Augustine; taken to Baldwin; thence to Tallahassee, to Chattahoochee River, to Columbus, to Macon; at Macon under parole a month and a half at Camp Oglethorpe; thence to Andersonville for a month and a half; thence for exchange per rail and march across Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi to Vicksburg; thence to St. Louis, in command of Eastern paroled Union men; thence to Annapolis, May, 1865, in command of one thousand Union soldiers from rebel prisons to be mustered out; returned home and has suffered for many years from the malaria born of exposure in all weathers and climates. Since the war he has devoted himself to the law, real estate, etc.; was brevetted brigadier-general, by recommendation of Gen. Grant, in June, 1865.—EDITOR.

Our military history is closed. We have faithfully traced the history of the various regiments, and it has been our honest endeavor to place before the people of Fairfield County a truthful record of her gallant sons who risked their lives in the defense of their country. We have sought to deal justly with all and give deserving credit to each and every regiment.

While the history is a record of many of the severest battles of the war, it is not in any particular overdrawn; it is a "plain, unvarnished tale." It has been impossible to sketch many individual acts of heroism, but these were not wanting.

Fairfield County may justly feel proud of the record of her soldiery, as no section of our country acted a more prominent or honorable rôle in the great tragedy.

Fifteen years have now elapsed since the close of the Rebellion, and we find our country a united and prosperous people. Sectional strife is rapidly passing away, and the same hand strews flowers alike on the graves of the Blue and the Gray.

"No more shall the war-cry sever,
Or the winding rivers be red;
They vanish our anger forever
When they laurel the graves of our dead!
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day;
Love and tears for the Blue,
Tears and love for the Gray."

* The population of Greenwich, Norwalk, and Stamford in 1790, in the aggregate, was 11,942. They are not given separately.
 † In 1879 a part of Fairfield, containing a population of about 1900, was annexed to Bridgeport.
 ‡ There was a census taken by order of the General Assembly in October, 1761, to be completed at or before Jan. 1, 1762. According to that census the population of the colony was—white, 141,000, blacks, 4590. The only details relative to Fairfield County which I can give are that the population of Greenwich was 2021 whites, 32 blacks,—that of Stamford 2746 whites, 86 blacks.

PREFACE.

THE following paper upon the history of Bridgeport has been compiled after a careful study of original documents, such as church and society records, contemporary newspapers and pamphlets, petitions, deeds, wills, etc. It undoubtedly contains some errors, but it is hoped that they will not be very numerous, and a number of mistakes made by me in previous publications are here corrected. Thanks are due to Mr. R. B. Lacey, from whose excellent "Municipal Register" I have made frequent quotations, to the Standard Association for the use of their files, and to all others who have kindly assisted me. If the article is found to be of service to the community, I shall feel well repaid for the time spent in its preparation.

THE PAUGUSSET OR GOLDEN HILL INDIANS.

The Indians found in this vicinity by the first white settlers called themselves the Paugussets. Their neighbors upon the east were the Quinnipiacs, of New Haven; on the west the Uncawas, of Fairfield; and upon the north the Potatucks, of Newtown and Woodbury. Their acquaintance with the English began in the summer of 1637, when the latter, under command of Capt. Mason and Lieut. Davenport, surrounded Sisco Swamp, in Fairfield, and killed or captured the remnant of the fierce Pequot tribe who had taken refuge there. From passages in the early records of the colony, it would appear that a fine or tribute was imposed upon the Indians of this vicinity for having harbored the Pequots.

In 1639 settlements were begun by the English at Stratford and at Fairfield. So far as known, the planters in every case purchased the land from the Indians, and upon the records of these two towns may still be seen particulars of many such transactions. The terms "old field," and "old Indian field," frequently occurring in these records, are believed to refer to land which had been cleared by the Indians for cultivation before the arrival of the whites. These tracts were large,—a fact that would indicate that the Indians depended to a greater extent upon agriculture for their support than has generally been supposed.

The relations between the English and their wild neighbors at this early day are clearly shown by the orders passed by the General Court. It was forbidden to sell to an Indian, arms, ammunition, or liquor of any kind, or horses, or boats. Sachems were made answerable for the conduct of their tribes. Indians were forbidden by law to enter the houses of the settlers, or to handle their fire-arms or other weapons, under penalty of a fine for disobedience, or retaliation in kind if any loss of life or limb was occasioned by their carelessness. It was not allowable for more than two or three Indians to come into a settlement together, and, in any case, they were to leave their weapons behind them; and if found prowling around the dwellings of the settlers after dark, it was lawful to shoot them.

At the same time they were treated, in the main, fairly. Injuries to them in person or property were severely punished, and some attempts to Christianize them were made. The General Court passed resolutions instructing the Governor and other magistrates to endeavor to convey through suitable interpreters some knowledge of God and his word to "those poore lost, naked sonnes of Adam," and ordered that at least twice in every year a teaching elder and an interpreter should go among them and "endeavor to make known to them the counsels of the Lord." John Blackleach, Sr., who kept the ferry over the Housatonic River between Stratford and Milford, deserves honorable mention in this connection. In 1669 he petitioned to be allowed to make known to the Indians, as he should have opportunity, "something of the knowledge of God." The General Court granted his request, and expressed the hope that the divine blessing might accompany his labors. That at least a portion of them were in the habit of attending church is evident from a vote passed at an early date in Stratford forbidding the Indians to enter the meeting-house during the prevalence of a contagious disease,—perhaps the smallpox, then raging among them.

The colonial records clearly show, however, that they were always regarded by the whites as dangerous neighbors. It was early enacted that, to prevent sudden attacks upon the Sabbath or lecture days, one from each household should come to meeting fully armed and equipped,—a custom which had not entirely fallen into disuse in 1695, when the First Church of this city was gathered.

During the prolonged contest with the Eastern Indians known as Philip's War, great anxiety was felt throughout the colony. The Governor and Assistants, in session at Hartford, July 1, 1675, caused orders to be sent to all the western plantations to put themselves in a state of defense, and a little later, "from a deep sense of the eminent danger" impending, instructed them to provide places of refuge to which the women and children and other non-combatants might repair in case of assault. It was also ordered that strong guards be stationed in each town from twilight to sunrise, and that all males between the ages of sixteen and seventy, excepting magistrates, ministers, millers, physicians, and schoolmasters, should do their share of guard and other military duty. Patrols were to be sent out every day to keep open communication between the towns, and exposed frontier settlements were broken up for the time and their inhabitants counseled to return to places of greater security. All persons working in the fields were to go and come in companies of not less than six, especially if necessity called them to go more than half a mile from the settlement. In Stratford a vote was passed to prevent false alarms and needless waste of ammunition. It is dated Aug. 8, 1675, and reads as follows: "Voted: That there shall be no gun shot off in the town-plot, or within the field, or upon the common road to Fairfield, upon any occasion whatsoever, except upon defense or occasion against the enemy, under penalty of five shillings for every gun. This order to stand during the present trouble with the Indians." A similar order was issued by the colonial government Sept. 3, 1675.

In the same year Richard Hubbell, Sr., of Stratford, being indebted to the town of Fairfield to the amount of sixteen pounds, the balance due for a tract of land purchased from the town, was ordered, in lieu of the cash, to turn into the public "magazine" eight hundredweight of lead, to be used in casting bullets.

The whole colony was, in fact, placed for a time under martial law; but, happily, the precautions taken were so successful that even if an outbreak was meditated by the Connecticut Indians, none took place, nor were any of the frontier settlements sacked by the enemy.

In 1659, twenty years after the first settlement, the General Court granted the request of the Indians that Golden Hill might be set apart for them as a permanent dwelling-place, and instructed Mr. Canfield, Mr. Fitch, Richard Olmstead, and Nathaniel Ely, of Norwalk, to lay out eighty acres for them upon said Golden Hill, "beginning at y^e foot of y^e hill where y^e Wigwams stood, and so to run upward on the hill." As part of the Indians who were removed to the reservation were from Fairfield, and as the reservation was wholly in Stratford limits, the committee awarded damages to the latter place as follows: "Fairfield men shall pay to Stratford, for the 80 acres of land that the Indians do possess at Pequannock, twenty pounds, to be paid in beef, pork, wheat, and peas; 2 barrels of beef, 2 barrels of pork, good and merchantable, which we value at £12, and £8 to be paid in wheat and peas: wheat 4s. 6d. the bushel, peas 3s. 6d. the bushel.

"May 2, 1660."*

Although at present real estate is not very active, eighty acres upon Golden Hill would be considered a bargain at the price specified in this appraisal. The Indians also agreed with Stratford to keep up a fence, so that the swine of either party might not "damniſy" the growing crops of the other.

After the year 1659, when their land was set off to them, these Indians were commonly known as the Golden Hill tribe, from the name of their reservation.

* Conn. Rec., 1, 345, 348; Stratford Rec., 1, 249, 250.

In the summer of 1725 the shepherd of the town flock in Stratford was set upon by a number of Indians engaged in a drunken carousal, his face painted, his body stamped upon until he was breathless, when he was "buried as dead." The manner in which the charge is made, however, implies his subsequent resuscitation, and it is probable that Newtown and New Milford Indians, and not those living upon Golden Hill, were guilty of the outrage. About the same time David Lane, infant son of Alexander Lane, of Stratford, was thought to have been murdered, and two Indians, bearing the euphonic names of Shillings and Chops, were tried for the crime before the Superior Court at Fairfield, Aug. 30, 1726, but were acquitted. An entry upon the Stratford records shows that it was finally determined that the child was accidentally drowned.

A few years later occurred an incident which the late Deacon David Sherwood was fond of relating as illustrating the uncommon physical strength of his grandfather, John Sherwood, captain of the train-band and the founder and first elder of the Stratfield Baptist Church. On a certain training-day, among the spectators present was a party of Indians from the reservation on Golden Hill, who had been behaving rather insolently, and one of them, a burly, athletic fellow, finally challenged the whites to choose their best man and he would defeat him in a wrestling-match. None of the spectators, sturdy farmers though they were, felt able to cope with the Indian athlete, whose muscular frame plainly showed him to be a very formidable antagonist; yet all felt it to be important that his challenge should be accepted, and that he should be defeated, for the sake of the effect upon the other savages. After some deliberation it was decided that Capt. Sherwood was the only man capable of vanquishing him, but doubts were expressed whether he would be willing to engage in a wrestling-match now that he had become so active in religious matters. A deputation came to him as he was drilling his men upon the parade-ground, and after hearing their story he briefly answered that his present duty was to drill his company, but that afterwards he would attend to the matter. Accordingly, when the parade was over and he had laid aside his regimentals, he approached the Indian champion, who was naked to the waist and shining with grease, so that it would have been difficult for another man to lay hold of him. But, bringing his right hand down upon the shoulder of the astonished savage, Elder Sherwood crumpled it up in his vise-like grasp, and then, throwing his left arm around him, he gave him such a hug and mighty fall as to leave him almost senseless upon the field, while the air rang with the plaudits of the spectators.

At some date unknown, but probably about the year 1700, the Golden Hill Indians sold half their reservation to Samuel Hawley, of Stratford. Mr. Hawley subsequently conveyed one-half his purchase to Richard Blackleach, the phraseology of the deed, omitting legal verbiage, being as follows:

"Know all men By this presents that I Sam^l Haley, of Stratford In the county of fairfield and colony of Connecticut, have sold, alienated & confirmed, and Do by this presents sell alienate set over and confirm unto Mr Richard Blackledge of Stratford and his heirs &c the Juste & Equal halfe of a tract of Land which I have Bought of the Indians [Indian] proprietors.

Witness my hand and seal this 5th day of June 1706 Seal.

"SAM^l HALEY SEER. □"

This deed was witnessed by Jacob Walker, and was duly acknowledged before Justice Matthew Sherwood, but was not recorded until May 3, 1710. The amount of the valuable consideration paid for forty acres of land on Golden Hill is not stated, but, ten months afterwards, Mr. Blackleach sold sixteen acres in the same locality to Benjamin Fayerweather for the sum of thirty-two pounds in provisions at market rates. The essential portions of the deed, abbreviating as before, are as follows:

"Know all men pr. this presents that I Richard Blackledge Sr. for a valuable consideration to mee in hand already contented & paid pr. Benj fayerweather of fairfield Do pr. these presents sell alinate, set over & confirm to the sd Benja. fayerweather his heirs &c. for ever; sixteen acres of land, bee it more or less, situate within the limits of Stratford on Godding hill, commonly soe called; & is the one halfe of a parcell of Land that Sam^l Haley Bought of the Indians Belonging to said godding hill, except a small parcell that lies on the south side of the high way that runs across sd Hill now In the occupation of Elizer fayerhull containing about three acres. "witness my hand & seal this first day of April 1701. The valuable consideration above was thirty two pounds In pay Seal.

"RICHARD BLACKLEACH □"

This deed was witnessed by Samuel Hubbell and John Edwards and acknowledged before Justice James Bennett, and was put on record May 15, 1710.

About the year 1760, the Golden Hill Indians having become much reduced in numbers by death and by removal, the neighboring white proprietors began to encroach upon their reservation and to tear down the unoccupied wigwams. Three of the Indians, named respectively John, Eunice, and Sarah Shoran or Sherman, petitioned the Legislature for redress. The matter was investigated, and became the subject of litigation, which resulted, in 1765, in an order for the parties who had encroached upon the Indians to vacate the premises and restore the land they had unlawfully occupied. A compromise was, however, finally effected, by which the Indians gave up all right and title to their Golden Hill property, receiving in exchange twelve acres of land on the west bank of the Pequonnock River, eight acres of woodland on Rocky Hill, thirty bushels of corn, and three pounds' worth of blankets. The tract upon the river to which they removed was afterwards known as the "Indian Lot," and was upon the eastern side of Main Street, not far from the junction of Washington Avenue. Within the recollection of men now living an Indian wigwam stood upon this lot. A clear spring of water in the same vicinity was also known as the "Indian Spring." The Rocky Hill tract was north of the present reservoir.

In the manuscript records of the proceedings of the General Assembly at Hartford are a preamble and resolution showing, like the incident just mentioned, that, however unjustly the Indians may have been treated by unworthy individuals among the whites, the Legislature of Connecticut was ready to redress their wrongs. Following is the text of the preamble and act referred to:

"Upon complaint of Aaron Hawley, of Hartford, relative to certain abuses and injuries done to Tom and Eunice and other Indians of Golden Hill, in said Stratford, a committee were appointed by the Assembly to examine into the subject-matter of said complaint and report make; which said committee having reported to this Assembly.

"Resolved by this Assembly, That the accounts of Daniel Morris, of said Stratford, late guardian of said Indians, have been overcharged, as exhibited annually to the judge of Probate, and that the credits for the use of their land fall much short of their real value; and for a full settlement of all affairs of said Indians, said guardian, Daniel Morris, do pay and satisfy to said Indians the sum of £36 15s. lawful money and the costs of the suit, and that execution issue accordingly.

"Costs taxed and allowed at £25 6s. 3½d.

"Execution granted Oct. 31, 1783."

The successors of Daniel Morris as guardians of the Golden Hill Indians have all been men of high standing in the community, who have taken an interest in their welfare and carefully managed their affairs. The record does not show the date of their appointment, but their names, beginning with the century and coming down to the present time, are as follows: Josiah Lacey, Elijah Burritt, Smith Tweedy, Daniel O. Wheeler, Dwight Morris, Russell Tomlinson.

In 1802 the General Assembly in session at New Haven, upon petition of Thomas Sherman, Eunice Sherman, and others, called Golden Hill Indians, setting forth that their land was yielding but little income, directed their agent, Josiah Lacey, to sell both of the above-named tracts at public auction or otherwise, which was accordingly done, and the proceeds invested for their support.

In 1811, Ruby Mansfield and Nancy Sharp, alias Nancy Pease, petitioned the Legislature, alleging that they were the sole survivors of the tribe, and asking that a portion of the money in care of their agent, Smith Tweedy, be used to purchase a dwelling-house and sufficient land for their use and benefit. The Legislature by vote authorized Mr. Tweedy, with the advice and consent of the judge of Probate for the District of Bridgeport, to expend a sum not exceeding six hundred dollars for this object, and in November he purchased from Samuel Edwards about twenty acres of land, with a small house upon it, situated in Trumbull, at a place called Turkey Hill Meadow, where Ruby and Nancy took up their abode. Their statement, however, that they were the sole survivors of the tribe was not strictly accurate.

John Chops, who died in North Bridgeport in 1818, and whose name is perpetuated by the appellation of a hill upon which his wigwam stood, and William Sharp, a seafaring man, who is believed to have been sold into slavery at a South American port by his rascally captain, probably left no issue, but at the present writing (1880) there are still several families of these Indians remaining. William Sherman, the most intelligent of their number, lives in the town of Trumbull. He has for many years been in the employ of the Ambler family, by whom he is held in very high esteem for his many good qualities. His wife is a negro woman, and they have three or four children. Henry Pease, a nephew of William Sherman, is also a resident of Trumbull; he lost his hand a year or two since by the accidental discharge of a gun. There is also a family named Jackson, whose home is in North Stratford. So far as known to the writer, these are all the survivors of the Golden Hill branch of the once numerous Paugusset tribe.

At the present time their funds amount to about two thousand dollars, divided as follows:

Lent William Sherman to build a house.....	800

PEQUONNOCK OR STRATFIELD, FROM THE FIRST SETTLEMENT BY THE WHITES TO THE BEGINNING OF THE REVOLUTION.

FAIRFIELD and Stratford, as related elsewhere in this volume, were settled by the English in 1639.

Dr. Trumbull, in his "History of Connecticut," says that another settlement was begun the same year at Pequonock, in the western part of Stratford, near the boundary between the two plantations, and in this statement several passages in the colonial records would at first view seem to sustain him. Yet, upon further consideration, the question arises whether the word "Pequonock" in these passages is not loosely used as another name for Cupheag, or Stratford, and whether a number of years did not actually elapse before the fertile plains near the dividing-line between Fairfield and Stratford tempted a few families to locate upon them. Certainly it would be very strange if the first planters within our limits really waited for nearly forty years before setting up a school of their own, and for a much longer period before establishing public worship, considering the importance which we know that they attached to these institutions; yet this must have been the case if a settlement was begun here in 1639.

About the year 1653 a grist-mill is believed to have been built at the foot of what is now called Moody's Pond, near Mountain Grove Cemetery. Either Henry Jackson, of Fairfield, who had just sold the mill erected by him in 1648, or his son, Moses Jackson, was the builder.

In 1670 the land for some three-quarters of a mile west of the street now called Park Avenue was owned by ten families, who perhaps have as good a claim as any to be considered the original settlers.

Following is a list of their names, No. 1 being the one whose property was the farthest east, No. 2 coming next, and so on:

- | | |
|-----------------------|----------------------|
| 1, THE WIDOW WHEELER. | 6, ISAAC WHEELER. |
| 2, GOODMAN HALL. | 7, JAMES BENNETT. |
| 3, JOSEPH WHELLEY. | 8, MATTHEW SHERWOOD. |
| 4, JOHN ORRILL. | 9, RICHARD RUBLELL. |
| 5, SAMUEL TREADWELL. | 10, HENRY JACKSON. |

These people were the proprietors of "long lots,"—narrow strips of woodland only a few rods in width, but extending back into the forest for some six or eight miles. Even the front line or southern extremity of these lots we should now consider a long way back into the country, as it was about as far north as the present Stratfield Baptist Church. Where the houses of the owners stood cannot now be certainly determined, except in two or three instances. Most of them probably had their homes much farther southward than the locality mentioned, and perhaps some of them, though owning land here, never lived in Pequonock at all.

The word "Pequonock"—the name applied to the territory near where Park and North Avenues now intersect—is of Indian origin; it signifies "place of slaughter" or "place of destruction," and was perhaps given to the locality on account of some long-forgotten tragedy occurring among the aborigines. It still survives in the name of a street, in the title of one of our banks, and in that of the river upon which the city is built. In a petition dated May, 1694, the inhabitants asked that, as the place was upon the boundary-line of the towns of Fairfield and Stratford, belonging partly to each, the Indian name Pequonock might be changed to Fairfield,—a word whose composition is at a glance apparent. The General Court preferred that it should be called Fairfield Village, and so ordered; but in the following year the people changed this appellation to Stratfield, though the change was not legalized until 1701. The following order was passed by the Assembly at the May session in that year:

"This Assembly, having heard and considered the petition of the inhabitants of Fairfield village, presented to them by Lieut James Bennett desiring that the Court would state and settle for them a line for the west boundarye to their plantation, &c., doe order and enact. That the line to be the west boundarye of the said plantation shall run soe as that it may take in and include within their bounds, one Moses Jackson, miller, his housings and lands and run on the west side of old Jackson's lots (viz), pasture, building lot, and long lot, upwards or northwards to the upward or northern end of the bounds of the town of Fairfield, and that all such person or persons as have built or that shall build and inhabit on the east side of the abovesaid line, and on the west side of Pequonock River, shall pay to all publike charges that shall arise in the said plantation his rateable part thereof.

"Provided always. That this act shall in no wise hinder or abridge the inhabitants of the said plantation of using and hobbing the priviledge of feeding sheep to the westward of the abovesaid line, as it was granted to them formerly by the inhabitants of the town of Fairfield.

"And further it is enacted by the authority aforesaid: That the said plantation (formerly called Pequonock and Fairfield village) shall for the future be called by the name of Stratfield."

These limits were afterwards enlarged by an act passed by the General Assembly at New Haven in October, 1752.

The code of laws drawn up for Connecticut Colony by Roger Ludlow, the first settler of Fairfield, and deputy-governor of the colony, which was adopted by the General Court in the year 1650, contains this passage:

"It being one chief project of that old deluder Satan, to keepe men from the knowledge of the Scriptures, as in former times keeping them in an unknown tongue, so in these latter times by perswading them from the use of Tongues, so that at least the true sense and meaning of the original might bee clouded with false glosses of saint seeming deceivers; and that Learning may not bee buried in the Grave of our Forefathers in Church and Commonwealth, the Lord assisting our endeavors. It is therefore ordered that every Towneship within this Jurisdiction after the Lord hath increased them to the number of fifty householders, shall then forthwith appoint one within them. Towne to teach all such children as shall resort to him, to write and read, whose wages shall be paid either by the parents or masters of such children, or by the inhabitants in generall. . . . And it is further ordered, that where any Towne shall increase to the number of one hundred families or householders they shall set up a Grammar Schoole, the masters thereof being able to instruct youths so far as they may be fitted for the University."

There is abundant evidence to show that this law was not suffered to remain a dead letter upon the statute-book, and that the projects of the "old deluder" met with considerable opposition.

As early as 1650 it was voted by the inhabitants of Stratford in public meeting to pay the schoolmaster thirty-six pounds per annum,—a large sum considering the small size of the place and the greater relative value of money at that day,—the town to bear one-half the expense, and the parents of the children the balance.

So, also, the oldest document signed by the inhabitants of the plantation of Stratfield, as such, that I have been able to find, is a petition for a school, addressed to the General Court, dated May, 1678, and subscribed by Isaac Wheeler, John Odell, Sr., and Matthew Sherwood, in behalf of the people of the place. The distance of nearly four miles that separates them from Fairfield Centre is too great, they say, to be easily traversed by the children, especially the younger ones, and therefore they had set up a school of their own and employed an experienced teacher. Forty-seven children were already in attendance. The expense of the school they propose to bear themselves, but ask to be freed from taxation for the benefit of the one in Fairfield. Rev. Samuel Wakeman, minister at Fairfield, added a favorable indorsement to the petition, though most of his parishioners were opposed to granting it. The General Court referred the matter to the Fairfield County Court, with power to act, and recommended that body to make an allowance to the petitioners from the county revenues equal to or greater than their annual school-tax.

Ten years after the commencement of this school a young graduate of Harvard College, Charles Chauncey by name, son of Rev. Israel Chauncey, of Stratford, began to hold religious meetings in Pequonnock. These meetings were begun in the year 1688, as shown by a receipt or acquittance bearing Mr. Chauncey's signature, which may be seen upon the parish record-book, and they must have been held either in the school-house or in private dwellings, for no church had then been built. Though but twenty years of age, the preaching of the young divinity-student found favor, and in May, 1690, forty-six persons, the greater part of them residents of Pequonnock, petitioned the General Court to free them from paying taxes for the support of pulpit and school in Fairfield or in Stratford, as they purposed to maintain their own. Their petition, although acquiesced in by Stratford, was opposed by Fairfield, and the Court did not grant it.

Further petitioning followed, met by continued opposition on the part of Fairfield, whose representatives submitted a remonstrance containing twenty-four rather ill-natured "reasons why those of Pequonnock should not be discharged from paying anny of our town dews," but in the spring of 1694 liberty was finally obtained to embody as a separate parish. A formal call was immediately extended to Mr. Chauncey and accepted by him, and an annual salary of sixty pounds, payable in provisions at market rates, was voted him "for his encouragement in the work of the ministry."

The first meeting-house was a small building erected and roofed in, as we learn from one of the petitions to the General Court, in the summer of 1693. It stood upon a hill on the west side of Park Avenue, just south of Clark Street, a site commanding a fine view in every direction and not easily surprised by the Indians. The worshipers carried arms and were summoned to their devotions by a drummer,—a practice common in the colony, and alluded to in the following lines:

"New England's Sabbath-day
Is heaven-like, still, and pure;
Then Israel walks the way
Up to the temple door.
The time we tell
When there to come,
By beat of drum
Or sounding shell."

The church was formally organized and Mr. Chauncey was ordained, June 13, 1695. This is the same body which is now known as the First Congregational or North Church of Bridgeport. Upon the early records, however, it is not designated by any denominational title, but simply as "The Church of Christ in Stratfield." The original members were nine in number, all males,—viz., Richard Hubbell, Sr., Isaac Wheeler, Sr., James Bennett, Sr., Samuel Beardsley, Samuel Gregory, Sr., Matthew Sherman, Richard Hubbell, Jr., David Sherman, John Odell, Jr. Four weeks afterwards fifteen females were admitted to membership by letter,—nine from the church in Fairfield, and six from that in Stratford.

David Sherman was the first deacon. He was a farmer, and his home was on the summit of Toilsome Hill. Besides being gifted in prayer and taking the lead in religious services acceptably in the absence of the pastor, he was a good singer and acted as chorister, as shown by the following vote, passed Feb. 16, 1707-8: "Voted: That Thomas Hawley should second Ensigne Sherman in seting y^e psalm in publick." From another vote, passed in 1755, it appears that the collection of psalmody in use down to that time was the old "New England" or "Bay Psalm Book," copies of which are now very rare and command an enormous price. There is no mention in the records of the practice of lining out the psalm; but, as it was usual throughout New England, it may have prevailed here. The custom had its origin in the scarcity of books. Originally but one line was given out at a time for the congregation to sing, but it was found that coming to a full stop at the end of each line did not always improve the sense; as, for instance, in the following couplet:

"The Lord will come; and he will not Keep silence, but speak out."

Hence the practice of reading two lines at a time was introduced, and continued down to about the period of the Revolution.

Charles Chauncey, son of Rev. Israel, of Stratford, and grandson of President Chauncey, of Harvard College, was born at Stratford, Sept. 3, 1668; was graduated at Harvard in 1686, and commenced his labors in Pequonnock, as already mentioned, in 1688. March 18, 1689-90, he was made a freeman at Fairfield. He married, June 29, 1692, Sarah, daughter of

Col. John Burr, of Pequonnock, and in December of the same year the town of Fairfield granted him three acres of land, on the north side of his home lot, to descend to his heirs "if he dy in the ministry at Po-quonnock," but otherwise to revert to the town. The facts respecting his ordination have already been given. Mr. Chauncey's homestead was upon the street afterwards called Cooke's Lane and Grove Street, not very far from the present terminus of the horse-railroad in Fairfield Avenue. His first wife died in 1697. His second wife, Sarah, daughter of Henry Wolcott, and sister of Roger Wolcott, Governor of Connecticut, died Jan. 5, 1703-4, and on March 14, 1719, he married Elizabeth Sherwood, who outlived him. Mr. Chauncey died Dec. 31, 1714, "aged 48 years," says his tombstone, which may still be seen near the southwest corner of the old Stratfield burying-ground. Following is an extract from his will:

"To my wife, Elizabeth, £10 yearly from my estate at Lambeth, England; which estate came to me from my father, Israel. To my son Israel the balance of the estate at Lambeth, he paying the said £10. To my son John the homestead at Stratford. To my sons Robert and Ichabod Wolcott all my estate in Stratfield, slaves, &c. To my daughter Abiah, now wife of Rev. Timothy Cutler, of Stratford, successor of Israel my father, £40."

The number of children baptized by Mr. Chauncey in his own parish from June, 1695, until his death, in December, 1714, was four hundred and forty-four. During the same time ninety-seven adults were admitted to full communion, besides many others received under "the half-way covenant." No register of deaths appears upon the church records, and the list of marriages is incomplete. Commodore Isaac Chauncey, born at Black Rock in 1772, a distinguished naval commander in the war of 1812, was his great-grandson.

One of Mr. Chauncey's parishioners was Samuel Hubbell, the recorder, who died in 1714, leaving a large estate. The inventory of his effects upon the Fairfield Probate records is a voluminous document, well worth reading, but hardly of sufficient importance to copy in full here. A few extracts from it, however, will show what articles composed the wearing-apparel, weapons of war, and library of a wealthy man at that day:

All local affairs were settled in parish meetings, usually held in the school-house at the hour of sundown. The legal way of warning meetings was by posting three notices,—one at or near the meeting-house, one at Deacon David Sherman's corner, on Toilsome Hill, and a third upon an old white-oak tree which used to stand upon the boundary-line between Fairfield and Stratford. The officers appointed at these meetings were selectmen, school committee, sheep-masters, collectors, a treasurer, a constable, and a recorder. The selectmen laid the tax, the collectors gathered it, and the treasurer paid it out for the support of pulpit and school. The sheep-masters had charge of the town flock, concerning which more presently. The constable's duty, besides "putting forth pursuits or Hue and cries, after thieves, burglarians, profane swearers, and Sabbath-breakers," was "to warn those that frequented taverns and spent their time idly there," and to look after the boys in time of public worship. The recorder, or society's clerk, was one of the most important officers in the parish. Samuel Hubbell filled the place until his death, in 1714, when he was succeeded by John Burr, who was followed in 1720 by Deacon Lemuel Sherwood, at whose decease, in 1732, Daniel Hubbell took the office.

The original record-book, though much dilapidated, is still in existence, and perhaps in no way can so good an idea of life in Stratfield at that early day be obtained as by making some extracts from its pages, and, with the exception of a few words of explanation, suffering them to tell their own story:

EXTRACTS FROM PARISH RECORDS.

"The Records of the Acts of fairfield vilag, Beegun in the yer 1693-4.

"It was then voted per the s^d. Society that Mr. Charles Chauncey, for his Incouragement In the ministry shall Have Sixty pounds in good provisions for the yr. Insuing, to bee paid Him By way of Kate, Each man according to the Liste of his Estate given In."

Mr. Chauncey's salary was afterwards raised to eighty pounds, and was paid in provisions at market rates, which were about as follows: Wheat, 5s. per bushel; Indian corn and rye, 3s. per bushel; pork, 3½d. per pound. He was also annually supplied with fifty or sixty loads of firewood, worth about ten pounds more, one-fourth of it being of good hickory, the remainder oak.

The votes which follow relate to the custom of calling the people to church by beat of drum, of which mention has already been made. It will be seen that the drummer marched around the meeting-house so as to give the settlers on every side the full benefit of the summons:

1699, September: "Voted to give James Bonit His rate to Mr. Chauncey for beating the drume on publick days."

1710, Dec. 22: "Voted that the Select men shall agree with a man to Sweep the meeting-house & Beat the Drume on Sabath days, but not to give above 40 s. pr. yer."

1715, July, 17: "Voted that the Drum shall bee batten round the meeting hous on Sabath Days."

About seven years after the meeting-house was built, an effort was made to render it more comfortable. New seats, and iron window-casements with panes of glass, were among the improvements made. Before that time it is possible that oiled paper had been used in the windows as a substitute for glass. Following are some of the votes in relation to the matter:

1699, Oct. 30. "Voted that the Society wold bee at the Charg of new seating the meeting house

"Voted to pay a Rate of one penny in the pound towards the Seating of said Meeting house and other Charges."

1700, April 1. "Voted that the Society wold have the meeting house Seated with wainsot work."

1701, April 28. "It was then voted by this Society that the same Comittly which was ap^ynted to hiee a man to make the seats for the meeting house shall have the same power to hiee workemen to make Iron Casements for the meeting house and glaze them as is needful."

The iron casements must have rattled, and the teeth of the worshippers chattered, when the January blasts swept over the hilltop upon which the meeting-house stood, for fires were a luxury unknown in the early Puritan meeting-houses. The zeal of the hearer and his interest in the sermon were supposed to be sufficient to make him oblivious to trifling discomforts.

How the boys were cared for in time of service is shown by entries like the following. The constable, with his staff of office, must have been an awe-inspiring personage, but less so than his successor, Noah Morehouse, who was the village gravedigger, and used to receive three shillings for digging large, or two shillings and sixpence for small, graves. An unfortunate boy in his grasp must have experienced about the same sensations that Ichabod Crane did when pursued by the headless horseman of Sleepy Hollow:

1712, Oct. 8: "Noah Morehouse Is Chosen to whip boys on Sabath days."

1723, Sept. 17: "Voted that Thomas Chambers shall seee In y^e West Gallery to look after y^e boyes on Sabbath dayes to keep them in Good order. Also voted that John Hubble shall seee in y^e front Gallery to look after y^e boyes on y^e Sabath dayes to keep them in good order for the year Insuing."

1723, Dec. 19: "Voted that Nathaniel Wackle should be the man to look after y^e boyes a sabath dayes in time of Exercise, that they play not."

But, however strict the discipline of the boys may have been, there is nothing to show that attendance upon public worship was ever made compulsory in Stratfield, nor do the records contain any instances of fine or imprisonment for non-attendance, as in some other places in New England.

As the reader will observe, the Stratfield records include a variety of matter, genealogical and commercial as well as ecclesiastical. Some of the former class are recorded with great minuteness. Witness the following:

"Benjamin (?) fayrewether was married unto Sarah Wheeler (date illegible).

"Their daughter Katherine born wensday morning, March 3, 1693-94.

"Hannah, born munday Evening December 28th, 1696.

Not less minute than this list of births is the record of deaths upon the church register, in the beautifully clear handwriting of Rev. Samuel Cooke, Mr. Chauncey's successor, a few extracts from which are annexed :

Sheep-raising was an industry of some importance in Stratfield. The sheep were of the old long-legged breed, and were pastured on land owned in common, or upon the highway, and at night folded together by a man hired by the town for that purpose. Madam Knight in her "Journey from Boston to New York in 1704" alludes to this practice. Rev. Samuel Cooke, besides being the spiritual shepherd of Stratfield, was at one time one of the owners of the town-flock.

"1706, Februry. At a meeting of the proprietors of the Sheepe in Stratfield it was then voted that the Sheepe shall bee Lett at Sharmon's corner or near there about. Voted that Saml. Hubbell, Richard Hubbell & Sam^l Sumers Bee Sheepe masters to order the prudentials of the flock for the yer Insuing. Voted that the Sheepe masters shall Have power to hie men to clear the Comons for the advantige of the flock & to pay the Charges from the Sheepe money."

1709, March 28: "James Hubbell agrees with the sheepmasters to keep the flock from March 29th until the time of taking up the sheep at Mickelmas for 3s. per day in provision pay, or 2s. 6d. if he has a boy to help him."

1723, Dec. 24: "Voted that the Sheep shall bee Lett at the School Hous for the year Insuing. Voted that they that do not bring in the number of their Sheep by ye middle of Jeneary shall loose their money."

Horses were branded not only upon the shoulder, but upon the ear, every owner having his own private mark, which was registered as carefully as trade-marks are at the present day.

Several pages upon the record-book are filled with the particulars of sales and exchanges like the following:

1701, August: "Saml. whelers marke is a smale forke on the ner ear and a neck under it, and a halfe peny under the oil er."

1703: "Daubers Hall sold to John the frenchman at Millford one horse, Darke browne marked with 3 halfpennys under the oil er, slit in the ner ear, Branded on the ner sholder: sd horse was sold to said french man for —."

The price paid by John the Frenchman for his horse is destined apparently to remain, like the authorship of Junius' Letters or the identity of the Man with the Iron Mask, one of the unsolved problems of history, the concluding words of the paragraph having become, through age and much handling, wholly illegible.

1702, Dec. 18. "Daniell Bardsley sold Joseph Benit a Dun horse, with a Large Star in the forehead, Branded X on the ner shoulder, and two half-pennys on the under side of the near ear."

1702, Dec. 18. "Joseph Benit Sold Daniell Bardsly one hors; Dark Browne with a bald face and four white feet with a forke on the ner ear and a halfe peny on the off ear on the under side, about 7 years old."

April 5, 1703: "Sam^l french sold James Hubbell one horse, black with Abell Bingham's care mark, 2 yr old, for the same of 3 sheep and 2 Lambs."

Jan. 2, 1705: "Jonathan Taylor exchanged a roneish mare y^s was formerly Edward Lacy^s having a blaze down ye face, marked with aslit down ye near care & half penny on ye foreside of ye off ear, and branded with F on ye near sholder with Benj. Fayerweather for a Bay mare with a blaze down ye face, a wall eye two white feet behind.

"Present at ye exchange Jno. Sealy, Math. Sharwood Jun^r."

"The under ritten being Desired to apposa a black mare that was taken up in the Woods above fairfield by Saml. hall, being about ten ye^r old, hath a Star in the forad, marked with a half penny under the ner Ere, with Colchester brand & M. "SAM. OUEL"

Here is an entry which seems to indicate the existence of something like a guild or trade union among the storekeepers of the place,—hardly very numerous I imagine, though "majority of merchants in Stratfield" certainly has an imposing sound. The votes which follow show that keeping tavern without a license was not permitted:

1706-7 March (?) 21st: "Mr Jos^s Bennitt of Stratfield having payd full satisfaction to the Majority of Merchants in Stratfield for his trading in said place as a Merchant, the said Society acknowledges the same & allow him to enter on ye records of Stratfield Joseph Bennitt Merchant.

1713, Sept. 23: "Voted that the widow hubbell shall be tavern ceper for this yer."

1715, July 17: "Mr. Ben fairwether alsoe coseu [chosen] tarven ceper for the yer in suing."

After the death of Mr. Chauncey, Stratfield Society extended a call to Rev. Samuel Cooke to become their pastor. Mr. Cooke accepted, promising to serve them in the ministry for life if they would cheerfully and unanimously agree to pay him one hundred pounds per annum in current money, or in provisions at the following rates: Indian corn, 2s.; rye, 2s. 8d.; wheat, 4s. per bushel; pork, 20d. per hundred.

A vote had previously been passed to repair the meeting-house, but nothing had been done. Immediately after Mr. Cooke's acceptance of the call vigorous measures were taken in this direction:

1715, July 17: "John Burr, Benj. fairwether then added a Com^{tee} unto Capt. John Barsley, Mr. Jaems Benitt, & Richard hubbell to git the galerey finched and to sue Sam^l franch for not performin of his obligation which he gaive to finish the galerey."

1715, December: "Richard hubbell, thomas hally, Jaems Sely chosen Com^{tee} to Consult some Cafendurs for the In Largment of the meting hous."

The "Cafendurs" seem to have given it up as a hopeless case, and a new meeting-house, near what is now the northwest corner of Park and North Avenues, was decided upon:

1716, November: "Voted that the plas for the sating of a new meting hous, if they shall afterward agree to bild one, shall be nere the Corner of Joseph Trobige's orchard Lot, Deceased, on the norwest sid the road, between that and the wedow Sharmans, Deceased.

"Also voted, same meting, that thay will bild a nue meting hous of the following dimenchaus: 22 feet between joynts, 48 feet long, 38 feet wide, a long roof. Cost not to exceed £250."

1716-17, March 11: "Voted that thay shall be sow much Rume Laft in the Nue meting hous for pnes as the Com^{tee} shall judge best. Also Agreed that the Com^{tee} is impoured to lay out the bove sd. pnes, and say hoe shall have them."

Col. John Burr and the family of Rev. Mr. Cooke were the first to occupy pews. The remainder of the congregation were assigned seats annually, according to the social position of each, by a committee chosen for the purpose,—an unchristian custom long prevalent in Connecticut.

1717, Dec. 30: "Voted that the Nue meting hous shall be sated by Dignety Adge and a State [Estate] by the presant List.

"Also Voted that David Sharmen, Richard hubbell, John odell, Sam^l Sharword, John Burr, shall be a Com^{tee} to Sate y^e meting hous, and have power to Sate from time to time as thay see reason."

1723, Dec. 24: "Voted that Mr. Edwards shall Have Liberty to build a little House somewhere near y^e meeting house."

This must have been one of the Sabbath-day houses, common throughout the colony,—small buildings divided into two apartments, one for either sex, with ample fireplaces, around which those members of the congregation who came from a distance gathered during intermission and partook of refreshments, discussing the while theology, or sometimes perhaps more worldly topics.

1725-26, March 17: "Voted that they will have a bell for the meeting House att the Charge of the Society. Also voted that Sear. Samuel Gregory, John Hall, And David Sherman Jun^r shall be a Committee to agree with Mr. Lucas for said bell."

Apparently, the committee and Mr. Lucas failed to agree, and no bell was purchased at this time.

In 1770 a tall steeple was built at the west end of the church, paid for partly by subscription, partly by tax. In March, 1774, another committee was appointed to take up subscriptions for a bell, and on September 12th of the same year, the bell having been hung, it was voted to ring it not only on Sundays, but at noon and nine o'clock P.M., on other days.

It seems likely that the bell was speedily cracked, whether by ordinary use or by excess of patriotic zeal, for on Nov. 1, 1775, it was voted to have it taken down and run over.*

Brief mention has already been made of the Rev. Samuel Cooke, who succeeded Mr. Chauncey as pastor of the Stratfield Church. Mr. Cooke was born in Guilford, Nov. 22, 1687, and was graduated at Yale in 1705. He married, Nov. 30, 1708, Miss Anne Trowbridge, of New Haven. In October, 1712, and for three years following, he was elected deputy or representative from New Haven, and by the Assembly at each session was chosen clerk. His pastorate in Stratfield began in June, 1715, and continued until his death, Dec. 2, 1747,—a period of thirty-two years.

Mr. Cooke was a man of much dignity, and in public always appeared in full ministerial costume,—a heavy curled wig, black coat and small-clothes, shoes fastened with silver buckles, and over all a large cloak or gown. His homestead fronted upon the street long called by his name,—Cooke's Lane, more recently Grove Street, not far from the Roman Catholic cemetery. It was three times invaded by death. His second wife was Widow Esther Sloss, nee Burr; his third, Elizabeth, daughter of Joseph Platt; and his fourth, Abigail, widow of Rev. Joseph Moss, of Derby.

There is a certain pathos in the entry in which he excuses his failure to attend to the church records for a long period: "Whoever shall succeed me in the ministry here, let him not neglect the records of baptism, etc., as through multiplied troubles and sorrows I have done for many years past, of which I can only say that I suppose all the white children belonging to this place, born from the beginning of the year 1719 to July, 1731, were baptized, excepting David Jackson's. A particular account I hope will follow afterwards."

Mr. Cooke in his later years suffered also from the depreciation of the currency in which his salary was paid, old-tenor bills, worth hardly one-fifth of their face. His executors brought suit against the parish and recovered heavy damages, which the Legislature confirmed. His successor in the ministry here was Rev. Lyman Hall, some account of whom will be found in the next chapter.

Mr. Hall was in turn followed by the Rev. Robert Ross, who became pastor of the Stratfield Church Nov. 28, 1753, and remained over it for more than forty-two years. A remarkable occurrence took place during his ministry. The people had assembled for worship on the morning of Sunday, July 28, 1771. A thunder-shower was gathering, but the services went on as usual, until the congregation rose and remained standing while the minister led them in prayer. The room grew darker and darker as the heavy clouds rolled up, while the distant muttering of the thunder showed that a fearful storm was impending. The form of the pastor at length became almost invisible in the deepening gloom, but still he prayed on. Suddenly a dazzling glare of light filled the room, revealing in its swift passage the pale faces of the startled worshipers. The crashing peal of thunder which followed drowned the voice of the speaker, and he paused breathless. When the last echo of the thunder had died away, and the people were again left in darkness, there was an interval of awful expectancy. At length a solemn voice from the pulpit broke the stillness with the words, "Are we all here?" For a moment no one could answer, but as the congregation moved out and left the church, it was found that two of the most respected citizens had been taken in an instant from the house of God below, into the nobler house not made with hands, above. They were two of the best men in the little congregation,—Lieut. David Sherman and Capt. John Burr,—both of them in full health and in the prime of life. The former lived on Park Avenue, half a mile above North Avenue; the latter upon the corner of North and Clinton Avenues. The society voted to repair the damage done to the steeple by the lightning, and to put up a lightning-rod, then a new invention.

No particulars respecting the first school-house or its teachers have been preserved. A second one was built in 1703, as shown by the following vote:

Sept. 20, 1703: "Pr. the inhabitants of Stratfield then voted that Stratfield wold bee at the Charge of building a Schoollhouse sixteen foot Wide and 21 feet Long. Voted that the Schoolehouse should bee sett near the whit oak boundre, between that and the run of water that comes out of Capt. Sharwood's pasture."

Where Capt. Sherwood's pasture was, the present writer does not know. The white-oak tree referred to was on the boundary-line between Stratford and Fairfield, and was used as a public sign-post. Probably the schoolhouse stood near the junction of Park Avenue and Pequonock Street, not far from the site of the present one in "Old South" district.

In 1710, William Rogers was the schoolmaster, and his agreement with the school committee, Samuel Hubbell and Benjamin Fayerweather, is still extant:

"The said William Rogers, Schoolmaster of the said Plantation, is to keep a Reading and writing School in the said Plantation, to teach the children & Youth to Read, write, & cypher, the terme and time of Six months, commencing on the first day of the Instant Janry (1710). And if said Rogers shall be wanting in said six months, he is to keep a night school,—viz., five nights every week (unto) the Tenth day of March next, and the said Plantation is to pay to (said) Rogers the sum of Nineteen pounds as Provision pay, and the remainder as hath been paid to other Schoolmasters, to be judged by the Treasurer of the place, at or before the first day of April next."

John Wheeler, born March, 1709–10, died Sept. 26, 1799, taught school for many years. His compensation for teaching a summer school, in the year 1736, was sixty-three pounds, but the currency was then depreciated. "Master" Wheeler, as he was always called, was held in universal esteem. He was the son of Dr. John Wheeler, the village physician, and married Dorothy, one of the nine daughters of Deacon David Sherman, and after the death of his father-in-law resided in the house built by the latter upon the top of Toilsome Hill. This was "a large two-story edifice built in the best style of the day, with long sloping roof, high porch in front, and windows of diamond glass set in lead sashes. The children of Master Wheeler were three, all daughters,—viz., Dolly, Eunice, and Drusilla, the latter the wife of Abijah Beardsley, a Revolutionary soldier."

The time when the school in Toilsome District was established, is fixed by an entry on the society's record-book dated Dec. 20, 1738:

"Voted that this Society will have two schools, one where it has been formerly kept and the other at Toilsome hill."

A third school was established in 1754 "at or near the upper end of Sport Hill, so called;" but this must have been discontinued, for in 1766 the following votes were passed. The spelling would seem to indicate that additional school privileges were not unnecessary:

1766, Dec. 12: "Voted that the Society will have a third School in the Society this year. Voted that the third School Shall be kept at the Little house in the first Cross highway, near Nathaniel Seeley's."

1766, Dec. 23: "Voted that the Society will divid themselves in to proper and necessary Distrects for Keeping thoir Schools. Voted that Sam^l Sherwood, Benjaⁿ Wheeler, and Sam^l Sherwood the 3d, be a comtee for that purpos."

The committee reported a fortnight later, advising the formation of three districts, the boundary between the lower and middle ones to be "the highway southward of Elnathan Sherman's house,"—perhaps the one now known as Lincoln Avenue, a little above Beach's Woods. All the territory below this line was to be the South District,—a fact which explains the reason why the district in our present city limits extending farthest northward is known by the name of "Old South." The boundaries of these districts were afterwards slightly changed.

As early as the year 1707 services according to the form of the Protestant Episcopal Church were held in the parish of Stratfield. They were conducted by Rev. George Muirson, an agent of the English "Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts," stationed at Rye, N. Y., but at this time upon a missionary tour through western Connecticut. These services were held in a private house, as there was at that time no Episcopal church edifice in the colony. A few persons, mostly adults, were baptized.

The first missionary of this society settled in Fairfield County was the Rev. George Pigot, who in 1723 became stated pastor of the churches in Fairfield and Stratford, but in 1727 was transferred to Providence, R. I. He was succeeded by the Rev. Henry Camer, who was graduated at Yale College in 1724; studied theology with Dr. Samuel Johnson at Stratford; was ordained in England, and in 1727 appointed missionary at Fairfield. Mr. Camer preached in most of the towns in Fairfield County and founded the Episepiscopal Churches in Norwalk and Stamford. He also read the service occasionally in Stratfield in a private house. The University of Oxford conferred the degree of M.A. upon him in 1735, and in 1766 the additional title of D.D. After twenty years of faithful service in Fairfield and vicinity he was appointed, in 1747, rector of King's Chapel, Boston.

Mr. Caner's successor in Fairfield was the Rev. Joseph Lamson, a native of Stratford and a graduate of Yale College, who in 1741 sailed for Europe for ordination, but was taken prisoner by the French. His ministry in this vicinity lasted from 1747 until his death, in 1773. He usually preached in Stratfield every fourth Sunday.

In 1748 a church was erected here by his advice, the principal subscribers towards building it being Col. John Burr, John Holburton, Timothy Wheeler, Joseph Seeley, John Nichols, Richard Hall, and Samuel Beardsley. It was called St. John's church, and was located upon a common of about half an acre in extent upon the east side of "Church Lane," a little north of the old "King's Highway," and about a quarter of a mile west of the Congregational church, or, as we should now say, upon Wood Avenue, just above North Avenue. It is described as being a small wooden structure without a steeple or bell. "It had a pulpit, but no reading-desk; it was furnished with high-backed pews on either side, the body of the church being filled with slips. Seats were also provided for the colored people apart by themselves." Another account speaks of a steeple surmounted by a gilt weathercock, perhaps added afterwards. This church continued to be used until 1801, when it was torn down, and the congregation removed to a more commodious edifice on the site now occupied by the First Baptist church of Bridgeport.

A romantic story is told concerning the Rev. Mr. Lamson. Before entering the ministry, perhaps while still in college, he became engaged to Miss Abigail Ramsey, of Fairfield, a beautiful young girl of good family, only sixteen years of age. While on a visit to friends in Stratford, she was suddenly taken very ill, and it soon became evident that there was no hope of her recovery. Mr. Lamson was summoned to her bedside to bid her farewell, and before her death she directed that her gold beads—ornaments greatly prized at that day—should be taken from her neck and given to her lover. It is said that he wore them around his neck for many years afterwards. The remains of the young lady repose in the burying-ground at Stratford, and the stone above her grave bears this epitaph:

"Wasting sickness spoiled thy beautiful form,
And death assigned thee to thy kindred worm.
The day advances when the same shall rise
With sparkling glory, and ascend the skies."

Mr. Lamson afterwards married a Miss Wetmore, daughter of the Episcopal clergyman at Rye, N. Y. His successor in the ministry at Fairfield and as missionary of the Gospel Propagation Society was the Rev. John Sayre, who had previously been stationed at Newburg, N. Y. Mr. Sayre was a Royalist during the Revolution, and as such encountered considerable hostility. He was stationed in Fairfield from 1773 until 1779, and in the latter year, after having vainly endeavored to prevent the wanton destruction of Fairfield by British troops, he took the ill-advised step of embarking with them for New York, and never returned to the colony.

Respecting the persecutions said to have been inflicted upon the early churchmen by the Congregationalists in this vicinity, it may be proper to say here that statements of this kind, if not wholly without foundation, are certainly much exaggerated. By the colonial as well as by the English law every person was required to pay according to his ability for the support of public worship, and in default of payment was proceeded against in the same manner as for any other species of debt, but the principle of religious toleration was distinctly laid down by the General Court as early as 1669, and reaffirmed in 1708.*

At the May session, 1727, it was enacted that in every parish throughout the colony where worship according to the order of the Church of England was maintained by a resident clergyman, the entire tax collected from members of that denomination should be paid over to the Episcopal clergyman for his support. The members of the denomination were also allowed to tax themselves such further sum as they might elect. In Stratford and Fairfield the law went into immediate effect.

In Stratfield, there being no resident clergyman, the churchmen appear to have paid rates for the support of the established order down to the close of the year 1752. After that date their share of the tax was always paid over to them, as shown by numerous receipts like the following:

"STRATFIELD, May 8, 1755.

How Mr. Sayre's place was filled, is shown by the receipt which follows:

"JONATHAN SMITH,

Mr. Shelton was ordained in 1785 by Bishop Scarborough, and is believed to have been the first clergyman to receive episcopal ordination upon this side of the ocean. He continued to officiate as rector of St. John's Church until his resignation, at Easter, 1824. He died Feb. 27, 1825, in the seventy-first year of his age.

The third church organized in Stratfield was of the Baptist order, and was gathered in October, 1751. Most of the original members—ten in number—had been connected with the Congregational Church, but withdrew, I am inclined to think, on account of the troubles connected with the dismissal of Rev. Lyman Hall in June of the same year. It was "upon the second Sabbath of October, at the house of John Sherwood, of Stratfield,"—the same Capt. Sherwood whose encounter with the Indian has already been related,—that Elder Joshua Morse, of New London, at the close of the usual service, "proceeded and went on in the ordinance of baptism by plunging under water each particular person" composing the church,—viz., Zachariah Mead, Nathaniel Seeley, Eblim Marsh, John Sherwood, Ebenezer Sanford, Samuel Beardsley, Elizabeth Seeley, Mary Sherwood, Sarah Beardsley, and Martha Jennings. Previous to baptism each of the candidates came forward and "in the presence of a large assembly gave out a particular relation of the work of God upon his soul." After baptism they united in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Passages in their church covenant are very impressive. It commenced thus:

"O most dreadful God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, one God in three Persons, I give up myself, soul, body, and all that I have and am, to be Thine, and forever Thine, in everlasting covenant never to be forgotten. I entirely and unreservedly dedicate myself to Thee and Thy service, and, seeing no other way of reconciliation with the Father but in and through the Son, I come on the bonded knees of my soul unto the Lord Jesus Christ for justification, sanctification, and eternal redemption. . . .

"And now, O Sacred Majesty, omniscient and omnipresent God, in Thine awful presence and in the presence of angels and men I dedicate myself as thy dutiful servant and child (and by Thy grace in Jesus Christ I am Thy covenant child). And may what is done here upon earth this day be ratified in heaven. Amen."

The record goes on to state that at another meeting the members of the church "gave in their testimony concerning a minister, from which it evidently appeared that Brother John Sherwood was called to be a witness in the Gospel of Jesus Christ," and that upon the third Tuesday of December he was ordained and set apart to the work of the ministry by solemn prayer and fasting, elders and messengers from the baptized churches of New London and Groton being present by invitation.

Elder Sherwood is described as a man of large stature, of superior physical strength, and of no small degree of energy and firmness in carrying out his views of right and duty. His wife is said to have possessed remarkable gifts, both in exhortation and in prayer, so that frequently the people desired to hear her preach instead of her husband. At her death, in 1767, he resigned his office, and was succeeded by Rev. Benjamin Coles.

Elder Sherwood died Sept. 18, 1779, aged nearly seventy-four years.

CHAPTER IX.

BRIDGEPORT AND VICINITY IN THE REVOLUTION.

The Village of Stratfield one hundred Years ago—Military Companies—Petition for a Harbor Guard in 1777—The Guard established—Departure of Volunteers—Horror of Smallpox—Fairfield pillaged and burned by the British—Abduction of Gen. Silliman, and Capture of Judge Jones—Naval Services of Capt. David Hawley—Escape of David Matthews, the Tory Mayor of New York—Rev. Lyman Hall, a Signer of the Declaration of Independence—Partial List of Revolutionary Soldiers—Epitaphs from the old Cemeteries—Anecdotes of Gen. Washington.

It may seem rather presumptuous to speak of Bridgeport in connection with the Revolution, when, strictly speaking, one hundred years ago to-day there was no such place as Bridgeport in existence. This beautiful city, the third in the State in size, and, as we believe, second to none in many respects that make it desirable as a dwelling-place, was then not only unknown to fame, but the ground now occupied by the busiest streets and most stately warehouses was either overflowed by the rising tide or was, at best, but a dense morass; while Golden Hill, now crowned by so many spacious mansions, was only a craggy eminence surmounted by nothing more palatial than a few Indian wigwams. Fairfield and Stratford were indeed places of some importance, especially the former, which was a business centre, and for more than a hundred years had been the county and court town; but Bridgeport was as yet represented only by Stratfield, a plantation upon the western border of our present township, embracing some one hundred and fifty houses and a population of perhaps a thousand persons.

Let us for a few moments dismiss the present from our thoughts, and try to call up before us this settlement of Stratfield as it existed a hundred years ago. We find it rather a farming community than a com-fact village, and the houses are somewhat widely scattered, though most of them either front upon the old Boston stage road, now known as North Avenue, or else extend along Park Avenue to a point far up the slopes of Toilsome Hill. The houses themselves were of that antique type of which a few specimens yet remain,—unpainted and covered with clapboards of riven oak, with sloping roofs descending nearly to the ground in the rear, and windows of diamond glass set in leaden frames and swinging upon hinges. Frequently the upper story of the house overhung the lower, and in every case the only means for securing warmth and ventilation, especially the latter, was the immense fireplace in the great stone chimney, sometimes twelve feet square, which occupied the centre of the building.

As elsewhere throughout the colony, the people of this vicinity were almost entirely of English descent. The occupation of the men was either agriculture or seafaring, for, with the exception of the miller, the blacksmith, and the tanner,—important personages in every new community,—manufacturers and mechanics were almost unknown, everything required for use being either produced on the homestead or brought by exchange from foreign countries. Sheep-raising was a much more important branch of industry than at present, and broad fields of flax waved upon every farm. The spinning-wheel and the loom were indispensable articles of furniture, and with these the women of each family produced all the clothing and linen needed for the household. Negro slavery was common. Almost every family of means held one or more slaves, who were in general kindly treated, and were sometimes members of the same church with their owners.

Besides the churches and the school-house, which have already been described, the only other public building in Stratfield was the tavern kept by John Nichols, where, on week-days and in the evening, when the work of the day was done, the men used to assemble to talk politics or discuss the news of the day as obtained from some passing traveler, or read aloud from the columns of the Connecticut Journal and Post-Boy, a weekly newspaper published in New Haven. This tavern may still be seen on the western side of the parade-ground, not far from the cemetery. It is a building of antique style, but in such good repair that it can hardly look a day older than when Washington was entertained within its walls; and if preserved from fire and from the spirit of modern improvement, it bids fair to withstand the storms of still another century.

Political debate used sometimes to run high within its walls; as, for instance, on a certain evening, when among the company present were Rev. Mr. Ross, pastor of the Congregational church, and the village blacksmith, Nathan Bangs, whose two sons, Nathan and Heman, afterwards rose to such eminence in the Methodist denomination. Some doubts having been expressed as to whether the people of New England were prepared to make the sacrifices necessary to insure their country's independence, the sturdy blacksmith arose, and with flashing eye and a glowing countenance proclaimed that for his part he would not only be willing to shed his blood, but to endure the pains of perdition eternally, if by such a sacrifice he could set America free.

"It is a good thing to be zealous, Brother Bangs, but not too zealous," replied Parson Ross, who was perhaps a little scandalized at the vehemence of his parishioner; and, calling for his hat, the reverend gentleman took his departure.

It should not be inferred from this incident that Mr. Ross was indifferent to the issue of the contest. On the contrary, he was a strong Whig, and throughout the Revolution, in his public services never failed to pray for the success of the cause of independence. A sermon of his, preached about the commencement of the war, and afterwards printed, from the text, "For the divisions of Reuben there were great searchings of heart," had reference to the painful state of uncertainty in which many found themselves in regard to their future political action, and endeavored to remove it.

Stratfield possessed at this time one military company, the Stratfield Train-Band, which for nearly eighty years before the Revolution used to drill on the village parade-ground, a tract of common, still uninclosed, a short distance east of Mountain Grove Cemetery. It was organized in the year 1697, in obedience to the following order of the General Court:

"Ordered by this Court, that the soldiers inhabiting within the bounds of Stratford on the west side of Peponnack River, and those inhabiting within the bounds of Fairfield Village westward, be united together and exercised in one band and company, and Lieut. John Beersley to be their Lieut., and Ensign Isaac Wheeler to be their Ensign, and to be commissioned respectively."

Besides the Stratfield Train-Band, several other military companies and detachments were raised here during the Revolution. One of these was a company called the Householders, made up entirely of elderly men and designed for home defense. It was organized Aug. 13, 1776, with the following officers: Captain, Hezekiah Hubbell; lieutenants, James Hamilton and Stephen Burroughs; clerk, Joseph Strong. It was not disbanded until the close of the war.

Another company was the guard of about twenty-five men stationed on Stephen Burroughs' wharf at the foot of State Street. At that time Burroughs' wharf was the only landing-place for shipping in this harbor below the present Berkshire Bridge. Above the site of this bridge the depth of water used to be much greater than at present,—so much so that vessels designed for the foreign trade were built and launched where now a skiff could scarcely float. The design of this guard was to break up contraband traffic with the enemy, to hinder the Tories of Newtown and vicinity from communicating freely with their brethren ren on Long Island, and to protect the place from sudden attacks by marauding-parties from over the Sound.

Following is a copy of the petition for this guard, signed by fifty-seven patriotic individuals living near Newfield (now Bridgeport) Harbor. For convenience of reference the signatures are arranged alphabetically:

PETITION FOR HARBOR GUARD.

"The memorial of the people living near Newfield Harbor, in the township of Stratford, in Fairfield County humbly sheweth: That Newfield Harbor is distant from Stratford between three and four miles, and there are a few inhabitants settled near the water, and this harbor is convenient for and almost the whole navigation of the town is carried on from this harbor; and though there has been occasion enough given by our Tory enemies, yet no effectual measures have been taken to secure this harbor, although there has within a few months past been taken and carried away out of this harbor in the night season nine vessels and boats by our Tory enemies from among ourselves, who have gone off to the enemy. The last was a sloop of about twenty tons, taken off and carried away in the night to the enemy, about eight days ago, by forty-four Tories; and there is great reason to believe that Mr. Matthews, Mayor of New York, and several other prisoners have made their escape from this harbor in some of the boats and vessels that have been taken away, together with our Tory enemies; that there are so many persons living but a little way from this harbor that are unfriendly to their country; that these enemies of their country always be secreted until a favorable night arrives for them to steal a vessel and go off; and there is no possible way to prevent further mischief of this kind but by a constant guard being kept at the harbor. Unless this is done we have reason to believe that what has been done by the Tories is but the beginning of the mischiefs that are to be apprehended from these deserters of their country's cause. The friends of the deserters will sometimes threaten that those who have gone off in this way will soon return in circumstances to make themselves respected and feared, and that it will not be long before new laws will be established here that will prevent people being oppressed, etc.

"This harbor has already been the place for Newtown, so famous for Tories, to resort to in all their trade and traffic, and it is now the capital place of resort for all our Tory enemies to go out. We have great reason to believe that great numbers more are now watching a convenient opportunity to get out and go off with Maj. French, who is lurking about not far off we have reason to believe; and there are ships every day hovering about, and at night oftentimes comes to within a few miles of this harbor; and we have reason to believe that as soon as the weather moderates, those Tories, with the aid of our other enemies, will return again into this harbor and destroy the lives and property of the friends of our own government.

"We are therefore humbly of opinion that the safety of the people requires that there should be a guard of twenty-five men constantly stationed at this harbor, with two small cannon, mounted on traveling carriages, to protect the people and harbor; and earnestly entreat that your Honor and Council (or Assembly if sitting), will be pleased to give orders for it.

"For the particular state of facts we beg leave to refer your Honor to the bearers, Messrs David and Aaron Hawley, Abraham Hubbell, and William Wordin, who live at and near the harbor.

"We humbly pray your Honor's attention to these matters, for they are important; and we as in duty bound shall ever pray.

"Dated in Stratford this 14th day of January, A.D. 1777.

The prayer of the petitioners was granted, and the command of the guard was given to Lieut. Aaron Hawley, of Newfield. An order was also given him on the foundry at Salisbury for two small cannon, fifty round-shot, and a hundredweight of grape-shot. The company was stationed in Stephen Burroughs' store, a small wooden building, upon the only wharf at that time in the place, near what is now the foot of State Street. Several sentinels were posted upon this wharf, with orders not to permit any boat to pass out of the harbor if unprovided with a proper clearance. If the boat did not stop when challenged, it was to be fired upon.

In May, 1778, Amos Hubbell and other residents of Newfield petitioned the Legislature to have this guard dismissed, claiming that it was stationed in a place poorly calculated to discover the approach or to resist an attack of the enemy, and that great uneasiness had been caused, in consequence, among the people of the place. It was therefore requested that this company might be disbanded, and a small guard posted upon the shore of the Sound near the boundary-line between Stratford and Fairfield. This request was granted, and Lieut. Hawley ordered to dismiss his men and turn over the public property in his charge to the colonel of the Fourth Regiment of State troops, who was directed to detail twelve soldiers and station them on the site of the present Seaside Park.

Probably this arrangement failed to inspire complete satisfaction, for the old guard was afterwards revived, under command of Lieut. William Hall, and again took up its quarters on Burroughs' wharf. They captured many boats attempting to run out of the harbor, which, with their contents, became the property of the soldiers.

One of these captures is said to have been attended with loss of life. It occurred at two o'clock on the morning of the 28th of July, 1782. A boat attempting to run the guard was hailed by one of the sentinels, and, refusing to stop, was fired upon. Two men, named Stoddard and Judson, were killed by the shots. A third man, named Phineas Baker, was grazed by a bullet, but escaped uninjured. He was captured, with the boat, and after the war was over resided in Newfield. Gideon Hawley is said to have been the sentinel who fired the fatal shot.

There were also during the war several detachments enlisted in Stratfield for service at a distance. One of these took part in Arnold's expedition against Canada, and before its departure for the scene of action was mustered in the door-yard of Rev. Mr. Ross, where all knelt down while the clergyman invoked the divine blessing upon them and their enterprise.

In August, 1776, the Stratfield Train-Band joined Washington's army in New York for a brief term of service. It was attached to Silliman's Connecticut Brigade, and was officered by Capt. Thaddeus Bennett and Lieuts. Edward Burroughs and Josiah Lacey. The company suffered much from sickness, from the effects of which Lieut. Burroughs and Private Ichabod French died, and sundry others were obliged to be discharged as unfit for service. Two of these, David Sherman and Stephen Sterling, were unable to make their way home until Abijah Sterling went down to their relief. He found them in a barn near Harlem, unable to move, and brought them home in his chaise, going on foot himself and leading his horse all the way. Both were eventually restored to health.

The Stratfield Train-Band narrowly escaped capture with its brigade when New York was evacuated by Washington, the order for retreat not having been received in time. It took part in the battle of White Plains, and soon afterwards was mustered out, its term of enlistment having expired. A few months after the discharge Josiah Lacey raised a company for the Continental army, and was commissioned as its captain. Its term of service was three years, and it formed a part of Col. Philip Bradley's regiment, in Huntington's brigade.

With the exception of parties called out hastily in sudden emergencies, and as speedily disbanded when the danger was over, the foregoing were probably all the military companies recruited in Stratfield during the Revolution.

In the early part of the year 1777 great suffering was caused in Stratfield by the terrible scourge of smallpox, introduced by a party of exchanged prisoners who had been landed at Stratford Point under a flag of truce. The horror of this complaint can be but faintly conceived by us at the present day. Vaccination was unknown, and those who had contracted the disease were shunned even by their friends and nearest neighbors. People were afraid to travel upon the highway past the dwellings where the red flag showed the presence of the dreaded infection. The guard at the harbor forsook their posts, business was suspended, and yet, in spite of all precautions, the number sick at one time in Stratford township was estimated at six hundred persons.

In May, 1777, Timothy Wheeler and twelve other residents of Stratfield petitioned the Legislature for relief, and a few weeks later another petition was signed by Rev. Robert Ross and twenty-one others. In this it was stated that the condition of affairs had become insupportable; that the people were desperate, and even threatened to pull down the infected houses and shoot the sufferers if the plague could be stayed in no other way.

By direction of the Legislature, Gen. Silliman, of Fairfield, took the matter in hand, and by the use of vigorous sanitary measures (though hardly such extreme ones as the petitioners threatened) the ravages of the disease were finally checked.

During the whole war the people of this place, in common with those of other towns along the coast, were exposed to constant alarms, occasioned by real or anticipated attempts of the enemy to land and burn their dwellings and plunder their property. The British fleet having control of Long Island Sound, and many of the able-bodied men being absent in the Continental army, every strange sail approaching the shore was viewed with apprehension and its movements carefully watched. The first attempt of the kind was unsuccessful. In March, 1777, seven British vessels anchored off Mill River (now Southport), and twelve or fourteen boat-loads of men tried to effect a landing, but were repulsed by the militia on shore, among whom was a company from Stratfield, commanded by Capt. Abijah Sterling and Lieut. Nathan Seeley.

Six weeks later, April 25, 1777, a fleet of twenty-six sail appeared at Compo Point and landed a force of two thousand men, commanded by the infamous Tryon, the Tory Governor of New York. Their destination was Danbury, where there was a depot of military stores belonging to the Continental army. At Redding Ridge, on the following morning, Tryon's light-horse wounded and captured a young American, Lambert Lockwood by name, who was bearer of a letter from Col. Cook, the officer in command at Danbury, to Gen. Silliman, of Fairfield. The messenger perhaps owed his life to the fact that he was recognized by Tryon, to whom he had rendered some assistance several years before, when the Governor's carriage had broken down in passing through Norwalk. After the Revolution, Mr. Lockwood removed to Bridgeport and lived here for many years, a successful merchant, a leading member of the Congregational Church, and a prominent man in local affairs generally.

The story of the raid upon Danbury, the burning of the town by the invaders, and their disastrous retreat, will be found in another part of this volume.

Two years later, in the month of July, 1779, Tryon made another descent upon the defenseless towns of the Connecticut coast. With an imposing force of forty-eight vessels and about three thousand soldiers, he first pillaged New Haven and then set sail for Fairfield. The weather was foggy, so that the approach of the fleet was not perceived on shore until it came to anchor off the town. Then, of course, an alarm was raised, bells were rung, guns fired, and expresses despatched to Stratfield, Stratford, Milford, and all the neighboring towns for such aid as could be afforded. The British column disembarked on the western shore of the town, at a place called Kenzie's Point, and marched up the beach until opposite the court-house, severely galled the while by the artillery-fire from a little fort on Grover's Hill, overlooking Black Rock Harbor, which was held that day by Lieut. Isaac Jarvis with a force of only twenty-three men. Meanwhile, the village militia company had formed on the green, and by a lively musketry-fire and several charges of round-shot and grape kept the invaders in check for a short time, when they were forced to retreat to Holland Heights, leaving the town in full possession of the British. During the next twenty-four hours every house in the village, whether the property of Whig or Tory, was plundered from cellar to roof-tree, and everything that could not be carried off was broken or destroyed. Several inoffensive citizens were killed, and the handful of women and children who remained in the place, though not treated with actual violence, were exposed to indignity and insult. The few protections granted by Tryon were disregarded by his men, and when shown were rudely snatched away and torn in pieces. Towards nightfall the town was set on fire by Tryon's orders. Rev. Dr. Dwight, afterwards a resident of Greenfield Hill, thus describes the scene:

"While the town was in flames a thunder-storm overspread the heavens just as night came on. The conflagration of near two hundred houses illumined the earth, the skirts of the clouds, and the waves of the Sound with a union of gloom and grandeur at once awful and magnificent. At intervals the lightning blazed with a livid and awful splendor. The thunder rolled above; beneath, the roaring of the fires filled up the interval with a deep and hollow sound. Add to this the sharp sound of muskets occasionally discharged, the groans here and there of the wounded and dying, and the shouts of triumph, then place before your eyes crowds of the miserable sufferers, mingled with bodies of the militia, taking from the neighboring hills a farewell prospect of their property and their dwellings, their happiness and their hopes, and you will form a just but imperfect picture of the burning of Fairfield."

Among those most active in carrying the torch were a number of Tory refugees, who had accompanied Tryon upon this expedition. Besides dwelling-houses, stores, etc., the court-house, jail, school-house, and two churches were destroyed, Mr. Sayre, the Episcopal missionary for Fairfield and Stratfield, pleading in vain with Tryon to spare any portion of the town. Mindful of former experiences, Tryon did not attempt any movement inland upon this occasion, but re-embarked before a sufficient force of Americans could be collected to offer him battle.

Throughout the whole Revolution the people of our shore-towns had to suffer not only from actual invasion and the destruction of their property by organized bodies of troops, but also from marauding attacks by small parties of Tories and refugees from Long Is-

and. On one occasion a whole congregation was surprised at Darien while engaged in worship upon the Sabbath, and, after being plundered of every article of value, the Rev. Moses Mather, D.D., with his deacons and the male members of his church, fifty in number, went that Sunday on a sailing-party to Long Island, from whence they were all subsequently transferred to a British prison in New York. Sometimes the attack was made at night, as was the case in May, 1779, when Gen. Silliman's house on Holland Heights was broken into by a party guided by one Glover, a Newtown Tory, who had been employed as carpenter by the general, and was consequently familiar with the premises. Gen. Silliman's gun missed fire, and he and his eldest son were both seized, hurried to the water's edge, and forced to embark for Long Island. This successful raid of the Tories of course occasioned some excitement here, and, as the Americans held no officer of rank who could be exchanged for Gen. Silliman, it was decided to attempt to kidnap Judge Thomas Jones, of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, a leading Tory, whose residence was at Fort Neck, on Hempstead Plain, L. I. For this purpose a party of twenty-five volunteers, commanded by Capt. David Hawley, set out from this harbor one evening in November, 1779. Landing at Stony Brook, they concealed their boats in the bushes, and after a toilsome night-march over by-roads and through the woods reached their destination just forty-eight hours from the time they started.

There was a ball at the residence of Judge Jones that evening, and no one will wonder that the old gentleman was reluctant to leave the festive scene, with its music and pleasant company, for a fifty-mile tramp on a frosty night through woods and swamps, with the prospect of a prison at the end of the route, but his visitors would take no denial. On their way back, the party passing near the camp of a royal regiment, the judge coughed loudly to attract the attention of the sentinels, nor would he be silent until Capt. Hawley threatened him with instant death. The march was a severe one, and several members of the party straggled, through fatigue, and were captured by the enemy's light-horse; but the main body reached their boats and crossed in safety to Black Rock with their prisoner. Invited to dine with Mrs. Silliman, Judge Jones did not display the urbanity which under other circumstances he might have manifested, but is said to have been reserved and sullen in his demeanor. He was ordered to Middletown for confinement, but after a few months was exchanged for Gen. Silliman.

Our record of Revolutionary incidents would be incomplete without further reference to the services of the gallant naval officer already mentioned, Capt. David Hawley, of Stratfield.

Early in the war Capt. Hawley sailed to the West Indies for a cargo of gunpowder, which upon his return was divided between the towns of Stratford and Fairfield, a part of it being stored for a time in Nichols' tavern, on North Avenue. In March, 1776, he sailed again from Stratford in command of a privateer sloop, but was captured when four days out by the British man-of-war "Bellona." Large inducements were offered him by his captors to change his allegiance and act as pilot to the British fleet, but these were firmly declined. He was taken to Halifax, but after a captivity of only two weeks made his escape with eight companions in a small boat, and at length found his way back to Connecticut. In August, 1776, Capt. Hawley was commissioned by the Legislature to raise a naval detachment for service upon Lake Champlain, and a few months later he took part in the disastrous action fought upon this lake between the British and American flotillas. After this affair Long Island Sound was his cruising-ground, and, besides capturing Judge Jones, we find him in May, 1777, and again in August of the same year, bringing a number of prizes into Black Rock Harbor. After the war Capt. Hawley resided in Bridgeport until his death, in 1807. He built on the corner of Water and Gilbert Streets the first brick house erected within the city limits.

One of his neighbors was Stephen Hull, who was one of the party that conducted the unfortunate Maj. André from the place where he was apprehended, to Washington's headquarters. After the war Mr. Hull settled in Bridgeport, where he built a house on the corner of Main and Wall Streets, on the site of the building now owned and occupied by the Connecticut National Bank.

Another neighbor was Major Benjamin Muirson Woolsey, whose home was on the east side of Main Street, a little north of the Bridgeport National Bank. He was a Tory from Long Island, served during the war as an officer in the cavalry regiment called the Queen's Rangers, and was one of the pursuers of Gen. Putnam, when the latter made his famous ride down the stone steps at Greenwich. At the close of the war he went to New Brunswick, where he held the rank of major in the militia, but subsequently returned and settled in Bridgeport,—or Newfield, as it was then called,—and engaged in the dry-goods and milling business. Major Woolsey received a pension—said to have been a crown a day—from the British government for his services. He died in 1813, aged about fifty-six years.

Another royalist of note, referred to in the petition copied above, was David Mathews, the Tory mayor of New York, who in June, 1776, was arrested for complicity in a plot for the assassination of Gen. Washington. More than a hundred and fifty Tories, many of them persons of wealth and good social position, were concerned in this villainous scheme, which was originated by Governor Tryon, then a refugee upon the British man-of-war "Asia." Washington once disposed of, in the opinion of the conspirators the dream of independence indulged in by the colonial leaders would be at an end. The royalists of the province would rise in a body, blow up the magazines, take possession of the fortifications around New York, and welcome the royal forces with open arms, while the colonial troops, confused, disheartened, and without a leader, would either disband and return to their homes or fall an easy prey to their powerful and well-disciplined enemy. Thus in course of a few weeks the rebellion would be crushed, the king would have his own again, royalists like Tryon would be recompensed for all their trials from the confiscated estates of enemies of the Crown, while noted rebels like Hancock, Samuel Adams, and others would be either compelled to flee the country, or else reap the just reward of their treason. Such were the dreams of the conspirators, nor did they omit to take measures to carry them into action. Mayor Mathews, whose country-seat was at Flatbush, near the anchorage of the "Asia," was the messenger through whom Tryon communicated with the Tories in New York, while two of the soldiers at Washington's headquarters had been corrupted, and had agreed to abduct or murder their distinguished leader as might be most convenient.

Just as the plot was ripe for execution it was discovered, and all the principal parties concerned in it save Tryon were arrested and tried before a military commission. Thomas Hickey, a member of Washington's body-guard, was found guilty, and on the 28th day of June, 1776, was hung in the presence of several thousand spectators. It was the first military execution of the Revolution, and the place where the gallows was erected was a field in what were then the suburbs of New York, adjoining the camp of the brigade of Col. Huntington, of Connecticut. Mayor Mathews and twelve others were sent for safe keeping to Litchfield, Conn. Notwithstanding the serious nature of the accusation against him, his parole was taken, and he was allowed to reside in the family of Major Moses Seymour, great-grandfather of Messrs. Edward W. and Morris W. Seymour, of this city. In the course of a few months Mathews violated his parole and escaped to the British lines on Long Island, crossing the Sound by night, probably in a small boat putting out from this harbor. His escape led to the stationing of a guard at the harbor's mouth, as already noted.

The statement is sometimes made that Rev. Dr. Witherspoon, of New Jersey, was the only clergyman whose name was affixed to the Declaration of Independence, but as residents of Bridgeport we ought to know that a member of the Continental Congress and a signer of that instrument was in early life settled here in the work of the gospel ministry. Lyman Hall, born at Wallingford, in this State, in 1724, and a graduate of Yale College in 1747, was on Sept. 27, 1749, ordained in Stratfield, and settled over the church in that place, now the First Congregational Church of Bridgeport. The old meeting-house on North Avenue often re-echoed the sound of his voice, and upon the church records may be seen his autograph,—an exact fac-simile of that appended to the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Hall remained in Stratfield a little less than two years. He was dismissed June 18, 1751, and probably removed to Fairfield where, on the 20th of May following, he married Abigail, daughter of Thaddeus Burr, Esq. Mrs. Hall died July 8, 1753. Following is a copy of her epitaph:

"Here lies buried the Body of
Mrs. Abigail Hall,
wife of Lyman Hall, M.A., daughter of Thaddeus Burr, Esq.,
died July 8th, 1753, aged 24 years.

Modest, yet free, with Innocence adorn'd,
To please and win by Art and Nature join'd,
Benevolent and wise, in virtue firm,
Constant in Friendship, in Religion warm,
A Partner tender, unaffected kind,
A lovely form with a more lovely mind.
The Scene of Life, tho' short, sh' improved so well,
No charmers in human form could more excell.
Christ's Life her copy, His pure law her Guide,
Each part she acted, perfected, and dy'd."

Mr. Hall must have remained in Fairfield for some years after her death, judging from several entries upon the town records,—viz.:

"Amos, a negro male child under care of Lyman Hall, born June 7, 1755. Died December 8, 1756."

"Primus, a negro child under care of Lyman Hall, &c., born June 7, 1757."

The records of the County Court also show that Lyman Hall, of Fairfield, as one of the executors of Thaddeus Burr, deceased, appeared as plaintiff in a lawsuit, Feb. 6, 1758.

Mr. Hall had many noble traits of character, and the hope expressed by the council in dismissing him from the ministry at Stratfield—that "a door of usefulness might be opened to him elsewhere"—was signally fulfilled. He emigrated to Georgia, and commenced the practice of medicine in that remarkable New England colony which settled the parish of St. Johns.

Early in the year 1775, impatient at the attitude of Georgia, which had for six months been hesitating and vacillating whether to join the other colonies in the contest for liberty or to stand aloof, and had even refused to send representatives to the Continental Congress, the parish of St. Johns elected Dr. Lyman Hall as a delegate on its own account. He presented his credentials and took his seat upon the 13th of May, so that "on that day Congress was composed of the representatives of the twelve united colonies and Dr. Hall, the deputy for the parish of St. Johns."

The patriotic spirit of this little community had a salutary effect upon its neighbors, and in a short time there were four representatives in Congress from Georgia, of whom Dr. Hall was one, and in this capacity in the following year he subscribed his name to the Declaration of Independence, in connection with which it will go down to posterity.

His subsequent career can be summed up in a few words. A representative in Congress until 1780, his property was confiscated by the British when they occupied Georgia in 1782, and in the following year he was chosen Governor of the State. He died in October, 1790, aged about sixty-six, leaving a good estate to his widow, his only son having died some time before. A few years ago the State of Georgia erected a monument to his memory, and gave the handsome stone that had been placed over his grave soon after his decease, by his widow, to the town of Wallingford, Conn., where it now stands. It bears the following inscription:

"Beneath this stone rest the remains of
THE HONBLE LYMAN HALL,
Formerly Governor of this State,
Who departed this life the 19th of October, 1790,
In the 67th year of his age.
To thee, so mourned in death, so loved in life,
The childless parent and the widowed wife
With tears inscribes this monumental stone
That holds his ashes and expects her own."

It is much to be regretted that a complete list of all the Revolutionary soldiers from this place was not made at an earlier date, for the omission can now never be supplied. Below are mentioned what few names I have met with:

FROM RECORDS OF FIRST CHURCH.

Bennett, Thaddeus, captain, died Jan. 21, 1777.

Burroughs, Edward, lieutenant, died Sept. 14, 1776, act. 42.

Fayerweather, Nathaniel, "died of smallpox in the army," December, 1778.

French, Ichabod, died "in camp at New York," September, 1776.

Hawley, Maj. Aaron, died July 23, 1803.

Lemon, George, "killed on Long Island," July, 1781.

Odell, Isaac, sergeant, died Feb. 22, 1826.

Seeley, Nathan, lieutenant, died Sept. 29, 1777.

Sherwood, David, died Aug. 31, 1826, act. 72.

Wells, David, "died in Continental army," October, 1777.

MUSTER-ROLL OF HARBOR GUARD.

This company was stationed upon Burroughs' wharf, at the foot of State Street, as already noted. Following is a copy of its muster-roll in the year 1781:

Officers.—Lieutenant, William Hall; sergeant, Isaac Patchin; corporal, Joel Parish; clerk, Samuel French.

Enlisted Men.—Ichabod Beardsley, Josiah Burritt, Sherman Burritt, Seth Bulkley, Thomas Cooke, James Crawford, Ebenezer Gregory, James Gregory, Wildman Hall, Joseph Dawes, Ebenezer Hawley, William Hubbell, Lyman Knapp, John McKenzie, Salmon Patchin, John Porter, Denton Seeley, Gideon Wells, Zechariah Wheeler.

Another account mentions two additional members of this guard,—viz., Gideon Hawley and Elijah Peet. It is not likely that all of those who were members of the guard resided here except during their term of service. Some of them were undoubtedly from other towns.

ADDITIONAL LIST.

Most of the following are referred to incidentally in the valuable series of historical articles by the late Isaac Sherman, published in the Bridgeport Standard in April, 1866. The names of some of the members of the "Householders," or home-guard, are included, though it is not likely that they saw much service:

Beardsley, Abijah, ensign.
 Brothwell, Joseph, lieutenant in Householders.
 Burroughs, Stephen, captain in Householders.
 Fairchild, Nathan. His widow was a pensioner.
 Gregory, Ezra, was a pensioner.
 Hamilton, James, lieutenant in Householders.
 Hawley, David, captain of privateer.
 Hubbell, Hezekiah, captain in Householders.
 Hubbell, Salmon, lieutenant; was at the battle of Stony Point, etc.
 Lacey, Daniel, captain of coast-guards.
 Lacey, Josiah, captain in Continental army.
 Seeley, Nathan, lieutenant in Householders.
 Sherman, Isaac, died in the army, aged eighteen.
 Sherman, David, member of Stratfield Train-Band.
 Sterling, Abijah, captain in Householders.
 Sterling, Stephen, member of Stratfield Train-Band.
 Strong, Joseph, clerk of Householders.
 Wordin, William, captain in Householders.

ANECDOTES OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

Reference has already been made to the fact that Gen. Washington several times passed through Stratfield by the old stage road, now North Avenue. One of these occasions was in 1775, when on his way to Boston after having been appointed commander-in-chief of the American army. Rev. Dr. Ripley, pastor of the Congregational Church in Green's Farms, mounted his horse and joined the cavalcade. "They stopped at Bulkeley's Inn, in Fairfield, and I think dined there. After passing from the house, and while standing in front of it, waiting for their horses, Washington, continuing his conversation on public affairs, passed his finger through the button-hole of the doctor's coat, and said that if the Americans could prolong the contest for one year they would ultimately succeed, because by that time arms and ammunition could be obtained and they would be invincible. Dr. Ripley was a man of commanding presence,—of tall, athletic, and dignified frame. His fine countenance beamed with intelligence and kindness, and yet there was something in his look which gave assurance of unyielding firmness. I think it would be difficult to find two men who would be a finer subject for a painter than those two patriots communing together under such interesting circumstances. The doctor accompanied Gen. Washington to Stratford Ferry."†

It may have been upon this occasion, as has been said, that Washington, accompanied by Maj.-Gen. Lee, Major Thomas Midlin, and Samuel Griffin, aides-de-camp, halted at Nichols' tavern, in Stratfield, for refreshment, occupying the southeast corner room as their parlor. Another version of the incident, perhaps the correct one, is that Washington stopped in Stratfield in March, 1781, when on his way to meet Count Rochambeau at Newport.

† Sprague's Annals of American Pulpit.

Still another interesting anecdote connected with Washington's progress through this part of the country used to be related by a daughter of George Benjamin, Mrs. Alice Thompson, of Stratford, who died in May, 1862, aged nearly ninety-eight years. She was eleven years of age in 1775, and may have been about thirteen or fourteen when she saw Washington. On that occasion she with other girls was picking berries on the banks of the Housatonic, near the ferry, when suddenly a cry was heard that soldiers were crossing the river, and presently an officer with a number of others landed and asked the ferryman to direct them to the tavern. He replied, "Yonder is the tavern-keeper's daughter," and, calling Alice, bade her show Gen. Lafayette the way to her father's house. She walked beside his horse on their way to the village, Lafayette talking to her in his charming broken English, telling her of his children, and asking her if she would not like to go to France with him to see them. On reaching home she found that Gen. Washington had arrived by the western road. Her mother, thus unexpectedly called upon to provide dinner for two such distinguished guests, would have apologized for her fare, but was reassured by Washington, who told her that all he wanted was simple food, and that what was good enough for her family was good enough for him. Mrs. Benjamin happened to have some potatoes,—then a great rarity,—and Alice obtained leave to place them upon the table. In doing this she stepped between Washington and Lafayette, when the former, placing his hand on her head and turning her face towards him, asked her name, and after some other questions told her to be a good girl and gave her his blessing. It may easily be believed that she never forgot the circumstance.

On a tour made by President Washington through New England after the war, in October, 1789, he is said to have halted and asked for a drink from the well of the old Seeley house, which is still standing on North Avenue, a short distance from Island Brook Bridge. At that time Capt. Alison Benjamin was living in West Stratford, in a house which may still be seen, about half-way down the western slope of Old Mill Hill. This Capt. Benjamin built a sloop of forty-five tons burthen, called the "Hunter, of Berkshire," in a field south of the road, just opposite his own door, although no water was in sight. It was nearly completed when Washington passed, and, surprised at the sight, he alighted, went over to the place, and questioned the workmen as to how they expected to get the vessel to the water. In reply they told him that strong ways were to be built beneath the craft to serve as a sled, upon which, when winter came, it could glide down hill to the creek (a branch of Yellow Mill stream, fully a quarter of a mile away), and with the spring it would settle through the ice into the water,—a plan which was subsequently carried into effect.

Newfield Stores in 1760—Newfield Ferry chartered, and Main and State Streets widened, 1787—Act establishing Lottery Bridge, 1791—Stratford Avenue laid out, and the first Newspaper established in 1795—Curious Advertisements from the American Telegraph—Tragic Fate of Wilson Hubbard—Incorporation of the Borough of Bridgeport, 1800—Copy of the Petition and List of Signatures—St. John's and the Congregational Churches removed to Bridgeport—Founding of the first Methodist Church in New England—The Bridgeport Bank incorporated—Description of the Borough in 1810—Incidents of the War of 1812—Reception of Gen. Lafayette—The Town of Bridgeport set off, 1821, and the City incorporated, May, 1836.

ZACHARIAH LACEY, a Revolutionary veteran and grandfather of Mr. R. B. Lacey, used to say that he well remembered the time in his boyhood when there was not a single dwelling-house on either side of the river within that part of Bridgeport now occupied for business purposes. There were, however, two shanties on the shore, near the present intersection of State and Water Streets, one of them owned by Capt. Stephen Burroughs, Sr., and the other by Aaron Hawley. There was no wharf, vessels being laden and unladen in the stream by boats or by teams driven out into the water. This was between the years 1760 and 1765. It is evident, however, from the petition for a harbor-guard in the preceding chapter, that Newfield, as the place was called, had begun to increase a little in size before the Revolution, and after the close of the war it developed rapidly in importance. There was then no bridge across the Pequonnock below the head of tide-water, which was where the old stage road, now called North Avenue, crosses the river. Near this bridge was the store of Philip Nichols, established before the Revolution.

In May, 1787, the following resolution was passed by the Connecticut Legislature:

"Upon report of a committee appointed in May last, which is now accepted and approved, resolved by this Assembly that the town of Stratford be and they are hereby empowered and allowed to keep and maintain a public Ferry in said town, across the Creek or Harbour called New Field Harbour, from the point of land called New Pasture Point, below Toby's Ware, to the opposite shore of said harbour or creek, to and on the land of Aaron Hawley, about ten rods south of said Hawley's dwelling-house, and that two sufficient Boats shall be constantly kept, one on each side of said Creek, plying from shore to shore as occasion may require, at the places aforesaid, during the pleasure of this Assembly, all subject to the same regulations that other Ferries in this State are by Law subjected to."

The western terminus was near the present foot of Union Street and the following were the legal rates of fare:

Each man, horse, and load	1 cent and 2 mills.
Each footman	2 cents and 1 mill.
Each led horse	2 cents and 8 mills.
Each ox or other neat-kine	5 cents and 5 mills.
Each sheep, swine, or goat	1 cent.

With such a tariff it must have sometimes been a difficult matter to make change.

Whether Benjamin's Bridge—now called Yellow Mill Bridge—had been built at this time, the writer does not certainly know. He has been told that it had not, and that passengers by this ferry, if bound to Stratford, were obliged to take boat again across the eastern arm of the harbor; but of this there is no mention in the act.

PETITION FOR A BRIDGE.

It is obvious that this mode of travel must have been very inconvenient, and in May, 1791, Robert Walker, of Stratford, and others petitioned the Legislature for authority to establish a lottery to raise the funds necessary to build a bridge across Newfield Harbor. At that time this was a favorite method of raising money for public improvements. Nor was the purchase or the sale of lottery tickets even at a later period regarded as disreputable by the best people in the commonwealth.

In response to the petition the Assembly appointed Messrs. James Davenport, John Chandler, and Jonathan Ingersoll a committee, with the following instructions: "To view the place where the petitioners propose to build a bridge, and make an estimate of the expense, and to determine what kind of bridge it will be proper to build, and report to this Assembly."

The committee reported favorably, and in October, 1791, the following resolution was passed. The original may be found at Hartford in one of the ponderous manuscript volumes containing the public acts:

ACT ESTABLISHING LOTTERY BRIDGE.

"Upon petition of Robert Walker and other inhabitants of the town of Stratford, and Jonathan Sturges, Thaddens Burr, Andrew Rowland, and other inhabitants of the town of Fairfield, in Fairfield County, showing to this Assembly that the road from the town of Stratford to the town of Fairfield through a village called Old Mill is about nine miles, and by reason of the rocks, hills, and other bad quarters of said road, the same is extremely inconvenient to traveling in general, and particularly to the public stage, and that another road leading from said Stratford to said Fairfield through a place called New Field is three miles shorter and capable of being an extremely good and pleasant road and very commodious to the public, but that by reason of the intervention of an arm of the sea across said road at Newfield the same cannot be rendered convenient without a bridge at said New Field across said arm of the sea, and that the said town of Stratford, to which said village of Newfield belongs, is unable to erect said bridge at their own expense; praying for liberty to raise a sum of money to build said bridge by Lottery, as per petition on file, etc.,—

"Resolved by this Assembly, that liberty be and the same is hereby granted to the petitioners for the setting up a lottery for the purpose of raising a sum of fifteen hundred pounds lawful money; and that the moneys so to be raised shall be appropriated to the purpose of building said bridge; which said bridge shall contain therein a draw or draw-bridge over the most convenient place in the channel, of twenty-four feet in width, and shall be completed in every respect and commodious for the public; and that John Benjamin, Amos Hubbell, John Thompson, Josiah Lacey, David Burr, and Daniel Salmon, or any of them not less than four, be and they hereby are appointed managers of said lottery, and fully authorized to establish a scheme or schemes of said lottery, to consist of one or more class or classes, make sale of the tickets and collect the money arising therefrom.

"Provided they do within three months after the rising of this Assembly lodge with the treasurer of this State a bond payable to said treasurer or his successors in said office, with one or more sureties, to be approved of by said treasurer in the penal sum of three thousand pounds lawful money, conditioned for the faithful management of said lottery, payment of the proceeds, and that the money so raised be faithfully applied to the building said bridge, and that the said bridge be erected and completed by the 1st day of December, 1793, and that the sale of said tickets shall not commence before the first day of July next."

The eastern extremity of Lottery Bridge was that of the present lower bridge, but on the west it extended nearly to what is now the foot of Wall Street, and some traces of the abutments which supported it could until recently be seen there under the dock at low tide. It had a draw, parting in the middle and raised by pulleys on either side, but must have been very poorly built, as within three years' time it needed repairing. About the year 1804, while undergoing further repairs, the whole structure gave way, and, tipping over to the southward, fell into the water, where it remained, a melancholy ruin, for a number of years.

Benjamin Hall, of Stratford, and afterwards Abel Hall, Jr., and Elijah Burritt, were given permission to repair it by the Legislature, but failed to improve the grant, and in 1807 Salmon Hubbell and others rebuilt the bridge, or rather built a new one,—the present Bridgeport or lower bridge,—with western terminus farther up stream, at the foot of Fairfield Avenue.

In January, 1787, Josiah Lacey, of Newfield, Nathan Seeley, of Danbury, and David Burr, of Fairfield, were appointed a committee by the Fairfield County Court to lay out and widen the highways now known as Main Street and State Street. The former is designated in the committee's report, dated April 13, 1787, as "the road at the foot of Golden Hill," and the latter as "the road from the dwelling-house of the Widow Eunice Hubbell, near the stores at Newfield, to the town-line between Stratford and Fairfield." The following persons are stated by the report to have sustained damages by the alterations made:

The report in full, with notes explanatory by R. B. Lacey, Esq., may be found on page 228 of the "Municipal Register" of Bridgeport for 1871.

In October, 1795, William Herron and Eli Mygatt were appointed by the General Assembly a committee, with instructions "to view the great road leading from Dragon Bridge, between East Haven and New Haven, through New Haven, Milford, Stratford, Fairfield, Norwalk, Stamford, and Greenwich, to Byram River, and to make and lay out any necessary alterations in said road." Following is an extract from their report, dated Oct. 20, 1796, on file at the State-house, in Hartford. The paragraph relates to the first opening of the street now known as Stratford Avenue, in East Bridgeport. Previous to this time the stage road had followed the shore around the extreme end of the point,—a route sometimes impassable at high water:

"The alterations between Newfield Bridge and Benjamin's Bridge are grounded on the necessity of avoiding or shutting the road now traveled, under the bank where the tide flows, which renders it at times impassable, to the detriment of travelers; being likewise very crooked, which is now remedied by a straight line on good ground through Asa Benjamin's rope-walk. Twenty rods of the south part thereof must be taken up and shifted to the north end, together with his wheel-house, which is thirty feet in length, and subjects him to the necessity of purchasing a lot of land of about seven acres at an extravagant price, beside the expense of taking up the rope-walk."

The committee recommended that three hundred and thirty dollars damages should be paid to Asa Benjamin by the town of Stratford.

Their report was accepted by the Assembly, and a resolution passed making the road, as recommended, "an open public highway." Liberty was also given to Stratford to set up a toll-gate at Lottery Bridge, in Newfield, for the support of that and of Benjamin's Bridge, which was accordingly done in 1799, John Thompson, Amos Hubbell, and Thaddeus Benedict being the commissioners.

In October, 1797, an act was passed by the Legislature authorizing the inhabitants of Newfield to meet annually at the school-house on the first Monday in December to choose for firemen twenty-five men living within the limits of Newfield. Power was also given the village to make regulations for better protection against fire, and to impose penalties not exceeding ten dollars in case of their violation. A fire-engine and a number of fire-buckets had already been purchased by subscription.

In the following year another resolution of similar tenor was passed by the Assembly, which is interesting because it defines the limits of Newfield Village. These were briefly as follows: Beginning at Welles Tongue, and following the river to the northeast corner of the Indian Lot, a short distance above the present horse-railroad bridge; thence crossing to Main Street and following the line of Washington Avenue over Golden Hill to a stone bridge across Cedar Creek, not very far from where St. John's church now stands; thence southeastwardly through the fields to the starting-point.

The first newspaper published in Newfield or Bridgeport was the American Telegraph and Fairfield County Gazette, which was commenced in 1795 and issued weekly by Lazarus Beach, who came here from Redding and carried on the business of printer, bookseller, and stationer on the corner of Wall and Water Streets, opposite the old Washington Hotel. It was printed upon what would now be called fair wrapping-paper and circulated about eight hundred copies, which were distributed by means of post-riders throughout the whole of Fairfield County. The subscription price was one dollar and a half per annum, and it continued to be issued by Mr. Beach and his successor, Samuel Mallory, for nearly ten years.

The art of reporting is quite a modern one, and the news and editorial columns of the Telegraph contain very little that is interesting at the present day. The advertisements, on the contrary, are often very entertaining, and I have thought it worth while to copy quite a number of them as illustrating, much better than could be done in any other way, the customs and the business of the place at the beginning of the present century:

Bridgeport, Jan. 1, 1817

J. STERLING.

The foregoing advertisements, and many others which we have not room to copy, plainly show that, though Newfield or Bridgeport was small in size, its people possessed a good deal of business enterprise. Almost every firm owned a coasting sloop or schooner, while there were a number of brigs and other large vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

While homeward bound from the West Indies in the year 1799, young Wilson Hubbell, son of Amos Hubbell, perhaps the most prominent man in Newfield, lost his life in a manner that never fails to excite sympathy even at this distant day. He was captured by a French privateer, who, taking out several of his seamen, replaced them with a prize crew, with orders to bring the sloop into some French port. While the prize-master was enjoying his noon-day nap Capt. Hubbell turned the tables upon him by locking him into the cabin and overpowering and securing his men. At length, upon promise of good behavior and surrender of his weapons, the Frenchman was allowed to come out from the cabin, and the two sat down upon the quarter-rail to smoke a cigar together. The Frenchman dropped his cigar, and, stooping as if to pick it up, caught Capt. Hubbell by the feet and hurled him overboard. The sea was calm, and the young man swam after the vessel, begging to be taken on board, but in vain. His enemy would not listen to his cries, and his gold, which he had secured in a belt about his body, weighed him down, so that he soon sunk beneath the waves to rise no more. A tablet in the old Stratfield burying-ground commemorates his fate, and refers with not unnatural warmth to "the unprincipled officer of a French privateer, who, deaf to the claims of justice and the cries of humanity, plunged the sufferer into the ocean and left him to perish in the waves."

In the year 1800, on petition of Amos Hubbell and forty-nine others, the village heretofore known as Newfield was incorporated under the name of the Borough of Bridgeport, and granted most of the privileges usually conferred upon cities except representation in the General Assembly and the right of voting at town and State elections, for which purpose the inhabitants of the borough were still obliged to go to Stratford. Careful search in the archives of the State, at Hartford, has brought to light the original petition, which is now published for the first time. The document is in the handwriting of Joseph Backus, attorney, who originated the idea and drew the charter, the first of the kind in the State:

COPY OF PETITION.

As yet there were no churches within the borough, and the people were obliged to go to Stratfield to attend service upon the Sabbath, but in March, 1801, the members of St. John's parish voted to pull down their old church, which, as already stated, stood near the present crossing of North and Wood Avenues, and build a new one in Bridgeport. This was upon the corner of State and Broad Streets, and continued to be occupied by the society until 1835, when it was sold to the Baptists.

An effort was made in the spring of 1801 to have the Congregational Society removed to Bridgeport, but it met with considerable opposition from that part of the congregation residing in Stratfield, and it was not until 1808 that the change was finally effected. The new meeting-house was erected by subscription at a cost of two thousand dollars, and was on the corner of Broad and John Streets, on the site of the present North church. Rev. Elijah Waterman was then the pastor, and deserves to be commemorated, not only as a faithful and successful minister, but as being the first white man to recognize the advantages of Golden Hill as a place of residence. He built his house, afterwards occupied by the late Hanford Lyon, upon the brow of this hill when it was so rugged and forest-clad that hardly a neighbor was in sight, and his people wondered that he should locate so far away from the village.

One of the most honored names in the history of the Methodist denomination is that of Jesse Lee, the founder of Methodism in the Eastern States. On his first tour through New England he preached once at Norwalk and again in the court-house at Fairfield, and then continued his journey into Rhode Island. Returning, he preached in Stratfield on Friday, Sept. 25, 1789.

Dr. Abel Stevens, in his history of the denomination, thus refers to the occasion: “It was a memorable day. After the sermon he conducted a kind of class-meeting composed of about twenty persons. It was the first class-meeting held on the circuit, and led to the formation next day of the first class, composed of three women, who appeared willing to bear the cross and have their names cast out as evil for the Lord's sake. Since his arrival in New England three months of incessant labors and vexatious rebuffs had passed, and but three women were organized into the new church which was to spread scriptural holiness over the land.”

In Barber's “Historical Collection for Connecticut,” page 409, it is also stated that the first Methodist Society in New England “was formed by Rev. Jesse Lee, at Bridgeport, Sept. 26, 1789.” The house where the meetings were held was that of a Mrs. Wells, on the lower part of Park Avenue. It was pulled down a few years ago, but before its destruction photographs were taken of it, which are still preserved.

Nathan and Heman Bangs, both eminent men in the denomination, were born in Stratfield, the former about the year 1777, the latter April 15, 1790. Their father, an intelligent blacksmith, has already been mentioned in these pages. His house was at the foot of the hill upon which the Stratfield Baptist church now stands, but about the year 1793 he removed to Stamford, N. Y. He is said to have been a churchman, and, when Jesse Lee preached here, to have kept his family closely at home, lest they should become infected with the itinerant's supposed heterodoxy. Both himself and his wife in after-years became members of the Methodist connection. Of Nathan Bangs it is said, that as a minister or presiding elder for more than sixty years, as a founder of the missionary society, the periodical literature, and the Conference system of his Church, and as its recognized historian, he rendered it more important services than any other man save Asbury.

The Bridgeport Bank, of which a more particular account will follow, was chartered by the Legislature in 1806 with a capital of two hundred thousand dollars. In 1810 the census of the borough, which before that date had been included with the town of Stratford, was taken separately, and showed a population of two hundred and twenty-two persons on the point, and eight hundred and sixty-seven on the west side of the river,—an aggregate of one thousand and eighty-nine souls. Bridgeport contained at this time one bank, two houses of public worship,—one for the Episcopalians, one for the Congregationalists,—and one hundred and twenty-three dwelling-houses, thirty-one of which were on the point. Most of the houses were two-story buildings and painted white.

Eighteen vessels, of the capacity of one thousand four hundred and fourteen tons, were owned here, and were engaged in the West India or the coasting-trade. The principal exports were live-stock, wheat and rye flour, and Indian meal, corn, rye, oats, flaxseed, pork, beef, butter, lard, cider, and cider-brandy. Among the articles manufactured in the place were beaver hats, rope, saddles and saddletrees, boots and shoes, cabinet-work, and carriages. There were two tanneries, three printing-offices, two weekly newspapers, one pottery, and forty-three stores.

During the war of 1812, New London was blockaded for a number of months by a British fleet, while the coasting-trade of Long Island Sound was for a long time almost entirely suspended owing to the presence of the fleet and the activity of several privateers fitted out in the British provinces. One of these, known as the "Liverpool Packet," and hailing from Liverpool, Nova Scotia, picked up, among other prizes, two sloops running as packets between Bridgeport and New York.

One afternoon in 1814 she was seen in pursuit of two coasters, a sloop and a schooner, the latter owned in Derby, and commanded by Capt. Hart, of that place. Both vessels spread every sail in the attempt to escape, but, finding their efforts in vain and that their enemy was gaining upon them, they bore up for Bridgeport Harbor, which the sloop succeeded in reaching safely, while the schooner grounded on the outer bar. She was soon boarded by a boat's crew from the Nova Scotian, who, finding their prize immovable, would have set her on fire, but it was before the day of matches, and Capt. Hart had taken the precaution to throw overboard the tinder-box as soon as his vessel struck. The captors now rummaged cabin and hold, taking whatever suited their fancy, and some of them had even commenced to cut with their sheath-knives strips of duck from the sails to mend their canvas trousers with, when a cannon-ball from the shore coming inconveniently near, caused them to tumble precipitately into the boat and return to their own ship, which soon bore away up the Sound. At the next tide the stranded schooner floated again, and was brought up to the dock and discharged her cargo here. The pursuit and capture and subsequent relinquishment of the prize were witnessed by hundreds of excited spectators on shore, and the artillery-fire which drove off the privateersman was partly from the single gun of the Bridgeport Artillery Company, under command of Capt. Samuel Hawley, and partly from the little fort on the "Tongue," from which Capt. James Allen fired twenty-four shots at the enemy.

As there were no railroads at that time and the British had entire control of the Sound, great inconvenience resulted from this practical blockade of our ports. Most of the commerce carried on between them and New York had to be by means of whale-boats, which, being of exceedingly light draught, could closely hug the shore, and if pursued put up into some little creek or inlet for safety; but this mode of conveyance was both inconvenient and costly, and it is not surprising that a plan to capture some of the detested privateers was much discussed. It was proposed to put out from Bridgeport Harbor with an old sloop gotten up very much on the plan of the celebrated Trojan horse, with two or three venerable fishermen of simple demeanor on deck, and half a hundred well-armed athletic young fellows concealed below in the hold. When captured, as they were sure to be, they would lie to very close to their captors,—if possible alongside,—and then at the proper time would turn the tables in a most surprising manner, capture the British privateer, and bring her into port amid the ringing of bells, the firing of cannon, and the applause of the populace. I am told that this remarkable plan would actually have been attempted but for the opposition of Joseph Backus, already mentioned as an attorney and a leading man in the place at that time.

Early in the war a company of State militia, commanded by Lieuts. Curtis and Bellamy, was stationed here for a time. It was quartered in an old bakery on Water Street, opposite Union Street, on the ground now occupied by the Housatonic Railroad building, and details were sent down daily to mount guard in an earthwork upon the peninsula known as the "Tongue." Another detachment occupied "Fort Union," upon Grover's Hill, Black Rock.

Some time after this company had been ordered elsewhere, probably during the year 1814, the community was startled one afternoon by the sight of two British men-of-war coming to anchor opposite the town. These vessels belonged to the fleet which, under the command of Sir Thomas Hardy, the friend and companion of the illustrious Nelson, was blockading Decatur at New London. Their port-holes were raised, as if it was intended to shell the town, and by the aid of a spy-glass it could be seen that their decks were swarming with men. People recalled to mind the fate of Fairfield and Norwalk in the Revolution, and, though the sun went down and darkness came on without the firing of a gun or any attempt being made to land, the excitement on shore was very great, and continued to increase throughout the night. No one slept, the church-bells were rung, the money and valuable papers belonging to the Bridgeport Bank were removed into the country for security, and not a few of the people, taking with them their most portable property, sought safety upon the summit of Toilsome Hill. Of course the militia were called out and made ready to welcome the invaders "with hospitable hands to bloody graves," and Gen. Enoch Foote sent messengers for reinforcements to all the neighboring towns, some of which responded, while others did not.

To the great relief of all, when morning dawned not a trace of the British ships could be seen. They had sailed during the night, having only anchored here to procure a supply of fresh provisions, which, under cover of darkness, were purchased from certain parties on shore. A man named Garlick, who was proprietor of the Johnson tide-mill, in West Stratford, carried on contraband traffic of this kind quite extensively, buying many sheep and cattle and selling them again at such times to the officers of the British fleet. The enemy never made any attempt to land here, but their vessels were frequently in sight, and caused much alarm to the timid.

One evening the sentinel stationed upon the shore, near where the Soldiers' Monument now stands, rode furiously up town shouting at the top of his voice, "The British have landed!" Two parties were sent down in different directions to meet the supposed invaders, and in the darkness fired upon each other, causing great excitement for some time, but, fortunately, no lives were sacrificed.

The news of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain was received in New York, Feb. 11, 1815, and was welcomed with an illumination. A public celebration in honor of the event was held in Bridgeport, February 22d. There was firing of cannon and ringing of bells at daybreak, and in the forenoon a procession headed by a band of music marched through the streets to the North church, where the President's proclamation was read, Rev. Messrs. Shelton and Waterman offered prayer, and J. A. Crocker pronounced an oration. After the exercises in the church were concluded there was a public dinner at Knapp's Hotel, and a ball in the evening. At Fairfield an ox was barbecued on the public green.

On the night of Aug. 20, 1821, Gen. Lafayette and suite, while on a journey from New York to Boston, put up in Bridgeport at Knapp's Hotel, on the corner of Wall and Water Streets. Preparations had been made for an escort to meet the party in Fairfield and conduct it in triumph to the hotel, but these were disconcerted by the lateness of the hour—past eleven o'clock—of the general's arrival, nearly every one having given up expecting him and retired to rest.

An eye-witness* gives the following account of his reception next morning:

"At five in the morning the bells began ringing and the cannon firing. Lafayette had arrived and slept securely through the night at Knapp's. A few minutes later the street before the hotel was thronged with men, and the walk before the brick stores was filled with ladies. Lafayette and his suite made their appearance upon the balcony between Mr. Hubbell and Mr. Lockwood. The people welcomed Lafayette with three cheers. He replied, 'I am very happy to receive your kind welcome.' Afterwards, placing his hand upon the balustrade, he exclaimed, not in a loud voice, but with much feeling, 'Happy, happy people!' The ladies now formed in line in front of the men, and, going up one by one, shook hands with him. The men did the same, and I grasped the hand of Lafayette."

After breakfast Lafayette resumed his journey eastward, and was accompanied by a disorderly procession of the townspeople, some on horseback, others in vehicles of various descriptions. At Washington Bridge, Gen. Enoch Foote made brief farewell remarks "in behalf of the citizens of Bridgeport," but a few of the escort kept on as far as Milford.

In the year 1819, thinking that Bridgeport was fully capable of managing its own affairs, and feeling the inconvenience of being compelled to go to Stratford to vote at every election, the people of this place petitioned the Legislature to be set off into a separate town. Their petition was defeated by the opposition of the Stratford representatives. In 1821 the attempt was renewed, and this time was successful, no opposition being offered on the part of Stratford. In fact, finding that the Bridgeport men were very decided and could outvote them at town-meetings, the people of Stratford favored the division of their town, but were careful to have the boundary-line established to suit their own interests and not those of Bridgeport. This is the reason why our township, down to the year 1870, was so extremely narrow, and why the eastern shore of our harbor still remains under another jurisdiction.

At the time of the setting off, Bridgeport is reported to have contained about seventeen hundred inhabitants and two hundred and eighteen dwelling houses.

* Rev. Edward W. Peet, D.D.

There were also within its limits two flouring-mills, and seventy-three stores and manufactories. The number of the taxable polls was two hundred and thirty-five, and the valuation of property, according to the returns made by the assessors for that year, was twenty-four thousand seven hundred and one dollars.

Division Street, now Park Avenue, continued to be the western boundary of the township until 1870, when that portion of Fairfield lying east of Ash Creek was annexed by act of the Legislature.

The city of Bridgeport was incorporated in May, 1836. At the first city meeting Isaac Sherman, Jr., was elected mayor, and Ira Sherman city clerk. In the year 1839, owing to the financial troubles resulting from the issue of city bonds to the Housatonic Railroad Company, East Bridgeport petitioned the Assembly to be set off from the city. Their request was granted, and for twenty-five years our neighbors upon the east side of the river, while belonging to the town, had no voice in city affairs. In 1864, however, the eastern district was reunited to the city, of which it has since formed a very important part.

The charter of Bridgeport has been so frequently amended that to give an exact account of its successive changes would require the pen of a historian like Hallam.

Following is a list of the mayors of the city from its first incorporation to the present time: Isaac Sherman, 1836; Daniel Sterling, 1837; Alanson Hamlin, 1838; Charles Foote, 1839; Charles Bostwick, 1840; William P. Burrall, 1841; James C. Loomis, 1843; Henry K. Harral, 1844; Sherwood Sterling, 1847; Henry K. Harral, 1849; John Brooks, Jr., 1851; Henry K. Harral, 1852; Charles B. BRIDGEPORT has changed wonderfully in almost every respect within the memory of many persons now living. One well-known citizen tells the writer that he can recollect the time when Main Street was bordered with common rail-fences for almost its entire length, and it was necessary to let down a pair of bars before going up upon Golden Hill. Another speaks of the time when he rented a broad tract fronting upon the river and extending as far back as Lafayette Street, to be used as a cow-pasture, for the sum of seven dollars per year. In 1824 a map of Bridgeport was published by H. L. Barnum, a print of which, though upon a smaller scale, forms one of the illustrations of this work and will repay careful examination. Even since the incorporation of the place as a city, in 1836, it has increased in population more than sevenfold. The article upon Bridgeport in Barber's "Historical Collection of Connecticut," written in the following year,—1837,—is worth reading in this connection, and, as copies of the work are now scarce, the greater part of it is herewith reproduced:

"Bridgeport was incorporated as a town in 1821. It was formerly that part of the parish of Stratfield lying in the town of Stratford. It is of a triangular shape, averaging four miles in length from north to south and over two miles in breadth, containing perhaps about ten square miles. It is bounded north by Trumbull; east by Stratford; south by the waters of Long Island Sound; and west by Fairfield. The township is generally level, and has a strong, fertile soil.

"The city of Bridgeport was incorporated in 1836. It is mostly built on the west side of an arm of the sea, seventeen miles southwest from New Haven, sixty-two miles from New York, and four from Fairfield. The harbor extends about three miles inland to the head of tide-water, where it meets Pequonnoek River, a considerable mill-stream. The average width of the harbor at high water is eighty rods. At low water most of it is bare, leaving a channel about a dozen rods wide; common tides rise seven feet,—spring tides, nine. The depth of water on the bar at high water is about thirteen feet; within the bar the water is much deeper, having a muddy bottom. The bridge across the harbor is about one mile and a half from its mouth, seventy-five rods in length, built on trestles, with a draw for vessels to proceed above. The surface on which the town is principally built is a plain about twelve feet above high-water mark. There is, however, a rise called Golden Hill, commencing about one hundred rods northwest of the centre of the present buildings, which after a gradual ascent of about twenty rods, in which the perpendicular elevation is fifty feet, presents a surface of half a mile square, forming a delightful situation for an upper town; from this elevation is a fine prospect of the Sound and surrounding scenery. Though situated within three miles of Stratford and four of Fairfield, both among the earliest settlements in the State at the close of the Revolutionary war, there were but ten or twelve houses on the site where Bridgeport is now built. In 1790 there were but one hundred and ten inhabitants. In 1830 there were upwards of eighteen hundred in the borough. The number of inhabitants at this time (1837) in the city is three thousand four hundred and sixteen.

"The original name of the village (now city) was Newfield, which in 1800 was incorporated as a borough and called Bridgeport.

"There are five churches in the limits of the city,—one Episcopal, erected in 1801, now (1837) used by the Baptists; two Congregational: the first Congregational church was erected in 1803 (?) by the society formerly worshiping in Stratfield, the other in 1830; the Methodist, erected in 1822; and the present Episcopal church, now building. The ancient meeting-house of the parish of Stratfield stood about one mile and a half northwest of the central part of the city, on the Line Road between Fairfield and Bridgeport. It was taken down a year or two since.

"The first newspaper printed in the village was in 1795, and edited by Lazarus Beach. The first bridge was erected across the harbor in 1788 (?). There are two banks in this place,—the Bridgeport and Connecticut Banks, the former incorporated in 1806, the latter in 1831. The number of inhabitants within the limits of the town is estimated at upwards of four thousand. A daily line of steamboats between Bridgeport and New York was established in July, 1834. Among the principal articles manufactured in this place are saddlery and carriages. The whale-fishery of late has received considerable attention. Bridgeport at this time is rapidly increasing in wealth and population. A charter was granted in 1836 for a railroad, called the Housatonic Railroad, following the valley of the Housatonic about eighty-five miles to West Stockbridge, Mass."

Allusion has been made to the prosecution of the whaling-business from this port. In May, 1833, Eben Fairchild, Daniel Tomlinson, David Perry, Samuel F. Hurd, and David P. Minot were incorporated under the name of "The Bridgeport Whaling Company;" the capital stock of the company was one hundred thousand dollars, and the object of its formation was "to prosecute the whale and other fisheries in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans." The company owned four ships, called the "Atlantic," "Hamilton," "Harvest," and "Stieglitz."

When the news was received that one of the whaleships was outside great crowds of people used to assemble at the water's edge, usually at Stephen Hawley's lumber-yard, where the docks of the Housatonic Railroad Company now are, to welcome the mariners home from their long voyage. The boat's crew would bend to their oars until it seemed as if they would snap them, and the final pull as the boat neared the wharf would make it almost leap from the water. Then a great shout of joy would go up as the adventurers landed, and each would be surrounded with a throng of friends and relatives eager to bid him welcome. These vessels made quite a number of voyages with varying success, but, upon the whole, the business was not profitable, and after a few years it was discontinued. The late Deacon Sherwood Sterling was the last secretary of the company.

THE RAILROAD EPOCH.

Bridgeport, from its geographical position, is the natural depot for the products of the valleys of the Housatonic and the Naugatuck, and it was in order to secure the trade of Litchfield County that the Newtown turnpike was chartered, in 1801. Efforts were made from time to time, however, to divert this trade from Bridgeport to other ports, such as Black Rock and Norwalk. New roads were opened for this purpose, and in 1827 a company was chartered by the Legislature with power to build a canal from the Housatonic River at New Milford to tide-water at Saugatuck Harbor. The desire to counteract such plans was one reason why the people of Bridgeport were inclined to take an active interest in the project of a railroad running northward to the Massachusetts line when that measure was first proposed.

Others may have originally suggested the idea of such a railroad, but to the late Alfred Bishop belongs the credit of first taking steps to carry it into practical effect, and to him, as the author of its complete system of railway communication, Bridgeport is certainly much indebted, and owes no small degree of its present prosperity.

Mr. Bishop was born in Stamford, Conn., Dec. 21, 1798, but in early manhood removed to New Jersey, where he engaged in farming. Upon his farm he made numerous personal experiments with pickaxe, shovel, and wheelbarrow, obtaining in this way exact estimates of the cost of moving masses of earth to a distance, which he afterwards turned to good account in his business as a railroad contractor. Before leaving New Jersey he had already become known as the builder of the Morris Canal and the bridge over the Raritan at New Brunswick. In 1836, Mr. Bishop removed to Bridgeport, where he built the residence upon Golden Hill Street until recently occupied by his widow. His connection with the Housatonic, New York and New Haven, and the Naugatuck Railroads is related elsewhere. Had his life been spared, it was his intention to present to Bridgeport a tract of land in the centre of the city for a public park, but on the 11th of June, 1849, at the comparatively early age of fifty-one years, he died, at Saratoga, whither he had gone for much-needed rest.

At the funeral, which was on June 13th, his pastor, Rev. Dr. Hewitt, preached the sermon, and the Common Council, which had previously passed resolutions of respect, attended in a body.

Mr. Bishop left a large estate to his family, and in his will, besides an annuity to the Rev. Dr. Hewitt, was a legacy of eight thousand dollars to the American Bible Society, and another of five thousand dollars to the Ladies' Charitable Society of this city, the income of which is still applied to benevolent purposes.

In March, 1836, a little gathering of gentlemen met in the parlors of the old Sterling Hotel, to discuss the need of a railroad from Bridgeport to the northern line of the State. Eventually, they thought, this road would not only bring to Bridgeport the trade of the Housatonic valley, but would be extended from its southern terminus to New York, and thus become the great medium of freight and passenger communication between that city and Albany during the winter season, when the Hudson River was closed by ice.

Railroads were then in their infancy, it being but seven years since the first locomotive in the country was imported, and but two years since the Boston and Albany—the pioneer road of New England—was opened for travel, but Mr. Bishop succeeded in infusing some of his own enthusiasm into the gentlemen present, and before the meeting adjourned a petition for the proposed road had been signed by nearly all of them. Two months later Enoch Foote, William Peet, W. C. Sterling, and their successors, were incorporated by the Legislature of Connecticut under the name of "The Housatonic Railroad Company," with authority to build a road from Sheffield, Mass., to Brookfield, Conn., and from thence to tide-water at Bridgeport, or such other point as might be deemed expedient.

In order to aid the undertaking, the city of Bridgeport, at a meeting held March 2, 1837, voted to subscribe for stock of the new company to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, and individuals residing in other towns upon the route subscribed for two hundred thousand dollars more.

Ex-Governor Gideon Tomlinson acted for a time as president of the company, but at the first regular election, April 5, 1837, the following persons were chosen officers of the road: William P. Burrall, President; William H. Noble, Secretary; Jesse Sterling, Treasurer; William P. Burrall, Edwin Porter, Samuel Simons, Stephen Lounsbury, Charles De Forest, of Bridgeport, Anan Hine, Asa Pickett, of New Milford, Alpheus Fuller, of Kent, and Peter Biers, of Cornwall, Directors.

Mr. Horace Nichols subsequently became treasurer of the road, and held the position until his resignation, in 1848. A contract was made by the board of directors with Messrs. Bishop and Sykes to build the entire road for the sum of $936,000,—viz., cash, $636,000, and stock of the company at par, $300,000. Work was commenced in July, 1837, about three hundred men being employed by the contractors.

Owing to the panic of 1837, which caused nearly all the banks and moneyed institutions of the country to suspend specie payments, subscriptions for stock were not received as rapidly as had been anticipated, and the progress of the road was delayed.

In February, 1840, the southern division of the road—viz., from Bridgeport to New Milford—was completed and opened for travel. The cost up to that time had been, for the road proper, $476,000; for cars, engines, depots, tanks, etc., $99,000; total, $575,000.

The remaining portion of the road was opened Dec. 1, 1842. Much annoyance was caused by the original track, which consisted of an iron strap fastened upon wooden sills by spikes, which often became loose, when the weight of passing trains caused it to curl up into "snake-heads." In 1846 it was replaced by iron rails of the present pattern.

March 25, 1838, the city of Bridgeport voted to confirm the previous subscription of one hundred thousand dollars, and authorized an additional one of fifty thousand dollars, and Messrs. Henry Dutton, F. C. Bassett, and Lockwood De Forest were appointed agents for the city to raise the necessary funds by issuing coupon bonds. These bonds were paid to the railroad company in lieu of cash, and by the company were disposed of to other parties.

At the May session in 1838 the Legislature by a special act validated the action of the city of Bridgeport, referred to above, in subscribing for the stock of the Housatonic Railroad Company, and in issuing bonds in payment for the stock. This act of the General Assembly was approved at a city meeting held for the purpose, but no provision was made for the payment of the bonds or of the coupons as they fell due.

The action of the majority was viewed with alarm by many of the leading tax-payers, who in January, 1839, appointed a "Council of Safety" to advise as to what measures should be taken in regard to these bonds. This council was composed of thirteen members, Philo Hurd being chairman and Isaac Sherman secretary. Eminent counsel were also retained by the city, and an effort was made to secure the services of Daniel Webster, but Mr. Webster was obliged to decline the case on account of other engagements. No active effort seems to have been made by any one to repudiate the debt, but a very general desire was manifested that some competent tribunal should decide to what extent the private property of citizens in the minority could be taken to satisfy a debt created by the vote of a majority, many of whom were not tax-payers.

In June, 1843, the railroad company obtained judgment against the city in the Superior Court, and, an appeal to the Supreme Court of Errors having been decided in favor of the plaintiff, an execution on this judgment was issued and placed in the hands of Deputy Sheriff Smith, of Norwalk, to be by him levied and collected. This officer then first demanded payment of the amount from the mayor, clerk, and treasurer of the city in turn, and then, payment not having been made, called upon them to exhibit goods, chattels, or lands belonging to the debtors,—viz., the Mayor, Common Council, and freemen of the city,—which they were either unable or unwilling to do. The deputy sheriff then, acting under legal advice, broke open the dry goods store of Bronson B. Beardsley and the wholesale grocery of Niles, Thorp & Co., and, seizing a quantity of goods from the former, sold them at the post. Mr. Beardsley brought an action against the deputy sheriff for taking his property unlawfully, but in June, 1844, the case was decided against him. It was then carried to the Supreme Court of the State, where the decision in favor of the defendant was affirmed, Judge Church, in giving the opinion, using the following language:

“The city of Bridgeport, with great deliberation and unanimity, and under sanction of the General Assembly, has contracted a debt. The securities issued by the city have been purchased by bona-fide holders, with its assent, and upon the faith of the city and the laws. No funds, either by taxation or otherwise, have been provided for payment. A right without a remedy is not an admitted principle. We know of no other practical remedy but the one to which this plaintiff has resorted.”

This was a very important decision, as the question at issue—viz., the liability of private property for the debts of a municipality—had never before been adjudicated. Once definitely settled, however, immediate steps were taken for the payment of overdue interest and legal expenses, and a tax of seven and a half per cent. upon the entire property of the city was laid and collected.

In 1856 a sinking fund of fifty thousand dollars—this being the sum derived from the sale of the stock owned by the city—was established by Mayor Calhoun, which, by careful management, has increased from year to year, until the greater part of the railroad debt of the city has already been paid off, and for the balance, due in 1886, full provision is already made.

The Housatonic Railroad, which had largely been built with borrowed capital, was much crippled. In 1844 it passed into the hands of a committee of twenty citizens, and for some time was operated under the name of E. Gregory & Co. Preferred stock to a large amount was finally issued, and a reorganization of the company effected.

Judging from the last report of the railroad commissioners, however, this road is now in a prosperous state. At the beginning of the year 1880 it had 74 miles of track, extending from Bridgeport to Sheffield, Mass., besides several branches and leased lines. Its capital stock is $2,000,000,—viz., $820,000 old stock, and $1,180,000 preferred. Its bonded debt is $550,000, and its floating indebtedness $228,038.73; total, $778,038.73. It has 20 locomotives, 32 passenger- and baggage-cars and 440 freight-cars, 420 employees, and 20 stations. It carried last year 252,740 passengers and 225,937 tons of freight, and its revenue from all sources was $599,660.09.

The railroad commissioners, in concluding their report, say of this road,— “Steel rails have been laid as far north as Merwinsville, and it is proposed to continue the steel track during the present year to the State line. The bridges, track, and rolling-stock of this road are all in good condition. The usual dividend of eight per cent. has been paid to the preferred stockholders.”

The following are the officers of the company: William H. Barnum, President; David S. Draper, Vice-President; Charles K. Averill, Secretary and Treasurer; Henry C. Cogswell, General Freight Agent; Hobart W. Watson, Chief Clerk; L. B. Stillson, Superintendent; William H. Barnum, of Lime Rock, Conn.; Samuel Willets, of New York; Horace Nichols, William D. Bishop, of Bridgeport; George W. Peet, of Falls Village; Edward Leavitt, John B. Peck, of New York; D. S. Draper, of Great Barrington; A. B. Mygatt, of New Milford, Directors.

In the year 1844 an act of incorporation was obtained from the Legislature of Connecticut by Joseph E. Sheffield, of New Haven, Anson G. Phelps, of New York, and others, giving them permission to lay out and build a railroad, not exceeding six rods in width, from New Haven to the western boundary of the State, and to transport persons and property upon it by the power of steam or any other mechanical force, by animals, or “by any combination of these which said company may choose.” May 11, 1846, the Legislature of the State of New York granted the same persons permission to extend their proposed railroad from the Connecticut line to connect with the Harlem road at Williams Bridge, N. Y.

The first stockholders' meeting was held at New York City, May 19, 1846, when the following board of directors was elected: Robert Schuyler, Anson G. Phelps, Elihu Townsend, Morris Ketchum, of the city of New York; Henry J. Sanford, of Stamford; William P. Burrall, Stephen Tomlinson, of Bridgeport; Joseph E. Sheffield, of New Haven; F. R. Griffin, of Guilford. At a subsequent meeting of the directors Robert Schuyler was chosen president and William P. Burrall secretary.

Preliminary surveys having been made by Alexander C. Twining, on the 27th of October, 1846, a contract was made with Messrs. Alfred Bishop and Sidney G. Miller to build the road from the depot of the Hartford and New Haven Railroad, in the city of New Haven, to Williams Bridge. The contract included the cost of obtaining a right of way of not less than four rods wide, and of building upon it a single-track railroad with four miles of turnouts, also the grounds and buildings for eleven depots, sundry water-stations, and numerous culverts. It also called for substantial bridges over the various streams crossed, including the Housatonic, Pequonnock, Saugatuck, and Norwalk Rivers, and the marsh at West Haven. Work was to be commenced by the first day of December, 1846, and was to be completed by Aug. 1, 1848. The contract price was two and a quarter millions of dollars, payable partly in cash and partly in the company's stock, as follows,—viz.:

Cash, in installments, as work is completed.....	$1,350,000
9000 shares of stock at par.....	900,000
Total	$2,250,000

The contractors were also each to receive a free pass for the term of their natural lives.

As usual in works of this magnitude, there was a slight delay in its completion. Trains commenced running from Bridgeport to Fairfield Sept. 2, 1848, but, though finished from New Haven to Westport in October, 1848, it was not until Jan. 1, 1849, that the road was fully open for travel over its entire length. The original fare, if the writer's information is correct, was from New Haven to New York, one dollar and fifty cents; from Bridgeport to New York, one dollar.

The capital stock of the road was originally two and a half millions of dollars, divided into twenty-five thousand shares, and at the completion of the road was owned as follows:

New York.....	15,374 shares.
Boston.....	4,600 "
Connecticut.....	5,026 "
Total.....	25,000 "

As already noted, Messrs. Stephen Tomlinson and William P. Burrall, of this city, were stockholders and members of the first board of directors. So many Bridgeport gentlemen have been connected with this road that some additional particulars respecting it, though not in strictly chronological order, may properly find a place here.

In May, 1851, an additional track was laid, and the capital stock was increased to three million dollars. Two severe disasters have occurred in its history,—the first the terrible accident and loss of life at Norwalk bridge, May 6, 1853, and the second the fraudulent overissue of stock by its first president, Robert Schuyler, which came to light in July, 1854,—but, with these exceptions, it has had a career of almost unbroken prosperity. Much of this success is due to the ability of Hon. William D. Bishop, of Bridgeport, who was its efficient president from May 17, 1867, to March 1, 1879, when ill health compelled him to resign. He is still, however, a member of the board of directors. Hon. Nathaniel Wheeler has also been a director from May 19, 1870, to the present time. Mr. John T. Moody and Mr. William H. Stevenson, of this place, are also connected with the road,—the former as assistant superintendent and the latter as superintendent of the Shore Line division.

In the summer of 1872 the New York and New Haven road was consolidated with the Hartford and New Haven Railroad, and in June of the following year the work of equipping it throughout was completed. The consolidated road now leases the Boston and New York Air Line, paying that company six per cent. of the earnings of the main line. It has also leased the Shore Line since 1870 for an annual rental of one hundred thousand dollars. The distance from Springfield, Mass., to Harlem Junction is one hundred and twenty-three miles, but the total length of main lines and branches is two hundred and twenty-two miles.

The capital stock of the consolidated road is $15,500,000, and the total debt only $428,978.48. There are 1683 stockholders, and the earnings from all sources in 1879 were $3,997,892.96. About fifteen passenger-trains traverse the road in each direction daily. There are 57 stations, 84 locomotives, 1740 cars, and during the past year 3,587,899 passengers and 1,209,630 tons of freight were transported. The usual dividend paid to the stockholders is ten per cent.

The idea of a railroad through the Naugatuck valley, terminating at Bridgeport, is also due to Alfred Bishop. This road was chartered in 1845, the following persons being the incorporators: Timothy Dwight, of New Haven; Philo Hurd, of Bridgeport; Green Kendrick, of Waterbury; Alfred B. Brittain, of Bridgeport; Thomas Burlock, of Derby; George L. Schuyler, of New York; William P. Burrall, of Bridgeport.

At the organization of the first board of directors, Feb. 18, 1848, Timothy Dwight was chosen president, Ira Sherman secretary, and Horace Nichols treasurer of the company. Messrs. Dwight and Sherman both died many years ago, but Mr. Nichols still retains his post. The recently published history of Derby, Conn., makes the following brief reference to this veteran officer:

"When the Naugatuck road was started Mr. Nichols was elected treasurer, and has continued therein—a faithful, honorable, prompt, and energetic officer—until the present time. He is unostentatious, scarcely allowing a notice of himself to be made in print, constant in his attention to business, and therefore greatly successful, and merits and receives the esteem of all with whom he is associated."

The original intention was to build only from Bridgeport to Waterbury, but the capital stock was afterwards increased from eight hundred thousand dollars to one million two hundred thousand dollars, and the road was extended to Winsted, Mr. Alfred Bishop being the contractor. He did not live to see the work entirely completed, but died in June, 1849, while the road was not finished until September 24th of the same year. Since the opening of the road villages upon the line have grown into thriving and prosperous cities, manufactures known the world over have been established, and the value of real estate has been increased fivefold.

The Naugatuck enjoys the reputation of being one of the best-managed roads in the country. It has neither floating nor bonded debt, pays all bills monthly, and its stock is in demand as a sound, dividend-paying investment.

The present officers are: E. F. Bishop, President; Horace Nichols, Treasurer; James Potter, Chief Clerk; George W. Beach, Superintendent; Samuel Wilmot, Auditor. The directors are W. D. Bishop, R. Tomlinson, E. F. Bishop, Bridgeport; J. G. Wetmore, Winsted; A. L. Dennis, Newark, N. J.; H. Bronson, J. B. Robertson, New Haven; R. M. Bassett, Derby; F. J. Kingsbury, Waterbury.

The Naugatuck now leases and operates the New Haven and Derby road, paying the latter twenty per cent. of the gross earnings of both corporations, the contract to be readjusted every five years. Its length, from Winsted to its junction with the consolidated road, near the Housatonic River, is 56½ miles. Its capital stock is $2,000,000,—held by 432 persons, residing in every quarter of the world except South America,—and its total debt does not exceed $30,000, while its earnings from all sources in the year 1879 were $516,594.14. This road has 19 stations, 254 employees, 11 locomotives, and 310 cars, and transported in the above year 261,469 passengers and 199,845 tons of freight.

The railroad commissioners of the State, in their last annual report, say of it,—

“Steel rails have taken the place of the original iron the whole length of the road, and the track is kept in good surface and alignment. The passenger-cars have, during the past year, been equipped with the Miller platform and the Westinghouse automatic brake. The usual dividend of ten per cent. has been paid to the stockholders.”

The decade between 1850 and 1860 was one of great prosperity for Bridgeport, and during this period it first began to assume the appearance of a city. In 1853 the Bridgeport Water Company was formed, and in 1854 and 1855 water-mains were laid through the principal streets by Nathaniel Greene and his associates. The Bridgeport Gas-Light Company was chartered in 1849, and commenced business in December, 1851. In June, 1850, the Bridgeport Library was incorporated. About the same time the Farmers' (now the First National), the Bridgeport City, and the Pequonnoek Banks were chartered, several churches were dedicated, and two new bridges opened between the city proper and East Bridgeport. The newly-completed railroads brought much business to the place, and many new residents were attracted hither. Manufacturing, except for home consumption, was yet in its infancy, but the old-established houses of Lyon & Calhoun, afterwards Lacey, Mecker & Co., manufacturers of saddlery and harness, and of Tomlinson, Wood & Co., now Hincks & Johnson, carriage-builders, gave employment to many workmen and turned out an excellent class of work for export.

East Bridgeport now began to attract attention as an excellent site for building and for manufactories. The following paragraphs relating to its rapid growth are slightly abridged from the “Autobiography” of Hon. P. T. Barnum:

“In 1851 I purchased from Mr. William H. Noble the undivided half of his late father's homestead, consisting of fifty acres of land lying on the east side of the river, opposite the city of Bridgeport. We intended this as the nucleus of a new city, which we concluded could soon be built up, in consequence of many natural advantages that it possesses. Before giving publicity to our plans, however, we purchased one hundred and seventy-four acres contiguous to that which we already owned, and laid out the entire property in regular streets and lined them with trees, reserving a beautiful grove of six or eight acres, which we inclosed and converted into a public park. We then commenced selling alternate lots at the same price which the land cost us by the acre. Our sales were always made on the condition that a suitable dwelling-house, store, or manufactory should be erected upon the land within one year from the date of purchase; that every building should be placed at a certain distance from the street in a style of architecture approved by us; that the grounds should be inclosed with acceptable fences and kept clean and neat; with other conditions which would render the locality a desirable one for respectable residents. A new foot-bridge was built, connecting this place with the city of Bridgeport, and a public toll-bridge which belonged to us was thrown open to the public free. We also put up a fine covered drawbridge, between the two bridges already existing, at a cost of sixteen thousand dollars, which we also made free to the public for several years. We built and leased to a Union Company of young coach-makers a large and elegant coach-manufactory, which was the beginning of the extensive manufactories subsequently built in East Bridgeport.”

The sagacious policy of Messrs. Barnum and Noble laid the foundation of the prosperity of East Bridgeport, but it was not until the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company removed here that its remarkable growth really commenced. Since that time many other large manufactories have been located here,—notably the Howe Sewing-Machine Company, in 1863; the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, in 1865; the Frary Cutlery Company, Messrs. Glover, Sanford & Sons; the Bridgeport Brass Company; the Farist Steel Company; the Monumental Bronze Company; J. A. House; and not a few smaller concerns. All these have in a greater or less degree contributed to the prosperity of the place.

The same is true of such establishments upon the west side of the river as the Eaton Cole & Burnham Company, the Furniture-Manufacturing Company, the Burlock Manufacturing Company, Thompson, Langdon & Co., the Spring Perch Company, Hincks & Johnson, the Read Carpet Company, the R. Tomlinson Spring Company, Ives, Blakeslee & Co., the Pacific Iron-Works, the John S. Way Company, Bridgeport Patent-Leather Company, Warner Brothers, Bridgeport Malleable Iron Company, Hotchkiss Sons, Parrott Varnish Company, Bridgeport Spring Company, J. B. Secor, Smith & Egge Company, Wheel and Wood-Bending Company, White Manufacturing Company, Bridgeport Organ Company, Lee Arms Company, Fray & Pigg, American Belt, Tin, and Tube Company, Ornamental Wood Company, Bridgeport Coach-Lace Company, Bridgeport Elastic Web Company, Belknap Manufacturing Company, W. F. Swords, Bridgeport Paper-Box Company, Bridgeport Silver Company, H. D. Gates & Company, Etna Spring and Axle Company, the Pequonnoek Paper Company, J. S. Follansbee, Giles and Clancey, Coulter & McKenzie, and a multitude of others.

It is much to be regretted that the limits of the present sketch do not admit of an extended account of each one of them. The Wheeler & Wilson Company, however, has been so long and so intimately connected with Bridgeport, and has given employment to so large a number of the population, that no history of the city, even though a brief one, can be written without containing some account of it.

This company removed to Bridgeport in 1856, but, in order to gain a clear idea of its history, it is necessary to go back to 1849, the year when Allen B. Wilson first invented his sewing-machine. Nathaniel Wheeler, who was born in Watertown, Conn., in 1820, was then carrying on the manufacture of light metallic goods in his native place. Happening to be in New York upon business, he went to see the new sewing-machine, which was then on exhibition in a room in the old Sum building, and was attracting considerable attention. Mr. Wheeler quickly recognized the merits of the invention, and at once entered into a contract to build five hundred of the machines at his factory in Watertown, Mr. Wilson agreeing to remove to that place and superintend their manufacture.

Further improvements having been made in the machine, an application for a patent was filed, and the document was issued Aug. 12, 1851. Messrs. Wheeler and Wilson now entered into copartnership with Alanson Warren and George P. Woodruff, of Watertown, under the firm-name of Wheeler, Wilson & Co., and began the manufacture of machines under the patent. Several hundred had been sold, and Mr. Wheeler had succeeded in introducing them into the extensive shirt-factories at Troy, N. Y., and New Haven, Conn., and had established depots for their sale in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, when, for the better prosecution of the business, the firm was dissolved, and the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company was organized in October, 1853, with a capital of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, one hundred thousand of this sum representing the patent-right, and the remainder standing for tools, machinery, and working capital already employed in the business.

The first president of the company was Alanson Warren, and the first secretary and treasurer George P. Woodruff, while among the original incorporators and stockholders was George Mallory, then of Watertown, but for many years past a resident of this city. Mr. Wheeler was elected president of the company July 18, 1855.

In the spring of 1856, the business having greatly increased, it was decided to remove to East Bridgeport, where the works of the Jerome Clock Company had been purchased. Since that time its history has been identified with that of Bridgeport. The original clock-factory has been greatly enlarged and new buildings erected, so that the establishment is at present one of the most extensive and complete in the country.

At the present time the principal buildings consist of the main factory, for metal-working, assembling, testing, etc., occupying one complete square, 368 by 307 feet, under one roof; a wood-working factory, covering a second square, 526 by 219 feet; a foundry and needle-factory upon a third, 368 by 232 feet; the works altogether covering over seven acres of ground.

Only a few rooms and the more interesting operations can be mentioned here. The main machinery-room is that in which the principal mechanical work is performed in the production of the metal parts of the sewing-machines. This fireproof room is L-shaped, 300 feet in length, 210 feet in width in one part and 100 feet in the other. Power is distributed from four main lines of shafting, which have not perceptibly deviated from correct adjustment since they were first placed in position, thirteen years ago. In this room are no less than 1093 separate machines for special mechanical operations, many of them seemingly possessed of such intelligence and skill as to direct and control their own movements, and only needing consciousness to rise to the plane of the skilled mechanic.

To show how far division of labor is carried, it may be mentioned that the well-known rotary hook undergoes one hundred and twenty-eight distinct operations, a glass-presser thirty-two, and a hemmer seventy.

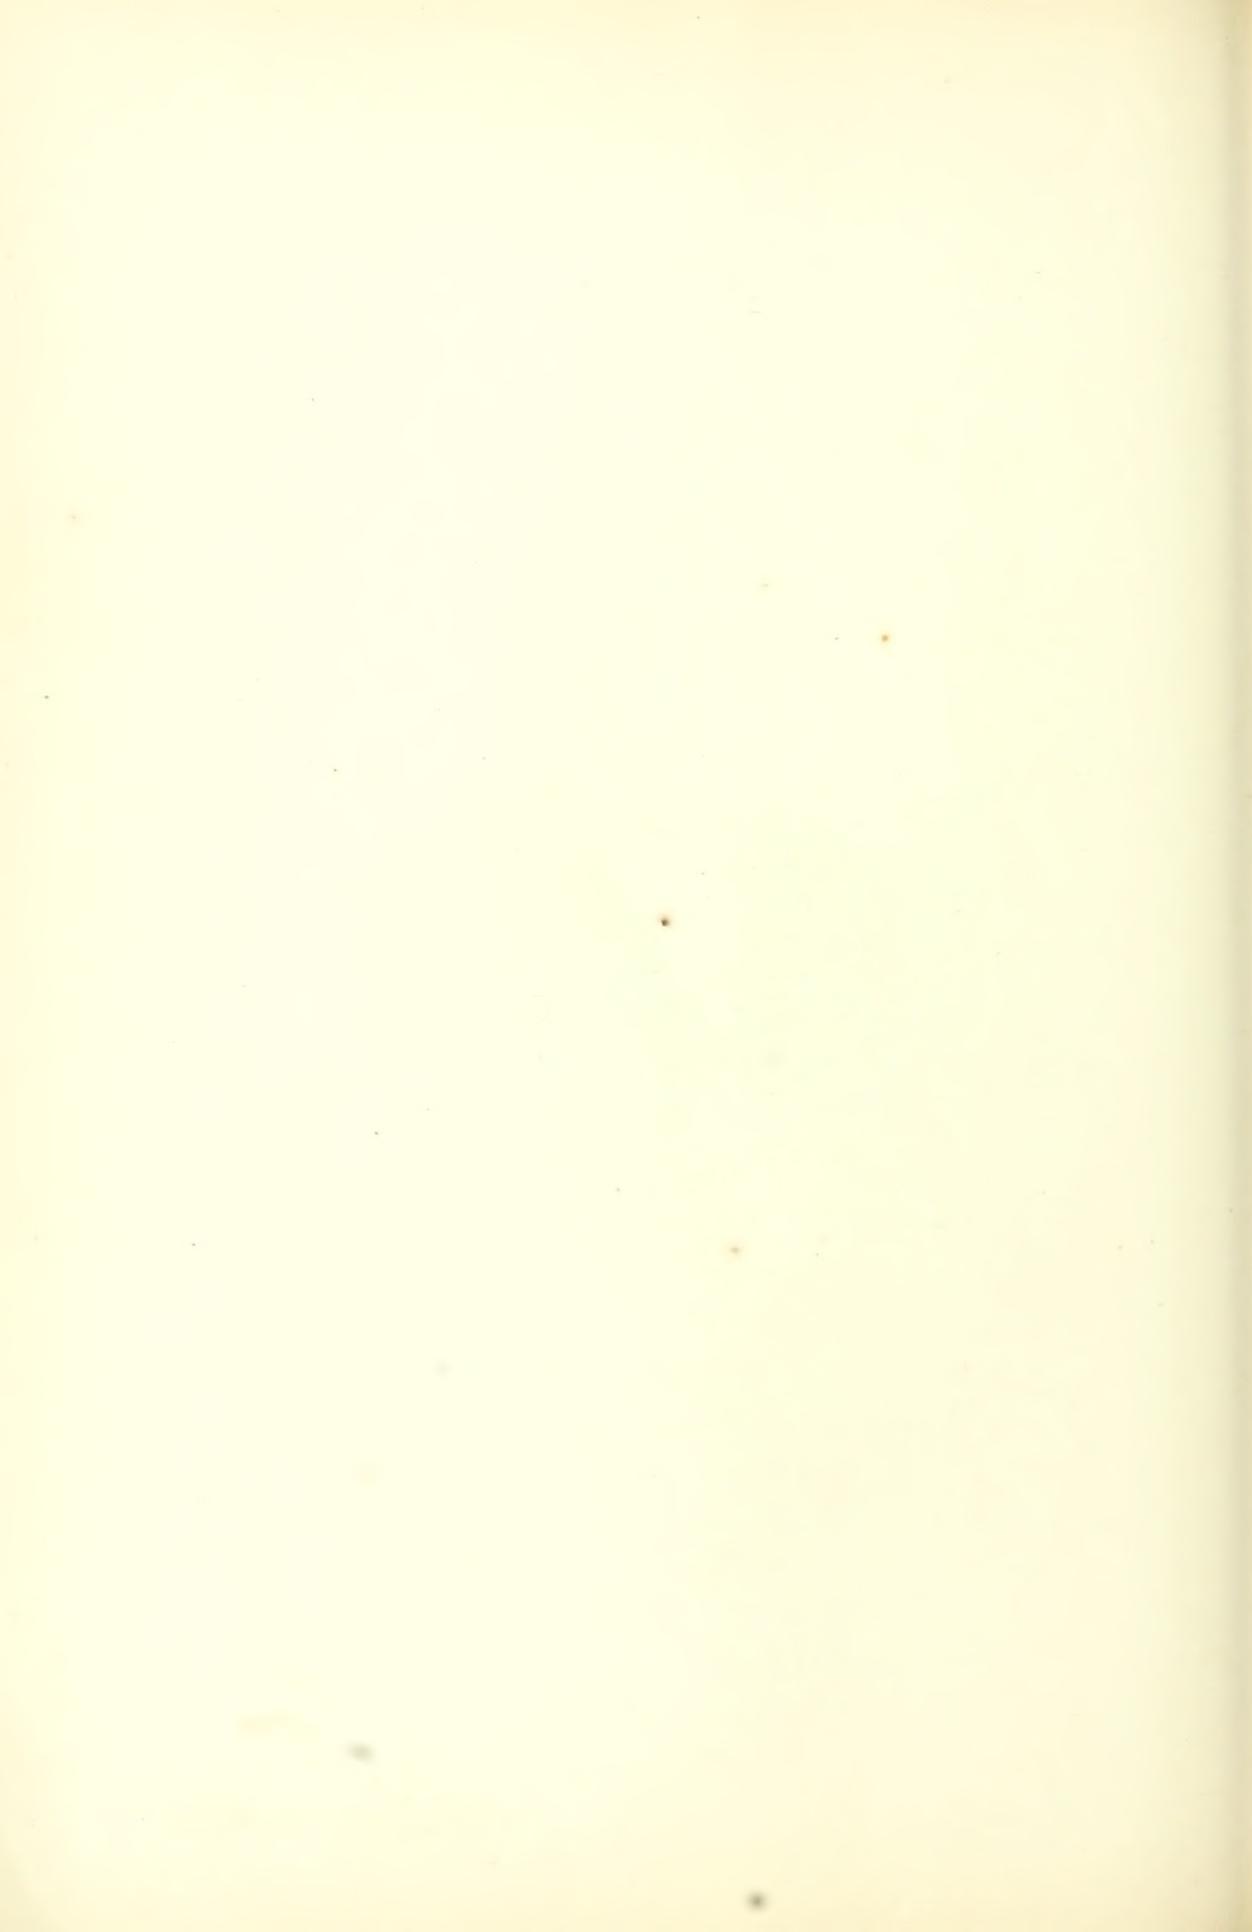

The number of driving-belts which meet the view in this one room is, by actual count, 1676, of the total length of 39,510 feet, or but 90 feet less than 7½ miles. This is exclusive of short feed-belts, etc., of which there are probably as many more.

Passing through a tunnel under the street, we reach the buildings in which are the foundry and the needle-factory. Of the former it need only be said that for convenience and perfection of all appointments it is not surpassed.

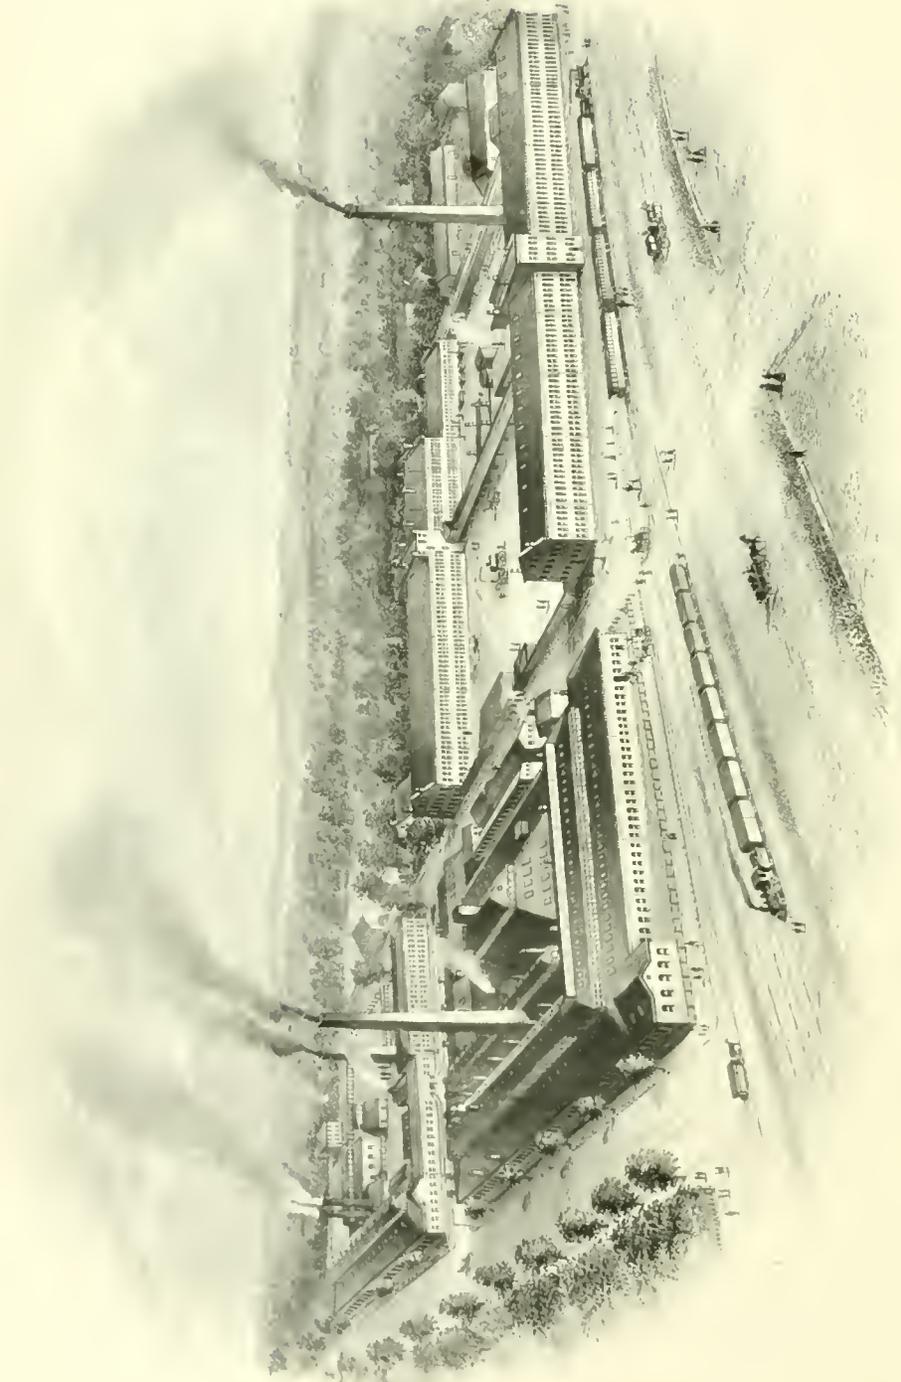

As the sewing-machine proper is useless without the needle, the latter is, of course, an article of prime importance. No department of these works is more interesting than the mechanical processes of converting steel wire into perfectly finished needles. The distinct operations in the making of each needle now number thirty-three, having been recently reduced from fifty-two by improved machinery.

The wood-working or cabinet department of this company is under a separate organization, styled the Sewing-Machine Cabinet Company. The main buildings of this department are two in number, each 526 feet in length. Here is made all the furniture for the machines, from a plain table-top to the most elaborate and expensive full case or cabinet. The raw material, brought from Arkansas and elsewhere, is cut to dimensions in the company's saw-mill, and afterwards worked up into the desired forms. The excellent finish of the cabinet-work is obtained by the use of the wood-filling invented by Mr. Wheeler, and patented Jan. 18, 1876. The invention is said to be one of great value, not only for sewing-machine work, but for all kinds of wood-work where a superior finish is desired.

The present number of employees in all departments of the factory is about 1200, and the aggregate sum paid out to employees of the company in the city of Bridgeport up to the present time is not less than $14,000,000. Most of the workmen are of a superior class.

The following table, recently compiled for the United States Census Bureau, exhibits their nationalities:

" " Ireland.....	197
" " Germany.....	101
" " England.....	49

The merits of the Wheeler & Wilson machine have been recognized at the different World's Fairs. Awards were made to the original machine at London, in 1862, and at Paris, in 1867, and to the improved No. 6 and No. 7, for sewing leather and heavy cloth, at Vienna in 1873, and at Philadelphia in 1876, while the only grand gold medal and grand prize diploma issued to sewing-machines at the Paris Exposition of 1878 was awarded to the Wheeler & Wilson sewing-machine as excelling for general use any of its eighty competitors.

As already stated, the original capital of the company was $160,000, but an increase to $600,000 was authorized by the Legislature in 1864, and a further increase to $1,000,000 in 1866. At this amount it still nominally remains, though the assets are much larger, and the stock sells for several times its par value.

The present officers and representatives of the company are: Nathaniel Wheeler, President; William H. Perry, Secretary and Treasurer; Frederick Hurd, President Sewing-Machine Cabinet Company; Isaac Holden, General Correspondent and Superintendent of Agencies. The directors are N. Wheeler, William H. Perry, of Bridgeport; S. M. Buckingham, James Elton, of Waterbury; T. A. Warren, of New Haven; N. Shipman, of Hartford; C. B. Erwin, of New Britain.

Mr. Wheeler has now been president of this great manufacturing establishment for more than a quarter of a century. He has represented Bridgeport in the Legislature for several terms, and was one of the commissioners for building the new State Capitol at Hartford. He has rendered valuable service to Bridgeport by the discharge of many public trusts, and is at the present time a director of the Public Library, of Mountain Grove Cemetery Association, and a member of the school board and many other institutions. He has always been a warm friend to the cause of education, and to his influence is largely due the decision of the town to erect a new high-school building upon Golden Hill, which will be a credit to the city.

The organization of the perfect system which prevails throughout these works requires excellent business talent, and reflects great credit upon Mr. William H. Perry, who has been connected with the company almost since its organization. He was elected secretary Sept. 5, 1855, and secretary and treasurer July 16, 1856, which office, with that of superintendent, he still holds. Mr. Perry has also rendered important services to Bridgeport for a number of years past as one of the board of park commissioners, and the city is much indebted to him for the present excellent condition of the public pleasure-grounds.

BRIDGEPORT DURING THE REBELLION.

No adequate account of the part taken by Bridgeport in the war of the Rebellion can be compressed into the limits of a sketch like the present. Only a few leading incidents can be given here, but perhaps upon the foundation now laid some future historian may build a better edifice.

The surrender of Fort Sumter was on Sunday, April 14, 1861. On Monday, the 15th, President Lincoln issued his proclamation calling for seventy-five thousand men. On the following day, Governor Buckingham called for one regiment of three months' volunteers, and two days later for a second regiment. Thursday, April 18th, sixteen car-loads of Massachusetts volunteers passed through Bridgeport en route for Baltimore, followed on Friday morning by twenty car-loads more, and on Sunday by still another detachment. These troops were welcomed by a great crowd at the depot, and in firing a salute to them, April 19th, Leopold Schmidt, a member of the German rifle company of this city, was killed, and a comrade of the same company was wounded, the first Connecticut soldiers to fall. The same day the banks voted to loan to the Governor the sum of one hundred thousand dollars.

Saturday evening, April 20th, there was a great war-meeting, presided over by Hon. D. H. Sterling, mayor of the city. The "Star-Spangled Banner" was sung by the assembly, and great enthusiasm prevailed. Some idea of the spirit of the meeting may be obtained from the resolutions which were introduced by Hon. Amos S. Treat. It was unanimously voted that the photographs and the autographs of every member of the companies now being raised should be preserved in the town archives, that ten thousand dollars should be raised for the families of the volunteers, and that when they left for the seat of war the whole population of the place should escort them to the depot. Of the ten thousand dollars voted, seven thousand were subscribed before the meeting closed.

To Capt. (afterwards Col.) Richard Fitzgibbons and to Capt. (afterwards Col.) John Speidel belongs the honor of being the first in the field. Their commands, subsequently designated as Company H, First Connecticut Volunteers, and Rifle Company B, of the same regiment, escorted by the Wheeler & Wilson Band and a great procession, marched to the depot and took the cars on Tuesday, April 22d, followed, a few days later, by Company D, Third Regiment, under command of Capt. (afterwards Lieut.-Col.) Frederick H. Frye. Maj. Henry M. Hoyt, now the publisher of the Morning News, was first lieutenant of Capt. Fitzgibbons' company. Two hundred overcoats, two hundred shirts, and a beautiful flag were presented to the volunteers by the ladies of Bridgeport, who had toiled incessantly to make them since the proclamation was issued.

On Saturday, April 26th, a town-meeting was held, Joseph Thompson acting as moderator, at which it was voted that the town should borrow thirteen thousand dollars,—the sum of ten thousand dollars to be expended for the families of volunteers, and three thousand dollars in raising and equipping additional troops. Thanks were voted to the volunteers already enrolled, and to the patriotic women of the place. Hon. D. H. Sterling was authorized to negotiate the loan, and a committee of seven was chosen to disburse it.

After this there was a lull in the excitement until July 12th, when the news of the battle of Bull Run was received. Early in August, the time of the three months' volunteers having expired, they returned home, and were met with a hearty welcome.

August 24th a picnic of the returned volunteers was held in Hough's Grove. The same day a peace-meeting at Stepany was broken up by a party from Bridgeport, and in the evening the office of the Farmer newspaper was destroyed.

During the fall of 1861 seven companies, to serve for three years, were recruited wholly or in part in Bridgeport,—viz., Company D, First Connecticut Cavalry, Capt. L. N. Middlebrook; Company H, Sixth Connecticut Volunteers, Capt. Henry Biebel, and Company I of the same command, Capt. Thomas Bondren; Company I, of the Seventh Connecticut Volunteers, Capt. Sylvester H. Gray; Company A, of the Eighth Connecticut Volunteers, Lieut. H. M. Hoyt; Companies D and I, of the Ninth Connecticut Volunteers, commanded by Capt. Thomas Coats and Elliott M. Curtis, respectively. Among the field-officers commissioned by the Governor during the same period were Maj. John Speidel, of the Sixth, Lieut.-Col. Richard Fitzgibbon and Maj. Frederick H. Frye, of the Ninth, Regiments.

Several Bridgeport firms also were busy at this time filling government orders for war-material. Gun-carriages and caissons were built by Frederick Wood & Co.; harnesses in great numbers were turned out by Calhoun, Lacey & Co.; while the Pacific Iron-works were busy in manufacturing steam-engines for the "Kanawha" and other gunboats.

The reverses of the Union army under Gen. McClellan in the early summer of 1862 only quickened the patriotic spirit of the loyal people of Bridgeport.

Thursday evening, July 19, 1862, a great war-meeting was held, which filled both Franklin and Washington Halls. Mayor Sterling and Hon. Russell Tomlinson were the presiding officers, and among the speakers were Governor Buckingham, Hon. William D. Bishop, Elias Howe, Jr., the inventor of the sewing-machine, and others. Twenty thousand dollars was subscribed before the meeting closed, to be expended in carrying on the war; and when Mr. Howe announced that he had himself volunteered as a private soldier, the enthusiasm was very great, and numerous young men came forward and signed the roll.

During the next few days enlisting went on rapidly, owing in good degree to the efforts of Private Howe, who went about the streets with drum and life picking up recruits for the Seventeenth, the new Fairfield County regiment. The ranks of the Seventeenth quickly filled up, and in August, 1862, it went into encampment at Camp Aiken, the present site of Seaside Park. During its stay here Rev. A. R. Thompson, of the South Congregational Church, acted as chaplain, and collections were taken up in the churches to provide the regiment with a chapel-tent and a library. August 29th a patriotic meeting was held on the green east of the court-house, attended by the Seventeenth in a body, and addressed by Messrs. Barnum, Bishop, Rev. Dr. Hewitt, Father Lenihan, and others, and on Sunday, September 7th, divine service was conducted in the same place, and a sermon appropriate to the occasion was preached by Rev. J. M. Willey, rector of St. John's Church, who had served as chaplain with one of the three months' regiments.

Aug. 25, 1862, the Fourteenth Regiment, one thousand and fifteen strong, and containing a company from Bridgeport, marched through the streets of Hartford under command of Col. Dwight Morris, of this city, and embarked for the seat of war. Eight days later the Seventeenth, whose field-officers were Col. (afterward Gen.) William H. Noble and Lieut.-Col. Charles Walter, also left for Washington. It contained two full companies from Bridgeport,—D and G,—commanded by Capt. William H. Lacey and James E. Dunham. Most of the members of Company K were also from this place.

The Second Connecticut Light Battery, Capt. John W. Sterling commander, was also recruited almost entirely from Bridgeport, and received marching orders for Washington, Oct. 15, 1862.

During the month of November three additional companies recruited in Bridgeport, under the call for nine months' volunteers, left the State for service in the Department of the Gulf. These were: Company D, Twenty-third Connecticut Volunteers, Capt. C. W. Hall; Company I, Twenty-third Connecticut Volunteers, Capt. William H. May; and Company K, Twenty-fourth Connecticut Volunteers, Lieut. E. N. Goodwin. Lieut.-Col. C. W. Wordin was also commissioned as one of the field-officers of the Twenty-third Regiment.

On the 6th of October, 1862, occurred an event unprecedented in the annals of Bridgeport, viz., a municipal election with but one ticket in the field. Hon. D. H. Sterling was re-elected mayor and a Common Council composed of members of both political parties was chosen without opposition, the whole number of votes cast being but three hundred and sixty-seven.

Mention ought to have been made sooner of the organized work of the loyal women of Bridgeport.

The Ladies' Relief Society was formed Aug. 1, 1861, and from that time forward until the close of the war met every Wednesday for work. Mrs. Woolsey G. Sterling was president until her removal from the city, when her place was filled by Mrs. Daniel Thatcher. The other officers of the society were Miss Lydia R. Ward secretary, and Miss Sarah Jane Hawley treasurer. The cash receipts of the society from its organization to its final meeting, in July, 1865, were $3814.36. Large quantities of supplies were also contributed, chiefly by Bridgeport, but also from fifteen other towns. The main work of the society was in preparing and forwarding hospital garments and stores, co-operating in this good work with the Sanitary Commission; but boxes of provisions, and packages of mittens, stockings, etc., were also forwarded to most of the Connecticut regiments. The average attendance of ladies at the weekly gatherings was about thirty, but over one hundred were sometimes present. The following extract from the final report of the secretary, Miss Lydia R. Ward, is worthy of special notice:

"Voted to place the balance remaining in the hands of the treasurer ($375.74) in trust for the benefit of the destitute children of soldiers, in the hope that as early as September a plan may be devised, which may be adopted by the citizens of Bridgeport, to found a home for these and other destitute children."

The first meeting of the Soldiers' Aid Society was held July 19, 1862, when the following officers were elected: Mrs. D. H. Sterling, President; Mrs. Monson Hawley, Vice-President; Mrs. L. H. Norton, Secretary; Mrs. William E. Seeley, Treasurer. The membership of this society was very large, and its work correspondingly important. During the first six months of its existence its cash receipts were over two thousand five hundred dollars (this amount having been raised by a paper circulated by Messrs. D. H.

Sterling and Henry R. Parrott), and twenty-two boxes had been sent to regiments. In December, 1863, it issued an appeal to the people of the State for fresh vegetables for the soldiers, which was liberally responded to, and several thousand barrels and boxes were received and duly forwarded, Mr. Henry R. Parrott, at that time agent of the Adams Express Company, having charge of the shipment.

The League of Loyal Women of Bridgeport was another organization, begun in April, 1863. Mrs. S. S. Clapp was president and Miss E. B. Whiting secretary, and one hundred and twenty-nine ladies signed the constitution, which pledged them to wear the Union colors and to "give the preference in trade to those known to be truly loyal."

In the summer of 1863 drafting was begun in Bridgeport to fill the quota of this and other places under the repeated calls of President Lincoln, the headquarters for the Fourth District being at the corner of Main and State Streets, over the Pequonnock Bank. The draft had not progressed very far when it became so unpopular that it was suspended, and from that time forward to the end of the war recruits were obtained only through the substitute-broker. Enormous bounties were offered, but, as a rule, the value of the recruit was about in inverse proportion to the amount of the bounty paid. Some few of the substitutes were honorable men and did good service, but the great majority were from the slums of New York City, and deserted upon the first opportunity. The whole history of the substitute business reflects but little credit upon the people of Connecticut, and it was putting a grievous insult upon the volunteers who were fighting the battles of the country at the front to send out such men for their comrades and companions, though it must be admitted that a great many never reached the front, but deserted en route.

Upon the 10th of April, 1865, there was a grand illumination in Bridgeport in honor of the fall of Richmond and of Petersburg, and the surrender of Lee's army. Five days later news was received of President Lincoln's assassination. A meeting of citizens was immediately called, and a committee of thirty was appointed to make arrangements for public funeral exercises. The Common Council met, and passed appropriate resolutions. Mayor Morford issued his proclamation, and on Wednesday, April 19th, which was the appointed day, all business was suspended, places of amusement were closed, the bells of all the churches were tolled, and the citizens assembled in their respective places of public worship, which were draped in mourning, and participated in memorial services in honor of the martyred President.

One of the earliest of the three years' regiments to return was the Fourteenth, which had participated in all the leading engagements of the Army of the Potomac from Antietam to Appomattox, and, after witnessing the surrender of Lee's army and marching in triumph through Richmond at the head of the Second Army Corps, had participated in the grand review at Washington. June 3, 1865, the surviving members of the command, numbering two hundred and thirty-four, reached Hartford, and a week later the small detachment from Bridgeport was received at the depot and marched to the Sterling House, where a collation and many kind words of welcome awaited them.

Friday afternoon, Aug. 4, 1865, a grand reception was given to Companies D, G, and K, of the Seventeenth, which arrived from New Haven upon a special train provided by Elias Howe, Jr. Some five thousand people turned out to meet them; there was a procession through the principal streets; houses were gayly decorated with bunting, and at Franklin Hall there were stirring addresses and music by the glee club. Other companies and detachments were welcomed as they successively returned, though, coming later, their reception was not so demonstrative as was that of the companies belonging to the Seventeenth.

The number of soldiers enlisting from Bridgeport who are known to have been killed in battle, to have died of disease, or to have been starved to death in rebel prisons during the war is one hundred and seventy. Adding to this the number missing in action who were never after heard from, or who died from the effects of wounds received or from disease contracted in camp shortly after their return, the aggregate loss will doubtless exceed two hundred and fifty. Among them were such men as Lieut.-Col. Walter, of the Seventeenth, who was killed at Chambersville; Maj. Wilson Hubbell, of the Sixty-second New York, who fell at Cold Harbor; and Frederick H. Thompson, who died while serving upon the steamship "New London."

Special mention ought to be made here of eight young men,—the oldest can hardly have been more than twenty-one at enlistment,—all of them either schoolmates or members of the same literary society, the old Philomathean, whose early death it is almost impossible to deplore, so bright an example of Christian patriotism have they left to all who come after them. These were Walter Fitch, adjutant of the Sixth Connecticut Volunteers, who received his death-wound in the night attack upon Fort Wagner, while standing upon the parapet cheering on his men; Ord.-Sergt. Albion Brooks, of the Eighth Connecticut Volunteers, who did not live to enter the Christian ministry, as he had purposed, but fell in the charge at Cold Harbor; First Lieut. Franklin Bartlett, only seventeen years of age when he enlisted, who was killed at Hatcher's Run, near Petersburg; Capt. William H. Hawley, of the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers, well termed "a heroic Christian soldier," who, after passing almost unscathed through twenty-five engagements, received a bullet in the brain while defending the captured Weldon Railroad; Adjt. Henry Chatfield, of the Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers, who, refusing to surrender, was shot down by a party of guerrillas in Florida; Corp. Henry T. Winslow, member of a Massachusetts regiment, who fell a victim to the deadly malarial fever of the South; and First Lieut. Richard Ross Crawford, of the Seventh U. S. Infantry, a Virginian by birth, and a Democrat by education, but who remained true to the Old Flag and fell bravely fighting in its defense at Gettysburg, as did also Corp. Alvah Wilcox, of the Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers, who had sometimes been Crawford's opponent in political debate, but who fought under the same banner and has his name inscribed upon the same monument.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

Very soon after the close of the war it was decided by the ladies of the Soldiers' Aid Society that a monument should be erected to perpetuate the memory of our deceased soldiers. The funds at their command were small, but they were carefully invested, and from time to time were increased by fairs, a promenade concert, and other entertainments, until they reached quite a respectable sum. The corner-stone was laid at Seaside Park, Aug. 29, 1866, with appropriate ceremonies, the Governor and his staff, Maj.-Gen. Terry, and a large audience, made up of militia, firemen, veterans, civic societies, and citizens generally, being present.

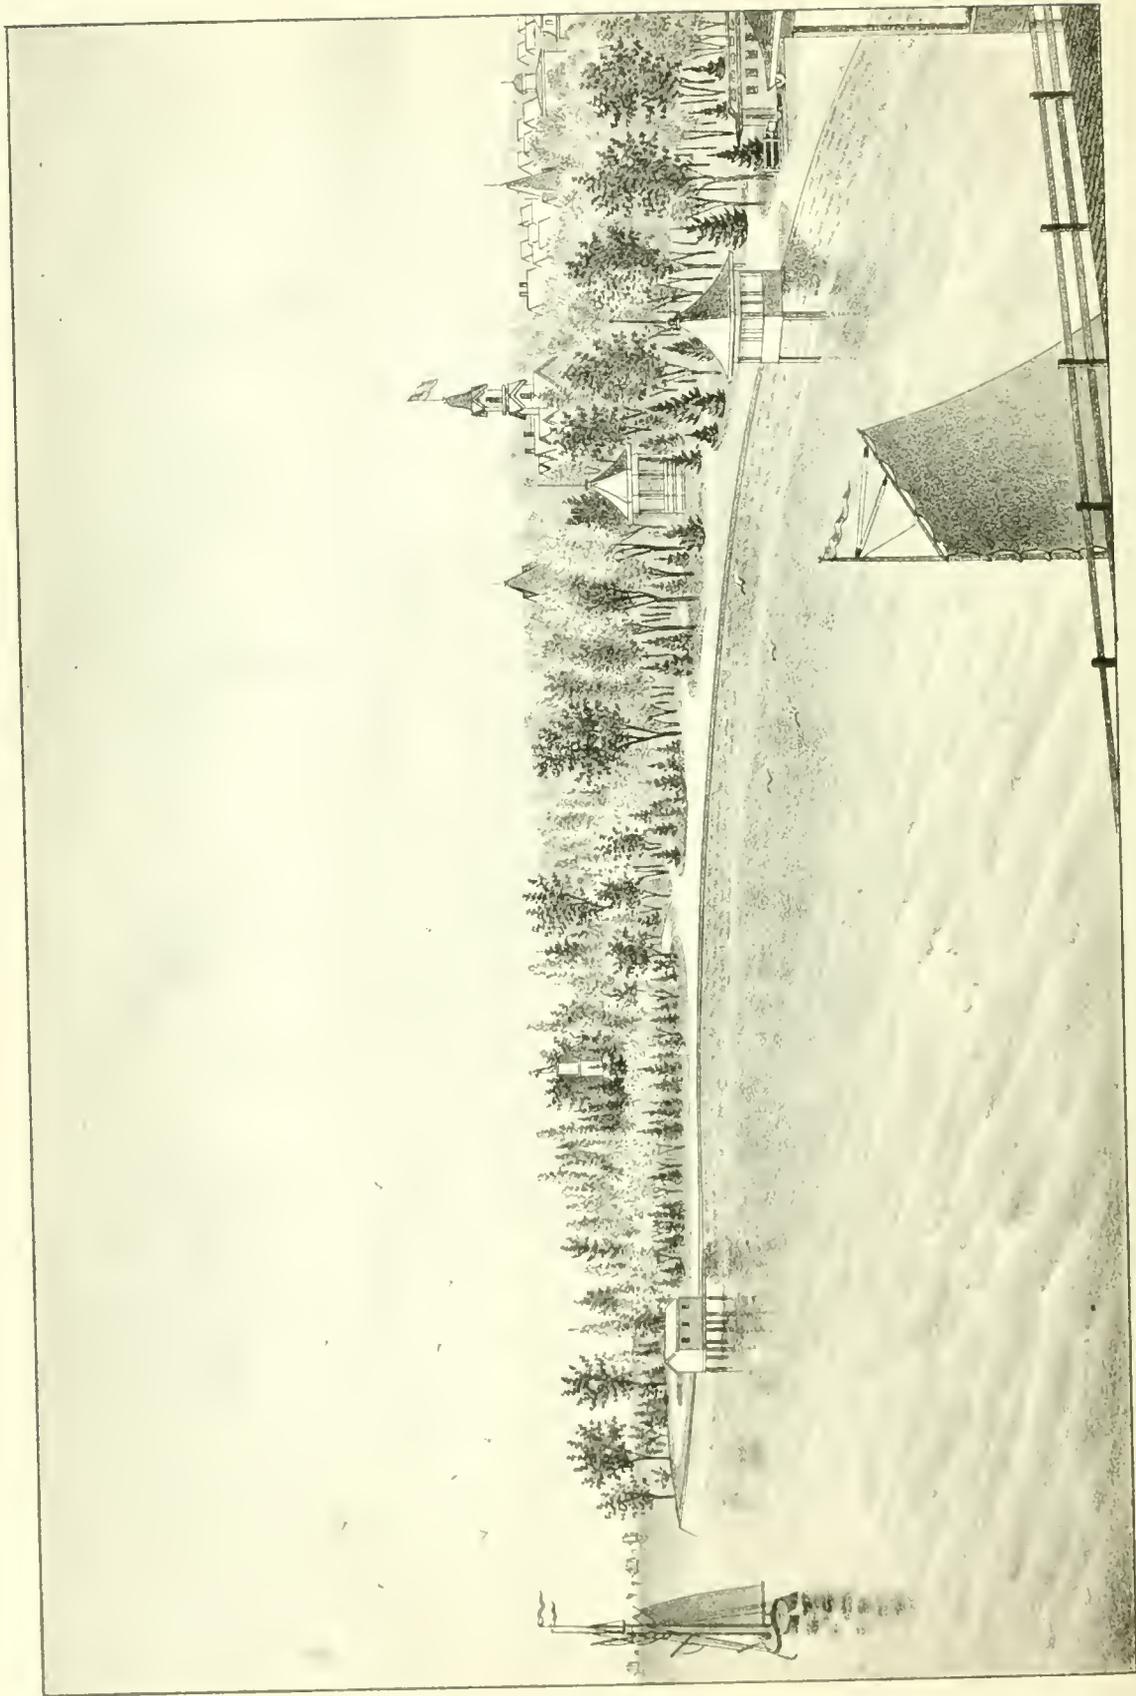

At a town-meeting held June 10, 1873, the sum of eighteen thousand nine hundred dollars was voted by the town for the monument, and William H. Mallory, Henry A. House, and J. D. Alvord were appointed a committee to superintend its construction. The ladies of the Soldiers' Monument Association were also requested to co-operate in the work. The whole cost of the monument, including plans and specifications, was twenty-eight thousand nine hundred dollars, of which ten thousand dollars was contributed by the ladies' association.

Aug. 17, 1876, was the day set for the dedication exercises. Military organizations and guests from abroad were present in large numbers, and the procession, which was under command of Chief Marshal William E. Disbrow, of the Nineteenth Connecticut Volunteers, was perhaps the most imposing ever seen in Bridgeport. A violent rain-storm interrupted the exercises at the park and compelled an adjournment to the opera-house, where addresses were made by Hon. D. H. Sterling, Rev. Dr. A. R. Thompson, Maj. W. H. Mallory, ex-Governor Hawley, Gen. W. H. Noble, and others. The design of the monument, which is the work of W. H. Mosman, of Chicopee, is generally much admired, and its location, overlooking the bright panorama of Long Island Sound, is certainly unequalled.

The ladies of the monument association still keep up their organization for the purpose of seeing that the monument and its surroundings are kept in proper order, and hold pleasant reunions in August of each year.

SOLDIERS MONUMENT, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

VIEW OF SEASIDE PARK; FROM PIER, WALDEMEER IN THE DISTANCE, BRIDGEPORT CONN.

SEASIDE PARK.

Public attention was first drawn to the capabilities of our water front, by the encampment of the Seventeenth Regiment upon the shore in the summer of 1862, and the experiments of Gen. Gillmore with the Ames gun in the same locality two years later. In October, 1863, an article in the Standard urged the necessity for one or more public parks, and Sept. 9, 1864, another article in the same journal recommended the purchase of the ground now occupied by Seaside Park, describing it in the following graphic terms:

"A beautiful undulating piece of land, free from rocks, skirted for a good part of the way on the north by fine forest-trees, and bounded on the south for its entire length by the sparkling waters of the Sound. From this water-front, which is cool and pleasant even in the hottest days, a picturesque and striking view is obtained. On the left, as we stand facing the water, is the city, with its tall spires and chimneys pointing skyward from among the trees; the harbor, dotted with its sailing craft, and the wooded point, with its cottages opposite; on the right, the green sloping shores of Black Rock, stretching far around to the lighthouse. Far away to the south the hills of Long Island loom up from the horizon in clear weather, while in the foreground a constant panorama meets the eye of white-sailed vessels passing up and down the blue waters of the Sound."

Messrs. P. T. Barnum and James C. Loomis were the first to move in the matter, and the former especially pushed it with his usual energy. Early in November, 1864, a survey of the land was made by E. R. Lambert and George Beckwith, and a map hung up in the post-office showing the area of the proposed park to be about thirty-five acres, thirteen of which were situated in the town of Bridgeport, and the remainder within the territory since annexed, but at that time a part of the town of Fairfield.

During the winter of 1864-65 the owners of the land, Capts. John Brooks and Burr Knapp, and Messrs. George Bailey and P. T. Barnum, agreed to convey the land to the city free of charge on condition that it be used perpetually for a public park, and the sum of two thousand seven hundred and twenty dollars was contributed by some sixty individuals and business firms, to purchase additional land. In the following spring the matter was brought up in the Common Council and referred to a committee composed of Hon. Nathaniel Wheeler, Frederick Hurd, and Eli Thompson, who reported favorably; and at a city-meeting, called in accordance with the report of the committee, July 8, 1865, the Council was authorized to accept the deeds of the land and to appropriate a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars in grading and improvements. Aug. 14, 1865, the Common Council formally accepted the deeds, and appointed James C. Loomis, S. S. Clapp, and Jacob Kiefer Commissioners of Seaside Park.

Gen. Egbert R. Viele, of New York, was consulted by the commissioners, and, acting upon his advice, the sea-wall and drive-way were begun, and the pond excavated and provided with an outlet. Plans were afterward procured at his own expense by Hon. Nathaniel Wheeler from Messrs. Olmstead and Vaux, the designers of Central Park, New York, which were followed in laying out the grounds. Extensive additions have since been made by purchase, including the beautiful grove on the north, so that the present area of the park is more than double that of the first survey.

It would be difficult to say too much in praise either of the original idea of this beautiful pleasure-ground or the manner in which it has been carried out. In addition to the natural attractions mentioned in the article which has been quoted, the trees and shrubbery, the Soldiers' Monument, the trotting-park, the open-air concerts through the summer, and the facilities for sea-bathing make it a place unequalled elsewhere in New England, while numerous streets and the horse-railroad afford easy access to all. What a benefit the Seaside Park will be to Bridgeport when another century has passed and the population of the place has perhaps increased to a hundred thousand, can hardly be estimated.

THE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The anniversary of our national independence, July 4, 1876, was celebrated at the park so pleasantly, and withal so sensibly, that the occasion seems worthy of mention here.

John D. Candee, Esq., editor of the Standard, was president of the day, Col. Samuel B. Sumner was chief marshal, and the procession, though an excellent one, was entirely from Bridgeport and its immediate vicinity. The day was a perfect one, and those who managed the affair had set up the platform and the seats for spectators in the beautiful shady grove belonging to the park, and had not forgotten to provide barrels of ice-water for the refreshment of those who had marched in the procession.

The exercises were begun with prayer and the singing of Whittier's Centennial Hymn,—

"Our fathers' God! from out whose hand
The centuries fall like grains of sand,
We meet today, united, free,
And loyal to our land and Thee,
To thank Thee for the era done,
And trust Thee for the opening one."

After this the audience listened with exemplary patience to the Declaration of Independence, to a historical address descriptive of the place as it was one hundred years ago, to a number of speeches, humorous, eloquent, and prophetic, and to an original poem, all the production of home talent. The whole company present then united in singing "America,"—"My country 'tis of thee," etc.—and, having been dismissed with the benediction, retired to their homes, much wondering what the exercises would be, and who would compose the assembly, when another century should have rolled around, and the 4th of July, 1976, have dawned.

CHAPTER XII.

BRIDGEPORT (Continued).

THE PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS OF BRIDGEPORT.

Almshouse—Banks—Board of Trade—Bridges—Casualties and Crimes—Cemeteries—Churches—Custom-House.

IN the succeeding chapters the writer proposes to give some account of the public institutions of Bridgeport, together with a number of incidents which could not conveniently be introduced into the preceding narrative, yet which are too important to be wholly passed over. Doubtless some of the statistics here given will seem to readers of to-day wholly uninteresting; yet it should be remembered that matters quite unimportant to one body of readers are often esteemed valuable by another circle, and also that many facts perfectly familiar to the public at the present time will be by no means so to the succeeding generation, unless put upon record in some such work as this. For convenience of reference, the topics in this chapter are arranged alphabetically.

ALMSHOUSE.

In the year 1865 the selectmen, having sold the land and building in East Bridgeport formerly occupied by the town-poor for about twenty thousand dollars, purchased a farm in the northeastern part of the town and began the erection of another building. The farm cost six thousand four hundred dollars and contains forty acres, of which about twenty-five are in good condition for tillage. The building is of brick, L-shaped, three stories high, and cost about fifteen thousand dollars. It stands upon the east side of Asylum Street, a little north of Old Mill Green, and has usually from fifty to sixty inmates. Besides these, some two hundred others receive occasional assistance at their own homes. For the past ten or twelve years the town has contracted with Mr. William H. Bunnell for the relief of the poor, paying him a gross sum, which is at present between thirteen and fourteen thousand dollars per annum, together with the use of the farm rent free. Mr. Bunnell is well spoken of by all who have dealings with him, and is believed to discharge the duties of his position with humanity. No stated religious services are held at the poorhouse.

BANKS.

At the present time there are five national banks in Bridgeport, whose aggregate capital and surplus is over a million and a half of dollars, and four savings banks, whose united assets exceed six millions.

One of these institutions, which has reached a very respectable—not to say venerable—age, is the old Bridgeport Bank, which was incorporated soon after the establishment of the borough, when there were but five other banks in the State, and has now entered its seventy-fifth year without showing any marks of decrepitude. Did space permit, it would be pleasant to speak at length of many of the gentlemen who have been prominent in banking circles here, but only a few can now be referred to, and that in the briefest manner.

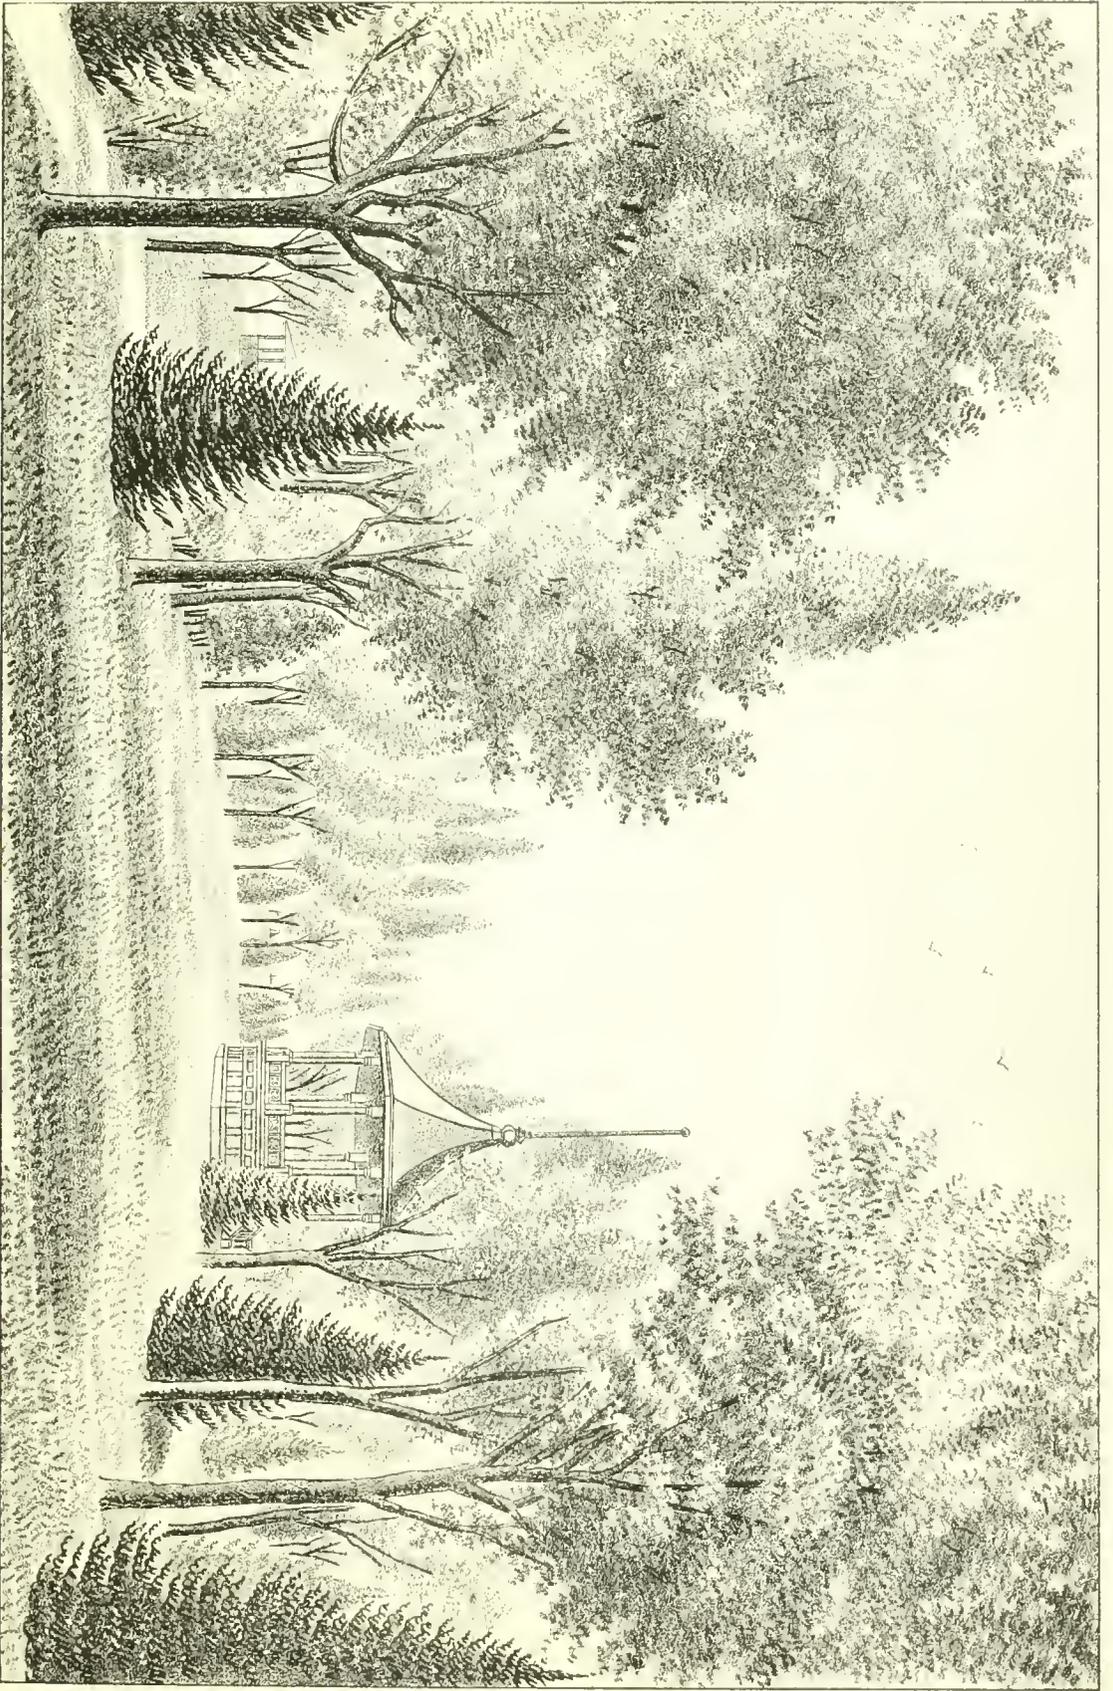

Dr. Isaac Bronson, of Greenfield Hill, the first president of the Bridgeport Bank, was a man of mark in his day. He had served in the Revolution as assistant surgeon of Connecticut troops, and after the war had been engaged in banking, both in Philadelphia and in New York, before coming to Bridgeport. He was a successful financier, though some of his rules might now be thought a little arbitrary. One of these was never to discount paper having more than sixty days to run, and another never to renew a note.

Daniel Thatcher, president of the Connecticut Bank for fifteen years prior to 1848, Sherman Hartwell, president of the Bridgeport from 1849 to 1869, and Sherwood Sterling, president of the City for a number of years prior to 1869, were all excellent men and stood high in public estimation. George Sterling also, who died in 1871, had been for twenty-eight years treasurer of the Bridgeport Savings Bank, and was respected and loved by all who knew him. Mention may also be made of P. C. Calhoun, who has found a wider field for his abilities than Bridgeport affords, and has been for a number of years past the president of the Fourth National Bank of the city of New York.

The Bridgeport Bank was incorporated October, 1806, on petition of John S. Cannon, Salmon Hubbell, Lambert Lockwood, and Isaac Hinman, and began business May 21, 1807, in a house no longer standing, upon the west side of Water Street, near State Street. The building now owned and occupied by the bank, on the corner of Main and Bank Streets, was erected in 1810, and was esteemed at that time a great ornament to the place. In 1865, in common with all the other banks of discount in the city, the Bridgeport became a national bank.

This bank has had seven presidents,—viz., Isaac Bronson, term of service, eighteen years; John S. Cannon, seven years; Ebenezer Jessup, five years; Sylvanus Sterling, eleven years; Hanford Lyon, one year; Sherman Hartwell, twenty years; and Monson Hawley, eleven years.

The capital of the Bridgeport National Bank is now $215,850, and its surplus $80,000. Officers of the institution at the present time are: President, Monson Hawley; cashier, F. N. Benham; directors, T. B. De Forest, Monson Hawley, R. B. Lacey, Carlos Curtis, D. M. Reed, John M. Wheeler, J. Bartram, T. B. Bartram, and P. N. Fairchild.

In May, 1831, Cyrus H. Beardslee, Daniel Sterling, Enoch Foote, and others, petitioned the Legislature, and received permission to establish a new bank in Bridgeport, to be called the Connecticut Bank, with power to open a branch at Mill River, or Southport, in the town of Fairfield. As the custom was at that time, the incorporators were required to pay a bonus of $5000 for their charter, seven-tenths of which sum went to Yale College, and the remainder to Washington College. The first officers of the Connecticut Bank were Capt. Ezekiel Hubbell president, and Charles Foote cashier, the latter for many years identified with the bank, both as cashier and as director.

For several years this institution was located on the north corner of Wall and Water Streets, but after the great fire of 1833 a lot was purchased upon the corner of Main and Wall Streets, and the present edifice erected.

The capital of this bank at the present time is $332,000, with a surplus of $100,000, and the officers are as follows: President, Samuel W. Baldwin; cashier, Henry B. Drew; directors, P. C. Calhoun, William D. Bishop, Jarratt Morford, S. C. Trubee, Henry B. Drew, S. W. Baldwin, William R. Higby, and Marshall E. Morris.

The Farmers' Bank was chartered in 1849, with a capital of $200,000, and was obliged to pay a bonus of $5000 to the General Hospital Society of the State of Connecticut. For many years it transacted business upon the southwest corner of Main and State Streets, but in February, 1871, removed to its present location, at Main and Bank Streets, in the building of the People's Savings Bank. The Farmers' Bank was the first to avail itself of the National Banking Act, and in March, 1864, its name was changed to "The First National Bank of Bridgeport." It has been since its organization as a national bank a depository for funds of the United States government.

The capital of the bank now stands at $210,000, with a surplus of $105,000, and following is a list of its officers: President, Edmund S. Hawley; cashier, William E. Sealey; directors, E. S. Hawley, Russell Tomlinson, Horace Nichols, W. E. Sealey, Edward Sterling, C. K. Averill, C. A. Grannis, S. S. Booth, and H. L. Fairchild.

The Bridgeport City Bank—now the City National Bank—was organized Jan. 17, 1854, under the general banking act of 1852, with a capital of $100,000, which five years later was increased to $200,000. It began business in the old post-office building, on the north side of Bank Street, thence removed to the southwest corner of Wall and Water Streets, and in 1861 completed and occupied its spacious building, Nos. 17 and 19 Wall Street. The cost of this building was twenty-six thousand dollars. March 15, 1865, this bank was reorganized under the National Banking Act, with a capital of $250,000.

The following gentlemen have served as presidents of the institution: Adam P. Houston, S. F. Hurd, Ira Sherman, Sherwood Sterling, George B. Waller, and Daniel N. Morgan. Its capital stock is now $250,000, and its surplus $58,000. Hon. D. N. Morgan, mayor of the city, is the president, and J. F. Fayerweather cashier. The directors are George B. Waller, Elbert E. Hubbell, S. M. Middlebrook, Nathaniel Wheeler, George Mallory, E. G. Sanford, D. N. Morgan, D. B. Booth, and Miles Beardsley.

The Pequotnoek Bank was chartered in 1851, and the sum paid for the privilege was four thousand dollars, which was distributed in the following manner: One thousand dollars to the Bridgeport Library, one thousand five hundred dollars to the State treasury, for the benefit of the insane poor, and the same amount to the State Reform School. Its brownstone building, corner of Main and State Streets, was completed and its doors opened for business Nov. 10, 1851.

Following is a list of the presidents of this bank: P. T. Barnum, 1851; Charles B. Hubbell, 1855; Clapp Spooner, 1860; Monson Hawley, 1865; Charles B. Hotchkiss, 1869. William R. Higby was cashier from the first organization until February, 1869, when he was succeeded by I. B. Prindle.

March 18, 1865, the Pequotnoek was reorganized as a national bank. Its present capital is $200,000; surplus, $40,000. The officers are: President, Charles B. Hotchkiss; cashier, Isaac B. Prindle; directors, C. B. Hotchkiss, David Trubee, John Hurd, James H. Moore, I. B. Prindle, William M. Terry, William G. Linburgh, J. L. Wessels, and Charles Nettleton.

The Bridgeport Savings Bank was chartered in May, 1842, and began business at a store on Water Street in July of the same year. Of the twenty-two corporate members mentioned in the charter, but four are now living,—viz., Messrs. Gideon Thompson, William H. Noble, Thomas Ranson, and Schuyler Sealey. At the time when the charter was granted there were but eight savings banks in the State, some of them just organized, and none west of New Haven. In 1821 the bank was removed to No. 21 Wall Street, and in 1850 to a building upon the site now occupied, on the corner of Main and State Streets. The present handsome banking-house was completed in 1878, and cost about forty-four thousand dollars, or with the lots, some fifty-eight thousand dollars.

The following gentlemen have been presidents of the institution: Sherwood Sterling, 1842; Smith Tweedy, 1843; Daniel O. Wheeler, 1850; Lemuel Coleman, 1851; Sherwood Sterling, 1864; Hervey Higby, 1870; E. S. Hawley, 1875. On Oct. 1, 1879, the last annual report of the bank commissioner shows that the number of depositors was 7763, and the total assets $3,288,451, of which amount about two-thirds was invested in loans upon real estate. The present officers of the institution are: President, E. S. Hawley; vice-presidents, S. C. Trubee and Luzon W. Clark; treasurer, C. P. Porter; trustees, S. C. Trubee, W. R. Higby, A. E. Joy, C. Thompson, P. Conrad, J. Bartram, F. B. Hawley, L. W. Clark, E. Birdsey, Edward Sterling, Dr. D. H. Nash, T. B. De Forest, W. H. Perry, C. P. Porter.

The petition for a second savings bank in Bridgeport was drawn by S. M. Middlebrook, and was signed by such men as S. Hartwell, P. C. Calhoun, Hamford Lyon, Russell Tomlinson, Horace Nichols, A. A. Pettengill, John Brooks, and others, and a charter was granted for the institution in May, 1859. Mr. S. M. Middlebrook was the first treasurer of the institution, and still holds the position, which he accepted nearly twenty years ago. The rooms of this savings bank have always been adjoining those of the City National Bank, at first upon the corner of Wall and Water Streets, and since 1861 at Nos. 17 and 19 Wall Street. The assets of the City Savings Bank, Oct. 1, 1879, were $1,686,478, of which sum $916,883 was invested in loans upon real estate. There were at the same date 4294 depositors. Mr. Hamford Lyon, for many years president of the institution, died Dec. 21, 1879. The following are the officers at the present time: President, Ira Gregory; treasurer, S. M. Middlebrook; trustees, Ira Gregory, D. F. Hollister, John Brooks, G. P. Stockwell, F. W. Parrott, Courtland Kelsey, C. K. Averill, Horace Nichols, J. Baylies, H. S. Peck, Horace F. Hatch, Burr Curtis, L. W. Booth, S. M. Middlebrook, George K. Birdsey, Levi B. Booth, Nathan Birdsey, and Marcus C. Hawley.

In June, 1860, upon petition of Nathaniel Wheeler, James C. Loomis, William H. Perry, Sherwood Sterling, George B. Waller, Frederick Wood, Elbert E. Hubbell, P. C. Calhoun, Ira Sherman, and others, the People's Savings Bank was incorporated. Its place of business was for some time upon the corner of Main and State Streets, in the building of the Pequonock Bank. Its present handsome banking-house was erected in 1870, and cost about forty-three thousand dollars. The assets of the institution, Oct. 1, 1879, were $1,268,143, a little more than half of which was invested in loans upon real estate, and the number of depositors 2893. The officers are as follows: President, George B. Waller; treasurer, Egbert Marsh; trustees, William E. Seeley, S. W. Baldwin, S. S. Booth, E. W. Marsh, D. W. Kissam, E. E. Hubbell, B. Sanford, S. P. Glover, R. Tomlinson, C. B. Hotchkiss, and Eli C. Smith.

The Mechanics' and Farmers' Savings Bank was incorporated in 1871, and commenced business Oct. 1, 1873, in a building upon Washington Avenue, East Bridgeport. Sept. 1, 1878, it was removed across the river to the rooms beneath the Connecticut National Bank, and April 1, 1880, to the premises now occupied, 109 Main Street Barium Building. The whole number of depositors, Sept. 1, 1880, was 730, and the total assets same date, $142,838.09. The officers of the institution were: President, William G. Lineburgh; vice-presidents, George Lewis and Andrew Burke; secretary and treasurer, Lyman S. Catlin; trustees, David Wooster, S. C. Kingman, E. W. Smith, G. W. Peck, Carlos Curtis, R. B. Lacey, D. N. Morgan, B. Soules, H. R. Parrott, L. B. Stillson, C. Morton, D. B. Lockwood, G. W. Hayes, L. F. Curtis, George Keeler, John L. Wessels, F. B. Hall, and Isaac B. Prindle.

BOARD OF TRADE.

The Bridgeport Board of Trade was incorporated in 1876 "for the promotion of trade, the giving direction and impetus to commercial and manufacturing enterprises, the encouragement of intercourse between business-men, and for the general growth and prosperity of Bridgeport." Among the substantial results already achieved may be mentioned the location here of Messrs. Warner Brothers' and Thompson, Langdon & Co.'s corset-factories, the Bridgeport Paper Box Company, the Frary Cutlery Company, the Sharps' Rifle Company, and other manufacturing establishments. A map of Bridgeport, with two columns of letterpress upon the margin setting forth the merits of the place as a site for manufacturing, has been published and extensively circulated. Besides the monthly meetings, annual banquets have also been held, at which much eloquence has been displayed which the world will not willingly let die.

The officers of the Board of Trade are as follows: President, David M. Read; vice-presidents, N. Wheeler, P. T. Barnum; secretary, R. B. Lacey; treasurer, T. R. Cruttenden; directors, W. H. Noble, B. Soules, J. Morford, H. R. Parrott, I. De V. Warner, E. G. Burnham, and M. W. Seymour.

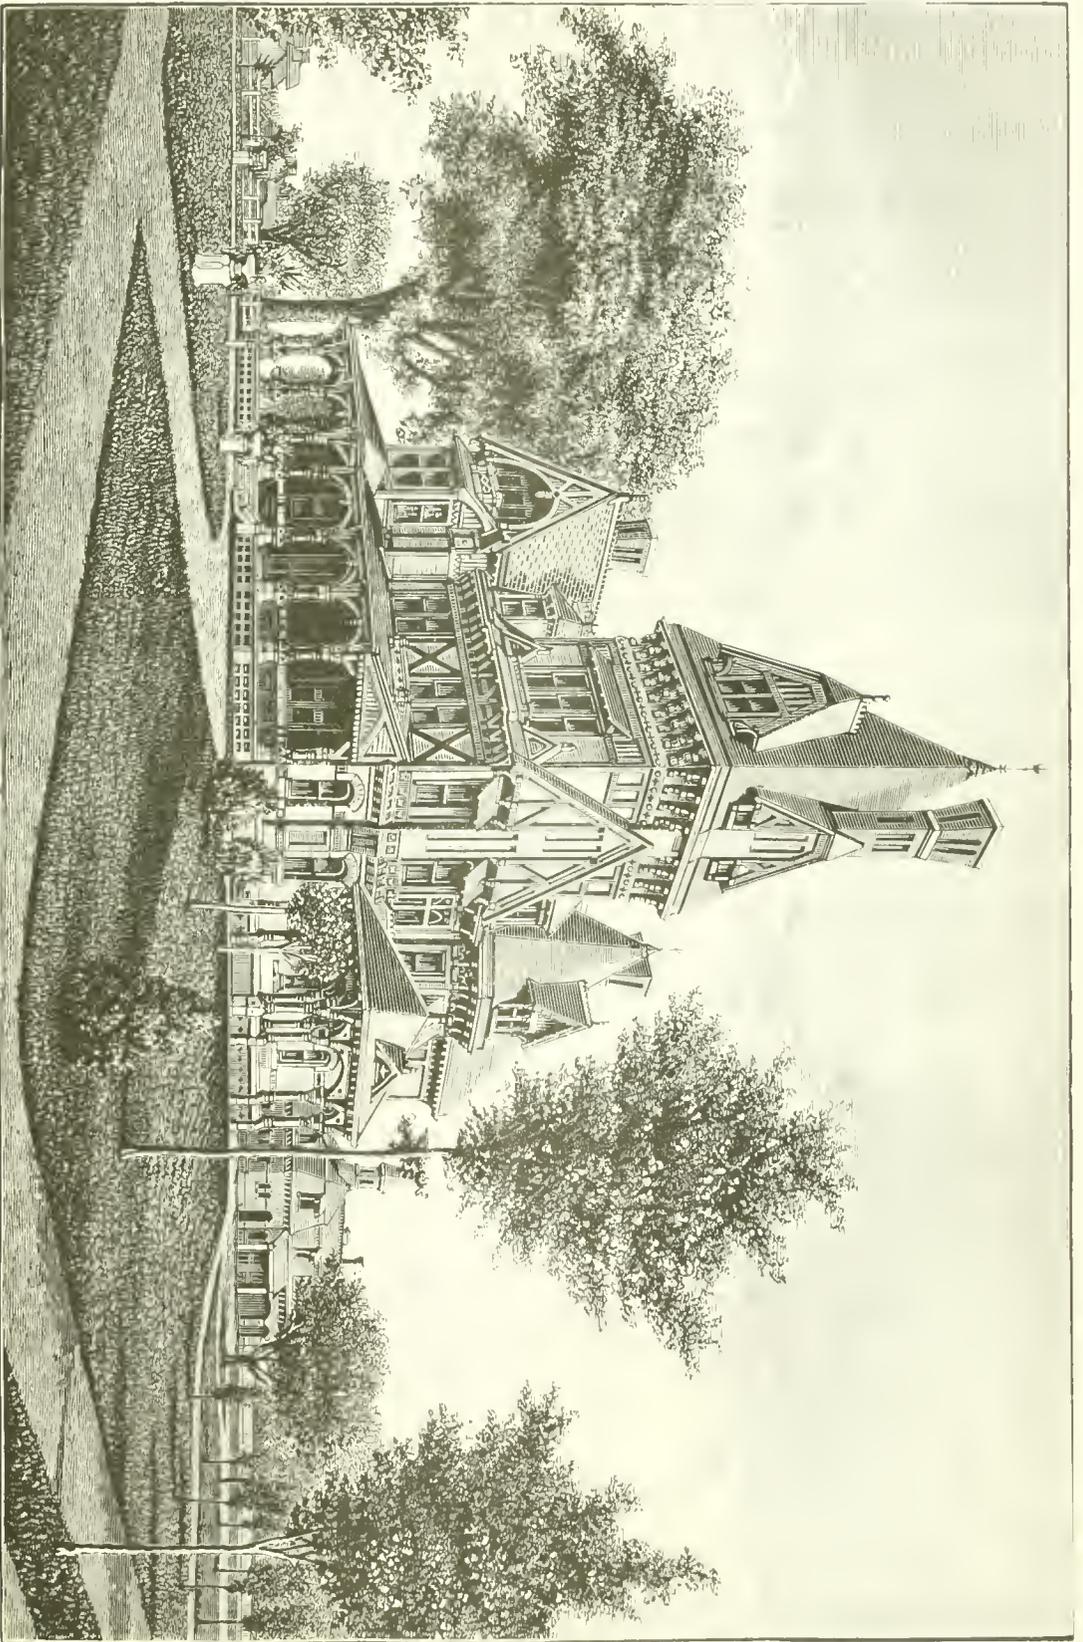

BRIDGES.

Bridgeport is not inappropriately named, as the whole number of bridges, great and small, crossing the Pequonock River, Pembroke Lake, and the various streams known as Ash Creek, Horse Tavern Brook, Island Brook, and Rooster River, cannot be less than twenty-five or thirty in number. Time does not permit even an enumeration of them all, and only those crossing the Pequonock River will be mentioned, taking them in the order of their construction.

1. First in point of time comes the bridge crossing the river upon the line of North Avenue, at the upper end of Berkshire mill-pond. This bridge is of no very ancient date, but its predecessor was built long before the Revolutionary war.

2. The Lottery Bridge, which was erected in 1793, extended from near the foot of Wall Street to Stratford Avenue upon the east. Having become dilapidated it fell over, and was replaced about the year 1807 by the present Bridgeport or Lower Bridge, whose western terminus is at the foot of Fairfield Avenue. Toll continued to be collected at the Bridgeport Bridge until the year 1868, when it was sold to the city for about eighteen thousand dollars and made free for public travel. The covered way for foot-passengers was built in 1850.

3. The dam across the river just above the Berkshire Mill was constructed in the year 1783, but that there was no bridge at that point for at least nine years afterwards is implied, though not expressly stated, in an act passed by the Legislature in October, 1792. The present Berkshire Bridge, connecting Washington Avenue and Berkshire Street, is, however, without doubt, either the second or the third point at which the river was crossed.

4. In May, 1836, Willis Stillman, Birdsey G. Noble, and others, were given permission by the Legislature to build a drawbridge across the Peponnock River at a place called Indian Island, and to collect toll from all persons crossing it except those going to public worship, funerals, or town-meetings, or who were upon military duty, all of whom were entitled to pass free. The corporation was called the East Bridgeport Bridge Company, and the bridge was the one now connecting the two parts of East Washington Avenue. It was finally purchased by the city for the sum of four thousand dollars, and thrown open for public travel Oct. 22, 1864. A sort of annex to this bridge was constructed by the horse railroad company in 1865.

5. In the year 1848 the New York and New Haven Railroad Company built a wooden bridge across the river, which in 1869 was replaced by a more substantial structure with double track and heavy iron draw, extending from Golden Hill Street upon the west to Crescent Avenue upon the east side.

In November, 1850, Abijah Burrongs, William A. Peck, and others, having been chartered by the Legislature under the name of the Crescent Foot-Bridge Company, with capital stock of two thousand dollars, opened a foot-bridge, built upon the foundation of the railroad company, upon the south side of the track, charging one cent toll. The present bridge for the accommodation of foot-passengers, upon the northerly side of the railroad track, was built by the city in 1869, and is free to all.

The next bridge built is no longer standing; having become unfit for heavy travel it was taken down about the year 1869. It was erected by Freeman B. Plumb, William S. Knowlton, and their associates, who in the year 1852 were authorized by the Legislature to construct a bridge from the foot of William Street, East Bridgeport, to some point near Porter's Rocks, on the western shore of the harbor, to collect toll from passengers, and to maintain a draw. This also was purchased by the city and made free, Oct. 22, 1864, the price paid being thirteen thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. A salute of one hundred guns in honor of the event was fired by enthusiastic persons in East Bridgeport, who perhaps had building-lots to dispose of.

6. The present Centre Bridge is the only one which can really be called a credit to the city. It extends from the foot of Congress Street, on the western side of the river, to the foot of William Street, in East Bridgeport, a distance of some eight hundred feet. For the greater part of this distance it has a clear roadway of thirty feet, and sidewalks of six feet in width, while the draw, which measures two hundred and ten feet, is the longest in New England. The cost of this bridge was, in round numbers, one hundred thousand dollars, and it was completed and opened for travel in December, 1870. Following is a list of the special committee appointed by the Common Council for its construction: William D. Bishop, N. Wheeler, Eli Thompson, J. D. Alvord, Frederick Hurd, Eli Dewhurst, and J. H. Sharpe.

CASUALTIES AND CRIMES.

The great dam across the river, near the reservoir in North Bridgeport, has several times given way, causing disastrous inundations. These floods occurred in 1836 and 1843, and also on Nov. 21, 1851. Upon this latter occasion not only was the bridge below the factories and the Berkshire bridge and dam swept away by the resistless tide, which damaged property to the amount of seven thousand dollars, but a young man named Peter Kinsella was drowned, while trying to save a horse from a barn in the track of the torrent.

The steamer "Lexington" was burned opposite this harbor, though too far over towards the Long Island shore for assistance to be rendered, Jan. 13, 1840. It was a bitter night, and only four persons were saved, while one hundred and twenty-two are known either to have perished in the flames or to have sunk in the icy waters of the Sound. The light from the burning steamer was plainly visible here, and many people collected upon the shore to gaze at it.

Although the number of trains is about seventy daily, the list of railroad accidents in Bridgeport is a surprisingly short one. It is safe to say that more persons have been killed in this vicinity by runaway horses than in traveling upon the cars. Yet painful accidents have not been entirely escaped, and twice a horrible disaster has barely been prevented. Oct. 12, 1852, a locomotive and four cars belonging to a Nantuck freight-train ran off the drawbridge. The engineer escaped by jumping; the fireman's leg was broken, but he was able to swim ashore. Aug. 15, 1865, a collision took place in North Bridgeport between a Housatonic passenger-train which was backing down and a locomotive upon its trial-trip, by which eleven persons lost their lives and twenty-seven others were injured. Engineer William Bristol was also killed by a collision a short distance above the Parlor Rock picnic-ground, Aug. 30, 1880.

On June 29, 1867, the noon express-train out of New York reached Bridgeport at half-past two, and after the usual halt at the depot moved forward upon the bridge at the rate of eighteen miles an hour, neither the engineer nor the conductor noticing that the red ball or safety-signal had been lowered, and that the heavy iron draw, which had been opened to admit the passage of a schooner, was still some twenty feet out of place. The only hope for the safety of the train was in the exertions of the bridge-tender, Dennis Colgan, who, by putting forth every effort, succeeded in closing the gap just in time. Even then he was obliged to run down the single track in face of the advancing engine and shoot the bolt into its socket, or, the bridge being crescent-shaped, the impact of the train would have thrown the draw open again and precipitated the engine and cars into the water below. He was just in time to push the pin into its place and then drop between the ties to the timbers beneath, when the train thundered over his head. So close was the locomotive that spectators on shore and upon the adjoining foot-bridge, who had shouted for him to keep back and not to sacrifice his own life in the vain hope of saving others, all believed that he had been killed; and it was perhaps under this impression that the engineer, on arriving at New Haven, left at once his train and the company's employ without waiting for the formality of a discharge. Two weeks after this narrow escape the board of directors of the New York and New Haven Railroad passed a preamble reciting the foregoing facts, and a resolution that as a token of their appreciation of the heroism exhibited by Dennis Colgan five shares of the company's stock be transferred to him, and that a copy of the preamble and resolution, signed by the president, be sent to him, together with the certificate of stock.

Five years after this occurrence another disaster of the same nature, and of even greater magnitude, was just escaped at the same place. It was the afternoon before Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 27, 1872, when a train of fourteen passenger-cars from New York, being behind time, after a brief stop at the Bridgeport depot, ran upon the bridge, the draw being open at the time to admit the passage of a lumber barge. From the neighboring Centre Bridge, which was crowded with carriages and pedestrians waiting for the draw on that bridge to close, frantic efforts were made to attract the attention of the engineer, but in vain; and men turned their backs that they might not see the fatal plunge that seemed inevitable. The new drawbridge has a double track and two sets of gearing, the one in ordinary use requiring about twenty revolutions to close the draw, the other, or fast gearing, taking only thirteen revolutions, but needing the strength of two men to operate it. Using the latter, Colgan, by his utmost exertions, just succeeded in closing the gap in time. Almost breathless from the exertion, he ran down the track to drive home the wedge which secures the draw, but was too late, for the engine had already reached the spot. There was no hesitation upon his part, however. "Standing upon the side track," says an eye-witness, "he planted his lever hard against the rail and held the draw firmly in place while the train went thundering by. Five seconds later in forming the connection, or the slightest shrinking on the part of the bridge-tender, and the train would have plunged into the horrid chasm." One can hardly read such an incident as this without thinking of Horatius at the bridge, and that, too, not altogether to the advantage of the brave old Roman.

It is pleasant to add that Dennis Colgan still remains in the employ of the railroad company in whose service he has been for over thirty years, and that he has prospered financially, being at present the owner of four double houses. Another point worthy of mention is that no drawbridge upon the line is now allowed to be opened within ten minutes of the time for any train.

In 1870 a man named Achille Zajotti was killed by an explosion of fulminate at the works of the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, in East Bridgeport. On Sept. 18, 1880, a disastrous explosion of the same substance occurred near the same locality, instantly killing three men, Philander Clark, Michael Dempsey, and Wilbur Fiershinger, and two boys, James Tobin and Joseph Sullivan, and completely demolishing the small building in which they were at work. The shock of the explosion broke hundreds of panes of glass in the vicinity, and was plainly felt for miles away. The accident was probably caused by carelessness in allowing the fulminate, in which the men were working, to become dry, as, when moist, it is considered non-explosive. The manufacture of exploders, in which this substance is used, has since been discontinued by the cartridge company.

Bridgeport has always been a law-abiding city, and its records are not stained by many great crimes. A few cases, however, are sufficiently horrible. In 1796 a youth named Shelton Edwards was murdered; the store, upon the corner of State and Water Streets, in which he slept, plundered, and then set on fire to conceal the crime. The perpetrator was never discovered.

Another mysterious case occurred here on the evening of June 3, 1872. Capt. George M. Colvocoresses, a retired naval officer, was shot dead in a secluded street near the steamboat-landing, whether by an assassin or by his own hand was the subject of much controversy at the time. Rewards of seven thousand dollars for the arrest of the murderer and ten thousand dollars for the recovery of the securities supposed to have been stolen from the person of the victim were offered, but have never been claimed, though detectives were busy for a long time investigating the case. Capt. Colvocoresses had insurance policies upon his life to the amount of nearly two hundred thousand dollars, which the companies declined to pay upon the ground that he had committed suicide. Suits were brought by his executor to enforce payment, but a compromise was finally effected.

One of the most cold-blooded murders ever perpetrated was brought to light here in September, 1878, when a woman of bad character, named Alexander, and one Bassett, the man with whom she was living, quarreled and accused one another of having murdered Frank Weinbecker, a sailor, in the hope of realizing a few dollars by selling his remains for dissection. The body was packed into a barrel and carried to New Haven, to the Medical School. Failing to dispose of it there and fearing detection, the barrel, with its ghastly contents, was abandoned in a lonely place upon the way home, where it remained until discovered in the manner already indicated. Both the criminals are now serving out sentences of imprisonment for life in the State prison, at Wethersfield.

CEMETERIES.

The old Stratfield or Pequonnock burying-ground upon North Avenue was used by the early settlers. It contains six hundred and forty gravestones, the inscriptions upon which have been copied, the earliest date found being 1688.* Besides these are other rude-stones without any lettering, and not a few graves entirely unmarked. Through the praiseworthy efforts of Mr. R. B. Lacey, this ancient burying-place has recently been greatly improved. The remains of three ministers of the first church in this city—Charles Chauncey, Samuel Cooke, and Robert Ross, whose united pastorates covered the period of ninety-three years—repose here, and a monument to their joint memory, either here or in Mountain Grove Cemetery, would not be an inappropriate tribute.

MOUNTAIN GROVE CEMETERY contains some seventy-five acres, beautifully situated near the western boundary of the town, and partially encircled by the meandering course of the pretty stream called Ash Creek. Within its limits repose the mortal remains of no less than five thousand seven hundred persons, about three thousand two hundred of whom were originally interred here, the remainder having been removed from other grounds,—in particular from the old Division Street or Park Avenue burying-ground in 1873. Although including so many inhabitants, this city of the dead is not an old cemetery, having been incorporated as recently as 1849, and opened with appropriate ceremonies June 7, 1850. The first person buried within its limits was Caroline, infant daughter of the late Dr. F. J. Judson, Aug. 1, 1850. About eleven thousand dollars—the profits of a very successful fair held in St. John's Hall in December, 1878—have recently been expended in grading and beautifying the grounds. Russell Tomlinson is president and William R. Higby is secretary of the association. The directors are R. Tomlinson, William D. Bishop, H. T. Shelton, William H. Perry, N. Wheeler, W. R. Higby, E. Birdsey, D. M. Read, and Edward Sterling.

PEMBROKE CEMETERY is situated in East Bridgeport, north of Old Mill Green, and bordering upon Stillman's Pond. It was chartered October, 1811, and originally contained but one acre of ground, to which seventy-seven rods were added in 1844. From 1862 to 1872 the old ground, being full, was suffered to become overgrown with underbrush, and burials in it ceased. In 1872 the charter of the association was amended, permission being given to purchase one hundred acres of land, to sell the old ground, and to remove the dead to the new inclosure. Sixteen acres of land were accordingly purchased in the above locality. No record of burials previous to April, 1874, can be found. Burials since that date number three hundred and seventy-one. The officers of the association are: President, Ali Andrews; Secretary, A. C. Parker; Treasurer, George B. Mallory.

PARK CEMETERY, in North Bridgeport, was organized in 1878. It is situated a short distance west of Berkshire Mill-pond, and contains about forty-four acres. Seventy-five interments have already been made here. The officers of the cemetery are: President, B. T. Nichols; Secretary and Treasurer, Joseph S. French; Superintendent, Edgar S. Nichols; Directors, B. T. Nichols, Curtis Thompson, J. A. Nichols, E. S. Nichols, Joseph S. French.

There are also two Roman Catholic cemeteries,—one between Arctic and Shelton Streets, in East Bridgeport, which fronts upon Pembroke Lake, and the other upon that pleasant old thoroughfare called Grove Street (in early days Cooke's Lane), not far from the western terminus of the horse-railroad.

Here are a few epitaphs copied from the old burying-ground upon Park Avenue, incorporated in 1811, but discontinued and the remains removed elsewhere in 1873:

"Death is a debt to nature due,
Which I have paid, and so must you."

"In youthful bloom death cut me down,
There to await the trumpet's sound,
Repent, believe, while you have time,
For I was taken in my prime."

"And what is life? 'Tis but a flower
That buds and blossoms for an hour,
But death comes like a wintry day,
And cuts the pretty flower away."

CHURCHES.

At the present time there are twenty-six churches in Bridgeport, belonging to ten different denominations,—viz., Baptist, Congregational, Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, Universalist, Christian, Advent, and Hebrew. Full particulars of the early history of the oldest three—the First Congregational, St. John's Episcopal, and the First Methodist—have already been given. Mention of the others will follow, but the space given to each will be unavoidably quite limited.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH was constituted Sept. 20, 1837, with thirty-nine members. The society had been formed previously,—July 24, 1835,—and the sum of three thousand dollars raised by subscription, which was paid for the house of worship just vacated by St. John's Episcopal Society,—a wooden building upon the corner of State and Broad Streets. This sum was collected through the efforts of Rev. James H. Linsley, of Stratford. A regular minister was not obtained until 1838, when the Rev. Joseph W. Eaton, from Boston, was settled. His successors in the ministry here were: Rev. Daniel Harrington, 1840; Rev. William Smith, 1842; Rev. William Reid, 1846; Rev. Dr. A. G. Palmer, 1854; Rev. J. L. Hodge, D.D., 1857; Rev. A. M. Hopper, D.D., 1861; Rev. M. H. Pogson, 1877.

The present house of worship, a substantial brick structure costing seventeen thousand dollars, was built upon the site of the former church in 1860. In 1878 it was repaired and a number of improvements made, at an expense of about one thousand three hundred dollars. The number of communicants is now 325; membership of the Sunday-school, 283.

THE EAST WASHINGTON AVENUE BAPTIST CHURCH was organized Jan. 30, 1874, with forty-seven members; Rev. C. W. Ray was the first pastor. The price paid for the church, which fronts upon Washington Park, and originally belonged to the Bethesda Mission Sunday-school, was ten thousand dollars, and about three thousand five hundred dollars additional was expended in repairs and improvements. Rev. W. M. Ingersoll is now the pastor, and the church has increased to 158 members, with a Sunday-school of 175.

An account of the organization and early history of the FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH has already been given. The present church edifice, upon the corner of Bank and Broad Streets, was completed and dedicated April 11, 1850, and is the fourth that has been occupied by the society. The chapel was built in 1858, cost eight thousand dollars, and has lately been repaired and improved at an expense of two thousand five hundred dollars. The communion service contains some antique pieces of plate presented by early members many years before the Revolution. The parsonage, No. 84 Golden Hill Street, was bequeathed to the society by the late Mrs. Sylvanus Sterling.

Fifteen pastors have been settled over the church during the one hundred and eighty-five years of its existence, but only three of them are now living. Rev. Charles Ray Palmer, the present pastor, was installed Sept. 11, 1872. A history of the church, prepared by Mr. Palmer in 1876, was published, and contains many interesting facts relating to the early settlers of this place. The present number of communicants is 348; membership of the Sunday-school, about 200. The church records contain the names of forty-two persons belonging to this congregation who served in the Union army during the Rebellion.

THE SECOND (or South) CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized Jan. 28, 1830, with one hundred and seventeen members, who had been dismissed for that purpose from the First Church. Its first house of worship, a wooden building upon the corner of Broad and Gilbert Streets,—the same site now occupied,—was completed in November, 1830, and cost about five thousand dollars. Rev. Nathaniel Hewitt, D.D., the first pastor, was installed Dec. 1, 1830, and his ministry—a very successful one—lasted for nearly twenty-three years.

His successors were: Rev. A. L. Brooks, 1854; Rev. Benjamin L. Swan, 1856; Rev. Alexander R. Thompson, 1859; Rev. Francis Lobdell, 1863; Rev. Daniel Lord, 1865; Rev. Edwin Johnson, 1870; Rev. R. G. S. McNeille, at present pastor, who was installed Dec. 4, 1877. The present house of worship was dedicated Jan. 20, 1862, and during the past year both church and chapel have undergone extensive alterations and improvements, costing upward of eleven thousand dollars, and rendering them exceedingly convenient and attractive in appearance.

This church furnished quite a number of the flower of its young men for the Union army in the late civil war. Among those who volunteered were Edward W. Marsh, William H. Hawley, Frederick B. Hawley, Frederick B. Doten, Henry M. Hoyt, Eliot Curtis, John Curtis, Frederick Curtis, James H. Porter, Henry L. Sturges, John Ward, Alfred G. Mollan, and Marcus Sterling.

The whole number of members enrolled upon the register of this church is 1186; the present membership is 434, and the Sunday-school numbers 350. Eight young men have been sent into the ministry, and over one hundred thousand dollars have been contributed by its members for benevolent purposes.

March 18, 1880, the church celebrated the completion of its first half-century of existence by services deeply interesting to all who attended. A history of the church, prepared by Mr. Edmund S. Hawley, was read upon this occasion; it is a document of great value, and ought to be reprinted.

THE PARK STREET CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized Jan. 15, 1868, with thirty-nine members, twenty-five of whom were dismissed at one time from the North Church for the purpose. Rev. John G. Davenport was ordained July 1, 1868, and still continues to be the pastor of this very successful church. Until the summer of 1871 services were held in Bethesda Mission Chapel, upon East Washington Avenue. The present church building, corner of Park and Barnum Streets, opposite Washington Park, was dedicated Oct. 17, 1871, and cost about twenty-five thousand dollars. The membership of the church is now 430, and its Sabbath-school—one of the largest in the city—numbers about 600,—certainly a very marked increase for the short space of less than thirteen years.

OLIVET CHURCH.—About the year 1866 a mission Sunday-school was begun by members of the First Congregational Church and others in the northern part of the city. The school met at first in the upper story of No. 114 North Washington Avenue, afterwards at Olivet Hall, upon the corner of Grand Street. After some time the school developed into the church now known as Olivet Congregational Church, which was formally organized by a council convened for the purpose, Nov. 16, 1870, and Dec. 14, 1870, the Rev.

De Forest B. Dodge was ordained pastor. Oct. 11, 1871, Mr. Dodge resigned, and letters of dismission were granted to forty-nine members of his former flock, that they might join him in forming a new ecclesiastical body. His successors as the pastors of Olivet Church have been: Rev. S. Hopkins Emory, April, 1872; Rev. Allen Clark, September, 1874; Rev. John S. Wilson, August, 1879. The building now used by the society, upon the corner of Main Street and North Avenue, was completed and occupied for worship Dec. 24, 1876. It cost, including the ground upon which it stands, about three thousand five hundred dollars. The membership of the church at its organization was 36; the present number of communicants is 104, with a Sunday-school of 170.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF BLACK ROCK was gathered Sept. 11, 1849, twenty-four members having been dismissed from the Fairfield Congregational Church for the purpose. On the same day the house of worship erected by the society was dedicated. It stands upon the corner of Church Street and Bartram Avenue, and its cost was about three thousand dollars. The first pastor, Rev. W. J. Jennings, was ordained and installed April 9, 1850. His successors have been: Rev. Marius Willett, 1858; Rev. A. C. Baldwin, 1861; Rev. F. W. Williams, 1866; Rev. Howard W. Pope, at present pastor, Sept. 1, 1874. Present membership of the church, 82; of the Sunday-school, 75.

CHRIST CHURCH (Protestant Episcopal) was organized August, 1850, and at first worshiped in a frame building on John Street, formerly occupied by the First Congregational Church. The Rev. J. Howard Smith, the first rector of Christ Church, was settled in December, 1850. His successors in the parish have been: Rev. William Preston, 1854-56; Rev. George B. Thrall, 1856-59; Rev. Lucius W. Bancroft, D.D., 1859-61; Rev. Henry M. Stuart, 1861-63; Rev. J. Blake Falkner, 1863-70; Rev. J. J. Harrison, 1870; Rev. N. L. Briggs, 1871-75; Rev. Horatio N. Powers, D.D., the present rector, November, 1875. The handsome brown-stone edifice on Courtland Street occupied by the congregation of this church since its erection in 1852 cost about thirty-one thousand dollars. A lecture-room was added in 1870 at an expense of nine thousand dollars. The first wardens of the parish were Charles Bostwick, senior warden, and Russell Tomlinson, junior warden. Among the names of its prominent members deceased are those of Charles Bostwick, S. S. Clapp, S. B. Ferguson, Stephen Tomlinson, Frederick Wood, L. H. Whiting, and Daniel Hatch. Of the older members of the Vestry, Russell Tomlinson, P. B. Segee, George Keeler, Luzon W. Clark, W. H. Noble, S. B. Beardsley, S. Titus, C. B. Hotchkiss, Clapp Spooner, and Benjamin Ray still remain. Russell Tomlinson is the present senior warden, and George C. Waldo junior warden. The present number of communicants is 259, and the membership of the Sunday-school about 235.

THE CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY (Protestant Episcopal) was organized June 4, 1858. A mission Sunday-school and mission services had been maintained at the woolen-mills for several years previous to this date, but the precise time of their commencement is not known. Rev. G. S. Coit, D.D., was the first rector, and among those prominent in the enterprise at the outset were Rev. E. F. Bishop, H. M. Sherman, Eli Thompson, Joseph Richardson, Ira Gregory, John Hurd, and William L. Hubbell. Dr. Coit's successor was Rev. E. F. Bishop, who was followed by Rev. Henry Darby, who is now rector, though Rev. E. F. Bishop and Rev. Lewis W. Wells are at present officiating. The church, a very picturesque stone building upon Sylvan Avenue, North Bridgeport, was completed and occupied Jan. 15, 1859, and cost about ten thousand dollars. The number of communicants is about 50, and the Sunday-school (now being reorganized) has 65 members.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH (Protestant Episcopal).—Particulars respecting the early history of this ancient church have already been given. Rev. Philo Shelton was rector from 1784 until 1824, when, after forty years of continuous service, his resignation was accepted. His successors have been Rev. Henry R. Judah, 1824; Rev. Gurdon S. Coit, D.D., 1833; Rev. J. M. Willey, December, 1861; Rev. Eaton W. Maxey, D.D., at present rector, June, 1867. The present church edifice, at the corner of Park and Fairfield Avenues, is the fourth that has been occupied by the parish of St. John's. The corner-stone was laid by Bishop Williams, Sept. 18, 1873, with appropriate ceremonies, and the house was first occupied Easter Day, March 28, 1875. The dimensions of the building are 120 by 57 feet, and it seats some seven hundred persons. The cost, including the building-site, but exclusive of the tower and lecture-room, which are yet to be added, was one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The number of communicants is now 265, and the membership of the Sunday-school is 239.

Among the members of St. John's who entered the Union army during the Rebellion were the Rev. Dr. Coit, who resigned to accept a position as chaplain; Rev. J. M. Willey, chaplain of the Third Connecticut (three months') Regiment; Major William L. Hubbell, Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers; Adj. Walter Fitch, Sixth Connecticut Volunteers; F. H. Thompson, of the naval service; and others.

Rev. Mr. Willey, whose death occurred in April, 1866, is the only rector who has died while holding the office.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH (Protestant Episcopal) was organized June 4, 1858, at the house of William H. Noble, on Stratford Avenue, and the Rev. G. S. Coit, D.D., of St. John's Church, was chosen rector. The Sunday-school at first met in the coal-office of D. W. Thompson, near the east end of Centre Bridge, afterwards in rooms over a store upon the corner of Crescent Avenue and East Main Street. Rev. N. S. Richardson, D.D., was the first settled rector of St. Paul's parish, his ministry here beginning January, 1868.

The corner-stone of St. Paul's Church, a handsome stone building upon Kossuth Street, fronting Washington Park, was laid by Bishop Williams, Oct. 6, 1868; the structure was dedicated and occupied for worship July 29, 1869, but not consecrated until May 18, 1880. It cost about thirty thousand dollars.

Rev. Dr. Richardson, in addition to parochial duties, is now editor of the Church Guardian newspaper of New York City, Rev. George S. Pine assisting him in the care of the parish.

The communicants at St. Paul's number 296, and the Sunday-school has 403 members.

TRINITY CHURCH (Protestant Episcopal) was organized June 1, 1863, and services were at first held in a hall over the New York and New Haven Railroad Depot. The corner-stone of the church, which is built of freestone, and stands at the corner of Broad Street and Fairfield Avenue, was laid Nov. 2, 1863. The first services were held in it July 3, 1864, and the building was consecrated November 2d of the same year. The cost of this church was ten thousand dollars, or, including the lot and church furniture, sixteen thousand dollars. The original number of communicants was 57; present number, 284; the Sunday-school has 157 members. Rev. Sylvester Clarke has been rector of this church from its organization until the present time.

TRINITY MEMORIAL CHURCH, in West Stratford, is also under the pastoral care of Rev. Mr. Clarke. This is a mission of Trinity Church, Bridgeport, and a memorial of the Rev. G. S. Coit, D.D. The first services were held at the house of Silas Seofield, in West Stratford, Sept. 20, 1871, and a Sunday-school was begun four days later in the Newfield district school-house. The corner-stone of the present chapel was laid Nov. 29, 1871. First service, the Holy Communion, Whitsunday, May 9, 1872, at seven A.M. Cost of the chapel, including lot, etc., was six thousand dollars. The present number of communicants is 30; membership of Sunday-school, 70.

THE FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—If this is the same religious body that was founded by Rev. Jesse Lee, it is the oldest Methodist church in New England, and its centennial anniversary, which occurs in 1889, ought to be duly celebrated. The late Isaac Sherman, however, in his historical sketch, published in 1860, mentions Rev. Nathaniel Ruggles and Rev. John N. Mallit as the "founders of the first Methodist church in Bridgeport in 1802." Before they had a meeting-house of their own the members of this denomination used to gather for worship in the wooden block which is still standing upon the corner of Main and State Streets. The church was built in 1822, upon the corner of Fairfield Avenue and Broad Street, the site now occupied, and was destroyed by fire March 23, 1849. Its successor, the present brick structure, was completed and dedicated in the latter part of the same year. Among the many ministers who have been settled over this church, one of the most successful was Rev. Heman Bangs, who was stationed here in 1847 and 1848. Rev. Charles E. Harris is now pastor. The number of communicants is 370, and the Sunday-school has 345 members.

WASHINGTON PARK METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH was organized Sept. 12, 1853. The church building, which stands upon the corner of Barnum and Noble Streets, in East Bridgeport, was completed and occupied in the same year. Its original cost was only four thousand dollars, but in 1867 it was enlarged and improved at an expense of eleven thousand dollars. The present value of the property is about twenty thousand dollars. Rev. J. E. Searles, who is now pastor, began his work here April 1, 1879. There are 380 communicants, and the Sunday-school—one of the largest in the city—has 585 teachers and scholars.

THE TABERNACLE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH was founded in July, 1873. In March, 1874, the house of worship, which stands upon North Main Street, at the foot of Frank Street, was completed, and in the following month Rev. A. B. Sanford was appointed pastor. His successors have been Rev. S. H. Smith, Rev. David Osborne, and the Rev. Joseph R. Dumble, the latter commencing his labors here in March, 1880. The cost of the church building, including the lot, was about four thousand five hundred dollars. The church has ninety-five communicants and a Sunday-school of one hundred and seventy-five members.

There are two African Methodist Episcopal chapels upon Broad Street, a short distance north of Seaside Park. The older (or Bethel) Church was built in 1835; the younger and larger, known as Zion Church, was completed, as a tablet over the door informs the passer by, in June, 1843. This tablet also formerly contained an inscription from the Old Testament,—“The glory of the latter house shall exceed that of the former.”—but the words are now erased. Rev. J. B. Small is pastor of Zion Church, which has eighty-two members and a Sunday-school of seventy. Bethel Church, with twenty-eight members and a Sunday-school of twenty, is at present without a settled minister.

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was constituted Oct. 16, 1853, at which time eighty-two persons entered into covenant and resolved to join the Presbytery of New York. The pastor, Rev. Dr. Hewit, and a considerable number of the members had previously been connected with the Second (or South) Congregational Church of this city. The first meeting for public worship was held Oct. 9, 1853, in the upper room of the brick school-house, No. 200 State Street, Dr. Hewit preaching from the text “Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.” October 31st the church was admitted to the Presbytery of New York, and Feb. 1, 1854, the chapel on Myrtle Avenue was dedicated, having cost about three thousand dollars. The church adjoining, upon the corner of Myrtle Avenue and West Liberty Street, was dedicated Aug. 8, 1855, and cost twenty-eight thousand dollars. The lot upon which the church and chapel stood was the gift of Capt. John Brooks and Capt. Burr Knapp. In 1873 the chapel was taken down and a new one, costing eleven thousand dollars, was erected at his own expense by Capt. Brooks, and presented to the church. The expense of enlarging the church organ, already one of the finest in New England, and of putting a new roof upon the church, amounting to about five thousand dollars, was also borne entirely by Capt. Brooks.

These and other improvements were not quite completed, when on Wednesday evening, Dec. 9, 1874, both church and chapel, with all their contents, were totally destroyed by fire, probably occasioned by the careless use of candles by a workman. The burning steeple, two hundred and twenty-seven feet in height, was the most magnificent spectacle ever seen in Bridgeport. The loss upon the buildings and their contents amounted to seventy thousand dollars; insurance, thirty-five thousand dollars. Resolutions of condolence and tenders of the use of their several edifices were made by most of the other churches in Bridgeport, but the church preferred to occupy the opera-house, corner of State and Main Streets, for a season. Owing to the liberality of Capt. Brooks and other members of the society, rebuilding was promptly commenced. The new church, which stands upon the corner of State Street and Myrtle Avenue, cost, including the chapel, organ, and furniture, about ninety-four thousand dollars, and was dedicated Oct. 12, 1876.

In 1858, having reached the age of seventy, Dr. Hewit resigned his office, but his resignation was not accepted, and he continued to be pastor of the church until his death, in February, 1867. Rev. H. G. Hinsdale was settled Oct. 28, 1862, at first as colleague to Dr. Hewit, and after his death as sole pastor. Mr. Hinsdale resigned in 1877, and was succeeded, Feb. 14, 1878, by Rev. H. A. Davenport, who is at present pastor of the church. The late Mrs. Mary Bishop was one of the most liberal benefactors of this church, having subscribed largely to build it, and also to cancel the debt incurred in its erection. The church records show the number of communicants to be 185, and the membership of the Sunday-school 316.

THE GERMAN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, on State Street, was first organized Oct. 1, 1860. Rev. A. Schroeder was pastor from 1860 to 1864. In 1868 the church was reorganized. Rev. Casper Bruner was then settled as pastor, and has continued to hold that office until the present time. In the same year the society purchased the church now occupied, on State Street, nearly opposite Myrtle Avenue, for about eight thousand dollars. The present membership of the church is 115; of the Sunday-school, 110.

ST. AUGUSTINE CHURCH (Roman Catholic).—The Rev. Mr. McDermott was the first Catholic priest who celebrated mass in Bridgeport. This was in the house of Mr. Farrell, on Middle Street, in the year 1834. About eighteen Catholic families were then living here. Soon afterwards, by order of Bishop Fenwick, the Rev. James Smith attended Bridgeport once a month. He built the old brick church which formerly stood upon the corner of Arch Street and Washington Avenue. Rev. Michael Lynch, the first settled pastor for Bridgeport, was appointed in December, 1842. Ten years later,—Sept. 2, 1852,—Rev. Thomas J. Synnott was appointed by Bishop O'Reilly to take charge of the Catholics of Bridgeport. Soon after his arrival Rev. Mr. Synnott commenced building the old church of St. Mary upon Crescent Avenue, in East Bridgeport, and finished it in the following year. In this same year he began St. Thomas' church, at Fairfield, and finished it in 1854.

Ten years later, the old brick church upon Washington Avenue being found too small to accommodate the growing Catholic population, the foundation of St. Augustine's church was laid upon the corner of Washington Avenue and Pequonnock Street. This church, which is the largest in Bridgeport, was dedicated March 17, 1867, and has cost about one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. The material of which it is built is gray granite from North Bridgeport. It is intended to carry up the spire about ninety feet higher than its present termination, making it by far the highest object in the city. The whole number of Catholics in St. Augustine parish is about four thousand, and the average attendance at mass is estimated to be as high as three thousand. The Sabbath-school contains about six hundred and fifty members. The amount contributed for special benevolent objects during the pastorate of twenty-eight years of the Rev. Mr. Synnott is between three and four thousand dollars; the amount raised for church purposes—parish expenses, building, etc.—cannot be far from a quarter of a million of dollars.

Adjoining the church on the west is a large and extremely handsome structure, built of gray granite from Plymouth, Conn., which is intended for a Sisters' house and academy for young ladies. It will be completed during the year 1881, and its cost is expected to be about the same as that of the church,—one hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

ST. MARY'S CHURCH (Roman Catholic).—This fine edifice is built of brick with granite trimmings, and stands upon the corner of Pembroke and Steuben Streets, East Bridgeport. It was dedicated Oct. 14, 1877, and cost about ninety thousand dollars. The number of Catholics belonging to St. Mary's parish is estimated to be three thousand, and the average attendance at church from two thousand to two thousand five hundred. The Sabbath-school has about six hundred members. The first settled minister of the parish was the Rev. Dr. Wallace, from Providence, R. I., and his successors were Rev. Messrs. O'Gorman, O'Neil, Drea, Lenihan, and Rev. J. F. Rogers, the present pastor. The old church of St. Mary, upon Crescent Avenue, is still standing, and is used for school and other purposes.

THE GERMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH was organized in December, 1874, and for a time held religious services in a hall in Wheeler's Building, Main Street, corner of Fairfield Avenue. Subsequently it removed to the building No. 419 Main Street. The present house of worship was commenced in October, 1878, and completed in April following, at a cost, including the land, of eight thousand dollars. Rev. Joseph A. Schaele, of New Haven, has been pastor from the organization of the church to the present time. There were at first twenty-five families in the congregation, which now numbers seventy-five families, or about three hundred persons. The Sunday-school has one hundred members. Mass is celebrated and a sermon preached every Sunday morning, the pastor returning to New Haven at the conclusion of the services.

UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.—The Universalist Society in Bridgeport was organized in the year 1850, and the brown-stone building on Fairfield Avenue, near Broad Street, originally known as the Church of our Saviour, but now called Church of the Redeemer, was dedicated near the close of the following year. Rev. Olympia Brown—now Mrs. Olympia Brown Willis—was pastor of this church from 1869 to 1875; Rev. John Lyon, who is now the pastor, was settled Dec. 3, 1876. The cost of the house of worship, including land, etc., was thirty-four thousand dollars. The present number of communicants is 70, and the membership of the Sunday-school is 135. A chapel is soon to be constructed upon the lot in rear of the church, which was given to the society by P. T. Barnum, and it is proposed that the second story of this building shall contain a free reading-room for the use of workmen and others.

THE ADVENT CHRISTIAN CHURCH of Bridgeport was organized November, 1849, with fourteen members, and has maintained regular services ever since, both upon the Sabbath and on week-day evenings, though most of the time without a settled pastor. Eighty-two members have been added since the church was first formed, but, owing to death, removal, and other causes, the present membership is only fifty-seven. The place of meeting is Temperance Hall, on Beach Street, East Bridgeport.

The members of the body known as the CHURCH OF CHRIST in Bridgeport have met for study of the Bible and for religious worship since the year 1871, but were not formally organized as a church until Aug. 23, 1874, under the leadership of Dr. W. A. Belding, of Troy, N. Y. The meetings, at first held in a private house, have been for several years past conducted in the hall at No. 356 Main Street, on the Sabbath and upon two week-day evenings. No stated preacher has been employed, but since May, 1880, Charles Abercrombie, a revivalist, has been laboring here. The present membership is 65.

The Hebrew congregation (BENAI ISRAEL) in Bridgeport was organized Sept. 19, 1859, the first minister being Rev. A. Jacobs, and the place of worship No. 35 Wall Street. Rev. Mr. Jacobs has had twelve successors, the present incumbent being Rev. E. Willner, settled Aug. 16, 1879. The congregation now meets upon Friday evenings and Saturday mornings at Freedman's Building, on State Street, opposite the court-house. The Hebrews in this place number only fifteen families, or about seventy-five persons, all of whom belong to the congregation. The Sunday-school has fifteen members.

CUSTOM-HOUSE.

In the "Municipal Register" for 1875 Mr. Lacey has given so full an account of the customs district of Fairfield that it is only necessary to make brief reference to it here. This district was constituted by act of Congress, March 2, 1799, and includes the entire coast, from the Housatonic River to the New York State line. The collector's office was at first at Fairfield, then at Greenfield Hill, but was removed to Bridgeport in 1832. Capt. Samuel Smedley, distinguished as a naval commander in the war of the Revolution, was the first collector. His successors were: Walter Bradley, date uncertain; Samuel Simons, 1832; Joseph Thompson, 1840; Stephen Lounsbury, 1844; William H. Peet, 1848; William S. Pomeroy, 1852; Silas C. Booth, 1860; John Brooks, 1864; Julius S. Hanover, 1869.

Since December, 1874, the custom-house has been located in rooms, handsomely fitted up for the purpose, upon the corner of Main and Wall Streets. The records of the office are well kept, and among the archives are documents bearing the autographs of Alexander Hamilton, John Quincy Adams, James Monroe, and other venerable patriots.

EXPRESS COMPANY.

WILLIAM F. HARNDEN was the first man to commence running an express between Boston and New York, in February, 1839, and is regarded as the founder of the express business in this country. In May, 1840, Alvin Adams began an opposition to Harnden. For several years Mr. Adams was his own messenger, cashier, clerk, and porter, all in one. In 1843 he first began to use horses and wagons in delivering, and soon afterwards Adams & Co. made a contract with the Treasury Department for the transportation of government funds, which their successors still continue. Oct. 26, 1848, the New York and New Haven Railroad was opened for travel from New Haven to Bridgeport, and on October 31st the following advertisement appeared in the Weekly Standard:

“NEW EXPRESS.”

“Adams & Co. respectfully give notice that they have commenced running a daily express, to and from New Haven and Bridgeport, in connection with their New York and New Haven line. Packages, Specie, Bank-Notes, and Valuables of every description intrusted to their care will be transmitted with the utmost safety and dispatch, and all business, such as the collection of Notes and Bills, the delivery of Drafts for acceptance, and orders of all kinds, will receive their particular attention. A special messenger will accompany the train leaving New Haven at quarter before nine A.M.; returning will leave Bridgeport at ten, or on arrival of boat from New York.”

“OFFICES AND AGENTS.”

“W. WEBB & Co., 114 Chapel Street, Dwight's Building, New Haven.

“SANFORD CORNWALL, No. 2 Exchange Place, opposite the Sterling House, Bridgeport.”

The office of the express company was afterwards located under the Sterling House, subsequently removing to the York House building, on the west side of Water Street, near Union Street, and from thence to its present location, in the depot building at the foot of Fairfield Avenue. The Adams Express Company was formed by the consolidation of some half a dozen other lines, July 1, 1854. At that time the capital stock was divided into twelve thousand shares, whose value was not specified, but supposed to be worth at least one hundred dollars each, or one million two hundred thousand dollars altogether. The headquarters of the New England division were removed from Hartford to Bridgeport, April 2, 1865; to Boston, Sept. 1, 1868; to Hartford, Sept. 2, 1869; and again to Bridgeport, Feb. 6, 1876. Since that time Bridgeport has been the central office, all the other agencies in New England reporting to it.

The company has experienced several robberies. One of the greatest on record took place on Saturday evening, Jan. 6, 1866, when the door of the express-car running from New York to Boston was forced, and securities, cash, and other valuables, to the amount of half a million dollars, were abstracted therefrom. Nearly all the stolen property was recovered, and the criminals, who were arrested in Norwalk, were tried and sentenced at Bridgeport in February, 1866.

The officers and representatives of the Adams Express Company residing at Bridgeport are: Henry Sanford, General Superintendent; Clapp Spooner, Resident Manager, and Superintendent of New England Division; William L. Hubbell, Auditor; S. J. B. Dibble, Cashier; John C. Curtis, Agent.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

One of the first public measures of the citizens of Newfield—afterwards the borough of Bridgeport—was to form themselves into a fire company, which was incorporated, as already mentioned, in 1797. An act of similar tenor was passed in the following year, and in 1834 a third fire company was chartered, followed in 1840 by the Phoenix Fire Company, No. 4, and the Pequonnock Fire Company, of North Bridgeport, and in 1845 by the Bridgeport Hose Company.

The engines of that day, however, were extremely rude affairs, without any suction apparatus, it being necessary to pour the water into them before it was squirted upon the fire, and whenever an alarm of fire was given the first duty of a good citizen was to rush to the spot with his fire-bucket, which was a part of the furniture of every house, and to form one of a line for drawing water from some convenient well and passing it up to the engine. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that fires were frequent and destructive. Conflagrations several times swept through the business part of the place, notably upon the morning of Dec. 11, 1845, when the eastern side of Water Street and both sides of Wall and State Streets were devastated. Forty-nine buildings were consumed on this occasion, and the loss was estimated at over one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

The first engine worthy of the name was that purchased for Company No. 5, which had a suction apparatus, and was built in New York at a cost of one thousand dollars. Within a week after its arrival the steam flour-mill near the corner of Water Street and South Avenue was burned, and, ten days later, the Methodist church on Beaver Street suffered the same fate.

Previous to 1847 there was no organized fire department, the several companies being not only independent of one another, but sometimes antagonistic. A by-law drafted by Mr. R. B. Lacey, providing for the appointment of a board of engineers and the enforcement of better discipline, was adopted in that year, and continued in force until the adoption of a paid fire department. The steam fire-engine D. H. Sterling, No. 1, was purchased by the city in January, 1864, and proved so successful that in May, 1865, steamer Protector, No. 2, was purchased, and in August of the same year steamer Excelsior, No. 5.

In October, 1872, the volunteer fire department was disbanded, and a paid department substituted for it. Charles A. Gerdenier, who had been at the head of the volunteer organization since 1869, was appointed chief engineer, and has held this important office to the present time.

The property of the fire department, March 1, 1880, consisted in part of the following articles: Five engine-houses, three steam fire-engines, two hook-and-ladder trucks, one of them with chemical attachment, ten thousand four hundred feet of hose, two bell-towers and alarm-bells, a fire-alarm telegraph, five chemical fire-extinguishers, twelve horses, and one hundred and seventy-three hydrants, the aggregate value of the whole being one hundred and seven thousand seven hundred and nineteen dollars.

Besides the chief engineer, the active force of the department consists of nine assistant and steamer engineers, seven drivers, and forty-five hose and hook-and-ladder men,—in all, sixty-two persons. The government of the department is in the hands of a board of commissioners, Messrs. S. W. Baldwin, William R. Higby, Eli Dewhurst, and John M. Sammis* being the present members.

The department has upon the whole met with excellent success ever since its organization in subduing the ravages of the devouring element, but it is hardly to be expected that a place of this size should wholly escape from disastrous fires, the work either of incendiaries or of carelessness. Among the noteworthy fires of recent years have been the following: July 22, 1852, steamer "Alice" burned at the dock; loss, twenty-eight thousand dollars; Dec. 22, 1865, carriage-factory of F. Wood & Co., on Broad Street, badly damaged; May 28, 1871, lumber-yard of Beardsley, Wilson & Co. burned; Sept. 30, 1872, planing-mill and lumber-yard of S. Nickerson & Son destroyed; Feb. 21, 1873, Courtland Block badly damaged; Dec. 9, 1874, Presbyterian church destroyed; Dec. 14, 1875, the cabinet-factory of the Wheeler & Wilson Company destroyed, causing a loss estimated at six hundred thousand dollars; June 7, 1877, the hat-manufactory of Glover Sanford & Sons burnt, on which occasion eleven lives were lost by the falling of a wall.

FREEMASONS.

St. John's Lodge, No. 3, F. and A. M., of this city, was founded under a charter dated Feb. 12, 1762, and issued by George Harrison, Grand Master of the province of New York, to Eleazer Hubbell, of Stratfield, in the county of Fairfield and colony of Connecticut. There was then no Grand Lodge in Connecticut; indeed, there were but two other lodges in the colony,—viz., Hiram, No. 1, of New Haven, instituted 1750, and St. John's, No. 2, of Middletown, instituted 1754.

The first meeting of St. John's Lodge under its new charter was at the house of Capt. Samuel Wakelee, which stood upon the street now called Park Avenue, a short distance south of State Street, Feb. 15, 1762. Five members were present,—viz., Arnout Cannon, of the city of New York, who officiated as Master pro tem.; Joseph Knapp and Isaac Young, both of Fairfield; Eleazer Hubbell, of Stratfield; and J. Anderson, who acted as Secretary, and was perhaps a visiting brother, as his name occurs but once again in the records. It was a special meeting, called for the purpose of initiating David Wheeler and Wolcott Chauncey. The first regular or proper meeting was held at the house of Richard Hubbell, who lived on the street now called Clinton Avenue, Feb. 24, 1762. On July 14th of the same year occurred the first election of officers, when Eleazer Hubbell, who had already acted in the capacity, was formally chosen Master for the ensuing year.

Meetings continued to be held in Stratfield until Dec. 8, 1762, when the lodge was removed to the house of Isaac Young, in Fairfield. It was voted at this meeting that brother Young should be paid forty shillings in lawful money for the use of two west chambers for a period of one year from date. Two years later it was voted to remove to "the sign of the Anchor," probably the village inn at Fairfield. In January, 1763, it was voted that the lodge should have a seal and parchment, and that the secretary should charge three shillings for giving a certificate. The initiation fee was three pounds ten shillings until 1780, when it was fixed at three pounds silver money, or its equivalent in the depreciated Continental currency. Besides the initiation fee, taxes, regular and special, were often imposed upon the members to defray the expenses of the lodge. Several passages in the records show that the "refreshments" furnished were what would now be thought of a convivial nature. Among the furniture of the lodge-room were glasses and a punch-bowl, while by special vote it was made the duty of the steward "to provide necessaries for the lodge, such as rum, sugar, pipes, and tobacco." This was according to the universal custom of the time, when spirituous liquors were freely used at gatherings of every description, even those of the clergy. Masonry at the present day, however, has an excellent record in the matter of temperance, for nearly sixty years ago the Grand Lodge of the State of Connecticut forbade, under heavy penalty, the introduction of ardent spirits into any lodge within its jurisdiction, and the law is still enforced.

Frequent mention is made in the records of the celebration of the two St. John's Days,—June 24th and December 27th,—when the members of the lodge and invited guests usually dined together after listening to a sermon by some one of the clergy. The Rev. Andrew Eliot, of Fairfield, was a frequent guest upon these occasions, and the names of the Rev. Messrs. Lamson, Sayre, Baldwin, and Shelton also occur in this connection. Slight tokens of good will were often voted to the officiating clergyman, such as a piece of calico for a summer gown to the Rev. Mr. Eliot, a pair of silk gloves to the Rev. Mr. Stebbins in return for a "very ingenuous and pathetic discourse" in memory of a brother lost at sea. The following resolution dated Feb. 25, 1793, is a similar instance:

"Voted unanimously, That Bro's Lacey and Cannon wait on the Rev. Philo Shelton and present him with the thanks of this lodge, as likewise one guinea, for his excellent discourse on St. John's Day, 27th Dec., 1792, at Newfield."

* Mr. Sammis died in August, 1889.

Among the prominent members of the lodge while it remained in Fairfield were Jonathan Bulkley, who for seventeen years was elected Master; Gen. Elijah Abel, the county sheriff; Lieut. Isaac Jarvis and Capt. Samuel Smedley, of Revolutionary fame, the latter afterwards the collector of customs for Fairfield District; and Dr. Francis Fergue, the leading physician of the village, who for many years was a constant attendant.

On Christmas Day, Dec. 25, 1782, the following resolution was passed by the lodge:

Resolved, That Brother Abel be desired to wait on Brother Fergue and know whether it is his desire that prayers be desired for him at the Throne of Grace, under his present indisposition of body."

A few weeks later the brethren of the order followed his body to its last resting-place, and resolutions of respect to his memory were drawn up and published in the New Haven paper.

Jan. 14, 1784, St. John's Lodge participated by its delegates in the formation of the present Grand Lodge of the State, on which occasion Pierrepont Edwards, of New Haven, but afterwards of Bridgeport, was chosen Grand Master. No allusion to either the Revolution or the war of 1812 is made in the records, but in December, 1799, it was Resolved, That the members of the lodge wear suitable mourning upon the anniversary of the death of the late M. W. Grand Master of the United States, George Washington."

During the war of the Revolution intervals of several months occurred during which no meetings were held, and from 1786 to 1789 the meetings were very infrequent and but slenderly attended.

In 1789, through the efforts of Josiah Lacey, Lambert Lockwood, and Daniel Young, influential members of the order engaged in business at the thriving settlement of Newfield, which centred near the present corner of Water and State Streets, Bridgeport, the lodge was removed here. The first meeting was held at the dwelling-house of Daniel Young, which is still standing, on the southwest corner of Union and Water Streets, June 24, 1789. Nine members of St. John's Lodge and four visiting brethren were present, and officers were elected and delegates to the convention chosen, after which the brethren adjourned to the public-house of William Peet, "where they dined and drank in good harmony."

Jan. 27, 1790, the lodge voted to meet at the house of Mr. William Peet, innkeeper, upon the north side of State Street, where the post-office now stands, "until a more convenient place can be obtained." Dec. 14, 1791, it was voted to remove to the chambers of Brother Josiah Lacey's house, which stood upon the south side of State Street, between Main and Water Streets.

March 14, 1792, the committee previously appointed to procure sundry articles belonging to the lodge, which were supposed to be at Fairfield, reported that they had found fourteen drinking-glasses, one punch spoon, one silver seal, an old great chair, and three large wooden candlesticks without the brasses. A pair of brass andirons which had been left at the house of a member in Fairfield were not forthcoming, but were believed to have been carried off to Delaware by his son.

Oct. 5, 1792, the lodge voted to purchase ten tickets in the lottery for building Newfield Bridge.

Dec. 12, 1792, it was voted to remove to the house of Isaac Hinman, which stood upon the southwest corner of Wall and Water Streets.

Many other interesting extracts might be made from the early records did space permit, but it is sufficient to say that after its removal to Bridgeport its condition was prosperous. The surplus funds in the treasury amounted to several hundred dollars, and were loaned to members to use in their business, always by vote of the lodge and upon a six months' interest-bearing note.

From 1809 to 1812, by order of the Grand Lodge, the lodge was obliged to meet within one mile of the court-house, in the town of Fairfield. In 1812 it returned to the house of Brother Ephraim Knapp, who succeeded Mr. Hinman upon the corner of Wall and Water Streets, and from that time it has continued to meet in Bridgeport.

During the years 1831 and 1832, on account of the supposed abduction of Morgan, public feeling ran high against Masonry. It was accused of being an institution dangerous to the community and injurious to morality and religion. To meet this charge a defense of Freemasonry, signed by fifty members of St. John's Lodge, was published in the local newspapers. The document, though interesting, is too long to quote here. Among the signers were such well-known names as those of Hanford Lyon, Philo Hurd, Wilson Hawley, Gen. Enoch Foote, Charles Foote, William Peet, Rev. H. R. Judah, rector of St. John's Church, Dr. William B. Nash, Abijah Hawley, Ezekiel Hubbell, Eli Thompson, Gideon Thompson, and others of equal standing in the community. Notwithstanding this defense, the popular prejudice was so strong against the institution that Masonry was practically dormant in this place until about the year 1847. After this date it began to revive, and meetings were held at first in the old lodge-room, which was in the upper story of the school-house, No. 200 State Street, afterwards upon the northwest corner of State and Water Streets, then over Ferris Hurd's store, on Water Street, at the foot of State Street, and finally, in 1855, in the present well-known and handsome rooms in Sturdevant Building, corner of Main and Bank Streets.

Feb. 12, 1862, the centennial anniversary of St. John's Lodge, No. 3, was celebrated by interesting exercises held in the First Methodist Episcopal Church, and by a supper at Franklin Hall, at which some four hundred members of the order and invited guests were present. An account of the proceedings, together with a historical sketch and an oration delivered on the occasion by the Rev. Dr. Ewer, was afterwards published.

The present membership of St. John's Lodge, No. 3, is five hundred and eight, and the officers of the body are: Frederick F. Callender, W. M.; Thomas F. Daly, S. W.; Edward T. Ward, J. W.; E. Stewart Sumner, Sec.; William R. Higby, Treas.; Rev. E. W. Maxey, D.D., Chaplain.

Corinthian Lodge, No. 104, was chartered May 22, 1868, and now numbers one hundred members. It meets in the same lodge-room used by the members of St. John's, and its officers are as follows: Daniel N. Morgan, W. M.; W. W. Ingham, S. W.; H. E. Winsor, J. W.; Charles E. Wilnot, Sec.; H. H. Porter, Treas.; Rev. Sylvester Clarke, Chaplain.

Hamilton Commandery, No. 5, Knights Templar, was chartered under name of Hamilton Encampment, May 10, 1855, with sixteen charter members, all of whom had originally belonged to Clinton Commandery.

May 21, 1855, Hamilton Commandery, No. 3, of Norwalk, was instituted, officers were chosen, and three members—William R. Higby, James L. Gould, and James E. Dunham—received the honor of knighthood. The first public appearance of this body was at the funeral of Alexander Hamilton, a prominent citizen, from whom the Commandery took its name, who died Aug. 27, 1857. Its twenty-fifth anniversary was celebrated May 20, 1880, by appropriate exercises, including an interesting historical sketch by William R. Higby, which has been published. Officers of the Commandery at this time are: William E. Seeley, E. C.; Hugh Stirling, Gen.; William R. Higby, Treas.; W. B. Osborn, Rec.

Following are the dates of organization of several of the other Masonic bodies in this city. Want of space forbids giving any account of them at this time:

Jerusalem Chapter, No. 13, R. A. M., Oct. 21, 1813.

Jerusalem Council, No. 16, R. and S. M., in 1827.

De Witt Clinton Lodge of Perfection, May 11, 1858.

Pequonnock Chapter, R. C., June 1, 1858.

Washington Council, P. of J., June 1, 1858.

Lafayette Consistory, S. P. of R. S., June 1, 1858.

As will be seen by what has been written, the membership of the order in this city is at this time over six hundred. Though not professing to be a charitable organization, it does not a little for the relief of the sick and suffering, and in this respect is certainly worthy of all praise.

GASLIGHT COMPANY

The Bridgeport Gaslight Company was incorporated in 1849, and, as already mentioned, commenced business in December, 1851, with seventy-six private consumers and twenty-six public street-lamps. Among the original corporators named in the charter were Horace Nichols, R. B. Mason, W. P. Burrall, Philo Hurd, and Hanford Lyon. H. K. Harral was the first president of the company, and P. C. Calhoun the first treasurer. After the decease of Mr. Harral, in June, 1854, his place was filled by Hanford Lyon, who held the office until April 2, 1868, when he was succeeded by Amos S. Treat, who has ever since been president. The original cost of the works was seventy-five thousand dollars, but more than one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars additional has since been expended upon them. The late John Cornwall was secretary and treasurer for twenty years, from 1851 to 1871, and C. A. Gerdenier, the present superintendent, has been connected with the company since 1864.

Officers of the company at the present time are: Hon. Amos S. Treat, President; William B. Hincks, Secretary and Treasurer; Charles A. Gerdenier, Superintendent; Samuel C. Trubee, William H. Perry, William R. Higby, A. C. Hobbs, Henry L. Clark, Horace Nichols, Sidney B. Beardsley, Amos S. Treat, William B. Hincks, Directors.

GRAIN-ELEVATOR.

The following account of this building is taken from an article entitled "The Trade and Manufactures of Bridgeport," in the "Municipal Register" for 1876.

"Bridgeport has the only grain-elevator on the coast between New York and Boston. It was erected in 1871 by the enterprising firm of Crane & Hurd, and grew out of their connection and experience with the grain trade in the West. It is forty by fifty feet at the base, and one hundred feet in height. It is run by a twenty-five horse-power engine and the labor of five men, and is capable of taking in and storing eight thousand bushels of grain per day of ten hours from either railroad-car or boat at the dock. Grain is brought in bulk in rail-cars from any point in the West, or by water in canal-boat, barge, or schooner from any of the larger markets, and here conveniently and economically handled and then distributed to the various points of consumption. As many as one and a half million bushels of grain have passed through this elevator in a single year. Mr. John Hurd is the present sole proprietor."

HARBOR.

With proper attention Bridgeport Harbor ought to be one of the best upon the sound. Systematic improvements were begun by the United States government in the summer of 1872, and are still in progress. Before dredging was commenced there were but five and a half or six feet of water at low tide at certain points where there is now twelve feet. The intention of the government engineers is ultimately to make the channel three hundred feet wide and twelve feet deep from Long Island Sound to the lower bridge, and to extend the present breakwater to a point thirteen hundred and eighty feet from the eastern shore. The effect of the breakwater, it is thought, will be to keep the channel from filling up again, and thus make the improvements of a permanent character. Above the lower bridge the harbor has been much injured by encroachments, some of the docks and piers having been built out much farther than should have been permitted.

HORSE-RAILROAD.

The Bridgeport Horse-Railroad Company was incorporated in 1865 with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, the charter of the company giving it permission to extend its line from the starting-point near Pembroke Lake, in East Bridgeport, to Mountain Grove Cemetery and Black Rock, with a branch to the railroad depot at the foot of Fairfield Avenue. Cars first commenced running from the Sterling House to the eastern terminus Jan. 23, 1866, and while the road was a novelty it was liberally patronized. The present western terminus is at the junction of Fairfield and Clinton Avenues, the length of track four miles, and the rate of fare five cents. Nine cars and forty-one horses are owned by the company and three hundred and thirty thousand eight hundred and forty-seven passengers were carried during the past year.

Officers of the corporation are: Albert Eames, President; Frederick Hurd, Secretary and Treasurer; B. F. Lasher, Superintendent; N. Wheeler, P. T. Barnum, C. A. Hotchkiss, James Wilson, Frederick Hurd, Albert Eames, J. J. Gorham, Directors.

HOSPITAL.

The need of a well-conducted hospital in a city of the size of Bridgeport for the relief of cases of accidental injury and the treatment of patients who cannot receive proper care at their homes is very apparent. To Dr. George F. Lewis belongs the credit of first attempting to supply this want. At his suggestion a bequest was inserted in the will of his aunt, the late Miss Susan Hubbell, of West Stratford, for founding a hospital in this vicinity. In January, 1878, the Bridgeport Hospital was organized as a body corporate by the Legislature. Following are the officers of the corporation: P. T. Barnum, President; E. F. Bishop, Vice-President; George F. Lewis, Secretary and Treasurer; Jarratt Morford, William B. Hincks, Robert J. White, Executive Committee; P. T. Barnum, Samuel W. Baldwin, George F. Lewis, F. B. Hall, R. W. Bunnell, E. F. Bishop, Robert J. White, Amos S. Treat, William B. Hincks, Charles B. Hotchkiss, Jarratt Morford, Samuel C. Trubee, Directors.

The amount of Miss Hubbell's bequest was thirteen thousand four hundred and seventy-nine dollars, together with a lot containing about one acre of land on Mill Hill Avenue, West Stratford. By accumulation of interest upon the investments, and by collections taken up in behalf of the object by churches and societies, this amount has now increased to about twenty-two thousand dollars; but, as the sum of sixty thousand dollars is needed before commencing to build, it is obvious that much remains to be done.

HYDRAULIC COMPANY.

A very full account is given in the "Municipal Register" for 1873 and succeeding years of the history of the water supply of Bridgeport, and only a few of the leading facts will be recapitulated here.

The first effort to supply water by pipes to the people of Bridgeport was made by Rev. Elijah Waterman about the year 1818. Certain springs of pure water near the present corner of Golden Hill and Hewitt Streets were deepened and cleared out, and the water conducted down town and through the principal streets in wooden pipes, or rather bored-out logs. The enterprise was continued, at first by Lewis C. Segee, who succeeded Mr. Waterman about the year 1823, and afterwards in May, 1833, by Jesse Sterling, Stephen Hawley, S. B. Jones, Nichols Northrop, and their associates, who were incorporated in May, 1833, under the name of the Bridgeport and Golden Hill Aqueduct Company, with capital of ten thousand dollars, the water being obtained from the source already mentioned.

In 1853, the need of a more extensive supply of water, particularly for fire purposes, being felt, the Common Council granted to Nathaniel Greene (agent of the Pequonock Mills, in North Bridgeport), and to his assigns the exclusive privilege of laying down water pipes in the public streets, on condition of his furnishing the city and the inhabitants with a full supply of pure water for domestic, mechanical, and all ordinary uses, both public and private. The Bridgeport Water Company was incorporated by Mr. Greene and others for this purpose in the year 1853, with a capital of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, and during the following year a distributing reservoir in North Bridgeport was constructed and pipes were laid through the principal streets of the city, the source of supply being the water of the Pequonock River, which was pumped up into the reservoir.

The enterprise did not prove remunerative to the stockholders, and, bonds to the amount of ninety thousand dollars having been issued, the company eventually fell into the hands of the bondholders by foreclosure, and in June, 1857, a charter was granted to a new corporation composed of the bondholders. By this charter William S. Knowlton, N. Greene, J. H. Washburn, Joseph Richardson, and others became, under the name of the Bridgeport Hydraulic Company, the successors of the Bridgeport Water Company, and the possessors of all its rights and franchises. Serious complaint having been made for a long time both as to the want of a sufficient supply and as to the quality of the water furnished, an act was passed by the General Assembly, July 2, 1873, authorizing the city to buy the works of the Bridgeport Hydraulic Company, or to build new works, if a purchase could not be effected upon terms satisfactory to the city. This act was duly ratified by the city, but at a city meeting called for the purpose, Aug. 13, 1873, resolutions to purchase the hydraulic company's works for the sum of three hundred thousand dollars were lost by twenty-seven majority, the whole number of votes cast being six hundred and seventy-six. A new proposition made by the company to a committee of the Common Council, to sell the works, franchises, etc., for the sum of two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars was rejected, Nov. 3, 1873, by a larger majority than before, -viz., two hundred and twenty-three out of a vote of seventeen hundred and forty-three.

Eventually, Joseph Richardson, up to this time the president and leading stockholder of the hydraulic company, sold his stock to Hon. Amos S. Treat, and a new policy was inaugurated. The sources of supply have been greatly enlarged, old and worn-out pipe has been replaced in many sections with new pipe of good quality, and mains have been laid in localities not before reached. Since Aug. 25, 1875, the date of Mr. Treat's purchase, the sum of one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars has been expended in laying down mains and thirty thousand dollars in building new reservoirs, etc. The total amount of mains now in use is forty-five miles and the elevation of the distributing reservoirs above tide-water is one hundred and ten feet. The company now depends for water chiefly upon natural flow, resort to the pump being had only in dry seasons.

Following is a list of present sources of supply: Trumbull reservoir, 60 acres; Island Brook reservoir, 62 acres; Bunnell's Pond, 50 acres; Bunnell's Upper Pond, 45 acres; Ox-stream reservoir, 15 acres; Horse tavern reservoir, 5 acres; distributing reservoir, 3 acres; total, 210 acres.

Officers of the company for 1880 are: P. T. Barnum, President; A. S. Treat, Treasurer; C. H. Thorpe, Secretary; George Richardson, Superintendent; P. T. Barnum, N. Wheeler, J. Richardson, William H. Perry, A. S. Treat, T. B. De Forest, Samuel Wilmot, S. W. Baldwin, Directors.

INSURANCE.

The Mutual Life Insurance Association of Bridgeport was organized in 1878, and at the present time has about four hundred and fifty members. An admission-fee varying from six to sixty dollars according to the age of the applicant is charged, and upon the death of any member of the association an assessment of two dollars is made upon each of the survivors for the benefit of the relatives of the deceased, or of such other person as he may have designated. This is the only insurance company in Bridgeport.

Following is a list of the officers: Charles B. Hotchkiss, President; John D. Candee, Vice-President; W. G. Lineburgh, Secretary; William E. Seeley, Treasurer.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Internal Revenue system of the United States was established in 1862. Each congressional district was at first made a collection district, and David F. Hollister, of Bridgeport, was appointed Collector of the Fourth District of Connecticut (Fairfield and Litchfield Counties) by President Lincoln, Aug. 15, 1862.

In October, 1873, the Second and Fourth Districts were consolidated, and Mr. Hollister was appointed Collector of the consolidated territory, which comprises the counties of Litchfield, Fairfield, New Haven, and Middlesex, and is called the Second Connecticut District; and this position he still holds. The total amount of revenue collected from the old Fourth District from its organization in August, 1862, to the date of its consolidation, November, 1873, was $7,886,011.66. The collections in the Second District from its formation to Sept. 1, 1880, were $1,843,510.64, making the aggregate amount collected in a little over eighteen years $9,729,522.30. During this whole time there has never been the discrepancy of a single cent between Mr. Hollister's accounts and those of government, and the office has been repeatedly commended for the accurate manner in which its transactions are recorded.

The principal office of the district is in Bridgeport. The other officers residing here are: Henry C. Lemon and Francis E. Barlow, Deputy Collectors; William H. Kelsey, Clerk; and John A. Boughton, Gauger.

LIBRARY.

The present Bridgeport Library, incorporated in June, 1850, was reorganized and a new act of incorporation obtained in October, 1855. It was the successor of a similar institution, which disbanded and transferred its books and other property to the new association. The manner in which the original institution was begun is briefly as follows: About the year 1830, S. M. Middlebrook, the present treasurer of the City Savings Bank, wrote several anonymous articles urging the necessity of a public library in Bridgeport, and slipped them at different times under the office-door of The Weekly Farmer, where they were found and published by the editor. Encouraged by their reception, young Middlebrook wrote another article, calling a public meeting to be held at Knapp's Hotel, corner of Wall and Water Streets, upon a certain specified evening, to discuss the subject; but, feeling that he was only a boy, did not sign his name to the communication. Like the others, it was published. The evening came; quite a number of the solid citizens of the place were in attendance, but no one appeared to state the object of the meeting or to take the lead, and much wonder was expressed as to the author of the call in the Farmer, and why he was not present to champion his idea. Certainly no one thought of suspecting the young lad who was strolling up and down outside, occasionally casting a keen glance through the window to see what was taking place within. Alanson Hamlin, the leading lawyer of the borough, finally took the chair and made a strong speech in favor of a library. Resolutions were passed, a committee was appointed to take up subscriptions, and the result was that a small number of well-selected books was obtained.

This library was kept for a time in the old savings bank, the treasurer, Deacon George Sterling, acting as librarian without compensation. Sometimes interest in the affair would languish, and the books were boxed up for a time; at other times the institution was quite prosperous. It finally disbanded, bequeathing its property to its successor, as already related.

The Bridgeport Library received a bonus of five hundred dollars from the Farmers' Bank, and one of one thousand dollars from the Pequonnoek Bank, both in 1851. Considerable sums of money have also been realized at different times by courses of lectures and other entertainments, and by the circulation of subscription-papers in its behalf. During the year 1855 the sum of three thousand dollars was subscribed by public-spirited citizens of the place, and the collection of the Calliopean Society of Yale College was purchased and placed upon its shelves. The library and reading-room, originally at No. 41 Wall Street, were removed thence to the court-house building, and about ten years ago to their present location, in Wheeler's Building. The number of volumes is now about eight thousand, besides a large number of government documents. The rent is paid by the city, but the only source of income at present possessed by the institution is the membership dues of about three or four hundred dollars per annum.

The institution has always been fortunate in its librarians, and never more so than at present, but, owing to the want of funds, no new books have been purchased for several years past, and a large number of those owned by the association are badly dilapidated from long use. What this institution greatly needs is an endowment fund of not less than ten thousand dollars, the interest of which should be specially devoted to the purchase of new books. This would put new life into all its departments. Until such time as this can be obtained, it would seem that the town might wisely make an annual appropriation in its behalf, as is everywhere done in Massachusetts, and as permitted by the statute law in this State.

LIGHTHOUSES.

The Bridgeport lighthouse is about one and a half miles south by east from the city, and consists of a tower and dwelling painted white, with slate-colored Mansard roof and black lantern. The house stands upon iron piles, and was erected in the year 1871. In entering the harbor vessels must pass to the eastward and not nearer than two hundred feet. The light is a fixed red one, fifty-three feet above the sea-level, and the fog-signal is a cast-steel bell struck by machinery every fifteen seconds.

The Black Rock lighthouse is upon the southern extremity of Fayerweather's Island, and consists of a stone tower erected in 1808, white, with black lantern, containing a fixed white light, fifty-two feet above the sea-level and visible for thirteen miles. The breakwater adjoining the lighthouse was built in the summer of 1837.

Penfield Reef lighthouse, one and a quarter miles southwest of Black Rock light, was built in 1873, and marks what was formerly one of the most dangerous localities in Long Island Sound. The keeper's dwelling, of gray granite, is built upon a masonry pier and has a Mansard roof surmounted by an octagonal wooden tower painted white, excepting the dome of the lantern, which is black. The light is a flashing red one, and the fog-signal is a steel bell struck by machinery,—two blows in quick succession, at intervals of twenty seconds.

Information concerning the different lighthouses and beacons in this vicinity—their cost, date of erection, etc.—may be found in the acts of Congress approved upon the following dates: April 21, 1806; Feb. 10, 1807; May 23, 1808; March 3, 1819; March 3, 1821; March 2, 1827; and others.

The late Capt. Abram A. McNeil established a light at the entrance of Bridgeport Harbor about the year 1841,—at first merely a lantern upon the end of a buoy, afterwards a whale-boat decked over and carrying a light, and then a group of five piles with a lantern upon the one in the centre. In 1851, upon petition of Capt. John Brooks, a small lighthouse was erected here by the government, the predecessor of the handsome structure of 1871, described above.

The present breakwater and the beacon upon the rocks known as "the Cows," off Fairfield, were also built upon petition of Capt. Brooks.

MILLS.

The original parish grist-mill was upon Ash Creek, a short distance north of the old stage road or North Avenue, and is supposed to have been built either by Henry Jackson, of Fairfield, or by his son Moses as early as the year 1653. The successive structures upon this site have been commonly known as Jackson's, Knapp's, and Moody's Mill.

A mill upon the Pequonnoek River, near the present reservoir, was owned and occupied by Stephen Burroughs before the Revolution, but the date when it was built is unknown to the writer. Old Mill, which stood at the eastern extremity of the common known as Old Mill Green, was built in the year 1653 by Thomas Sherwood and John Hurd, of Stratford, who were granted land by the town, and allowed to charge a toll of one-sixteenth part of every grist ground. The name Old Mill is still a familiar one, though the mill itself disappeared nearly a century ago.

The mill near the site of the present Berkshire Bridge was first built in 1783, as shown by the following extract, slightly abridged, from the manuscript acts of the General Assembly at Hartford. The act in question was passed in October, 1792, and may be found in vol. v. pages 34, 35:

"Upon the petition of William Pixlee and James French, of the town of Stratford, stating that upon Pequonnoek River, above the settlement called New Field, about one mile from the mouth of Newfield Harbor, is a place called the Narrows; that they own the land on each side of said river at said place; that in the year 1783 they erected a dam and a grist-mill at said place, which they have continued ever since; that they have been perpetually harassed with law-suits ever since, by Philip Nichols and Stephen Burroughs, Esqs., of said Stratford, who own lands above said river, half a mile above said mill; and that a tide-mill at said place would be a public advantage, as per petition on file;

"Resolved by this Assembly, That said dam be established at said place called the Narrows, and liberty is hereby granted to said petitioners to keep up and maintain a dam across said river, and to use and employ said mills now erected, or that may be erected, for twenty years from the first of December next, or longer, at the pleasure of this Assembly. Provided, That the Gates of said Dam shall be deemed sufficient by a Committee appointed for the purpose for the passage of Vessels, Boats, and Scaws.

"And it is ordered that neither of the petitioners shall be liable to respond in damages to any private person for keeping up or maintaining the same. Always provided, That no person or persons shall be barred from maintaining any action in case they are damaged by the overflowing of the waters occasioned by said Dam."

NEWSPAPERS.

Extended reference has already been made to the American Telegrapher, the first newspaper published in Bridgeport. Among its successors were the following:

The Bridgeport Herald, a weekly paper, commenced about the year 1805 by Samuel Mallory. Copies of it are now extremely scarce,—much more so than those of its predecessor, the Telegrapher, of which quite a number have been preserved.

The Bridgeport Advertiser, started in 1806, by Hezekiah Ripley, and published weekly for several years at the rate of one dollar and fifty cents per annum.

The Connecticut Courier, begun in 1810, by Nathaniel L. Skinner, and continued by him for upwards of a dozen years.

Another paper, called the Connecticut Patriot, was commenced in 1826, by L. Bradley & Co., at their office, corner of Main and State Streets, opposite the Steamboat Hotel, afterwards the Franklin House.

A newspaper called the Spirit of the Times, published and edited by George W. Smith, Jr., at the corner of State and Water Streets, which met for a time with considerable success. This paper was started in 1831, when public feeling ran high on the subject of Masonry, soon after the abduction of the unfortunate Morgan. It was devoted to the cause of anti-Masonry, and for a while circulated as many as eight hundred copies. It was afterwards sold to John Swaine.

The Bridgeport Republican, a weekly paper, commenced in 1830 by Edmund Fanton. This paper was the predecessor of the Standard. About the year 1839, Mr. Fanton sold his printing material to A. A. Pettengill.

The Bridgeport Chronicle, first published Sept. 9, 1848, by B. H. Munson, at the corner of State and Water Streets. It was issued weekly, at one dollar per annum, and enjoyed but a brief existence.

The same is true of the first Bridgeport Leader, which was suspended after fifteen numbers. It was edited by T. M. Clarke, subsequently editor of the Winsted Herald, and published by the Bridgeport Printing Company. The date upon its first number is March 25, 1854.

The newspapers published in Bridgeport at the present time are the Farmer, Democratic, Standard, Republican, and the Morning News and Leader, independent.

The first number of the Republican Farmer was issued April 25, 1810, by Mr. Stiles Nichols, who had removed from Danbury, where the paper had been published under the same name since 1803. The first copy of the Daily Farmer was printed Jan. 1, 1850, by the late W. S. Pomeroy. The publication-office and editorial-room of the Farmer, which were for many years upon the corner of Wall and Water Streets, have been recently removed to a more convenient location, No. 21 Fairfield Avenue (Waller's Building), adjoining the railroad depot. Messrs. James L. Gould and Henry B. Stiles are the proprietors of this old-established journal, the former giving special attention to the editorial, the latter to the publication, department. The local editor is Mr. Rufus A. Lyon.

The Republican Standard was commenced in the year 1839 by A. A. Pettengill, who was both editor and proprietor. In the spring of 1848, Julius S. Hanover was admitted to an interest in the business, and the firm-name was subsequently changed to Pettengill & Hanover. In 1853 a tri-weekly edition was begun, followed in 1854 by the publication of a daily. In September, 1863, Mr. John D. Candee, formerly of New Haven, became the successor of the firm of Pettengill & Hanover, and Jan. 1, 1867, the Standard Association was organized, with a capital stock of sixty thousand dollars. At the present time the paper is edited by Messrs. John D. Candee and George C. Waldo, Alexander Wheeler having charge of the business management and Louis C. Prindle the department of local news. The handsome brick building on the corner of Fairfield Avenue and Middle Streets, owned and occupied by the Standard Association, was erected in 1870, at a cost of about thirty thousand dollars.

Several attempts have been made at different times to found a daily morning paper in Bridgeport,—a difficult task in any city, but especially so here on account of the proximity of New York and the early hour at which the metropolitan journals are received. The Morning News, however, begun in 1879, seems to have secured a foothold and to enjoy a fair share of public favor. The publication-office is No. 324 Main Street. Maj. Henry M. Hoyt is publisher, Arthur W. French editor, and I. M. Witmeyer reporter.

The Leader, now in its ninth volume, is issued every Wednesday and Saturday at No. 321 Water Street. Franklin Sherwood is the editor and proprietor. Special attention is given in its columns to municipal affairs, the proceedings of the Common Council, etc.

ODD-FELLOWS.

The society known as the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows was first introduced into Connecticut, and Quinipiac Lodge, of New Haven, instituted, Sept. 3, 1839. In April, 1840, Charter Oak Lodge,

No. 2, of Hartford, and Middlesex Lodge, No. 3, of East Haddam, were founded, followed, June 11, 1841, by Pequot Lodge, No. 4, of Bridgeport, the petition for which was signed by George H. Johnson, John M. Wilson, Gilson Landon, Samuel L. Eldred, and George Walters, all of this city. The first place of meeting for Pequot Lodge was in a small room in the upper story of No. 35 Wall Street, but in January, 1845, a larger hall was occupied, at No. 107 Water Street. Feb. 4, 1847, Arcanum Lodge, No. 11, was instituted, its first officers being Ira Morse, N. G.; W. H. Lacey, V. G.; W. H. Williams, Sec.; L. C. Shepard, Treas. The place of meeting was the same one occupied by Pequot Lodge, No. 407 Water Street. For a number of years these lodges prospered financially and numerically, but the interest having declined, and secret societies generally being out of favor with the public, in 1856 Arcanum Lodge surrendered its charter, and in 1860 its example was followed by Pequot Lodge.

Steuben Lodge, No. 83, of this city, was instituted April 1, 1867, and for a long time met at the old hall on Water Street, but on July 9, 1879, having greatly increased in membership and in funds, it removed to its present elegant rooms in Stanton Block, State Street. The charter of Pequot Lodge was renewed Feb. 2, 1869, on petition of Martin Conrad, F. H. Stevens, J. L. Roberts, Ebenezer Wheeler, and Lewis Sherman, former members. Its meetings were held at first on Water Street, but in January, 1871, it removed to the hall over the People's Savings Bank, corner of Main and Bank Streets, and April 19, 1873, to its present quarters, in the upper story of Burroughs' Building, upon the corner of Main and John Streets. These rooms were fitted up, furnished, frescoed, and carpeted very handsomely by the lodge, and the hall is the largest occupied in this State by the order. Arcanum Lodge, No. 41, was revived March 17, 1875, and at present meets in the hall of Pequot Lodge, while Lessing Lodge, No. 94, organized Dec. 14, 1874, has always met over the People's Savings Bank, and, like its parent, Steuben Lodge, works in the German language.

In the year 1876 it was thought advisable to begin to hold meetings of the order in East Bridgeport, and Harris Lodge, No. 99, was begun, October 27th of that year, at No. 224 East Main Street (Barr's Block), with thirty-eight members; but, a severe storm having unroofed the building, the lodge removed to its present rooms, upon East Washington Avenue, about Jan. 1, 1877. Charity Lodge, No. 4, and Friendship Lodge, No. 13, Degree of Rebekah, were instituted May 7, 1870, and Feb. 13, 1874, the latter working in the German language. Both these bodies are composed of members of the other subordinate lodges and their wives, and are in a flourishing condition.

Stratfield Encampment, No. 23, was instituted July 16, 1869, with seven charter members, and meets in the hall of Pequot Lodge. The whole number admitted to its membership is two hundred and thirty-one; present membership one hundred and nineteen, including a battalion of about forty uniformed Patriarchs. Bridgeport Encampment, No. 22, was chartered May 17, 1870, and meets in the hall of Steuben Lodge, on State Street. Its numerical strength at the present time is ninety.

Each of the lodges and encampments makes its own by-laws respecting the amount of admission fees and weekly and funeral benefits.

The Mutual Aid Association, composed of Odd-Fellows throughout the State, has at the present time (August, 1880) four hundred and thirty-five members in Bridgeport. It pays upon the death of a member fifteen hundred dollars in one class, and five hundred dollars in another class. There is also a sick-benefit association in connection with Pequot and Arcanum Lodges, which pays five dollars per week during sickness in addition to the regular benefits paid by the lodge. Another mutual-aid association of members of these two lodges has at present about one hundred names upon its roll, each one of whom pays two dollars upon the death of any member of the association.

In addition to the necessary expense of fitting up lodges, rent, etc., there has been paid out for relief of members of Bridgeport organizations since the revival of the order in 1867 not far from eighteen thousand dollars.

The whole number of persons admitted to membership during the same period is about twelve hundred, and the strength of the order in this place July 1, 1880, was as follows:

	Members- hip.	Funds on hand.
Pequot Lodge, No. 4.....	319	$7,922
Arcanum " " 41.....	112	4,707
Steuben " " 83.....	223	5,176
Lessing " " 94.....	71	102
S. H. Harris " " 99.....	139	1,238
Total.....	864	$17,845

At the same date the other branches of the order reported the following membership and strength:

	Members- hip.	Funds on hand.
Bridgeport Encampment.....	90	$825
Stratfield " ".....	119	1,219
Friendship Lodge, D. of R.....	132	978
Charity " ".....	150	150
Total.....	491	$3,172

These figures show that the aggregate amount of funds on hand in the several lodges of the place was twenty-one thousand and fifteen dollars, and that, not including the encampments or Friendship and Charity Lodges, the membership of the order embraced about one-sixth of the voting population of the city.

It should be also stated that, while pecuniary benefits are a leading feature of Odd-Fellowship, they are by no means the sole, or even the chief, end of the institution. Though not himself a member, the writer is assured by those in whom he has full confidence that it inculcates love for Him "in whom we live and move and have our being." It teaches gratitude to the Creator, loyalty to our country and its laws, and fraternity to our fellow-men.

Among the Bridgeport men who have been prominent in the order are the late George S. Sanford, who was elected Warden of the Grand Lodge in 1848, Grand Master in 1849, and Grand Representative in 1850, and Rev. J. M. Willey, D.D., former rector of St. John's Church, who held the offices of Grand Chaplain, Grand Master, and Representative. Rev. E. W. Maxey, D.D., present rector of St. John's, is a member of Arcanum Lodge, No. 41, and has been Chaplain of the Grand Lodge for the past three years. Charles W. Smith, of Pequonnock Lodge and Stratfield Encampment, was elected Grand Patriarch in 1877, and is at present Grand Representative; and Thomas Stirling, of Arcanum Lodge, was chosen Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Connecticut in 1878, and in 1879 Representative for two years from that body to the Sovereign Grand Lodge.

ORPHAN ASYLUM.

The Bridgeport Protestant Orphan Asylum was organized Dec. 11, 1867, and incorporated May 6, 1868, "for the purpose of relieving, supporting, and educating children who are friendless and desolate." Miss Lydia R. Ward, Mrs. Eliza S. W. Jones, Mrs. Mary L. Clapp, and forty-seven other ladies being the incorporators. The building now occupied as an asylum, No. 119 Lafayette Street, between Atlantic and Gregory Streets, was completed March 31, 1870, and cost thirteen thousand dollars. The land upon which it stands was the gift of Nathaniel Wheeler, Isaac H. Whiting, and Francis Ives. A new building for hospital purposes has just been completed at a cost of one thousand dollars. The present number of inmates of the asylum is thirty-two, and the annual expenses about two thousand five hundred dollars.

Officers of the institution are Miss Lydia R. Ward, President; Mrs. Edward Sterling, Vice-President; Mrs. S. B. Sumner, Chief Manager; Mrs. G. Oknesorg, Recording Secretary; Miss Henrietta Noble, Corresponding Secretary; Miss Georgiana Gossling, Treasurer; Miss S. C. Ward, Provider; Mrs. W. K. Seeley, Assistant Provider; Mrs. W. K. Seeley, Mrs. D. M. Reed, Miss Sarah C. Ward, Standing Committee; Nathaniel Wheeler, George Mallory, E. S. Hawley, Edward Sterling, Clapp Spooner, William D. Bishop, Trustees.

PARKS.

An account has already been given of our beautiful pleasure-ground by the seaside, and in the same connection reference was made to the reservation of a tract of land in East Bridgeport for a public park by Messrs. Barnum and Noble in 1851. This land was not formally transferred to the city until July 17, 1865, when deeds executed by P. T. Barnum and William H. Perry were accepted by the Common Council in behalf of the city, that body having been duly authorized to take this action by a city meeting held July 8th. At the same meeting of the Council the name of Washington Park was given to the land, an appropriation of one thousand dollars was made for fencing, in addition to the sum already raised by private subscription, and William H. Perry, Charles A. Hotchkiss, and Nathaniel Wheeler were appointed commissioners for the care and improvement of the park.

The proposed Beardsley Park is situated about one mile north of Old Mill Green, and two and a half miles from the county court-house, between the Trumbull Road and Bunnell's Pond. It contains some fifty acres, and its highest point is about one hundred and five feet above tide-water.

By the following list it will be seen that Bridgeport is well provided for in the matter of parks:

	Area in acres.	Estimated value.	Annual cost of maintenance.
Seaside Park.....	75	$250,000	$2500
Washington Park.....	4	100,000	500
Beardsley ".....	50	20,000	500
Old Mill Green.....	6	5,000	100
Total.....	135	$375,000	$3600

POLICE.

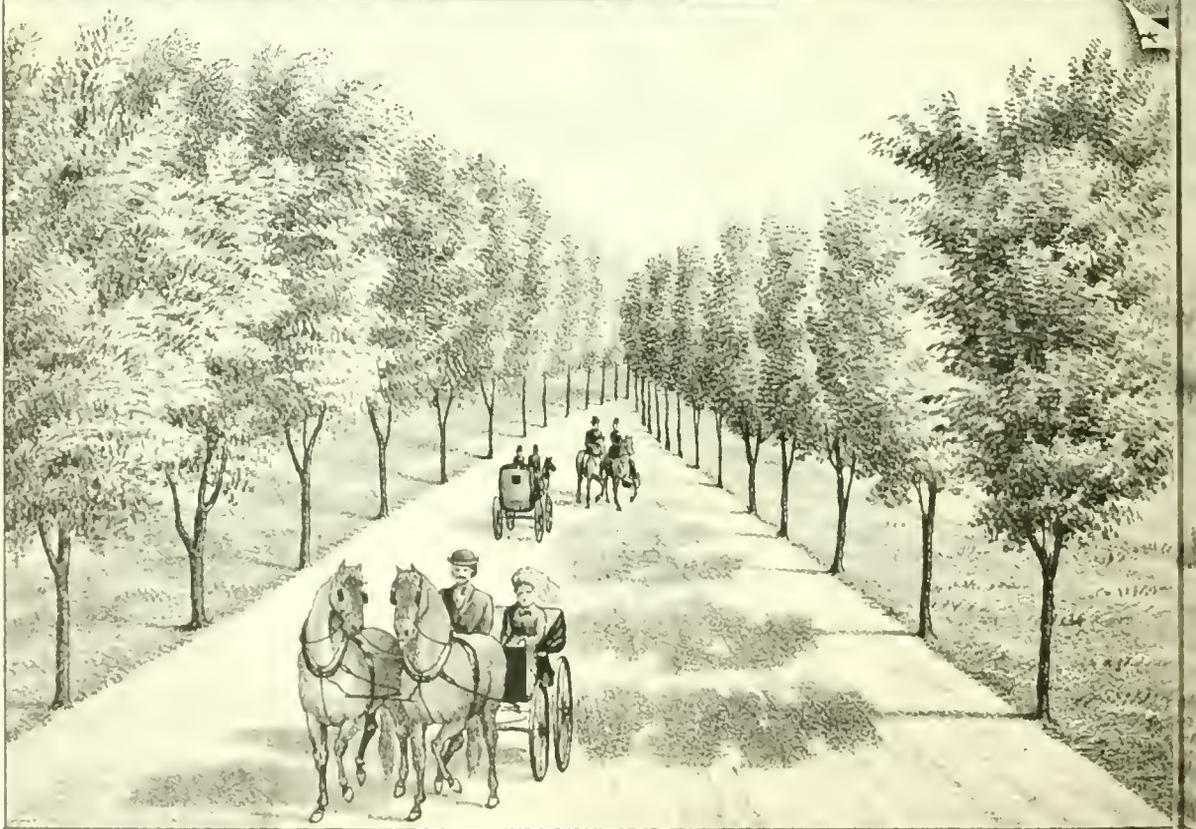

The police force of Bridgeport at the present time consists of Chief William E. Marsh, Capt. George S. Pratt, Sergt. Wm. J. Dorrance, and sixteen patrolmen. There are also a police surgeon and thirty-seven special officers for occasional duty when required. The annual expenses of the force, pay-roll, etc., amount to about eighteen thousand dollars.

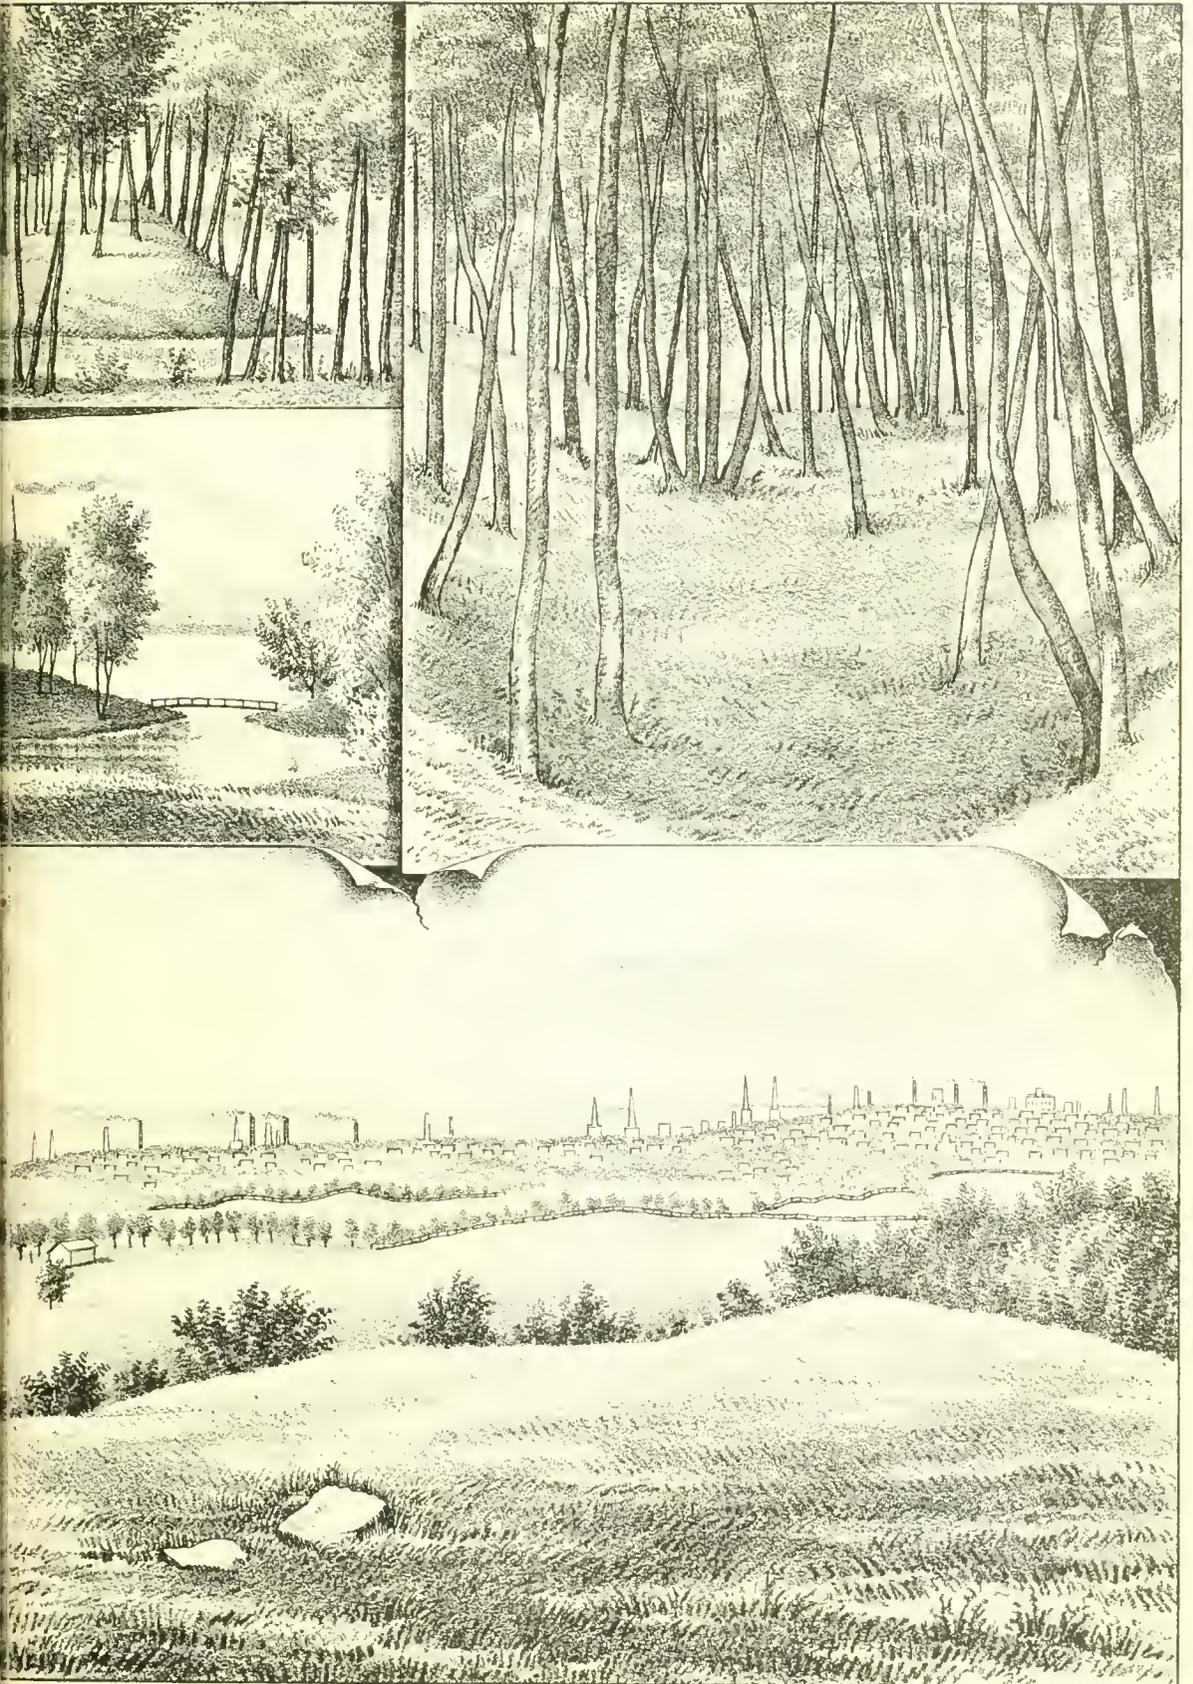

During the year ending March 1, 1880, eight hundred and sixty-two arrests were made, one of which was for murder, two hundred and thirty were for drunkenness, and the remainder for a variety of minor offenses. Of the persons arrested, two hundred and seventy-four were of American, and five hundred and eighty-eight of foreign, birth. Stolen property to the amount of three thousand five hundred dollars was recovered during the year. The police headquarters have been for a number of years past in the basement of the county court-house, hitherto a very damp and unhealthy locality, but alterations to the building are now in progress that will much improve its sanitary condition.

The government of the police force is vested by the city charter in a non-partisan board of four members, with the mayor as presiding officer. Following is a list of the board as at present constituted: Hon. Daniel N. Morgan, President, ex-officio; Charles K. Averill, term expires April, 1881; Samuel C. Kingman, term expires April, 1881; Frank C. Bennett, term expires April, 1882; William B. Spencer, term expires April, 1882.

POPULATION.

The late Deacon Isaac Sherman, writing in 1860, made the following estimate of the number of people residing at different dates within the territory embraced in the city limits of Bridgeport:

HARDSLEY PARK.

SKETCHED BY H. P. WHINNERY.

	Inhabitants.
1800	250

The first time that the census of Bridgeport was taken separately was in 1810, before that time it having been included with Stratford. Jeremiah W. Beardsley was enumerator that year, and his original return is still preserved. According to this there were 94 heads of families in the borough, and the total population, including a negro slave in the family of Lieut. Salmon Hubbell, was 572. The population of the adjoining towns at the same date was as follows: Stratford (not including the borough of Bridgeport), 2895; Fairfield, 4125; Trumbull, 1241. In 1820, Bridgeport had increased in size to about 1200, and in 1830 to 2800. In 1840, Henry Edwards was enumerator, and the number returned by him was 4570. In 1850 the late William R. Bunnell took the census, and found 7558 inhabitants, of whom 832 resided upon the east side of the river and 250 at North Bridgeport. The number of colored persons making their home in Bridgeport at that time was 286, and of foreigners 1493,—viz., born in Ireland, 1102; in England, 188; in Germany, 138; from other countries, 65.

In 1860, George W. Lewis was enumerator, and the population of the place was 13,299, having almost doubled during the decade preceding. In 1870 the census was taken under the supervision of the late Philo F. Barnum, and showed 19,876 inhabitants, not including the portion of territory annexed that year. During the present year (1880) the census has been taken under the supervision of Supervisor W. E. Disbrow, whose jurisdiction embraces Fairfield, Litchfield, and New Haven Counties. By dividing the territory into districts whose population does not exceed 2000, greater accuracy than ever before has been attained. The present population of Bridgeport is found to be 29,153, of whom 27,713 reside within the city limits and 1440 beyond them. The number living upon the west side of the river is 19,770, and in East Bridgeport 9383. Careful investigation showed the number of insane to be 27, and of idiots 17. There were also found here 16 deaf and 9 blind persons and 53 paupers.

POST-OFFICE.

Following is a list of the postmasters in Bridgeport, with dates of appointment, since the first establishment of the office:

Amos B. Fairman, appointed April 1, 1801.
 Charles Bostwick, appointed Jan. 1, 1804.
 Benjamin Bostwick, appointed July 1, 1806.
 Charles Bostwick, appointed Oct. 1, 1808.

 Stephen Lounsbery, Jr., appointed May 8, 1829.
 Smith Tweedy, appointed Jan. 12, 1837.
 Isaac Sherman, Jr., appointed April 12, 1841.
 Philo F. Barnum, appointed Sept. 22, 1845.

George Wade, appointed July 16, 1849.
 E. B. Goodsell, appointed April 9, 1853.
 F. W. Smith, Jr., appointed May 16, 1861.
 George F. Tracey, appointed April 16, 1869.
 James E. Dunham, appointed Nov. 9, 1872.
 Julius W. Knowlton, appointed Oct. 15, 1875.

The mails were carried by stage-coach entirely until about 1838; after that date in part by steamboat until 1849, when the New York and New Haven Railroad was completed. The present post-office, No. 39 Bank Street, extending through to State Street, was first occupied Aug. 5, 1864. The letter-carrier system—perhaps the greatest improvement since the office was instituted—went into effect Sept. 15, 1879. A full history of the office, written by Mr. R. B. Lacey, from memoranda furnished by F. W. Smith, Esq., will be found in the "Municipal Register" for 1877.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Before the vote of the town in 1876 placing all the schools under the control of the Board of Education there were eleven separate school districts, a great deal of information concerning which may be found in the "Municipal Register" for 1874, in the annual reports of the Board of Education since consolidation, and especially in a historical sketch by Superintendent H. M. Harrington, published with the report dated July 12, 1880.

"Under the district system, prior to consolidation, the public schools of Bridgeport were confessedly inferior to the general standard of schools in towns of corresponding population, especially to those where consolidation had been established. There was great irregularity in attendance, an entire want of uniformity in school accommodations, in the course of study, in the books, maps, and charts used, in the qualifications and compensations of the teachers, in the proficiency of the pupils, and in the expenditures of the respective districts. In a word, all those evils existed which must necessarily result from so many disjointed systems running at random."^{*}

The abolition of these districts and bringing the schools into one harmonious system and under the executive control of a single head was certainly one of the most important events that ever took place in the history of Bridgeport. The superintendent of schools and the members of the Board of Education are entitled to great credit for the marked improvement in scholarship and in discipline already effected, which in the short space of four years has placed the public schools in Bridgeport upon an equal footing with the best in Connecticut, if not in the country at large. Still further progress in the future is confidently expected. It is to be hoped, however, that as vacancies occur in the Board only those who are well qualified to fill them may be nominated, and that our best citizens will not refuse to accept these honorable though onerous positions.

During the past year an appropriation has been voted by the town and plans accepted for a new high-school building, upon Congress Street, Golden Hill, which, including the land, is expected to cost about seventy thousand dollars, and will be, when completed, not only an ornament, but an institution of great value, to the city.

The whole number of pupils enrolled in the public day schools at the present time is about 4500, with 91 teachers,—viz., 3 males and 88 females.

The amounts expended for the maintenance of schools for the year ending July 13, 1880, were:

For salaries of teachers and superintendent	$41,765.56
" repairs to buildings	2,303.11
" janitors	2,668.78
" fuel	1,897.83
" miscellaneous items	2,701.34
Total expense for the year	$61,336.62

The Board of Education at this time is constituted as follows: Julius S. Hanover, President; Frederick W. Zingssem, Vice-President; Edward W. Marsh, Secretary; Augustus H. Abernethy, Edward W. Marsh, Thomas J. Synnott, Emory F. Strong, David Ginand, George N. French, Julius S. Hanover, Nathaniel Wheeler, Frederick W. Zingssem, James Staples, Peter W. Wren, George C. Waldo, Members of the Board; H. M. Harrington, Superintendent of Schools.

SOCIETIES.

In addition to the Masons and the Odd-Fellows, there are in Bridgeport more than fifty societies of various descriptions holding regular meetings, and some of them doing excellent work. Among them are some fifteen different temperance organizations, a Bible society, the Knights of Pythias and Knights of Honor, a dramatic society, a medical association, the St. George, Caledonian, Emmett, and other clubs, the Fireman's Benevolent Association, the Ladies' Charitable Society, a Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, several military companies, and numerous shooting, singing, and gymnastic associations; for a nearly complete list of which reference should be made to the "City Directory" for the current year. While many of these fraternities are well worthy of extended notice, it is to be regretted that the limits of this article allow only brief mention of two or three.

The Bridgeport Bible Society was organized Nov. 21, 1859, and is composed of delegates from some twelve different churches, in each of which an annual collection is taken up for the society. Many hundreds of copies of the Scriptures have been distributed by its members and agents, and during the past year the city has been thoroughly canvassed and destitute families supplied. The balance of the money raised—about one thousand dollars per annum—has been turned over either to the American or to the Connecticut Bible Society, to be used in publishing and distributing the Scriptures elsewhere. Mr. S. M.

Middlebrook has been treasurer of the Bridgeport Bible Society since its organization. Deacon George Sterling, Deacon John W. Hinks, and Rev. G. B. Day have successively held the office of president.

The Bridgeport Society of Natural Science is an incorporated body, formed for the purpose of original research and the discussion of scientific topics. This society was founded in July, 1877, and has now one hundred and fifty members and a collection embracing some fifteen hundred specimens of minerals, insects, old documents, Indian relics, etc. Interesting and valuable papers are read at its meetings upon such topics as the Stone Age, Electricity, Magnetism, Sound, Water, and the like, illustrated sometimes by diagrams and often by original apparatus, constructed by members. The officers of the society are: Rev. H. N. Powers, D.D., President; George C. Waldo, Secretary; Thaddeus E. Peck, Treasurer; Clarence Sterling, Curator.

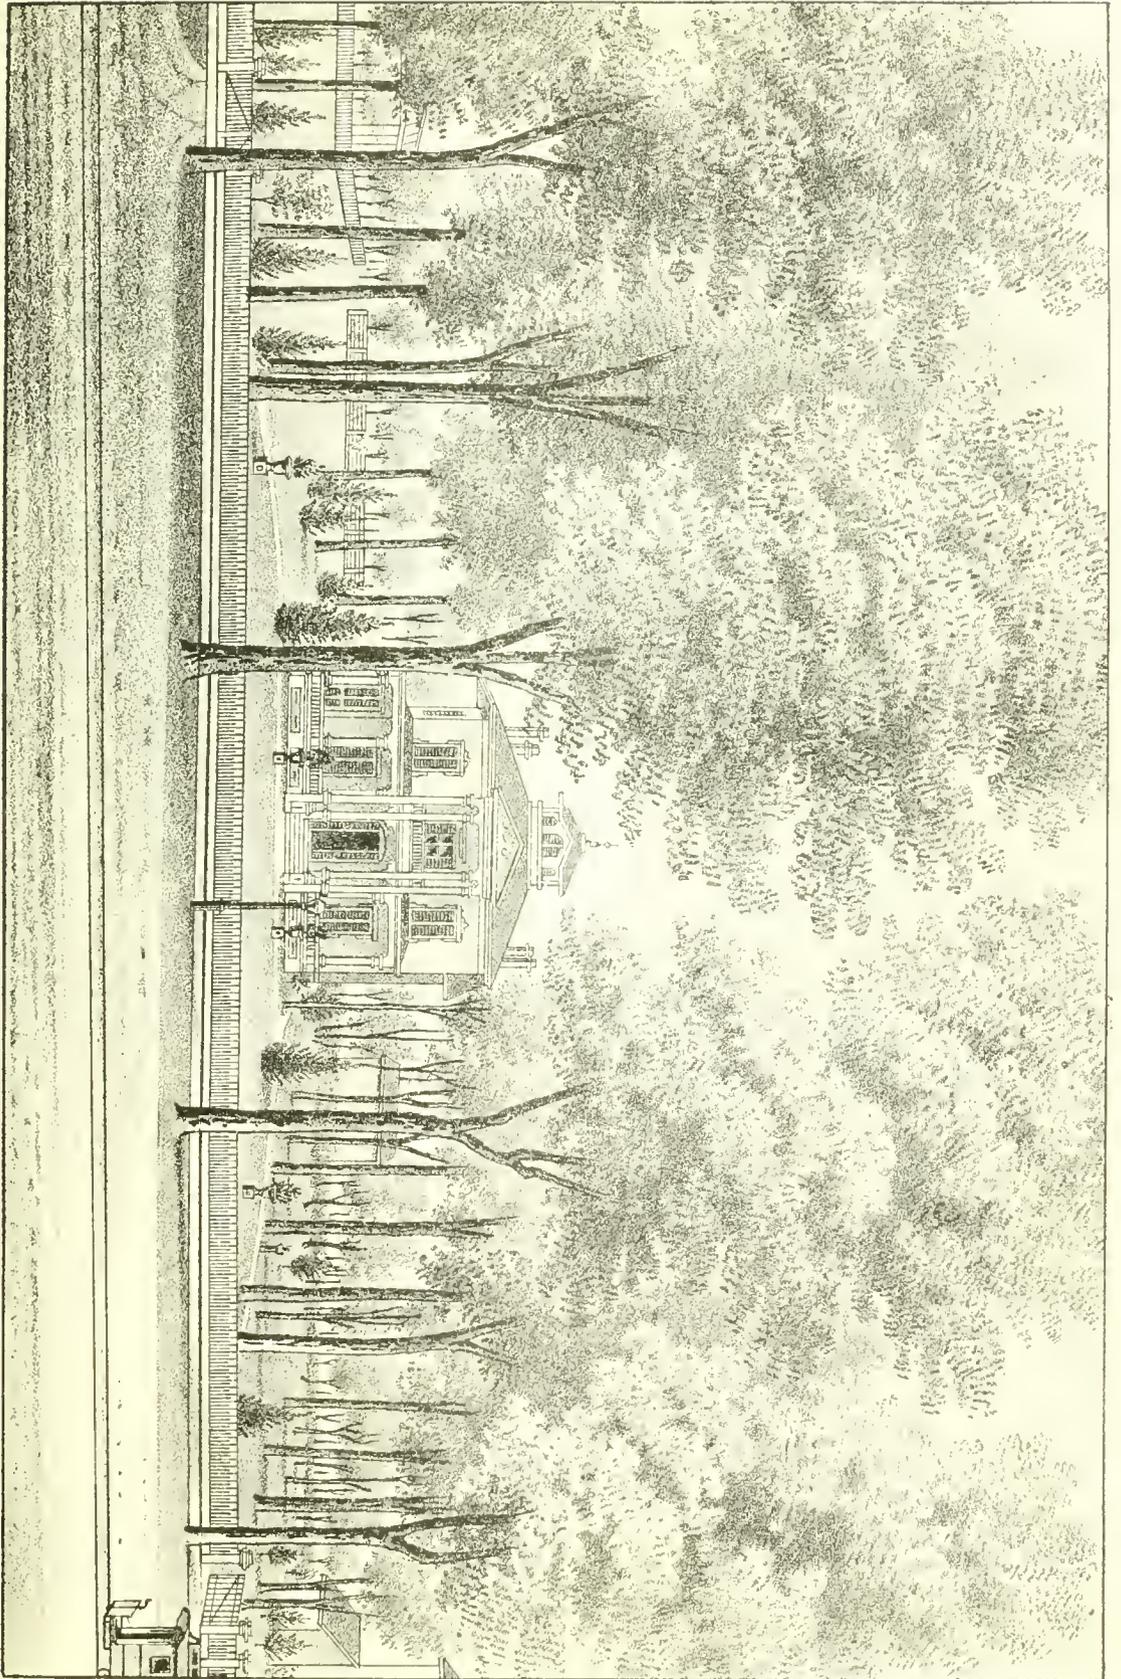

Elias Howe, Jr., Post, No. 3, of the Grand Army of the Republic, was instituted April 25, 1867, and is composed of honorably-discharged veterans who served in the war of the Rebellion. The present commander is Lewis G. Logan; adjutant, George W. Keeler. Comrade William E. Disbrow, of this post, was for some time commander of the order for the State of Connecticut.

The Bridgeport Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was organized in 1880, with many of the best citizens of the place as members, and has already effected a decided improvement in the treatment of the lower animals. Jacob Kiefer is president of this excellent society, and Edgar S. Nichols superintendent.

STEAMBOATS.

Steamboat navigation was begun in Long Island Sound about the year 1815, by Capt. Bunker, in the "Fulton," who made the trip from New Haven to New York once a week. The time occupied was eleven hours, and the fare was six dollars. April 16, 1832, the steamer "Citizen," Capt. John Brooks, commenced running from Bridgeport to New York, and in July, 1834, the "Nimrod," Capt. John Brooks, Jr., and the "Fairfield," Capt. Peck, were put upon the same route.

The present Bridgeport Steamboat Company is the successor of the Housatonic Transportation Company, and was incorporated in December, 1865, under the general joint-stock law, but in May, 1866, was granted a special charter. The original capital was two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but the assets of the company now amount to four hundred thousand dollars. The boats owned by the company are three,—viz., the "Bridgeport," 1062 tons, the "Laura," 1098 tons, and the propeller "Vulcan," 250 tons. Large quantities of freight are transported, and the company appears to be doing a good business, though the fare to New York is only thirty-five cents, or fifty cents for the round trip. In September, 1879, the fast sailing steamer "Rosedale," owned by A. M. C. Smith, of New York, was put upon this route as an opposition boat, and has received a good share of the public patronage.

The present officers of the Bridgeport Steamboat Company are as follows: E. F. Bishop, President; Sydney Bishop, Vice-President; William Tomlin, Secretary; S. Bishop, E. F. Bishop, S. W. Baldwin, Samuel Wilnot, J. Richardson, Directors.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

PHINEAS TAYLOR BARNUM.

Phineas Taylor Barnum was born in the town of Bethel, Fairfield Co., Conn., July 5, 1810. He is the son of Philo Barnum, and grandson of Ephraim Barnum, who was a captain in the war of the Revolution. He commenced his education at the district school at an early age, and worked at farm labor during the summer season and attended school in the winter. As he grew older his aversion to farm labor became manifest in various ways, and his father finally established a store in Bethel, installing him as clerk. On the 7th of September, 1825, his father died, leaving his mother and five children, of whom Phineas T., at fifteen years of age, was the eldest. He was trusted for a pair of shoes to attend the funeral of his father, thus starting in life with one pair of shoes less than nothing. Upon the settlement of the estate it was found to be insolvent, and P. T. was left without a cent, having loaned the little sum he had accumulated to his father. He then entered the employ of a mercantile firm at Grassy Plain as clerk, at six dollars per month, where he remained about one year, and then went as clerk in a grocery-store in the city of Brooklyn.

He remained there about one year and then opened a porter-house on his own account, which he continued but a few months, when he accepted an offer as clerk in a similar establishment at 29 Peck Slip, New York. In the following year he returned to his native town, and with a capital of one hundred and twenty-five dollars established a retail fruit and confectionery store.

In 1829 he opened a lottery-office in Bethel, lotteries at that time being legal in the State,—with branch offices in Danbury, Norwalk, Stamford, and Middletown, and did a large business. He soon after tried his hand as a book-auctioneer, and in 1831, with his uncle, Alanson Taylor, opened a country store in Bethel, which they continued but a short time, and he then embarked in an enterprise which eventually gave him great notoriety. This was the founding, Oct. 19, 1831, of the Herald of Freedom. He entered upon the editorial management of his paper with all the vigor and vehemence of youth, and frequently laid himself open to the charge of libel. Three times in three years he was prosecuted, and finally a judgment of one hundred dollars was obtained against him and sixty days in the common jail. He fared well while in jail, had a good room, lived well, edited his paper as usual, and at the close of the sixty days the event was celebrated by a large concourse of people from the surrounding country. An ode, written for the occasion, was sung, speeches delivered, and Mr. Barnum was conducted to his home by a band of music and a large procession of the citizens, amid the firing of cannon and the cheers of the multitude. In 1834 he sold his paper and removed to New York, where he was employed for a short time as a "drummer" for several stores, and, in May, 1835, opened a private boarding-house, at the same time purchasing an interest in a grocery-store.

The summer of 1835 was an important epoch in the career of P. T. Barnum. In that year he began the business which has made him famous throughout the civilized world.

He purchased a negress named Joice Heth, then on exhibition in Philadelphia, said to be one hundred and sixty-one years of age and the nurse of Washington, and exhibited her about the country. She lived but a short time after her purchase by Mr. Barnum, and was buried at Bethel, in this county. He then engaged an Italian sleight-of-hand performer, and soon joined Aaron Turner's traveling circus as ticket-seller, secretary, and treasurer. He subsequently traveled extensively throughout the country with a show, of which he was sole proprietor.

The occupation not proving particularly remunerative, and being desirous of having a permanent respectable business, he finally, after various discouragements, purchased the American Museum in New York for twelve thousand dollars, and succeeded in paying for it from the profits in one year. He was now on the high-road to success. His wonderful success with the museum, with Gen. Tom Thumb, and with the Jenny Lind enterprise, is too well known throughout the world to need repetition in this sketch. The latter was bold in its conception, complete in its development, most astounding in its success, and brought a fortune to its adventurous progenitor. As high as six hundred and fifty dollars was paid for tickets, and the receipts for ninety-five concerts aggregated seven hundred and twelve thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars and thirty-four cents. With Gen. Tom Thumb, Mr. Barnum appeared three times before Queen Victoria and the royal court of England, as well as the principal potentates of Europe then living.

In 1851 he organized the Great Asiatic Caravan, Museum, and Menagerie; in 1852 became part-owner of the first illustrated paper published in New York, and about this time also was president of the Crystal Palace Association. In 1851 he purchased a tract of land consisting of several hundred acres, where now is located the thriving city of East Bridgeport, laid out the entire property in regular streets, lined them with trees, reserving a beautiful grove of six or eight acres, which he inclosed and converted into a public park, which he presented to the city, and began the sale of lots, thus becoming the founder of one of the leading manufacturing cities in New England. Through his instrumentality a clock company from Litchfield, Conn., was removed to the embryo city and reorganized as the "Terry & Barnum Manufacturing Company," and in 1855 he received a proposition from a citizen of New Haven that the Jerome Clock Company, then reputed to be a wealthy concern, should be removed to East Bridgeport. The result is briefly told. He advanced a large sum of money to the company, the rotten concern finally came down with a crash, and P. T. Barnum was a ruined man.

So at the age of forty-six, after the acquisition and loss of a handsome fortune, he was once more nearly at the bottom of the ladder, and was about to begin the world again. The situation was certainly disheartening, but he had energy, experience, health, and hope.

In 1857 he again set sail for England, taking with him Gen. Tom Thumb, where he remained several years, and accumulated considerable money. He also, while abroad, delivered his famous lecture on "The Art of Money-Getting" in London and various other cities, and was finally offered six thousand dollars for the manuscript by a publishing-house, which he refused.

In 1859 he returned to America, and, having redeemed his property, on the 31st of March "Barnum's Museum" was reopened under the management and proprietorship of its original owner. Barnum was on his feet again, and congratulations poured in from friends at home and abroad. The museum was continued by Mr. Barnum with great success until July 13, 1865, when it was totally destroyed by fire. Although his old friend, the lamented Greeley, of the Tribune, advised him to "accept this fire as a notice to quit and go a-fishing," he failed to accept the advice, and soon after leased the premises 535, 537, and 539 Broadway, New York, known as the Chinese Museum buildings, and in less than three months had converted the building into a commodious museum and lecture-room. He soon after made arrangements with the renowned Van Amburgh Menagerie Company to unite their entire collections with the museum, and the company was known as the Barnum & Van Amburgh Museum Company. This was also a success, and the monthly returns made to the collector of internal revenue showed that their receipts were larger than those of any theatre or other place of amusement in New York or America. The fire fiend again visited him, and on the morning of March 3, 1868, the museum was totally destroyed. He then followed Mr. Greeley's advice to "go a-fishing," and for about two years retired from active business, though he was still more or less interested in numerous enterprises.

He traveled extensively, and seemed happy in the contemplation of the fact that he was a gentleman of elegant leisure. But nature will assert itself. To a robust, healthy man of forty years' active business life something else than "elegant leisure" is needed to satisfy. He could no longer remain inactive, and so in 1870 began the organization of an immense establishment, comprising a museum, a menagerie, caravan, hippodrome, and circus of such proportions as to require five hundred men and horses to transport it through the country. In 1871 and '72 this already largest traveling show in the world was reorganized and greatly augmented, and to move it required seventy freight-cars, six passenger-cars, and three engines. Additions and attractive novelties have since been added, and "Barnum's own and only greatest show on earth" of 1880 is, indeed, the largest combination of circus, menagerie, and museum ever exhibited on either continent.

Mr. Barnum's ambition has always been to exhibit the greatest novelties at whatever cost, and to combine instruction with amusement. He never advertises attractions which he does not exhibit, thereby forming an honorable exception in his profession. He is careful to secure the best possible assistants,—honest, competent, and, like himself, clear-headed. At this present writing, although he has passed his seventieth birthday, he has just formed a combination with The London Circus and Menagerie, the greatest show in the world except his own, and entered into a contract binding his heirs and executors for ninety-nine years to continue this immense combined moral and refined traveling show,—thus, as he says, hoping to gratify future generations with a sight of "Barnum's greatest show on earth."

At the present writing Mr. Barnum has all the vigor of middle life, and, having made arrangements which he thinks will secure the permanency of his great traveling museum, menagerie, and circus for many years after he is gone, he, in the summer of 1880, erected in Bridgeport buildings covering five acres of land for the headquarters and especially the wintering of his great show. Among these buildings is an "elephant house," containing a ring for the training of elephants, horses, ponies, and other animals, as well as for the practicing of his circus-riders. Long rows of iron cages in adjoining buildings, heated by steam in winter, contain many hundreds of the most valuable and rare wild beasts and birds in captivity in any country.

Politically, Mr. Barnum was a Democrat previous to the breaking out of the Rebellion, but since that time has acted with the Republican party. He was elected to the General Assembly of Connecticut from the town of Fairfield in 1865, and from Bridgeport in 1877. In 1878 he again received the nomination for the same office, and, although in a Democratic city, he was elected by a handsome majority. In 1875 he was elected mayor of Bridgeport, and, as he always has the best interests of the city at heart, it is needless to add that his administration was eminently successful.

Mr. Barnum has ever manifested a lively interest in all measures looking to the advancement of the interests of the city, and has devoted much labor and money in public improvements generally. He was the progenitor of Seaside Park, one of the most beautiful parks in New England, and it was principally through his influence that the improvement was consummated. "To Mr. P. T. Barnum," says the Bridgeport Standard, "we believe, is awarded the credit of originating this beautiful improvement, and certainly to his untiring, constant, and persevering personal efforts are we indebted for its being finally consummated." Mr. Barnum purchased the land from the owners at nominal prices, amounting in all to less than five thousand dollars, of which he paid the largest share and obtained private subscriptions for the balance, and thus the park was presented to the city free of cost.

In the summer of 1878 he expended about twenty-five thousand dollars in the purchase and reclamation of a large tract of salt marsh adjoining Seaside Park and the grounds of Waldemere on the west. Although he well knew that he would never be reimbursed for half of his expenditures, he could see that the improvement would be a great public benefit, and he bent his energy to the task. He built this dyke straight across a channel which let in the tide-water every twelve hours and covered an immense tract of low salt meadow. He made it seventy-five feet wide at the bottom and of sufficient width on the top to form a fine street leading from one of the city avenues to the beach on Long Island Sound. This extension of Seaside Park, forming a boulevard for carriages and promenade on the very edge of Long Island Sound, where the flashing waves may be seen, heard, and enjoyed for all time, is one of the finest improvements of its kind on the Atlantic coast.

He also secured to the city of Bridgeport the beautiful Mountain Grove Cemetery. He has laid out many streets and planted hundreds of trees in Bridgeport proper, and built hundreds of houses, many of which he sold to mechanics, giving them years in which to make the payments, and in annual sums equal only to about their usual rents.

In 1846 and 1847 he erected the well known "Iranistan"^{*} palace for his residence. It was modeled after the Oriental architecture, and was the first of this peculiar style introduced in America. Its interior and exterior decorations were of the finest style, and it was singularly complete in all its appointments. The whole was built and established by Mr. Barnum literally "regardless of expense," for he had no desire even to ascertain the entire cost. This was one of the finest country-seats in New England, and it was indeed a great loss to Mr. Barnum when, on the night of Dec. 17, 1857, it was burned to the ground. He subsequently built Lindeneroof, which was his residence for a number of years, and finally, in 1868, erected a house, laid out walks, etc., on a delightful spot overlooking Long Island Sound and Seaside Park, and christened it "Waldemere" ("woods-by-the-sea"), preferring to give this native child of his own conception an American name of his own creation. He removed to "Waldemere" in 1869, where he has since resided.

Nov. 8, 1829, Mr. Barnum united in marriage with Charity Hallett, a native of Bethel, by whom he had three daughters.

Mrs. Barnum died Nov. 19, 1873.

In the autumn of 1874 he married again. His wife is the daughter of his old English friend John Fish, Esq., whom he has embalmed in his "Recollections" under the title of "An Enterprising Englishman."

Mr. Barnum's career has been a remarkable one. He has been up and down and up again the financial ladder, and now the Bethel boy who at the age of fifteen years was so poor that he attended his father's funeral in borrowed shoes is reputed to be worth several millions, and his name is a household word throughout the civilized world.

Alfred B. Beers

Hon. Alfred B. Beers was born at New Rochelle, N. Y., April 23, 1845, and is the son of Alfred Beers, now a resident of Stratford, Conn., and who has been identified with the Naugatuck Railroad since 1851. The ancestry of Mr. Beers upon the male side of the line is traced back to James Beers, of Gravesend, Kent, England, who died in 1635, leaving two sons, James and Anthony, who emigrated shortly after to Watertown, Mass., and removed from there to Fairfield, Conn., in 1659. Anthony was a mariner, and was lost at sea in 1676, leaving a son Ephraim, who was born 1618, and died, leaving a son Ephraim, who died in 1759, leaving a son Daniel, who was born 1745, who removed to Ridgefield, Conn., and served in the Continental army and was present at the attack on Danbury and engagement at Ridgefield by Tryon, in 1777, and died 1820. He left a son Edmund, born 1768, who died in 1843, leaving a son Jonathan, born 1789, who settled at Vista, Westchester Co., N. Y., and died in 1868, and who was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch. His mother's maiden name was Mary E. Bishop, her father being Leander Bishop, of Stamford, Conn., who was a brother of Alfred Bishop, late of Bridgeport, Conn., now deceased, a well-known contractor and builder of railroads, especially of the Naugatuck Railroad; their father was William Bishop, of Stamford, Conn. The grandfather of his mother upon her mother's side was Dr. Charles McDonald, of Rye, N. Y., a Scotchman by birth, who came to this country shortly before the Revolutionary war, and upon the breaking out of hostilities enlisted in the Continental army and served during the entire war, participating in the capture of Fort Ticonderoga, and also in the battle of White Plains, N. Y., in 1776, where he distinguished himself by his bravery. After the close of the war he entered the medical profession, and practiced successfully until his death, which occurred about 1842.

Alfred B. Beers removed to Bridgeport in 1851, and was educated in the public and select schools of that city. He entered the volunteer army, Sept. 5, 1861, as private in Company I, Sixth Connecticut Volunteers. This regiment was attached to the Tenth Army Corps, and participated in the bombardment of Hilton Head, S. C., battle of Pocotaligo, S. C. (he was honorably mentioned in regimental orders for bravery and meritorious conduct in that engagement), also in the siege of Fort Pulaski, Ga., actions at James Island, S. C., Morris Island, Fort Wagner, and siege of Charleston, S. C.; re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer in same regiment in 1864, and was engaged in the Bermuda Hundred, Va., campaign against Richmond, siege of Petersburg, Va., engagements at Deep Bottom, Deep Run, Chapin's Farm, and Laurel Hill, on the north side of the James River, in 1864; was promoted from first sergeant of Company I to captain of Company B in same regiment, and was engaged in the bombardment, charge, and capture of Fort Fisher, N. C., January, 1865, capture of Wilmington, February, 1865, and advance upon Goldsboro', N. C., April, 1865, and was discharged from the service at New Haven, Conn., Aug. 21, 1865, being then about twenty years of age. He then engaged in general business and in study until 1868, when he commenced the study of law, and was admitted to the Fairfield County bar in 1871. In 1872 he was clerk of the City Court, in 1875 assistant city attorney. In 1877 he was elected by the Legislature judge of the City Court of the city of Bridgeport, re-elected in 1879, and still holds that office. He has been prominently connected with the Grand Army organization since 1868, and is now the Senior Vice-Commander of the State of Connecticut, and will probably be elected Commander in 1881. He was married Feb. 29, 1872, to Callie T. House, of Vineland, N. J., daughter of William House, who was one of the settlers of Little Meadows, Pa., and was a brother of Royal E. House, the inventor of the House printing telegraph system, with whom he was interested, and also took part in the construction of the first telegraph line erected in this country, being the line from Baltimore to Washington. Two children are the result of the marriage, — Alfred B. Beers, Jr., born Feb. 16, 1873, and Harry H. Beers, born March 27, 1876.

As a lawyer, Judge Beers is devoted to his chosen profession, and brings to its practice a clear and logical mind, a retentive memory, confidence in his cause upon its merits, and a thorough hatred of trickery and slams. He is careful in the preparation of his cases, ready in speech as an advocate, and honest in his claims for his client.

As a judge he has discharged the duties of that position with marked fidelity and inflexible honesty. He holds the scales of justice evenly balanced, and renders his decisions unmoved by sympathy and unswayed by clamor.

Possessed of a genial and kind nature, affable in intercourse with his fellows, with a personal character above reproach, he is esteemed and honored as a private citizen no less than as an able lawyer and an upright and conscientious judge.

DANIEL WHITEHEAD KISSAM.

Daniel Whitehead Kissam, son of Samuel and Elizabeth Addons Kissam, was born in New York City, Jan. 6, 1836. At nine years of age he removed with his father's family to Plymouth, N. C., where he remained about six years, when he was sent to West Bloomfield, now known as Montclare, N. J., and entered the preparatory school then known as "Ashland Hall." He continued in this school, pursuing his studies with diligence and attention, until seventeen years of age, when he entered the employ of the late H. N. Conklin, a lumber-dealer in the city of Brooklyn, as clerk, the remuneration being his board and shoes. Although the compensation was small and the labor irksome, he attended strictly to his business, and three years later was rewarded with the position of book-keeper in the large steam-engine and iron-works establishment owned by Mr. Conklin.

In February, 1859, with a Mr. Wilmot, he started in business for himself, manufacturing metallic fastenings used in the manufacture of hoops-skirts, under the firm-name of Wilmot & Kissam. In the following year the business was organized into a stock company, with a capital of thirty thousand dollars, under the name of the Wilmot & Kissam Manufacturing Company, Mr. Kissam taking one-quarter of the stock. The business was continued until 1865, when it was removed to Bridgeport, and reorganized as the Bridgeport Brass Company, with a capital of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, manufacturing rolled brass, brass wire, tubing, and various other goods. Upon the organization of this company Mr. Kissam was made secretary, and has been secretary and manager of the business since, and is the largest stockholder in the concern. At the beginning the annual sales amounted to about twenty-five thousand or thirty thousand dollars per year, and, as an illustration of the rapid development of the business, the annual sales now aggregate four hundred thousand dollars, and two hundred and thirty persons are employed.

The factory is a three-story brick structure, one hundred and sixteen by one hundred and thirty feet, with various additions and extensions, located on the corner of Crescent Avenue and Willard Street, East Bridgeport. The power for this establishment is furnished by three steam-engines, with an aggregate of two hundred horse-power, and has a capacity of one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds of metal per annum. This is a representative institution of this manufacturing city, and great credit is due Mr. Kissam and those through whose energy and enterprise it has been placed in the front ranks of manufacturing establishments in New England. The present officers of the company are F. A. Mason, President; D. W. Kissam, Secretary; and Samuel Holmes, Treasurer.

Politically Mr. Kissam is a Republican, and is a vestryman in St. John's Church. He has given nearly his undivided attention to his business, and during his whole career as a manufacturer has not been absent from his post of duty two consecutive weeks.

Oct. 22, 1863, he united in marriage with Mary J. Nostrand, of Brooklyn, and their family consists of two daughters,—Jeannie and Elizabeth.

Mr. Kissam has ever manifested a lively interest in the welfare of his adopted city; is a member of the Board of Trade, incorporator and director in the People's Savings Bank, etc.

He is descended from old Puritan stock on his father's side from the "Mayflower," through John Alden, and collaterally from Bishop Seabury. His maternal grandfather served as captain in the Revolutionary war and fought at the battle of Monmouth, and was one of the original members of the Cincinnati Society, and his father served in the war of 1812; and Col. Abeel, an ancestor of Mrs. Kissam, was also in the Revolution, serving as deputy quartermaster under Gen. Greene.

Mr. Kissam is essentially a self-made man. Early in life he learned that the way to success was no royal road, but was open to stout hands and willing hearts. Energy and integrity coupled with an indomitable will have rendered his career a success, and the boy who worked for his board and shoes when seventeen years of age is now one of the substantial manufacturers of New England.

DANIEL N. MORGAN.

The ancient town of Newtown has been the home of various men who subsequently occupied conspicuous positions in the councils of the State and nation, and of many old and sterling families who have left the impress of the New England character upon their posterity. Prominent among these families and intimately associated with the welfare of the town and county stands the name of Morgan.

Ezra Morgan, the father of Daniel N., was for more than forty years a farmer and merchant in this town and one of its leading and influential citizens. He was a leading Democrat, and occupied many official positions of trust and responsibility. He was also president of the First National Bank of Bethel.

Daniel N. Morgan, son of Ezra and Hannah Nash Morgan, was born in Newtown, Aug. 18, 1844. He received the rudiments of his education at the common schools of his native town, and subsequently attended the Newtown Academy and Bethel Institute, where he acquired an education which well fitted him for his subsequent successful business career.

At the age of sixteen he entered his father's store as a clerk. He soon exhibited a remarkable capacity for mercantile transactions, and at the age of twenty-one years stepped out into the broad area of active business life on his own account, and for one year conducted the mercantile business at Newtown Centre as sole proprietor, when he took a partner and continued for three years longer. Desiring a wider range and better facilities for doing business, where his ability might have ample scope, Mr. Morgan removed to Bridgeport and became a member of the firm of Birdsey & Morgan, dealers in dry goods and carpets. Mr. Birdsey subsequently retired, and the large and prosperous business was continued by Mr. Morgan until January, 1880, when, in consequence of impaired health, caused by too close attention to business, he was compelled to relinquish it, and in the mean time took an extensive tour for his health to Great Britain and Continental Europe.

His strength of character and financial ability was soon recognized by the citizens of his adopted city, and he has been called to many positions of trust and responsibility. He was elected to the City Council in 1873, and re-elected in 1874. He was also a member of the Board of Education in 1877. In January, 1879, he was chosen president of the City National Bank, and is the present incumbent of that office. In the same year he was elected a trustee of the Mechanics' and Farmers' Savings Bank.

True to the instincts of his early training, he is a Democrat in politics and an able advocate of the principles of that party. He is active in political circles, and in 1880 accepted the nomination for mayor from the Democratic party, and was elected by a handsome majority, running one hundred ahead of his ticket,—sufficient commentary upon his popularity and worth as a citizen. He is also Master of Corinthian Lodge, No. 100, F. and A. M.

Mayor Morgan also manifests a decided interest in religious matters, is a consistent churchman, is the present clerk of Trinity Parish, and has been many years. He comes of a long-lived ancestry, his grandparents living to the advanced age of eighty, eighty-four, ninety, and ninety-six respectively.

The latter, Daniel Nash, who lived to the advanced age of ninety-six years, and from whom Mr. Morgan received his name, when seventy-four years of age walked from New York to Westport in one day, a distance of forty-four miles.

June 10, 1868, Mr. Morgan united in marriage with Medora H., daughter of Capt. William A. Judson, a native of Huntington. Capt. Judson is a prominent and influential man, and has officiated in various capacities within the gift of his fellow-citizens. He has been senator and representative, and has served as justice of the peace nearly forty years.

The ancestors of both Mr. and Mrs. Morgan were sterling patriots during the Revolution. Agur Judson, great-grandfather of Mrs. Morgan, was a colonel in the war of the Revolution, and served from the beginning to the close of that arduous struggle.

Zedekiah Morgan, great-grandfather of Daniel N., was a captain in the Revolution and an active and determined patriot. During the war he kept a number of cavalry horses on a portion of the place still known in Newtown as the Morgan farm.

SHERMAN HARTWELL.

The subject of this sketch was born in the town of Washington, Litchfield Co., Conn., Dec. 2, 1790. Through his grandmother on the father's side he was connected with the Sherman family of Dedham, England. Several representatives of this family came to New England in 1631, and settled in Watertown, Mass., now Cambridge. Mr. Hartwell's particular line is through Capt. John Sherman, as distinguished from that of Pastor John of the same town, and of Samuel, brother of the latter, who removed and became a resident of Stratford, Conn. The grandmother of Mr. Hartwell was Rebecca Sherman, sister of the celebrated Roger Sherman, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and the family line may be traced as follows: 1. Capt. John Sherman, born 1613, in Dedham, England; 2. Joseph, born 1650, in Watertown, Mass.; 3. William, born 1692, married Rebecca Cutler; 4. Roger, born 1721, married Elizabeth Hartwell; 5. Rebecca, married Joseph Hartwell; 6. Isaac Hartwell, born 1768, married Mary Pitcher; 7. Sherman Hartwell, born 1790, married Sophia Todd, daughter of Eli Todd, of New Milford. Roger Sherman spent his early life in New Milford.

The Hartwell family came also to Litchfield County from the vicinity of Boston in the early part of the eighteenth century, and were among its most substantial citizens. This branch of the Sherman family and the Hartwell family seem to have been intimately connected, as the wife of Roger Sherman was the sister of Joseph Hartwell.

The early years of Mr. Sherman Hartwell were spent on his father's farm in Washington. His educational advantages were only such as were afforded by the district schools of his native town. He made such proficiency, however, as to fit himself acceptably as a teacher, and taught school in Kingston, N. Y., one or more years, when he was about twenty years of age. Returning therefrom to Connecticut, he entered the store of Mr. Eli Todd, in New Milford, where he continued several years.

In 1813, assisted by Mr. Todd, Mr. Hartwell started a country store in the town of Warren, adjoining his native town. Here he continued business by himself and in successive partnerships with a Mr. Starr and Burton Gilbert for twenty-five years, and by patient toil, frugality, and thrift laid the foundation of his ample estate.

In 1838, Mr. Hartwell removed to Bridgeport, rather as an experiment for the benefit of the health of Mrs. Hartwell. The change proving beneficial, he made his permanent residence here, and thereafter became thoroughly identified with Bridgeport and its institutions. For a short time he engaged in merchandising on Water Street, in connection with the late Charles De Forest. In 1844 we find him on the "council of safety" (with twelve others of the most substantial men of the city) to advise in all matters relative to the city bonds issued in aid of the Housatonic Railroad Company. This subject presented a problem of appalling financial interest at that period, and in its treatment Mr. Hartwell rendered valuable aid. It was manfully grappled with, and by a wise and careful management time has wrought a comparatively easy solution.

From 1840 to 1848 he was nearly all the time a member of the Common Council of the city and participated actively in city affairs, especially in matters of finance. He was agent for the management of the funded indebtedness of the city and the payment of interest on the same from 1848 to 1858.

It was, however, in connection with our banking interests that Mr. Hartwell was best and most favorably known. On the reconstruction of the old Bridgeport Bank after the disastrous period of 1837, he became an active and efficient director, and contributed largely in bringing it up to the position it soon attained as one of the soundest and most prosperous institutions in the State. On the death of Silvanus Sterling, Esq., in 1848, Mr. Hartwell became president, and filled that position ably and successfully until 1869, when he positively declined a re-election. His active connection with this bank thus covered a period of thirty-one years. During this time there were many seasons of financial stringency and embarrassment, sometimes very trying. Mr. Hartwell so thoroughly enjoyed the friendship and confidence of leading bankers in New York—the late R. Withers, president of the old Bank of the State of New York E. G., and others—as to be of great service in such periods. In the discharge of his often delicate duties Mr. Hartwell exhibited great urbanity and kindness, mingled with firmness, and his superior judgment and ability were recognized. On his relinquishment of his official relations to the bank he was tendered the free use at his pleasure of his chair and desk in the directors' room, of which he availed himself more or less quite to the close of his lengthened life.

Mr. Hartwell was also an active trustee of the Bridgeport Savings Bank for a number of years. On the organization of the City Savings Bank, in 1859, he became identified with that institution, and continued a trustee and vice-president to the time of his death, Jan. 16, 1876. He was very methodical and careful in all his transactions, and retained his interest in affairs to the last.

Mr. Hartwell united with the Congregational Church in Warren, Conn., during his residence there. Soon after his removal to Bridgeport, he and his family became connected with the First Congregational Church and Society, where they have ever been a pillar of strength.

The following are the names of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Hartwell, only one of whom survives; Mary, born 1818, married Hon. Simeon B. Chittenden; Rachel Todd, born 1822, married Timothy P. Chapman; Eli Merwin, born 1827, died 1829; Sophia, born 1830, married John N. Bonstedt; Sidney, born 1832, died 1833; Cornelia, born 1834, married Robert Hubbard, M.D.

L. DE VER WARNER, M.D.

Dr. L. De Ver Warner was born in Lincolnton, Chesapeake Co., N. Y., March 26, 1840. He received a common-school and academic education, and, having decided upon the medical profession as a life-work, entered the office of Dr. C. M. Kingman, a leading physician and surgeon residing at McGrawville, Cortland Co., N. Y. He pursued his studies with diligence and attention, and subsequently, when only twenty-one years of age, graduated at the Geneva Medical College, and was valedictorian of his class.

He commenced the practice of his profession at Simeyeh, Broome Co., N. Y., where he remained about two years, when he returned to McGrawville, and succeeded to the practice of his former preceptor, Dr. Kingman. An active practice soon convinced Dr. Warner that the masses should be taught concerning their physical organization, and he at once instituted a series of popular lectures, which he delivered with marked success throughout New England and the Middle States. Being a thorough master of his profession and a fine speaker, he drew large and intelligent audiences, and continued in the lecture-field about ten years. During this time he became convinced that many of the diseases of women were the result of illy-contrived corsets, and at once set about to institute the much-needed reform, and became the inventor of the celebrated Warner health corset. The manufacture of this corset was commenced at McGrawville, N. Y., where it was continued until 1876.

Deceased.

The corset at once became immensely popular, and, desiring increased facilities for manufacture and shipping, Dr. Warner decided to locate in this city, and after selecting a site the erection of their present large brick factory was commenced in August, and on the 5th of the following October the manufacture of corsets was begun. Not content with producing a corset which worked a revolution in the manufacture of this much-needed article, he still gave it his study, and three years ago patented and began the manufacture of the famous flexible-hip corset, the improvement being that the bones run around the body instead of up and down. He has also other patents in embryo. From a small shop, where six hands were employed, the business has rapidly increased, until at the present time they employ over one thousand persons, and the daily capacity is three hundred and fifty dozen corsets. They operate five hundred Wheeler & Wilson sewing-machines. The firm has a large store in New York, and also one in Chicago, which is the only exclusive jobbing corset-house in the West. The junior member of the firm, Dr. L. C. Warner, is at present in Europe, and has completed arrangements for the manufacture of the Warner corset by the large firm of Footman, Pretty & Nicholson, of Ipswich, England. The manufacture is also to be introduced into Paris.

Thus, within an almost incredibly short period, this energetic firm has inaugurated an industrial enterprise of vast proportions, of which not only Bridgeport, but New England and the entire country, may justly feel proud. It is the largest establishment of its kind in America, and justly merits its success. By a strict attention to business, coupled with an indomitable will and the manufacture of the best quality of goods, Dr. Warner has succeeded in building up in this city the largest corset-manufactory in the world.

Sept. 24, 1862, he united in marriage with Lucetta M. Greenman, a native of McGrawville, Cortland Co., N. Y., and has three children,—Annie L., De Ver H., and Hugh F. The last named died May 1, 1879.

JARRATT MORFORD.

A man who entirely by his own efforts has risen to affluence and social position, and through all the changing events of an active business life has preserved his integrity unimpeached, well deserves the pen of the historian. Such an one is Jarratt Morford, the subject of this sketch. Without the advantages of inherited aid he worked the problem of his own fortune, and lives to enjoy the fruition of a successful business career.

He was born in Shrewsbury, N. J., March 29, 1817, and was one of a family of eight children of George Morford and Maria Wardell.* His boyhood was passed in his native town, like the youth of that period generally, working at farm labor during the summer season and attending school in the winter. When only twelve years of age he entered as a clerk the retail grocery establishment of Klots & Trafford in New York City. Here he remained six years, and then became a clerk in the store of C. & R. Wardell & Co., wholesale grocers in New York, and after a service here of six years came to Bridgeport, then a small village, as clerk for the late D. H. Sterling, who was a wholesale grocer, and for that day doing a large business. He remained in the employ of Mr. Sterling about four years, and on the 12th of April, 1845, thirty-five years ago, commenced business for himself as a member of the firm of Morford, Blakeman & Co., wholesale grocers. Mr. Blakeman, who is now a member of the firm of Ivison, Blakeman, Phinney & Co., publishers, of New York, continued with the firm only about six months, and disposed of his interest to Mr. L. C. Northrop, and the business was conducted under the firm-name of Morford, Northrop & Co., the "Co." being Mr. Philo Hurd, about four years, when Mr. Samuel C. and David Trubee purchased Mr. Northrop's interest. Samuel C. remained with the firm but a few years, when he retired, and this large business has since been carried on under the name, familiar to business men throughout Connecticut and Massachusetts, of Morford & Trubee. During the long career of this firm they have occupied only two stores, the old one, No. 346, and the present one, first occupied in 1870, 356 and 358 Water Street.

At the beginning of business the sales were meagre, amounting to about seventy-five thousand dollars per year, and as an illustration of the rapid development of the business, it is stated that the value of the annual sales now reaches from six hundred thousand to eight hundred thousand dollars, while at times their monthly sales reach the sum of ninety-five thousand dollars. The house handles an immense amount of flour and sugar, and also owns a flouring-mill at Kalamazoo, Mich., with a capacity of nine hundred barrels per week. While the success of this business has been something remarkable, it has not been attained without the exercise of good judgment and a strict attention to the business in all its details. From the beginning Mr. Morford has given the business his personal attention, and to this fact, which is too much undervalued by many young business men of to-day, is attributed much of his success. During the various financial panics which have swept over the country this house remained firm, and, remarkable as it may appear in the life of an active business man, from the beginning to the present time not a year has elapsed that Mr. Morford has not made more than his expenses.

Mr. Morford has educated numerous young men in business, many of whom have become successful in their various spheres. Among the number may be mentioned Melanetha M. Hurd, now a member of the celebrated publishing house of Hurd & Houghton.

Mr. Morford is a public-spirited and generous citizen, popular with the masses, and manifests a deep interest in all matters tending to advance the interests of the city of Bridgeport.

Politically he is a Democrat, and an earnest advocate of the principles of that party. In 1858 he was elected first selectman of the town, and held the office three years, the second year being nominated by both parties. Mr. Morford established the present system of taking care of the town-poor, and reduced the pauper expenses in one year from twenty-two thousand dollars to five thousand five hundred dollars. He was elected mayor in 1864, and it was largely through his influence, and during his administration as mayor, that Seaside Park, one of the finest in the country, also Washington and Beardsley Parks, were commenced.

Mayor Morford also manifests a lively interest in ecclesiastical matters. He is a churchman, was junior warden in St. John's Church, was one of the founders of Trinity Church, and has been senior warden since its organization, in 1863.

Nov. 19, 1844, he united in marriage with Anna Eliza Amin, a native of New York City, and has two children living,—Esther Holmes and George, both of whom reside in Bridgeport. Mrs. Morford is a descendant of John Amin, one of the pioneers of Basking Ridge, N. J., and Jonathan Dickinson, the founder and first president of Princeton College. The old Amin homestead is still standing, which was erected over one hundred and fifty years ago. The Amins were of the Scotch nobility.

Mr. Morford's life has been one of steady and active devotion to business, and his great success has been the natural result of his ability to examine and readily comprehend any subject presented to him, power to decide promptly, and courage to act with vigor and persistency in accordance with his convictions.

CHARLES KETCHUM AVERILL.

The subject of this sketch is descended from an old New England family, dating from an ancestor, Isaac Averill, who, in 1700, with two brothers, emigrated from Milford Haven, Wales, and settled in Topsfield, Mass.

Nathan Averill, father of Charles K., was born April 10, 1774, in New Preston, Litchfield Co., Conn., and married Polly Ketchum, of Salisbury, Conn., both of whom lived to a ripe old age, the former dying at the age of ninety-two, and the latter at the age of ninety. Their family consisted of nine children,—six sons and three daughters. Their eldest son, Henry, married a niece of Chancellor Kent, and their eldest daughter married Chancellor Walworth, the eminent jurist of New York.

Charles K. Averill was born in Granville, N. Y., Oct. 6, 1812. His boyhood was passed in the village of Plattsburgh, N. Y., where he was educated at the Plattsburgh Academy, at that time the leading educational institution in Northern New York.

In early life he exhibited a fondness for mercantile pursuits and the counting-room. At the age of thirteen he accepted a clerkship in a store at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and in 1830 removed to the city of New York, and became a clerk in the wholesale jobbing-house of Joseph B. Varnum, 165 Pearl Street. While here, as a branch of education, he took up during his leisure hours the science of double-entry book-keeping, and became familiar with books and accounts. After a few months he was promoted to assistant book-keeper, and finally became the book-keeper for the concern.

In the winter of 1862 he accepted an invitation from the late Morris Ketchum, Esq., to come to Bridgeport and reside, and on the 14th of March of the same year he was unanimously elected treasurer of the Housatonic Railroad Company, and has since held that office. He is also treasurer of the "Bridgeport Steamboat Company," and has held that office for fifteen years.

Mr. Averill has always prominently identified himself with the community wherein he has resided, and has held at various times the office of recorder and acting mayor of Michigan City, Ind.; postmaster in Vermont; and councilman, alderman, assessor, and police commissioner in this city. While in New York he held a commission from Governor William L. Marey as captain in the One Hundred and Forty-Second Regiment of infantry, and his company was chiefly composed of Pearl Street clerks.

Mr. Averill is a staunch Democrat, whose first vote was given for Andrew Jackson, hard money, and the honest payment of all debts.

He is a consistent churchman, a member of St. John's Church—Protestant Episcopal—in this city, in which he is now senior warden. He is also treasurer of the parish. April 9, 1838, he united in marriage with Jane M., seventh daughter of John H. Sumner, of Claremont, N. H., and their family consists of five children: Lucy, Mary, Henry D., Jane, and Charles. Henry D. is general ticket agent of the Housatonic Railroad.

ISAAC SHERMAN.

Isaac Sherman was born in the parish of Stratfield, now Bridgeport, Sept. 25, 1788. He was the youngest son of David and Rebecca (French) Sherman. The paternal residence was on Division Street, now Park Avenue, a short distance above North Avenue, on the site of the present residence of Mr. John H. Beach. It was the homestead of three generations bearing the honored name of David Sherman, in direct succession, all of them men of mark in their time. This family came from Samuel Sherman, the first settler of the name in Stratford, Conn., through Matthew, one of his eight sons, who very early came to Stratfield, and located at or near the above-mentioned spot. Matthew Sherman was one of the constituent members of the Stratfield Church (now the First Congregational Church of Bridgeport) at its organization in 1695, and with others brought his letter of dismissal from Stratford. Samuel, the father of Matthew, emigrated to Boston from Dedham, in Essex, England, in 1634, in company with his distinguished brother, Rev. John Sherman, and their cousin, Capt. John Sherman. While both the latter settled in Watertown, Mass., Samuel, who was married to Sarah Mitchell (daughter of Matthew Mitchell and — — —), pushed on to Connecticut, first to Wethersfield, and from thence to Stratford. Here he reared his family of eight sons and one daughter, all or nearly all heads of families, having their representatives in all parts of the country.

At the risk of digression, it may be of interest to note here that John, one of the sons of Samuel, who went from Stratford to Woodbury, Conn., was the ancestor of W. T. Sherman, General of the United States army, and of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. John Sherman, of Ohio, their father and grandfather having removed to Cleveland about 1820.

The family line of Isaac Sherman may be given as follows:

In England, Henry Sherman, of Dedham, England, married Agnes Butler. He died 1589.

In England, son Edmund first married, in 1569, Ann Pellett; second marriage, in 1584, to Ann Clark.

In England, son Edmund married, in 1611, Judith Angier; came to this country in 1634; some time in Watertown, Mass., and died at New Haven, Conn., in 1641.

In Stratford, first, Samuel, baptized 1618; married Sarah Mitchell.

In Stratfield, second, Matthew, born 1645; married Hannah — — —.

In Stratfield, third, Lieut. David, born 1692; married, second, Sarah Thompson.

In Stratfield, fourth, David, born 1736; married Mary Sterling.

In Stratfield, fifth, David, born 1757; married Rebecca French.

In Stratfield, sixth, Isaac, born 1788; married, 1810, Maria Burroughs.

The children of Isaac and Maria (Burroughs) Sherman were as follows, none of whom survive: Mary, born 1812, died 1857; David, born 1814, died 1815; Eliza, born 1816, married Darwin Warner, died in 1845; Jane Eleanor, born 1819, married Rowland B. Lacey, died in 1857; Harriet, born 1825, died 1825.

Very early in life Mr. Sherman compiled and executed quite artistically a genealogical chart, showing at a glance his descent, on his father's side, from Matthew Sherman (son of Samuel) and Jacob Sterling, and on his mother's side from Samuel French and John Edwards, heads of four families of first settlers here, with the collateral branches in each generation.

At the lower right-hand corner is represented the log house of the original settler, a large group of children with the mother at the door, and at a short distance in the clearing is the husband and father, with uplifted axe felling the forest-tree.

"This genealogical table was designed and executed by Isaac Sherman . . . from motives of duty and filial affection for his ancestors, whose names are remembered with respect and honor in this new country, of which they were among the first settlers."

This tribute, which is preserved and cherished by Mr. Sherman's descendants, shows a drift of mind which was more fully developed in after-years, and will be again referred to.

The son was not wanting in respect for his father, but Mr. Sherman was accustomed to acknowledge his indebtedness to his mother more than to any earthly friend for the formation of his character and the foundation of his religious life. His school education was limited, such only as was afforded by the district school at the four corners (now of Park and North Avenues). It had been the intention of his father to give him a liberal education, but the loss of a valuable vessel and cargo crippled him financially, and the idea was abandoned.

Almost the only avenue open to an aspiring young man without capital was the sea. Despite its risks, Isaac betook himself to this, with the approbation of his parents, at the age of sixteen years. He followed it with varying success for upwards of four years, having twice been shipwrecked on the New Jersey coast, with the loss of all things except his dauntless purpose to rise. At the end of this period he came out with ninety-five dollars ahead. To this his good mother added five dollars, thus giving him a capital of one hundred dollars. Observant of his manly qualities, his excellent uncle, Dr. James Eaton Beach, furnished nine hundred dollars additional capital, and thus started the firm of Beach & Sherman, located on Water Street, in a grocery business, conducted solely by Mr. Sherman. So successful was he that the capital of the firm was doubled by his profits the first year.

Shortly after, his brother, Capt. Sterling Sherman, was admitted as a partner, with additional capital, and the business was continued successfully up to 1814, a period of seven years in all. At the close of the second war, commonly known as the war of 1812, the political and international situation was not favorable for mercantile and maritime pursuits in this country, and there followed for Mr. Sherman a year of enforced quiet, which completely cured him, as he said, "of ever wishing to spend any part of his life in idleness."

In December, 1810, he married Maria, the eldest daughter of Stephen Burroughs, Jr., and purchased the house, then recently built, on the northeast corner of Main and Gold Streets, which was the only home of his married life of fifty-three years.

In 1815 he joined his father-in-law in the grocery, grain, Boston and New York coasting business, which was successfully continued up to 1831, with the exception of an interval of four years in partnership with Capt. John Brooks, Jr., in the same line of business. The firm of Burroughs & Sherman owned a number of vessels, and built the schooner "Nassau" for a Boston coaster. During her second year this vessel was sent in command of Capt. Lent M. Hitchcock, under charter of some merchants from New York, to Saint Stephens, on the Tombigbee River (Alabama). On this trip, June, 1817, she was the first American vessel to enter the port of Mobile after it came into the possession of the United States. She continued to run to Mobile under the same command, with good success about four years, when the trade had increased so much as to require larger vessels.

In 1832, Mr. Sherman retired from active commercial life, but not from active usefulness. Indeed, he never ceased to be useful. While physical strength remained he was busy, according to the principle expressed in his journal: "I believe it best for me to exercise myself in some honest and useful employment as long as health will permit."

As early as the year 1819, Mr. Sherman had been appointed justice of the peace, and this office he retained after his retirement from business, and until 1851. In the same year of his withdrawal from mercantile business he became town clerk, and held the office sixteen years by successive annual elections. He was also town treasurer twenty-two years by the annual suffrages of his fellow-citizens, and during this period his office was headquarters for conveyancing, and indeed all public business. Later he was for a time judge of Probate and recorder of the city.

He seemed reluctant to take part in the administration of the city government. Having once been elected alderman he declined to qualify, as is supposed, from a disinclination to attend the evening sessions of the Common Council, often very much protracted, yet he was not wanting in interest in municipal affairs. In the trying times of 1844 he was a member of the council of safety, appointed by the city to advise in all matters connected with the city bonds issued for the benefit of the Housatonic Railroad Company. Mr. Sherman was the secretary of the council, and the meetings were generally held in his office. The records of the council are extant.

To these and other duties Mr. Sherman added an agency for procuring pensions for Revolutionary soldiers and widows of deceased soldiers. From the absence of early records the establishment of these claims by the requisite proofs frequently involved an amount of investigation and persevering labor almost incredible. He never undertook doubtful cases. His papers were always made out with great care and clearness, and it came to be understood that their special reliability was recognized at the pension office in Washington. This was all the more true as Commissioner Edwards, who so long and ably administered the Pension Bureau at this period, knew his personal worth.

That he was a most industrious man is amply attested by voluminous records, original deeds and other conveyances, wills and documents, which are preserved in the archives of the town of Bridgeport, the Bridgeport Probate District, and the private box of nearly every property-holder of his time in this vicinity. Yet, though so busy and so efficient, those who knew him well remember his quiet manner, and how, if he ever hasted, he seemed to illustrate the maxim, "Make haste slowly."

This part of our sketch would not be complete or just without allusion to the last contribution made by Mr. Sherman, for the benefit of those who should come after him. His long life in this community and his extensive personal acquaintance, his familiarity with the church and parish records, his respect for his own ancestry—already noticed—and his genealogical studies, his intercourse with and fondness for old people, his extensive business intercourse, his investigations for the establishment of pension claims, his experience in connection with the settlement and distribution of estates, all contributed to furnish his observant and retentive mind with a fund of information regarding the early settlement and history of Stratfield and Bridgeport. He could give the exact location of the old family homes, and much about the descendants, the settlement of the Newfields (now the city of Bridgeport), the rise and progress of business, the business firms, how composed, how located, and whether successful or otherwise, etc. No one had attempted to cover the field, and no one living could do it as he could, and unless by him committed to paper, at his decease it was certain that very much would be inevitably lost. This consideration was frequently urged upon him for years without success. After his retirement from public business, to the quiet of an office improvised under the domestic roof, the situation seemed favorable, and his consent to enter upon the work was gained. The plan was laid out for him, and he entered upon it timidly, as he said "his early education was defective, and had not qualified him to write history," but his interest and his confidence grew as he progressed. The result was not a complete history, but the embodiment of a mass of fact and valuable information of great value. To those who would study the early history of Bridgeport and Stratfield, or their families, "Esquire Sherman's Recollections" are a necessity, and every passing year they increase in value.

Mr. Sherman's religious convictions commenced early in life. They were grounded on the Word of God, were pronounced, and influenced his whole being. He and his estimable wife together united with the Stratfield church, the church of his fathers, in 1812. Though modest and retiring, here, as in secular matters, his worth was thoroughly appreciated and his services sought. In 1830 he was elected to the office of deacon, and continued in active service until 1858. He was for a long period upon the Society (or Parish) Committee, and its most active member. He was also clerk and treasurer of the church. The responsibility and labor involved in this connection added very materially to his daily cares and duties. As to how they were met, his pastor in his funeral discourse bears this testimony: "In the heart to see the house of God prosper, and thoughtfulness for widows, for the poor and bereaved, he was without fault. Many a child of sorrow has called him blessed." He was not ambitious for wealth. This is apparent from his early voluntary retirement from mercantile business, also from the firm Christian principle which led him to decline, when a young man, to sell liquor by the glass, and this long before the temperance reformation, while it was customary and entirely respectable to do so. It was urged upon him, and visions of wealth were painted before his eyes. But he was inflexible, and would have no share in a traffic which was injurious, which he saw to be wrong, whether others did or not.

Having acquired a moderate competency, he seemed only desirous of earning by his useful labors enough to provide for his moderate family expenses and disbursements for religious and charitable purposes. These latter probably seldom, if ever, fell short of the Scripture rule of one-tenth of his income. He often remarked that "it was a very nice thing to live right;" and again, that Agur understood the matter pretty well in his prayer; "Remove far from me vanity and lies. Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me," etc. In his own estimation, he had not much religion to speak of. But his life told, and, referring to it, it was well said in the funeral discourse before quoted: "One exemplary, faithful, kind, peaceable, loving, practical Christian life, sustained to the last—such as our lamented and venerable friend has led in this community—is worth to the cause of God and truth and human salvation, more than all mere head orthodoxy,—the spasmodic piety, the exhortations and conversations, which are so common and so cheap in every place,—all put together—a thousand fold. Such a life is a 'living epistle' written not with pen and ink, but with the finger of God. Men cannot help reading it, nor can they help believing it.

"So lived and labored

ISAAC SHERMAN,

And rested Nov. 23, 1863."

ROWLAND B. LACEY.

If one were to choose a proper title for the biography of the subject of the present sketch, no fitter one could be found than "Record of a busy and exceedingly useful life." Rowland Bradley Lacey, only son of Jesse and Edna (Munson) Lacey, was born at Easton, Conn., April 6, 1818, and comes from excellent New England stock, being connected upon his mother's side with the family of President Stiles, of Yale College, and directly descended from John Haynes, the first Governor of Connecticut colony, and his wife, Mabel Harlakenden. Upon his father's side he is descended from John Lacey, an early settler of Stratfield Parish, and Deacon David Sherman and Deacon Henry Rowland, both of whom were pillars in the ancient First Church. His great-grandfather, Edward Lacey, son of John, removed to North Fairfield, now Easton, in 1756, and was one of the founders of that town. His grandfather, Zachariah Lacey, son of Edward, was a Revolutionary soldier, who served under Washington at the time of the evacuation of New York, and afterwards commanded a small guard which was stationed for a time upon Fairfield beach. Rowland Lacey was brought up upon his father's farm in Easton, receiving the usual common-school education of the day. When fourteen years of age he was sent to a select private school, taught by Eli Gilbert, in Redding, Conn. At the early age of fifteen and a half years he commenced teaching a district school in his native town; and in the summer of 1834, and the following winter, taught the large public school upon Redding Ridge, many of the pupils being quite as old as their youthful preceptor.

Among those who attended this school were Mr. Henry Sanford, of this city; Sheriff Aaron Sanford, of Newtown; Henry B. Fenton, of Danbury, and others. The next year was passed as a pupil at Easton Academy, after which, in April, 1836, at the age of eighteen, he removed to Bridgeport. This place was then only a small village of some three or four thousand inhabitants, with very few of the public improvements now possessed. There were no parks, no sewers, no gas, a very scanty supply of public water, and flagged sidewalks only in a portion of three or four business streets. The principal public buildings were the Bridgeport and Connecticut banks and the wooden Sterling Hotel on Main Street, then just completed.

Mr. Lacey's first occupation in Bridgeport was that of assistant postmaster. This place he held, at first under Stephen Lounsbury, and afterwards under Smith Tweedy, for nearly four years, with an interval of about six months in 1838, which were spent in study at Easton Academy.

On the opening of the Housatonic Railroad,—one of the very first roads of the country,—in December, 1839, Mr. Lacey took a position in the transportation department, and as agent at Bridgeport bore a large share of the responsibilities of operating the road. For several years during the winter season this was the only steam line between New York and Albany, and the traffic was very heavy, taxing to the utmost not only the meagre facilities for handling freight, etc., but the mettle and resources of the management. The duties intrusted to Mr. Lacey, however, were faithfully and successfully performed until March, 1841, when he voluntarily withdrew, not without the remonstrances and expressed regrets of Alfred Bishop and other leading men connected with the road. In taking leave of the railroad business, he had the satisfaction of feeling that not only had his services been highly prized by the company, but that no mistake or negligence of his had ever been the occasion of injury to either life or property. The immediate reason for his making the change was an unsolicited proposition upon the part of Messrs. Harral & Calhoun that he should take the position of book-keeper in their saddle-factory.

This was at that time one of the leading manufacturing establishments in Connecticut, doing a large and remunerative Southern trade, and having a warehouse in New York and a branch establishment in Charleston, S. C. Mr. Lacey soon became assistant manager of the manufactory, and so familiar with all the details, both of the saddle trade and the office business, that new hands who did not know to the contrary supposed that he had been brought up to it. In 1853 he became a member of the firm of Harral, Calhoun & Co. In 1858, after the death of Mr. Harral, the firm was reorganized under the name of Calhoun, Lacey & Co., and in 1863 the title was again changed to Lacey, Meeker & Co. The late war was almost a fatal blow to the saddlery business, the chief market for which was in the South. Not only did it cause immense losses, but it demoralized and impoverished the market, so much so as to render attempts to continue the business unprofitable, if not disastrous.

Between the years 1840 and 1850, Mr. Lacey was connected with the old volunteer fire department, as private member and as foreman of Company No. 1, and assistant engineer. In 1848 he drew up and procured the passage of a very full and explicit ordinance for the organization and government of the department. Previous to this time the several companies had been entirely independent of each other, and anything but harmony had prevailed. Under the new system the government was vested in a board of engineers, discipline was enforced, and the result was exceedingly advantageous in all respects. This plan continued in force until the adoption of the paid system in 1870.

Another field in which his influence has been felt is the Common Council, to which he was elected in 1848, 1852, 1853, and again in 1864.

About the year 1870 there was felt by leading citizens of Bridgeport to be a need of a better system of keeping the city accounts. Accordingly, at the request of Mayor Morford and other prominent gentlemen, Mr. Lacey visited New Haven and Hartford, Newark, N. J., and Springfield, Mass., in order to examine the methods of keeping the public accounts in use in those cities. From information thus acquired he drew up the present financial system, which, after having been revised, and in some respects elaborated, by Francis Ives, Esq., was adopted by the Common Council, Feb. 20, 1871. At the same time he was appointed city auditor, an office which he has filled with eminent ability and faithfulness to the present time, having been thrice re-elected to it,—viz., in 1874, 1877, and 1880. The original appointment was made under a Democratic administration as a non-partisan one, and has always had the support of leading men of both parties. As auditor of the city, all matters of finance and accounts pass under his inspection, and no bills or claims can be paid without his examination and approval. He has also been connected almost constantly during the above period with the street and sewer departments, as the clerk and man of business of the board of road and bridge commissioners, and as secretary of the Park commissioners. In addition to other services performed, all the men in both of these departments are paid their weekly wages by him personally, a matter of no small responsibility and labor. In all these transactions there has been a remarkable freedom from error, and the books and accounts have been kept with accuracy and care.

Mr. Lacey has also introduced system into the accounts of the town of Bridgeport, and since 1876 has had the management of the town sinking fund, which at the present time (October, 1880) amounts to over $100,000. From his large experience, his services are frequently in demand to apportion the cost of sewers and pavements, and in fact, in so many forms does his work appear, that he has sometimes been accused of running the entire city government. He is continually called upon for advice and for data concerning city and town matters, both by residents of the place and by correspondents from abroad. In 1873 he commenced the compilation of the "Municipal Register," a work of several hundred pages, containing lists of city officers, public documents, financial statements, etc., together with historical information of great interest. This work has been published annually to the present time, and is invaluable as a work of reference.

From a very early period Mr. Lacey has taken a deep interest in the cause of education. On first coming to Bridgeport, when he was only eighteen years of age, his "spirit was stirred within him" at the low condition of the public schools. He addressed several communications to the newspapers upon this topic, and unobtainable obtained the services of Prof. J. Orville Taylor, of Albany, the common-school champion of the State of New York, to lecture here upon the subject. As the fruit of these efforts, the old wooden building, inappropriately known as the High-school house, was demolished, and a substantial brick structure, at No. 200 State Street (now occupied for business purposes), took its place, and the services of such teachers as George W. Yates, and afterwards of Emory F. Strong and others, were secured.

Another subject in which Mr. Lacey has always been interested, and which in fact might be called his hobby, is the early history of this place and of its inhabitants.

Concerning the old families here his knowledge is varied and exceedingly accurate. It was at his suggestion that his father-in-law, Deacon Isaac Sherman, a life-long resident, wrote out a valuable series of articles, embodying his own early recollections, together with many facts that had been handed down from the first settlers. These articles, revised and corrected by Mr. Lacey, were published after the decease of Esquire Sherman.

The historical papers of the "Municipal Register" have already been alluded to, and mention ought also to be made of the many excellent and judicious obituary sketches from Mr. Lacey's pen which from time to time have been kindly contributed to the columns of our local newspapers when the ranks of our leading citizens have been thinned by death. These sketches have always been read with interest, though few beside the immediate friends of the deceased have been aware of their authorship, nor even they of the labor involved in their preparation. The biographies of the Rev. Henry Jones, Sherman Hartwell, and Isaac Sherman in the present volume, are from his hand.

As might be supposed, the services of a gentleman so well qualified have been in request in various positions of financial responsibility. He is at present a director in the Bridgeport National Bank and in the Bridgeport Mutual Insurance Company, also trustee in the Mechanics' and Farmers' Savings Bank, and his aid is often sought in the making of wills and in the management of estates and property, in such capacities as executor, administrator, conservator, or trustee.

For several years he was a director in the Mountain Grove Cemetery, and was on the committee for the first reappraisal of the lots. The old Stratfield Cemetery also, which has been used as a burying-place for more than two hundred years, has lately been placed under the charge of a committee, of which Mr. Lacey is the treasurer and active member, and by his instrumentality improvements are being made in the grounds.

With so many public duties devolving upon him, Mr. Lacey has been necessarily much absent from home, but he has always been an affectionate husband and father.

His first wife was Jane E., daughter of the late Isaac Sherman, Esq., of this city. They were married Nov. 17, 1811, but the union was dissolved by her death, April 5, 1857. His present wife, Mrs.

Elizabeth R. Boardman Lacey, was a daughter of the late Sherman Boardman, Esq., of Hartford. The date of their marriage is April 14, 1859. The children by the first marriage were (1) Mary Louisa, whose first husband was the late Maj. Ezra D. Dickerman, but who is now the wife of Samuel S. Hunter; (2) Edward Rowland, deceased; (3) Henry Rowland, deceased; (4) David Sherman, now in business in New York City. Miss Henrietta Boardman Lacey is Mr. Lacey's daughter by his second marriage.

In politics, Mr. Lacey in his early years was a member of the old Whig party, and a great admirer of Daniel Webster and Henry Clay. During the war he was an earnest Union man, and since its close he has acted with the Republican party, and may be classed as a conservative Republican, though he has many warm friends in each of the two political parties.

No sketch of the subject of this biography would be complete that did not give more than passing notice to the religious principles which are the foundation of his whole character,—the solid rock upon which the entire structure rests. Mr. Lacey was born and educated a Congregationalist of the Puritan type, yet, from early association with Christian people of other denominations, has always been catholic and liberal in his sentiments, though firmly adhering to the faith of his forefathers. About the year 1827 he was one of the original scholars in the first Sunday-school formed in the town of Redding, the Sunday-school then being a new institution. Mr. N. H. Lindley, now of this city, was his teacher in this school, but in his fifteenth year Mr. Lacey himself became a teacher. Previous to this time, May 6, 1832, at the age of fourteen years, he had made an open profession of religion, and united with the Congregational Church in Redding, a step due to the influence and the early religious instruction of a devoted Christian mother, more than to any other human source.

In July, 1837, he became a member of the First Congregational Church of this city, with which he has ever since been identified, both as deacon, to which office he was elected Aug. 30, 1850, and for a number of years as clerk and as treasurer of the church. From 1837 to 1850 he was a member of the choir. For many years he has also served in one or more of the following capacities: society's treasurer, member and chairman of society's committee, Sunday-school teacher, librarian, superintendent of Sunday-school, and teacher of a Bible class. His heart is in the Sunday-school work, and he considers himself as enlisted for life to serve this cause in some capacity.

In connection with Henry W. Chatfield, now of New York, Mr. Lacey solicited and raised most of the funds for building the house of worship now occupied by the First Church, and was also a member of the building committee for the erection of the chapel adjoining.

These services are all important in their way, but more important than any of them is the influence exerted by a constant and devoted, yet unostentatious, Christian life of more than forty years in this community.

Such a life is a more eloquent argument for the Christian religion than any sermon, however able, and such a character, together with

"That best portion of a good man's life,
His little, nameless, unremembered acts Of kindness and of love,"

will at some future day be his legacy to those who bear his name, to the church of which he is a member, and to all who have in any way come within the sphere of his influence.

JOHN L. WESSELS.

The paternal ancestors of John L. Wessels were of German origin, and the maternal ones French Huguenots. Mr. Wessels was born in White Plains, Westchester Co., N. Y. He was son of James and Letitia Wessels. His grandfather, Hercules Wessels, was an old-time resident of White Plains, settling on the homestead (which was in the possession of his descendants until a few years ago) before the Revolution. He was a sterling patriot, and served as sergeant of Gen. Washington's body-guard during the entire period of the Revolutionary war, and was wounded at the battle of Yorktown.

James Wessels was a farmer, and John spent his early life at the old home, acquiring the physical vigor so essential to success in life, and also a common school education. When he was sixteen years old he entered his brother's store at Port Chester, in capacity of clerk. After one year's time he was called to take charge of a store in East Bridgeport, and remained there two years, when, seeing a good opportunity to engage himself in business, Mr. Wessels formed a partnership with Elias Hall, and purchased the stock of goods (groceries and hardware), and continued the trade for two years, when William H. Wessels, his brother, purchased Mr. Hall's interest. The brothers continued together in this business until 1877, when they sold the stock and fixtures, and opened a wholesale fruit and produce store on the corner of Wall and Water Streets, Bridgeport, where they are still in trade.

Mr. Wessels married, Sept. 23, 1862, Sarah A., daughter of James and Nancy Merritt, of Port Chester, N. Y.

Brought up by a father who was an old-line Whig and afterwards a Republican, Mr. Wessels has ever affiliated with the Republican party. The first Republican parade in East Bridgeport consisted of eighteen men and one boy. Mr. Wessels was that boy. Believing in the necessity of the prevalence of Republican principles, Mr. Wessels has been active and ardent in their support, a valued leader and counselor, a member of town, county, and State committees, was placed in candidacy for the Legislature in 1878, but defeated with the entire Republican ticket; was elected mayor of Bridgeport in 1879,—the only candidate on the Republican ticket that was not defeated. He was unanimously renominated by acclamation on expiration of his term of office as mayor, but declined to accept on account of the pressure of business, which was rendered much heavier by the ill health of his brother.

Mr. Wessels has also been alderman for the Fifth Ward of Bridgeport for four years, and in the discharge of the duties of that office was chairman of several important committees. He was vice-president of the Republican State convention which met at New Haven in the spring of 1880 to elect delegates to the Republican National Convention at Chicago.

Mr. Wessels is a member of St. John's Lodge of Free Masons in Bridgeport, and for over twenty years has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, holding many offices in its gift, and is at present president of the board of trustees. He is largely engaged in Sunday-school work, and has held various positions in that connection.

Mr. Wessels was a charter member of Battery B, Light Artillery, Connecticut National Guards, organized in 1858, and was commissioned gun-sergeant, but soon promoted to third lieutenant, again to second lieutenant, first lieutenant, and captain. As captain, was senior artillery officer of the State.

As an individual, Mr. Wessels is social and pleasing, is very popular, and is justly considered one of Bridgeport's successful, progressive, public-spirited, and honorable citizens. While active and progressive he is also prudent, and never carried away by any visionary scheme or project, however brilliant it may appear, and is thus a careful guardian of public trusts or private interests and a sound counselor.

ALISON AMOS PETTENGILL.

Alison Amos Pettengill, son of Rev. Amos Pettengill, was born in the town of Champlain, Clinton Co., N. Y., Nov. 13, 1808. His father was a Congregational minister, and removed to Morris, in Litchfield County, in this State, when Alison A. was quite young, and here, at the Morris Academy, his education was commenced; and having prepared himself for a collegiate course, entered Middlebury College, Vt. He subsequently entered Yale College, where he graduated in the class of 1829. After graduation, during a period of nine years, he taught private select schools of a high grade in the towns of Stratford, Danbury, Fairfield, and Bridgeport. While conducting the school in this city in 1839, he purchased the materials of the newspaper known as the Bridgeport Press and changed the name to the Republican Standard, and continued as its editor and proprietor until the spring of 1868, when H. B. Wildman and J. S. Hancock were admitted to an interest, and the paper was conducted under the firm-name of Pettengill & Co. Mr. Pettengill subsequently purchased their interest, and conducted the paper as sole editor and proprietor until 1863, when he disposed of it to John D. Candler, Esq.

Politically, Mr. Pettengill is a Republican, and was previously a Whig, and, although not an active politician, has held various offices within the gift of his fellow-citizens. He was a senator in 1845, and has also been a representative. He held the office of United States marshal four years, and was the census marshal for this State and appointed the census supervisors for 1850. He has also been a member of the Common Council of this city, and alderman several years. In the early days of the telegraph he was much interested in the matter, and acted as director of the company.

Mr. Pettengill is an earnest churchman, and a member of the vestry of St. John's Parish.

He has been twice married. His first wife was Elizabeth Philipps, of Danbury, who died in 1862. His present wife is Catharine A., daughter of the late Isaac Burroughs. Her grandfather, Stephen Burroughs, opened the second store in this city. He was during a long period a successful merchant.

Since Mr. Pettengill disposed of his interest in the Standard newspaper, he has lived a retired private life, and is honored and respected by all.

PHILO HURD SKIDMORE.

Philo Hurd Skidmore was born in Bethlehem, Litchfield Co., Conn., Oct. 1, 1817, living with his parents to the age of sixteen, enjoying the privileges of the district school during the winter months, and laboring with his father on the farm through the summer, securing thereby a healthy development of body and mind. He then went to New Haven as clerk in the wholesale grocery-store of Henry Oaks, where he served five years, securing the confidence and esteem of his employer. On completing his clerkship he was admitted a partner in the wholesale grocery-firm of Kidston & Hall,—Mr. Kidston retiring. He continued in this connection five years, doing a successful trade. During all these years he was an active member of the Young Mechanics' and Young Men's Institute, and one of the original founders of the latter.

In 1843 he returned to his native town and kept a country store, doing a varied and extensive business up to the year 1853, and by rigid economy and strict attention to business increased his little savings of early days to a moderate competence. Confidence in his ability and integrity gave him during these years the positions of town and parish treasurer, town clerk, collector, etc.

On the organization of the Woodbury Bank he was made a director to represent the Bethlehem stockholders. Its failure from the unwarranted transactions of the president and cashier was the first disaster of his life. Smarting under the chagrin of the failure of anything with which he was connected, in September, 1853, he came to Bridgeport, leaving his store in charge of his brother, and joined James E. Dunham in the dry-goods trade. He remained in this connection but a short time, retiring to accept the position of secretary and treasurer of the Pacific Iron-Works, vacant by the resignation of Hon. H. K. Harral. Wholly ignorant of mechanics, machinery, and manufacturing, it was a new existence to him, but with characteristic determination he grappled with the necessities of the situation, and after a struggle of eight years found the works with nothing to boast but safety from the almost universal wreck of the numerous joint-stock corporations organized at that period. The rising cloud of rebellion loomed a dark shadow over the future. The demand for armed vessels to enforce the blockade led to a contract with government to build and erect the machinery for the gunboat "Kanawha" for forty-five thousand dollars, in 1861. This resulted in a loss of twenty thousand dollars, which crippled the company and brought them to the verge of bankruptcy. At this time he was surety on a large amount of the company indebtedness and bonds to the government. In 1862 he became owner of the entire works by purchase of the stock and assumed the debts. Wrestling with the difficulties that surrounded him for a while, the revival of business in 1863 found him fully prepared to reap the benefit of the tidal wave of success which swept over New England manufactures, and he gathered a rich harvest of profits for the next five years, the works attaining a reputation and extent second to but few in the country. In 1865 he removed to Newtown, where he has since resided, and purchased the fine residence and farm of D. V. T. Baldwin, retiring somewhat from the immediate oversight of his manufactory. He was representative from that town in the Legislature of 1869.

In January, 1870, he visited Florida, making a tour through the Southern States, visiting five State Capitols, in which the Legislatures were in session, composed largely of colored members. In May following he returned to Florida and arranged for the construction of the St. John's Railway, running from the St. John's River to St. Augustine on the coast, furnishing the entire means for building and equipping the same, he and his two sons operating it for five years. In 1875 he disposed of his interest in the road to Mr. Lanier, of Winslow, Lanier & Co., New York. In 1876 he purchased the entire machinery, patterns, and material of the steam fire-engine works of William Jeffers, Pawtucket, R. I., and removed them to Bridgeport, and has since carried on that branch in connection with his other business, producing some of the finest specimens of steam fire-engines of the present times. Since that year his time has been divided between the care and oversight of his farm and the works at Bridgeport. On the night of May 2d the works were destroyed by fire. His loss was heavy and insurance small, but undaunted by the seeming great disaster, and believing that God rules in the affairs of men, he set to work vigorously, and not only rebuilt but largely extended his works, and has now one of the most complete establishments for the manufacture of machinery of all kinds, boilers, and foundry-work in the New England States.

The fire caused the dissolution of the firm of Skidmore & Moore, and the works are now carried on by himself and two sons, under the firm-name of P. H. Skidmore & Sons. The revival of business has filled their shops with work to their utmost capacity. Rigorous, almost severe, in his habits of diet and sleep, his vigor now at the age of sixty-three is unabated, and his health perfect.

In January, 1880, he visited New Orleans, traveling through Texas and States bordering on the Mississippi River, and was so well pleased with New Orleans, its people and climate, and so fully impressed of its certain future growth and prosperity, that he not only made investments in real estate, but made arrangements for residing there permanently during the fall and winter months, and is at present (fall of 1880) there on his plantation near the city.

Such is briefly the history of one of our successful self-made Connecticut men, based upon self-reliance, industry, and economy.

With a family of seven children, five of whom are living,—three sons and two daughters,—with a reasonable competence, his declining years are the pleasantest of his life, and amply repay the struggles and hardships of his early days.

JULIUS W. KNOWLTON.

Julius W. Knowlton was born in Southbridge, Worcester Co., Mass., Nov. 28, 1838. His boyhood until he was seven years of age was passed in his native town. He then went with his parents to Norwich, Conn., where they remained three years and then removed to Bridgeport. He was educated at the public and private schools in this vicinity, giving particular attention to mathematical studies and civil engineering. In 1860 he purchased a coal interest in this city, and was conducting that business upon the breaking out of the Rebellion. He was not one of those to stand idly by when his imperiled country called for brave men to strike at the hideous head of rebellion, and in 1862 sacrificed his business and enlisted as a private in Company A, Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and upon the organization of the regiment was made commissary-sergeant. He subsequently acted as brigade-commissary in the brigade commanded by Gen. Dwight Morris, colonel of the Fourteenth Regiment. In all the walks of life Mr. Knowlton has exhibited great executive ability, and at no time has this more conspicuously appeared than on the night of the memorable battle of Antietam, when with the utmost dispatch he pushed his provision-train to the front, and his brigade was the first to receive supplies. He was complimented by his superior officers, and was promised promotion in the commissary department,—a promise, however, which was never fulfilled. He was promoted to second lieutenant of Company C, the color company of his regiment, and was in command of that company at Gettysburg. On the third day of the battle of Gettysburg he was severely wounded, and remained in a hospital on the field eleven days, and was then removed to Baltimore, and soon after came home. Early in the following January he returned to the front, but was unable to perform arduous military duty, and, March 29, 1864, was discharged for physical disability, and at the surrender of Lee was clerk in the provost-marshal's office at Bridgeport.

Upon the close of the war Mr. Knowlton received appointment in the Adams Express Company, and subsequently, in October, 1866, was one of three who purchased the Bridgeport Standard, which was organized as a stock company in the following January, with Mr. Knowlton as secretary and treasurer and business manager. He resigned this position in March, 1873, to take the superintendence of the Moore Car-Wheel Company, of Jersey City, N. J., a large establishment doing an extensive business, but that ever-memorable "Black Friday" came and the business was ruined.

Oct. 1, 1874, he accepted the position of chief of the division of dead letters at Washington, which division at that time was in a deplorable condition, the business being fourteen months in arrears. Here Mr. Knowlton's executive ability received a fresh demonstration. He at once reduced the whole business of the division to a system, and in less than three months the fourteen months' arrearages were cleared up and the vast machinery of the office was running smoothly. Postmaster-General Jewell then made him chief clerk of the post-office department, a position which he held until Oct. 15, 1875, when he received the appointment of postmaster at Bridgeport, and November 1st took possession of the office and has since officiated in that capacity.

His genial and courteous manners won him hosts of friends during his stay in Washington, and upon his departure he was the recipient of a vast number of letters both from the heads of the department and his subordinates regretting his departure and expressing the warmest friendship.

Politically, Mr. Knowlton is a Republican, and is active and prominent in the councils of the party. He has served two terms in the Legislature, has been a member of the Republican State committee, etc., and was on Governor Jewell's staff with the rank of colonel.

He is also a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity, and at present is Captain-General of Hamilton Commandery. He still manifests a lively interest in the "Boys in Blue," and has been assistant adjutant-general of the Grand Army of the Republic of Connecticut, and also a member of the National Council of administration of the Grand Army, and this year (1880) was a delegate to the National Encampment of the Grand Army.

Dec. 17, 1866, he united in marriage with Jennie E. Fairchild, a native of Newtown, Conn. They have had two children, both of whom are deceased.

Mr. Knowlton traces his genealogy back to Thomas Knowlton,* who was the youngest of three brothers who came to the United States in 1632 or 1633 and settled in Ipswich, Mass. He married Susanna —, † and was a deacon in the church in Ipswich. He had two sons,—Thomas, Jr., and Joseph. Deacon Thomas died April 3, 1692, aged seventy years.

Thomas (2) Jr., born 1643-44, married Hannah Green, November, 1668. He was jailer in Ipswich in 1680, and died Feb. 28, 1717, and had children as follows: Thomas (3), Robert, Katherine, Deborah, Ezekiel, Zerubbabel, Susannah.

Thomas (3), born May 11, 1670, married Margery Goodhue, Dec. 9, 1692; married (2) Margery Carter. Children, Robert, born Sept. 7, 1693, married Hannah Robinson; Asher Knowlton, who resides in Stafford Springs, Conn., is one of his descendants; Margery, Sarah, Abraham, Deborah, Joseph, Ezekiel (4).

Ezekiel (4), born March, 1707, married Susannah Morgan in 1728. Ezekiel died March 14, 1774, and Susannah died March 19, 1794. Their children were Mary, Deborah, Luke, Susannah, Ezekiel, William (5), Sarah, Margery, Thomas.

William (5), born April 29, 1741, married Hannah Hastings, Oct. 22, 1764. He resided in Shrewsbury. She was born in Watertown. Dr. William died Sept. 13, 1820; Hannah died Oct. 25, 1832. Their children were Hannah, Asa, Susannah, Artemas, William, Dr. Seth (6), and Joseph H.

Dr. Seth (6), born in Shrewsbury, May 11, 1781, married Relief Howe in 1802. He died April 12, 1832. Children of Dr. Seth were Darwin, Charles, Eunice (died when two years old), Artemas, William S.,—father of the subject of this sketch,—Eunice, Nancy, Calvin, and Dolly.

DAVID M. READ.

David M. Read was born in Hoosic Falls, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1832. His parents soon after removed to North Adams, Mass., where most of his boyhood days were passed. He commenced his education at the district school, finishing it at the old Drury Academy, North Adams, at the age of fourteen, working during the summer vacation for farmers and in stores to help pay for clothes and schooling, as his parents were not able to keep him at the academy. After leaving school he engaged with a farmer at four dollars per month, and his first work was sawing and splitting wood in the hot sun. With blistered neck, but lots of "pluck," he kept at his task until one day the farmer came to him and said, "Now, David, I am going to set you to farming." Never was there a boy more delighted. With a quick step and a light heart he accompanied the farmer away up on the mountain-side to an open lot in the rear of a piece of woods, and was set to picking up stone! This capped the climax. If farming for him meant sawing wood and picking stone he was through with it. So he abandoned his dreams of agriculture and went with his older brother Charles, who had taken a cloth-mill in Pownal, Vt., for the manufacture of cloths for men's wear. This business, however, proved unsuccessful, and he was soon out of employment. He afterwards clerked successively in Williamstown, Stockbridge, and Lenox, continuing his studies during this time, and finally, in March, 1852, came to this city, and entered the employ of E. Birdsey & Co., with whom he remained until Aug. 15, 1857, enjoying the entire confidence of the firm in his honesty, judgment, and ability.

Sept. 1, 1857, having saved about one thousand dollars, he was kindly loaned fifteen hundred dollars by the late Hanford Lyon, and, associating with him W. B. Hall, opened a dry goods and carpet-store at 227 Main Street. This firm continued at the old stand until May, 1869, when they removed to the store in Wheeler's block now occupied by Mr. Read. The partnership of Hall & Read continued until Aug. 1, 1877, when Mr. Hall withdrew, and the business has since been continued by Mr. Read. The business of Hall & Read increased rapidly, and at one time their sales amounted to $500,000 per year. During the panics of 1857, 1861, and 1873 this house remained firm, and at their dissolution enjoyed the distinction of having always paid one hundred cents on the dollar.

Mr. Read, with his brother, Charles A., began the manufacture of ingrain carpets in a small way in Water Street, with two hand-loom. They subsequently purchased their present location on Middle Street, and increased their business until they were operating twenty looms. The business was conducted by this firm—D. M. & C. A. Read—until 1873, when a stock company was formed with a capital of fifty-five thousand dollars, under the name of the Read Carpet Company, David M. being president and selling agent. This company owns the block corner of Fairfield Avenue and Middle Street, with a frontage of one hundred feet on the former and two hundred on the latter, and have now in process of erection a block adjoining one hundred and twenty by fifty-six feet. The establishment will be furnished with fifty power-looms, and will manufacture ingrain, Brussels, and Axminster carpets, with a capacity of four hundred and fifty thousand yards per year.

Mr. Read has been a member of the Common Council, first alderman of the city, member of the Board of Education, member of the school committee, is a director in the Bridgeport National Bank, and, with the exception of the first year, has been president of the Board of Trade since its organization; a director in the Mountain Grove Cemetery Association and the Fairfield County Agricultural Society. He was a member of the Connecticut National Guard for eight years as a brigade commissary with the rank of major, and was an efficient officer. He was acting commissary-general at the encampment of the Connecticut National Guard at the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia in 1876, and was highly complimented by Gen. Trowbridge for the executive ability displayed in the management of his department.

Politically, he was a Republican until 1872, since which time he has been an Independent, although generally voting with the Democratic party. He is a member of the vestry of St. John's Church.

Dec. 3, 1855, he united in marriage with Helen Augusta, daughter of the late Philo F. Barnum. They have two sons—Charles Barnum, who is cashier in his father's business, and David F., who is in Yale College—and one daughter, May Louise. One daughter, Helen A., died Oct. 13, 1872.

That Mr. Read's business career has been one of marked prosperity his large business interests and handsome residence in Park Avenue afford ample proof.

He is a public-spirited citizen, of a genial and social nature, and very popular with the masses.

CAPT. ISAAC BURROUGHS.

Capt. Isaac Burroughs, son of Stephen Burroughs, was born in Bridgeport or Newfield, Conn., in 1778, and died at his residence in Bridgeport, Conn., Jan. 8, 1861. His father, Stephen Burroughs, was a native of Stratford, Conn., and was born in the year 1729.

From the personal recollections of an old friend and partner in business, Isaac Sherman, we glean the following. Stephen Burroughs, Esq., a farmer, shipbuilder, Boston coaster, shipmaster, mathematician, astronomer, and surveyor, was a self-made man. He was about five feet eight inches in height, strongly built, never sick during his long life, a cold-water man. He died in the year 1817, aged eighty-eight years. It is related that he and Isaac Sherman sent the first American vessel into the port of Mobile, in June, 1817, after that city came into the possession of the United States. He was an active patriot during the Revolutionary war, raised a militia company called "Householders," of which he was made captain. He was often a representative to the General Assembly and magistrate of his town for many years.

Besides his extensive business in the shipping trade he owned the parish grist-mill, called Burroughs' Mills, that stood where the Pequonnock Woolen Mills now do.

He was blind several years before his death, when it is said he invented, in 1798, the present system of Federal-money.

It is said of him that he was the first man in Bridgeport to take a daily New York paper, called the Daily Journal of Commerce, which he took for its marine intelligence, as he was then engaged in trading between New York and Richmond, Va. Upon the arrival of the mail, by the consent of Mr. Burroughs, his paper was considered public property for a short time, and the citizens would assemble to hear the news read by some good reader chosen for the occasion.

His children were as follows: Stephen, Jr., Isaac, David, Abijah, Eunice, Betsy, and Huldah. David died of fever taken from a German while in Boston, and was buried at Martha's Vineyard in 1796, Abijah was lost at sea, Eunice married a Mr. Pendleton, Betsy married Capt. Joseph Sterling Edwards, and Huldah married Joseph Backus, of Bridgeport and Glastonbury, Conn.

Isaac Burroughs, like his father before him, was extensively engaged in navigation, and owned a large number of vessels, which plied between Boston, New York, and nearly all the Southern ports, besides visiting many of the islands of the sea. He was a large owner of real estate in this city. He was a director in the old Bridgeport Bank, of which Isaac Brunson was its first president. He was a life-long Whig and Republican, and as such represented his town in the State Legislature. He was a warden for several years of St. John's Episcopal Church of Bridgeport, Conn., and one of its most liberal supporters. He married Rebecca, daughter of Andrew Hurd, of Old Mill, Conn. Their children were six in number, all of whom are dead except Catharine A., who married A. A. Pettengill, an accomplished gentleman and scholar, of Bridgeport, Conn.

WILLIAM R. HIGBY.

William R. Higby, son of Hervey and Charlotte Baldwin, both of whom were natives of Milford, Conn., was born in Bridgeport, Conn., Aug. 6, 1825. His father, Hervey Higby, was born Jan. 27, 1801, and in 1820 located in Bridgeport and became one of the leading and substantial citizens of the town. In addition to the saddlery business, in which he was engaged until 1853, he occupied numerous official positions. His good judgment, ability, and correctness were recognized in the community, and brought into requisition as appraiser, distributor, executor, or administrator on numerous estates. He was president of the Farmers' (now First National) Bank, and subsequently of the Connecticut National Bank; was special and financial agent of the city and town, and agent and active manager of city and town sinking-funds, trustee and president of the Bridgeport Savings Bank, etc.

William R., the subject of this sketch, was educated at the private schools in this city and in New Haven. He commenced business as teller and book-keeper in the Connecticut Bank, where he remained seven years, and then engaged in the manufacturing business, which was destroyed by a fire a few months later. He then assisted in organizing the Pequonnock Bank, became its first cashier, and officiated in that capacity until 1869, when he resigned and engaged in the business of fire insurance, and has continued in that to the present time. In 1871, T. B. De Forest became associated with him in the business, and the firm has since been Higby & De Forest.

Mr. Higby has ever been alive to the interests of his native city, and has occupied numerous positions of trust and responsibility. He was treasurer of the city of Bridgeport in 1853, '54, '55, '56, and 1857, and town treasurer in 1858, '59, '60, '61, '63, '64, '65, '66, '67, '68, and 1872. He was a member of the Common Council two years; is director, secretary, and treasurer of Mountain Grove Cemetery Association, and has been since 1861; was a director in the Bridgeport Savings Bank about fifteen years; is a director in the Connecticut National Bank, and also in the Bridgeport Gas-Light Company.

Mr. Higby has always manifested a decided interest in Masonic matters, and is one of the highest members of the fraternity in the State, having taken the Thirty-third Degree. He was initiated in St. John's Lodge, No. 3, in 1852, and was the first templar in Hamilton Commandery in 1855. He is one of the two active members of the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite for the Northern Masonic Jurisdiction of the United States. He has also been Commander of the Grand Commandery of Connecticut.

Mr. Higby is a Republican in politics, and attends the South Congregational church, in which his father was for a long time a deacon.

In 1846 he united in marriage with Mary Ann Johnson, a native of New Haven, Conn., and has two children living,—Martha Louisa and Helen Augusta. A son, Henry Cornelius, is deceased.

FREDERICK AUGUSTUS BARTRAM.

The Bartram family was among the pioneers of Fairfield County, and has an honorable record from that time to the present. Several of the family served in the Revolution, among them Daniel, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, who marched to the defense of Danbury when that town was invaded and burned by Tryon in 1777. The Redding branch of this family removed from Fairfield in 1733. This was David Bartram, and he located in Lonetown.

Frederick A. Bartram, son of Gurdon and Lorraine Sanford Bartram,* was born in Redding, Sept. 13, 1824, and was the youngest of eight sons. He remained with his father on the farm until sixteen years of age, when he entered as an apprentice the employ of Bartram & Wilson, carriage-makers at Redding. In 1848 he removed to Fairfield and commenced the butchering business. In 1854 he established the business of pork-packing in Fairfield, and conducted the business at that place until 1867, when he disposed of his interest in the Fairfield establishment and removed to this city. Mr. Bartram is an energetic and thorough business man, and every year from the beginning of the business to the present time his sales have increased, until from one thousand dollars the first year they now aggregate over two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. He conducted the business as sole proprietor until 1874, when George H., a nephew, and Edgar B., a son, became associated with him, and the business is now carried on under the firm-name of F. A. Bartram & Co.

Nov. 11, 1851, he united in marriage with Amelia Burr, a native of Fairfield, and they have four children living,—viz., Edgar B., Lillian Francis, Belle, and Jesse. He is a staunch Republican, and although never an active politician has held various city offices. He has been a member of the Common Council, and is a present alderman. He is in all respects a practical man, and has lent his aid to all projects which in his judgment would advance the interests of the people, and was the prime mover and manager of the movement which resulted in giving the people of Bridgeport the "Rosedale Line" of steamers with New York City, and is now the general manager and agent of the line.

Mr. Bartram is essentially a self-made man, and his great success has been the natural result of an indomitable will coupled with good judgment, keen business foresight, and integrity of character.

ASAHIEL LEWIS LYON.

Asahiel L. Lyon was of Scottish ancestry, and the family trace their lineage back to 1681, when the first of the name in this country emigrated from "old Scotia." He was a son of Hezekiah Lyon and Sarah Hendricks, both natives of the old town of Fairfield. The latter was a daughter of Samuel Hendricks and Catharine Jennings.

Asahiel L. was born in Louthbury, Conn., Sept. 26, 1810, and obtained his education at the common schools. At the early age of sixteen he commenced working at the trade of carpenter and joiner, and continued as an apprentice until he was twenty years of age, when he purchased his "time" and removed to New Haven, Conn., where he formed a copartnership with one Brown, which was continued under the firm-name of Lyon & Brown until 1846, when he came to Bridgeport and entered into business with his brother-in-law, the late Ezra Curtis. This firm built up a large and prosperous lumber business, which is still carried on by their heirs under the firm-name of Lyon, Curtis & Co., and they rank among the largest dealers in the State.

Sept. 14, 1837, he united in marriage with Lucy Loomis, a native of Torrington, Conn., born July 16, 1817, by whom he had one child, Lucy Loomis, born Oct. 15, 1838, and died in 1859. His wife died in 1839, and in 1843 he married Marietta Clarke, a native of East Haven, Conn., born May 20, 1816, and died in 1859. Their family consisted of two children, Marietta Francis, born Nov. 23, 1846, and died in 1863, and Louis H. Lyon, born May 4, 1857, a resident of Bridgeport and engaged in the lumber business. In 1861, Mr. Lyon was married to Louisa, daughter of Frederick P. and Mary A. Whiting, of Torrington, Conn., by whom he had three children,—Louisa K., born July 16, 1868; Frederick W., born May 24, 1872; and Asahel L., born Aug. 26, 1874.

Mr. Lyon was a public-spirited citizen, and one of the substantial men of the city. Although not active in political matters he was an earnest Democrat, and a member of the Congregational Society. He died Oct. 4, 1874.

JAMES W. BEARDSLEY.

James W. Beardsley, son of Elisha H. and Betsey Walker Beardsley, was born in Monroe, May 8, 1820. He was educated in the district schools of his native town and at the preparatory school of Samuel B. Beardsley. In 1850 he removed from Monroe to this town and located on the premises where he has since resided. He occupies the old Walker homestead, which was built by James Walker, his great-grandfather, in 1739. (See accompanying view.)

Mr. Beardsley commenced business for himself as a cattle-dealer at the early age of seventeen years, and has since continued in that vocation. He is a generous and public-spirited citizen, and has done much to advance the welfare of the city and town of Bridgeport. As an evidence of the above statement, in 1878 he donated to the city of Bridgeport Beardsley's Park, a tract of land containing one hundred acres, delightfully located in the northeast part of the city, for which he had been offered the sum of twenty thousand dollars. When thoroughly improved it will be one of the finest public parks in New England. He commenced the ornamentation of the park in 1876 by planting with his own hands two rows, four rods apart, of fine elm-trees, extending a mile in length.

Politically, Mr. Beardsley is a Democrat, who cast his first vote for James K. Polk. He is an Episcopalian and attends service at Trinity church, Nichols' Farms. He has in his possession many interesting relics of "ye olden time," one of the most interesting being a huge clock which originally belonged to the Rev. Mr. Muirson, the first Episcopal clergyman in the State of Connecticut.

STEPHEN NICHOLS.

Stephen Nichols, son of William and Huldah Nichols, was born Sept. 16, 1804, in Trumbull, Fairfield Co., Conn. His great-grandfather, Theophilus Nichols, was one of the early settlers of the county; died April 7, 1774, aged seventy-one years, and was interred in the old cemetery in Stratford. His grandfather, Philip Nichols, was a man of much influence in the county. A magistrate for many years. Was a large landholder; owned several slaves; dealt extensively in horses and mules, many of which he exported to the West Indies, together with produce of various kinds. He owned several vessels, in which he made several trips to the West Indies. William Nichols was a farmer by occupation. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, as was also his father and all of his family; two of his sisters married Episcopal clergymen,—viz., Rev. Philo Shelton and Rev. Mr. Allen. He died July 22, 1837, and was buried in the Pequonnock Cemetery. He was twice married; eight children were born of the first marriage, and seven by the second. Stephen Nichols was one of the latter. When he was thirteen years old his mother died, and he was forced to seek a home for himself, which he did by coming to Bridgeport, where he had a sister residing, with whom he made his home. He worked by the month for farmers for several years, and then learned the boot and shoe trade, which business he followed as an occupation for about twenty years, and then gradually turned his attention to farming, which business he has since been engaged in. Mr. Nichols has taken an active part in politics. He was a Whig before the organization of the Republican party, but since that time he has been a strong advocate of the principles of the Republican party. He was elected to represent the town of Bridgeport in the State Legislature in 1878, and was appointed a member of the committee on cities and boroughs. He has been justice of the peace, assessor, selectman, and a member of the Common Council.

Mr. Nichols was married March 4, 1829, to Emeline, daughter of Aaron Beardsley, of Trumbull. They have had two children,—viz., Jane E., who died in childhood, and Stephen M., who was born July 10, 1838, and died July 29, 1870. He was in the late war about one year; served as first lieutenant of Co. D, Twenty-third Regiment Connecticut Volunteers; was in the crockery trade in Bridgeport before and after the war. He married Julia G. Hall, of Trumbull, who survives him, and is living with her children, Lizzie H. and Willbur E., in Bridgeport. Mr. and Mrs. Nichols are members of the North Congregational Church. He is in his seventy-seventh year, genial, hale, and hearty, and is a good specimen of a well-preserved, temperate man.

REV. HENRY JONES.

Henry Jones, the son of Maj. Daniel Jones and Rhoda Mather, was born in Hartford, Conn., Oct. 15, 1801, where he spent his early years. He was fitted for college at the grammar school in that city, in company with his eminent surviving college classmates, President Theodore D. Woolsey and Rev. Leonard Bacon, D.D., between whom and the subject of this sketch there was life-long friendship and appreciation.

His father, who was a man of a noble type, died when the son was but three months old. That he was thus deprived of the personal influence of such a father was ever and keenly regretted by him. His mother was the daughter of Charles Mather, M.D., a descendant of the distinguished Richard Mather, of early colonial times. Though crushed and made despondent by her early widowhood, she lived to a good old age.

Mr. Jones entered Yale College at the age of sixteen years, and was graduated in the class of 1820. He pursued his theological studies at Andover Seminary, and was graduated by that institution in 1821.

He was married to Eliza S. Webster, daughter of the late Noah Webster, LL.D., Sept. 5, 1825; was ordained to the gospel ministry, and settled as pastor of the Second Society in Berlin, Conn. (now the First Congregational Society of New Britain), Oct. 12, 1825. This position he filled with acceptance to his people, gaining the respect and confidence of neighboring pastors also, and his ministry was fruitful. Many were added to the church during his pastorate.

Possessing a highly sensitive nature, cultured, conscientious, and exacting, the responsibilities resting upon him as a Christian pastor and teacher, however successfully discharged according to the judgment of others, so oppressed him with a painful sense of his own inadequacy and unworthiness, as to seriously impair his health. This led to an early relinquishment of his ministry at Berlin, and to his entrance upon the work for which he was eminently fitted, and which proved to be the work of his lifetime.

He was dismissed from his pastorate Dec. 19, 1827, and the following year opened a select school for young ladies at Greenfield, Mass., which was successfully continued for a period of nearly ten years. In 1838 he removed to Bridgeport, and erected the cottage he ever afterwards occupied, on the western slope of Golden Hill. Here he opened the classical school for young men and boys, so well and favorably known in its day as the "Cottage School," in December of that year. Both this and his first school attracted and enjoyed patronage of the highest order from all parts of the country.

The large list of alumni embraces names distinguished in literature, the professions, in politics, and in business. Mr. Jones was respected and beloved by his pupils, and rarely failed, even in the most unpromising cases, to find and develop redeeming qualities.

After thirty years of successful and almost uninterrupted labor as an instructor, he gradually withdrew, to enjoy in a green old age the competence which he had acquired. Soon after his removal to Bridgeport, Mr. Jones and family united with the First Congregational Church, of which he remained a valued and useful member until his death, Nov. 9, 1878.

While the responsibilities of his school were upon him, his devotion to his professional duties left little time for Christian work in other ranges.

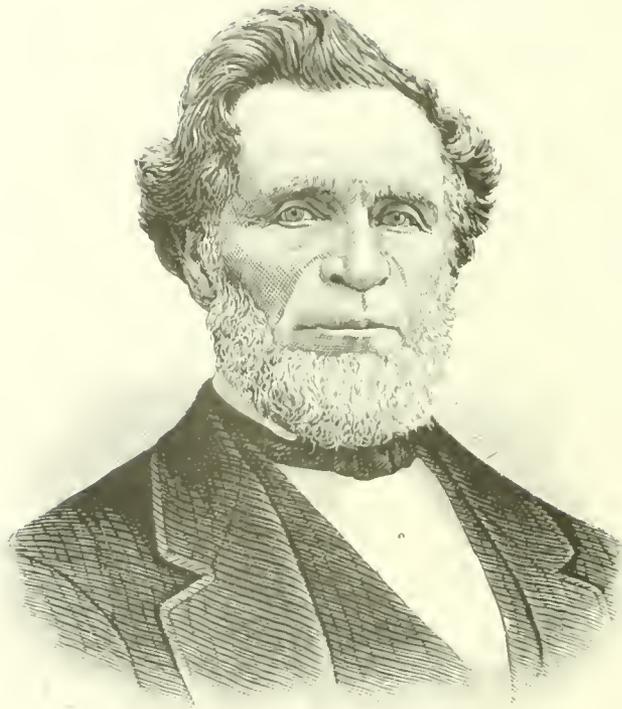

When measurably relieved, in 1858, he was elected to and accepted the office of deacon of the First Church, and fulfilled its duties most acceptably until his voluntary retirement, in March, 1873. Oftener than any other brother, he represented the church in the stated and special meetings of the Council of Consociation. The church was fortunate in so fit a representative, and he was welcomed as a genial and valuable member.

A constant attendant upon public worship on the Sabbath, in heat and in cold, in sunshine and in storm, and upon the other stated meetings of the church, he was ever the appreciative hearer and the faithful, yet unobtrusive friend and ally of his pastor. His presence in the social meetings was always much enjoyed, and his usually brief but beautiful remarks and prayers were prized by and helpful to both old and young.

His generous nature responded quickly to the various calls of charity and Christian benevolence, at home and abroad, and his gifts were only limited by his means. Of Puritan ancestry, orthodox in sentiment, and of sterling integrity, he was yet liberal and genial, eminently social, and a great lover of the beautiful in nature and art. These traits, together with his perfect transparency of character, secured the confidence and love of a large circle of friends. Meetyly helped by his lovely wife, both young in spirit, even in their old age, his house was a model Christian home, and the many friends, ministerial and others, who have enjoyed its hospitalities, ever carried away pleasant remembrances, and refer to such visits as among the happiest of their lives. Such a home could but leave a deep and abiding impression upon the pupils of the school, and most happily supplemented its otherwise superior advantages.

The golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Jones occurred in September, 1875, and was a most interesting and memorable occasion. The large attendance, numerous and elegant gifts from old pupils and friends, from far and near, attested the interest felt in the happiness and welfare of the venerable pair.

The names of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Jones are as follows: Frances Julia, born July 15, 1826, married to Rev. Thomas K. Beecher; Emily Ellsworth, born Nov. 8, 1827, married to Daniel J. Day; Eliza Webster, born Feb. 16, 1833, died in infancy; Henry Webster, M.D., born March 10, 1835, of Chicago, Ill.

Emily Ellsworth Day, deceased July 23, 1869, leaving one son, Robert Webster Day,—the only grandchild.

Mr. Jones was much interested in genealogical researches. He searched out and compiled the genealogies of the several branches of his own family, with great fullness and particularity. His library was rich in this department, and his reading and study enabled him to afford valuable aid to others, which he cheerfully rendered. He was a life-member of the New England Historical Genealogical Society of Boston, and a valued contributor to its publications.

Mr. Jones' positive religious convictions dated very early in life. He professed his faith in Christ at the age of twelve years, and united with the old Centre Church in Hartford, then under the pastoral care of Rev. Nathan Strong, D.D., for whose memory he ever cherished a reverent regard.

Though naturally self-distrustful, he possessed and maintained a strong reliance upon the truths of the inspired word, increasing each year of his life. His personal trust in the promises of God through Christ was unflinching, ripening most beautifully in his closing years, and rendering his end, though attended with extreme physical suffering, peaceful and happy. The sting of death was taken away. Though life to him here was pleasant, and this world and its relations beautiful and attractive, yet he felt that his work was done, and to depart and be with Christ was far better. Mr. Jones was connected with the Ministerial Association of Fairfield East, where, as also in frequent Consociational councils, his presence and co-operation were highly valued, and are beautifully attested by the following minute, extracted from the records of that body:

"Fairfield East Association in annual meeting, Park Street Church, Bridgeport, May 27, 1878.

"Whereas, The Rev. Henry Jones, of Bridgeport, for many years a member of this Association, rested from his labors, Nov. 9, 1878, in his seventy-eighth year,

"Resolved, That the Association holds in abiding remembrance the character of this departed brother and his services to his generation.

"His unaltered piety, his Christian kindness, his scholarly spirit and varied attainments, his fidelity to his matured convictions, and his diligence in the duties of his vocation, won for him the cordial esteem and the sincere friendship of all his brethren. They make this minute in devout and affectionate commemoration of him as an exemplary Christian, a brother beloved, and a true man."

FREDERICK WELLS PARROTT.

Frederick Wells Parrott, one of our oldest business men, was born in Bridgeport, July 25, 1807. His great-grandfather, Capt. Jedediah F. Wells, and grandfather, Jedediah Wells, were also residents of this town, the former being the original owner of the entire lower portion of this city (including Sea-Side Park), and the latter a soldier of the war of 1812.

Mr. Parrott, in 1827, at the early age of twenty years, commenced business as a manufacturer of furniture, and built the first sofa and hearse that was ever used in Bridgeport. It was while engaged in this business that his attention was directed towards the manufacture of varnishes, which he commenced in 1846, and laid the foundation for the present firm known as the Parrott Varnish Company, which was organized in 1869 by his associating with himself his son, Henry R. Parrott, and son-in-law, John D. Whitney. By strict attention to business and the manufacture of the best quality of goods, this industry has increased from a small beginning to its present large proportions. The increasing demand for their varnishes from all quarters of the globe has given them a world-wide reputation. Mr. Parrott has been in active business over half a century, and, so far as can be ascertained, is the only man now still in active life who was thus engaged. Fifty years ago! within this time the city and town, with its entire commerce, has passed into other hands, and has doubled and quadrupled and changed over and over again. Mr. Parrott has always been an active business man, taking great interest in local affairs and prominently identified with our municipal government, in the management of which he served as alderman, member of Council, and board of road and bridge commissioners. In all these departments he labored faithfully and diligently to subserve the best interests of the city, by his efforts to have its affairs conducted on strictly business principles. His best service to the town was undoubtedly as first selectman, which position he held during our late civil war. His stalwart Republicanism and unbounded confidence in the justice and final success of the cause made him a hearty supporter and worker in responding to the calls for recruits made by the general government, his plain, unassuming manner and strict business integrity enabling him to fill Bridgeport's quotas for troops rapidly and with great success financially. It would hardly be possible to find any one man so thoroughly identified with Bridgeport growth and progress during the last half-century.

He was married in 1827 to Miss Luella A. Remer, of Derby, Conn. At the golden wedding of this venerable couple, which was celebrated May 17, 1877, a pleasant feature of the occasion was the presentation by the Ladies' Charitable Society of a beautiful silver piece, for fruit and flowers, to Mrs. Parrott, she being one of the oldest living members, having joined it in 1828. The occasion was one of special interest and was a marked social event.

HON. SHERWOOD STERLING.

The Sterling family date their ancestry back to Jacob Sterling, who was born in England about the year 1677. He emigrated to this country and settled at Haverhill, Mass., a short time before the Indian massacre at that place. He fled to Cape Cod; later removed to Fairfield, and finally located in Stratfield (now Bridgeport). His children were Joseph, Jacob, John, Stephen, and Mary. Upon reaching maturity, John and Stephen located near their father, and Joseph settled in the town of Trumbull. Jacob settled at Newtown.

Stephen was born about the year 1712, and married Eunice Sherman. Their children were Abijah, Stephen, Jr., Sylvanus, and Eunice. Abijah located in Bridgeport and married Eunice Sherwood, and their family consisted of David, Daniel, Abijah, and Sherwood. David also located in Bridgeport. He married Deborah Strong, daughter of Joseph Strong, of Stratfield. Their issue were John W., David, George, Sherwood, Ann, Cornelia, and Cordelia.

The male line in the ancestry of the subject of this sketch died as follows: Jacob, Jan. 9, 1769; Stephen, 1792; David, June 15, 1843, aged seventy-three; and Abijah, June 19, 1862. Deborah, the wife of David, died March 10, 1849, aged seventy-three. She was the daughter of the Hon. Joseph Strong, who was descended in the following line: Selah and Thomas from Elder John Strong. The latter, who was born at Taunton, England, in 1695, sailed from Plymouth, England, March 20, 1630, and in the following May landed at Nantasket (Hull), Mass.

The subject of this sketch, Hon. Sherwood Sterling, was born in Bridgeport, May 23, 1803, where his entire life was passed. He married Jane Elizabeth Hawley, a lady whose mental and social worth endeared her to all who knew her. Their family consisted of twelve children, ten of whom survive.

Mr. Sterling was closely identified with all enterprises for the religious, moral, and material advancement of his native city. From his youth he was greatly interested in religion, and was always an active, energetic worker in the church, also practically exemplifying his profession in his daily life. He was deacon in the South Congregational Church from 1833.

At different periods of his life he was engaged in commerce, and was chiefly instrumental in establishing the Newfoundland and whale fisheries, which were successfully prosecuted for many years.

One of the originators of the Bridgeport Savings-Bank, he was president of that institution from 1864 until his death. He also held the office of president of the City National Bank at the time of his decease, having been elected in 1857.

In politics Mr. Sterling was an old-line Whig, subsequently a Republican, and though never an active politician,—avoiding publicity, and declining office unless convinced it was his duty to accept,—yet his advice was frequently sought and his influence felt in the councils of his party. He was mayor of the city in 1847 and 1848, and was repeatedly elected a State representative, serving with honor and marked ability during the troubled period of the war. He was intimately associated in council with the Hon. William A. Buckingham, then Governor of the State, who, relying upon his sound judgment and discretion, oftentimes advised with him during those gloomy and memorable days.

The iron business established by his father, David Sterling, in 1798, and in which Sherwood continued until within ten years of his death, still remains in a prosperous condition, conducted by his eldest son, under the old firm-name of "S. Sterling's Sons."

Sherwood Sterling inspired all with whom he came in contact with unbounded confidence in his common sense and uncompromising integrity. Possessing great energy and marked business ability, he was frequently selected to act as arbitrator, trustee, guardian, and advisor.

He was a man of fine presence, and commanded universal respect. Of exceptionally even temperament, probably no person ever saw him in an angry mood. Extreme suavity of manner and gentleness of demeanor characterized him at all times. "None knew him but to love him, none named him but to praise."

He died Oct. 31, 1869. Upon his decease resolutions of condolence were passed by the directors of the Bridgeport Savings Bank and City National Bank, also by the Board of Aldermen and Council of the city. One of the city papers, referring to his death, said, "He was a great and good man, honored by all who knew him."

His was an active and eventful career. Death at last laid his hand upon the strong man, and he passed to that higher life which he had endeavored to exemplify in his daily walk and conversation.

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth, e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour:
The path of glory leads but to the grave."

This eminent theologian and reformer was born in New London, Conn., Aug. 28, 1788. He graduated from Yale College in 1808, and at first determined to follow the profession of the law, but afterwards chose the gospel ministry. He was licensed to preach Sept. 24, 1811, but, feeling the need of further preparation, repaired to Andover for more thorough training. His first charge was the Presbyterian Church at Plattsburgh, N. Y., over which he was installed July 5, 1815. At that time Plattsburgh was but little more than a military outpost. Its rigorous climate told upon his health, and he was obliged to resign.

He was dismissed Oct. 2, 1817, and on the 14th of the following January was installed pastor of the Congregational Church at Fairfield, Conn., where he continued to labor half a score of years, rejoicing in a rich fruitage of souls born into the kingdom. He was bold in his warnings and denunciations against intemperance, and enlisted multitudes on the side of total abstinence. His fame spread abroad, and the American Temperance Society engaged his services. In 1827 he spoke in the principal cities of Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, and Pennsylvania, and organized many temperance societies.

On the 18th of the following December he was dismissed from his church in order to give himself more effectually to the work, and traveled far and wide for a number of years proclaiming total abstinence. The results were marvelous. Everywhere multitudes were convinced and converted, and without doubt what Luther was to the Reformation, Nathaniel Hewit was to the early temperance movement. After having thus successfully inaugurated this grand reformation, he returned to his first love, and Dec. 1, 1830, was installed pastor of the Second Congregational Church of Bridgeport, Conn.

On the 18th of May, 1831, he sailed for England to give impetus to the temperance cause in the Old World. He arrived in London June 28th, and delivered an address in Exeter Hall the next evening. On the 19th of July he assisted in the formation of the British and Foreign Temperance Society and then visited Paris, returning afterwards to London, and delivering addresses there and in Birmingham and Liverpool. In the fall of the same year he returned to Bridgeport and resumed his pastoral duties. For more than twenty years he ministered to his flock, his fame and influence as a theologian continuing to increase till he became known and felt as a power in the church.

In 1853 a division arose in his congregation in regard to procuring him an associate. A large number withdrew and formed the First Presbyterian Church, to which they called their "old, revered, and beloved pastor, whose ministrations they could not consent to forego." He was dismissed from his former charge September 21st, and October 31st was installed over the latter, where "he continued to preach the Word and feed the flock of God" till nearly fourscore years of age.

During all these years he retained his remarkable vigor. In stature more than six feet, of imperial form and visage, he bore the impress of a prophet. His intellect was gigantic, his voice of unequalled compass, power, and melody, and his eloquence unrivaled. During the theological controversies that for scores of years agitated the churches he bore a most decided part, holding fast to the Westminster standards. And yet, with all the courage of a soldier and always in the thickest of the battle, his heart was tender as a woman's, and he had the simplicity of a child. Though often subject to fits of despondency, in conversation he was most charming, and the seed sown by the magnetism of personal intercourse will continue to bear fruit through successive generations.

Dr. Hewit was twice married. His first wife, Miss Rebecca Hillhouse, of New Haven, died Jan. 4, 1831. His second wife, Miss Susan Eliot, of Fairfield, died May 1, 1857.

In the fall of 1858, having arrived at the age of seventy years, he tendered his resignation, which his people refused to accept. Four years later, April 1, 1862, he released his salary to the congregation, and in August of the same year Rev. Horace G. Hinsdale was called as associate pastor. To this colleague and successor he cordially handed over his charge, preaching occasionally, until on Sabbath morning, Feb. 3, 1867, he "fell asleep." Of the three children who survived him, one, Henry S. Hewit, M.D., late surgeon of the Army of the Cumberland, has since died; another son, Rev. Augustus F. Hewit, is one of the Paulist Fathers, of New York; the other, Sarah, the widow of the late William S. Bowen, M.D., surgeon U.S.N., resides in New Haven. A marble tablet to his memory, which was destroyed when the church edifice was burned in 1874, has been replaced in the new sanctuary by a handsome memorial baptismal font of carved stone, the gift of the children of the Sunday-school.

EZRA CURTIS.

Ezra Curtis was born in Monroe, Fairfield Co., Conn., Sept. 24, 1813, and died in Bridgeport Oct. 17, 1879. He was third child of Geo. P. and Sarah Curtis. His grandfather, Dr. Ezra Curtis, was widely and favorably known for his professional skill, as well as his probity and manly worth.

The ancestry of Mr. Curtis was of the English knighthood, and in the time of Charles I. "by grant under the Great Seal, reciting that search having been made in the Register and Records for the true and antient armes belonging to the Curtis name and family, and the same appearing by ould scales and other good testimony and proofs in the custody and keeping of Richard St. George, Clarencieux King of Armes, to be the proper and antient armes thereof, and which they did theretofore beare, they were to them and their issue and posterity in memory thereof forever ratified and confirmed, according to the law of armes and the custom of England." This coat of arms has been in possession of the American family from the early days when their ancestors emigrated from England.

Mr. Curtis was educated at the common and private schools of Fairfield County; learned the carpenter trade and engaged in business in New Haven, where he remained until 1847 or 1848, when he removed to Bridgeport, and in company with Asabel Lyon, his first wife's brother, established one of the first, if not the very first, lumber firms in Bridgeport, under title of Lyons & Curtis. The business was profitably conducted, and still continues as Lyon, Curtis & Co., S. M. Cate, Sr., and C. A. Grannis having been admitted as members.

Mr. Curtis was a man of far-seeing sagacity in business and practical in attention to details. He attended strictly to his own affairs, taking but few into his confidence, and never intruding himself into matters concerning others, except to quietly and effectually relieve such cases of suffering as came to his notice, and, in passing, we would here note that, although one of the quickest persons to respond to any call for aid, and a liberal contributor to church purposes, his generosity was not proclaimed from the house-tops, but desired by him to be known only by its results.

For years a member of the Baptist Church, he was universally acknowledged a good Christian man, who strived to follow his Master in all respects. He was a deacon for some time, and his counsels were sought and heeded in all important matters.

In the family circle he found his highest earthly pleasure, and was an affectionate husband and a loving father. He preferred the society of home to that of public life, and never would consent to allow his name to be put forward as a candidate for any public office, although from the time of the organization of the Republican party he gave it his vote and strongest influence. In all the relations of life Mr. Curtis did his work well, and the void caused by his death will not soon be filled.

Mr. Curtis married Miss Mary E. Lyon, of New Haven, in 1839. (She was sister of Asabel Lyon, so many years a partner of Mr. Curtis, and whose biography appears elsewhere in this work.) She died in 1867, leaving no offspring. He married, Oct. 6, 1869, Miss Mary Elizabeth, daughter of Robert and Elizabeth E. (Bishop) Ells, of Norwalk. Their only child, George Ells, was born Jan. 20, 1871.

CHARLES B. HOTCHKISS.

Charles B. Hotchkiss was born in the town of Waterbury, now Naugatuck, July 4, 1820. He received the rudiments of his education at the common schools of his native town and completed it at the Middlebury Academy. His father was a manufacturer of buttons and cloaks in Naugatuck, and at the early age of eighteen Charles B. assumed the management of his business. About this time experiments were being made at Naugatuck in the manufacture of rubber goods under the Goodyear patent, and the management of the business soon passed into the hands of Mr. Hotchkiss and two others, and it was conducted under the firm-name of The Naugatuck India-Rubber Company. It was continued with varied success about three years, when, in consequence of trouble with the Union Rubber Company of New York, the factory was closed. The establishment was subsequently, however, opened by Mr. Hotchkiss, who continued the business a short time, when he disposed of the whole concern to the National Rubber Company of New York, and, removing to New York City, took charge of the business of the Union Company, and in the following year superintended the erection of the present large factory owned by this company at Harlem, New York City. He remained in charge of the business in New York about four years, during which time he visited Paris to negotiate the sale of rubber patents, and soon after, an American company having decided to commence the manufacture of rubber goods in Paris and in other parts of France and Germany, he removed with his family to that city and took the entire charge of their foreign manufacture. His characteristic energy and determination displayed itself here, and about one year later he became a partner in the establishment, which was known as Hutchinson, Henderson & Co. The business increased with amazing rapidity, and the manufacture was not only carried on in Paris extensively, but large establishments were also located in Montargis and in Mannheim, Germany. Mr. Hotchkiss remained in Paris ten years, when he withdrew from the business, and, returning to his native State, located in the city of Bridgeport, where he has since resided.

Mr. Hotchkiss is a public-spirited citizen, and is interested in various enterprises both at home and abroad. In 1867 he purchased an interest in the Pequonock National Bank in this city, and was made its vice-president, and at the next annual meeting was elected president, a position which he has since held. He is still interested in the Union Rubber Company in New York; is a stockholder in the Tomlinson Spring and Axle Company, located at Newark, N. J., in the Derby Gas Company, and various other companies.

In 1879, Mr. Hotchkiss, in company with John Hurd, Esq., of Bridgeport, and Peter McFarlane, of Ewart, Mich., purchased the Ewart and Osceola Railroad, with the contract to put sixty million feet of logs into the Muskegon River. In addition to this they also purchased a large tract of pine timber-land and commenced operations at once, and up to August of the following year—a period of about nine months—have put into the river about fifty-three million feet of lumber, the largest business of the kind ever done by any firm in the State up to that time. They employ about four hundred men, forty pair of horses, and several yokes of oxen. Although the business is now of gigantic proportions, it will be largely increased during the ensuing year. Messrs. Hotchkiss and Hurd are now also prospecting for the purchase of a very large tract of timber-land located in Wisconsin.

Dec. 24, 1845, Mr. Hotchkiss united in marriage with Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Richard Hine, a native of Seymour, Conn., and their family consists of six children, three sons and three daughters,—viz., Edward M., who resides in Newark, N. J., and is treasurer of the Tomlinson Spring and Axle Company; Marie Louise, wife of John E. Parker, superintendent of a branch of the Meriden Britannia Company, located at Hamilton, Ontario; Nellie A., wife of F. A. Nickerson, superintendent of the Dickinson Hard Rubber Company, Springfield, Mass.; Emma A.; Charles L., who is also employed in the Dickinson Hard Rubber Company; and William L.

Politically, Mr. Hotchkiss is a Republican, and has been since the organization of that party. He was previously a Whig. He is an Episcopalian and a member of the vestry of Christ Church, in this city. Mr. Hotchkiss has never been an active politician, but has given his whole attention and energy to his business. He has a remarkable capacity for large business transactions, and is possessed of social and marked characteristics that make him esteemed by all with whom he comes in contact.

JACOB KIEFER.

Jacob Kiefer was born in Bavaria, Germany, in 1829. His mother died when he was but one year of age, and three years later (1833) he came with his father to this country.

He received a common-school education at Public School No. 7 in New York City, and in 1839 entered the service of Benjamin Mooney & Co., wholesale hardware merchants in Pine Street, as an apprentice. He remained with this firm about four years, when he commenced the manufacture of guitars in his father's cabinet-shop, under the direction of Signor Bini. The superiority of the workmanship and tone of the instruments made by young Kiefer soon attracted the attention of the musical public, and at the American Institute Fair, held in New York in 1846, his guitars received the first premium, and his competitors were among the best makers in the United States. His father having consented to give him his "time," he came to Bridgeport and began work as a journeyman cabinet-maker. Conceiving the idea of manufacturing furniture by the aid of machinery, in 1850 he commenced business on his own account in a small building, and with the use of steam-power manufactured furniture for his old employers. In 1852, in connection with several business men of Bridgeport, he organized the Furniture Manufacturing Company, and for several years he acted as superintendent and built up the largest furniture business in the Eastern States, employing four hundred hands. Since 1868 he has been the sole proprietor of this immense establishment, and the goods manufactured by him are known throughout the country as the standard of excellence.

Mr. Kiefer is a public-spirited and enterprising citizen, Republican in politics, and was reared in the Dutch Reformed Church.

SAMUEL CLAYTON KINGMAN.

Samuel Kingman was the son of John and Hannah Kingman, and was born in Hingham, Nov. 20, 1802, and settled in South Redding, Mass. (now Wakefield), in 1824, commencing business as a tailor, which occupation he followed for thirty years. In 1827 he was married to Sarah Ring Pope, daughter of Jesse and Annie (Hay) Pope. Their children now living are Abner Augustus, William W., Lucy Ellen, Charles E., Orlando P., Annie E., Arthur H., and Samuel Clayton, the subject of this notice. Samuel Kingman was highly esteemed in the community in which he lived. He served the nation, commonwealth, and town in various offices of trust and usefulness. He served as postmaster twenty-one years, as representative in General Court, as captain of the "Washington Rifle Grays," as selectman and assessor, and was justice of the peace for eleven years. His death occurred Nov. 23, 1880. His wife still survives him.

Samuel Clayton Kingman, the second son of Samuel Kingman, was born in South Redding, Mass. (now Wakefield), in 1830, graduated in the high school, and was the valedictorian of his class. The following year he spent at sea for the benefit of his health, after which he served his time as a machinist in the celebrated Lawrence Machine-Shop, with such apprentices as Amos Whitney, Joseph Marble, F. Higgins, and J. A. Taylor, after which he spent one year in the service of Col. Anderson, at the Tredegar Works at Richmond, Va. Upon his return he entered the employ of the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company, at Watertown, Conn., organized about that time, and still remains in their employ. He has invented a number of machines for the Company which have resulted in a great saving of labor.

Mr. Kingman was married in 1853 to Miss Emily Eustis Brooks, at Haverhill, Mass., a descendant of Governor Eustis. He has ever been a benefactor to the poor and sorrowing, and his gifts, with those of his companions, have been many. The bell of the Park Street Church, to which they belonged, memorizes the death of a soldier, friend, and brother, Albion D. Brooks, killed at Cold Harbor, June 3, 1864. The clock and communion-table presented by them attest their interest in the welfare of their church.

Mr. Kingman resides at Washington Park, in a delightful residence, surrounded by his family, which consists of his wife and five daughters. He has occupied many positions of public trust, and enjoys the confidence and esteem of the citizens of the city in which he resides.

THOMAS TILESTON WATERMAN.

In presenting a sketch of one whose activity in life was so remarkable, and whose career of usefulness extended over so large a field, a detailed narrative would be impracticable in a work of this character; but it is proposed to give the salient points in the life of one who was so long identified with the moral and religious interests of the territory treated in this work—the late Rev. Thomas Tileston Waterman.

He was born in Windham, Conn., Sept. 24, 1801, and four years later removed with his parents to ancient Stratfield, now the city of Bridgeport. He was prepared for college by his father, Rev. Elijah Waterman, and at Hartford, and was graduated at Yale in the class of 1822. He entered Yale with the purpose of becoming a lawyer, and was led to change his mind from a remark made by an irreligious companion. He studied theology with his father, and was ordained as pastor of the Richmond Street Congregational Church, Providence, R. I., Dec. 13, 1826, Dr. Lyman Beecher, then of Boston, preaching the ordination sermon. In 1837 he became pastor of the Fifth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. This pastorate continued until 1843, when he returned to Providence, and was installed over the Fourth Congregational Church, which soon after came to be called the Free Evangelical Church. After leaving this church he held pastorates in the Second Presbyterian Church at Galena, Ill.; in the Congregational churches at Winona, Minn.; Danielsonville, Conn.; Spencer, Mass.; and Monroe, Conn.

During Mr. Waterman's pastorate in the various churches mentioned above he preached the doctrines of grace, as taught in the Bible and expressed in confession of faith, with great freedom, earnestness, and power, and left a lasting impression upon the minds of his hearers. His oratory was at times peculiarly effective, and partook somewhat of the manner of an advocate earnest in presenting and pleading for a just cause. At such times his definitions, illustrations, and incidents were so used that he kept the attention with unflagging interest. In 1856 he had been preaching in a series of meetings at Beloit, and on the last Sunday evening had for his subject the immateriality of the soul. He had prepared the sermon for two discourses, but was compelled to deliver it as one. Soon after, Professor Fisk, in his rhetoric class, instanced to the theological students the delivery of that sermon as worthy their careful study, as it was such an unusual thing that a logical sermon of two hours in delivery would find a large and mixed audience regretting that it was ended.

Professor H. S. Osborn, LL.D., of Oxford College, Ohio, in speaking of Mr. Waterman, says, "The first acquaintance we made of the Rev. T. T. Waterman, was as pastor of the Arch Street Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. No man ever won the regard and warm-hearted confidence of the young men in that part of Philadelphia as he did; and at no period in the history of that church had the congregation shown so large an attendance of the young at its Sabbath and other public services. Mr. Waterman possessed an everlasting spring of enthusiasm, and it constantly overflowed. No one ever caught him unprepared to welcome a friend, sympathize with a stranger, or counsel, in the kindest way, an erring one; and his reproofs, when presented in the most earnest way of which he was capable, were always given so as to leave the impression of loving sincerity. During the writer's stay in Virginia, Mr. Waterman made a visit to that State, and at his invitation made a tour among the plantations. The influence of that visit was most remarkable. The contrasts of society and conditions of life were peculiarly great. The master and slave—the wealthy, educated, and aristocratic, and the poor, ignorant, and prejudiced, in splendid mansion or log cabin—were alike won to him. Persons who were haughtily opposed to all approach on the subject of religious suggestion or instruction were even delighted with his conversation upon the subject. Walking in some elegantly-arranged garden, with a party of gay young people, he could with the most charming adroitness and apparent fitness draw a momentary attention to some striking feature of design, or method of arrangement, in some plant, or flower, or shrub, and, with perfect poetry in his purpose, make a winning allusion to the infinite heart of love above all things."

"Mr. Waterman's personal appearance was in itself an introduction at once. His countenance expressed just what we have been describing in character. There was a kind frankness commingled with a sympathizing honesty and intelligent ability expressed in his face which put his hearers into a favorable mood to hear him and disarmed suspicion. He was peculiarly a preacher to the hearts of his audience, and, though at times his appeals to the reason were forcible and pertinent, his great strength lay more in the appeals to conscience, to the claims of duty, and to the emotions of heart, and in these appeals his earnestness, appositeness, and naturalness were singularly powerful. We have known him to address the roughest, ignorant, and almost brutally profane, suddenly, yet with such wisdom and efficiency as to change the man addressed into an apparent friend, and that during the utterance of an ordinary sentence.

"There are many now living whose memories turn from the recollections of many great speeches, eloquent sermons, and masterly intellectual efforts, to the memories of the wonderful power of Mr. Waterman's earnest, plain, and yet remarkable appeals to the heart, to his warm and sincerely beautiful pointings to the eternal Father and to the Saviour, and these memories are as pleasing as the lasting harmonies of those highest beauties with which his soul seemed always in sweet accord."

Politically Mr. Waterman was a Whig, subsequently a Republican, and a vigorous exponent of the principles of that party. He was a powerful champion of the temperance cause, and was practical in his efforts to check this unholy traffic. It is related of him that when he lived in Galena, Ill., the city had a large trade with the upper Mississippi River country, and it was the custom for the wholesale grocers to keep full supplies of liquors to fill the orders of customers, while they might deny that they were liquor dealers. One day one of his sons went into a large wholesale grocery on the levee, when the proprietor said to him, "Your father has just been here and given me a lecture on liquor selling. If it had been any one else I should have sent him off in short order, but you know he can say anything he pleases and one cannot get mad about it."

He possessed in a remarkable degree the power of adapting himself to people and circumstances individually his own. It is related of him that on one occasion he was making a journey of two or three days through Wisconsin. On the return the driver told an acquaintance, "That minister can go anywhere and do anything he thinks right, and the folks think it's all right too. You see, the first night out I didn't want to stop at the regular place, because I found there was going to be a dance there, but he insisted on stopping there. At last I told him of the dance, and that it wouldn't be pleasant for him, but he insisted; and, if you'll believe me, he actually had the fiddler play Old Hundred, got them all to singing, and at last made a prayer and went up-stairs."

William F. De Wolf, who was a law-student in the office of Mr. Burgess, in Providence, when he first began to preach in that city, says his first recollection of him was his coming into the office and standing for over an hour at the book-case reading, and remarking, as he closed the book, "Upon many points it is important that a minister should know the common law." It was not an unusual custom for him thus to visit the law-office.

Senator Carpenter relates that upon one occasion he was in his office, where a young man was reading for the profession. During a brief conversation he remarked that he trusted in his studies he would recognize the claims and merits of the religious law of the soul. The young man replied he was so occupied with his studies that he had no time for religious subjects. Mr. Waterman said to him, "Young man, you will never know civil law enough to rule out the law of your soul."

In speaking of his power as a Christian worker, an article published in the Congregationalist in 1873 says,—

"About the year 1826 or 1827, Dr. Lyman Beecher having become the pastor of Hanover Street Church, Boston, revivals of religion were frequent, and a new energy in religious things was developed. Especially the May anniversaries in Boston, as also in New York, began to assume new importance, to command the attendance of multitudes, and to awaken a much higher measure of interest than had characterized them before, or than has attended them for a few years just past. This year Rev. T. T. Waterman, then pastor of the Richmond Street Church in Providence, lately deceased, was invited to spend the sabbath, immediately preceding anniversary week at Boston, in that city. He acceded to the proposal, and in three different churches preached a sermon on the especial duties of Christian residents in cities.

"At each delivery attention was marked. The subject was much talked of through the week, and continued to be a theme for remark in conversation and in religious journals for subsequent months. By special invitation, this discourse was repeated in several cities, and the name of the young pastor of Providence became at once well known through New England and the Middle States. I have reason to think that this sermon had appreciable influence in preparing the way in later years for labor in cities to save young men and young women, and for the introduction of the whole work of Christian Associations."

While Mr. Waterman excelled as a sermonizer and a pulpit orator, and was engrossed in the multifarious duties of an active pastorate, still he found time to indulge the poetical promptings of his nature, and the poetry of his soul found vent in many sweet and sacred songs, which clearly indicate that the bent of his mind in this sphere also was of no ordinary cast. The following beautiful lines are from his pen, entitled "The Thrill at Parting:"

"Repress! No, I would not, that thrill of the soul
Which saddens the moment of parting with friend;
That thrill, 'tis the strength of affections which roll Down the current of time, 'till partings shall end."

"That thrill—let it come, in the night of its power;
It bids us look upward and onward for peace;
It hails the glad promise, and welcomes the hour
When the sorrows of parting forever shall cease.

"O then, when in Heaven, what emotions will rise,
As hearts which are holy in fellowship rest;
Nor distance, nor absence, nor tears reach the skies,
Nor farewell is heard in the home of the best.

"Then cease thy repining, and chase away gloom,
By faith 'look adoft' where attachments abide;
Our Jesus has triumphed o'er sin and the tomb,
And by parting, we meet to be one at His side.

"This thought, then, shall cheer us when far and away
'Mid the changes and sorrows of life we are driven,
We shall soon meet above, and in ecstasy say—
There was nothing below like the friendship of Heaven.

"The friendship of Heaven!—by blood 'tis made sure,
Everlastingly strong its raptures shall roll;
It is union with God and the hearts of the pure,
In the bosom of Jesus—the home of the soul."

Dec. 11, 1827, he united in marriage with Delia, daughter of Dann Storrs, a native of Mansfield, Conn.,

JAMES D. FRARY.

James D. Frary was born at Meriden, Conn., Sept. 20, 1832. He remained with his father, who was a manufacturer of britannia ware, until he was sixteen years of age, when he went to New York City as clerk in the hardware business. Here he remained until 1852, when he returned to his father's factory, taking charge of the business. He was one of the organizers of the Meriden Britannia Co., Jan. 1, 1853. In the following year he disposed of his interest, and purchased the stock of the Meriden Hardware Co. Jan. 1, 1855, he became one of the firm of Frary, Benham & Co., manufacturers of powder-flasks, shot-pouches, game-bags, and a general assortment of sportsmen's goods. In the spring of 1857 he sold his interest to a new company, known as the American Flask and Cap Co., located at Waterbury, Conn., and removed to that city. He returned to Meriden in the fall of the same year, and formed a company known as Frary & Co., subsequently Frary, Cary & Co., manufacturers of hardware. This company was consolidated in the spring of 1861 with the Dann Storrs, mentioned above, was the grandfather of the Hon. O. S. Seymour and Mrs. George C. Woodruff, of Litchfield Hill, Conn.

The Watermans trace their ancestry in this country to Thomas Waterman, who came with his family to Plymouth, Mass., in a very early day.

His son Thomas married Elizabeth Allen, of Grotton. They lived at Norwich, and died in their ninety-fifth and eighty-ninth year, respectively, having lived together sixty-eight years.

His son Nehemiah married Sarah Gifford.

His son Nehemiah married Susannah Isham, of Colchester.

His son Elijah married Lucy Abbe, of Windham, whose son was the subject of our sketch. Mr. Waterman died in Stratford, Conn., Aug. 7, 1873, aged seventy-one years.

Landers & Smith Manufacturing Co., at New Britain, Conn., and the name changed to Landers, Frary & Clark, manufacturers of general hardware and cutlery.

In spring of the year 1876, Mr. Frary removed to Bridgeport, Conn., and organized the Frary Cutlery Co., for the manufacture of table cutlery. To this manufacture was added, in July, 1879, the making of pocket cutlery and razors. At the beginning of the business there were about one hundred persons employed. The business has rapidly increased, and at the present time the establishment gives employment to seven hundred and sixty-nine.

Mr. Frary is a public-spirited citizen and a thorough business man. Politically, he is a Republican, and was a member of the Legislature in 1868. Dec. 22, 1852, he united in marriage with Miss Helen A. Peck, of Berlin, Conn. Their children have been as follows: James P., Harry L., Cora A., and Grace R., all of whom are living except James P., who died at Meriden in the spring of 1861. R. Tomlinson

THERE is no prouder or more enduring personal record than the story of a self-reliant, manly, and successful career. It declares that the individual has not only understood his duty and mission, but fulfilled them. The following biography is highly suggestive of these facts.

Russell Tomlinson, now a leading manufacturer of Bridgeport, Conn., was born at Southbury, in that State, April 5, 1807. His father was a mechanic, and worked and owned a mill forge at Oxford, but died in 1819, when Russell was only twelve years of age. From the age of eight years he had lived about on the neighboring farms. At fifteen he went to Amenia, in Dutchess Co., N. Y., where he labored on a farm during the summer months, and worked in a blacksmith-shop in winter and at night. Not being well treated by his employer, he left and located in Salisbury, Conn., on what is known as the old Salisbury Ore Hill, where for two years he worked at blacksmithing for the miserable pittance of fifteen dollars a year and board, clothing himself from his earnings. About 1827 he joined one of his brothers, who had established a small factory for making carriages at Bridgeport. He was engaged here for some time at the then wages of one dollar and a quarter a day. At this time I. & L. Shuman had a branch of their saddlery and carriage business at Columbia, S. C., and, knowing young Tomlinson to be a popular and intelligent workman, made an engagement with him to go to that place, and take charge of the blacksmith-shop. He went there, but remained only one winter, when he returned to Bridgeport. He was shrewd enough to see that the best opportunities for success in business were in New England. He opened a small shop, where he attended to blacksmith work of different kinds and made carriage-springs. Having now accumulated the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars, he closed up his affairs in Bridgeport, and went to Derby, Conn., where he built a shop, and carried on the manufacture of carriages in a small way. He continued in this for three years, when he sold out and found himself the possessor of fourteen hundred and fifty dollars. Returning to Bridgeport, he bought a steam-engine, and worked for a year or two making axles and sawing timber. By this time his brother's carriage business had grown into considerable importance, and was conducted under the firm of Tomlinson, Wood & Co. He bought half of his brother's interest, and Mr. Wood sold half of his interest to a brother, thus making four in the firm. Mr. Tomlinson was a member of this firm for about fifteen years. During this period it established a name over the whole country for the manufacture of all descriptions of carriages. This branch of manufacture has given to Bridgeport much of its importance. The business of Tomlinson, Wood & Co. was conducted in all its departments with great judgment and success. Mr. Tomlinson at length sold his interest, and retired from said business. Not being satisfied with a life of ease, he next turned his attention to the organization of a company for the manufacture of springs and axles, which was in the year 1852. The present flourishing Tomlinson Spring and Axle Company, of Bridgeport, is the result of these efforts. In 1867 he resigned the presidency of the Naugatuck Railroad, an office which he had held for a number of years. The year 1863 saw him elected to the Legislature of Connecticut. In 1878 he was elected to the Senate for two years, and by a vote of the Senate was appointed to fill the position of chairman of the State prison committee, which place he held for two years. He has also filled nearly all the different offices in the municipal government of the city and town of Bridgeport, and during the whole period of the late war was the active and efficient agent of the town in raising troops for the Union army. Though still interested in business enterprises, he has withdrawn from active participation in them. He resides in a fine mansion on Golden Hill, a beautiful locality of Bridgeport. Mr. Tomlinson was a large contributor to the building of Christ Episcopal Church, one of the finest edifices of Bridgeport, which is located in the same select neighborhood. He has always exhibited a great deal of public spirit, and aided in every possible manner the growth and improvement of the city in which he lives. Mr. Tomlinson is about of the average height, and equally proportioned. His face shows intelligence, foresight, and decision as the chief elements of his character. He is practical and reflective in all things, and, when once his plans are formed, is diligent and obstinate in their speedy and complete execution. His success in life has been achieved by economy and industry in its earlier stages, and by a prudent and skillful management of large business interests at a later period.

He has gained nothing by mere luck, but everything by well-digested plans, and the intelligent appreciation of his energies to the end in view. In social life he is a gentlemanly and affable person, and there is a considerable vein of humor in his composition which adds very much to his companionable qualities. His business ability and integrity and popularity have placed him in the first rank of the successful manufacturers and valuable citizens of New England.

John Brooks

CAPT. JOHN BROOKS, son of John Brooks and Mary Coe, was born in Stratford, Sept. 18, 1795. His grandfather on the maternal side was Ebenezer Coe, of Stratford, who was a captain in the war of the Revolution. He was in the vicinity of Dunbury when it was burned by the British, and lost an eye at the battle of Ridgefield, where the lamented Wooster was mortally wounded.

The subject of this sketch attended school at the old Stratford Academy, which was then under the control of David Plant, subsequently judge of Probate and Lieut.-Governor of Connecticut. In 1810 he was taken to New York City to live with John Vanderbilt. In 1811 he went as clerk with Gershom Smith, a grocer in Peck Slip, but, not being adapted to that business, he left the establishment, and soon after the breaking out of the war of 1812 came home.

About this time Elisha Wilcox built a sloop called the "Arab," to run as a packet between here and New York, and, knowing well the sterling qualities of young Brooks, offered to make him its commander. He accepted the position, and at the age of eighteen years Capt. John Brooks commenced his long career as a steamboat commander. He sailed the "Arab" until 1814, when he was transferred to a sloop owned by his father, called the "Intrepid." In 1815 he was captain of the regular packet "Patriot," owned by Beach & Peck, and in 1816 of his father's sloop called the "Mary Ann." In 1817, Capt. Brooks formed a copartnership with the late Isaac Sherman which lasted about two years.

He continued in charge of one of the line of packets plying between Bridgeport and New York until 1821, when he became captain of the "John Marshall," a steamboat plying between New York and Norwalk. He remained here but one year, and then took charge of the steamer "United States," plying between New Haven and New York, and soon became captain of the "S. B. Hudson," a fine boat built by Montgomery Livingston to run on the Hudson River, but was then plying between New York and New Haven. We next find Capt. Brooks in command of the "Franklin," a steamer running between New York and Poughkeepsie, and in 1827 of the "Governor Wolcott" on the same line. A few weeks after assuming command of the "Governor Wolcott," the boat was chartered by Capt.

Vanderbilt to run to New Brunswick. While running on this line he lived with Mr. Vanderbilt as one of his family. About this time, the winter of 1826-27, he made the acquaintance of Capt. Cornelius Vanderbilt, which soon ripened into a warm friendship which lasted as long as Mr. Vanderbilt lived.

He subsequently commanded the "Emerald," running between Norwalk and New York; the "Bellona," running to New Brunswick; the "Thistle," from New York to New Brunswick; the "S. B. Baltimore," from New York to Norwalk; the "Nimrod," and the "Westchester." Capt. Brooks' long and active business career closed in 1861, when he retired with a competency, and has since lived in the enjoyment and peace of a happy home. Capt. Brooks has a strong individuality and strength of character. Like his friend and collaborer the late Com. Vanderbilt, he was possessed of an indomitable will, which triumphed over all obstacles.

Capt. Brooks never allowed his multifarious business cares to interfere with his duty to Him who had given life, strength, and prosperity, and has ever been a faithful Christian. He was originally a member of the North Congregational Church of this city; subsequently became one of the founders of the South Church, from which he with others seceded and united in organizing the First Presbyterian Church.

Politically he is a member of the Republican party, and has been an earnest exponent of its principles since its organization. He was previously a Whig.

Oct. 14, 1817, he united in marriage with Maria Hawley, a native of this town; hence it will be seen that this venerable couple have enjoyed the marital felicity of more than three-score years.

A prominent characteristic of Capt. Brooks is his benevolence; charitable and religious objects ever find him ready to contribute with his counsel and his means. Warm-hearted and generous, no worthy poor were ever turned empty-handed from his door. He has ever manifested a decided interest in religious matters, and has contributed liberally, and almost lavishly, to the various churches with which he has been connected. He is a kind husband, a devoted friend, and an upright citizen. Although Capt. Brooks is now an octogenarian, he retains in a remarkable degree the vigor and elasticity of youth.

the war of the Rebellion. During the year 1866 he was assistant editor of the Waterbury Daily American. In 1867 he again resumed the practice of his profession in Bridgeport, which he has continued until the present time in connection with his other duties. From 1869 to 1871 he was judge of the City Court of Bridgeport, and in 1875 representative to the General Assembly. The present year (1880) he is city attorney for Bridgeport.

He was married Jan. 11, 1856, to Caroline Amelia Redfield, of Clinton, Conn., who died Nov. 5, 1865. The result of this union is Alice Redfield, born Oct. 2, 1856, and Lester Burchard, born Sept. 25, 1860. In 1868 he married for his second wife Lydia Ellen Nelson. CHAPTER XV.

BROOKFIELD.

Early History—First Town-Meeting—Parish and Church Organizations—Schools—Burial-Places—Military Record—Representatives—Selectmen.

IN respect to most of the rural towns and smaller communities of New England, back of all recorded history there was a period of formation and incipient growth, interesting, doubtless, in its incidents, but not subject-matter of accurate knowledge to the present generation. No chronicler having certified the facts transpiring or preserved even the names of the great majority of those who bore part in the life that was lived, and traditions handed down being very unreliable evidence of what actually took place, little can be spoken of which is not conjectural, and the most satisfaction we can have in the study of the period is that a field is thus opened for the "pleasures of imagination."

Brookfield is no exception to this general rule. There were beginnings of days and dawns of history concerning which we must consent to remain much in ignorance. Could we successfully interrogate the years of dimness and uncertainty reaching backward from the time when the first settlers of the town (settlers of the English stock) built here their homes and here began their endeavors for thrift and comfort, we should find much, it is easy to believe, which, by its novelty and other elements of interest, would well reward our investigation.

The aboriginal inhabitant doubtless had here his rude cabin, his ties of love and hope, and his rudely-constructed civilization. Doubtless, by the side of Still River and the Housatonic he dextrously cast the spear and threw the hook for fish, trapped by Beaver Brook, and pursued on plain and hillside fur-clad or savory game, the evidence of this being a few Indian names not yet obliterated—as "Whisconier" and "Pokono"—here and there an arrow-head or other stone "relic" picked out of the furrow with a few faded legends, as of the maiden of "Lover's Leap."

Precisely who these aboriginal dwellers were in respect to their tribal connection, how numerous they were, and whither they went are all matters which lie much in the haze of the unchronicled period to which allusion has already been made. The probability is that they were an outlying portion of an Indian settlement, two hundred warriors strong, at New Milford, where a somewhat distinguished chief or sachem, Werauhamaug by name, held his seat of government, and where there are still pointed out Indian burial-places and a neighborhood on the western bank of the river known as "Indian Field." But this is scarcely within the limits of veritable history.

When first brought into a separate organization for local purposes, as the support of schools and churches, the place took to itself the name of the "Society or Parish of Newbury,"—the name derived, presumably, from Newtown and Danbury, adjoining towns, from which, as will be subsequently seen, the society was largely taken,—and under this appellation it continued from its first organization, in 1754, to the time of its incorporation with town privileges, in 1788,—a period of thirty-four years.

Newbury (now Brookfield) was constituted of portions of three adjacent towns,—viz., New Milford, Newtown, and Danbury, these portions meeting at a common centre near the present residence of Mr. Abel Sherman. A rock, now blasted away, lying within limits now inclosed in Mr. Sherman's doorway, was recognized at the "bound-stone" between these different towns, and of course the different sections of the newly-constructed society.

With reference to the first settlers who planted here their homes, opened the school-house, and set up the altars of religion, it is not now possible to designate them so clearly as perhaps their enterprise and worth deserve. Tradition affirms that they came here from the town of Milford. They were probably induced to settle here from the fact that some of their kindred and townspeople had previously located in Danbury and New Milford. They who came to these neighboring communities not unlikely reported to their former neighbors and friends, as the children of Reuben and Gad did concerning the land of Gilead, "Even the country is a land for cattle," and, allured by the prospect of pecuniary advantage, as well as being in the immediate vicinity of former friends and acquaintances, they came hither into what was comparatively a new country and kindled their home fires.

Exactly when this first settlement took place it is difficult now to determine, there being no authentic record, although, in an old historical sermon preached in Danbury at the beginning of the present century by "Thomas Robbins, Candidate for the Gospel Ministry," it is asserted that "the first settlement of Danbury was begun in the summer of 1684," and elsewhere the statement is made: "The western part of the town, called 'Miry Brook,' and the eastern part (which now comprises a part of the town of Brookfield), were settled within a few years after the Centre," the centre of Danbury being evidently referred to.

New Milford was settled in 1707, and Newtown still earlier; so the inference is warranted that a pioneer population was here not long subsequent to 1700, perhaps still earlier than that, in the Danbury portion of the society.

It is equally difficult to determine accurately who the first settlers were; but from the earliest dates found upon tombstones in the various cemeteries, and from some other sources of information, it is evident that among the earliest dwellers in the place were Tibbals and Jared Baldwin, whose homes were on Long Meadow Hill, near the school-house; Samuel Merwin, whose residence was where Noah Taylor, deceased, lived; Deacon Matthew Baldwin, who lived a little south of Mr. Edwin Smith's; Samuel Sherman, who lived near where Mr. Abel Sherman now resides; and Deacon Amiel Peck, who lived at the corner just east of the Merwin Brook crossing.

Among the earlier, if not the earliest, inhabitants were also Mr. John Dunning and Deacon Michael Dunning, the last of whom came to his death under peculiarly sad circumstances. On his return from a religious meeting one night to his home, now known as the "Benham" place, by some mishap he fell into his own well, and was either drowned or killed by the fall.

Mr. Henry Peck, the Dibbles, of Bound Swamp, and the Smiths and Hurds, of Whisconier, were also early in the field.

The Society of Newbury was, by an act of General Assembly, incorporated as a town in 1788, Mr. Amos Wheeler acting as the society's agent in carrying its memorial to the Assembly and obtaining the act of incorporation. It would seem, from the repeated efforts of the society in this direction before the final success was achieved, that either the people were unduly ambitious for manhood before they had gotten their growth, or else that the then lawmakers of Connecticut, wise and conservative men as they doubtless were, were chary of allowing upstart societies to "put on airs" and have their ambitious notions gratified too hastily. Application was made for town privileges as early as 1772, and the purpose prosecuted through successive years before many sessions of the Legislature until the final victory over opposition, as already stated, in 1788. Hope deferred and endeavors made through sixteen years would certainly indicate a good measure of will on the part of the men then active. It is just a little more than possible that Danbury, Newtown, and New Milford knew something of the reasons why the success was so long in coming.

THE FIRST TOWN-MEETING.

The first town-meeting was held on June 9, 1788, and was moderated by Col. Samuel Canfield, who was appointed by General Assembly to "warn" the meeting and preside over its doings. It was evidently regarded as quite an event in the history of the place, and interest was felt in it even in the surrounding towns, as shown by the following vote passed at the meeting:

Voted, Thanks to the gentlemen spectators from the neighboring towns for the respect shown to the town of Brookfield in attending their first town-meeting, and in particular return thanks to Col. Samuel Canfield, Esq., appointed next moderator for said town of Brookfield by the General Assembly, for his care and service in said office."

The following-named persons chosen at this meeting had the honor of serving the town as the first selectmen: Lieut. Martain Warner, Capt. Joseph Smith, Capt. Ezra Dibble, Mr. Amos Wheeler, and Capt. Richard Smith. Elijah S. Starr was elected as the first town "clerk."

The name of the town seems to have been adopted as a tribute of respect to the first pastor of the place (for the entire town was under his ministrations and pastoral care). Brook's field easily was converted into "Brookfield" as the permanent designation of the place.

Being thus incorporated as a separate town, the people soon appreciated the need of a town-house, their meetings for business for the first few years being generally "warned" to meet at the "Sign Post," and being thence adjourned either to the "meeting-house," a school-house, or to some private residence.

At an adjourned meeting held on Dec. 22, 1794, it was voted "That this town build a house the ensuing year for the purpose of transacting all business in," "that said house be built thirty-four feet long and twenty-four feet wide, two stories high," and "that said house be built convenient for hanging a bell upon." The committee appointed to superintend the building were instructed by vote of the same meeting "to procure the most convenient place near the meeting-house for setting the town-house upon," and the selectmen were authorized to "draw orders upon the town treasurer to the amount of the expenses of said building."

The lower portion of this house was finished and "seated" two years afterwards, so as to become available for town purposes, the upper part remaining unfinished until a later period. A bell was placed upon this house in 1795, and was replaced by another—the one now in use—in 1829.

The house, thus built and appointed, served the annual gatherings of the freemen of the town until the summer of 1875, when, after a somewhat protracted and heated controversy, mainly in respect to the location of the proposed new building, it was torn down, and the present more comely and commodious structure was built upon its foundations.

PARISH AND CHURCH ORGANIZATIONS.

In New England, in "the days of old," there was a mingling, as there is not now, of church and town history, of ecclesiastical and civil affairs. In the meeting of the freemen tax levies were raised for the "support of the gospel" and ministers were chosen. Especially the Congregational Church—the church of the "Standing Order," as it was called—was cared for, every legal voter being responsible for pecuniary support and having a voice in its affairs.

Parish and church organizations, therefore, must be taken into account in any complete town history, as should be the case also on the ground that the Church and the sanctuary are such important factors of influence and destiny in any community.

There is no record now available by which can be ascertained when religious services began to be held in Newbury, or the exact date when the ecclesiastical society was organized.

We may naturally suppose that in the first years of their settlement the people worshiped in the towns to which they respectively belonged,—some at Newtown, where a church was organized in 1715; some at New Milford, where a church was gathered in 1716; and some in Danbury, where the first church began its existence in 1696. It is to be presumed that for some time after separation from these churches the people gathered in private houses for their Sabbath-day devotions,—the people, for these were times in which all held it their duty and their privilege to be worshipers on the Lord's day.

A book of society records, supposed to have been lost, but recently recovered, makes it certain that the society was in working order so early as 1755, and two years later—viz., in 1757—the church was organized, the only account of the event being the following entry in the records of Consociation: "A number of this society that came well recommended from neighboring churches appeared before this council, gave their consent to the Saybrook Confession of Faith and Platform of Church Discipline, unitedly consented to a church covenant, and as members of a church gave a unanimous 'call' to Mr. Brooks to be their minister, to which he gave his consent." In this somewhat informal way the living temple began here to be builded. All the facts of its early history have passed beyond present knowledge by reason of the fact, much to be regretted, that no church records were kept prior to the settlement of Rev. Richard Williams, in 1807.

As already indicated, the earliest Sabbath-day services were probably held in private houses, perhaps at the residence of Joshua Northrop, Amos Northrop, or Peter Hubbell, where it is a matter of record that society meetings were frequently convened for business purposes.

While a sanctuary was being prepared the ark of the Lord rested in the "house of Obed-edom;" and we shall not hazard much if we believe "the Lord blessed the house of Obed-edom and all that pertained unto him because of the ark of the Lord."

But a change was at hand: the long-felt need for a church edifice was to be met. "At a lawful meeting, Jan. 21, 1755, of the inhabitants of the established religious society of Newbury, more than two-thirds of the inhabitants of said society then present and qualified by law to vote declared it necessary to build a meeting-house," and either because of differences of opinion concerning the site upon which to build, or through desire to avoid future divisions such as are very likely to grow out of locating public buildings, they made application to the court of Fairfield County "to appoint and fix the place whereon the meeting-house should be erected and built," and the court thereupon appointed a commission "to fix the place." For reasons not stated, the recommendations of this commission were negatived by the court.

In the following April the court took still further action in the case, and a new commission was appointed, consisting of Increase Mosely, Benjamin Stiles (?), and Gideon Walker, all of Woodbury, in Litchfield County, who were empowered "to fix a place whereon to set a meeting-house." The doings of this commission were accepted by the society and approved by the court, and so the place of the sanctuary was "fixed," and with it doubtless the place of the village itself; and if so, the wisdom of the commissioners must have been more clear to themselves than in the judgment of succeeding generations.

In December the society made appointment of a building committee, and took action with reference to the finances of the undertaking. It was also voted that the structure should be "forty-six feet in length and thirty-six feet in width, and that the posts should be twenty foots long." The committee were further instructed "to get cedar shingles, if they can be attained to, to cover the fore-side of the ruff, and chestnut for the back-side, and to cover the upright with oak 'clapboards.'" This building seems to have been simply "covered in" at the first, and to have been used for a period without seats other than benches carried in for temporary convenience, and even without a floor, except of loose boards, on which these benches were placed. Seats and pews were introduced into the building in 1759, four years after its erection. In 1769 it was voted that "the society will oyl and cutler the winders and doors and corner-bords," and a committee was appointed with power "to git and preener oyl and stuef to fulfill the said vote." Four years later galleries were added to the accommodations already existing. The house was internally improved with "plaster" in 1790, and was externally shingled upon "both sides and each end." The structure was at first without a steeple, and this was added in 1824, after the house had been occupied nearly seventy years, though a bell was never mounted upon its deck, the town-house bell, after its purchase, being used for calling the people together for religious services.

Evidently the spirit of improvement was not of very rapid development. The house of the Lord thus builded piecemeal, as we might say,—a kind of accretion of the prayers and endeavors of two entire generations,—gathered the worshipers beneath its roof until 1854, an entire century, lacking a single year, from the time when its foundations were laid, when it was taken down and the edifice now occupied by the Congregational Church and Society was erected upon its site.

This first meeting-house built in the town was a structure in what may be called the barn-style of architecture, having a door upon the south side and each end, east and west, with a pulpit on the north side, opposite the main entrance, over which was the old-fashioned "sounding-board" with the "deacons' seat" beneath.

It was creditable to the good taste of the people, and reflected somewhat their good habits at home, that a tax of thirty shillings was assessed annually for the purpose of defraying the expense of sweeping the meeting-house, the sweeping to be done by some competent person "once in three weeks nine months in the year, and once a month for the three winter months." Evidently the people in those times were believers in the sentiment, "Cleanliness is next to godliness."

The house now occupying the same site was dedicated April 12, 1854, the sermon being preached by Rev. Mr. Churchill, of Woodbury, and the dedicatory prayer being offered by the pastor, Rev. Mr. Curtiss. The bell now (1880) in use was purchased the same year.

Quite relevant to what has thus been recorded of the houses of worship occupied by this parish will be some account of its ministry.

In September of 1755 the society voted "to have the gospel preached amongst us," and likewise "to invite Mr. Josiah Sherman, a candidate, to preach the gospel on the Sabbath in this society, to join with New Preston for the term of time as may be agreed upon." It would thus appear that at first there was preaching but part of the time, probably on alternate Sabbaths, and for this service the society paid "fifteen shillings prock or old tenor," or its equivalent in provisions, per Sabbath.

The arrangement of filling the pulpit by supplies as they could be secured continued for about two years, when the society, at their meeting, "manifested their unanimous desire to have a gospel minister settled among them," and a committee was appointed "to crave the advice and direction of the reverend members of the association in so important an affair."

As a result of such advice, or without regard to it, as the case may have been, at a meeting of the society held in June, 1757, it was proposed to vote "whether we will choose ye worthy Mr. Thomas Brooks, who preached with us on probation, to be settled as our minister and pastor," and it was voted in the affirmative, the church, organized three months later, as we have seen, uniting in the "call." The provision made for his pecuniary support was a "settlement" of one hundred pounds, to be paid in three yearly installments, and for yearly salary forty-five pounds for three years, with addition afterwards of forty shillings each year until the amount should be fifty pounds, this sum to be a permanent allowance. This financial basis being mutually satisfactory, on Sept. 28, 1757, the young candidate was duly ordained and installed as pastor of the church and society, Rev. Ebenezer White, of Danbury, preaching the sermon, and Rev. Jedediah Mills, of Huntington, offering the ordaining prayer.

It is creditable to the memory of Pastor Brooks that his ministry continued through a period of forty-two years, and that the people, as already seen, permanently associated his name with the place as the name of the town. He is remembered by a few persons still living as a man small in stature,—a Zacharias whom Jesus called,—of fair abilities, and of somewhat marked eccentricities, especially absent-mindedness, and a somewhat quick and uncontrollable temper. As evidence of the first of these characteristics, the well-authenticated anecdote is told of him that on one occasion, when he had worn for his comfort two pairs of stockings to a meeting of Consociation, in the morning, when dressing, he was unable to find but a single stocking. His delegate, however, Mr. Henry Peck, coming to his assistance, shortly ascertained that the four stockings were all upon one foot. And, as an illustration of the last peculiarity mentioned, it is told of him that, meeting with provocation from a parishioner, overmastered by his impetuous spirit, he seized hold of the offender and caused him to shake in a manner somewhat different from that in which the Philippian jailer did in the presence of Paul.

This first pastor, on account of impaired health and growing infirmities, was relieved from the active duties of his office (whether formally dismissed or not is uncertain) in 1796, and reached the end of his pilgrimage three years afterwards.

On an unpretentious gravestone in the "Hawleyville" Cemetery there is the modest record:

"In memory of Rev. Thos. Brook, who departed this life Sept. 13, 1799, aged 80 years.

Mors nili vita est.

(Death to me is life.)

O mortal, wander where you will.

Your destiny is cast:

The rising stone and verdant hill

Proclaim your destiny at last."

The subsequent pastors of the church, with their periods of service, have been as follows: Rev. Erastus Ripley, November, 1800, to November, 1801; Rev. Richard Williams, June, 1807, to April, 1811; Rev. Bela Kellogg, January, 1813, to October, 1816; Rev. A. B. Hull,* October, 1819, to October, 1820; Rev. Abner Brundage, May, 1821, to October, 1839; Rev. Dan C. Curtiss, October, 1843, to October, 1855; Rev. Thomas S. Benedict, April, 1859, to September, 1862; Rev. P. Hollister, December, 1862, to December, 1864; Rev. F. Munson,* April, 1865, to 1868; Rev. A. C. Pierce, October, 1870.

It is in evidence that the "service of song in the house of the Lord" was duly regarded by the early worshipers of the town that frequently in the records there is statement of special arrangements made for instruction in singing, the town making appropriations of money to defray the expense, and under date of Dec. 24, 1792, there is the entry:

* Those thus marked stated supplies, but not pastors.

"Total, That Mrs. Ebenezer Blackman, Isaac Northrop, Capt. Joseph Ruggles, Sergt. Hezekiah Stevens, Junr., Nehemiah Barlow, and Amiel Peck be a Committee to mention a number of old Psalm tunes, and to see that said tunes are taught in the singing-school now taught in this town by Capt. Thair."

It has seemed proper that this somewhat extended account should be given of the church first organized in the town,—which was the religious home of all the people for more than a generation, and which was the mother church as related to others subsequently organized,—and proper also that Pastor Brooks, as the first minister and the one whose memory is perpetuated in the name of the town itself, should have more extended mention than those who were subsequent laborers in the same field.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH

But other churches and other ministers have had their place in the history of the town, and are well entitled to a page in the make-up of its historic record.

Almost from the first formation of the society or parish, of which an account has just been given, there were persons residing within its limits whose sentiments affiliated with other forms of worship, as evidenced in the fact that so early as 1757 a vote was passed to memorialize the General Assembly for a "land-tax of twopence on the acre of all ye uninclosed land in Newbury, exclusive of lands of Church-of-England men residing among us." It is said that occasional worship was held within the parish boundaries after the Church-of-England type while yet in its civil state the country was in colonial relations, the ministrations probably furnished from Newtown, where an Episcopal parish was organized in 1734.

On Jan. 21, 1785, thirty-five persons, all of whom were males, lodged a certificate with the clerk of the Congregational parish, declaring themselves "to belong to the Episcopal Church," and it is presumable that at about this time separate worship as a regular weekly appointment began, though the first parish meeting, the records of which have been preserved, was not held until 1789.

A movement was made—so, at least, it is said—for a house of worship for the accommodation of those of Episcopal preferences some four years before the Revolution, and the frame of a building was actually reared. But it was never covered in, and finally disappeared, the war bringing defeat to this, as to so many other enterprises.

After the war, though at what precise date it is perhaps now difficult to determine, an edifice was built for Episcopal use upon the triangular spot midway between Mrs. Lucy Northrop's residence and that of Mr. Sherman Foote, where services were held until 1837, when the parish entered the more commodious house still occupied, though in the mean time enlarged and otherwise greatly improved.

The ministrations of the Episcopal pulpit and parish have been conducted as follows: By the rector, Rev. Philo Perry, from 1785 (or 1786) to 1798; Rev. Daniel Burhans, D.D., 1798 (or 1799) to 1812; Rev. Benjamin Benham, 1812 to 1828; Rev. Joseph S. Covell, 1829 to 1836; Rev. Mr. Shimeal, 1836 to 1837; Rev. David H. Short, 1838 to 1839; Rev. Edward C. Bull, 1839 to 1842; Rev. Edward J. Ives, 1842 to 1844; Rev. Henry D. Noble, 1844 to 1858; Rev. J. E. Goodhue, 1863 to 1869; Rev. Levi B. Stimson, 1869 to 1872; Rev. Frank B. Lewis, 1872 to 1873; Rev. Frederick A. Fiske, 1873 to 1876; Rev. E. L. Whitcome, 1877.*

The occasional services held, as already stated, prior to the organization of the parish were probably largely conducted by Rev. John Beach, of Newtown, who went over to Episcopacy from the ministry of the Congregational Church in 1732.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

At the time the old house of worship standing on the triangle in front of Mr. Sherman Foote's was abandoned for the new edifice, in 1837, certain Methodist brethren residing at the "Iron-Works" and in the neighborhood united with others of like views living at Southville, and, forming one society, purchased the old Episcopal meeting-house, and there continued services for nearly twenty years, when a portion of the worshipers resumed their separate status at Southville, and the remaining portion began to hold services at the "Iron-Works" village in the edifice now (1889) occupied by the Reformed congregation.

With varying experience the feeble society here held on its way until, by removals from the place and the death of members, its strength was exhausted, and as a separate organization it became extinct in 1865, or at about that date.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH

On Sept. 23, 1846, the Baptist meeting-house, so called, was opened for public worship by exercises appropriate to the occasion, and on the 12th day of November following the "First Baptist Church of Brookfield" was constituted, a society of affiliated sentiments having been in existence since 1843. On the 2d day of December delegates from other churches were present for the public formal recognition of the new organization, and at a "covenant-meeting" held December 5th Elder William Biddle was called to be the first pastor of the church, which office he held until September, 1854, when, at his own request, he was released from his official connection, though even to the end of life he was intimately identified with the interests of the church, and was constant in his labors on its behalf.

Additional to services rendered by him the church has been under the pastoral supervision of Elders Ganning, Shove, Wilson, and Chapman.

THE REFORMED CHURCH.

The Reformed Church began its organic life in 1869 as a mission enterprise under the auspices of the Classis of New York.

Rev. S. W. Roe, Rev. Ransford Wells, D.D., Rev. F. E. Allen, and Rev. F. M. Bogardus have served the church in the ministry.

SCHOOLS.

By a kind of law of association, in New England at least, the mention of schools is closely connected with that of churches, and a sketch of Brookfield would be incomplete without some mention of this kind. The fathers were not indifferent to the need of facilities for a higher grade of education than that furnished by the common or district school, and, accordingly, not unfrequently in the town records there is statement of special appropriations from the treasury for the support of "select schools" or to facilitate in some way higher grade instruction. Thus, under date of April 4, 1799, the selectmen of the town were empowered to pay forty-five dollars for finishing the upper room in the town-house "for the purpose of keeping a school in the same," and it was also voted "that a committee of two persons from each school district in the town be appointed as a joint committee to hire a teacher to teach school in the upper room of the town-house, and to regulate such school."

Private enterprise has also engaged in the same laudable purpose. In 1840, Mr. Edward Robbins opened a school at the "Centre" which assumed flourishing proportions, and was continuously kept up for about ten years.

In 1858, Rev. Henry D. Noble, being measurably disqualified for the services of rector of the parish, conceived the idea of establishing a high-class boarding-school for boys, and entered with his accustomed energy upon the accomplishment of the plan. "St. Paul's School for Boys" was the result, and was carried on with growing prosperity until interrupted by his sudden death, which occurred Sept. 14, 1868.

Shortly after this Madame Booraem opened a private school for lads and misses, which continued, with varying patronage, until 1878.

It should be mentioned in this connection that, in 1795, Widow Mary Northrop, at her decease, left for the benefit of the town an estate of which one hundred and forty-seven pounds four shillings sixpence was in the form of promissory notes, and the proceeds of this estate have been regularly devoted to the interests of education, for a portion of the time being expended in the maintenance of select schools, and at other times being divided among the several districts as partial support of the district schools. At the present time the interest of this fund—known as the "Molly Money"—is counted in as part of the public-school money, and is divided among the districts.

BURIAL-PLACES.

It will not be inappropriate that some reference shall be made here to the burial-places to which the departed have been borne as the six generations dwelling here since the first settlement of the town have lived and died.

The Newbury fathers, while united for ecclesiastical purposes, seem to have maintained, not unnaturally, something of the town feeling, and hence the cemetery on "the plain" for the New Milford portion of the society, that by the railroad-track, below Mr. David Northrop's, for the Danbury portion, and that near Hawleyville for the Newtown portion, while a spot marked by a few remaining stones by the side of Hop Brook, on the left of the road to "Obtuse," was a resort for those having no preferences, but looking only to convenience as to distance. The cemetery near Mr. Beman Fairchild's, that known as the "Central," west of Still River, and the one at the "Iron-Works" were of later beginning.

In the burial-place referred to by Hop Brook there stands a slab erected "To the memory of Mr. Henry Baldwin, drowned April 4, 1798," with this somewhat singular poetic inscription:

"Here lies interred a blooming youth;
He lived in love and died in truth.
Call, and behold, as you pass by,
As you are now, so once was I;
As I am now, so you must be;
Prepare to die and follow me."

For the benefit of such as are always looking into the past for the golden, and upon the present with disparagement, in this connection it may be stated that within the memory of some now living, on funeral occasions within the town, liquors were provided for the "bearers," and as the procession moved, here and there on the route, when the "bier" was changed from the shoulders of one set of men to those of another, the bottle, carried by an attendant, was passed around to strengthen the men helping in carrying the dead. Surely, there is some progress!

The history of a place is inclusive of its outgoing influences, as well as of events which transpire within its boundaries. Emigrant sons and daughters are important factors, therefore, which must not be left out of the account, and of these the following should be enrolled: Rev. William A. Hawley, Rev. William Dibble, Rev. Bennet F. Northrop, Rev. Beebe Stevens, Rev. Oliver Taylor, Rev. Oliver St. John, and Rev. Frank Lobdell. Mr. Samuel Ruggles and Mrs. Lucia Holman, missionaries of the American Board, were also natives of the place. Besides these, a long list might be added of non-professional persons who in various secular relations and pursuits have "obtained a good report."

MILITARY RECORD.

Though no distinguished names or exploits adorn the war record of Brookfield, yet this department of its history is not altogether barren of incident, and there are names which ought not to die out of memory, because they who bore them were willing to hazard life for their country's safety.

When the Revolutionary war broke out it found here a company of militia already organized, which did service under Maj.-Gen. Wooster, and probably was present when he received his death-wound at Ridgefield.

It is represented by the older citizens, who gathered their information from the fathers, now passed away, that when Governor Tryon, of "blazing memory," burned Danbury, great excitement swept over Newbury, and that many of the people, their patriotism stirred by the words of good Pastor Brooks, rushed to the aid of their Danbury neighbors; also that in another stage of the conflict royal troops were for a little time quartered here.

In the war of 1812 a "draught" was served upon the people here, and, additional to the men thus raised, Lieut. Ruggles enlisted a company of volunteers, the whole being sent to New London for active duty. But the perils of these men were more dreadful in anticipation than in reality, and their exploits of war were not of such account as to cover either themselves or their country with imperishable glory.

In response to the call of the country for the suppression of the Rebellion, fifty-seven men enlisted from Brookfield, serving for a longer or shorter period, of which number two—Albert Clark and Frank Benson—were killed in action.

The full roll of enlisted men, as they appear upon the books in the State archives, is as follows:

Charles S. Smith, Charles B. Steward, William Turrell, Edwin Wheeler, Samuel Magee, Rockwell H. Smith, Harmon Edgett, Theodore Jackson, Abner H. Johnson, Patrick Sullivan, Benjamin Stebbins, Leonard D. Wilkinson, Frank J. Benson, Charles T. Delevan, Joseph Mabblocks, Charles Hayes, Lemuel Peck, Hanford N. Bassett, William R. Hamlin, George W. Anthony, Lewis J. Ives, Henry W. Soley, Gilbert H. Campbell, James W. Hamilton, Frederic A. Bennett, McAllister Craig, Charles H. Clark, Thomas Sherman, Tallman Simons, William F. Banks, Edwin H. Nearing, Frederic E. Nearing, William Stebbins, Frederic A. Osborn, Edward A. Osborn, Zenus L. Dibble, Daniel Briggs, James H. Case, Edward H. Northrop, Marcellus B. Pishon, Allen Rogers, Clarence Smith, George Squires, Jonathan T. Salmon, Joseph H. Canfield, Daniel McKimmon, Timothy T. Turrell, Albert Clark, John Triel, Joseph C. Goldsmith, William Hamilton, Thomas Hoye, William D. Hoyt, William H. Hawley, Booth Lattin, John S. Prentice, Thomas Prentice.

Ten died while in the service; their names as follows:

The most noteworthy items of Brookfield history have thus been passed in review. In closing such a record the thought is quite natural, "How much there is of unwritten—never to be written—history!" and the thought also, "The generation now living is making history for those who shall come after, and how important that the record, when filled out by some as yet unknown chronicler, shall be spotless and aglow with honorable incident and names to be held in abiding respect!"

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

AMOS L. WILLIAMS.

Dr. Amos L. Williams is of Welsh descent, his ancestors coming to America and settling in New England at an early day.

His father, William Williams, was a native of Lebanon, New London Co., Conn., who followed farming, and took to wife Miss Lydia Loomis of Lebanon. Salmon L., William C., Lydia, Harriet, Gilbert, and Amos L. were the names of their children.

Amos L. Williams was born Jan. 11, 1811. His father died when he was but seven years of age. He remained with his mother until he was sixteen, when he took up his residence with his brother, Dr. William C. Williams, at that time a practicing physician in Roxbury, Conn. He remained two years, teaching the district school in the winter, and reading medicine in his hours from school and during the remainder of those two years. In the winter of 1831-32 he attended a course of medical lectures in New Haven, and in March, 1832, was licensed to practice. Locating in Greene Co., N. Y., he practiced there a few months when he removed to Brookfield, Fairfield Co., Conn., where he has lived and followed his profession since March 1, 1833. Eight years afterwards, in 1840, he attended a course of lectures and graduated at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia.

Oct. 16, 1833, he married Miss Sarah J., daughter of Daniel and Lucy (Gregory) Holley, of Brookfield. The children born to them have been Ellen F., Julia G., William H. H., and Florence H.

It may be truthfully said of Dr. Williams that he is a self-made man. Commencing the practice of his profession under adverse circumstances, he has, by careful study and close attention to his professional duties, won for himself the position of trust and honor which he now occupies.

EZRA W. WILDMAN.

Ezra W. Wildman, son of Edward and Anna A. (Bennett) Wildman, was born Dec. 2, 1818, in New Fairfield, where his parents were temporarily residing, having lived in Brookfield prior to and returning there soon after Ezra's birth.

Edward Wildman pursued the calling of farming. He was married to Anna A., daughter of Stephen and Hannah (Lucy) Bennett, of Brookfield, by whom he had seven children. Ezra, the eldest son, lived with his father, attending the district school and assisting in the farm-work, until reaching the age of nineteen, when he began the business of manufacturing curriers' knives with Mr. Tomlinson in Brookfield. At the age of twenty-one he entered into partnership with Mr. Tomlinson and his uncle, Mr. John F. Bennett, and did business under the firm-name of D. Tomlinson & Co. This connection lasted until the "big freshet" in 1853, which carried away the firm's dam, when, Mr. Tomlinson retiring, the firm became Bennett & Wildman; the dam was rebuilt and business resumed. In 1867, Mr. Wildman sold his interest in the establishment, and devoted his time to farming.

In February, 1841, Mr. Wildman married Miss Harriet, daughter of Hiram Barlow, of Bridgewater, Conn. Their children were Emily M., Sarah E., Laura A., Henrietta E. His first wife dying in 1850, the following year he married Miss Sarah J., daughter of Albert and Hannah (Rusco) Stevens, of New Canaan, by whom he has had the following-named children: Harriet N., Henry S., Josephine, Ida C., and William E.

The family of Stevens are of English origin. Albert Stevens was a public educator, devoting a long life to the arduous calling, teaching in Patterson, Vista, and elsewhere.

In politics, Mr. Wildman is Republican. He is an attendant at the Reformed church, Brookfield, of which Mrs. Wildman and several of the children are members.

CHAPTER XVI.

DANBURY.

Geographical—Topographical—Robbins' Century Sermon—Original Name—Pahquoque—The First Settlers—Date of Settlement—The First Physician—First Survey of the Town—The Patent—"John Reed, the Lawyer"—First Probate Judge—The Pioneer School. The Revolution—First Public Library—Ecclesiastical—Sketch of Mr. Robbins—Danbury in 1770—Last of Inhabitants in 1793.

DANBURY lies in the northern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by New Fairfield; on the east by Brookfield and Bethel; on the south by Redding and Ridgefield; and on the west by Ridgefield and Putnam Co., N. Y. The surface is diversified with hills and valleys, and the soil is fertile.

In presenting the history of Danbury it is deemed advisable to reproduce, as introductory, a century sermon delivered by Rev. Thomas Robbins, A.M., Jan. 1, 1801, wherein was embodied many facts bearing upon the early history of the town which can be obtained from no other source. Mr. Robbins was at the time temporarily supplying the pulpit of the Congregational Church. He was an enthusiast in matters of historic lore, and in the language of Mr. Bailey, of the News, "He builded better than he knew, and delivered a sermon that will live as long as Danbury itself has an existence."

THE SERMON.

"The original Indian name of this place was Pahquoque. The first settlement of this town was begun in the summer of the year 1684. The settlers came that year and began some improvements in buildings, sowing grain, and other things necessary. Some of the families moved here that summer, and continued through the winter; others did not move till the spring following. It may therefore be said that the first permanent settlement was made in the spring of the year 1685, by eight families. The names of the men were, Thomas Taylor, Francis Bushnell, Thomas Barnum, John Hoyt, James Benedict, Samuel Benedict, James Beebe, and Josiah Gregory. They lived near together, at the south end of Town street. Beginning at the south end, Taylor, Bushnell, Barnum, and Hoyt lived on the west side; the two Benedicts, Beebe, and Gregory on the east. All except James Beebe came from Norwalk, he was from Stratford. They purchased their lands from the Indian proprietors. Mr. Taylor had seven sons, from whom all of that name now in town descended. Mr. Bushnell had a family of seven daughters, but no son. There have therefore been none of the name in this town since, only as it is still borne up in several Christian names. Mr. Barnum had five sons, from whom are the families of that name. Mr. Hoyt left six sons, who are the ancestors of the families of that name now living. Mr. James Benedict left three sons, from whom are a part of the Benedict families which survive, particularly those in which the Christian name James frequently occurs. His eldest son James was the first English male child born in town. The sons of Samuel Benedict were four. From them are those families of Benedicts in which the Christian name Samuel is often found. Soon after these first families settled here, Daniel Benedict, a brother of the other two of that name, came and became a settler. He was not one of the first, as has been supposed. He left but one son, Daniel.† From him are the families in which that Christian name is often found, of whom there are as many families now in town as from either of the others. Mr. Beebe had two sons,—James and Samuel. From his two sons sprang the families of Beebes now in town. The sons of Samuel moved to Litchfield, and afterwards began the settlement of the town of Canaan. Mr. Gregory had two sons, from whom are the numerous families of that name."

THE FIRST PHYSICIAN

"One of the first settlers after the first eight families was Dr. Samuel Wood, a regular-bred physician, born and educated in England. Able and skillful in his profession, he was very useful in the town for many years. From him are the families of that name now in town.

"Mr. Josiah Starr came to this town from Long Island soon after its first settlement. He had six sons, from whom the many families of that name have descended. Joseph Mygatt, from Hartford, afterwards married Elizabeth, daughter of Benjamin Starr, eldest son of Josiah, and settled in this town, from whom are the families of that name. The families of Picket, Knapp, and Wildman are ancient families in the town, the latter of whom are now very numerous. Some of the grandsons of the original settlers are now living. Mr. David Taylor, of Westton, and Mr. David Benedict, of this town, are grandsons of Mr. Thomas Taylor. Mr. David Shove is a grandson of Mr. Bushnell. Capt. Comfort Hoyt, Thaddeus Benedict, Esq., Mr. Isaac Benedict, and Mr. Joseph Beebe—the two latter of Bethel—are grandsons of the first settlers Hoyt, the two Benedicts, and Beebe. Mr. Abel Barnum, who died about a year ago at New Fairfield, was the last grandson of the first settler Barnum. The last grandson of the first settler Gregory was Samuel Gregory, Esq., who has been dead about eighteen years."

FIRST SURVEY OF THE TOWN.—THE PATENT.

"The first settlers, having purchased their lands of the Indian owners, became proprietors of the town. The town was surveyed in February, 1693, by John Platt and Samuel Hayes, of Norwalk. The survey bill declares the length to be eight miles from north to south, and the breadth six miles from east to west. At the session of the General Assembly in May, 1702, a patent was granted, giving town-privileges to the inhabitants and proprietors of Danbury. The patentees named are James Beebe, Thomas Taylor, Samuel Benedict, James Benedict, John Hoyt, and Josiah Starr. In this act the boundaries were fixed according to the former survey.

"The first justice of the peace who was appointed was Mr. James Beebe. The first town clerk was Mr. Josiah Starr. For many years after this time there were Indians living in town, who held their lands separate from the English people by known bounds. It does not appear that they were ever troublesome. But in the time of the wars, which were in the early part of the century, in which the French used great exertions to excite the enmity of the natives against the English settlements, it became necessary to provide some means of security. The house of Mr. Samuel Benedict, at the southeast corner of the street, and the house of Rev. Mr. Shove, on the eminence near where the two former meeting-houses stood, were placed in a posture of defense. When they were apprehensive of danger all the families used to repair to these two houses, especially nights. But it does not appear that they ever had any serious alarm. In October, 1708, it was enacted by the General Assembly that garrisons should be kept at Woodbury and Danbury if the council of war should judge expedient. It thence follows that this was then a frontier town. But we have no account that any garrison was ever maintained here at public expense.

"The western part of the town, called Mary Brook, and the eastern part, which now composes part of the town of Brookfield, were settled within a few years after the centre. Many parts in the middle of the town which are now very fertile and prolific were considered by the early proprietors as not worth cultivation. Some of them, therefore, went from four to seven miles for land to raise their ordinary crops.

"One of the early inhabitants in this town was John Reed, a man of great talents, and thoroughly skilled in the knowledge and practice of the law. He possessed naturally many peculiarities, and affected still more. He is known to this day through the county by many singular anecdotes and characteristics under the appellation of 'John Reed the Lawyer.' The first representative from this town to the General Assembly was Mr. Thomas Taylor. He was for many years a careful man in the town, and died January, 1735, aged ninety-two. He continued the longest of any of the first settlers. The second justice of the peace was Mr. Josiah Starr. He held the office but a short period. He died Jan. 4, 1715,* aged fifty-seven. The next to him in office was John Gregory, son of Judah Gregory, one of the first settlers. James Beebe, Jr., was successor in office to his father, who died April 22, 1728, aged eighty-seven. It is noticeable that James Beebe, the father and the son, each bore the several offices of justice of the peace, captain of the militia, and deacon of the church. The father, having commanded the military company of the town for many years, said to be thirty, on his resignation led them to the choice of a successor, which fell upon his son. The fifth justice of the peace was Thomas Benedict, son of James Benedict, a first settler. Samuel Gregory, son of John Gregory, the former justice, was next appointed to that office. The next to him was Comfort Starr, youngest son of Josiah Starr, Esq. These seven justices of the peace are all that have been in town prior to those now living.† It is worthy of remark that in five instances that office has been sustained by father and son. The town clerks have been, in succession, Josiah Starr, Israel Curtis, Thomas Benedict, Thaddeus Benedict, Major Taylor, and Eli Mygatt. The Probate district of Danbury was established by act of Assembly, October, 1741. It then contained the towns of Newtown, Ridgefield, New Fairfield, and Danbury. Redding and Brookfield have since been added. Before that time this town belonged to the district of Fairfield. The first judge was Thomas Benedict, Esq. He held the office until his death, in 1775. The present judge‡ was then appointed.

¶ Comfort Starr, Esq., who died May 11, 1763, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, left to the town a donation of eight hundred pounds, lawful money, for the support of a perpetual school in the centre of the town: to be under the direction of the civil authority and selectmen, the instructor to be capable of teaching reading, writing, arithmetic, and the Latin and Greek languages. In the general wreck of paper currency during the Revolutionary war, the fund depreciated to the sum of four hundred and eighty-eight pounds twelve shillings and nine pence, which now remains. In April this school was converted into a 'school of higher order,' agreeably to an act of Assembly passed May, 1798. A sketch of this school from the beginning has been lately written, which was copied off by several of the pupils, which they are again requested to preserve as a valuable memoir.

¶ At an early period in the town, of which the year cannot now be ascertained, a malignant nervous fever prevailed by which numbers of the inhabitants died. Aside from that, there never was any prevalent epidemic in the town till the year 1775; in that year a dysentery raged with great fury in all parts of the town. The number of deaths in the town during the year was about one hundred and thirty, of which eighty-two were within the limits of the first society. Says Mr. Baldwin, in his Thanksgiving sermon of that year, 'No less than sixty-two have been swept away from within the limits of this society in less than eleven weeks the summer past, and not far from fifty in other parts of the town. Much the greater part of this number were small children. A terrible blow to the rising generation.' A remarkable fact occurred that year. A military company of about one hundred men was raised in town and ordered to the Northern army, on Lake Champlain. When they went it was viewed by their friends as next to a final departure. At the conclusion of the campaign they all returned safely, and found that great numbers of their friends at home had sunk in death. The disorder subsided before their return.

¶ The town was again visited by the same disorder in the year 1777, but it was far less malignant and mortal than before. In the autumn of the year 1789 the influenza spread through the country. This town was visited in common with others; few persons escaped the disorder, yet in very few instances was it mortal. In the following spring, 1790, the same disease again spread abroad; it was less universal and much more severe than before. Many of the persons died of it in this and most of the towns through the country. In the years 1793 and 1791 the scarlet fever spread considerably, but was not mortal but in a few instances. The smallpox has never been but little in this town, and there are now

THE REVOLUTION.

¶ In the latter part of the year 1776 the commissioners of the American army chose this town for a deposit of a quantity of military stores. Large quantities of flour, meat, and various kinds of military stores were collected and deposited here. In April, 1777, Governor Tryon, of blazing memory, set out from New York with a detachment of two thousand men for the purpose of destroying the Continental stores in this town. They landed at Campo Point, in the town of Fairfield, and marched without interruption directly to Danbury. There was in the town a small number of Continental troops, but without arms. They with the inhabitants generally withdrew from the town as the enemy approached. The enemy entered the town on Saturday, the 26th of April, at about three o'clock in the afternoon. They soon began those cruelties and excesses which characterize an unprincipled and exasperated enemy. Several persons were inhumanly murdered. One very valuable house, with four persons in it, was burnt immediately. The utmost inhumanity was committed upon all except the persons and property of the Tories. The next morning, before the King of Day had arisen, the unhappy inhabitants who remained in the town saw the darkness of night suddenly dispelled by the awful blaze of their dwellings. The enemy, fearful of their retreat being cut off, rallied early on the morning of the 27th, set fire to the several stores and buildings, and immediately marched out of town. Nineteen dwelling-houses, the meetings-house of the New Danbury society, and twenty-two stores and barns, with all their contents, were consumed. The quantity of Continental stores which were consumed cannot now be accurately ascertained; accounts vary considerably. From the best information which can be obtained, there were about three thousand barrels of pork, more than one thousand barrels of flour, several hundred barrels of beef, sixteen hundred tents, two thousand bushels of grain, besides many other valuable articles, such as rum, wine, rice, army-carriages, &c. The private losses were estimated, by a committee appointed for the purpose, sixteen thousand one hundred and eighty-four pounds seventeen shillings and ten pence.

¶ Gen. Wooster, Arnold, and Silliman immediately collected such a party of inhabitants as they were able, and effectually annoyed the enemy on their retreat to their shipping. A spirited action was fought at Ridgefield the same day they left this town, in which Maj.-Gen. Wooster received a mortal wound. He was brought to this town, died on the 29th, and was interred in the common burying-place. Congress resolved that a monument should be erected to his memory, and made the necessary grant; the charge was committed to his son, who has never fulfilled it. His grave still remains, and probably ever will, without a stone to tell posterity where he lies.

¶ Notwithstanding the public loss of this town, it was still used as a deposit for Continental stores through the war. A guard for security was maintained the whole period. A great hospital was also kept in this town from March, 1777, till the termination of the war, in which great numbers died. In the autumn of 1778 a division of the army, consisting of four brigades, under the command of Gen. Gates, was quartered in this town for a few weeks. Small detachments of the army were here occasionally afterwards.

¶ The people of this town were united in one society till the year 1754. At that time a part of the town, with a part of the towns of New Milford and Newtown, was incorporated a society by the name of Newbury. The society of Bethel, which is wholly in this town, was incorporated by act of Assembly, October, 1759. In May, 1761, a small part of the town, with a part of the town of Ridgefield, was incorporated a society by the name of Ridgebury."

FIRST PUBLIC LIBRARY

¶ A public library was established in this town in the year 1771, which afterwards consisted of about one hundred volumes. In the conflagration of the town the books, except a few which were out, were consumed. It remained in such a mutilated state till March, 1795, when it was dispersed. In January, 1793, a number of inhabitants formed and signed a constitution for a library company; one dollar and seventy-five cents was paid on each share, and led out for the purchase of books. An annual tax, generally of half a dollar upon a share, has been regularly applied for the purchase of books, judiciously chosen. The library now contains two hundred volumes; should the same care in enlarging and preserving it continue, it promises to be a respectable and useful collection. A library was founded at Bethel about the year 1793, which now contains one hundred volumes, and is increasing.

Dr. Ramsey's account of the losses in this town is certainly far short of the truth.

"By an act of the General Assembly passed in May, 1784, this town was made a half-shire of the county of Fairfield. From that time to this the courts have met alternately in Fairfield and Danbury. A court-house and jail were built in the town, with some assistance from the neighboring towns, the year following; the sum of three hundred and eighteen pounds was raised by a tax, the remainder by subscription. In the year 1791 the first jail was consumed by fire, after which a second one was built, more valuable and secure. The expense was defrayed by the product of a lottery.

"A census of this State was taken in the year 1796. We know of no earlier enumeration of the inhabitants having been made. At that time the whole number was 130,611; the number in Fairfield County was 20,560; the number in this town was 1527. Another census was taken in January, 1774. The State then contained 197,836 inhabitants; the county of Fairfield, 30,130; the town of Danbury, 2526. By the census of 1790 the population of the State was 237,916; the number in Fairfield County was 36,230; in this town it was 3029. This was after the town was diminished by the society of Newbury being incorporated a town. In the census of the year past, returns from the whole State have not been made; the county of Fairfield is found to contain 38,160, and the town of Danbury 3274 inhabitants. The number of towns in the State in 1796 was 73; in 1774 it was 76; in 1790 it was 98; in 1800 it was 106.

"A printing-office was established in this town in March, 1790. A weekly news-print has been regularly published from that time to this, on demi-paper; it has generally been, as it is at present, respectable for good principles and information. The number of papers issued at first were but one hundred; there have been as many as two thousand; the usual number has been about one thousand. In June, 1793, a second paper was published in town, which continued several months.

"We now proceed to relate in a concise manner a sketch of the ecclesiastical history of the town. The time when a church was first organized in town cannot be exactly determined; it was probably at the ordination of the first minister. The first minister in this town was the Rev. Mr. Shove, a very pious and worthy man, who was very successful in his exertions for the promotion of peace, virtue, and true religion; so that the general peace and union in his time are proverbial at this day. He was ordained in the year 1596, and died Oct. 3, 1755, aged sixty-eight.* The town was destitute of a settled minister but a short time. In a few months the church and people, in great harmony, invited Mr. Ebenezer White to settle with them in the ministry. He was accordingly ordained March 10, 1736.† Universal harmony prevailed between the people and their minister for more than twenty-five years. The people of the town were considered by all the neighboring towns as eminent for morality and religion, for regularity of conduct, and for constant attendance on the institutions of Christianity, though it is to be lamented that there has never been any special revival of religion in this town from the first settlement. In the great awakening which spread through the land in the years 1740 and 1741, which was probably the most signal effusion of divine grace this country has ever experienced, this town was mostly passed over. In the great revival of religion in two years past, in the northern part of this State and many other places, which is doubtless the greatest display of divine grace, excepting the one before mentioned, which has taken place in this country the past century, this and the neighboring towns seem to have possessed no share. These considerations call for serious consideration and humility.

"It is supposed, on good grounds, that the first meeting-house was built prior to Mr. Shove's ordination; its dimensions were about forty feet in length and thirty feet in breadth. It is remarkable that after the frame was raised every person that belonged to the town was present and sat on the sills at once. The second meeting-house was built about the year 1719; its dimensions were fifty feet in length and thirty-five feet in breadth. In 1715 an addition of fifteen feet was made to the whole front of the house. About the year 1762 religious controversy began in this town, and was carried to a great extent for many years. It is presumed that in no town in this State has there been more religious contention than in this. It is hoped that the flame is now mostly buried, never to break forth again.

"At the time above mentioned, Mr. White having altered his sentiments and preaching in several particulars, some uneasiness arose among his people. The efforts of several ecclesiastical councils to heal the division proving ineffectual, it finally issued the dismission of Mr. White from his pastoral charge, March, 1764 †. A major part of the members of Mr. White's church joined with him in denying the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical councils and renouncing the form of church government established by the churches in this State. The remaining part, who signified their adherence to the ecclesiastical government, were established and acknowledged by the two Consociations of Fairfield County, convened in council, as the First Church in Danbury. Soon after this Mr. White and his adherents separated from the church and society and formed a separate church; they were generally denominated 'Mr. White's adherents.' In October, 1770, a number of the inhabitants of the town individually named in the act, principally those who composed this separate church, were incorporated a society by the name of 'New Danbury.' Prior to this they built a good meeting-house, its dimensions about fifty feet by forty, in the year 1768, which was consumed in the general conflagration of the town. In the same year Mr. Ebenezer Russell White was ordained a colleague with his father over that church.

"In the year 1761, Mr. Robert Sandeman, a native of Perth, in Scotland, a man of learning, of great genius and art, and, according to his views of divine truth, a man of strict piety, who had had some correspondence with Mr. White and some other ministers in this country, came from Scotland and landed at Boston. He came to this town near the close of the year 1761. After tarrying several weeks he returned to Boston, where he soon organized a church. He came again to this town and gathered a church, July, 1765; he died and was buried in this town, April 2, 1771, aged fifty-three ‡. The principal doctrines which he taught were similar to those of Calvin and Athanasius, which have been received in all ages of the Christian Church. His distinguishing tenets were that faith is a mere intellectual belief; his favorite expression was, 'A bare belief of the truth;—That the bare work of Jesus Christ, without a deed or thought on the part of man, is sufficient to present the chief of sinners spotless before God.' He maintained that his Church was the only true Church then arisen from the ruins of Antichrist, his reign being near to a close §. The use of means for mankind in a natural state he pretty much expounded. In the year 1772 the Sandemanian Church in this town moved to New Haven. In July, 1774, several persons who had been members of that church, together with a number that belonged to the society of New Danbury, united and formed a Sandemanian Church. That continued and increased for many years, till March, 1798, when they divided into two churches, which still continue. There are also a few individuals at Bethel who compose a third church; they all adhere essentially to the doctrines and practices which were established by their founder.¶

"The society of New Danbury continued regularly, though constantly diminishing, till July, 1774, when the Rev. Ebenezer Russell White, with a number of the society, united with the Sandemanians. Public worship was maintained irregularly afterwards for two or three years, till the society finally expired.

"After the dismission of the Rev. Mr. White, the First Church and Society were destitute of a stated minister till Feb. 13, 1765, when Mr. Noahiah Warner was ordained their pastor. The Rev. Mr. Warner was regularly dismissed from his pastoral charge Feb. 23, 1768.†† The people remained destitute about two years and a half. The Rev. Ebenezer Baldwin was ordained Sept. 19, 1770.‡‡ He officiated with great reputation to the ministry till a sudden death terminated his labors, Oct. 1, 1776, aged thirty-one years,§§ a man of great talents and learning, a constant student, grave in his manners, a constant and able supporter of the sound doctrines of the gospel. He left a legacy of about three hundred pounds to the society, which is carefully appropriated to the support of the gospel. From that time there was no settled minister in the society till the Rev. Timothy Langdon, who was ordained Aug. 31, 1786. The Rev. Ebenezer White died Sept. 11, 1779, aged seventy. The deacons of this church have been in the following order: Samuel Benedict, James Beebe, John Gregory, Richard Barnum, Joseph Gregory, James Beebe, James Benedict, John Benedict, Nathaniel Gregory, Joseph Peck, Daniel Benedict, Thomas Benedict, Joshua Knapp, succeeded by those now in office.¶¶ The present meeting-house, which is sixty feet in length and forty-five in breadth, with a steeple one hundred and thirty feet in height, was raised October, 1785; it was inclosed the summer following.

"The society of Bethel built their meeting-house in the year 1760. The Rev. Noah Wetmore, their first minister, was ordained November 25th of the same year; at the same time a church was organized by the Ordaining Council. Mr. Wetmore was regularly dismissed from his pastoral charge Nov. 2, 1781.* His successor, the Rev. John Ely, was ordained Nov. 30, 1791. In the society of Newbury the Rev. Thomas Brooks, their first minister, was ordained Sept. 28, 1758; a church was gathered at the same time.† In May, 1788, the society of Newbury was incorporated a town by the name of Brookfield. Mrs. Abigail Knapp, now living, aged seventy-five, widow of the late Deacon Joshua Knapp, was the first English child born within the limits of Brookfield. The Rev. Samuel Camp, the first and present minister of Ridgebury, was ordained Jan. 18, 1769. The church in that society was organized on the day of the ordination.

"There were a few professors in this town of the mode of the Church of England as early as the year 1750. They built a meeting-house whose dimensions are forty-eight feet by thirty-six, in the year 1763. In September, 1784, they were constituted a regular Episcopalian society. Sixty-six persons, the most of whom belonged to this town, were then considered as belonging to the society. The society have had occasional preaching, but no minister has been settled over them.

"There were a number of professors of the denomination of Baptists, about the year 1783. A Baptist Church was constituted in the north-west part of the town, November, 1785. The year following they built a meeting-house, which is now standing. Mr. Nathaniel Finch was their minister for several years; their present minister, Mr. Nathan Bulkley, was ordained the 8th of last May. A second Baptist Church was constituted in the western part of the town in the year 1788; the members who survive are now mostly connected with other churches.

"I shall now close with a few general remarks. The present number of schools in town is seventeen,—twelve in the first society and five in Bethel. Much more attention is now paid in the education of youth than formerly, though it is conceived there might be still more to great profit.

"For many years there was but one military company in town; at present there are three of infantry, one of cavalry, and one of artillery, which for accuracy in evolutions, military spirit, and appearance may vie with any military companies whatever.

"There have been but few remarkable instances of longevity in this town, though it was formerly remarked there was a great many old people; that is not the case at present. Mr. William Hamilton, born in Scotland, who lived many years in this town, died in the year 1749, aged one hundred and two; Mr. John Cornwall died in the year 1753, aged one hundred and one; those two are the only persons known to have lived in town over one hundred years of age. Mr. David Hoyt, who lived longer than any person ever born and living in town, died in April last, aged ninety-seven. The family of Mr. Thomas Taylor, one of the first settlers, as a family, was remarkable for longevity. He had ten children; the whole amount of his age and theirs is nine hundred and forty-seven years, the average of which is eighty-six years; but three of them saw less than ninety years.

"The increase of this town in a number of years past has not been great, owing to very great emigration; which has been the case with this in common with all the towns in the State.

"The general occupation of the people in this town has been farming; within a few years considerable manufactories have been established. In the manufacture of hats this town much exceeds any one in the United States. More than twenty thousand hats, mostly of fur, are made annually for exportation. The manufacture of shoes is also carried on to a considerable extent. At a low computation, fifteen thousand pair of boots and shoes are annually exported from this town. A paper-mill was erected in the town in the year 1792, in which about fifteen hundred reams of paper are manufactured annually. A considerable number of saddles are also made yearly for exportation."

"The people in this town have generally been very free from litigation; within a few years it has considerably increased, though it is not yet great. A spirit of litigation is one of the greatest evils which can befall any community.

"In our Revolutionary war the people in this town generally warmly espoused the American cause. Notwithstanding all that is said by the enemies of our government to show that its supporters were enemies to the Revolution, the people in this town, though they were great sufferers in the war, are almost unanimously firm friends of the present government of the United States.

"The list of the town is not to be obtained but for a few years past. In the year 1788—the first year after Brookfield was made a town—it was upwards of sixty-six thousand; in the year 1799 it exceeded eighty-one thousand.

"We have thus given a sketch of the history of this town from its first settlement to the present time. It is not pretended that some important facts have not been omitted, but, from the materials which can be obtained, this is the best that I have been able to collect. In the review of these things we witness the fading nature of all earthly scenes. How applicable are the words of inspiration, 'Your fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live forever?' While it is our lot to be pined on the stage of human action, let it be our constant solicitude to seek an interest in that Kingdom 'whose Builder and Maker is God,'—to act our parts worthily in the vicissitudes of human life, that, through grace, we may be approved when called upon to pass in review before the intellectual world; that when the chief Shepherd shall appear we may appear with Him in glory."‡

DANBURY IN 1770.

Danbury had no trouble with the Indians. There are no traditions of burnings and scalplings. Dr. Peters says that in 1770 there were not four hundred Indians in all Connecticut. Here is his brief glance at Danbury:

"It has much the appearance of Croydon, and forms five parishes, one of which is Episcopal, and another Sandemanian; a third is called Bastard Sandemanian because the minister refused to put away his wife, who is a second wife. The town was the residence, and is now the tomb, of the learned and ingenious Rev. Mr. Sandeman, well known to the literary world. He was the fairest and most candid Calvinist that ever wrote in the English language, allowing the natural consequences of all his propositions. He taught that a bishop must be the husband of one wife,—that is, he must be married before he was ordained,—and if he lost his wife he could not marry a second; that a bishop might dress with ruffles, a red coat, and sword; that all converted brothers and sisters, at their coming into the church, ought to salute with a holy kiss; that all true Christians would obey their earthly king; for which tenets, especially the last, the Saber Dissenters of Connecticut held him to be a heretic."

§ Mr. Robbins was born in Norfolk, Conn., in 1777, was educated at Yale, and graduated, in 1796, with Prof. Silliman. In 1815 we find him in Hartford in charge of the Athenaeum, in which city he died in 1868. He was a bachelor.

"We are glad to learn," says the News, "that this was from necessity, and not from choice. While here he became smitten with the charms of an amiable and accomplished young lady. She did not reciprocate his feeling, however, and refused to become his wife. He never fell in love again, but made antiquarian lore his life-companion and solace. The young lady afterwards married, and was the mother of Mr. Lucius H. Boughton.

"Contemporary with Mr. Robbins were Sells, Osborne and Comfort Mygatt. The former conducted the village paper, and the latter represented the town in the Legislature. During Mr. Robbins' stay one of the village poets blossomed forth in a string of verses calculated to hurtle up the feelings. One of these verses could hardly be considered complimentary. It ran:

"Danbury is a thriving town,
And nobody can prevent them;
An undodged Robbin preaches there,
And a Ma'got represents them."

"WHEN this section of country," says the News, "was called Puhquique, or Puhquaige, it presented a somewhat different appearance from what it does now. We can easily understand that. But the imagination must be an active one, enjoying very excellent health, to picture our neighborhood as it was in 1684, when, according to Mr. Robbins, the first settlement was made.

"It is reasonable to suppose that the original eight families came to Danbury by what was since the turn-pike between here and Norwalk. It is the most direct and presents less obstacles in the matter of high ground than any other way. So long ago as that there could not have been more than a trail, if as much, to direct and aid them. What must have been their thoughts as they forced their way we cannot know. Judging the aspect of nature to be then considerably more forbidding than it is now, we must admire the courage of the original eight, even if we cannot respect their judgment.

"Presuming there was a trail, its location through here must have been the present Main Street, and would naturally present to the new-comers a place of residence principally because it defined something.

"According to Mr. Robbins' account they located close together, four on one side and four on the opposite side. Their object was to start a village. This with a view to sociability and protection, would demand concentration. The lands on whose cultivation they depended they sought here and there as the richness of the soil made necessary, and these locations varied so much that to reside upon the tracts would have so scattered the settlers as to have made the nucleus of a village 'a barren ideality,' and to have put social intercourse and mutual protection beyond the pale of possibility. It is likely enough that the eight families' homesteads did not cover more than the ground between South Street and the court-house.

"The land was got from the Indians, and some of it remains in the possession of the families to this day, never having been sold or bought since the day the Indians, beguiled by the glitter of new jackknives, swapped it for the bright treasures.

"Mr. Eli T. Hoyt owns a piece in Great Plain District, known as 'Unity Rocks,' which came from the Indians. Mr. Philo White, in the same district, occupies ground that his grandfather, the Rev. Ebenezer, mentioned in the sermon, got from the Indians. The homestead of Mr. Russell Hoyt came into his family from the same source.

"In May, 1684, the General Court empowered Thomas Benedict, Thomas Fitch, and John Burr to plant a town at this point. What Messrs. Fitch and Burr did in the matter we do not know. Mr. Benedict's two sons, Samuel and James, were of the 'original eight.' The Mr. Beebe of the same party was a brother-in-law. The Dr. Wood was also a brother-in-law. Mr. L. Starr Benedict and Mr. Charles Benedict are direct descendants of James Benedict. Perhaps the Danbury man of to-day who holds the most immediate connection with the first families is Mr.

Eli T. Hoyt, who is the great grandson of John Hoyt, of the 'original eight.' Mr. Hoyt has the rare distinction of having lived under the administration of every President, and of having voted for sixteen of them.

"By a careful wretch of the imagination we can see Danbury something as it existed then. We know from the quality of the land that the eminences were full of fir-trees. We deduce, also, from the lay of the land, that along the streams alders grew in profusion, and that in that portion east of Main Street and west of the Town Hill ridge there was a rather considerable swamp.

"We are pretty confident that the swamp must have been a prominent feature in the topography from the fact that the first settlers set their heart upon calling their town Swampfield, and were only deterred therefrom by the arbitrary action of the General Court, which substituted the name Danbury."

THE BURNING OF DANBURY.

"The American view of the night of terror which has gone down in history as the burning of Danbury has been already given in Mr. Robbins' sermon, on a previous page. The following is the English version of the affair, being Sir William Howe's official report:

"The troops landed on the afternoon of the 25th of April (Friday), four miles to the eastward of Norwalk and twenty miles from Danbury. In the afternoon of the 26th the detachment reached Danbury, meeting only small parties of the enemy on their march, but Gen. Tryon having intelligence that the whole force of the country was collecting to take every advantage of the strong ground he was to pass on his return to the shipping, and finding it impossible to procure carriages to bring off any part of the stores, they were effectually destroyed; in the execution of which the village was unavoidably burnt.

"On the 27th, in the morning, the troops gutted Danbury, and met with little opposition until they came near to Ridgefield, which was occupied by Gen. Arnold, who had thrown up intrenchments to dispute the passage, while Gen. Wooster hung upon the rear with a separate corps. The village was forced and the enemy driven back on all sides.

"Gen. Tryon lay that night at Ridgefield, and renewed his march on the morning of the 28th. The enemy, having been reinforced with troops and cannon, disputed every advantageous situation, keeping at the same time small parties to harass the rear, until the general had formed his detachment upon a height within cannon-shot of the shipping, when, the enemy advancing seemingly with an intention to attack him, he ordered the troops to charge with their bayonets, which was executed with such impetuosity that the rebels were totally put to flight, and the detachment embarked without further molestation:

"The inclosed returns set forth the loss sustained by the king's troops, and that of the enemy from the best information:

"Return of the stores, ordnance, provisions, &c., found at the rebels' stores, and destroyed by the king's troops in Danbury.—A quantity of ordnance stores, with iron, &c.; 4000 barrels of beef and pork; 1000 barrels of flour; 100 large tierces of basket; 80 barrels of rice; 120 puncheons of rum; several large stores of wheat, oats, and Indian corn, in bulk: the quantity thereof could not possibly be ascertained; 30 pipes of wine; 100 hogsheads of sugar; 50 ditto of molasses; 20 casks of coffee; 15 large casks filled with medicines of all kinds; 10 barrels of saltpetre; 1020 tents and marquees; a number of iron boilers; a large quantity of hospital-bedding; engineers', pioneers', and carpenters' tools; a printing-press complete; tar, tallow, &c.; 5000 pairs of shoes and stockings; at a mill between Ridgebury and Ridgefield, 100 barrels of flour, and a quantity of Indian corn.

"Returned of the killed, wounded, and missing.—One drummer and fifer and twenty-three rank and file, killed; three field-officers, six captains, three subalterns, nine sergeants, ninety-two rank and file, wounded; one drummer and fifer and twenty-seven rank and file, missing. Royal artillery, two additional killed, three matrosses and one wheeler wounded, and one matross missing.

"Return of the rebels killed and wounded.—Killed, Gen. Wooster, Col. Gould, Col. Lamb, of the artillery, Col. Henman, Dr. Atwater, a man of considerable influence, Capt. Coe, Lieut. Thompson, one hundred privates. Wounded: Col. Whiting, Capt. Benjamin, Lieut. Coe, two hundred and fifty privates. Taken: fifty privates, including several com-mittee-men."

"The Connecticut Journal of that time, after speaking of the landing of the British and their march to Danbury, in which there are no particulars other than those given in the preceding accounts, says,—

"Early the next morning (Saturday) Brig.-Gen. Silliman, with about five hundred militia, pursued the enemy; at Reading he was joined by Maj.-Gen. Wooster and Brig.-Gen. Arnold. The heavy rain all the afternoon retarded the march of our troops so much that they did not reach Bethel (a village two miles from Danbury) until eleven o'clock at night, much fatigued and their arms rendered useless by being wet. It was thought prudent to refresh the men and attack the enemy on their return. Early the next morning (which proved rainy) the whole were in motion; two hundred men remained with Gen. Wooster, and about four hundred were detached under Gen. Arnold and Gen. Silliman, on the road leading to Norwalk. At nine a.m. intelligence was received that the enemy had taken the road leading to Norwalk, of which Gen. Wooster was informed, and pursued them, with whom he came up about eleven o'clock, when a smart skirmish ensued, in which Gen. Wooster, who behaved with great intrepidity, unfortunately received a wound by a musket-ball through the groin, which it is feared will prove mortal. Gen. Arnold, by a forced march across the country, reached Ridgefield at eleven o'clock, and, having posted his small party (being joined by about one hundred men) of five hundred men, waited the approach of the enemy, who were soon discovered advancing in a column with three field-pieces in front and three in the rear, and large flank-guards of near two hundred men in each. At noon they began discharging their artillery, and were soon within musket-shot, when a smart action ensued between the whole, and which continued for about an hour, in which our men behaved with great spirit, but, being overpowered by numbers, were obliged to give way.

"Our loss cannot be exactly ascertained, no returns being made. It is judged to be about sixty killed and wounded.

"The enemy's loss is judged to be more than double our number, and about twenty prisoners. The enemy on this occasion behaved with their usual barbarity, wantonly and cruelly murdering the wounded prisoners who fell into their hands, and plundering the inhabitants, burning and destroying everything in their way."

"According to the above account from the Connecticut State Journal, the American troops approached Danbury in a storm of rain. The British must have been more fortunate in their progress, judging from the following incident: Mrs. Stephen Ambler, who died at a ripe old age some years ago, was a girl of sixteen at that time. Her father, whose name was Munson, occupied a house which stood where Mr. E. A. Houseman's place now is, on Deer Hill Avenue. Many of our readers will remember the house. Miss Munson and her mother were engaged quilting on that Saturday when the news of the approach of the British was brought here. She went to an upper window, which commanded a view clear through Bethel, and she saw the moving mass of men, distinguishing their presence by the reflection of the sun on their burnished arms and accoutrements. The spectacle made so vivid an impression upon the mind of the young girl that she never forgot the sensation she then experienced."

* Miss Munson subsequently married Stephen Ambler (who, with his six brothers, served in the war), and became the grandmother of Oliver P. Clark.

"The British reached the village shortly after two o'clock, so it was about one o'clock when Miss Munson saw them. The column had had an uninterrupted march from the water. This is not surprising. The country was full of Tories,—men who were in sympathy with the king's cause and who knew every foot of the country. Through these Tryon knew the condition of defense and offense of the people, and by them was guided along the safest and most direct route. With such knowledge and help, and with troops in fine condition, the march to Danbury was but an excursion.

"Some four miles below here is an eminence called Hoyt's Hill. It is not on the turnpike, but is located by the road to Lonetown, southeast of the pike. It was along this road the British approached Bethel. The hill is on the border of Redding and Bethel, and is not eight miles distant from here, as Barbour in his chronicles states.

"An incident occurred here that has been confused by two or three versions. Hollister, in his 'History of Connecticut,' says that Tryon was confronted on Hoyt's Hill by a presumably insane horseman, who appeared on the crest waving a sword and conducting himself very much as if he was in command of a considerable army in the act of climbing the opposite side of the hill. The British commander halted his force and sent out skirmishers to reconnoitre, when it was discovered that the stranger was alone, and, instead of leading on an enthusiastic army to almost certain victory, was making the best of his way back to Danbury.

"This account is apparently a distortion of an incident that really did occur, although it has the sanction of local tradition, and is repeated (in honest belief) by several aged residents, who got it from their parents, who were living here at the time.

"Joseph P. Cooke, a resident of Danbury, was in command of the few Continental soldiers here at this time, with the rank of colonel. We do not believe the troop was very large,—merely a guard over the government store which was located here.

"When the news of the British approach was learned in Danbury, Dr. John Wood dispatched a young man in his employ named Lambert Lockwood to learn the size and contemplated line of march of the British troops. Young Lambert reached the summit of Hoyt's Hill, when he suddenly and rather unexpectedly came upon the foe. He must have been riding at a smart speed, or he would not have become so helplessly entangled as he turned out to be. When he discovered the enemy he was too close upon them to get away, and in attempting it he was wounded and captured. He learned a great deal of the British and their designs, but the value of it was considerably impaired by this incident.

"Tryon's troops marched through Bethel without singularly enough, taking in account his 'blood-thirsty' nature doing any damage to life or property.

After leaving Bethel the ranks were deployed, and Danbury was approached in open order, some of the advance being so far deployed as to take in Shelter Rock Ridge on the right. The father of the venerable Thomas Andrews, of Bethel, with several companions, went on Shelter Rock to see the British column pass, and while there were surprised and shot at by the royal scouts.

"On reaching the south end of our village Gen. Tryon took up his headquarters in the house of Nehemiah Dibble, on South Street. The same building has ever since been known as the Wooster Place, from the fact of Gen. Wooster dying there a few days later. Several years ago it was torn down.

HOUSE OF NEHEMIAH DIBBLE, IN WHICH GEN. WOOSTER DIED.

"It was between two and three o'clock in the afternoon when the British arrived. The leader having selected his headquarters, the quartering of the force for the protection of themselves was next attended to. Tryon's assistants, Gens. Erskine and Agnew, accompanied by a body of mounted infantry, proceeded up Main Street to the junction of the Barren Plain road (now White Street), where Benjamin Knapp lived. Knapp's house stood about where is now D. P. Nichols' brick block, long known as Military Hall, the corner of which is occupied by F. W. Barnum, druggist. The two generals quartered themselves upon Mr. Knapp, taking complete possession of the house, with the exception of one room where Mrs. Knapp was lying ill.

"On this dash up Main Street the party met with two incidents. A man named William Hamilton had a piece of cloth at a fuller's on South Street. When he heard of the approach of the enemy, he got on his horse and rode there in full haste for his goods. He was rather late, however, and when he came out into the street to remount his horse a squad of the force was upon him. Danbury's horses could not have had the reputation for speed they now enjoy, or Mr. Hamilton was very poorly provided, for the steeds of the military gained on him at every rod of the way. He flew up Main Street with a half-dozen troopers in full pursuit, and on reaching West Street, then a mere lane, turned up it, the hair on his head being very erect. The pursuers followed him, and one of them, being more in advance and close upon him, swung his sword to cleave him in two, when a singular but most fortunate accident occurred. Hamilton lost a part of his hold on the roll, which he had up to this time tenaciously clung to; the cloth flew out like a ribbon, frightening the pursuing animals and rendering them unmanageable.

"The column that came up Main Street were fired at from the house of Capt. Ezra Starr. This building stood where now is the residence of the Hon. D. P. Nichols, corner of Main and Boughton Streets. The shots were fired by three young men. It was an act of reckless daring, and the actors must have been very young, as the shots could not have possibly had any other effect on the invasion than to have exasperated the invaders. These men were Joshua Porter and Eleazer Starr and a negro named Adams, who was in Ezra Starr's employ. Mr. Porter lived in Oblong (Westville District). He was in the village after a gallon of molasses when the enemy came. Starr lived on the corner of Main and Elm Streets, within a few feet of The News office. Both men went into the captain's house, and there awaited the approach of the enemy. They were killed on the premises, and the building was immediately fired, the three bodies being consumed with it.

"The skirmish-line of the British as they approached Danbury extended from Shelter Rock to Tom Mountain. Tryon was an able general, and, although pretty well assured that the country was without an organized military force, omitted no proper precaution. The main body came in on the road (now but little used) which skirts the west side of Coalpit Hill. The skirmishers advanced a few rods north of South Street, covering Main Street, and then rested. Gen. Tryon took up his headquarters with Nehemiah Dibble, and Gens. Agnew and Erskine, with a body of the troops, preceded by two pieces of artillery, started up the main street.

"The alarm in Danbury was, of course, considerable. The town was in no position of defense. The news of the invasion was known in New Haven hours before it was received here. Danbury had a company of cavalry under command of Capt. Starr, but the greater portion of them were in New York State, in the Federal army. The number here with the few detachments did not form a total of a hundred and fifty effective men. There were but very few able-bodied civilians present. The whole body of military was under command of Col. Cooke. He withdrew as the enemy advanced, so the only opposition Tryon's men found came from the few citizens who from every available shelter fired upon the column as it advanced up Main Street.

"As the force reached the present location of the court-house the two pieces of artillery were discharged, and the heavy balls, six- and twelve-pounders, flew screaming up the street, carrying terror to the hearts of the women and children and dismay to the heads of the homes thus endangered. There are probably a number of these balls saved up by our citizens. Two of them, found on Dr. W. F. Lacey's place, are in possession of Col. Samuel Gregory.

"Immediately upon Gens. Agnew and Erskine taking up their quarters in Mr. Knapp's house, a picket was located. One squad of twenty men occupied the rising ground where is now the junction of Park Avenue and Prospect Street. A second took position on the hill near Jarvis Hull's house. The third was located on what is now called Franklin Street. We have no information of other picket-squads, but it is likely enough that every approach to the village was guarded.

"It is related of a brother of Joshua Porter that, coming into the village to see what the British were doing, he came upon three of the picket stationed on Park Avenue. They commanded him to halt.

"'What for?' he inquired, still continuing towards them.

"'You are our prisoner,' said they.

"'Guess not,' he laconically replied, moving steadily upon them.

"'We'll stick you through and through if you don't stop,' one of them threatened, advancing close to him.

"Porter was a man of very powerful build, with muscles like steel and a movement that was a very good substitute for lightning. They were close upon him. There was a gulch back of them. In a flash he had the foremost trooper in his grasp. In the next instant he had hurled him against the other two, and the three went into the gulch in a demoralized heap. The rest of the squad, seeing the disaster, immediately surrounded and subdued Porter. This little affair, it is said, gave the name of Squabble Hill to that neighborhood.

"Porter and a man named Barnum are believed to be the only prisoners the enemy carried away from Danbury. They were taken to New York City and confined in the infamous Sugar-House prison. Porter was subsequently released and returned home, but Barnum died there from starvation. When found he had a piece of brick in his hand holding it to his mouth, as if to draw moisture from it to cool his feverish throat.

"The main body of the troops remained in the village and shortly engaged in the destruction of the military stores. Those in the Episcopal church were rolled out into the street and there fired, as the edifice was of the Church of England, and so revered by the English invader. This church stood where is now the graveyard on South Street, which was then its churchyard. The building was years after removed to the corner of Main Street and turned into a tenement.

"Two other buildings contained stores. One of these was a barn belonging to Nehemiah Dibble. The goods were taken out and burned to save the building, as Dibble was a Tory. The other was a building situated on Main Street, near where is now Samuel C. Wildman's place. It was full of grain. It was burned with its contents. It is said that the fat from the burning meat ran ankle-deep in the street. No less free ran the rum and wine, although not in the same direction. The soldiers who were directed to destroy these tested them first, and the result was as certain as death. Before night had fairly set in the greater part of the force were in a riotous state of drunkenness. Discipline was set at naught. King George stood no chance whatever in the presence of King Alcohol, and went down before him at once. The riot continued far into the night. Danbury was never before or since so shaken. They went up and down the main street in squads, singing army songs, shouting coarse speeches, hugging each other, swearing, yelling, and otherwise conducting themselves as becomes an invader when he is very, very drunk. The people who had not fled remained close in their homes, sleepless, full of fear, and utterly wretched, with the ghastly tragedy at Capt. Starr's house hanging like a pall over them. The night was dark, with dashes of rain. The carousers tumbled down here and there as they advanced in the stages of drunkenness.

"Some few of the troops remained sober, and these performed the duties of the hour. One of these was the marking of a cross upon the buildings which belonged to the Tories. This was done with pieces of lime. There was considerable of this property. Sympathizers with the government of the mother-country abounded hereabouts. They were men who honestly believed that colonies had no right to secede from the Crown, and they defended their belief when they could, and cherished it at all times. They were jubilant now. The proper authorities were in possession, the rebel element was overcome, and the Tories believed that Danbury was forever redeemed from the pernicious sway of the rebellion.

"It was two of these people who piloted Tryon into Danbury. They were Stephen Jarvis and Eli Benedict. They were very happy men on this dismal night, and the future looked very bright to them. The next night there was a very big difference in the state of their feeling. They had fled from Danbury. Some time after, Benedict came back, but, being threatened with violence, he left for good. Jarvis went to Nova Scotia, where he made his home. Once he returned on a visit to his sister. He came privately; but, the neighbors getting word of his presence, they went to the house in search of him. His sister hid him in her brick oven, and when the danger was over he secretly left Danbury for Nova Scotia, never again to return. He lived in the house just east of George Ryder's place, on Wooster Street, and which, remodeled, stands there yet.

"It was not a particularly happy night for the general in command. He had met with a complete success in reaching Danbury and destroying the stores, which was the object of his mission. But the great bulk of his force was helpless in the strong embrace of New England rum, and news had come that a force of the enemy was gathering and marching towards him. They were anxious hours to the three generals and their aids, but especially to him on whom rested all the responsibility of the expedition.

"Besides the approach of Wooster's men, there was the small band of troops under command of Col. Cooke, who were undoubtedly near by, ready to give vigorous help to an attacking force, knowing every foot of the ground, and capable of giving an infinite amount of annoyance if nothing more. Then there were gathering farmers from the outlying districts, who had through the afternoon given substantial evidence of their presence by creeping up as near as possible and firing at the pickets. The darkness that fell about the town after nightfall might pardonably be peopled with many dangers by even a less imaginative person than was the British general.

"In the mean time Benjamin Knapp was having his own particular trouble.

"Mr. Knapp was a tanner. His house stood on what is now White Street, near the corner of Main. White Street was then called Barren Plain Road, and this name was given it because the road ran across the Balmforth Avenue region, which was then pretty much sand. Barren Plain Road was not quite as straight as White Street. It bowed to the south about where Hawley & Sayers' coffin warehouse stands. Back and just east of there, on the stream, Mr. Knapp had his tannery.

"It is very rarely the resident of a humble village has two brigadier-generals come to spend Sunday with him, and the advent of Gen. Agnew and Erskine should have been an unbounded delight to Mr. Knapp, but it is doubtful if it were. The generals made themselves fully at home. There was no stiffness about them. They killed Mr. Knapp's stock and cut up the meat on his floor, and the dents thereof were visible as long as the building stood. Mr. Knapp's wife was a sorely-afflicted invalid, but her inability to attend domestic duties did not in any way embarrass the guests, yet it was very unpleasant for Mr. Knapp. Besides that, the neighboring people, on that eventful afternoon, drew near to the town with their long-barreled guns, and, taking advantage of the heavy growth of alders along the stream, fired at a red-coat wherever he showed himself. There was a picket stationed on the Main Street bridge, and this party was a special target. All this made Mr. Knapp very nervous, as he could not very satisfactorily show that he was not in league with the ambushed patriots, and he feared his property would suffer. However, it did not. The British generals, in view of the accommodation and illness of Mrs. Knapp, spared the house in the general conflagration that followed. The house was removed twenty-five years ago to make room for the present building. It was the stereotyped house,—side to the street, with back roof sloping down to within a man's height of the ground.

"At midnight the uproar caused by the inundation of two thousand soldiers and the absorption of such a great quantity of New England rum had to a great degree abated. Tryon was fully awake. His position was becoming exceedingly perilous. Shortly after midnight word came to him that the rebels, under Wooster and Arnold, had reached Bethel and were preparing to attack him. This was unexpected to him. He had thought to spend the Sabbath leisurely in Danbury. The word that came from Bethel radically changed his programme. At once all became bustle. The drunken sleepers were aroused to new life by the most available means, and a movement made towards immediate evacuation.

"It was nearly one o'clock Sunday morning when Tryon got word of the Bethel gathering. Up to that hour there had been but three buildings destroyed (already mentioned). As soon as the men were aroused and in place, excepting those detailed for picket, the work of destruction began. This was about two o'clock. In the next hour the buildings owned by Tories were marked with a cross, done with a chunk of lime. The work of burning was then commenced.

"The first house burned stood just west of the Episcopal church on South Street, but some little distance from the street, and where is now the garden of the late Charles Ryder's house. There was a long garden attached to it, and at the opposite end of the garden, almost reaching Main Street, was another house. These buildings were owned and occupied by John McLean, one as a dwelling, and the one on the corner as a store.

"Mr. McLean was commissary of the Continental troops in that vicinity, and the object of the visit of the enemy to Danbury was to destroy the army provisions which he had accumulated in his store and in the Episcopal church, which was then unfinished. They would not burn the church, but rolled the barrels of flour and pork into South Street, and burned them and the buildings, the hard being over shoe deep after the conflagration.

"Mr. McLean had sent off all his working teams towards West Point with supplies, and had nothing at home but a pair of fattening oxen and a saddle-horse. Upon the alarm of the enemy's approach the oxen were put before a cart with a feather-bed in it, upon which his wife and children proceeded to New Milford, while he remained burying and putting in safety such of his property as he could conceal until the British appeared over Coalpit Hill. They saw and pursued him, calling out, 'Old Daddy,' 'Rebel,' etc., and firing after him when the fleetness of his horse seemed likely to carry him out of their reach. Some of the bullets passed through his coat and hat, but he escaped uninjured, joining his family in New Milford, whence they removed to a farm which he owned in Stony Hill, and remained until the close of the war. They then returned to Danbury and built the house now standing near the foot of Main Street. A few of his descendants still reside in the town, but none bearing his name, the only grandson being Dr. John A. McLean, of Norwalk.

"Capt. Daniel Taylor, Maj. Taylor, Comfort Hoyt, Jr., and Joseph Wildman were also among the sufferers, but the writer knows not where their property was located.

"The second house fired was on the east side of Main Street, a few rods from the corner of South Street, and where the big pine-tree now stands. After that there was no order in the firing, but the flames seemed to burst out simultaneously in all directions.

"Dr. John Wood's place, about where are the places of William Bedient and the late Philander Comstock, was destroyed. There were two wells in this vicinity, each of which was filled with iron, cannon-balls, etc., which could not be burned, and were thus put out of the way. David Wood's house, where William H. Clark now lives, was burned. Across the street from him lived Capt. James Clark, who lost his house. Next to Clark was Maj. Mygatt's home, just south of E. R. Whittlesey's place, also burned. Another contribution to the flames was the house of Rev. Ebenezer White, where G. F. Bailey's house now is. Zadoc Benedict's house stood where Schoppaul's bakery is, north of the depot. Mr. Knapp must have thought the trouble was getting pretty close to him. Capt. Joseph P. Cook's house also went. It stood where Lucius P. Hoyt's house is.

"The record says there were nineteen dwelling-houses burned in all. It is said also that there were several stores burned. They must have been owned by members of this list. We know that Capt. Cook owned one of the stores, and that the Woods owned another. Cook's store stood where he lived, and the latter was where Mr. Bedient's place is. Near Samuel C. Wildman's house stood a blacksmith-shop, which also perished. In it was made a part of the chains with which the Hudson was barricaded at West Point. The meeting-house of the New Danbury Society was also burned. It stood on Liberty Street, between Delay Street and Railroad Avenue.

"As but nineteen houses were burned, it was not so much of a conflagration, after all. Danbury then had a population of some two thousand five hundred. To accommodate these there must have been at least four hundred dwellings in the township, and nearly, if not quite, three hundred in the village. Historians say that every house was burned except those belonging to Tories. If this be so, then the humiliating reflection is ours that the great bulk of Danbury was Tory. Thank Heaven for the strength to believe that it is not so! It is likely that the British burned only those buildings that were available in their hasty getting together, including those whose owners may have been particularly obnoxious to the loyal heart.

"With the fire well under way the pickets were called into the formed line, and the invading army took up its march in retreat.

"Tryon did not undertake to return as he came. The force under Wooster at Bethel deterred him from that, and he sought to make a détour through Ridgefield."

THE FIGHT.

"In the light from the burning buildings the British troops took up their line of march from town, passing over Deer Hill by way of the road now called Wooster Street. No sooner had the last man left Main Street than the advance of the American squad, which had hung on the outskirts of the village since being driven out, appeared on the street, and immediately followed after.

"Before the last of the British were fairly out of the village the gray dawn of the Sabbath waved up from the east, and as it advanced into the broader light of the new day it showed the long line of British filing through Miry Brook road, and the straggling but determined rebels, armed with long muskets, carried with both hands, bringing up the rear, and doing their best to harass the foe, and succeeding. Still, with all their patriotic zeal, we are obliged to entertain but a poor idea of their marksmanship, for there is no record that any of the enemy were killed on Danbury soil.

"Among this crowd of daring if not effective persons there was one who was sufficiently rapid in his manual of arms, however short he may have fallen from being effective. He was poised on a fence the afternoon before, and fired thirty-two shots at the skirmish-line of the advancing British without being touched by a single one of the many bullets sent after him. When his ammunition was gone he held up his cartouch-box to the enemy to show its emptiness, and then left, shouting as he ran these very patriotic words:

"He that fights and runs away
May live to fight another day,
But he that is in battle slain
Shall never live to fight again."

"A movement of a body of two thousand men could not be made, of course, without the knowledge of the neighbors. The people of the adjoining districts and villages had been apprised of the arrival of the British in Danbury by the families who had fled from the doomed town. All that Saturday night men were hovering about the place, looking with hungry eyes for every manifestation from the enemy. No sooner had the line taken up its march than these people knew of it, and, determining the route, sought to annoy the march all that was in their power to do. One of their acts was to destroy the bridge over Wolf Pond Run, in Miry Brook District. When the enemy reached this place they were obliged to stop and throw over a temporary bridge of rails. This made a delay, and enabled the forces under Wooster to gain headway.

"One historian says that the British marched through Sugar Hollow. This is plausible enough if the force had been an excursion-party hurrying to Ridgefield to take a railway-train, but no military man would be so insane as to take his men through such a defile, where there was every advantage and ample protection for an enemy.

"Gen. Tryon took his people through Ridgebury, having an open country for his skirmishers. He was confident that by making this détour he would mislead Wooster, and escape to his boats without serious interruption.

"But Wooster, at Bethel, soon got word of the move and prepared to meet it. Wooster was a resident of New Haven, and was in that city when the news of the enemy landing at Compo reached him. Immediately he started for Danbury with what force he could get there. He was joined on the way by Arnold and Silliman, and the men under their commands. Poor Wooster! He little realized when he started for this insignificant hamlet that it would become his everlasting home, so far as this world is concerned, and that here the only substantial honor he should ever receive would be given.

"Gen. Wooster sent Arnold and Silliman, as we have already indicated, direct to Ridgefield, across the country from Bethel, while he struck out in a more northerly direction, intending to strike the foe before he reached Ridgefield. In this he succeeded. He came upon the enemy while they were breakfasting, about eight o'clock in the morning of that eventful Sunday. He appeared from a piece of woods, and struck a rear regiment with such unexpected force that he captured forty of the men before the command was fairly aware of his presence. He withdrew as rapidly as he came, but shortly after made another dash, while the enemy were in motion, and it was then the fight took place in which he lost his life.

"There are so many conflicting accounts of this engagement that we are powerless to determine which is right. It is not a matter of any moment, however. Wooster and his two or three hundred men were alone in it, as Arnold and Silliman's force were in Ridgefield Village, barricading the road and waiting for a chance to do their share. Out in the country, amid the rocks and the pine scrub lying between Ridgefield Street and Ridgebury church, the brave and ill-fated man was waging the unequal battle. It was at the first of the second attack that he received the fatal wound. The British must have been on the retreat, or his friends would not have been able to recover his person, as he fell where he was shot. The great sash* which he wore was unwound, and, being spread out as a blanket, he was put in it and carried from the field. Then he was placed in a carriage and slowly brought back to Danbury.

"In the Dibble mansion, where Tryon but a few hours before had had his headquarters, the unfortunate general was placed. A local surgeon dressed the wound as well as he was able, and shortly after a more experienced man came from New Haven to attend him. The bullet, which is said to have been fired by a Tory, entered his back obliquely just as he turned to wave on his men, and, cutting the spinal cord, was buried in his stomach. The nature of the wound precluded recovery even had he received the best skill on the moment. His wife arrived from New Haven, but a delirium had seized him, and he did not recognize her. For three days he lay in the old South Street house, suffering untold agony, and then he fell into a stupor. This was Thursday morning of that eventful week.

"It was noted by her who, faithful to the last, unremittently watched his pillow that during this and the following day (as is frequently the case in the closing scene of an active life) his mind was busied in exciting reminiscence. By the feeble light of flickering reason he was tracing the long and weary pilgrimage, the cruises, sieges, battles, marches, through which he had passed, only to reach his grave. The home of his childhood, the cabin of his ship, the old mansion by the Sound, pass in a blended image before his fading vision. The dash of waves, the rattle of musketry, the roar of cannon, ring confusedly in his deafened ear. His hand cannot respond to the gentle pressure of affection. His breathing grows shorter and shorter, while the icy chill advances nearer and nearer to the heart. As his wife wipes the death-damp from his brow his eyes, hitherto closed, open once more, and in their clear depths, for one glad moment, she discovers the dear, the old, the familiar expression of returned consciousness; his lips gasp in vain to utter one precious word of final adieu, and the last effort is to throw on her one farewell glance of unutterable tenderness and love.†

"On Friday, May 2, 1777, he died. On Sunday the funeral was held. It was a quiet affair, although the body was that of a major-general and of a soldier who for courage and patriotism had no superior. But Danbury was sorely afflicted. Many of the houses were in ruins, and nearly all the able-bodied men were away.

"Miss Betty Porter, aged sixteen, daughter of one of the men killed and burned in Maj. Starr's house, and subsequently the wife of Capt. Nathaniel Gregory, grandfather of our Col. Gregory, was at the funeral. She says there were but six men present, and they bore the body to its resting place. The remains were buried in the graveyard on Wooster Street.

"Rev. Samuel Peters, in his quaint work 'A General History of Connecticut,' says, 'David Wooster, the rebel general, Benedict Arnold's old friend and mobbing confederate, received a fatal ball through his bladder as he was harassing the rear of the royal troops, of which, after being carried forty miles to New Haven, he died, and was buried at the side of David Dewartell, one of the judges of Charles I.'

"The firing of our people upon the British, with the return fire of the enemy, marked as distinctly as sight could have done to the refugees the progress of the march. Besides, there were messengers, in the person of boys, who kept track of the course and reported hourly. Long before the royal column passed Ridgebury church the people who had fled began to return to the village, some to undisturbed homes, others to smoking ruins. Before night the most of them had got back, although it was not until the next day that all had returned. The parents of the venerable Mrs. Phebe Benedict, who is still abiding with us, went to New Fairfield.

"With the returning Danburians came a host of sight-seers from Redding, Bethel Village, Brookfield, Newtown, New Fairfield, and other places. It was a great spectacle for outsiders, and they flocked here just as people do to the scene of an overwhelming disaster. All that Sunday afternoon the main street and South were full of people, viewing the ruins, sympathizing with the sutlers, cursing the enemy, and delivering opinions of reckless wisdom, as is common with the dear masses in matters they know nothing of. One of these visitors used to relate that the wheels of his wagon sank above their felloes in the cold grease on South Street, which came from the burnt pork. There were three taverns here at the time, and the business they might have done, had they the liquid facilities, would have been immense.

"Dr. Jabez Starr, grandfather of Mr. Fred Starr, kept one of the taverns. His place stood on the corner of Main and Elm Streets, near where is now The News building. On the approach of the enemy he moved his goods out of town and harn's way. Mr. Starr was the only doctor in Danbury at the time.

"The house now occupied by Nathaniel Barnum, a few doors south of The News office, was a tavern at that time. On a sign swinging from a post it bore a copy of the arms of King George IV., which gave the tavern its name. It was kept by John Trowbridge, who was Mr. Barnum's great-grandfather. Owing to its sign it was saved from destruction, but its furniture was piled up in the street and burned. Mr. Barnum has completely changed the outside appearance of the building, so that to-day it looks but little like it was at that time.

* The sash and sword are now in Yale College.

† Henry C. Deming's oration at the Wooster monument, 1854.

"Mr. Trowbridge was a lieutenant in the rebel army. He was away with his regiment at the time. His people removed themselves and what furniture they could get together to Nathan Cornwall's tavern, in Beaver Brook District, the tavern standing on what is now Henry Starr's place. The royal troops did not interfere with the property, but the furniture that was destroyed was the work of Tory neighbors.

"Maj. N. M. Taylor in 1777 lived in a house which stood at the junction of South Street with Dumping Hill road. On the news of the coming of the British he hurried home and told his wife to make ready to fly. She was of the genuine Revolutionary material. She had a baking of bread ready for the oven, and she declared she would not leave until it was done. Before it was done the enemy came into town, and Taylor's tavern was inundated by soldiers. She told them that she had a batch of bread in the oven, and if they wanted some she would give it to them. Hot fresh bread is a toothsome bit to a soldier, and when the bread came out they took it all. Fortunately for Taylor's property, his wife was a good baker, and the soldiers, whose stomachs had been delighted by her skill, left the building undisturbed.

"Ten years later Mr. Taylor put up a guide-stone in front of his place, which contained the following information:

"67 miles to Hartford).
66 miles to N. Y.

This stone erected by N. M. Taylor, 1787."

"Mr. Taylor soon after built the house, now owned by Martin E. Clark, on South Street at the foot of Main, which was used as a tavern. There is not a Revolutionary building in town that shows less change than this building. It is two stories high, with a tremendous garret. His dining-room was then used as the reception-room, with the small bar of those days opening off from it, and now used by him for a milk-room. A part of the second floor was used as a ball-room. Three stone chimneys pierce the roof. One of these at the base is eight by eleven feet and five feet square in the garret. The others are nearly as large. Near to this building stood the house of Comfort Hoyt, Jr., which was burned. John McLean was the most serious sufferer of the lot. His house stood where is now the venerable big double tenement on the south side of Main Street, and which is to-day called by many the McLean place.

"Immediately after the disaster the selectmen were instructed to present a petition to the Legislature for the relief of the sufferers. Hinman, in his 'War of the American Revolution,' says,—

"John McLean, Eli Mygatt, and others, selectmen of Danbury, stated to the General Assembly convened at Hartford on the 5th of May, 1777, that the enemy in their incursion into Danbury burned and destroyed the public stores of said town, and they apprehended great damage might arise to the inhabitants unless some timely remedy should be provided. The Assembly appointed Daniel Sherman, Col. Nehemiah Beersley, Increase Moseley, Leonard Safford, Col. S. Fairfield, and Caleb Baldwin to report to Danbury as soon as might be, and notify the inhabitants of said town, and by all lawful ways inquire into and ascertain every man's loss, and report to the next General Assembly.

"This committee reported to the Assembly that the British troops had made a hostile invasion into said town, and under a pretense of destroying the public stores had consumed with fire about twenty dwelling-houses, with many stores, barns, and other buildings, and that the enemy on their retreat collected and drove off all the live stock—viz., cattle, horses, and sheep—which they could find, and that the destruction of said property had reduced many of the wealthy inhabitants to poverty. Having notified the inhabitants, they from day to day examined the losses of each sufferer, on oath and by other evidence, and allowed to each his damage at the time said property was destroyed. They found that by reason of the price of articles the inhabitants had been obliged to pay large sums over and above the value in procuring the necessaries for their families, that many of them had their teams forced from them to remove the public stores, etc. They gave the name of each sufferer, with his loss allowed, annexed to his name, which amounted to the sum of sixteen thousand one hundred and eighty-one pounds one shilling and four pence, which report was accepted by the Assembly and ordered to be lodged on file, to perpetuate the evidence of the loss of each person, that, when Congress should order a compensation, to make out the claims of sufferers.

"On the receipt of this communication the pay-table were directed to draw an order on the treasurer for the sum of five hundred pounds in favor of the selectmen of Danbury, as aforesaid, who could not subsist without such relief.

"In 1787 the sufferers in Danbury, having received no further relief, again petitioned the General Assembly of Connecticut, upon which petition Hon. Andrew Adams and others were appointed a committee.

"The chairman of said committee reported that for want of exhibits and documents they were unable methodically and correctly to state the facts or losses and estimate of damages, and also, for the want of proper certificates from the treasurer and secretary of state, to report what had already been done for their relief, but were of opinion that the houses and buildings and necessary household furniture destroyed by the enemy ought to be paid for by the State at their just value, and that the only manner in the power of the State, at that time, was to pay the same in Western lands; which report was in October, 1787, accepted by the House, but rejected by the Upper House."

"In 1792 the General Assembly made the award of land. This territory is in Ohio, and has since been known as the Western Reserve.

"This list of sufferers, with the amounts of losses, we herewith give, as awarded by the first-named committee.

"The total loss as thus determined by the committee amounted to nearly eighty-one thousand dollars.

"There were two Matthew Benedicts, father and son, who figure in the list of losers. The latter, who was great-grandfather of Benedict Brothers, the shoe-dealers, lived where is now the homestead of Mrs. Henry Benedict. It is said that he owned a small hat-shop which was burned by the British, although Francis' 'History of Hatting' says hatting was begun in Danbury in 1780, or three years later than the advent of the British. The senior Matthew lived with Jonah, another son. The junior's estate included the Concert Hall property, which was given by the family to the First Church society for the use of the society. We have not been able so far to locate the residence of either Jonah or Zadock Benedict, who were brothers of Matthew, junior. The former is said to have lived at the lower end of Main Street.

"Still another brother was Noble Benedict, who raised a company of one hundred men at the beginning of the war. He was captured in November, 1776, at Fort Washington. Nathan was captured in the Danbury fight, and taken to the Sugar-House prison. Jonah was in his brother's company at Fort Washington, and was captured there. He suffered from the imprisonment to such an extent that it was believed he was dying, and then he was released, being brought to Danbury on a litter. In the 'Genealogy of the Benedicts in America' it is said he arrived here about two weeks before the burning of the village. He and his brother were taken out of the house that dark Sunday morning and tied to trees in the garden, while the house was burned.

"Joseph Wildman lived where now resides Hon. F. S. Wildman. In the award of land to the sufferers he received fourteen hundred acres in Ohio. So little did he value it that he sold it in exchange for a horse. A part of the flourishing city of Sandusky is on that land, and is now worth millions of dollars. The singular sale was made with the right of redemption within thirty years. About a year or so after the expiration of that time, and when the property began to be quite valuable, Joseph's heirs unfortunately discovered this clause in the deed.

"Benjamin Knapp, who figured so conspicuously as the entertainer of generals, lived until 1834, when he met his death at the heels of a colt in Beaver Brook District. Mr. Amos Morris, who was then in the prime of life and as now a resident there, gave the wounded man shelter. A doctor was called, who saw that the injury was fatal, and recommended that Mr. Knapp be taken home at once. He was comfortably placed in a cart, and Mr. Morris brought him home, where he died at the age of ninety-four years. He built the house on White Street, now owned by Mr. Joseph Bell, for his son, Noah Knapp. Benjamin Knapp is remembered by our older citizens as a little old man in knee-breeches and gray stockings. He owned a number of cows, besides the shoe-shop and tannery.

"Samuel Morris, father of the venerable Amos Morris, was an army-teamster. He was employed in drawing the army stores from New Haven to Danbury. His brother, Jacquin, was not equally eminent for patriotism. In fact, Jacquin took advantage of the presence of the British army to join its ranks. He went away with them, and served through the war. Shortly after that he returned to Danbury on a visit to his mother, who was living in Beaver Brook District.

"The first intimation of his presence was given to a little niece, who in crossing the bridge over Still River, near her grandmother's house (and where is now the grist-mill), was startled by the appearance of a man's head from under the bridge. The man, learning who she was, told her to call her father. She did so, and then the stranger revealed that he was Jacquin Morris, the deserting Danburian. He was not immediately recognized by the brother, having changed considerably, but on uncovering his head a bare spot on his scalp, well known to the family, was found, and he was received. He was obliged to keep himself secluded, and during his stay was secreted in the garret of his mother's house. Some years later he made a second visit home, but did not remain long.

"As an offset to this loss Danbury gained three citizens—and, so far as we can learn, they were good citizens—in the persons of three deserters from the British army. One of these was Harry Brockleton, who lived in Dumping Hole, now Mountainville. The others were privates. Thomas Flynn was the name of one of the latter. He settled in South Street.

"The following anecdote of Brockleton is related by Mr. A. B. Hull. He traded a small piece of land for a horse, and the horse for potatoes. His wife, Hannah, said she would make some poetry on the occurrence. Her poetry was:

"Ehær proprietatis!

Harry Brockleton sold his land for a horse, and his horse for potatoes!

Harry said he would like to make some poetry, which he did, as follows:

"As the children of Israel were passing through the wilderness, the Lord sent them manna:

When Harry Brockleton wanted a wife, the devil sent him Hannah."

"Mr. A. B. Hull, mentioned above, enjoys a distinction which can scarcely be claimed by any other citizen of New England or of the country at large. He is about sixty years of age, and yet is the son of a Revolutionary soldier. His father was seventeen years old when the British burned Danbury. He joined in the pursuit of Tryon through Ridgefield, and was in all the fighting. In escaping one of the dashes of the enemy he found himself back of a rock, in company with two boys a trifle younger than himself, who were having their first experience in battle. While waiting there he discovered that a Tory was in a brake near by, watching with ready gun for them to reappear. Putting his hat on the end of his gun, he pushed it out beyond the rock. Immediately the Tory fired, the bullet piercing the hat. The next instant he plunged towards the rock, when the three boys fired simultaneously at him. At the discharge he sprang several feet in the air and came down full length upon his face, but turned in a flash upon his back, and lay there motionless in death. After the battle Mr. Hull's father went over the ground to look for the body. He found it where it had fallen, but it was stark naked. He saw that the three bullets had taken effect in the Tory's body,—one at the navel, and the two others at such angles as to form the letter V.

"During this catastrophe to Danbury there was an army hospital in existence here. It was established the month before, and was not touched by the British. The location was on what is now called Park Avenue, at the junction of Pleasant Street, on the lot now occupied by Mr. Henry N. Scribner, and just west of his house. All that property was then owned by Samuel Wildman, grandfather of Mr. Samuel C. Wildman, who leased to the government the land for the use of the hospital. Mr. Wildman lived then in the modernized house on the avenue which stands on the east corner, opposite Mr. Scribner. There are several pear-trees in this garden which were set out by Samuel Wildman over a hundred years ago, and which now yield abundantly.

"The soldiers who died at the hospital were buried in a plot of ground now forming the grounds on the south side of George Buell's house on Pleasant Street, near to the corner of the avenue. The soldiers who occupied the hospital were principally French. The place where the dead were buried was held sacred by Mr. Wildman, who would not have it plowed. Some years after it was rented, the tenant, being either ignorant of the burial or extremely practical in his views, cultivated the ground. His plowshare turned up many bones. Relics in metal of the occupancy of the hospital have been found under the soil in Mr. Scribner's garden.

"The hospital itself was a one-storied building, with a large garret in the steep roof. The first floor was divided into four rooms; the garret was one room. The building was torn down many years ago by Mr. Samuel C. Wildman.

"A volume entitled 'Connecticut During the War of Revolution' furnishes some incidents of interest to Danbury. In fact, Danbury largely figures in the book, much of the matter, however, being the same that we have already presented. The book was compiled in 1841 by Royal R. Hinman, who was then secretary of state. The matter pertaining to Danbury was furnished to Mr. Hinman by Reuben Booth. We learn from this book that Danbury's grand list in 1775, at the beginning of the Revolution, was $142,507.66.

"In May, 1777, the month following the burning, Governor Trumbull issued, at the suggestion of the General Assembly, a proclamation. The document is a sorry confession of man's inhumanity to man, especially to his neighbor. It appears from this paper that a lot of shiftless and mercenary wretches took advantage of the appearance of the enemy here to burn the houses and steal the portable property of Danburians and others who escaped the raid of the British. The proclamation calls upon these graceless offenders to immediately restore such property and make good such losses, or suffer the severe penalties of the law.

"We have mentioned the death of a young man named Barnum in the Sugar-House prison, in New York. His father, Col. Joseph Barnum, was seriously affected by the deplorable fate of his boy, and became so full of the spirit of vengeance that on the next day after getting the news he loaded his gun and started out to avenge himself on sympathizers with the British. Seeing a Tory at work in a field the half-crazed father fired at him, wounding him severely. 'He had previously been a professedly pious man, but frequently after the loss of his son concluded his devotions in his family by invoking a curse upon "old King George and his hellish crew."' "

"Several writers say that Nehemiah Dibble, who occupied the old mansion which entertained Gen. Tryon and received the dying breath of Wooster, did not escape punishment for his Tory sympathies. They tell that shortly after the retreat of the British a number of young men took hold upon Dibble, and, carrying him to Still River, near where is now the railroad, immersed him several times in the water, giving him what they called a 'thorough ducking.'

"In the record of the General Assembly, May session, 1777, there are the following interesting entries:

"Thaddeus Benedict, of Danbury, represented to the Assembly that the British troops, when in Danbury, burned his dwelling-house and several other houses kept for public entertainment, and stated that he had provided a convenient house in the centre of said town, and asked for a license to keep a public house, which was granted by said Assembly.

"Mary Hoyt, the wife of Isaac Hoyt, then late of Danbury, shewed to the Assembly that she had ever been a good Whig and a true friend to the rights of her country, and that her husband, when the enemy entered said Danbury, being an enemy to his country, went off and joined the British, by which he had justly forfeited all his estate, both real and personal, and that the selectmen had seized upon all the personal estate of her husband, by means of which she was deprived of the necessities of life, and asked the Assembly to order that one-third part of all the clear movable estate should be given to her, and the use of one-third part of all the real estate, for her natural life, for her support. The Assembly ordered that said Mary Hoyt should have and enjoy one-third part of the personal and real estate during the pleasure of the Assembly.'

"At an adjourned session of the same body in February, 1778, occurred the following:

"John Marsh, of Danbury, stated to the Assembly that when the British troops went into Danbury he through surprise joined them and went away with them, but soon made his escape and returned home, and was committed to gaol, and prayed pardon for the offense, which was granted him, by his taking the oath of fidelity, and paying the cost of prosecution.'

"It appears from an item in the report of the General Assembly that an attack on Danbury was anticipated several weeks before from the Hudson River direction. Two weeks before the attack the Governor sent a letter to Gen. Silliman instructing him to keep a strict watch upon the enemy, who were preparing in New York to go up the North River, with a view, undoubtedly, to destroy the stores at Danbury. On the night of the 27th the General Assembly received word that there were alarming symptoms from the North River, and almost immediately after that Danbury was burned.

"In the March (1778) session of the Assembly occurs the following:

"Hannah Church, of Danbury, the wife of Asa Church, (then) late of said Danbury, shewed the Governor and council that her husband had joined the British army and was then in New York, and that she had no estate to support her, and prayed for liberty to go to New York to her husband. The Governor and council gave her liberty to go to New York, with such necessary apparel as the committee of inspection of said Danbury shall think proper. And Gen. Silliman was directed to grant a flag, or passport, to the said Hannah accordingly."

"The following-named are the prisoners taken from Danbury at the time of the raid: John Bartram, Nathan Benedict, Benjamin Sperry, John Porter, Jonathan Starr, William Roberts, Jacob Gray, and Aaron Gray Knapp.

"In the May (1777) session is the following record:

"Ruth Peck, the widow of Jesse Peck, (then) late of Danbury, stated to the General Assembly that her husband, with three sons, in the spring of 1776 enlisted in the service of the State, and all went through the fatigue of the campaign. Two of the sons were taken prisoners at Fort Washington and suffered the hardships of captivity in New York; one son had the smallpox in the worst manner possible, in the most scarce time of gold, the (then) last winter at New York, who started for home and froze his feet, so that he became a cripple. Another son was sent home by the British about the 1st of January, 1777, infected with the smallpox, of which he soon died, after his arrival; the husband, who had arrived home a short time previous to his son, took the disease, and also died after a long confinement. One other son also took said disease, who by the goodness of God recovered; whereby said Ruth was grievously afflicted, and the town of Danbury expended the sum of twenty-six pounds twelve shillings and six pence in their sickness, and held a claim upon the small estate her husband had left for the payment of it, and, if paid by her, would leave her with a family of small children, and needy indeed; and prayed the Assembly to pay the sum aforesaid."

"In the January (1778) session were given the following depositions regarding the negro who was killed in Maj. Starr's house, and who, we should judge, was a slave whose owner was seeking remuneration. Here are the entries:

"Ebenezer White, of Danbury, of lawful age, testifies and says that on or about the 26th day of April, 1777, at evening, there being a number of gentlemen at his house belonging to the British army, amongst which was one whom he understood was the Earl of Falkland's son, who told him (the deponent) that he was the first that entered Maj. Starr's house, and found a number of men in the house, among whom were two negroes, all of whom they instantly killed, and set fire to the house, and gave this for a reason why they did so, "that it was their constant practice, where they found people shut up in a house and bring upon them, to kill them and to burn the house; and further the deponent saith that the said young gentleman told him that one of the negroes, after he had run him through, rose up and attempted to shoot him, and that he the said Earl of Falkland's son cut his head off himself; which negro, the deponent understood since, was the property of Mr. Samuel Smith, of Reading; and further the deponent saith not."

"DANBURY, Jan. 26, 1778.

"The Rev. Mr. Ebenezer White, the deponent, personally appearing, made oath to the truth of the above written deposition.

"Sworn to before me, Thaddens Benedict, Justice of the Peace.

"Ebenezer Weed, of Danbury, of lawful age, testifies and says that on or about the 26th day of April, 1777, he being at home across the road opposite to Maj. Daniel Starr's house, he saw a negro at the house, which he knew to be the property of Mr. Samuel Smith, of Reading, about a half hour, as near as he can judge, before the British troops came to said house; and further the deponent saith that in the evening of said day he heard a man belonging to the British army say that they had killed one dam'd black with the whites, in said Starr's house; and further the deponent saith not."

"DANBURY, Jan. 26, 1778.

"Sworn before Thaddens Benedict, Justice of the Peace.

"Anna Weed, of Danbury, of lawful age, testifies and says that on or about the 26th day of April, 1777, she being at home across the road opposite to Maj. Starr's house, she saw a negro at said house, which she understood was the property of Mr. Samuel Smith, of Reading, but a short time before the British troops came up to the house; and further the deponent saith she heard one of the British soldiers say "Here is a dam'd black in the house; what shall we do with him?" Another answered, "Damn him, kill him," and immediately the house was in flames; and further the deponent saith not."

"DANBURY, Jan. 26, 1778.

"Sworn to before Thaddens Benedict, Justice of the Peace."

ROLL OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

"It will be remembered that in Mr. Robbins' sermon he spoke of a company of one hundred men being raised in Danbury and ordered to the Northern army, at Lake Champlain. He said that they went away leaving their friends to believe that perhaps they might never return, but they came back safely, while during their absence an epidemic raged in the village and carried off many of their friends.

"The company was raised by Noble Benedict, who was made captain. The men were recruited in May, 1775. It is the only organization contributed by Danbury to the war. It joined the Sixteenth Regiment, commanded by Col. David Waterbury. The following is the list of the company:

"Captain, Noble Benedict.

"Lieutenants, James Clark, Ezra Stephens.

"Ensign, Daniel Heacock."

"Sergeants, John Trowbridge, Eliph Barnum, Elijah Hoyt, Nathan Taylor, John Ambler.

"Corporals, Aaron Stone, Jonah Benedict, David Weed, Moses Veal.

"Musicians, Joseph Hamilton, drummer; Russel Bartlett, Nathaniel Peck, fifers.

"Privates, Seth Barnum, Eleaz Benedict, John Barnum, Eli Barnum, James Boughton, Josiah Burchard, Samuel Bennet, Lazarus Barnum, Hez Benedict, Gilbert Benedict, Wm. Benedict, David Bishop, Eben Barnum, Abram Barns, Joseph Boughton, John Constock, Enoch Crosby, Samuel Curtiss, Wm. Combs, Isaac Colter, Thomas Campbell, James Clements, Samuel Cook, Miles Cauty, Henry Covel, John Chapman, Elnathan Edy, Eliph Ferry, John Guthrie, Wm. Griffin, Drake Hoyt, Thaddens Hoyt, Joshua Hineckley, Jonathan Hayes, John Holcomb, Wm. Hawkins, Francis Jackson, Thomas Judd, John Johnson, Benjamin Gorham, John Green, Henry Knapp, Elisha Lincoln, John Linly, James Lincoln, Nathan Lee, Thomas Morehouse, Thaddens Morehouse, Done Merrick, John Morehouse, Sylvanus Nelson, Isaac Northrop, Wilson Northrop, Joshua Porter, Wm. Porter, Elkanah Peck, Farel Picket, Caleb Spencer, Samuel Spencer, Eli Stephens, Samuel Sturdivant, Daniel Segar, Levi Starr, John Stephens, Jabez Starr, James Scovel, Stephen Scovel, Peter Stringham, Isaac Smith, Thomas Starr, Ephraim Smith, Levi Stone, Stephen Townsend, Samuel Townsend, Stephen Trowbridge, Joshua Taylor, Thomas Weed, Samuel C. Warren (or Warden), Major Warren, Thomas Wheaton, Jonas Weed, David Sturdivant.

"The captain of the above company was father of the late Archibald Benedict, and he lived in the house now occupied by the venerable widow of Archibald, on North Main Street. The captain was a stutterer, and many anecdotes based on this infirmity are related of him. We give one of them. When he was at Lake Champlain with his company the countersign in use one night was the word 'Ticonderoga.' The captain came across a sentry, who, halting him, demanded the countersign. 'T' was a bad letter for the captain to overcome, and in his mad efforts to clutch it he lost all memory of the word itself. In this dilemma he shouted to the sentry: 'S-s-s-say the word, and I e-e-e-can tell it.' History does not tell what the sentry did, but, as the captain returned safely to Danbury, it is presumed the matter was compromised satisfactorily.

"James Clark, first lieutenant, lived on South Main Street. His wife, on the coming of the British, sunk her silver-ware and some other articles in the well, and fled with her family to a more congenial latitude.

"Ezra Stevens, the second lieutenant, lived in Pembroke District. He was great-grandfather of Erastus Stevens. His son Eli was in the company as a private.

"First Sergt. John Trowbridge lived at the upper end of Main Street; he was a grandfather of Truman Trowbridge. Second Sergt. Eliph Barnum lived at the south end of the village. Third Sergt. Elijah Hoyt lived where now stands the residence of Charles H. Merritt, on Main Street.

"Corp. Jonah Benedict has already been treated of as far as our information goes. Corp. David Weed lived in King Street District, near to where Aaron Pearce now lives.

"Joseph Hamilton, the drummer, lived in Pembroke District, and a very patriotic portion of this town it appears to have been.

"Private Seth Barnum lived in King Street, opposite the Baptist church. John Barnum and Eli Barnum lived in the same district. Samuel Curtis lived near to where Ezra Mallory & Co.'s hat-factory stands. He was once sexton of the First Church. Drake Hoyt and Thaddeus Hoyt lived in Pembroke District. Thaddeus for a number of years kept the town-poor on contract, as was then the custom. Thomas Judd lived in Great Plain District, his house standing where now Granville Taylor lives. Benjamin Gorham lived in Miry Brook District. John Green lived at the junction of Elm and River Streets. John Lindley lived in King Street District. Thaddeus Morehouse lived on Main Street in a house now owned by George E. Cowperthwait, and standing next north to his residence. Stephen Trowbridge lived, we are told, on the corner of Main and Liberty Streets, where is now Benedict & Nichols' Block.

Levi Stone belonged in the Middle River District. Joshua Porter came home from the Northern campaign all right, but lost his life by Tryon's troops in Maj. Starr's house. John Ambler, the fifth sergeant, was a great-grandfather of Rev. E. C. Ambler, and was at that time a man of advanced age. The grandfather of Rev. Mr. Ambler, Peter Ambler, and two of Peter's brothers, Stephen and Squire Ambler, were in the war, but not in this company. The family lived in Miry Brook District.

"Ensign Daniel Heacock was a grandfather of Col. Samuel Gregory. He lived in Bethel. His home is still standing, being near A. B. Blackman's house. Col. Gregory has in his possession the powder-horn which Henry Knapp, private, carried in the company's campaign. Mr. Knapp lived in the Westville District. Jabez Starr kept the tavern which stood on property adjoining The News office. David Weed lived in Westville District, where Mr. Anson Comstock's house now stands. Daniel Segar lived on the Mill Plain road. Stephen Townsend lived near the New York State line.

"Young Lockwood, who went to meet the British on their approach to Danbury to learn their strength, and was captured on Hoyt's Hill, was left there on the flight of the British. It is said that while living in Norwalk, some time before this, he did a favor for Governor Tryon, on the occasion of an accident to the Governor's carriage when he was driving through Norwalk. The Governor was writing a parole for him when the alarm of the approach of the Americans under Wooster came upon him, and the paper was dropped.

"It must not be understood, however, that these men were all that Danbury gave to the war, but the company was the only organization going from here of which there is any record. On a previous page it was stated that two sons of Aaron Gunn, living at the upper end of Main Street, were drafted into the army during the war of 1812-14. Previous to the draft they enlisted and served for several months at New London. When drafted they were assigned to duty at the same place. Uncle Amos Morris and the late Frederick White were drafted at the same time. At New London the command had the choice of messing inside or outside the fort. The Gunn party of Danbury boys chose the outside, and boarded with a widow-woman who gave them a bed and cooked their rations daily for the sum of six cents each. No mess in New London fared so well as the Danbury mess, thanks to the knowledge of the country gained by the two Gunn boys during their previous location in the place.

"One day an officer of the regiment visited their quarters at dinner-time, and was amazed at the sight of their table. One prominent dish thereon was new potatoes, and that before the same were scarcely in the market and totally unknown to the commissary.

"'Why, boys, how's this?' he exclaimed. 'Here you've got new potatoes! Why, there's not another mess in the command with new potatoes. We can draw nothing but old potatoes. How is it that you draw new ones?"

"I'll tell you, major, how we draw them," spoke up White, in a confidential tone: "we draw them by the tops."

CHAPTER XVIII.

VIEW OF DANBURY IN 1815-20.

IN the following chapter, taken from the Danbury News, will be found located all the dwellings and stores which, in 1815-20, stood upon the present site of the village.

MAIN STREET.

"It is likely that, with few exceptions, the picture was the same at the beginning of the century. Main Street was then as now the principal thoroughfare. Running from it on the east was North, White, and Liberty Streets; on the west, Franklin, Elm, West, and Wooster Streets; South Street at the foot. The other streets were River and Town Hill. Deer Hill Avenue was then but a lane, chiefly used for the transfer of farm products.

"East Side.—The first house, on coming into Main Street at the north, on the east side of the street, was occupied by Aaron Gunn. It was washed away by the Kohanza disaster in 1869. Mr. Gunn had two sons who were drafted in the war of 1812, and entered the army at New London.

"The next house stood on the corner of North Street. It was occupied by Benjamin Barnum, and was a large, roomy building. Some years ago it was moved north on Main Street, and still stands there.

"On the opposite corner, where is now the Porter estate, lived Noah Hubbell, grandfather of Mrs. John Carpenter. Between there and what is now Patch Street there was but one house. It was occupied by William Patch, Jr., father-in-law of its present occupant, Oliver P. Clark.

"Next to him was a small tenement owned by Mary Daniels, an aunt of the late W. A. Daniels, and was then occupied by a family named Barnum.

"John Gregory's house came next. None of his descendants are living here.

"Where Wildman's Lane or Court now is were two houses, since gone. One of these was occupied by Benjamin Cozier and the other by William Patch, father of the William living above, and grandfather of Mrs. A. P. Tweedy and Mrs. G. D. Foote.

"The next premises were those of John Nickerson, a lay preacher in the Methodist church. Nickerson was an active man, and consequently well known to his fellow-citizens.

"Then came another tenant-house, which was occupied by Zar Patch.

"Following the tenement was the home of Archibald Benedict, now occupied by his venerable widow. He was a son of Capt. Noble Benedict, our Revolutionary hero.

"The residence now occupied by Harrison Flint was then the home of the late Enoch Moore. It was built by Amos Stevens.

"Next in order came the home of Abel Gregory, now owned by Mrs. Henry Benedict, and after this a school-house. It stood on the north line of what is now the grounds of E. T. Hoyt's home. Many years ago it was removed to Franklin Street, where it continued to be used as a school until about fifteen years ago, when it was turned into a tenement.

"Deacon Joseph Platt Cook, son of the Revolutionary colonel of the same name who was in command of Danbury when Tryon came, occupied the next house. It stood on nearly the same ground at present occupied by the residence of William Jabine.

"Russel Hoyt lived next to Deacon Cook, in the house now occupied by his son Granville.

"Just south of the house was a store where Daniel B. Cook sold shoes, shirting, sugar, and other groceries. The building was subsequently removed to White Street, and is now occupied by Avery Raymond's market.

"Next came the home of Col. Russel White, which stood on the site of the present residence of his son, William R. White. Col. White was a prominent hat-manufacturer.

"Nirum Wildman lived next, in the house now occupied by his grandson, John W. Wildman.

"Where the residence of Giles M. Hoyt now stands stood the home of Rev. Ebenezer R. White, grandfather of William R. White and Ebenezer R. Whitteley. Between and partly in front of these two houses stood a small building once the store of Burr & White, but at this time occupied by the worshippers in the Sandemanian Church. Previously dissension had arisen in the body because of the second marriage of an elder, and the congregation divided.

"Next came the hat-manufactory of White Brothers & Co. It stood near the banks of the Still River, its site not at present being occupied.

"Across the river, and on the corner of White Street, stood the giant old home of Benjamin Knapp.

"West Side.—Going back to the north end of the street and returning on the west side, the first house was the home of Stephen Ambler, the husband of Miss Munson. He was the grandfather of Mrs. A. A. Heath and O. P. and W. H. Clark. He did active work in the war. It is said that he and five brothers, lying down on a thirty-six foot stick of timber, would just cover its length. His house stood under the hill, next to the graveyard, and was long since torn down.

"The graveyard itself was then there. It was not only opened to relieve the Wooster Street grounds, but to accommodate the districts of Middle River, King Street, and Pembroke, which then, being sparingly settled, had no burial-place in their district.

"Andrew Akin occupied the house now owned by George Downs.

"Next to it was the home of Mary Daniels, who owned property on the other side of the street. The place is now occupied by V. E. Barnum.

"John Foot, father of Mrs. Ezra Abbott, lived in the next house.

"Where Abijah Knapp's home is stood Capt. Foot's hat-shop.

"Adjoining this was a tenement, now owned by Harmon Knapp.

"Following came the home of Asa Hodge, now occupied by George W. Hoyt.

"Thaddeus Morehouse lived next north of where now stands the home of G. E. Cowperthwait.

"Adjoining was a small tenement, which closed its existence in a summary and tragic manner. We do not know who occupied it at the time. It perished in 1836. It was at the time that a strong anti-slave feeling was exhibited in the North. An Abolitionist address in the Baptist church called forth a mob, who stoned the church, breaking the windows, and threatened the life of the speaker, Rev. Mr. Colver, who was visiting here. Danbury's trade was then largely in the South, and it was natural its people should be in sympathy with that section and averse to anything calculated to disturb its peace. The family occupying the tenement were strong anti-slavery people, and had given shelter to runaway slaves. This coming to the knowledge of our citizens, a number of them made a descent upon the house in the night-time and leveled it to the ground. The family escaped.

"The next house was occupied by Knapp Boughton, who distinguished himself by winning for a wife the young woman Parson Robbins wanted. He was father of L. H. Boughton. His place was removed to make room for the spacious residence of S. H. Rundle.

"Mrs. Boughton, mother of Knapp, occupied a house adjoining his. It was afterwards owned by Nathaniel Bishop, and was removed. On the southeast corner of this lot was a brick building occupied by Knapp Boughton as a store. It was removed a long time ago.

"Mrs. Elias Boughton occupied a place where now stands George C. White's residence.

"The next building stood on the corner of Franklin Street, where Barr Roland now lives. It was occupied as a hat-finishing shop by Russell and Eli T. Hoyt.

"On the opposite corner stood the residence of William Cook, who was a prominent member of the Masonic order. Mrs. William D. Morris' dwelling now occupies its site. Mr. Cook's house was removed to Patch Street.

"Next to Mr. Cook lived Starr Nichols, grandfather of Mr. John Nichols, of Nichols & Hine. He was a large hat-manufacturer, and an active man in all enterprises.

"Following this was a tenement. It was taken down, and the present residence of Judge Lyman D. Brewster occupies its place.

"Next came the residence of Samuel and William Tweedy, father and son. Samuel was the grandfather of Edgar S. Tweedy. They were cutters off of fur, and their shop stood north and in rear of their home.

"Adjoining their house was the place of Gershom Nichols.

"Where Charles H. Merritt's residence now is stood the house of Capt. Elijah Hoyt, grandfather of William and Albert Hoyt.

"Daniel B. Cook, son of Col. Joseph Platt Cook, the soldier of the Revolution, lived where does now L. P. Hoyt.

"Next to this place was a store occupied by E. M. White. It was removed to White Street.

"Following was a house belonging to Najah Wildman.

"Next south of Najah Wildman stood a house where A. N. Wildman's residence now is.

"On the river-bank stood a mill. It was built in the last century by Daniel Comstock for a grist-mill, and occupied by Samuel C. Dibble. Afterwards for many years it served as a hat-forming factory, and was owned by Niram Wildman. To-day the spot has again become the location of a grist-mill,—that of G. S. Disbrow. For some years it was used as a mill. There was considerable feeling at one time in the community occasioned by this mill. The occupant wanted to build a waste-weir to empty into the stream at a point just below the opposite side of the street, but Mr. Knapp, who lived on the corner and owned the land, would not give him the right of way. The only alternative was to tap Mad River just above its junction with Still River, near to where is the rear of Nichols & Hine's factory. The plan did not work, however, as the grade did not give sufficient fall to carry off the water. As the grist-mill was a matter of considerable importance to the people, public sentiment took a hand, and Mr. Knapp was induced to consent to the emptying of the weir in Still River in the rear of his house. The mill-building was last occupied by Holly & Wildman, wool-hat manufacturers. It was destroyed by fire in 1868.

"The building on the corner of Elm Street now owned by H. N. Fenton was at that time the home-stead of Samuel Tweedy. It has been made into stores and built on to considerable since then. In its rear stood a hat-factory occupied by Tweedy & Benedict.

"Between White and Liberty Streets.—There have been more changes in that portion of Main Street between these points than in any other part of the thoroughfare, and far less in Main Street as a whole than in any other street, except, perhaps, South Street.

"In 1815 there were but eight buildings on the east side of Main Street between White and Liberty, where is now an almost unbroken bank of business places. The space not immediately occupied by these buildings was used for gardens and fields, principally pasturage, while that portion in the neighborhood of the railroad buildings, up as far as White Street, was swamp. Except in front of the buildings the wall the length of the block was a stone fence. Mullein, dock, milk-weed, and brambles were conspicuous products.

"The first building, passing down the street, was a small brown tenement.

"Close to it was the dwelling of Mrs. Betsey Benedict. It stood where is now Schoppaul's bakery. She owned a store-building, which was next in order, and was then rented by Irel Ambler. Previously, Eli T. Hoyt and his brother Russel occupied it. It stood where is now the station of the Danbury and Northwalk Railway.

"There was no other structure until the dwelling of Lemuel W. Benedict was reached. It stood where is now the house occupied by David Pearce.

"Mr. Benedict's neighbor on the south was Samuel H. Phillips. Near his house was a little store run by Mr. Phillips. The same building now stands. It belongs to the estate of the late Sturges Selleck, and is now occupied by Mrs. M. Harris. Mr. Phillips was a well-known character. He was deputy postmaster of Danbury, and kept the office in his store. Consequently, his place was a resort for the various luminaries, and Mr. Phillips perhaps heard more mendacity than any other citizen of Danbury. He was a quiet man, of a studious turn, and, having a well-balanced mind, was rarely surprised into states of undue feeling. One day a woman apparently very anxious for a letter came in and gave her name. There was nothing for her.

"'I wish you'd look again,' said she, 'for I'm sure there must be a letter here for me.'

"He complied, carefully going over the stock-in-hand.

"'There is no letter here,' he said.

"'Well, that's strange,' she muttered. 'I was sure it must be here. When do you suppose I'll get one?' History does not give his answer.

"Another well-known resident was the next neighbor to Postmaster Phillips. He was Eli Mygatt, a heavy gentleman in knee-breeches. His dwelling stood where is now Baldwin Bros.' drug-store, and just south of it he kept a drug-store himself. There must be something in the locality favorable to the existence of the drug-business, as it has been used for that purpose by different parties since the day Uncle Eli began his enterprise. Both his residence and his store have long since passed away. Uncle Eli had charge of the Franklin Library, as it was kept in his store.

He did not do an extensive business, and made no effort to.

"On the corner of Main and Liberty Streets, where now stands Benedict & Nichols' Block, lived Mathew Curtis. Mr. Curtis was a butcher, and had his slaughter quite convenient, it being on Liberty Street, in the rear of his house, and where now stands the Disciples' church. Mr. Curtis did not have a market; no one did in that day. He followed the course lately revived by Orrin Lessey, of selling his meat entirely from a wagon. The slaughter was a favorite resort for the boys of that day, who are now gray-headed men, and it was also a place frequented by frugal housewives of very limited means, where a sheep's-head or pluck could be got for a mere song, and a whole beef's liver for two or three pennies.

"West Side.—On the corner of Elm Street, the premises now owned by J. S. Taylor, stood the tavern of Dr. Jabez Starr, a prominent Revolutionist. Dr. Starr's swinging sign bore the simple inscription 'The Inn.' It was the headquarters on training-days of the up-town military companies, which consisted of a cavalry and an infantry organization. The infantry used to parade in the square fronting the tavern. On one of these occasions—in 1812, we believe—a corporal was to be elected. It appears that the ladies, who favored the military, had the privilege of selecting the candidate for this honor. Their suffrage was given in behalf of a blushing youth from Great Plain District, then eighteen years old. On his election being announced, it was incumbent on him to step to the front and pledge himself to faithfully perform the duties of the office. The ladies were assembled in front of the residence of Samuel Tweedy, on the opposite corner, and the youth, in making his acknowledgment, was obliged to face them,—an ordeal that very nearly prostrated him, but he got through with it. The eighteen-year-old boy was Deacon Eli T. Hoyt.

"Peck & Wildman's grocery was then an unpretentious dwelling, little dreaming of the glory it was in time to ripen into, with a gorgeous landscape as a forepiece.

"The dwelling and church in the lane, both the property of the Sandemanian Society, were standing then.

"The St. George Tavern, now the property of Mrs. Urana Barnum, was then occupied by her father, William Dobbs. Long before the period of which we write it had ceased to be a hostelry.

"Next in order was the residence of Moses Hatch,—or Judge Hatch, as he was called. It is now owned by his grandson, Alexander Wildman, and is unoccupied. He had an office built on the street-line, and now moved to rear of the post-office building. Moses Hatch was a prominent member of the bar. He defended Amos Adams, a negro executed in Danbury in 1817 for rape. Mr. Hatch died at the early age of forty-one, at the threshold of what promised to be a brilliant career.

"The residence of the venerable E. Moss White stood where is now the library building reared by the liberality and public spirit of his sons. He was both a successful farmer and merchant of Danbury, a man well known, thoroughly trusted, and sincerely respected by his fellow-townsmen. The old homestead became the residence of the late Col. N. L. White, and after he vacated it it was used by the library association until the present building was started, when it was moved to Library Place, where it now stands.

"Benajah Starr occupied the present residence of Hon. Roger Averill.

"Next to him lived Deacon Thomas Tucker, grandfather of the late Col. White. It is now the residence of Mrs. George W. Ives.

"Next came the residence of Asel Benedict, grandfather of the Benedict Brothers, shoe-dealers. The present residence of Edgar A. Benedict occupies its site.

"Mrs. Huldah Starr's house followed. Her premises took in the corner of West Street. The dwelling and lot were bought in 1864 by J. S. Taylor, who built up the present block of stores and tenements. The old homestead is among these, but its identity is completely lost.

From Liberty Street to the Court-House.—Maj. Seth Comstock lived in a substantial residence on the corner of Liberty Street. He was a merchant, and had a store just south of his dwelling. Maj. Comstock was a man in good circumstances, and once in his life created quite a sensation in the community. He had a son doing business in New York City. The son was to be married, and desired the ceremony to take place in his father's home. He sent word to that effect, directing his father to fix up the place in the best possible style, and he would make good the expense. The major accordingly proceeded to make the homestead into a wedding-bower. Carpenters, painters, and upholsterers were set to work, and for days the transformation went on. Summer-houses, arbors, and grottos were put up in the garden. The entire front of the house was changed by elaborate additions placed thereon, and the premises blossomed into the appearance of a small paradise. The place was daily visited by Danbury people, who were filled with pride and admiration as they viewed it. Even abroad went the fame of the change, and people from neighboring towns came to see the Comstock palace. The transformation was all the talk of the day and supplanted every other subject. The wedding was in keeping with the preparation therefor, and filled the street in the neighborhood with curious people.

"Among those who came from out of town was a young man hailing from the extremely rural district of Wolfpits, below Bethel. He was barefooted and timid. He had heard of the grand house and the beautiful garden, and he wanted so much to see them that he walked to Danbury for that purpose. But when he got here and saw how grand was the place he dared not step on the premises. More than that, he feared to go on the same side of the street, but kept on the opposite side. Even at that he shrunk from stopping in front of the place, so timid was this rural lad. He walked slowly up the street and then back again, feasting his eyes upon the architectural magnificence and bucking against numerous people in his eagerness to look alone at the house. That was fifty years ago, and the barefooted farm-boy so overcome by the display that he dared not stop in front of it is Mr. Charles Hull and the present owner of the property.

"The transformation of the place into a bridal-bower cost a number of thousand dollars. In the place of the residence and his store stands Mr. Hull's block of business places.

"Rachel Barnum's dwelling came next. It stood where is now Almon Judd's store and home.

"Next came the residence of Friend Starr, father of Charles F. Starr, and now occupied by the latter. Mr. Starr had a shoe-store where the Pahquioque Bank now is. The following anecdote is related of Charles F. Starr when he was a boy: One of his duties was to go to the pasture and bring home the cows. He rode a horse for this purpose, and, being of a social turn, generally came home with several playmates perched on the animal behind him. In fact, the horse was full of boys. Old Mr. Starr got out of patience, finally, with making an omnibus of the steed, and he told Charles one day that if he came home at night with any boys behind him on the horse he would severely punish him. When the cows came in that evening, there was the horse as full of boys as ever. But every mother's son of them was in front of Charles. That conscientious youth was poised well back on the animal's rump. His father gave up the point.

"Where Martin H. Griffing's residence now is lived Zalmon Wildman, father of Hon. F. S. Wildman. Just north of his house was a small hat-finishing shop, and on the south was a store. The dwelling was removed to the rear, on East Liberty Street, where it is used as a tenement.

"The Pahquioque Hotel was then a private residence, and was occupied by Elijah Sanford, grandfather of Librarian C. H. Sanford. He had a saddlery at the north end of the building. In company with Friend Starr he conducted a tannery, which stood on Liberty Street, at the junction of Railway Avenue.

"Abel B. Blackman lived in the house now occupied by the family of the late Lyman Keeler. Mr. Blackman was a shoemaker, and had his shop on the north side of his house.

"David Foot's house stood on the site occupied by Dr. W. F. Lacey. Mr. Foot was a tailor. His shop stood in the southwest corner of his door-yard, where is now the doctor's drive-way entrance. Mr. Foot was a prominent man in that day, and was for many years a trying justice of the peace.

"Benjamin Smith lived where is now the residence of Samuel Stebbins.

"His neighbor on the south was Horace Bull. He lived where now stands St. Peter's church. His house was removed to the since-opened Centre Street, and is now the parsonage of St. Peter's church. He was the father of the children's great friend, Miss Mary Bull. Mr. Bull was a tailor. He was also a noted singer, and for over thirty years was the chorister of the First Congregational Church. He was the first milk-peddler Danbury had, peddling on the street from a cart and ringing a bell at the customer's door. This was in 1850, we think. Up to that time people bought their milk from neighbors who owned a cow, sending the children for it; and at this time every fourth family had its cow. A tribute to Mr. Bull's musical talent was a remark Judge Dutton, then of the Superior Court, made when in Danbury. He said, 'I heard Mr. Bull ring his bell this morning, and there was really music in it.' Mr. Bull's sales amounted to about forty quarts a day.

"There was no house between his place and what is now the Turner House, but was then a tavern kept by David Wood. The land lying between, and running clear back to Town Hill Street, was a vacant lot, boggy at the front with meadow at the rear. This piece belonged to the First Congregational Society, and the use of it was given to the pastor.

"Joseph Moss White, father of Col. E. Moss White, lived where is now the G. F. Bailey homestead. Mr. White was a surveyor, and held a county office as such.

"Maj. Comstock's store was an important centre of business aside from its traffic in merchandise. In the day of which we write there was no bank here, and the only means of exchange was through an agency of a distant bank. The Phoenix Bank, of Hartford, had a branch in Litchfield, and Mr. Comstock was its agent here. Twice a week the stage plying between Norwalk and Litchfield passed through Danbury and took up the money and bills collected by agent Comstock and carried them to Litchfield. The major did a business also in iron-ore. This was received from the mines at Brewster and piled up on the ground in rear of his place. Mr. Hull has frequently found pieces of this ore in excavating on the premises.

"Where now stands the store long occupied by the late Samuel Stebbins stood a shoe-shop, which as early as 1805 was occupied by Col. Ebenezer D. Starr.

"Zalmon Wildman, who lived where now stands the residence of M. H. Griffing, was a prominent man in the history of the town. He was appointed post-master in 1805, and held the office for a period of thirty years, when he resigned the position on being elected to Congress. This election occurred in the spring of 1835. In the winter following he died. Mr. Phillips was Mr. Wildman's deputy, and to him Mr. Wildman gave the income from the office.

"From West to Wooster Streets.—The first building was a small one, and stood on the corner. Next to it was a store. Both structures stood where is now the garden of Mr. F. S. Wildman. The first was used for various purposes. Early in the century it was used as a comb-shop by Green & Barnum until 1815, after that it was occupied by a party named Leggett for fur-cutting. It also was used as a barber-shop, a school, and a stone-cutting-shop. Subsequently, William Gray used it as a tailor-shop. It now stands on the Danbury and Norwalk Railway line, opposite the freight-depot, where it is occupied as a tenement. The store was built in 1800 by Col. Timothy Taylor, who occupied it. In 1818 it was rented by Amos and Samuel Stebbins, who did business there until 1839, when the building was torn down. Amos died some years before this, and the business was conducted by his brother Samuel. When this place was removed, Mr. Wildman put up the building across the way, where the late Samuel Stebbins did business until his death.

"Next to the store, and where is now the Methodist parsonage, stood the home of Alanson Hamlin. He was a lawyer.

"Between this and where is now Mrs. Amos Stebbins' residence there was no building. It was an open meadow with a pond at the front. In 1830 or thereabout Thomas T. Whittlesey put up two buildings where now stands the Baptist church. One of these was built for a conference-room for the First Congregational Society. In 1838 it was occupied by Benedict & Nichols, who remained there until 1842, when they took the building now occupied by Almon Judd. In 1852 they built on the corner of Liberty Street, which they now own. After they vacated the conference-building it was bought by Judge Homer Peters, who removed it to the foot of Liberty Street, where he now occupies it. The other building was used at one time for the publication of the Danbury Recorder. It stood on part of the ground now occupied by the Baptist church, and when it was built the building was moved south, where it still stands.

"West Side.—Where the house of Mrs. Amos Stebbins stands stood at the beginning of the century a house occupied by Dr. Daniel Comstock. He was the physician of the village then, and a man of considerable mental attainments. There was an addition to the house in which, from 1812 to 1815 or thereabout, was published a paper by Nathaniel Skinner. In the last-named year he removed his office to Bridgeport.

"The next house was the house of Maj. Ezra Starr, who distinguished himself in the Revolution. It was built on the site of the one burned by Tryon's troops. In 1830 the property came into the possession of Starr Nichols, who moved back the major's house and built the one now owned and occupied by Hon. D. P. Nichols. Maj. Starr had a large family, but none of its members have a residence in Danbury now.

"The next house was occupied by Col. Elias Starr, and is now the residence of Edward Allen. The colonel was a teacher, and his school (private) was in the next building, now a tenement, and twenty years ago occupied by L. H. Boughton as a shoe-store.

"There was no other building until near the corner of Wooster Street, where stood the 'Academy,' a public school of the higher order. It is now a tenement belonging to St. Peter's parish, and adjoins on the north Vaughn & O'Brien's carriage-factory (the old church). For many years the lamented Irwin taught there, and a number of our gray-haired citizens drank in knowledge at that fountain.

"East Side.—The present court-house was built in 1823-24. Its predecessor was a box-shaped affair of two stories, with a little chunked cupola on its roof. The first floor was used for some time as a place of worship for the Universalists and until they built the structure across the way that in later years became the church of St. Peter's parish. In front of the old court-house stood the whipping-post and stocks, and both institutions passed away with the building. The stocks fell into disuse a long time before the whipping-post was abolished. Whippings were frequent in the early days of the century. The punishment was inflicted by justices' decisions as well as by court decrees, although much lighter in the former cases. The whipping was generally done by the deputy sheriff. The late Aaron Seeley and Samuel Wildman as deputy sheriffs, and Levi Starr as constable, presided at the post.

"The principal whipping-day was that which followed the close of the court session. The victims were relieved of their upper clothes in the jail. Then a blanket was placed over their bodies, and they were marched across the street to the post. The prisoner's hands were tied about the post above his head, the blanket removed, and his suspenders let down. Then the sheriff took position with the whip, carefully measuring the distance so the lash would just lay across the back in the stroke and not lap around the side. The number of blows adjudged the culprit, varying from five to twenty-five, were then administered. Blood was rarely drawn by the lash, but the stroke made heavy marks. These were red on the backs of white persons, and white on the persons of negroes. The whipping over, the victim's suspenders were put up, the blanket replaced over his back, and he was taken back to jail. There were cases where the hands were not tied to the post, but simply clasped to it. The whippings were conducted in public, but were not largely attended, there being but few present to witness the performance, and those being mostly young boys and idlers.

"The last known case of whipping in this section was in Brookfield. The victim was a Danbury man. There was a reunion in Brookfield of the veterans of the war of 1812-14, and the attendance from neighboring towns was quite large. The village store, which sold New England rum as well as other groceries, was doing an immense business. There were two openings in the counter above the money-drawer,—one for silver, and the other for bills. When the money was received it was put through these openings. The Danbury man (whose name it is not necessary to mention) lounged about on the counter, a most innocent-looking party. He had in his possession a bit of stick with tar on the end of it. When the merchant and his assistants ran to the door to look at the doings outside, he would push the stick down into the opening for bills, and by the help of the adhesive tar would draw up one. At night the merchant discovered the loss. The Danbury man who had lounged on the counter was suspected. He was followed to Danbury, arrested, and the money with tar-marks found in his possession. He was taken to Brookfield, confessed his crime, and was publicly and severely whipped.

"West Side.—The present handsome jail-building was erected in 1872. Its predecessor was of stone, and was built in 1830. The building before that was a frame structure with barred windows, out of which a modern housebreaker would have made his exit in less than no time.

"There was no building between the jail and the present estate of the late Aaron Seeley. The 'saddle-factory' was not built until 1836. At the time it was put up it was considerable of a building, and its business bade fair to be an extensive industry. It was occupied by Elias S. Sanford and William B. Fry in the manufacture of saddles and harness. The firm had a store in New Orleans. The manufacture was carried on for about four years, when the failure of the firm broke up the business. In 1840, or thereabouts, Stone & Wadhams rented the front of the building for a store, and remained there three or four years. James S. Taylor and his brother Granville did business there after that, and when they left the building became a tenement. Several years ago the greater part of it was destroyed by fire.

"The store on the Seeley estate stood where is now the residence. It was at one time occupied by Amos and Samuel Stebbins.

"Next to that was a tavern built of brick. It is now the residence of Mrs. George Meeker. The tavern was built by Maj. Whiting at the close of the last century. Henry S. Whiting, a son of the builder, kept the tavern until 1816, or thereabouts, when the late Aaron Seeley became its host, and remained in charge some fourteen years. The hotel was a popular resort, and a stopping-place for the stages that ran from New York to Litchfield. In those days its capacious yard and stabling were the scene of much activity. Henry Whiting went to Herkimer, N. Y., from Danbury, engaged there in the tavern business, and died there. There is none of the family in Danbury.

"The house next to the tavern, and now known as the Bedient place, was, until 1830, occupied by two brothers, Darius and John Starr.

"The next building stood where James Doran now lives. It was occupied by Nathaniel Wood, who was a shoemaker and had a shop in his yard.

"Just north of William H. Clark's residence, and on his property, is a brick dwelling which was built by Fairchild Wildman, who kept a store there for many years, and it was also occupied by Warden Clark and Nelson Crane for this purpose. In 1865 it was converted into a dwelling. On its site stood a building owned by Zachariah Griswold, who occupied it about 1820 for a suspender-manufactory. It was not a successful venture, although Mr. Griswold did quite a business at one time.

"The present residence of Mr. Clark dates back from the last century. At one time in the last decade of the eighteenth century a room in it was used as the office of the village paper, and the building itself was the dwelling of one of the proprietors. Mr. Clark retains a door in which are the nails that held the various prints which it was once customary to tack on the printing-office door. For many years the place belonged to Hiram Barnes, the famous stage-man, and from its gates his four-in-hands have gallantly trotted, to the great delight of the village youth.

"The house now occupied by Charles H. Hoyt was long the residence of Everett Ames, grandfather of Mrs. Hoyt. At the beginning of the century it was occupied by Joshua Benedict, who was a saddle-manufacturer and made saddles in the building.

"His neighbor on the south, and in the house now occupied by Charles Bigelow, was Dr. Daniel M. Carrington. Mr. Carrington had an addition to his residence in which he dispensed drugs, and which business gave him the title of 'Doctor.' Dr. Carrington was a prominent citizen, and was several times sent to the Legislature.

"In the time of which we write Town Hill Avenue had but three houses. It was not an avenue then, but simply a lane, running around from Liberty Street, as it does now, and connecting with South Street. It was then commonly known as 'Niggers' Lane,' although the hill itself bore its present name. Why it was called Town Hill we do not know. Perhaps because there was no town on it, nor any likely to be.

"One of the three houses was owned and occupied by Agur Hoyt, father-in-law of the venerable Amos Morris. He lived on the east side of the street, where I. W. Stillman's house now stands.

"There was a low-browed house which stood across the way. It was occupied by Aunt Liz Henry. Aunt Liz was an aged maiden, of decrepit form, popularly supposed to be a witch, although no more direct evidence of this than mere surmise hatched from the brain of the superstitious was ever laid at her dingy door. Her house stood where Lawrence Smith now lives, and a part of it is, we believe, incorporated in his building.

"Near to where Turner Street now intersects Town Hill Avenue stood a building occupied by a negro named Peter Stockbridge. It is remarkable what a great matter a little fire kindleth. As near as we can get at it, the disagreeable name of the lane came from this single family of colored people. Peter was a prolific man, and he had a large family of interesting children. He was commonly known among the people of that day as Peter Goathead.

"There were no more buildings until the foot of Liberty Street was reached. There, where is now Railway Avenue, stood the extensive tannery of Starr & Sanford. Of both of these men we have already spoken. The business of the tanner, like that of the fuller, has concentrated at prominent centres since that day. Then tanneries and fulling-shops were distributed throughout the land, Danbury having several of each. The Starr & Sanford tannery, with its vats and bark-buildings, extended almost to where is now the railway-track.

"The only dwelling on Liberty Street then was occupied by Mrs. Betsey Starr, widow of Col. Ebenezer Dibble Starr, who was a shoemaker. He died in 1816. It stood where is now Burr Rockwell's place.

WEST STREET

"North Side.—The first house was the dwelling of Elijah Gregory, where L. S. Benedict now lives. He was a blacksmith, and had his shop in one corner of the yard. Mr. Gregory was a somewhat prominent man, and was sent to the Legislature. The house was a large frame building. It now stands on George Street, where it has become a tenement.

"The next house was that in which John Fry lived, and where now stands Dr. W. H. Rider's residence. He was a hat-manufacturer, and had his shop on the premises. Prior to his occupancy Benedict Gregory owned the premises. This was in 1812. In 1827, Fry, Gregory & Co. occupied the shop. After this Mr. Gregory went to Dayton, Ohio, where he died. Ohio, and especially Dayton, called away a number of people from Danbury in the first years of the present century.

"Next came the place of Ezra Gregory, grandfather of Mr. L. P. Hoyt. He lived where C. H. Reed now does, and had a small tannery in the rear of his house. He was a shoemaker.

"Next to him was the home of Uncle Mathew Gregory, now occupied by the family of the late Ephraim Gregory; he was a farmer. Between the two places is now New Street. This street was opened mainly through the exertions of Thomas T. Whittlesey, and it was named after him, but the name was subsequently changed by a borough-meeting.

"Nathan Gregory lived where is now the large double house owned by Mrs. Charles Benedict. He was a fuller of cloth, and the buildings used for fulling stood on the premises. The manufacture of cloth in those days was strictly a domestic industry. The wool or flax (linen) was bought of the stores. The housewife spun it into threads on her spinning-wheels. It was then woven into cloth, and after that taken to the fuller, who dressed and colored it. The process was something similar to the making of rag carpets in a later day. There are fine linen sheets preserved in Danbury to-day which were made from the flax seventy years ago.

"Rev. Israel Ward owned the place now occupied by Uncle Ira Dibble. He was the pastor of the First Congregational Church, and lies buried in the Wooster cemetery. He died in 1812. After his death the house passed into the possession of Samuel Dibble, the father of the present occupant. He was a miller, and his first mill was on Main Street. His second and last mill stood where is now White's fur-factory, on Beaver Street. Mr. Dibble was 'always noted for taking honest toll.' In those days people got their flour principally from the mills, buying or raising the grain and giving a portion of it to the miller for grinding. Rye-flour was the staple, although corn-meal was considerably used. Benjamin Knapp, who figured as a caterer to several of Tryon's officers, was remarkably fond of Indian meal, and it was said of him that a pudding of that meal graced his dinner-table every day in the year. Wheat was not a common grain then, and its flour was used principally for pie-crust and the finer grades of pastry.

"The remaining house on that side of the street was occupied by Caleb Starr, grandfather of Charles F. Starr and Mrs. F. S. Wildman. His house stands at the junction of Harmony Street with West. He was a farmer, and owned a great deal of land.

"South Side.—Col. Taylor, merchant, lived where now stands the residence of Mr. F. S. Wildman. It was a story-and-a-half house, of double pattern, and had a long sloping roof, although the roof did not run so near the ground as was common in the houses of that day. Subsequently the house passed into the possession of Seymour Wildman, uncle of Frederick. The latter tore it down in 1842, and built his present place. Before this the old house was occupied by several families. Judge Reuben Booth lived there at one time, and Miss Eunice Seeley kept a school there for young women. She subsequently moved to Rochester, where she died. There was no other house until that of Andrew Beers was reached. He lived where Charles Hull does now. Mr. Beers was a dervise in astronomy and a prominent cultivator of weather. For several years he prepared an acceptable almanac, which had a circulation throughout the United States. Andrew Beers' Philom was a familiar address to many families. His almanac was the origin of the 'Middlebrooks.' A remark attributed to him and in general currency seventy years ago was the information that 'grass wouldn't start to grow until thunder shook the earth.'

"Mr. Beers lies buried in the old Episcopal church-yard, in South Street. There is the following inscription on his head-stone:

"In Memory of
Andrew Beers, Esq.,
Born in Newtown,
August 10, 1749,
Died in Danbury,
Sept. 20, 1824,
75 years, 1 month.
Life and the grave
Two different lessons give:
Life teaches how to die,
Death how to live!"

"The next house was that of Joseph Benedict, who was a tailor. His house stood where now S. A. Barnum lives. It was moved back on George Street, where it still stands.

"Next came the dwelling of Joseph Hoyt Gregory, where Allen McDonald now lives. Mr. Gregory was a hatter, and had his factory by his home. He moved to Indiana in 1830, and there died.

"Farther on, and where now stands L. Wildman's place, lived Abial Phillips. Samuel Dibble lived there before he bought the Ward place. The house was removed years ago. Division Street was then an open road containing no dwellings.

"The last house on West Street stands there now, close to the pond. Sixty years ago it was occupied by Ezra Boughton; it now belongs to Mr. A. M. White. Mr. Boughton was a dresser of cloth, and had his works by his home.

"The house owned and occupied by William H. Clark was once owned by Stiles Nichols, and the paper printed in the building was the Republican Farmer, which at one time was published by Mr. Nichols.

"David Wood owned the house now occupied by George B. Benjamin, Jr. Sixty years ago it was a tavern under his management. He subsequently kept the tavern where now stands the Turner House.

"Next to his place were the dwelling and hat-factory of Ezra Wildman. The house is now occupied by Berlin St. John. The hat-shop is a tenement.

"Next was the dwelling of Miss Ann Bennett. Following it came the residence of Eliakim Peck, father of S. S. Peck. It still stands. Mr. Peck was a blacksmith, and his shop stood on the corner where is now the old Episcopal church tenement. He was a strong Episcopalian, a man of marked hospitable traits, and his shop and home were the resort of people fond of entertainment and given to discussion. In those days there were no fires in churches, and the worshipers in the Episcopal church (then on South Street) used to go to Mr. Peck's home Sundays, between service, to get warm."

MAIN STREET.

"East Side.—The first building on the south of the court-house was the dwelling of Jesse Skellinger. He had a carriage-shop next to it. The place was subsequently occupied by John Rider, father of George E. Rider. The carriage-factory is gone. The residence is at present occupied by Dr. S. G. Griffin.

"Next to it was a small building owned and occupied as a silversmith-shop by John S. Blackman, father of F. S. Blackman. The building, in an enlarged form, is still used for this purpose, and is conducted by the son. The senior's wares were of the genuine metal, without doubt, and many of the spoons he sold sixty years ago with his name upon them are now in the possession of the older families. His dwelling is now the property and home of Fred Tweedy.

"Next came the residence of Matthew B. Whittlesey, father of E. B. Whittlesey, and the site is now occupied by him. Mr. Whittlesey was a lawyer.

"The present dwelling of George Bates, which comes next, was the property of E. S. Sanford, the tanner, who had a shoe-shop there.

"Next came a dwelling, whose occupant's name we do not know. It still stands.

"Capt. John Rider lived where now George St. John resides.

"Samuel Wildman and Fairchild, his son, lived in the house occupied by Samuel C. Wildman, son of the latter.

"The store and dwelling of John Dodd came next. It is now the property of Mrs. Edwin Taylor and Mrs. William H. Rider.

"Following this was the house of Epaphras W. Bull, a promising young lawyer, who went to Ohio in 1810, to grow up with the great West, and shortly after died there of a fever. The house was later owned by Curtis Clark, and is now owned by Mr. Murphy.

"Capt. James Clark owned a small dwelling next south, which is at present the property of Patrick Burke.

"Following this was the residence of Philo Calhoun, father of the president of the Fourth National Bank in New York City.

"Next came the McLean place, a Revolutionary house, which still stands.

"On the corner of South Street, in the yard of the house occupied by the late Charles Rider, stood, fifty or more years ago, a store kept by a man named Griswold. It was burned down, and was not rebuilt."

SOUTH STREET.

"South Side.—The most prominent house on the street then, because in full view of Main Street, was the residence of Daniel Taylor at the beginning of the century. Mr. Taylor was a hatter. The house was a relic of the Revolution. It is now occupied by Myron Clark, and has changed but little in the past century.

"Going south, the dwelling of Eliakim Benedict, farmer, came next. It still stands.

"Third was a small dwelling, which is at present occupied by Reuben Tompkins.

"Following was another small dwelling, the name of whose occupant we do not know. It belongs to the estate of E. S. Griffin, and adjoining was the home of E. S. Griffin, who recently died at an advanced age.

"West of Samuel Brunker's place was the dwelling of Comfort Hoyt, who was a farmer.

"Beyond that was meadow-land until where is now the home of Mrs. A. N. Sharp. Then stood the residence of Walter Dibble, farmer.

"On the corner of the street leading to Stephen Bates' place and Coalpit Hill road stood a house occupied by Thomas Flynn, which was torn down.

"Next came the home of Harry Taylor, which stood a short distance east of the house occupied by his grandson, Charles Taylor. Mr. Taylor was a farmer.

"His next neighbor was Lemuel Taylor and next to him was Joel Stone, who did not appear to have any particular occupation, but at one time carried the mail between Danbury and New Haven.

"North Side, going west.—Capt. Ezra Dibble lived where is now the residence of Stephen Bates. He was grandfather to Miss Mary Bull. He was a large farmer, and owned nearly all the land in that neighborhood. He was noted for his generous help of the needy.

"There was no other house until the place of Amos Hoyt was reached. He was a tanner and shoemaker and a deacon. The widow of his grandson, E. C. Hoyt, now occupies the place.

"The present home of Ira Morse was then occupied by Capt. Peter Starr, grandfather of Mrs. Morse. He was a blacksmith and a prominent citizen of that day.

"East of Capt. Starr's place was the residence (since removed) of Daniel Frost.

"The old Dibble house came next. It was built before the Revolution, and became famous in local history as the house where Wooster died.

"Next came the home of Wm. Chapel. He was a cabinet-maker, and carried on a small business. His place is now the property of Mrs. Roff.

"No other building occupied the interval between his place and the old Episcopal church which stood in the west end of the present graveyard, which was its churchyard. The South Centre District school stood close by, as at present.

"Deer Hill Avenue was a lane then. It was not one-half the width it is now, and the most travel was done by farm-teams and cattle. The only house in its entire length was occupied by Munson Gregory. It stood where E. A. Housman now lives, and was torn down some years ago. Rev. William Andrews lived here during his pastorate of the First Church.

"Wooster Street was not considered a street, but a road. It had no house until that of Eli Jarvis was reached. It still stands, and is owned by George E. Rider. Nearly opposite lived Eli Wildman, a farmer. The place is now owned by Wilson Small.

"Lovers' Lane contained one house,—a small one. It stood near to where is now Beach Wilson's place. Lovers' Lane was a popular name for this road many years ago, and everybody in Danbury knew of it. As late as twenty years ago a good part of it was shaded by overhanging branches. It is not now a walk for the sentimental, and perhaps not more than half of our citizens know where it is.

"The house now owned by Mrs. B. Crofut, on the Mountainville Road, was in that day occupied by Benj. Griffin.

"There were but three houses on White Street. White Street runs through a section called Barren Plain. It took this title from its sandy soil, which was not fit to cultivate. The bridge over the Still River, although generally known as the White Street Bridge, is yet called by many, especially older citizens, 'Bar'n Plain Bridge.'

"There were no dwellings on the north side of the street, unless we count the place of Mr. Knapp, corner of Main Street. On the south side the first house was a small dwelling, owned by Abel B. Gregory, who was a farmer. It is now occupied by Michael Ziegler, and stands on the corner of Canal Street.

"Next came the large house of Noah Knapp, son of Benjamin Knapp. It is supposed to have been built on the close of the war, if not before it. Noah was a farmer. The place is now the property of Joseph Bell.

"There was no other dwelling on the road until where is now Nursery Avenue. A large dwelling, the property of Zalmon Wildman, father of Fredrick S., stood there."

ELM STREET.

"At the east end of this street, on the north side, the first house was the dwelling of Zelotes Robinson. He was a butcher, and began the peddling business with a wheelbarrow. He was among the first peddlers of meat in Danbury. Alvin Hurd also lived there. He was a hat-manufacturer. The house stood where is now Darius Stevens' place. Mr. Hurd's factory stood on the river, where Conductor A. Pulling lives.

"On the corner of River Street was the next house. It was occupied by Dorastus Green, a laborer.

"On the south side there were but two buildings. One of them was the dwelling of Rory Starr, father of George Starr, the present occupant. The other was his shop, and is now Daniel Starr's box-shop. Mr. Starr was a builder, and a very extensive one, too. He did most of the building in those days, when houses with their gable-end to the street began to make their appearance here. Many of our older substantial residences were constructed by Mr. Starr, the most conspicuous being the residence of Mr. F. S. Wildman, which we believe was the last he put up. Mr. Starr was elected to the Legislature, serving in both the House and the Senate. He was a Methodist, and an active member of the local church.

"That portion of Elm Street which runs over Rabbit Hill contained but four houses. These were small, and it is not known who occupied them. Two of them were tenements, belonging to Col. Russel White. One of them is now occupied by John and Charles Meeder. Another stood where F. Mc'ready lives, and the other is G. S. Disbrow's.

"In one of these houses lived a man who was noted in the village as shiftless and improvident. He was a wagoner by profession, but scarcely by practice. His wife was entirely opposite in nature. She was both industrious and frugal, and, like such people, had an ambition. Hers was to have a home of her own, or a homestead, as she termed it. Her want was frequently, if not daily, presented to her husband. Finally, becoming impatient with her demand, he told her one day,—

"My dear, I would get you a homestead in a minute if I had anywhere to put it."

"This covered the subject completely, and the poor woman never again put in her petition for a homestead.

"Rabbit Hill was thus called because its gravel pits and clumps of brush were the home of that animal.

"Gallows Hill is the mass of rock at the head of the street, near the pond."

RIVER STREET.

"The classical name of River Street, in the early days of the town's history, was Pumpkin Ground. The hill which skirts its west side was in spots devoted to the culture of that plain-looking but excellent vegetable.

"River Street was a mere lane, and ran to the east of its present location. Dorastus Green's house, which stood on the corner of Elm, had a well within eight feet of the front door. The present roadway now covers the well. Rabbit Hill was so steep in that day that a half-cord of wood was about all a team could haul up it. Mr. Green's house sat perched upon a high bank. The street was opened by Col. Russel White for the convenience of his factory business. A good part of the hill on the west side belonged to Rory Starr. The house now occupied by the venerable widow of Mommouth Lyon stood there then.

"Richard Lovelace, who was a miller, lived opposite S. C. Holly & Co.'s factory. The house still stands.

"Next to him lived Wm. Earle. His place also remains.

"There were but two more houses, both of them opposite E. S. Davis' factory. One of them was occupied by Jonathan Leggett, a fur-cutter. The other was the dwelling of Sergt. Joseph Moore. Both yet remain.

"At the farther end of the street, near White's factories, lived Anthony Buxton."

BEAVER STREET.

"There were but two houses on this street (which is popularly known as Rose Hill). One of these was occupied by Ephraim Benedict, and is now owned by his granddaughter, Mrs. E. Polley.

"Lower down the hill lived Samuel Curtis. His house has been gone for years. He was for a long time sexton of the First Church, and was known to the young and old of his day as simply 'Sam.'"

NORTH STREET.

"There were but two houses on North Street seventy years ago. One of these stood where now lives Mrs. Patience Stratton. It was the property of Ezra Barnum, a farmer. The second house was a small building, since removed, which stood on Mrs. Benedict's lot.

"At a later day, fifty years ago or thereabouts, there was a hat-factory on the street. It stood near the bridge, on the north side."

FRANKLIN STREET.

"There was but one house on the north side of this now pretty well built-up street. This was the dwelling of Stephen Gregory, and is now occupied by Harris L. Crofut.

"On the south side the first house was that now owned by Mrs. Betsy Rosebaum, on the corner of Rose Street. In the rear stood the Methodist meeting-house of that day.

"George Lovelace lived next, where George W. Wilson now lives.

"The third and last house on that side was occupied by Darius Barnum. It stood nearly opposite Mr. E. S. Davis' place."

CHAPTER XIX.

DANBURY (Continued).

Internal Improvements—Canal from Danbury to Westport—The Fairfield Railroad Company—New York to Albany via Danbury—Interesting Figures—The Danbury and Norwalk Railroad—The Ridgefield Branch—Miscellaneous.

"As the town grew and its business grew the demand for a better means of transportation began to make itself felt. There are in every age and in every community, fortunately, progressive spirits who are always restless, because they are always looking for something better than what is already possessed. Danbury was blessed with this element, and those who composed it chafed under the limitations of the stage-coach and the slow-plodding road-wagons.

"In 1825, when the Erie Canal project was being agitated, the public attention throughout the country was directed to the subject of inside water-communication, and the agitation reached Danbury, being drawn here by the progressive spirits of that day. It was proposed to run a canal from Danbury to the tidewater. The point on the Sound was Westport. A survey was even made, the line following near to that of the present railroad as far down as Redding, where it crossed over to the Saugatuck Valley and thence to Westport. It was proposed to use Neversink Pond as a feeder to the canal. The levels taken showed Main Street at the Wooster House to be three hundred and seventy-five feet above tide-water, and Neversink to be twenty feet above Main Street. Much was said and done about the canal project, but it was finally deemed to be inexpedient because of the heavy locking that would be necessary, and was abandoned.

"The next project under consideration was a railroad. This agitation began in 1835,—the same year of the survey of the Hartford and New Haven road,—and in that year the charter was obtained from the Legislature. The charter was granted to 'Ira Gregory, Russell Hoyt, Eli T. Hoyt, Edgar S. Tweedy, David M. Benedict, Ephraim Gregory, Curtis Clark, Frederick S. Wildman, Elias S. Sanford, George W. Ives, with such other persons as shall associate with them for that purpose.' These were to be incorporated as 'The Fairfield County Railroad Company,' with a capital stock amounting to two hundred thousand dollars, or three hundred thousand dollars if necessary, and the following-named were authorized to receive subscriptions: Russell Hoyt, Jarvis Brush, Aaron Seeley, Ephraim Gregory, Starr Nichols, George Clapp, Starr Ferry, Isaac H. Seeley, Nathaniel H. Wildman, William J. Street, and Henry Sherwood. The road was authorized to run from Danbury by the most direct and feasible route to some suitable point at tide-water in either the town of Fairfield or the town of Norwalk.

"This was all down on paper and looked nice enough, but the trouble had not begun. The charter was got and a survey made, and everything seemed to indicate a speedy completion of the road. But a generation was to pass before the hopeful projectors should see a railroad from Danbury to tide-water, and before that glad consummation a mountain of worry, opposition, and discouragement was to be painfully scaled. As in the case of all enterprises benefiting a community, a few only of its professed friends were left to do the work, while the mass either stood idle or suggested obstacles with a fertility of resource that was as amazing as it was exasperating. Conspicuous among the workers for the project were Eli T. Hoyt and the late Aaron Seeley.

"The road as it was first contemplated and as it finally took shape were two different projects. Most of our readers are not aware that in Danbury's first inception of railway communication with the outer world the somewhat colossal project of a through-line from New York to Albany by way of this place was entertained, and that the Danbury and Norwalk Railway is to-day part of that scheme, and all, in fact, that is left of it. The proposed route was to run from New York by boat to Wilson's Point, on the Sound, four miles below Norwalk. The harbor there was the best in that section, and would be accessible for the greater part of the most severe winter. From the Point to Danbury the rail was to run, and thence to West Stockbridge, Mass., where the line would connect with what is now the Boston and Albany road, and which was then building from Albany to West Stockbridge. This, of course, was before the day of the Harlem road and in the beginning of railway enterprise in this country, —at a time when railways were mainly opposed on the very substantial grounds that cattle would get on the tracks and be killed.

"We shall speak first of the line from Danbury to tide-water, known in the charter as 'The Fairfield County Railroad.' The survey was made by Alexander Twining, of New Haven, in the summer of 1835.

"Two surveys were made,—one along the Saugatuck River to Compo Point below Westport, and the other along the present route to Belden's Neck (Wilson's Point). The distance on the Saugatuck route was about twenty-three miles, and on the Norwalk route to Belden's Neck it was twenty-six miles. In point of distance to New York, however, the latter route had the advantage in that it was seven miles nearer to that city by the channel than the former. It is not necessary to speak further of the Saugatuck route, as it was abandoned.

"The Norwalk survey, as first made by Mr. Twining, was considerably changed before the work on the road commenced. At this end of the route it was first designed to leave Bethel out, running the road through Mountainville along the line of Simpaug Brook, and coming into the borough across South Street and parallel with Main on the east to Turner Street, where it was designed to have the station. Mr. Twining recommended, however, that, instead of following the Simpaug, the road branch to the east and run through Grassy Plain into Bethel, and thus secure an important station with but a little increase in distance. The suggestion was accepted so far as Bethel was concerned, but the route at the south end of the village was not materially changed. Some one did speak of the line which is now occupied, but it was scouted at the time. The great flat between the lower bridge and Bethel was a bog, and some very wise citizen said at the time that two twelve-foot rails could be pushed down into it their full length without touching bottom. The route along the east of Main Street was strongly opposed by the owners of seventeen homesteads, who gloomily anticipated destruction to their cows and pigs by crossing the track. Mr. Twining hinted that the difficulty in building the road at Hubbell's Hill could be avoided by following the Norwalk valley into its extension Sugar Hollow and thus come into Danbury on the west side; but this was not further considered.

"While these surveys were going on the friends of the project had their heads full of a through New York and Albany line, and, although their charter provided for a road from Danbury direct to tide-water only, they dreamed of the through-line and worked for it. It was, to speak mildly, a stupendous enterprise for a town of less than six thousand inhabitants to take hold of and attempt to carry through, for as yet there was no organized effort in this direction outside of Danbury. But the progressive ones of that day worked hard for success, and earned it even if they did not receive it."

FROM NEW YORK TO ALBANY VIA DANBURY.

"As we have said, during the project of a road from Danbury to tide-water the projectors never lost sight of the feasibility of a through winter route from New York to Albany. This was a crying demand in both cities, and the Hudson River for a railway-line was not thought of; neither, in fact, was the route through Putnam County, now known as the Harlem road. And a railway-line between the two cities by way of Danbury was not so much out of the way, after all.

"The distance by the Hudson River, the most direct route, is one hundred and fifty miles; by way of Danbury it is but fourteen miles greater, as the following will show:

	Miles.
From New York by steamboat to Belden's Neck.....	40
By railway to Danbury.....	26
From Danbury to West Stockbridge.....	68
From West Stockbridge to Albany.....	30
Whole distance.....	164

"Mr. Twining recommended this through-route, and Messrs. Aaron Seeley, Eli T. Hoyt, and Jarvis Brush, to whom the surveyor made his report, published a card indorsing the same.

"It may not be uninteresting to our readers of this day to know what were some of the grounds on which was based a calculation in favor of a railway-line from Danbury to New York, and we herewith give the views of the gentlemen above named, as well as their estimate of the through-business. It presents most interesting reading, we think, to this generation, and the figures contemplated and those realized make entertaining comparisons. The committee advance these views in favor of direct rail-communication with tide-water:

"The town of Danbury* contains a population of about 6000, and the village of Danbury is the central point of business for a fertile and densely-populated territory of 201 square miles. The present amount of transportation from this and the adjoining towns, as ascertained by inquiry of persons engaged in business, is 7000 tons. This amount has actually been transported during the past year. Much, however, has been necessarily overlooked in the estimate, and the amount has been for the last ten years, and is now, gradually increasing. These considerations alone, without taking into the estimate the impulse which experience has shown will be given by a railroad to all branches of business, enable us to state with confidence that the transportation upon this road, upon its first opening, will be 10,000 tons. The regular price now paid for freight to those exclusively engaged in transportation from Danbury to Saugatuck and Norwalk is $5 per ton. Assuming the minimum price for transportation upon the railroad to be $3 per ton, the annual revenue from this source alone will be $30,000, to which may be added for freight from the towns south of Danbury, which will probably be nearly equal upon either route $2000, —making in the whole $32,000, and the difference between that amount and the price now paid, being $20,000, will be a clear gain to the public. The present number of passengers from New York to Danbury, as ascertained by a reference to the books of the proprietors of the stage-lines and other sources, is 10,000. The price of passage now paid, and which it is not proposed to diminish, is one dollar. The number of passengers from the intermediate towns we estimate 1000 more, for which there is now paid from fifty to seventy-five cents; estimating the fare at the average price of sixty-two and a half cents, the amount is $625,—making the amount of revenue to be derived from passengers, $10,625. These estimates are based upon the facts as they now exist; but when we take into consideration the increased amount of transportation and travel to be created by the increased facilities for communication, it may safely be assumed that the income from all sources of revenue will be greatly increased. For instance, we have stated that the present annual number of passengers from Danbury to New York is 10,000. This includes very few from the towns east of Danbury, and none from the southern portions of Litchfield County and the eastern part of the counties of Dutchess and Putnam, in the State of New York. But the proposed road would undoubtedly draw to itself all the travel from the entire region, which, it is not unreasonable to suppose, would increase the number of passengers to 20,000,—thus yielding from passengers alone an income of $20,000 per annum. A rapid extension of business along the whole line of the road, and throughout the portion of country within the sphere of its influence, may also be confidently anticipated. In the instance of heavy articles also the increased amount of transportation will, in our judgment, far exceed the estimate here made. We refer especially to the articles of coal and plaster, the former of which is now used in the interior to a very limited extent, but would, upon the opening of the proposed road, be extensively substituted for wood. In relation to the annual expenditures, the experience of other roads enables us to present an estimate upon which we may safely rely. The annual expense of repairs may be put at $2500. The cost of transporting freight to the amount with which this road will commence will not exceed thirty-five cents per ton. One trip and one return-trip per day will be sufficient to accommodate all the passengers with which the road will open, which, at $7.50 per trip, for 317 days, makes for the year $1695. The salaries of the officers in the employ of the company may be set down at $3000 per annum, the expense for drivers and keeping horses,* for freight-wagons, etc., exclusive of passenger-cars, $3500, making in the aggregate, for all expenses of the company, $13,695.

“We present the following recapitulation:

Income from freight	$32,000
Income from transportation of passengers	20,000
	$52,000
Deduct annual expenses of repairs, etc.....	13,695
Net annual profit.....	$38,305

Thus yielding a dividend of nearly ten per cent. to the stockholders.”

“Of the route through to Albany the committee further say:

“There is, however, another and more enlarged view which we take of this subject. The road, according to the original design of its projectors, ends at Danbury, and the company, by their charter, are authorized to construct it to that place only. But in the course of their inquiries, the undersigned have become convinced that this road is in the line of the very nearest practicable route for a railway between the cities of New York and Albany, and that by extending it northward through the valley of the Housatonic to West Stockbridge,—a distance of sixty-eight miles only,—and intersecting at that place the railroad from Albany to West Stockbridge, already commenced, the great object, so long desired, of effecting an open winter-communication between the commercial and political capitals of the Empire State will be accomplished. With a view to this object, Mr. Twining, the engineer by whom our road was surveyed, has examined the country between the northern termination of the Fairfield County Railroad and the proposed point of intersection with the Albany and West Stockbridge Railway. The result of his examination will be found in his report.

“Actual surveys have demonstrated that a railroad between the two cities must, for a portion of the distance, pass through the valley of the Housatonic. And it has never been proposed, nor is it indeed possible, to enter the valley with such road at any point farther north than at or near Canaan Falls, forty-four miles north of Danbury. It is immaterial, however, at what point any other practicable route enters that valley, because it being true that it must be brought thus far east proves that in regard to distance no other route ever can possess any material advantage over the present.

“That the business of this portion of country which the extended road would intersect will afford an ample remuneration to the stockholders there can be no reasonable doubt. Of its value as a channel of intercourse between New York and Albany no estimate has been or can be made. When we look at the immense numbers daily passing between the two cities, and reflect that this number, great as it now is, is daily augmenting by the increase of population and wealth throughout the country and by the opening of new lines of communication to an indefinite extent at the north and west, we are admonished that its value cannot be calculated, and that all attempts to make an estimate must fail.”

“There are some figures in the report of Mr. Twining’s survey from Danbury to tide-water which are of full as much interest to us of to-day as they were to those who watched the progress of the scheme. It must be borne in mind that this was not a steam-railway, but really a horse-railway. In that day locomotives were in but little use in this country, and nothing, comparatively, was known of them in New England. Mr. Twining’s estimate for the grading of the road was $7869 a mile, or $203,389 for the entire distance.

“In his estimate for the superstructure—that is, the track—is an item, ‘Horse-path,’ which was to cost $123 a mile. The horse-path was to be of plank. The following is his estimate for the appointments of the road:

Six carriages for passengers.....	$4,500
Fifteen wagons for burdens.....	1,250
Thirty horses.....	3,000
Harness.....	600
Two depots, with carriage-houses and stables.....	8,000
One half-way station, with ditto.....	2,750
Total.....	$24,100

“It will be seen by the above that passenger-cars could then be bought for $750 apiece, and freight-cars were in the market at $350 each.

“It was proposed to make two trips a day each way. The cars were to be drawn by horses, two to each car. The time required to make the trip was estimated to be three hours. As to how the freight-wagons were to run, or how many to a train, was not determined on, as the road was but then in its inception, and before matters progressed to any degree locomotives came into use.

“While these estimates were being made the ‘through-line’ was worked at. Mr. Twining and the originators of the road were firmly convinced that the line would pay and that it was a necessity. There was no rail-route between New York and Albany, and in the winter, when navigation was closed in the river, there was no communication between the two cities except by stage. The Danbury people sought to stir up enthusiasm at points along the proposed route.

“In December, 1835, a public meeting was held in Kent, the next town above New Milford. It was a large meeting. Delegates were present from all towns along the proposed line from Danbury to West Stockbridge. A proposed charter (granted the following year) had been drafted, giving to the company chartered the right to construct a road to Bridgeport, or to the New York State line in the town of Ridgefield, or to Danbury. The Kent meeting determined on the route to Danbury, and appointed Aaron Seeley, Peter Pierce, and Jay Shears a committee to employ an engineer and have a survey made and an estimate of cost prepared.

"In March following the committee secured the services of E. H. Brodhead, an experienced civil engineer, to make the survey. He entered upon his duties as soon as possible, and was accompanied along the course by Mr. Seeley, of the committee.

"Twenty-one days were employed in this work. Not only the line proposed, but several diverging routes, at the suggestion of citizens living off the line, were looked after. The line was carried, also, south of Danbury to the New York State line in Ridgefield, at the place of E. Bouton, a distance of about eleven miles from here. The line in Danbury began at the Main Street Bridge across Still River, and Mr. Brodhead's survey ran it through Beaver Brook District, thence along the line of the Still River to its confluence with the Ousatonic (Housatonic) at New Milford. From there it followed pretty much the line now occupied by the Housatonic road to West Stockbridge, where was met the railway known as the Boston and Albany.

"The route from Danbury to the New York State line followed the course of the Still River, passed through Miry Brook District and entered the Sugar Hollow. The ascent through the Hollow was, according to Mr. Brodhead, thirty-five feet to the mile. At Sugar Hollow Pond the line diverged to Bennett's Ponds, and thence passed through Titicus to the neighborhood of South Salem. This route was not, however, an important item in the consideration of the road. The main thing was to get the line to Danbury through the Ousatonic Valley, where it would connect with the Fairfield County road, to tide-water. The line from Ridgefield to West Stockbridge was eighty-one miles; from Danbury to West Stockbridge, seventy miles. Mr. Brodhead estimated the entire cost of the road, the longer distance, to be $1,247,509.

"These figures exceeded the expectation of the committee, but did not dampen their ardor. They made up their report and presented it to the convention, and with it a circular which was to go before capitalists who were looking for investments.

"The circular assumed that, viewed in connection with manufactures, the unusual water-power, and the cheapness of the land thereto, the Ousatonic route was to be preferred to any other route, especially one nearer to the Hudson River (this referred to the Harlem and Albany scheme). But the committee, wishing to make no uncomplimentary comparison, simply say that, feeling confident that while the counties of Putnam and Westchester undoubtedly surpass the Ousatonic Valley as an agricultural country, yet they feel confident it is manufactories that must give business to a railway and profit to the stockholders, and so, without comparing this route with the one farther west, they invite capitalists to examine for themselves.

"The committee were very much in earnest, even to the extent of using italics. 'Should the capitalists of the cities of Albany and New York prefer the western route,' say the committee, 'we appeal to the people of the Ousatonic Valley to come forward in all their strength, and, relying upon their own resources, to construct a road to tide-water.'

"The people of the valley eventually came forward in all their strength and constructed a road to tide-water, but not as the committee expected, and certainly not as they desired.

"Messrs. Hoyt and Seeley attended a big railroad meeting in Albany just previous to the Kent meeting. They went there to present the Ousatonic Valley route, and to learn what could be learned of the condition of the railroad pulse. Hi Barnes drove them there in a carriage. While in Albany a heavy snow-storm fell, and made it impossible for them to get back as they went. Mr. Barnes was equal to the emergency, however, and very soon succeeded in trading off his carriage for a sleigh, by which the return-trip was made. At any gathering of railway sympathizers which presented an opportunity to ventilate their favorite scheme these two men might be found.

"While these movements were being made, Bridgeport, which was not thought of by any one as a railroad point, began to realize that there was danger of losing something. The something in question was all the business of the Housatonic Valley.

"When Bridgeport got on high ground where it could look off some other direction than seaward, it saw that by way of Danbury and Norwalk was so much more direct for a line to New York than by way of itself that should the road be built there would never be the ghost of a chance for it to get the business of the upper Housatonic Valley. It would all go the shorter route.

"Danbury as yet had no road to tide-water. If Bridgeport could build a road from New Milford to itself, then it would stand a very good chance to take the business of the Housatonic Valley should a road be put through it. Alfred M. Bishop, father of William D. Bishop, was considerably interested in the proposed road, and came to Danbury to talk over the matter with our people. He offered to carry through the Fairfield County railway if Danbury would raise one hundred thousand dollars for that purpose. There were those in favor of doing it, of course; but there were so many more opposed to it that the scheme fell through. He next tried Bridgeport, and that city, being a trifle more awake than we, or a trifle less honest,* we are not sure which, pledged two hundred thousand dollars for a road from there to New Milford.

* When the time came for this money to be paid Bridgeport sought to repudiate, and the law was called in to force it to keep its word, which appeared to be equally as good as its bond.

"This practically killed the Danbury route from New York to Albany. In 1840 the railway from Bridgeport to New Milford was completed and opened for use. Two years later it was extended to the State line, and became the winter-route from Albany to New York, via the steamer 'Nimrod,' Capt. Brooks, to Bridgeport, and as such was occupied for a number of years. It was ten years later before the Danbury and Norwalk road took form.

"The reader remembers, perhaps, that there were two objective points at tide-water,—one at Westport and the other below South Norwalk. This end of the line was rampant for the road, but there was not so much interest taken below. It was desirable to get one hundred thousand dollars from the other end, and our railway committee made several journeys with that object in view. Westport wanted the road, but its anxiety was not a hundred thousand dollars' worth. Norwalk felt the same. Year after year passed away in this state of affairs, and then Norwalk people awoke up to the full importance of the line, and the money was subscribed.

"Work on the road was begun in the fall of 1850. Beard, Church & Co. were the contractors, Deacon John F. Beard being the senior of the firm. The total cost of constructing and equipping the road was three hundred and seventy thousand eight hundred and twenty-one dollars. The equipment consisted of three locomotives, four first-class and two second-class passenger-cars, eight box-, sixteen platform-, and three hand-cars. On the 1st of March the road was so far completed as to run trains. The station in Danbury was a subject of considerable discussion. The down-town subscribers wanted it in that neighborhood, while the up-town subscribers wanted it where it now is. As the latter's stock was much more than the former's, they carried the day; whereupon the dissatisfaction was so great among the disappointed that the successful ones took their stock off their hands.

"We of this day, enjoying the completed line, little realize what the founders endured and had to contend against to get the road through. There was trouble in securing the right of way, in the construction, and in the payment of the subscriptions. One notable case in the last-named class is worthy of mention. Down at Belden's Neck lived a New York merchant, and in Norwalk village lived another. The former we will call W., and the latter S. S. subscribed five thousand dollars. W. was then seen, and was told what S. had done. He said S. could take twenty thousand dollars' worth of stock just as well as not, and, if he did so, he, W., would guarantee him six per cent. from the earnings of the road, providing S. would let him vote on his stock. W. then took five thousand dollars' worth. S. was seen, and told what W. had said. Upon that he made his subscription twenty thousand dollars. When the money was called for the eager W. refused to pay, and suit was brought by the company to force him to keep his word. W. claimed that the directors had violated the terms of agreement in several particulars, and believed he could annul the subscription; but he failed, and the company recovered.

"The following were the officers of the new road, as recorded in the first printed report of the company:

"Directors, Eli T. Hoyt, Jonathan Camp, Frederick S. Wildman, Charles Isaacs, E. S. Tweedy, Wm. C. Street, L. P. Hoyt, Wm. K. James, Wm. A. White, Ebenezer Hill, Frederick Belden, D. P. Nichols.

"President, E. T. Hoyt; Treasurer, Geo. W. Ives; Secretary, E. S. Tweedy; Superintendent, Harvey Smith.

"The president, treasurer, and secretary were of Danbury; the superintendent was of Ridgefield.

"Mr. Hoyt served as president of the company until Aug. 25, 1864, when he was superseded. He determined his salary, fixing it at two hundred and fifty dollars a year, and refusing any increase. Edwin Lockwood, of Norwalk, was chosen president, and served until June 18, 1873, when R. P. Flower, the present incumbent, was elected.

"Mr. Tweedy continued as secretary until Aug. 25, 1864, when Harvey Williams was elected to the office. Mr. Ives served as treasurer until that period when the two offices were merged in one, Mr. Williams being both secretary and treasurer, and continues as such at this writing.

"Mr. Smith served as superintendent until prostrated by a paralytic stroke in 1859. John W. Bacon was appointed in his place July 14, 1859, and served until Jan. 1, 1876, when L. W. Sandiforth, the present incumbent, was chosen.

"When the road was opened the rails for some distance this side of Redding were laid on the ground, the earth being frozen so hard as to bear the weight of the train. This was done because the completion had been delayed for a considerable time beyond that set for its finish, and people were anxious to see a train go through.

"The first conductor was Henry Banks, who died some years ago. He was a man of marked suavity of manner and speech. Many anecdotes are told of him illustrating this pleasant quality. On leaving Norwalk he would observe, 'Those who are about to proceed on the train will please take their seats.' Now-a-days it's 'All board!'

"When coming to Norwalk station it was his custom to notify the passengers of the fact by impressively remarking, as if in the presence of some great mechanism, 'The train will presently reach Norwalk Bridge.' After leaving Bethel he would explain, 'We are now approaching the village of Danbury, which is the terminus of the road.'

"The citizens of Winnipauk were very much offended by his pronouncement of their station, which he unfortunately called Winnepauk.

"In 1844 the New York and Hartford road was projected. It was to pass through Danbury and thence to New York via White Plains, N. Y. We can now see what a splendid piece of property it would have become had it lived. But it fell through, and a goodly portion of the contemplated line between here and Hartford is now occupied by the survey of the New York and New England Railway.

"The committee appointed to secure the survey of the road made an estimate of the business in the circular to the public which they issued. Our readers remember it. These figures, made in 1835, are interesting compared with what the road did the first year after it was finished, 1852-53. The circular estimated its first year's business in freight to be $32,000. The passenger-traffic the circular fixed at $10,625, making a total of $42,625. The first report of the business of the road showed that the earnings for the first fifteen months of its existence were $51,237.70. So the authors of the circular had made a remarkably close estimate. The second report covered a period of eleven months, in which the earnings were $52,706.68. The through-fare was seventy-five cents.

"It is not often a new road so fully answers the expectation of its projectors as did the Danbury and Norwalk road. The directors, in the report referred to above, say,—

"The result of the experience of the company since the commencement of the operations upon the road has been fully to corroborate the opinion uniformly expressed by the directors, that the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad will prove a successful and profitable enterprise, and the favorable increase of the past year demonstrates that, but for the disastrous floods and the unusual expenditures rendered necessary thereby, the net earnings for the year would have warranted two dividends of three per cent. each, paid interest and taxes, and left a surplus of $3348."

"The floods referred to were three in number. These occurred in the fall of 1853 and the spring of 1854. They were disastrous in effect, delaying travel for sixteen days, and causing an expense of four thousand dollars for temporary repairs, and nine thousand dollars in addition for a thorough reconstruction of the damaged portions.*

"Ridgefield Branch.—In 1870 a branch road from Branchville to Ridgefield Village was built, with a view to accommodating the business of that place. Heretofore the connection had been made by stage. The distance is four miles.

"In 1872 another branch was built, running from Bethel to Hawleyville, to connect with the Shepaug Railway, which runs from Litchfield to Hawleyville. This was done to control the business of the Shepaug valley. The length of the branch is six miles. The cost of both these extensions was at the rate of forty thousand dollars a mile.

"The business of the road increased from year to

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH.

The following sketch of this church is taken from the minutes of the first session of the Fairfield County Baptist Association, in October, 1838:

"The First Baptist Church in Danbury was constituted Nov. 16, 1785, with thirteen members,—seven males, six females. There were formerly two branches connected with this church,—one in New Milford, the present New Milford Church; the other in Fredericksburg, N. Y., the present Patterson Church. In 1790 the church had about one hundred and twenty members; from 1815 to 1830 its average number was from fifty to sixty; but after this period a division threatened the destruction of the church. In July, 1837, there were only twenty-two members,—five males, seventeen females. Their present pastor was ordained with them Nov. 15, 1837, since that time there has been added twenty-six. Their prospects are now very encouraging: whole number, forty-eight. They have licensed three to preach the gospel,—Noah Sherwood, now in Western New York; Nathan Benedict, now in Northern Connecticut; John Mitchell, now in Michigan. They have had five pastors,—Brother Ferris, ordained in 1788; Brother Norton, ordained in May, 1789; Brother Wadhams, ordained in February, 1791; Brother Bulkly, ordained in May, 1809; and their present pastor, Brother Lucius Atwater."

The following additional history of this church was furnished by Rev. S. G. Silliman:

"The following is a list of the members of the church in September, 1798: Matthew Wilkes, David Pearse, Benjamin Bearss, William Rundle, Joseph Hamilton, Jr., Oliver Knapp, Joseph Bearss, Nathaniel Barnum, Israel Stevens, Matthew Wilkes, Jr., Gabriel Barnum, Benjamin Bearss, Jr., Joshua Pearse, John Bebee, James Knapp, Jr. Their first moderator, September, 1798, was Israel Stevens, and clerk James Knapp, Jr. That is the first meeting of which any record can be found.

"June 26, 1842, it was Voted, that we pull down the old meeting-house for the purpose of erecting a new meeting-house, and work in as much of the old one as is thought proper."

According to old minutes of Associations, "Brother Ferris was ordained in 1788," and "Elder Enoch Ferris" was present from that church in 1791; "Brother Norton was ordained 1789;" "Elder Nathanael Norton" was present at the Danbury Association in 1791. But I judge that neither of them was pastor, for their names are preceded in the minutes of the Association that year by the name of "Elder Nathanael Finch." Rev. Nathan Bulkly was ordained in 1800, and was pastor till 1830; Rev. John Mitchel was pastor in 1831; Rev. Lucius Atwater, in 1838, and till 1847; Rev. Fred L. Barlow, in 1851; Rev. Henry M. Barlow, in 1852; Rev. D. F. Chapman, in 1875 and 1876. The remainder of the time since 1847 they have had occasional supplies, or unordained men have occupied the pulpit. Alanson A. Hoyt is church clerk; George W. Wilkes is society's clerk. There are now thirty members,—ten males, twenty females.

In 1790 there were present, as messengers from the First Baptist Church of Danbury, Elder Nathanael Finch, Elder Nathaniel Norton, Elder Enoch Ferris, in the above order, and in 1790 none of them were present, and as "Deacon David Pearse" is the only officer among the delegates of that year, they were doubtless then without a pastor.

In 1790 reported one hundred and twenty-five members, and in 1791 they report only fifty-two members and no pastor.

SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH.

Just after the conclusion of the treaty of peace which terminated the war of the Revolution, on Nov. 18, 1785, the first Baptist church within the limits of the town of Danbury was constituted in the district of King Street. For years this church was prosperous, new members from time to time being added. The mother-church still maintains its visibility, and, though reduced in membership, is still struggling to strengthen the things which remain.

There were residing at this time, in the western part of the town—Miry Brook District—a number of persons who were attached to this faith. Among these were Peter Ambler, Bracey Knapp, and Benjamin Shove. Meetings were occasionally held, before a church was organized, in the dwellings of some of the members of the faith. Revival influences converted many who have long since departed this life.

About the year 1788 a church was organized under the name of the Ridgefield and Miry Brook Baptist Church. The Second Baptist Church of Danbury was constituted from this, April 3, 1790. Soon after, it was admitted into the Hartford Baptist Association. The number of constituent members was about twenty.

The first regular pastor was Rev. Thaddeus Bronson, who continued from the organization until 1793, when he removed to Schoharie Co., N. Y. The first deacons were Benjamin Shove and Daniel Wildman, who were appointed Oct. 2, 1790. In March, 1793, Calvin Peck was added to the number.

The first meeting-house was erected in 1794, on a lot presented to the society by Bracey Knapp, and was situated in Miry Brook District, about two miles and a half west of Danbury. The building was twenty-four feet square, with galleries. Its architecture and interior arrangements were of the most primitive style. It had no steeple, and no permanent seats inside. Loose boards made a floor. The gallery had no railing or stairs, and was reached by means of a ladder. The seats below were boards resting on logs and stones. The pulpit was made of oak boards, and was elevated two steps above the main floor. People came to the church on foot or horseback, with the exception of an occasional ox-cart.

Rev. Mr. Bronson relinquished the pastorate of the church in 1793, after which, during five years, they were probably without a pastor. Among those who ministered to the church during this period were Revs. Daniel Wildman, Justus Hull, and Elias Lee. The King Street pastors, Revs. Finch and Bulkly, were also accustomed to visit and encourage the new interest.

The name of Rev. Justus Hull deserves special mention. He was then a young man of unusual mental vigor and ministerial gift. He dispensed the Word with great power, and his service was long kept in fresh remembrance.

When, subsequently, the college-bred preachers came among them, the old people felt, in some instances no doubt without reason, that while the college and seminary had given polish and stronger grasp of truth, their graduates had lost the freshness and convincing energy of their predecessors. When a precise young man read an elaborate discourse to them the remark used to be made, "Brother Hull would take off his coat and beat that."

In the year 1798, Rev. Bennett Pepper, then a licentiate, came to Miry Brook. He preached from that time until November, 1807, without ordination, at which time he was ordained to the gospel ministry, and continued his services to the church. On the occasion of the ordination Rev. Nathan Bulkly was designated to give the charge, Rev. Jacob St. John to make the ordaining prayer, Rev. Daniel Wildman to preach the sermon, and Rev. Ezra Fountain to make the concluding prayer. The churches of Franklin, Carmel, North Salem, Bedford, Milton, First Danbury, Newtown, and Bristol were represented in the council.

About the year 1803 the church was called to pass through a season of trial and darkness, growing out of an attempt to modify the accepted articles of faith. The original articles, bearing date of Jan. 24, 1795, as to their subject-matter and form of statement, are not different in any essential particular from those now received by the church. The records do not show the name of the mover of the proposed change. The new articles proposed were, however, rejected. They asserted that Christians should be unlike the world even in "politeness of behavior," forgetting that the very term "gentleman" owed its origin to Christianity. They contained erroneous doctrines in the statement, "We believe that civil government is by providence and permission, and not of divine origin or appointment, and that we find neither precept nor example for the disciple voluntarily filling office in earthly states." It reflects credit upon the little church that they recorded their faith in the refining influences of our holy religion, and in the truth that "the powers that be are ordained of God," by rejecting these innovating articles and adhering to their original standards of faith and practice.

In the early part of Mr. Pepper's ministry there were large accessions to the church. This period is the first revival season succeeding the outpouring of the Spirit in which the church had its origin.

Shortly preceding the ordination in 1807 some improvements were made in the meeting-house. The side walls were plastered, a railing and stair made for the gallery, and the floors were nailed down. A better pulpit was also constructed, and new seats were introduced with backs to them.

Mr. Pepper's pastorate closed in 1809. At one period during his connection with the church his conduct was considered unbecoming. But on the whole his ministry was a success. One difficulty arose during this time on account of the course taken by Eli Gregory, who had been made a deacon in 1806. Deacon Gregory was opposed to a distinctive ministerial order, who should appropriate all the time allotted to the service of the sanctuary on the Lord's day. He claimed that God, having called different gifts into the Church, they should have expression, without regard to, or rather ignoring, any other pastor or teacher. He asserted in addition that any male member of the church might with propriety be appointed to administer the ordinances in the absence of a settled minister. He objected to the payment of a salary to a minister, claiming that the support of those who labored in behalf of the church would be contributed by free-will offerings of the members. These opinions were disapproved of by a majority, and Deacon Gregory still tenaciously adhering to them, a council of churches was called, which council convened June 3, 1807. The council did not coincide with Deacon Gregory's views, and passed resolutions not acceptable to him. They were accepted by the church, and he was excluded.

The resignation of Mr. Pepper was followed by another period of destitution, the church depending on supplies for about four years, until May, 1813, when Rev. Oliver Tuttle, a licentiate from Bristol, Conn., was called to the pastorate. His ordination took place in May, 1814.

Towards the end of the year 1815 "a reformation broke out in the community." It marks the second revival season of the history of the church. Deep seriousness pervaded the hearts of many who were out of Christ, which issued in a transformation of heart and life.

Mr. Tuttle's ministry extended over a period of nine years, from 1813 to 1822. In August of the latter year he resigned his charge and removed to Meredith, N. Y. During his pastorate Deacon Peter Barnum was baptized into the fellowship of the church. He, with Deacon Benjamin Ambler, was baptized the same date, July 28, 1816.

Timothy Weed and Thomas Wildman were elected deacons Dec. 13, 1816. George Benedict was baptized by Mr. Tuttle, Sept. 21, 1817. Some statistics of the membership of the church at this date may be of interest. From the minutes of the Union Baptist Association, which convened at Danbury in 1817, it appears that the membership of the church was then seventy-eight. In 1818 it was seventy. In 1820 there was a marked decrease, the reported number being fifty-six.

George Benedict was licensed to preach the gospel on the 12th of May, 1822. In August of the following year he was ordained as pastor of the church. His eminent gifts in prayer, exhortation, and Christian conversation are testified to by a cloud of witnesses in this and other churches which enjoyed his ministrations. Mr. Benedict resigned the pastoral charge of the church in May, 1831, to accept a call from the church then worshipping at the corner of North and Forsyth Streets, New York, now known as the Stanton Street Baptist Church.

The labors of Mr. Benedict were very successful in New York. Nearly twelve hundred persons were baptized by him, and nearly as many funerals were attended, during his ministry in the city, extending from 1831 to Oct. 28, 1848, at which time he passed away in the calm triumphs of faith. The scripture employed by Rev. Dr. Cone upon the occasion of his funeral was an epitome of his character and life: "He was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith; and much people were added to the Lord."

Dec. 7, 1823, Peter Barnum was elected deacon of the church. The membership had increased from fifty-six, reported in 1820, to one hundred.

During Mr. Benedict's ministry, Aug. 31, 1823, Edward C. Ambler was baptized. On the same day John Jennings and James St. John received the ordinance. Mr. Ambler subsequently entered the ministry, and was ordained at New Milford, Conn., Oct. 1, 1819. He has since served the following churches as pastor: New Milford, Conn.; Fishkill, Patterson, and Pleasant Valley, N. Y.; Mount Bethel, Millington, Westville, Woodstown, and Columbus, N. J. He was appointed chaplain of the Sixty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers during the first year of the Rebellion, and filled the position with great efficiency until compelled to resign from the effects of imprisonment and exposure. His services on the field during the war, and those of his wife in the hospital, deserve the grateful remembrance of all. Mr. Ambler, after the war, was for a time pastor of the Baptist church at Stamford, N. Y., but afterwards returned to Danbury, and has since supplied the pulpits of the King Street and Mill Plain churches.

Rev. John Jennings, who was received into membership at the same time with Mr. Ambler, was licensed to preach June 17, 1826, and was ordained at Beverly, Mass., which was his first regular pastorate. He was subsequently settled at Grafton, Worcester, and Fitchburg, Mass. He left the latter place and served the American Tract Society for some years. Afterwards he became pastor of the Baptist church in Westfield, Mass., and there continued until his death, which occurred some five years ago.

During the latter part of Mr. Benedict's ministry the subject of the removal of the location of the meeting-house was discussed, the second generation feeling that a more central location should be chosen, reasoning that the church must follow the people, and the Word of Life be dispensed where the streams of population have their confluence. These ideas prevailed, and in the year 1829 the foundations of a new house were laid on Deer Hill. A lot sixty by forty feet was donated to the society by Peter Ambler. A neat and convenient building, with gallery, steeple, and bell, was erected, and was dedicated Sept. 28, 1831, the Rev. Thomas Larcomb preaching the dedicatory sermon. In July of the following year Mr. Larcomb was called to the pastorate. A general revival was prevailing in the church at the time, and eleven converts were baptized the first Sabbath of the month following his settlement. Mr. Larcomb resigned the pastoral charge in the early part of the year 1833. He removed to Saugerties, N. Y., and from thence to Philadelphia, where for a number of years he continued his usefulness. He has entered upon his rest.

Rev. Robert Turnbull, a native of Scotland, succeeded Mr. Larcomb in Danbury. He was a graduate of the University of Glasgow. He arrived in New York in 1833, and soon after accepted the call of this church. At the end of one year and a half he accepted a call from the Home Mission Society to occupy a field in Detroit, Mich. About thirty members were added under Mr. Turnbull's ministry. Nehemiah Gillett and Benjamin Ambler were appointed deacons Jan. 25, 1834.

The next regular pastor was Rev. Orson Spencer, who entered upon his charge in May, 1835. His resignation followed after a few months' service. After leaving Danbury he became a convert to Mormonism.

After the resignation of Mr. Spencer the church had no pastor until April, 1836, when Rev. Jonathan G. Collom accepted their call. He continued with the church three years. During the second year of his pastorate over seventy persons were converted, among them being Starr Hoyt. Mr. Hoyt died Sept. 18, 1849.

During Mr. Collom's ministry Rev. Nathaniel Colvin visited Danbury for the purpose of pleading in behalf of the brethren of different color who were in bonds. Mr. Colvin was one of those champions of the slave who argued that a peace which rested on injustice to millions of his fellow-creatures ought to be disturbed. Danbury was largely concerned in the Southern hat trade, and Mr. Colvin's lectures evoked open opposition, and in one instance mob violence was the result. An attack was made upon the church during service, and stones were freely thrown, windows broken, and Mr. Colvin narrowly escaped personal injury. He lived to see slavery overthrown, and to preach to hundreds of freedmen. He gave theological instructions to a large number of colored ministers in a building formerly used as a slave-pen, and which has since been occupied by a theological school named in his honor,—Colvin Institute. Mr. Collom resigned during the fourth year of his pastorate, and entered upon the charge of the Baptist church at Pemberton, N. J. From thence he removed to Wilmington, and again to Mount Holly, N. J., where he died.

The Rev. Addison Parker was Mr. Collom's successor. He accepted the call of the church in August, 1839, and continued three years in the pastoral office. During this time the church enjoyed a good degree of prosperity. The resignation of Mr. Parker was accepted with great reluctance by the church.

The Rev. Daniel H. Gilbert was next called to the pastoral charge, and entered upon it in June, 1842. After a few months' service he was compelled to relinquish it on account of an attack of bleeding at the lungs. He sought a Southern climate, which, however, proved insufficient to arrest the work of death.

Mr. Gilbert was young and gifted, and his brief ministry was not without results.

In the following September the Rev. William R. Webb accepted a call. His ministry covered one year and a half, and was marked by eminent tokens of divine favor.

After the resignation of Mr. Webb, Rev. Rufus K. Bellamy was called to the pastoral charge. He was then ministering at Rondout, N. Y., and signified his acceptance of the call May 9, 1844. His gifts both as pastor and preacher were peculiarly acceptable. During his ministry the question of a removal of the church from Deer Hill was agitated. There seemed a necessity for more room, especially for the accommodation of the Sabbath-school and Conference meetings. Arrangements were at first made to add to the old building. It was, however, decided to purchase the present site and build a larger edifice.

April 19, 1847, negotiations were made with Thos. T. Whittlesey to purchase the present site, being lots south of his dwelling, for $1800. The Deer Hill property, excepting the burying-ground, was sold for $2500. The present building was erected at an expense of $6836. The subscriptions and property of the church amounted to $4505, leaving at the completion of the building a debt of $2351. The building committee were Thomas Ambler, William Montgomery, Levi S. Benedict, Charles Hull, Samuel G. Raymond, and Joseph L. Ambler.

The new edifice was dedicated Jan. 5, 1848, with the following order of exercises: Reading of Scriptures, by the pastor, Rev. Rufus K. Bellamy; Prayer, by Rev. Wm. Reid; Sermon, by Rev. John Dowling, D.D.; Concluding Prayer, by Rev. Wm. Dennison. In the following April Mr. Bellamy tendered his resignation and accepted a call from the Baptist Church at Chicopee, Mass., and has remained there since.

The retrospect from this point is in the highest degree encouraging. Times of trial and discouragement followed, but the period, taken as a whole, was one of steady and substantial progress. The Sabbath-school grew to a permanent and vigorous condition.

The Rev. Aaron Perkins accepted the call of the church while ministering at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and entered upon his duties in May, 1848. Many were added to the membership of the church during his connection with it. His resignation was accepted March 7, 1852.

The Mill Plain Baptist Church was constituted during Mr. Perkins' pastorate. A meeting was held in the Danbury church, Sept. 11, 1851, to consider the matter, and it was voted expedient for the brethren residing in Mill Plain and vicinity to call a council for the purpose of organizing a church at that place. At a subsequent meeting nineteen persons were granted letters to form the new interest, which was duly recognized, under the name of the "Baptist Church of Mill Plain," by a council which convened Sept. 24, 1851.

Deacon Thomas Wildman died during Mr. Perkins' pastorate. His death occurred Feb. 28, 1852. Nathan Seeley and Eli Barnum were elected deacons Aug. 4, 1849.

The Rev. W. S. Clapp next received the suffrages of the church in a unanimous call to the pastorate, extended April 11, 1852, and which was accepted on the 16th, he then being ministering to the Mount Olivet Baptist Church, New York City. He occupied, during the more than five years which he stayed in Danbury, a place in the affections of the church and community which it is the lot of but few pastors to obtain. A great revival occurred during his ministrations, and Mr. Clapp gave the right hand of fellowship to the largest number ever received at one time since the church was organized. He resigned Aug. 9, 1857.

The next successor to the pastoral office was the Rev. Henry K. Green, who was called Oct. 3, 1857, and soon afterwards commenced his ministry. He resigned in February, 1859.

G. M. Hoyt was elected deacon Feb. 6, 1859. March 4, 1860, Henry Crofut and L. S. Benedict were elected deacons. The latter, however, never served the church in that capacity.

From the time Mr. Green resigned until August the church was without a settled pastor. During the interval Mrs. Anna Moore died, her death occurring in May, 1859. She was baptized at Suffield, in this State. For many years she was the only one in the village of Danbury professing this faith. Both the churches in the town—one at King Street and the other at Miry Brook—were remote from her. She frequently walked to King Street church on Sunday. She died highly esteemed.

After Mr. Green's resignation the church was supplied for several weeks by Rev. O. W. Briggs, who afterwards declined a call to the pastorate. Rev. M. S. Riddell also received and declined a similar invitation. In the autumn of 1859, Rev. Geo. M. Stone, then at Madison University, spent four months with the church as a supply. At the expiration of that time he received a unanimous call to assume the duties of the pastorate. It was declined at the time, but in 1860 a renewed invitation was accepted. He entered upon his duties in August, and was ordained on the 19th of September, Rev. Mr. Turnbull, of Hartford, preaching the sermon. He married Miss Abbie B., daughter of Nathan Seeley, in April, 1861. His pastorate embraced a period of unusual interest, including the four years of conflict for the restoration of the Union. The record of the church during this period was one of honor. Elliott Taylor, Charles Osborn, and Col. Henry Stone died in the service of their country while members of the church. Others served honorably and returned. A daily morning prayer-meeting was held for months during the darkest period of the struggle, in the Conference-room of the church. The summer of 1862 was spent by the pastor in Europe. June, 1862, Jabez Ansbury and John Green were elected deacons. The seven years embraced by his pastorate were signalized by displays of divine grace.

In the summer of 1860 extensive repairs and changes were made in the church edifice. The building was lengthened, the side galleries were taken away, and the interior walls frescoed. In July, 1866, through the efforts of a few of the brethren, a beautiful organ was given to the church. The Sabbath-school was sustained with an interest and enthusiasm which increased every year.

The removals by death during Mr. Stone's pastorate included many of the most worthy and efficient members of the church. From August, 1860, to August, 1866, the number of deaths was thirty-six. Deacon Ambler died April 16, 1867. His wife survived him but a few days.

In August, 1866, Mr. Stone was attacked with bleeding of the lungs. He partially resumed his duties after a little rest, but was compelled in the following spring to request a respite for the summer.

While spending the summer in Minnesota he became convinced of the desirableness of spending some time in that climate, and in July, 1867, tendered his final resignation, which was reluctantly accepted. Mr. Stone gained the love of the entire community. His removal to the West was attended with beneficial results to his health. He was settled for two years at Winona, Minn., three years at Milwaukee, Wis., and seven years at Tarrytown, N. Y. He is now pastor of the Asylum Avenue Church, Hartford. For a period of fifteen months following his resignation the church was without a pastor.

Minor R. Deming became a member in March, 1861, and afterwards became pastor of the Baptist Church in Marlboro', Mass. June 16, 1868, Victor W. Benedict was licensed by the church to preach, and has since preached for the King Street and Mill Plain churches, and is now pastor of the church at Croton Falls, N. Y.

At a covenant-meeting held Oct. 1, 1868, it was unanimously voted to extend a call to Rev. A. C. Hubbard, then pastor of the First Baptist Church of Cincinnati, Ohio. The invitation was accepted, and he entered upon his labors Nov. 15, 1868.

The pastorate of Rev. A. C. Hubbard has been one of great success. From the time he took charge of the church up to the present the membership has steadily increased, the financial affairs have been managed with ability, and all things have, in the main, been prosperous. Mr. Hubbard is a born minister. He has the talent for conducting the work; he has ability, learning, and, above all, that quality which attracts and attaches to him all with whom he comes in contact. He is popular outside of his own church, and all people honor him for his upright carriage, his integrity, and his straightforwardness.

The tenth anniversary of his pastorate was celebrated on the 17th of November, 1878. In his sermon that morning he gave a few statistics which will serve for closing the history of the church. The additions to the church during the ten years were 272, of which 179 were by baptism. These numbers may now be given, up to to-day, as about 300 and 200 respectively. There have been dismissed by letter in that ten years at least one-third more than were received by that agency. The smallest number upon the roll in the past eleven and a half years was 398; the largest, 466. The present number is 469.

Of the financial condition of the church Mr. Hubbard spoke in his sermon on the above occasion as follows: When he assumed the pastorate there was a debt upon the church of $4000. This was afterwards increased by over $10000 more. This has been cleared off by the most earnest effort. He estimated that at least $5000 more had been raised and expended on improvements. The average annual current expenses in the ten years was $2768; the debt and improvements, $10,000; benevolent operations, including those of the Sunday-school, $5700, making a grand total of $43,390.

The Sunday-school of the church has been equally prosperous. The present superintendent, Mr. J. AmSBury, with his able co-workers, have the proud satisfaction of knowing that no school in the village has had a more prosperous time. The records of the school up to 1871 are missing. Since that time they have been faithfully kept, and they show the largest attendance at one time to have been 327, in 1879; the largest average attendance was, in 1880, 287. The number of scholars on the roll is 475. The collections in the school have aggregated nearly $3300. The library of the school now numbers six hundred volumes. This has grown from a few books purchased for $6.35, which money was raised by Rev. E. C. Ambler, who started the first Sunday-school of the church in 1817.

MILL PLAIN BAPTIST CHURCH.

The Baptist Church at Mill Plain was constituted during Mr. Perkins' pastorate. Members living in that vicinity had long desired a church at Mill Plain. A meeting was held in the church at Danbury, Sept. 11, 1851, with special reference to the subject. It was then voted expedient for the brethren residing in Mill Plain and vicinity to call a council for the purpose of organizing a church at that place. At a subsequent church-meeting nineteen persons were granted letters to form the new interest, which was duly recognized, under the name of the "Baptist Church of Mill Plain," by a council which convened Sept. 24, 1851.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

In the month of June, 1789, the Rev. Jesse Lee, known as the pioneer of Methodism in New England, visited Danbury. His sojourn was but for a day. He improved his time, however, by preaching two sermons in the court-house. Only a few were willing to hear him, and most of them out of curiosity. He was probably the first Methodist to set foot in Danbury. Subsequently other Methodist itinerants occasionally found their way to the village, usually preaching a sermon in the court-house and then passing on to other fields.

It was not an easy matter for them to find entertainment in Danbury. Dr. Jabez Starr is supposed to have been the first who would allow a Methodist preacher to sit at his table or sleep in his house. Some of the surrounding towns were more willing to open their homes to these men of "strange doctrine," and thither they were obliged to go for food and shelter.

Some time in the year 1808 a society was formed in the centre of the town. Hitherto there had been a "class" in the southwest part of the town, now known as Starr's Plain. This society was organized under the pastoral charge of Rev. Noble W. Thomas and Rev. Jonathan Lyon, whose large circuit embraced this region of country.

During the following year, under the earnest labors of Levi Bronson, a local preacher and class-leader, together with the preachers of the circuit, the little society succeeded in building a small and plain house of worship. The deed of this property locates the church on land bounded as follows: "Northerly by Joseph Robertson and Daniel Scofield, including the lane running from the highway to the meeting-house ; easterly by William Tweedy and Justice Barnum ; southerly by said Tweedy ; and westerly by Joseph P. Cook, Jr." The "highway" spoken of is now called Franklin Street, and the "lane" is the road leading to the Tweedy factories on Rose Street. Among the trustees of the society were Jabez Starr, Peter Hack, Charles Boughton, Levi Bronson, and Caleb Benedict.

For nearly thirty years the little church on the hill was the centre of Methodism. Some are still living who speak with enthusiasm of the good times enjoyed in the humble house of the days gone by. Those were certainly noble men and women who stood as the representatives of Methodism when she was despised by the masses.

Among those who bore the burden and heat of the day may be mentioned Revs. Rory Starr and John Nickerson, local preachers connected with the church from its early history. By their upright living in the community, by prudence and zeal in the church, they gave character to the denomination they represented.

Many are the pastors who came and went during that period of Danbury Methodism ; but the rule of the denomination demanding a change every two years made it impossible for any of them to become identified with the general interests of the town. Their names linger in many households as precious memories.

In the year 1835 a new site was purchased on Liberty Street, and soon the church now owned by the Disciples was erected thereon.

At the Conference of 1836 Danbury Methodism ceased to form a circuit and became a station. Hitherto her ministers had given only a part of their service here, but the Rev. Jacob Shaw was appointed to Danbury with the intent that he should live here and work, and he did this with great success. At the beginning of his pastorate the whole membership numbered one hundred and fifty-eight. At the close of his first year he reported over three hundred.

The revival of 1837, just referred to, was probably the most effective and abiding ever experienced by the society. The current of religious thought and feeling ran deeply ; men and women were strangely awakened, and were brought out into a positive religious life. Much of the fruit abides to this day, and many more have gone up higher.

At this time the officers of the church were as follows : Local preachers, John Nickerson and Rory Starr ; exhorters, Alvin Hurd, Stephen H. Barnum, John Comes ; leaders, George Andrews, William Hill, George Starr ; stewards, Wm. T. Scofield, Jonathan Couch, Underhill Nelson, Joel Sanford. Among the trustees were John Nickerson, Rory Starr, Jesse Crofut, Philo Wildman, Underhill Nelson, and Thomas Stocker.

Rory Starr departed from the church militant to the church triumphant on Thursday morning, Feb. 27, 1845. John Nickerson ceased his labors on earth and entered into rest on the 20th of March, 1848. As was fitting, the records of the church make special mention of these two worthies : " Being dead they yet speak."

The pastors who served the society during its stay in Liberty Street were Rev. Jacob Shaw, two years ; Rev. H. Wing, who after a few months sickened and was obliged to resign ; Rev. J. Crawford, who supplied the pulpit the remainder of the Conference year ; 1840-42, Rev. Sylvester H. Clark ; 1842-43, Rev. James Floy ; 1844-45, Rev. Fitch Reed ; 1846-47, Rev. John Crawford ; 1848-49, Rev. Robert Jessup ; 1850-51, Rev. John B. Merwin ; 1852-53, Rev. W. C. Hoyt.

During the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Hoyt the building now occupied by the society was erected, and the old building sold to the Disciples.

At a meeting of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church held Wednesday, April 27, 1853, to act upon proposals for building the new Methodist Episcopal church of Danbury station, there were present Sturges Selleck, Samuel Stebbins, William T. Scofield, Allen McDonald, William W. Stevens, George Hull, Thomas S. Barnum, and James W. Nichols, Joel B. Sanford being absent.

On motion of W. T. Scofield, it was voted that the board accept the proposals of Barnum & Starr for erecting the new church, seventy-four by fifty feet, for nine thousand three hundred dollars, provided the money can be raised to meet the several payments as they become due in said proposals. It was further voted that Samuel Stebbins and George Hull be a building committee, with power to make the contracts with Barnum & Starr, to superintend the erection of said church, and to do any other business to be done by the trustees in relation thereto. It was also voted that Sturges Selleck and Rev. W. C. Hoyt be a committee to circulate the subscription-paper drawn up this day for five thousand dollars. At a subsequent meeting the size of the church was enlarged to seventy-eight by fifty-six feet.

At the opening of the new church the society numbered about three hundred, including probationers. The Sunday-school was in a prosperous condition, under the superintendence of George Starr, consisting of nearly forty officers and teachers and one hundred and fifty scholars.

The pastor, Rev. W. C. Hoyt, in his report to the Quarterly Conference, says, "The numbers gradually increase. The Bible-classes are interesting. The infant class is well sustained. The teachers are generally in their places, and labor faithfully for the good of their scholars. The friends of the school have much to encourage them."

In the spring of 1855 the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, consisting of nearly two hundred ministers, held its annual session in Danbury. The changed feelings of the people towards the preachers of the denomination was beautifully illustrated by the cheerfulness with which the homes and churches were opened for their entertainment and service. The Conference passed resolutions highly complimentary to the town and the hospitality of its citizens. "What hath God wrought" in behalf of Methodism!

Since the erection of the new building now occupied the following pastors have officiated in the order named: Rev. E. E. Griswold, recently deceased; Rev. George W. Woodruff, a man sui generis and successful in his pastorate; Rev. John Miley, now professor in the Drew Theological Seminary; Rev. John Pegg, Jr.; Rev. John Crawford, whose home is with us still; Rev. W. T. Hill, now presiding elder of the New Haven District, who under the extended pastoral term remained three years; Rev. Thomas H. Burch; Rev. W. F. Hatfield, who was removed in the spring of 1873 to White Plains, N. Y. Rev. J. L. Peck succeeded Mr. Hatfield, and remained three years. Rev. P. Pilsbury followed Mr. Peck, and remained one year. The present pastor is the Rev. Spencer H. Bray.

At the last report, rendered in April of this year, the membership numbered six hundred and fifty full members and eighty-five probationers, making a total of seven hundred and thirty-five.

The church was enlarged and improved during the year 1876, and now has very pleasant Sunday-school rooms and a fine auditorium.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

On Sunday, July 9, 1876, Rev. J. J. Hough, then pastor of this church, preached a historical sermon, from which the following is taken:

"The history of this church stretches back over a period of a hundred and eighty years. For more than three-quarters of a century had the First Church of Danbury been in existence at the time of the American Revolution. Two generations had received instruction and guidance from its pastors, while as yet there was no thought among the colonists of a separate nationality. Could the founders of the church now return, they would find no trace of the work of their hands. Not a familiar house, or even a forest-tree, would greet them. The landscape they might recognize, for the everlasting hills, the valleys, and the streams are unchanged, but everything else would be to them new and surprising. The luxurious homes, the busy factories, the stores, the railroads and telegraphs, the schools, the present temples of worship, the altogether new and changed life of their descendants, the different styles of clothing worn, would all be to them subjects of wonder and surprise.

"In the year 1696—the year of the formation of this church—Danbury had been organized as a town but three years, although its earliest settlement was in 1684, when it was known by the Indian name of Pahquioque, or, as I find it in the old colonial records, Paquiage.

"From the records of a General Court held at Hartford, May 14, 1696, I take the following extract: 'Upon the petition of the towne of Danbury this court granted them liberty to embody themselves into church estate in an orderly way, with the consent of neighbour churches.' Previous to this act of the court a meeting-house had been built, probably on the theory that the logical order was the procurement of a cage before catching a bird. The site of the first meeting-house was on 'the Town street' (now Main Street), a little north of where the court-house now stands. Its dimensions were about those of an ordinary farm barn,—thirty by forty feet. It is recorded that 'every person belonging to the town was present at the raising and sat on the sills at once.' It is supposed that Mr. Seth Shove was ordained pastor at the time the church was organized, in 1696. The court grant quoted above is the only record in existence respecting the origin of the church, not even the number of the original members nor their names being known. 'Robbins' Century Sermon,' preached in 1801, characterizes the first pastor, Mr. Shove, as a 'very pious and worthy man, who was very successful in his exertions for the promotion of peace, virtue, and religion.'

"By a council of the colony authorities assembled at Hartford, Feb. 6, 1707, a time when the French were trying to excite the Indians to hostility against the English, it was 'Resolved, That for the preservation of the frontier towns of Sinsbury, Waterbury, Woodbury, and Danbury, order be sent to the inhabitants of those towns to provide with all possible speed a sufficient number of well-fortified houses for the safteie of themselves and families in their respective towns.' In obedience to this order the town put in posture of defense the house of Rev. Mr. Shove, which stood on an eminence near the church, and the house of Mr. Samuel Benedict, at the lower end of the street. The colonial records show that the sum of 'five pounds in country pay' was granted the town of Danbury the following year 'in consideration of the charge of said town in fortifying.' In connection with the defenses provided, obedience to the following order by the council, of the same date, may have contributed to the 'safetie' of the people: 'Resolved, That these towns do every of them maintain a good scout out every day of two faithful and trusty men to observe the motions of the enemy.'

"Mr. Shove's pastorate was terminated by his death, Oct. 3, 1735. The inscription upon his tombstone is: 'Here lyes buried ye body of Rev. Mr. Seth Shove, ye pious and faithful pastor of ye church in Danbury 39 years, who died Oct. 3d, Anno Domini, 1735, aetatis sue 68.'

"The church records were consumed when the town was burned by the British in 1777, consequently there are no writings to acquaint us with this early period in the history of the church; but we may infer an increase of population and the growth of the church under Mr. Shove's ministry from the fact that the first meeting-house gave place to a larger structure in 1719. Its dimensions were thirty-five by fifty feet. It occupied the same site as the building it replaced. The continued growth of the town and of the church is further indicated by the enlargement of this new meeting-house in 1745, during the ministry of Mr. White, fifteen feet being added to the front, making its dimensions thirty-five by sixty-five feet.

"March 10, 1736, five and one-half months after Mr. Shove's death, Mr. Ebenezer White was ordained pastor. In Robbins' sermon this commendatory statement appears: 'Universal harmony prevailed between the people and their minister for twenty-five years. The people of the town were considered by all the neighboring towns as eminent for morality and religion, for regularity of conduct and constant attentions on the institutions of charity.'

"During the pastorate of Mr. White, the Fairfield East Association, in session in Danbury, July, 1745, licensed as a preacher of the gospel David Brainard, who was then under censure of Yale College, having been expelled for saying of Tutor Whittlesey, 'that he had no more of the grace of God in him than that chair.' (As Tutor Whittlesey was afterwards pastor of the Centre Church, New Haven, it is to be hoped that Brainard was mistaken in his harsh utterance.) The Association justified itself for its action in a lengthy document; but if this were needed, a better vindication was the very useful work done by Brainard in his ministry. In a short career of five and one-half years he gained renown as a missionary apostle to the Indians. He died in 1747 at Northampton, in the family of President Edwards, by whom shortly afterwards his biography was written.

"After preaching acceptably to the church for twenty-five years, Mr. White changed his theological views, adopting substantially the Sandemanian belief. He was complained of to the Association in 1763, 'as holding and teaching false doctrine, and presented to the council of the Consociation for trial.' The council met at Danbury Aug. 1, 1763. The church (a majority of whom sustained Mr. White) objected to the authority of the council on the ground that it was a Congregational Church, and not amenable to any outside body. The objection was not allowed; from which we may infer that councils in those days (at least in Connecticut) were something more than 'advisory.' After a five days' session the result reached was 'that Mr. White should have a three months' probation to see if he would not preach to the acceptance of his hearers.' He did not, however, give satisfaction, and on Jan. 3, 1764, a joint council of both the Fairfield Consociations met to consider his case. Mr. White, with a majority of the church, denied the jurisdiction of the council and renounced the platform; but the council went forward and found him guilty of heresy, and put him on probation again until the last Tuesday in March. At that time the council met again and dismissed him from his pastorate under censure. The majority of the church still adhering to Mr. White, the council recognized the minority as constituting the First Consociated Church in Danbury, and left the seceding majority to themselves. At the solicitation of Mr. White the council convened again the following September to state upon what terms he could be relieved from censure. The terms given were declined by Mr. White, and he was never restored to fellowship.

"The seceding party, declaring themselves independent of Consociation, formed a new church organization, which received the name of the 'New Danbury Church.' Retaining Mr. White as pastor, they built a meeting-house in 1768, which nine years later was burned by the British. The church was greatly weakened by the loss of their meeting-house and by defections to the Sandemanians, among which was that of Rev. Ebenezer Russell White (son of Rev. Ebenezer White), who in 1768 had become colleague pastor with his father. In 1779, Rev. Ebenezer White died, and shortly thereafter the 'New Danbury Church' became extinct.

"The name White has been a prominent and honored name in Danbury for the last century, the line of Rev. Ebenezer White's descendants having been continuous to the present, and finding its representatives in Danbury to-day in the families of Mr. William R. White, Mr. Philo White, and Col. Nelson L. White.

"This church, weakened by the secession of a majority of its members, did not secure another pastor after the dismissal of Mr. White until two years had elapsed. In February, 1765, Mr. Noadiah Warner was ordained pastor, but his pastorate was brief and much interrupted by efforts that were made to secure the return of the seceders, he on two occasions consenting to relinquish his pulpit for several months that candidates might be listened to by both parties, it being understood that if a man was found upon whom all could unite Mr. Warner would resign in his favor. Variances about pecuniary matters and a lack of the spirit of concession thwarted these efforts, but they disturbed the relations of Mr. Warner to the church to the extent that he sought a dismissal at the expiration of the third year of his pastorate.

"From the society records, which date back to 1755, it appears that on April 3, 1769, a call to the pastorate was given by the church and society to 'the worthy Jeremiah Day,' who had for a few weeks supplied the pulpit, but, the vote of the society standing twenty-eight opposed to the call to forty-seven in favor, and the vote to give him a yearly salary of seventy-five pounds, with a settlement of one hundred and fifty pounds standing forty-six in favor, opposed forty-three, he did not accept. Doubtless this result seemed disappointing at the time, but Providence was not altogether unkind, as by his brief connection with the church he gained for himself a wife, he being married the following year to Miss Lucy Wood, one of the young-lady members of the church.

"In the summer of 1770, Mr. Ebenezer Baldwin accepted a call to the church. The earliest records of the church in existence begin with the minutes of the council that convened for his settlement, Sept. 19, 1770. The sermon upon the occasion was preached by President Daggett, of Yale College. The brief statement of Robbins' sermon respecting Mr. Baldwin is that 'he officiated with great reputation to the ministry till a sudden death terminated his labors, Oct. 15, 1776,—a man of great talents and learning' (he was the second scholar of his class in college), 'a constant student, grave in his manners, a constant and able supporter of the sound doctrines of the gospel.' (After the defection of Mr. White, soundness in the faith would beyond question be the first qualification demanded in a pastor.) During his ministry of six years there were added to the full communion of the church fifty-four. Ten were admitted to the half-way covenant.

"The practice of the churches of that day was to allow baptized persons who did not profess conversion to assent to the church covenant, which act brought them into connection with and under the jurisdiction of the church, although they did not join in communion.

"Mr. Baldwin married sixty-eight couples. He baptized one hundred and thirteen children, and attended one hundred and forty-nine funerals. The summer of 1775 was a period of great mortality in Danbury, and of the one hundred and thirty deaths in town that year eighty-two were within the limits of the First Society, and sixty-two funerals were attended by Mr. Baldwin in the three months of June, July, and August.

"The pastorate of Mr. Baldwin covered those exciting years in the national history that preceded and marked the commencement of the Revolution. At that day no class of citizens was more conspicuous for patriotism, or more powerfully contributed to arouse the spirit of resistance to the despotic acts of the British government and to prepare the minds of the people for the great struggle of the Revolution, than the Congregational clergy of New England, and among them Mr. Baldwin was conspicuous by his zeal and signal ability. Almost all the writing for the public prints at that day was done by the clergy. In 1774 he prepared and published a spirited address to the people of the western part of the colony to arouse them to a sense of the danger in which their liberties were involved. In November, 1776, on the day set apart for Thanksgiving in the colony of Connecticut, at a period which he regarded as the most calamitous the British colonies ever beheld, he preached a sermon designed to wake up the spirits of the people in the important and dangerous struggle in which they were engaged. This sermon had at the time great celebrity. So excellent, encouraging, and appropriate was it that it was called for and printed at the expense of a leading member of the Episcopal Church. A copy of it is preserved in the archives of the New York Historical Society. Mr. Baldwin, with the other ministers of the Association, arranged a series of circular fasts in the churches of Fairfield County, in the spring of 1776, on 'account of the threatening aspect of the public affairs.'

"A memoir of Mr. Baldwin, prepared by his brother, Hon. Simeon Baldwin, formerly judge of the Supreme Court of Connecticut, may be found in Sprague's 'Annals of the American Pulpit.' Mr. Baldwin's brother Simeon and James Kent, afterwards Chancellor Kent, of New York, and author of 'Kent's Commentaries,' were members of a class of young men who studied under the direction of Mr. Baldwin while pastor of this church. Chancellor Kent, in a Phi Beta Kappa oration given at Yale in 1834, paid a beautiful tribute to the memory of Mr. Baldwin. Speaking of the tutors in that college, he said, 'And suffer me for a moment to bring to recollection from among this class of men the Rev. Ebenezer Baldwin, of Danbury, for it is to that great, excellent man that the individual who has now the honor to address you stands indebted for the best part of his early classical education. Mr. Baldwin was tutor in this college for the period of four years, and he settled as a minister in the First Congregational Church of Danbury in the year 1770. He was a scholar and a gentleman of the fairest and brightest hopes. He was accustomed to read daily a portion of the Hebrew Scriptures, and he was extensively acquainted with Greek and Roman literature. His style of preaching was simple, earnest, and forcible, with the most commanding and graceful dignity and manner. His zeal for learning was ardent, and his acquisitions and reputation rapidly increasing, when he was doomed to fall prematurely in the flower of his age and while engaged in his country's service. Though his career was painfully short, he had lived long enough to attract general notice and the highest respect by his piety, his learning, his judgment, and his patriotism. He took an enlightened and active interest in the rise and early progress of the American Revolution. In the gloomy campaign of 1776 he was incessant in his efforts to cheer and animate his townsmen to join the militia which were called out for the defense of New York. To give weight to his eloquent exhortations he added that of his heroic example. He went voluntarily as a chaplain to one of the militia regiments, composed mostly of his own parishioners. His office was pacific, but he nevertheless arrayed himself in military armor. I was present when he firmly but affectionately bade adieu to his devoted parishioners and affectionate pupils. This was about the 1st of August, 1776, and what a moment in the annals of this country! There never was a period more awful and portentous. It was the very crisis of our destiny. The defense of New York had become desperate. An enemy's army of thirty thousand men, well disciplined and well equipped, was in its vicinity, ready to overwhelm it. Gen. Washington had, to oppose them, less than eighteen thousand men, and part of them were extremely sickly. Nothing could have afforded better proof of patriotic zeal than Mr. Baldwin's voluntary enlistment at this critical juncture. The militia, much reduced by sickness, after two months' service were discharged. Mr. Baldwin fell a victim to the sickness that prevailed in the army, having only strength sufficient to reach home, where he died on October 1st, 'honored by the deepest sympathies of his own people, and with the public veneration and sorrow.'

WEST STREET CHURCH.

This church originated with Mr. Horace Bull. He was impressed by reading a series of letters, published in the New York Observer, on the duty of large churches to colonize. They were written by Rev. Dr. Humphrey, of Massachusetts. He claimed "that the activity of a church would be increased by such a lessening of its members, and that new churches would draw in strangers, and thus increase the number of church-goers." Mr. Bull had a little property, and he gave one-third of it to start the enterprise. He had been for many years a member of the First Congregational Church, and contributed to its permanent fund, but was in no way distinguished except as a leader of singing. It was no part of his wish to deprecate other churches, but only to extend more widely the influence of a joyful gospel. Twenty members joined him in leaving the "old hive;" one came from the Methodist Church, one by letter from Poughkeepsie, and another from New York City.

"At a meeting of individuals in favor of forming a new organization for religious worship, held in the basement of the First Congregational church in Danbury, May 20, 1851, on motion, Horace Bull was appointed chairman, and a committee of two, consisting of Henry Lobdell and L. C. Hoyt, were appointed to confer with the Universalist Society to engage their house of worship, now St. Peter's Hall, for one year, and were authorized to correspond with Mr. William C. Scofield, of New Haven (Theological Seminary), and, if they deemed it necessary and expedient, to engage his services as pastor for the term of two months from the first day of June."

At a meeting held on the evening of May 23, 1851, the committee reported that they had hired the Universalist church for one year, and that Mr. Scofield would preach eight Sabbaths. Permission having been obtained from the First Church, by a vote of fourteen yeas to seven nays, to attempt the experiment of forming a new church, it was resolved to go forward notwithstanding that the First Church granted its permission only with the condition that it was not to be held responsible "either for its success or support." After voting to hold the first religious services in the new place of worship, June 1, 1851, the meeting adjourned. In 1851, July 9th, the church was organized by a Congregational Ecclesiastical Council, meeting in First Church. Oct. 15, 1854, the corner-stone of a church edifice was laid. This building is now in the possession of the Catholic Church, west of the park. May 6, 1852, the new church building was dedicated. On June 18th of same year rules of government were adopted and a resolution passed to organize an ecclesiastical society.

Mr. Scofield was ordained to the gospel ministry and installed pastor of the new church on Sept. 15, 1852. Thus it will be seen that within about a year from the preliminary meeting the infant society had attained to a formal and regular ecclesiastical organization, built a house of worship, and obtained a settled pastor. April 26, 1854, the pastoral relations of Mr. Scofield with the church were dissolved by mutual consent. From this time until the spring of 1858 the church was without a settled pastor. During the interim, however, the pulpit was supplied for more than two years by the Rev. E. S. Huntington, a friend of the church and a resident of Danbury.

In 1857, from July 1st until September 17th of the same year, Rev. William Page supplied the pulpit. From November, 1857, until April 1, 1858, Rev. S. H. Howell made the supplies. The Rev. David Peck, of Woodbridge, received a call March 26, 1858. On June 23d, Mr. Peck was regularly installed. Mr. Peck served acceptably until Jan. 2, 1861, when he was dismissed at his own request. Rev. Ezra D. Kenny was invited to supply for three months. Mr. James Robertson, a licentiate of Union Theological Seminary, New York City, also was engaged to supply for a time. On Dec. 20, 1861, the church voted to engage Mr. Robertson for twelve months. His services were so acceptable that the church voted to have Mr. Robertson ordained March 30, 1862. As the congregation grew and their wants increased, the necessity of a larger and more commodious building became apparent. Measures were taken to construct such edifice, and the result was that in May, 1865, the new West Street church was dedicated. July 1, 1865, Mr. Robertson severed his connection with the church. The Rev. Henry Powers was immediately called, and began his duties as acting pastor. He was installed April 15, 1868, and was dismissed at his own request after serving about nine months. May 30, 1869, Mr. D. A. Easton, a licentiate from Andover Theological Seminary, Massachusetts, began to supply the pulpit. On June 3d he received and accepted a call as stated preacher. Mr. Easton was finally called to the pastorate and accepted, and Dec. 29, 1869, he was ordained to the gospel ministry, and installed pastor of the church Oct. 10, 1870. Mr. C. A. G. Thurston, a licentiate of Andover Theological Seminary, Massachusetts, and more recently stated preacher at Bradford, N. H., began his duties as associate pastor and preacher with Mr. Easton, whose health, being impaired, rendered him unable to perform the duties of the pastorate without assistance. Sept. 20, 1871, Mr. Easton was dismissed as pastor on account of ill health, but, preserving membership of the church, he often supplied the pulpit and greatly aided in clearing off a funded debt which was burdening the church. The Rev. S. B. Hershey, the present pastor, was installed Oct. 27, 1874.

ST. JAMES' EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The earliest records of St. James' Church, Danbury, now in possession of the church go back only as far as the year 1812. The second missionary sent to this State by the venerable "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts,"—a society still in vigorous existence in the English Church,—the Rev. Henry Canes, a graduate of Yale in the class of 1728, and who went to England for holy orders in 1727 and became missionary to Fairfield late in the autumn of the same year, sought out the churchmen scattered in the contiguous regions. In his first report, made to the society in 1728, he speaks of a "village north-westward of Fairfield about eighteen miles, containing twenty families; the name of it is Chestnut Ridge (Redding), and where I usually preach and lecture once in three weeks." He also visited Ridgefield and Danbury as often as his duties would permit, and stated that there were in most of these places seven, ten, or fifteen families professing the doctrine of the Church of England.

About 1763 the first Episcopal church was erected in this place, and opened, on its partial completion, by the Rev. Ebenezer Dibble, a native of Danbury, and missionary at Stamford and Greenwich. Occasional ministrations were held here by the Rev. Mr. Leaming, and by the Rev. Mr. Beach, of Newtown. A charitable layman, Mr. St. George Talbot, residing in the province of New York, who presented the church with a Bible and Prayer-book and had assisted the people here towards the erection of their church, was one of the gratified congregation at the opening services. In 1769 the faithful missionary at Newtown, reporting his occasional services in the newly-erected church at Danbury, speaks of the edifice "with a decent steeple" and large enough to accommodate from "four hundred to five hundred people." In 1777, Gen. Tryon, commanding a detachment of two thousand of His Majesty's troops, penetrated to Danbury, a place which the commissioners of the American army had selected for depositing military stores; and while both church and meeting-house there were used as depositories, his troops are said to have taken the stores out of church and burned them in the streets, saving the sacred edifice, but they devoted the meeting-house to the flames. In 1784 the Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., was consecrated Bishop of Connecticut in Aberdeen, Scotland, the first American prelate. In 1794 the Rev. David Perry, of Ridgefield, resigned the pastoral charge of the parishes of Ridgefield, Redding, and Danbury, and in due time the Rev. David Butler succeeded him in the cure, and the Rev. Elijah G. Plum from 1808 to 1812. Bishop Jarvis consecrated the church here Oct. 6, 1802. Bishop Hobart, of New York, officiated in Danbury on a Sunday in August, 1817. In 1809 there were reported 70 families and 22 communicants. In 1816, 41 communicants. In 1822, 41 communicants. In 1824, 49 communicants.

The Rev. Reuben Hubbard was instituted rector, Sept. 1, 1812, to 1819; the Rev. Ambrose S. Todd from 1819 to 1823; Rev. Samuel B. Hall from 1823 to 1836. In 1836 only 40 communicants and 5 families of the original churchmen were remaining. Up to this time the parish had had clerical services once in three or four weeks, and from 1808 had always been associated with Christ Church, Redding, and part of the time also with Ridgefield. The Rev. Mr. Hall confined himself to Danbury and Redding, and after the chapel, now St. Thomas' church, Bethel, was built, in 1835, the services were divided between the two alternately once in four weeks. The year 1836 was the first time that the parish of St. James' Church and St. Thomas' Chapel had attempted to have the services of a clergyman the whole time, and this came near failing for the want of means. From Easter, 1838, to Easter, 1839, Dr. Short officiated half the time in Brookfield and the other half here, and the Christian Knowledge Society aided in the payment of his salary. The Rev. David H. Short was rector from 1836 to 1849, and the Rev. Thomas T. Guion from 1849 to 1847. In 1844 the first church built at the lower end of Main Street, a wooden building, the frame of which has been converted into a dwelling-house, was abandoned, and a new church was erected in a central position on West Street near Main. The Rev. Henry Olmstead and the Rev. John Purves were associated with the Rev. Mr. Guion, residing in Bethel and having charge of the chapel there. In 1844 the whole parish, including Bethel, reported 100 families and 130 communicants, with 80 Sunday-school scholars and 20 teachers. In 1845, on the separation of Bethel from this parish, Rev. Guion reported 75 families, 65 communicants, and 45 Sunday-school scholars, with 9 teachers. From 1847 to 1854 the Rev. William White Bronson was rector. In 1853 he reported 70 families and 77 communicants. From 1854 to 1854 the Rev. I. Leander Townsend was rector. In 1855 he reported 70 families and 107 communicants. In 1859 the church was enlarged by the addition of a chancel and new furniture, the latter being used in the new stone church. In 1863 he reported 130 families and 189 communicants. The Rev. Mr. Townsend was also rector of "Deer Hill Institute," a church boarding-school for boys. The Rev. Dr. Hawley entered upon his duties on the 1st of March, 1864. He reported this year 145 families and 278 communicants. In 1867 the present chapel and the chancel and the first bay of the nave of the new stone church was erected, and in 1872 the nave and the tower were completed all save the stone spire.

An ex-editor of the Church Review speaks of this sacred edifice as "one of the most beautiful churches in the country." The memorial and other windows were made by Messrs. Moore, Doremus, Henry E. Sharpe, Morgan & Bros., Slack & Booth, and are among the finest specimens of their best workmanship. The present rector, Rev. Arthur Sloan, assumed charge May, 1875.

FIRST UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

On the 9th day of December, 1822, a little company of men, twelve in number,—as were the earliest disciples,—met at the school-house in Great Plain District, in the town of Danbury, to organize a Universalist society.

These twelve men were Ebenezer Nichols, William Patch, Miles Hoyt, Philo B. White, Stephen Ambler, Zadock Stephens, Ira R. Wildman, Thomas P. White, William Peck, Joel Taylor, Andrew Andrews, Stephen Gregory.

Previous to this time Universalism had taken root in Danbury, in consequence of the preaching of itinerant ministers, or missionaries, who traveled through this part of the country from time to time, holding services in towns where opportunity offered, speaking in public halls, in school-houses, private dwellings, and, when no other place could be found, in barns or in the open air. In 1807, probably in September of that year, the Rev. Hosea Ballou, one of the fathers of the Universalist Church in America, having journeyed into Connecticut for the purpose of attending the annual meeting of the United States Universalist Convention, which was held at Newtown, September 15th, 16th, and 17th, conducted religious services in Danbury, preaching in the court-house. This was the first service ever conducted in Danbury by a Universalist clergyman of which any record has been found. There are traditions to the effect that the Rev. John Murray, a disciple of Wesley, who first planted Universalism on the shores of the New World, preached once in Danbury before the beginning of the present century, but of this service the present pastor can find no written record.

After 1807 occasional services were held in the town by various itinerant ministers, among others the Rev. Solomon Glover, of Newtown. At this time the social ostracism, amounting in some cases to actual persecution, which had been meted out to the Methodists in England, to the Baptists and Quakers in America, and to every religious sect at some period of its history, fell to the lot of the American Universalists. Their testimony was not taken in court; they were pronounced little better than atheists; were charged with being haters of religion and teachers of immoral doctrines. One of the twelve men who organized the society in 1822 attended the meetings for some time in secret, "going across the swamp to the court-house, in order not to be seen," as he often afterwards confessed. Such a profound impression was, however, produced upon his mind by the new truths which he believed he had heard that he was no more ashamed, but proud, to be seen going to the Universalist meetings. Those were the days when good, pious, Christian souls, not doubting that Universalists were infidels and were doing the work of Satan, prayed that the Lord would "uncover the bottomless pit and shake the Universalist minister over it until he repented of his errors." It was the retort of one of the Universalist pioneers that even in this prayer, seemingly so profane and merciless, there was, after all, a recognition of divine goodness, in the admission that a pit without bottom should yet be provided with a cover.

After the organization of the Universalist Society it was for a year or two without a regular pastor. Visiting clergymen on preaching tours spent the Sunday here on frequent occasions, and preached, sometimes in the court-house, occasionally in other places. Sometimes a clergyman would arrive late Saturday evening, and messengers would be sent out notifying the little band that on the morrow they were to have a minister.

Some time in 1824 the Rev. Thomas F. King, father of Rev. T. Starr King, was engaged to preach a portion of the time in Danbury, preaching also at Norwalk during his engagement, which continued about two years. In 1826 the Rev. Zelotus Fuller preached occasionally at Danbury, and was succeeded by the Rev. Daniel E. Morgan, who preached one sermon every Sunday for six months. Then, for a period of four years, occasional services were rendered by the Revs. Geo. Rogers, Solomon Glover, Menzies Raynor (a convert from the Episcopal Church), T. J. Whitcomb, Theophilus Fiske, Gilman Noyes, and Schemiah Dodge. Dec. 29, 1830, the Rev. John Boyden was called to become the pastor, and preached in Danbury about six months, when, finding his various duties more than he could longer undertake, and desiring that a pastor should be engaged who should give his entire time and attention to the Danbury congregation, he asked to be released from his engagement, and the request was granted. During the ministry of Mr. Boyden a choir was gathered under the leadership of the late Stephen A. Hurlburt, who served as chorister for many years with zeal and faithfulness.

The subsequent pastors of this congregation have been as follows:

1831.—Rev. G. W. Brooks, for two months only.

1831.—Rev. L. F. W. Andrews, for about the same length of time. Mr. Andrews was subsequently engaged with Hon. P. T. Barnum, as editor of a paper which Mr. Barnum published. Mr. Barnum was for several years the clerk of the Universalist Society.

1831-32.—Rev. G. W. Brooks, re-engaged.

1833.—In August, Rev. L. W. F. Andrews was called, and declined a re-engagement, Mr. Brooks' engagement having expired.

1834.—Rev. Albert Case.

1835.—The church was without a pastor.

1836-38.—Rev. S. C. Bulkley.

1838-40.—Rev. James Cook.

1841-43.—Rev. S. B. Brittan.

1843-45.—Rev. J. K. Ingalls.

1847.—Rev. Heman Burr.

1846.—In the latter part of this year the pulpit was supplied for a time by Rev. R. P. Ambler.

1847.—No settled pastor.

1848.—Rev. Timothy Elliott.

1849-51.—Rev. Geo. H. Deere.

1852-56.—Rev. S. C. Bulkley.

1856.—Rev. Mr. Bulkley's engagement closed early in the year. Rev. Edward Smiley was engaged early in June, ordained in July, but remained only till November. For two years following the church was weakened by the general prostration of business, and during this time was shepherdless.

1859-60.—Rev. Robert C. Brown.

1861.—No settled pastor.

1862-65.—Rev. J. H. Shepard.

1866-67.—Rev. Abel C. Thomas supplied the pulpit.

1868-70.—Rev. William G. Haskell.

1870-80.—Rev. D. M. Hodge, the present pastor.

A church edifice was erected for this congregation on Main Street, corner of Wooster, in 1833, and dedicated in September of that year by the Rev. Matthew Hale Smith, assisted by other clergymen. This building was afterwards sold to the Catholic Society, and is still owned by them. The edifice on Liberty Street now occupied by this congregation was built in 1851-52, and dedicated in the spring of the latter year.

The first deacons of the church were William Patch and Zadoek Stevens.

Nearly all the members of the original church organization are now dead or have removed from town. In fact, the church has been unusually subject to loss by these causes, especially the latter, notwithstanding which it has had a slow but steady growth; during the ministry of the present pastor a goodly number have been added to the membership of the church, and many children have been baptized.

This church observes one Sunday in June of each year as Rose Sunday, when the church audience-room is profusely decorated with flowers and children are christened or baptized.

The officers of this church at the present time are: Pastor, Rev. D. M. Hodge; Deacons, Stephen Bates, N. B. Dibble, Timothy H. Foster, Luman L. Hubbell; Clerk and Collector, Foster Jarvis; Treasurer, A. A. Heath; Executive Committee, Joseph T. Bates, T. H. Foster, Andrew J. Williams.

The church at the present time is united and prosperous, and is doing a good work in the community. It strives to work in harmony and peace with all who love the Lord Jesus Christ.

THE SANDEMANIAN SOCIETY.

Barber, in his "Connecticut Historical Collections," published in 1836, says,—

"In 1764, Mr. Robert Sandeman, a native of Perth, in Scotland, a man of learning and superior abilities, who had some correspondence with Mr. White and some other ministers in this country, came from his native land, landed at Boston, and came to Danbury near the close of the year. After tarrying several weeks he returned to Boston, where he soon organized a church. He returned to Danbury and gathered a church, July, 1765. The principal doctrines which he taught were similar to those of the Christian Church. His distinguishing tenet was, 'that faith is a mere intellectual belief;' his favorite expression was, 'A bare belief of bare truth.' He maintained that his church was the only true church, then arisen from the ruins of Antichrist, his reign being near a close. The use of means for mankind in a natural state he pretty much exploded.

"Mr. Sandeman died in 1771. The next year his church moved to New Haven. Here it appears they were in a flourishing condition for three or four years. The house in which they worshiped is still standing on Greyson Street.

"When the Revolutionary war broke out the Sandemanians, who were royalists, became objects of suspicion. They were brought up before the civil authority on several occasions, and at one time were imprisoned. These proceedings had the effect to break up their church in this place; nearly, if not quite, all their people moved away.

"In July, 1771, several persons who had been members of that church, together with a number who belonged to the society at New Danbury, united and formed a new Sandemanian Church. That continued and increased for many years, till March, 1795, when they divided into two churches."

The following is from a more recent account given of the Sandemanians:

"They meet on the Sabbath and the Thursday afternoon of each week to exhort and to explain the sacred word. Their church is provided with a large circular table, which occupies nearly half the area of the building, at which the several members seat themselves, each one provided with a copy of the Scriptures, and as they individually feel disposed they read and comment thereon, the females not partaking therein, being but indifferent spectators of the proceedings. They also add to their former exercises prayer and singing; and after which they assemble at one or the other of the brothers' or sisters' houses, where they partake of a feast. . . . There are probably at present about twenty primitive followers, of strict morals and chaste deportment, even to a proverb. It appears that none have joined them latterly.

"This sect, like most others, have divisions among them, one party of which go by the name of 'Osbornites,' from Mr. Levi Osborne, their present teacher. These are very few in number, reduced by deaths, and from the circumstance of none uniting with them. The other party go by the name of 'Baptist' Sandemanians, from their belief in, and practice of, baptism. The Osbornites appear to have been the most numerous of the two classes, having had formerly a considerable number of members, consisting of some people of influence."

There are said to be but four hundred persons of this denomination in the world, forty of whom are in the United States. Those of this belief in Great Britain are known by the name of "Glassites."

The following is copied from the monument of Mr. Sandeman, in the burying-ground opposite the courthouse:

"Here lies, until the resurrection, the body of ROBERT SANDEMAN, a native of Perth, North Britain, who, in the face of continued opposition from all sorts of men, long boldly contended for the ancient Faith, that the bare work of Jesus Christ, without a deed or thought on the part of man, is sufficient to present the chief of sinners spotless before God. To declare this blessed Truth, as testified in the Holy Scriptures, he left his country, he left his friends, and after much patient suffering finished his labors at Danbury, April 2, 1771, A. E. 53 years.

"Deign'd Christ to come so high to us
As not to count it shame
To call us Brethren, should we blush
At night that bears His name?"

"Nay, let us boast in His reproach,
And glory in His Cross:
When He appears, one smile from Him,
Will far o'erjoy our loss."

Rev. Nathaniel West, in his "Analysis of the Bible," says,—

"SANDEMANIANS.—Followers of Mr. Sandeman, who was himself a disciple of Mr. John Glass. The Sandemanians now usually include the Glassites, or followers of Mr. Glass. Place, chiefly Scotland, there being a few in England, the United States, and British North America. Numbers in all, about 2000."

"GLASSITES.—A body of dissenters from the Scotch Church, named after their founder, Mr. John Glass or Glas. Mostly in Scotland, where they number 2136."

We went to what is now called the Wooster Street Cemetery, and after a long search through the sadly-neglected ground found the grave of Mr. Sandeman in a good state of preservation, located west of the jail and near the fence which incloses it. From the appearance of the stone we should judge that it must have replaced an older one. The inscription thereon is not, in some respects, correctly quoted in Barber's "History." We give it verbatim.

As near as we can ascertain, after the death of Mr. Sandeman, the church was presided over by Elder Nathaniel Bishop, who died in 1857. After the death of Elder Bishop, Mr. William B. Ely, an esteemed citizen of Danbury, filled the position until his death, which occurred in 1869. Mr. Ely was an active member of the church for upwards of fifty years. Since his death the church has had no regularly-appointed elder. Although the members do not number as many as formerly, the services are kept up with the old-time regularity.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The first mass said in Danbury was at the house of James Doyle, in Grassy Plain, by the Rev. Father Smith, of New Haven, in the year 1838, and services were held at irregular intervals from that date until the years 1845 and 1846. The next mass said was by the Rev. Father Brady, then in charge of the mission of Norwalk and Stamford, at the house of John Hart, on Franklin Street, in the years 1847 and 1848.

At the next mission, in 1849, mass was said at the house of John Spain, then living in South Street. At the next mission, in 1850, mass was said at the house of James Croll, on Deer Hill. The same year mass was celebrated by Father Ryan in the court-house. The services in the court-house were disturbed by some American people. The academy owned by Rev. John Irwin, Second Congregational Society, was obtained for the use of the Catholics for the rest of the year. The next mission was in 1851. Rev. Father Ryan purchased the Universalist church, corner of Morris and Wooster Streets, at a cost of three thousand dollars. Some improvements were made the same year. The Catholic Cemetery was purchased in 1853, at a cost of two hundred dollars.

In 1857 a lot was purchased at the corner of Main and Centre Streets, and a parsonage erected thereon.

In 1858 or 1859 a piece of land on the west side of Main Street was purchased for two thousand dollars. In 1861 some improvements were made on the old church, now known as St. Peter's Hall. In 1862 the present church was purchased of the Congregationalists for two hundred dollars, and remodeled at a cost of two thousand dollars. In the following year improvements were made on St. Peter's Hall.

During the pastorate of Rev. P. Sheridan he instituted two Catholic schools,—one for boys and one for girls,—and the attendance was about two hundred. He also purchased a piece of land and added it to the cemetery, and also improved it materially.

In the fall of 1864, the debt of the church having reached about six thousand dollars, Father Sheridan resolved to liquidate at least a portion of it, and consequently inaugurated a grand fair at Concert Hall, from which the net proceeds were three thousand dollars. He then commenced collecting funds for building a new church. The church was commenced in 1869, and in September, 1871, the corner-stone was laid by the bishop, Right Rev. F. P. McFarland. The sermon on the occasion was preached by the Rev. Father Hewitt, of the Paulist Fathers, Fifty-ninth Street, New York. It is a singular fact that the walls were built before the laying of the corner-stone, in consequence of the absence of Bishop McFarland at the (Ecumenical Council at Rome. The church is a massive structure, and pleasantly located on Main Street, near the park.

The following is a list of the pastors from 1851, when Father Ryan was here, to the present time: Rev. Father O'Farrell, 1852-53; Rev. John Smith, 1853-57; Rev. Peter Kelly, 1858; Rev. Thomas Drea, 1858-61; Rev. Ambrose Manahan, D.D., 1861-62; Rev. P. Sheridan, 1863-July, 1874; Rev. John Quinn, 1874.

The present officers are the following: Rev. M. P. Lawlor, pastor; Rev. Michael J. Burns, associate pastor; Michael Darragan, Thomas Moran, trustees, elected annually.

The St. Patrick's Library Association was established in 1858.

The St. Peter's Catholic Benevolent Society was organized in July, 1865. Thomas Johnson, President; Thomas McCue, Vice-President.

St. Vincent De Paul Total Abstinence and Benevolent Society was organized August 6, 1866, with twenty charter members. The present membership is seventy-five. Charles Doran is the president, and Michael J. Griffin the vice-president.

The Young Men's Father Mathew Temperance Society was organized in 1878 with about sixty members present.

THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

This church dates its origin back to 1817, when Levi Osborne and wife and Uz Wildman and wife left the Sandemanian Society, in consequence of some difference of religious opinion, of which they had been honored members, and formed the nucleus of the present society.

Mr. Osborne, hearing of a society in New York called the Disciples, visited their church and was baptized by Henry Errett. Returning to Danbury, he baptized his wife and Uz Wildman and wife, and their services were held in Mr. Osborne's house. Mr. Osborne officiated as elder from this time until his death, in 1851. He was the leading spirit of the enterprise, and for many years the members of the church were called "Osbornites."

The society soon began to increase in numbers, and a room over Mr. Osborne's weaver-shop was fitted up for a place of worship. In 1810 a church building was erected on White Street. In 1853 the church belonging to the Methodist Society on Liberty Street was purchased, and occupied in January of the following year.

The following ministers of this faith have preached here: Porter Thomas, A. G. Conings, Matthew S. Clapp, William Tichenor, Ephraim A. Smith, Francis M. Craig, E. B. Osborne, J. M. Yearnshaw, W. W. Belding, N. W. Eaton, Theodore Brooks, Alfred N. Gilbert, Joel A. Headington, W. L. Hayden, W. R. Spindler, W. B. Craig, and J. L. Darsie, present pastor.

The elders have been as follows: Levi Osborne, John Benedict, Edward B. Osborne, Starr Benedict, John Abbott, Abel Foote, E. A. Mallory, Lewis B. Stevens, Edgar S. Morris.

In 1854 a division occurred in the church, and thirty-five members withdrew and met in a hall on Main Street, known as Christian chapel, calling Leslie R. Gault as pastor. The congregations were, however, reunited in 1869. The church is now in a prosperous condition, and has a membership of over two hundred.

GERMAN METHODIST CHURCH.

This church was first established, under the leadership of Henry Stapleburg and Henry Grabert, in the year 1875, in Benedict & Nichols' block, corner of Main and Liberty Streets. The need of a German church society had long been felt by the Protestant Germans of Danbury, that they might hear the gospel expounded in their own tongue, as many of them were unable to understand and fully comprehend the word in the English tongue, and the English church was the only church they were inclined to attend. By the efforts of the above-named leaders, about thirty Protestant Germans were brought together and organized a society at the above place in 1875, and Mr. Grabert was appointed by the pastor of the nearest German church (then located at New Haven) as a local preacher, and filled the pulpit three Sundays in each month, the fourth being the visit of the pastor, Rev. Mr. Hendiges, and who as often as possible sent ministers and tried to supply the pulpit every other Sunday. The society flourished in interest, although not rapidly in numbers, for the first year, the expenses being paid by the liberal donations of its members. A Sabbath-school was established at the same time of the church opening, and numbered about twenty-five scholars.

The pressure of the times and expense of sustaining the church caused the society to give up their undertaking in the year 1877. Its members then resumed their places again in the English churches, principally the Methodist.

In the spring of 1878, Henry Stapleburg built a small two-story dwelling-house on the rear of his lot and residence, corner of Rose Hill and Henry Street, the lower part occupied by a German family and the upper story to be used as a church. The dimensions were about twenty by twenty-five feet, and the room was comfortably fitted up for a chapel. This was a new opening for the society, as Mr. Stapleburg gave them the use of the room for the purpose of worship, which expense was quite an item to the little band, who were trying to worship under their own vine and fig-tree in their own tongue.

Early in the fall of 1878 the room was completed, and once more an effort was made to establish a church on a firmer footing. Other Methodist German families were induced to come to Danbury to work at hatting, and so increase the membership of the church society. Mr. Grabert filled the pulpit every other week, and other ministers from abroad were sent by the pastor at New Haven, Conn., to fill it at other times, he coming once a month and administering the sacrament.

Signs were evident that the growth of this church was more rapid than at any period since its formation, in 1875, and the little room was too small to accommodate them longer than through the winter of 1878-79, and on the first Sunday in April, 1879, the society again occupied their old rooms, corner of Main and Liberty Streets.

Mr. Grabert, in the winter of 1879-80, found his labors through the week in the factory and in the pulpit on Sunday were too arduous. He called a meeting of the society in the beginning of the month of March, and submitted to the pastor and people the necessity of a regularly established church with a permanent pastor. Application to the German Conference held at New York in the second week of April was made for a permanent minister and organized society, and the Conference, hearing the reports from this mission and its pastor, appointed to the German Church of Danbury the Rev. Jacob Kindler, then residing in Mount Vernon, N. Y., where his family still resides. Mr. Kindler was a chaplain in a New York regiment during the early part of the war, and is an old cavalry officer. At the battle of Bull Run he sustained injuries through the falling of his horse, breaking the chaplain's hip-bone.

The church is now regularly ordained, and has a membership of about fifty and a Sunday-school of about the same number.

THE town of Danbury was constituted at a General Court held Oct. 13, 1687. The following is an extract from the records:

"This Court named the new towne at Paquage* Danbury, and granted them a freedom from county rates for fower yeares from this date; and this Court grants that the boundns of the said towne of Danbury shall be six miles square, provided it doe not prejudice any former grant to any particular person made by this Court.

"This Court grants the Danbury brand shall be two eyes as followeth II." (Col. Rec.)

The early town records† were destroyed when the town was burned by the British, hence we are unable to give anything of a documentary character prior to that time.

RECORDS OF 1777.

The following is the first record which appears in the old town-book after the destruction of the town:

"At a town-meeting legally named, held in Danbury, Oct. 1, 1777, Cap. Daniel Taylor chosen moderator. Said meeting was by vote adjourned to the 6th instant at four of the Clock in the afternoon.

"MAJOR TAYLOR, Clerk."

The next entry is as follows:

"TO THE INHABITANTS OF THE TOWN OF DANBURY:

"GENTLEMEN.—It being represented to the General Assembly of this State at their Sessions in May last that the public Records of your Town were consumed by Fire, and said Assembly appointed us the Subscribers to look into the Matter and Ascertain the right of every individul owning Lands in said Town, to facilitate its matter, beg leave to recommend to you, Gentlemen, to call a Town-meeting and appoint a Com. "DANBURY, Nov. 12, 1777"

* A petition was presented "In behalf of the plantation of Paquage that the same may be constituted to be a towne and to be named Swampfield," their south bounds to be "by the north bounds of Fairfield and Norwalk, the north bounds Halfway to Weantucke, the east bounds, half way to Stratford river, the west bounds by York line." The petition, dated October 6th, is signed by Thomas Fitch, Jehu Burr, John Burr, and Thomas Bonnydick. They state that "there are twentie families inhabiting at Paquage, and more desirable persons coming." Samuel Hayes, of Norwalk, was deputed to present the petition to the court. The name substituted by the court for that proposed by the petition was probably adapted from Danbury, a village in Essex, five miles from Chelmsford. (C. J. Hadley.)

THE BOROUGH OF DANBURY.

The charter of the borough of Danbury was granted upon the application of Moss White and others at the May session of the Legislature in 1822. The first borough-meeting was held at the court-house, Wednesday, June 26, 1822, when the following officers were elected: Darius Starr, Clerk; Daniel B. At a meeting held July 5, 1822, S. P. Clark, Samuel C. Dibble, John Foot were appointed haywards.

At a special borough-meeting held May 8, 1823, Reuben Booth was appointed agent to oppose the petition of Comfort Hoyt and others praying the General Assembly to repeal the whole or in part the resolve incorporating the borough of Danbury.

The following is a list of the wardens and clerks from its incorporation to 1880:

WARDENS.

EAR-MARKS.

The following are specimens of ear-marks used in the early days to distinguish sheep:

"Justus Barnum's ear-mark is a crop in each ear and a nick under the near. Entered August 31, 1778."

"Abijah Barnum's ear-mark is a step under the off ear, and half-penny foreside the same, and half-penny foreside the near ear. Entered Decemr 5th, 1778."

"John Gregory, his ear-mark is a crop on the near ear and two half-pennys under the same. Dec. 9, 1778."

"Eben^r Gregory's ear-mark is a crop on the near ear, and a half-penny under the same. Dec. 9, 1778."

"Robert Benedict's ear-mark is a step under each ear. Entered Dec. 28, 1778."

"Andrew Comstock's ear-mark is a half-penny foreside the near ear, step under same. Dec. 28, 1778."

"Nathan Starr's ear-mark is a swallow fork on the near ear. Entered January 5, 1779."

"Eleanor Taylor's ear-mark is a half-penny under near ear, a crop on the off, and a nick under the off. Entered May 30, 1778."

"Ebenzer Whitlock's mark is a spade in the end of the right ear. Entered Dec. 23, 1779."

ROADS.

At a regular town-meeting held in 1800 it was "voted that men's labor on the highway should be rated at seventy-five cents per day, and the same for a good and sufficient team, except from the 20th of September to the 20th of December, when it should be but fifty-eight cents per day." This provision was undoubtedly intended to save the town from being cheated by the short days.

THE DANBURY PRESS.

The Farmers' Journal was established in March, 1790. The publishers were Edward Ely and Nathan Douglas. It was published in a building near the court-house. In January of 1793 the firm separated, and Mr. Douglas commenced a paper under the title of the Republican Journal. This venture does not seem to have proved altogether a profitable one to either party, for in December of the same year Mr. Douglas disposed of his paper to Mr. Ely, who then consolidated the two papers and issued the result as The Farmers' Chronicle. How long he continued its publication is not known. Mr. Douglas, after disposing of his paper, made a specialty of job-printing.

The Religious Monitor and Theological Scales, a monthly religious magazine, was started in 1797 by Douglas & Nichols, and was continued for several years. The copies extant show it to have been well edited, and it probably reached a large circulation.

The Sun of Liberty, a Republican paper, edited by Samuel Morse, Danbury, was established in July, 1800, and continued until October 8th, when it was removed to Norwalk.

The Farmers' Journal and Columbian Ark, an eight-page weekly paper, was started in February, 1803, by Stiles, Nichols & Co. This paper does not seem to have had a long run, as soon after we find that Mr. Nichols went to Bridgeport and published the Farmer of that place.

The New England Republican was established by John C. Gray in July, 1804. This paper was exceedingly neat and good-looking, but there is no record of the length of time it was published, although it must have continued for several years, as the copy in the possession of the writer is No. 41 of Vol. III.

The Danbury Recorder was established in 1826 by Orrin Osborn; it was in after-years published by W. & M. Yale in the building just south of the present Baptist church. It was a small paper, but handsomely gotten up and ably edited.

The Herald of Freedom was started in Bethel, then a part of Danbury, in October, 1831, by P. T. Barnum. We may note here that Mr. Barnum, for an alleged libel on a citizen of Bethel, was tried in October, 1832, found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment for sixty days and fined one hundred dollars. The sentence, so far as imprisonment was concerned, was immediately carried out, Mr. Barnum being confined in the jail, from whence he continued to edit his paper. His release was made the occasion of a grand ovation by his friends. It is but fair to state here that the jury, in finding Mr. Barnum guilty, did so on mere technical grounds, believing that the utmost punishment he would receive would be a small fine, and were as much astonished as was Mr. Barnum at the severity of the sentence. The fine of one hundred dollars was subsequently collected from Mr. Barnum by the State attorney, Mr. Ferris, of Stamford. In 1832 a theological department was added to the paper, under charge of Rev. L. F. W. Andrews, a Universalist clergyman, and the name changed to Herald of Freedom and Gospel Witness. In 1833 the paper was moved to Danbury proper, and the religious department of the paper and the latter portion of the name dropped. Its publication was continued here till November, 1834, when the paper was removed to Norwalk and published by other parties under a new name. The office of publication in Danbury was on the east side of Main Street, opposite the park.

The Connecticut Repository was established in 1832 by Mansion Taylor. It lived but a short time.

The Danbury Gazette was started in 1833 by Wilmot & Lobdall. This paper lived only three years.

In May, 1836, The Danbury Chronicle and Fairfield County Democrat was started by Edward Layden. In 1837 he disposed of his paper to Mr. E. B. Osborne, who in July of the same year established The Danbury Times, its office being the same as that which had been occupied by the Recorder. Mr. Osborne continued its editor and proprietor till 1845, when he disposed of the paper to his brothers, Harvey and Levi, and removed to Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he published The Daily Press and Weekly Telegraph.

The Hatters' Journal was started in 1855 by Granville W. Morris, but it was continued only a few months.

The Junta, a small campaign sheet, was published here for a short time in 1846 by Edward Taylor.

The Jeffersonian was established in 1860 by a number of gentlemen as a Republican paper, with W. A. Crofut as editor. The office was in Hull's brick block, near the Wooster House. In about a year Mr. Newtown obtained an interest in the paper, and the previous owners sold out to Mr. B. F. Ashley, who took the editorial charge. He conducted the paper alone till December, 1865, when Mr. J. H. Swertfaeger purchased an interest. In 1866, Mr. Ashley retired, and Mr. Swertfaeger continued the paper alone till March, 1870, when he sold out to the publishers of The Times. The Jeffersonian was from the first a seven-column, twenty-four by thirty-eight, paper.

In March, 1870, The Danbury Jeffersonian was purchased by James M. Bailey and Timothy Donovan, the proprietors of The Danbury Times. The two papers were consolidated and became The Danbury News, with Mr. Bailey as editor. The paragraphs which gave the paper its reputation originated in The Times a year or two before the consolidation. Mr. Bailey continued this style of writing in The News, but not to the extent he subsequently followed it. The News started with a circulation of nearly fifteen hundred copies, which on the 1st of January, 1873, had reached nineteen hundred,—all this being strictly of a local class. In the beginning of that year the paper was sought by outside parties, and in February found its way to city news-stands. In August, 1873, the circulation reached its highest figure,—thirty thousand. In October, 1873, the office was moved to a building erected for its uses, and a special edition for outside circulation was then begun, and continued until the close of the year 1879. In February, 1878, Mr. Bailey bought the interest of his partner, and became the proprietor of the business. The News is in a highly-prosperous condition, and has attained a national and almost world-wide reputation. As a paragrapher Mr. Bailey stands without a superior, and The Danbury News ranks with The Detroit Free Press, The Burlington Hawkeye, and other journals of its class in the United States. As a local journal, also, it is unsurpassed.

The Danburian appeared in 1874, but its stay was of short duration.

In October, 1878, The People, a Greenback campaign organ, was started by T. Donovan, but was discontinued after the November election.

The Danbury Globe was started by W. Frank Page, May 4, 1874, and was conducted by him until his death, in January, 1879. It is now edited by J. A. Wilcox. It was Republican in politics until July 13, 1880, when it became an independent paper. It is a good local journal, and justly merits its success.

The Danbury Democrat was started June 1, 1877, by Levi K. Wildman, who still conducts it. Mr. Wildman set his first type in the office of The Herald of Freedom, a paper published in Bethel—which at that time was a part of Danbury—by P. T. Barnum. The Democrat is a local sheet of merit, and an advocate of Democratic principles.

The Danbury Republican was established by W. B. Bartram, March 22, 1879, as an independent Republican journal. Much energy and good judgment must have been used during the first year of its existence, for it at once advanced to a prominent place in provincial journalism, gaining a wide circulation and a large advertising patronage. Although a sheet of large proportions when started, it was a few months later considerably enlarged, and on Aug. 3, 1880, was changed to a semi-weekly. It is an earnest advocate of the principles of the Republican party, and the able editorial management of Mr. Bartram has placed it in the front rank of the provincial press in the State.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The Danbury Agricultural Society was organized in the summer of 1869, and has since held annual fairs for the exhibition of stock and farm-produce as well as articles of useful and ornamental industry. The society has been very prosperous. It is free from debt, and receives annually from admission-fees and disburses for premiums a greater sum than any other similar organization in the State. More than sixteen thousand admission-tickets have been taken at the gates during the continuance of a single fair. The grounds are pleasantly located and supplied with all the necessary buildings. There is also an excellent half-mile track. Much credit is due the enterprising progenitors and those through whose influence it has been sustained and prospered.

BANKS.

NATIONAL PAHQUIOQUE BANK.

This bank was organized as the Pahquioque Bank, May 1, 1851, with the following board of directors: Aaron Seeley, William Montgomery, Charles Hull, Hiram L. Sturdevant, L. H. Boughton, W. F. Taylor, Oliver Stone, Frederick S. Wildman. Capital, $100,000. Aaron Seeley was the first president, and his son Augustus was the first cashier. It was voted that subscribers should pay fifty per cent. on subscribing and ten per cent. every sixty days afterwards until paid. Oct. 25, 1854, the capital was increased to $200,000, and in 1857 to $250,000. Augustus Seeley resigned as cashier in January, 1857, when his brother, William P. Seeley, succeeded him, and is the present incumbent. Aaron Seeley remained president of the bank until his death, in 1872. Barnabas Allen then became president, and continued in the office until January, 1879, when he was succeeded by the present incumbent, Barzillai B. Kellogg. It was reorganized as a national bank March 25, 1865, with the following directors: Charles Hull, B. B. Kellogg, A. S. Pearce, James E. Hoyt, Aaron Seeley, W. F. Taylor, Barnabas Allen, W. F. Lacey, Nathaniel Selleck. The present board of directors are as follows: B. B. Kellogg, M. H. Grilling, Henry Crofut, S. C. Holley, B. A. Hough, C. F. Starr, Benjamin Selleck, Charles Hull, and Barnabas Allen.

DANBURY NATIONAL BANK.

The Fairfield County Branch Bank, located at Danbury, was organized for business on the 24th day of August, 1824, by the election of Zalmon Wildman, Esq., as its first president, the several directors being elected by the mother-bank at Norwalk, Conn. The election of cashier was delayed until Sept. 20, 1824, when Curtis Clark, Esq., was chosen and began his duties immediately. The business of the bank was conducted in the house of Dr. Daniel Comstock, who then lived in the building now occupied by Mrs. Amos N. Stebbins. July 25, 1825, action was taken by the directors in regard to building a banking-house, and

Aug. 29, 1825, David Foot was appointed a committee to procure the necessary stone for the vault, hearth, steps, and underpinning, and on Nov. 17, 1825, he was appointed the agent to superintend the building of the banking-house, which was done, and is now the residence of Mrs. Charles E. Andrews, corner of Bank and Main Streets. May 20, 1826, Zalmon Wildman resigned the office of president, and June 22, 1826, Samuel Tweedy, Esq., was elected president, and was re-elected each year as president till July 7, 1834, when David Foot was elected and served that year, and June 20, 1835, Samuel Tweedy was again elected president, and was re-elected to the office each year until the Branch was merged into the Danbury Bank, July 1, 1844, and was re-elected as president of the Danbury Bank each year until June, 1864, when the infirmities of age required his declination as a director of the bank.

June 12, 1827, the following-named persons were elected directors of the bank (the record of the election of directors previously being at Norwalk): Samuel Tweedy, Elijah Gregory, Elijah Sanford, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Samuel Wildman, Richard Randall, and Henry Beers. The following names appear as directors of the Branch Bank for a year or more: Abel B. Blackman, Reuben Booth, David N. B. Baldwin, Friend Starr, John F. King, Isaac H. Seeley, Abner Gilbert, Starr Ferry, Samuel Stebbins, Starr Nichols, James Brush, William Hawley, Chandler Smith, Russel B. Botsford, Russel Hoyt, Eli T. Hoyt, Edgar S. Tweedy.

Curtis Clark remained as cashier until 1837. June 20, 1835, Geo. W. Ives was appointed assistant cashier, and remained as such until 1837. Aaron Seeley, Esq., was then appointed cashier, and remained such until the Branch Bank was merged into the Danbury Bank, in 1844, and as cashier of that bank until June 1, 1854, when he organized the Pahquioque Bank. He was president of that bank until his death, in 1872.

On Dec. 12, 1842, it was unanimously resolved by the directors of the Branch Bank to appoint Starr Ferry, Esq., a committee and agent to do all the necessary business of obtaining signers to a petition to dissolve the Branch Bank and attend to the appointing of commissioners, and do everything necessary to effect and complete a separation of the Branch from the bank at Norwalk.

The above action was successful in the obtaining of a charter for the Danbury Bank at the session of the State Legislature in 1844, and the appointing of Nelson Brewster bank commissioner, and E. B. Bennett and Harvey Smith committee to divide the stock and assets of the two banks.

The first board of directors of the Danbury Bank was as follows: Samuel Tweedy, President; Russel Hoyt, Isaac H. Seeley, Eli T. Hoyt, Starr Ferry, Samuel Stebbins, Edgar S. Tweedy. Hours of business, 9 to 12 A.M. and 1 to 4 P.M. Discount days, Monday and Thursday.

The following names appear as directors, for one or more years, of the Danbury Bank until its reorganization as a national bank, April 1, 1865: Samuel Tweedy, Isaac H. Seeley, Starr Ferry, Edgar S. Tweedy, Lucius P. Hoyt, Judge Brownson, Daniel N. B. Baldwin, Charles F. Starr, Lyman Keeler, Pierce A. Sutton, Russel Hoyt, Eli T. Hoyt, Samuel Stebbins, Reuben Booth, Abner Gilbert, Niram Wildman, Smith Tweedy, William Wildman, Charles Hull, Henry Benedict, Frederick S. Wildman, Anzi Rogers, Samuel C. Wildman, Levi S. Benedict, George Starr, George Hull, Oliver Stone, Elias S. Sanford, W. R. White, Roger Averill, David P. Nichols.

Lucius P. Hoyt was elected vice-president of the bank Dec. 27, 1862, and continued as such until his election as president, June 18, 1864, and continued as such until the reorganization as a national bank, April, 1865, and has annually been re-elected as president to this date, July, 1880, the bank having had but four presidents since 1824, viz.: Zalmon Wildman, two years; Samuel Tweedy, thirty-seven years; David Foot, one year; Lucius P. Hoyt, sixteen years.

The bank has had but four cashiers in its history since 1824, viz.: Curtis Clark, thirteen years; Aaron Seeley, seventeen years; Ephraim Gregory, one year; Jabez Amsbury, twenty-five years. George W. Ives was assistant cashier, appointed June 20, 1835, and resigned 1837, and Augustus Seeley, Dec. 1, 1852, and continued as such until his appointment as cashier of the Pahquioque Bank, June 1, 1854.

The original capital of the bank was $75,000, of which amount but seventy per cent. was called in until June 20, 1836, when ten per cent. was called for, payable Aug. 1, 1836, ten per cent. Oct. 1, 1836, and ten per cent. March 1, 1850.

In 1851 it was voted to prosecute a petition for an addition to the capital stock of the bank at the next session of the Legislature of the State, which does not seem to have been granted; but in June, 1854, we find they successfully prosecuted the petition, and the capital stock was made up to $200,000,—the Wooster Bank having been merged into the Danbury Bank at that time,—and in June, 1857, it was again increased $100,000, so that its chartered capital paid in at that time (1857) was $300,000, which, with the funds belonging to ecclesiastical societies, which all became stock in the Danbury National Bank in 1865, was $327,000, at which figure (July, 1880) it remains. The surplus of the bank is $73,000, thus making its capital and surplus $400,000, July, 1880.

The average dividend paid by the branch bank is not known, as all dividends were declared at Norwalk by the mother-bank. The average dividend declared by the Danbury Bank from 1844, when it was chartered, to April, 1865, when it became a national bank, was $8\frac{31}{100}$ per cent. per annum and one extra dividend of $11\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., or, in all, $8\frac{21}{100}$ per year. From 1865, when it became a national bank, until July, 1880, the average dividend has been $11\frac{21}{100}$ per cent. per annum.

The first board of directors of the Danbury National Bank was: Lucius P. Hoyt, President; Oliver Stone, Lyman Keeler, Roger Averill, George Starr, George Hall, Samuel C. Wildman, Frederick S. Wildman, David P. Nichols; Jabez Amsbury, Cashier; Robert Hoyt, Teller. Its present officers are Lucius P. Hoyt, President; Directors, Lucius P. Hoyt, Roger Averill, George Hull, Wm. R. White, George Starr, Samuel A. Rundle, David P. Nichols, Henry T. Hoyt, of Danbury, and Henry S. Peck, of Brookfield, Charles H. Merritt having also been a director for two years since its being a national bank; Jabez Amsbury, Cashier; George H. Williams, Teller.

The present banking-house was erected during the fall of the year 1855, and the business of the bank commenced to be done in the new bank Jan. 10, 1856. The building committee was Edgar S. Tweedy, Lyman Keeler, and George Hull, and the structure was built from plans made by Mr. Austin, of New Haven, who had a short time before planned the building known as the Wooster House.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The first reference to a fire department in Danbury we find in the Republican Journal, under date Nov. 11, 1793, being an advertisement, as follows:

READ FIRE ENGINE. — 1793

A SUBSCRIPTION has been set forward in this town for the purpose of procuring a FIRE ENGINE, and which has met with the warmest approbation of every gentleman to whom it has been presented. The Engine proposed to be purchased will discharge 80 gallons per minute and throw it 100 feet in height.

As soon as three hundred dollars are subscribed for (about sixty of which are now wanting) a meeting of the subscribers will be held, and a committee appointed to purchase said engine, and for such other purposes as may be deemed necessary.

To suggest to the enlightened idolitants of this town the usefulness of a Fire Engine, and to expatiate on the invention of a machine which under Providence has saved the lives and property of millions, would be justly deemed an insult to their understanding.

The subscription is still to be seen at the store of Messrs. Cunningham & Mygatt, where those who are desirous of subscribing are requested to call.

Danbury, Nov. 11, 1793.

At a borough-meeting at the court-house, Monday, July 11, 1823, a by-law was passed to appoint one or more fire inspectors, to hold the office until the annual borough-meeting, and their duties were defined.

DANBURY WATER-WORKS.

The subject of introducing water into the borough for domestic and other uses early engaged the attention of the citizens, and in 1834 the Danbury Water-Works Company was inaugurated. In 1851 a committee was appointed by the borough "to inquire into the expediency of supplying the borough with water for fire and other purposes, and report to a future meeting." This committee made an examination of "Mountain Pond," and reported the "source of supply unreliable, and the project of bringing water therefrom entirely impracticable."

The first movement which accomplished any practical results was begun in the spring of 1860, when a communication from J. W. Bacon was published in the Jeffersonian, calling attention to Kohanza Brook as a water-supply, and stating results of experiments made by him as to quantity of water, together with details of plan of proposed reservoir and system of pipes for introducing water from this source. Mainly through the exertions of Mr. Bacon, a charter was obtained from the Legislature early in the season of 1860, which was accepted by the borough on the 17th of May. Contracts for the entire works were signed on the 22d of May, and in the following December water was let into all the pipes, and the utility of the works for fire or other purposes fully shown to the satisfaction of all. Over nine miles of pipe were laid during the first year, and a supply-reservoir of about six acres constructed, the whole at a cost of about thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars.

In 1866, the storage capacity of the small reservoir being found insufficient, a larger reservoir, flooding over thirty acres, was built farther up the stream at an expense of about seven thousand dollars. Both of these reservoirs were swept away on the evening of Jan. 31, 1869, causing a great destruction of property and loss of life. The reservoirs were rebuilt the same year.

The water-supply of Danbury is one of the best in the country, and to Mr. John W. Bacon is the credit due for its successful introduction.

THE KOHANZA DISASTER.

The following account of this terrible disaster is taken from the Danbury Times:

"At a quarter to seven o'clock, on Sunday evening, Jan. 31, 1869, the dam to the upper reservoir of the Kohanza Water gave way, and the vast body of water was hurled down upon the lower pond, sweeping away the dam and bringing their united strength down into the valley below, carrying with it huge masses of ice and scattering destruction along its course. At Flint's dam the tide obtained fresh impulse. The dam was swept away in an instant, the large body of water there contributed its power to the destruction. The water, ice, and broken timber swept down the line of Mill River through the village, and created the most appalling disaster ever happening in this vicinity. Ten lives were lost and fifty thousand dollars' worth of property was destroyed. The Main, North, and White Street bridges were destroyed, and the bridges on Patch Street and Balmforth Avenue were badly damaged, the latter by the water and ice setting up the creek which it spans. The bridge crossing the Still River, opposite Lacey, Hoyt & Co.'s factory, was badly racked and displaced. Five buildings were swept from their foundations or demolished. Of these, two were dwellings, standing on the north side of Main Street, near the stream. The one nearest the stream was owned by Oliver Stone, and was occupied by James Bothwell, wife, and two children, and by Edward Clark, wife, and three children. The other building was owned and occupied by Mrs. Betsey Husted, who rented the upper story to John Chambers and family, who were absent at the time of the disaster. Mrs. Husted and the occupants of Mr. Stone's house were drowned. With the Bothwells boarded two sisters (who were also sisters of Mrs. Clark), Fannie and Betsey Humphrey, who were away from home at the hour of the disaster. One of them, Miss Fanny, in attempting to cross White Street bridge, nearly a mile below her home, was overtaken by the flood, and shared the fate of the rest. The last were Mrs. Husted, Mrs. Bothwell, Ida Bothwell, aged eight years, Edward Clark, Mary Clark, aged eight years, George Clark, aged two years, — Clark, aged five years, and Fannie Humphrey, aged twenty-eight years, Mrs. Clark and Nettie Bothwell, aged ten years. Starr's slaughter-house, Chase's factory, and Smedley's carpenter-shop were demolished. Two tenements belonging to Hendrick Barum, situated on North Street and occupied by the families of Perry Dishow and Daniel Hoyt, were considerably damaged by the ice. The water-work dams are ruined. The upper dam lost one hundred feet of earth, and the lower dam was entirely carried away. In the valley west of Clapboard Ridge, and northwest of the town, are the receiving and supplying reservoirs of the Kohanza Water. The natural stream at this point is about four feet wide and has an average depth of about four inches. The lower dam is about three miles from the centre of the village, and the upper is about a mile and a quarter beyond. The lower dam was built upon the inauguration of the works in 1860, and the upper in 1866. The lower pond contained about 7½ acres of water, and the upper about 26 acres. The greatest depth of water in both places was about 23 feet, or the average depth about 8 feet. The length of first dam was 49 feet; height, 26 feet; cost, $1700. Length of second dam, 600 feet; height, 22 feet; cost, $4500. Each dam was built of earth sloped 1½ to 1 on outside and 2 to 1 on inside, and the whole of inside lined with stones. The thickness of the dams at the lowest point was 90 to 100 feet, at the water-line, 20 to 22 feet."

ELMWOOD PARK.

The beginning of the pleasant trysting-place known as Elmwood Park was made in 1801. At that time the road passed on the east side of the park and formed a bow, and in the year 1801 a petition was presented to straighten the street at this point. Maj. Ezra Starr, of Revolutionary memory, who lived on the premises where now is located the residence of Hon. D. P. Nichols, and who owned the land from here down to Wooster Street, generously donated the land along his premises, on the condition, however, that it should ever after remain a "common." The "park" henceforth became a spot of considerable importance, as here were held the trainings of "ye olden time." There were two military organizations in Danbury at that time,—an artillery company and a company of cavalry, the former of which rendezvoused at the tavern kept by Ebenezer White, which stood on the site of the present Turner House, and the latter on the corner of Elm and Main Streets.

The little park remained with no particular attention being paid to it in matters of improvement or ornamentation until 1851 or 1852, when a movement was started for making it a central park by running a road on the west side. This project was stoutly opposed by the residents in the upper portion of the town, but finally succeeded. Two thousand dollars was subscribed for the purpose, and in 1853 the work began. Among the leading citizens who manifested a lively interest in the matter are mentioned the names of Augustus Seeley, W. P. Seeley, and Aaron Turner. The trees were given by Mr. James Harvey, and were dug by Noah Atkins and Fred. Bevans.

After a few years interest in the park waned, and, as predicted by those who opposed it in the beginning, it passed back to the borough. It, however, proved to be comparatively inexpensive, as the fence fairly rotted away, and it became "a mere irregular entanglement, uncared for, unsightly to the eye, not useful for any purpose." Finally, however, after about a score of years of inattention and neglect, a movement was started for the improvement of the little spot, principally by A. P. Sturges. The good work inaugurated by Mr. Sturges went on, and on July 19, 1879, the place, beautified and improved, was reopened as Elmwood Park. It is finely shaded, has a band-stand and an immense fountain, and, taken all in all, is one of the finest parks to be found in any village in the county. What Bushnell Park is to Hartford, Seaside to Bridgeport, is Elmwood to the present village of Danbury.

The following anecdote is related by the Danbury News:

"When the late Uncle Sam Jennings was warden he got a crop of hay from the ground. He had previously issued a proclamation forbidding the obstruction of the highways of the village. One afternoon he loaded his cart with the hay, but, it being late, he left the load in the street for the night. A number of unknown parties, in the fear of the law and with a most commendable regard for its integrity, drew the cart to the pond in the night, pitched the hay over into the inclosure, then took the cart to pieces and passed that over, and then finished up by reloading the hay and leaving the whole within the pond.

"The feelings of Warden Jennings when he discovered the location of his hay the next morning can easily be imagined. But he issued no manifesto nor offered any reward for the apprehension of the actors. He remembered where he had left his cart the night before, and silently went to work to pitch the hay outside, to take the cart apart and get that over, and then to put the machinery together again and reload the hay.

"That was in the 'good old times.'"

WOOSTER CEMETERY.

The visitor to Danbury is impressed with two things in its favor,—first, its good care of the living; second, its good care of the dead. The first is demonstrated in its facilities for educating the young and in providing for the helpless; the second is shown in the beautiful appearance of its cemetery.

Perhaps there is no place in Connecticut that can show a burial-place having so many advantages, both natural and artificial. The general contour of the ground is a ridge running the length of the place in part circle from east to north, inclosing a basin within the circle and a terrace outside. There are several small ridges surrounding the main ridge. The basin is flooded by a neighboring stream and divided into miniature islands covered with trees. From points on the main ridge the lake of islands is in plain sight, and presents a very picturesque view to the observer. There is also a drive around the water.

In laying out the roads and grounds for burial purposes, the taste displayed by the architects is admirable. Advantage has been taken of all the points presented by nature, and art has smoothed the rough places and developed them into beauty. The great bulk of those owning lots have been equally jealous of their appearance, and in many instances these spots have been made very beautiful. The great wealth of foliage in the cemetery strikes the visitor as being remarkable. The most hardy variety of trees and shrubs have been selected, and, while the shade is abundant, it does not entirely hide many of the other attractive features of the place in a distant view. The grounds are within the village, and are consequently visited quite frequently, especially on a pleasant Sabbath, when there is a large number of visitors.

The Danbury Cemetery Association was organized in November, 1850, under a law of the State relating to cemeteries, with sixty shareholders at twenty-five dollars a share. The first purchase of land was made in December of that year, of William K. Clark, the piece containing sixteen acres, for which three hundred dollars was paid; and another piece, five and one-fourth acres, for eighty dollars, of Col. E. Moss White. Additions were made from time to time, and there are now about fifty acres in that part of the cemetery which is improved.

In the spring and summer of 1851 the grounds were laid out, roads made, and trees secured. Most of the evergreens were obtained from William Mann's nursery in Bangor, Me., some of a suitable size to transplant, others, from six to twelve inches in height, set out in a nursery and transferred to the grounds when of a suitable size. Beneath the surface the soil is good and free from stones. Many of the knolls were quite barren and forbidding in exterior, but by the free use of muck, ashes, and manure a thrifty crop of grass appeared thereon. It was predicted by some that trees would not grow on this land, so naturally poor did it appear.

Where the lake now is was a muck-swamp filled with bogs and bushes. These were collected and burned, and the muck removed to cover the barren soil. The water which forms the lake sets back from the North Meadow stream, and, during a freshet, fills the lake. A dam at the outlet keeps the water at a proper height. There is a fine spring, which never fails, on the east border of the lake.

The improved grounds are nearly inclosed by a substantial stone wall, which is banked on the inside. Most of the material in the wall was brought from "Tamarack Woods."

On April 27, 1854, the Wooster Monument, whose top is conspicuous from a distance, was finished, and dedicated with appropriate ceremonies to perpetuate the memory of Gen. Wooster, of Revolutionary fame. The occasion was one of uncommon interest in this part of the State. There were fully ten thousand people present as witnesses of the ceremonies. The Masonic lodges of the State and neighboring States were represented. His Excellency, the Governor, with notables from abroad and military organizations from Bridgeport, New Haven, and Hartford, participated in the affair. The Masonic display was the most imposing ever made in the State. Hon. Henry C. Deming, of Hartford, delivered the oration.

In 1862 the reception-vault was built, and four years later the massive stone columns at the entrance to the cemetery were erected.

In November, 1867, the association purchased of the late William Augustus White about twenty-five acres, at thirty-five dollars per acre, lying on the east side of the road leading to North Meadow and opposite the improved grounds. No improvements have been made on this plat, but the setting out of evergreens and other trees in places that will not be accepted for burial purposes.

The grounds were laid out and improvements made by and under the direction of George W. Ives and Edgar S. Tweedy. Mr. Ives died in 1862. His remains rest in the northern point of the main ridge, and are marked by a massive granite cross of simple design, in the base of which is inscribed the following testimony from his fellow-citizens:

"This monument is erected to George W. Ives by his friends as a testimonial of his services in laying out and beautifying this cemetery, and in remembrance of his public and private worth."

Since his death Mr. Tweedy has had the supervision of the grounds.

THE DANBURY LIBRARY

as it exists to-day, with its commodious and elegant building on Main Street, the dwelling-house adjoining, its books and other property, including its invested funds, is substantially the gift of one family,—that of the late E. Moss White, of Danbury. The late William Augustus White, of Brooklyn, son of E. Moss White, by his last will and testament bequeathed the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be paid five years after his decease, for the establishment of a public library in his native borough of Danbury. The Legislature of Connecticut, at its session in 1869, passed an act incorporating the Danbury Library, which act was approved by the Governor, June 5, 1869.

On the 1st of June, 1870, Alexander M. White, of Brooklyn, brother of William Augustus White, and sole executor of his will, placed at the disposal of the trustees of the library the house on Main Street, in which he was born and in which his parents died, to be used for library purposes until a suitable building could be erected upon the premises. At the same time, Mr. White also notified the trustees of his willingness to give a plot of ground fifty feet on Main Street by one hundred and fifty in depth, on which to erect a suitable building, and also the sum of five thousand dollars, besides an equal amount to be given by his brother, George Granville White, towards the erection of such a building, so soon as the citizens of Danbury would join in erecting, free of debt, a suitable building upon this ground. At this time Mr. White directed that repairs be made upon the house so given, and that suitable furniture be purchased at an expense not to exceed five hundred dollars, the cost of such repairs and purchases being paid by him.

In 1871, Alexander M. White made a further donation of five hundred dollars for the purchase of books. A donation of five hundred dollars by the late Charles H. Merritt and of fifty dollars by Miss H. E. Merritt for the purchase of books was made and accepted.

The library continued to occupy the house formerly the residence of E. Moss White till the fall of 1876. In May of that year Mr. Alexander M. White notified the trustees of his desire to see a suitable building erected upon the site for library uses, and of the offer of his brother, George Granville White, to contribute five thousand dollars for this purpose. To this amount Alexander M. White generously offered to add fifteen thousand dollars, making twenty thousand dollars in all. Mr. White subsequently offered to remove the old dwelling-house to the rear of the library lot at his own expense and to fit it up for rental, also to donate additional ground on the south side and rear of the library lot, and directed that plans be obtained for a building costing from twenty thousand to twenty-five thousand dollars.

Of all these several gifts and donations the trustees have thankfully availed themselves. Not only the twenty-five thousand dollars placed at their disposal by the Messrs. Alexander White and George Granville White has been, in accordance with their wish, expended upon the building, but in October, 1878, Mr. Alexander M. White, to insure the utmost possible perfection in the completion of the new structure, made a further donation of fifteen hundred dollars. Upon receiving a vote of thanks from the trustees for this amount, he added three thousand five hundred dollars for finishing, furnishing, and purchase of books. These contributions, Mr. White desires it understood are, like others coming through him, from the family of the late E. Moss White.

The present building was erected from plans furnished by Messrs. Lamb & Wheeler, of Newark, N. J. It was begun in 1877 and completed early in 1879. The first story is rented for offices, leaving the entire second story for library uses. It is heated by steam throughout, and has received the approval and admiration of some of the best architects and authorities upon architecture in the country. It is a monument to the generosity and philanthropy of a single family, and a public benefaction of which all the inhabitants of Danbury have every reason to feel proud.

Hatting in Danbury—Other Manufactures—Present Manufactures—The Execution of Anthony—Trial and Execution of Amos Adams.

HATTING IN DANBURY.

THE following history of the hatting business in Danbury is condensed from W. H. Francis' History of Hatting, published in 1860, and continued from that time to the present by Mr. Bailey, in the Danbury News:

"It is said to be a sober fact in history that the first building ever erected in this country as a hat-shop was built in Danbury, and the first hat ever made in these United States was made in this town. Be this as it may, certain it is that in the days of the Revolution, when the town was but a hamlet, when provincial's blade was crossed with that of royalists and a little phalanx of stout hearts were contending for the inborn rights of man, when the seeds of future glorious empire were being planted in the furrows plowed by the cannon-ball, harrowed in deeply by the iron war-horse, the tramp of wheeling and charging columns, moistened and enriched by the generous flow of the life-blood of patriots, we find that in 1780 Zadoc Benedict was making hats in a small red shop standing near the grounds now the site of the depot, in Main Street. With limited resources and capital, he kept up the fire under his solitary kettle and employed to work up his 'stock' the services of one jourman and two apprentices, turning off hats at the rate of three per day, or one and a half dozen per week, two hats being an average for a good workman in a day.

"This is according to the statement of some of our oldest citizens about the first that was done at hatting in Danbury, and, although hats had undoubtedly been made here long before this, still we shall take this as the starting-point and regard it as the commencement of what has since proved an important and extensive trade.

"1787.—Col. Russell White and Oliver Burr, firm of Burr & White or O. Burr & Co., carried on what was then considered an extensive trade, employing thirty hands, variously engaged, and turning off hats at the rate of fifteen dozen per week, or seven hundred and fifty dozen per year. The hats of this period were without elegance, being heavy, rough, and unwieldy. They sold at from six to ten dollars each,—enough to buy two or three fine hats now. One man could make about nine hats per week.

"The manufacturer bought the skins in a bundle. The fur then had to be taken from them by hand and assorted. Then it was bowed into 'bats,' with the old 'bow,' 'pins,' and 'cutgut,' and these 'bats' were made into hat-bodies. After the hats were made (everything being done by hand), they were distributed to the ladies living in the vicinity in order to have the hair that remained sticking in the nap removed by tweezers.

"Among the men employed by Burr & White were Eli Benedict and William Babcock, who afterwards went to New Haven.

"1791.—In the Farmers' Journal, published at Danbury, in this year, we find the following advertisement:

"TO BE SOLD BY
O. BURR & COMPANY,
ONE HUNDRED WEIGHT OF GOOD HAT WOOL, AND SEVERAL PAIRS OF WHITE
ENGLISH RABBITS,

Whose increase is amazingly fast and the skins for fur in great demand, and their flesh of the most delicate kind; and to conclude the whole of their excellencies, their keeping requires nothing but vegetables, such as weeds, grass, potatoes, turnips, etc., etc. They need no drink.

"Also, given as usual twenty pence per run for coarse woollen yarn.

"Danbury, May 18th, 1791."

"1800.—In Robbins' century sermon, delivered at Danbury, Jan. 1, 1801, we find these remarks: 'In the manufacture of hats this town (Danbury) much exceeds any one in the United States. More than twenty thousand hats, mostly of fur, are made annually for exportation.' Thus, more than half a century ago, our fathers took the lead in the manufacture of hats, and to-day their sons are not behind.

"1802.—The first hat-store at the South in connection with manufacturing at Danbury was established by two active and well-known men (now deceased), Zalmon and Seymour Wildman. They had one store at Charleston, S. C., firm of Z. & S. Wildman; another at Savannah, Ga., firm of Wildman & Hoags. Zalmon Wildman manufactured in the shop of Zadoc Benedict after the decease of the latter, in 1803. He also some years later carried on quite extensively the finishing of hats for the Southern market, near the grounds now the site of the Pahquioque Hotel, in Main Street.

"1803.—During this and following years, Samuel H. Phillips, George Benedict, David Wood, William Babcock, Ezra Wildman, Ebenezer and John D. Nichols, Boughton & Starr, and others, carried on hatting in different parts of the township. The fashionable hat of this year was six inches deep and two inch brim.

"1805.—Clark & Benedict carried on the hatting business in the red building situated in West Street, and now occupied as a dwelling; Gersham Nichols at the same time, in a building near the residence of Oliver Stone, in Main Street.

"1807.—Noah Rockwell commenced manufacturing with his 'plank' shop in the cellar of the house now occupied by Mrs. Rosaboom, in Franklin Street. Also, Hoyt Gregory had a shop in West Street. All these manufacturers carried on the business on a limited scale, employing, probably, from seven to eight hands each, and turning off hats at the rate of four or five dozen per week, or two hundred and fifty dozen per year. Among the men in the employ of Hoyt Gregory were James Seal and Thomas Peck, who eventually engaged in an extensive business at Boston.

"1808-9.—There were fifty-six hat-shops in operation in the township of Danbury, averaging from three to five men each. Many farmers were interested in the trade, setting up a kettle and hiring journeymen. It is but a few years since the trade was centralized and the bulk of capital concentrated in a few large establishments.

"1812.—We have our venerable citizen, now president of the Danbury Bank (who went into business as early as 1800), and James Benedict, firm of Tweedy & Benedict, carrying on business in a shop situated on the ground where the house of Mrs. Sprague now stands, corner of Main and Elm Streets. Hands employed, 30. During the war the trade between hat-dealers and the Northwest Company was cut off. John Jacob Astor sold at auction, in the city of New York, a large quantity of furs which had been seized. James Benedict, hearing of the sale, attended and bought five bales (one thousand pounds) of 'old coat beaver' at one dollar per pound. The price immediately advanced to five dollars per pound.

"We must remember that at this time hat-finishing was a very small part of the trade here; in fact, hardly any hats were sent to market finished and trimmed, but were sent in the 'rough' to the city, there to be made ready for sale. In this year a machine was invented for blowing fur, and first used in Messrs. Tweedy & Benedict's establishment. It consisted of a wire drum, in which the fur was placed, and the machine moved with a crank by hand. Small, simple, and imperfect, it was thought to be an important invention at that time; now it would be laughed at as a child's plaything.

"1814.—Judson and Russell White, firm of White Brothers, conducted a large business here. Capital invested, $50,000. Hands employed, about 50, making probably about two hundred dozen hats per month, or two thousand dozen per annum. This firm had a warehouse in the city, where the hats were sent to be sold.

"Among those who learned the trade with the White Brothers was Starr Nichols, Esq., now deceased, who afterwards became a prominent townsman, contributing in a great measure to the advancement and building up of Danbury. Soon after his 'time was out' he commenced business for himself. Doing very little at first, but steadily increasing, he pushed forward with that zeal which ever afterwards formed so prominent a trait in his character, until, when the White Brothers retired from business, he took their place and carried it on with increased energy, employing fifty 'makers.' He met with several reverses of fortune, but at the time of his death (1856) was engaged in a lucrative business in a hat-store in New York City, and to-day he is remembered as one of the most prominent men in the trade. His benevolence and active perseverance are well worth imitating.

"1816.—Two of our citizens, R. & E. T. Hoyt, merchants in the place, receiving, as the custom was, hats in exchange for their goods, taking a few hats, went South and opened a store at Charleston, S. C. The hats were made by Tweedy & Benedict, and finished partly in the old finishing-shop yet standing on the corner of Main and Franklin Streets. The Messrs. Hoyt began on a small scale, the sales at first amounting to but $15,000 or $20,000 per year. But as the trade increased in importance throughout the country they took advantage of it, and through their efforts was built up a large establishment, increasing until at one period the yearly sales reached $100,000. The business continued in the hands of some of the Hoyt family until the death of John R. Hoyt (son of Russell), some twelve years since, and is yet in active operation under F. T. Fanning. David H. Boughton was the first partner taken into the firm, and the following individuals were from time to time connected with the same house: David M. Benedict, Edgar S. Tweedy, F. T. Fanning, Lucius P. Hoyt, and A. E. Tweedy. This hat-store was connected with manufacturing in Danbury up to 1854, and affords an example of prosperity and continued success, with close attention to business as the cause.

"In the fall of the same year, 1816, Zalmon Wildman (who, as before mentioned, was engaged in the Southern trade as early as 1802), with Ezra M. Starr,—the latter still one of our most respected and influential citizens,—started another hat-store in Charleston. This firm also commenced with about $20,000 as the yearly sales, but an enterprise like this, in the hands of such thorough and active business men, could but succeed; they were soon firmly established, and went on extending their trade and enlarging their operations, until we have as the amount of sales per annum $60,000. Hats worth here ninety dollars per dozen were taken South and sold at one hundred and twenty dollars per dozen.

"1817.—Capt. John Foot, with one Mr. Hodge, manufactured hats for the firm of Wildman & Starr, em-plying six or eight men, and getting up about six hundred dozen per annum. Elias Boughton, Abel Hoyt, and others, carried on hatting in Danbury about this time. The hats were then eight or nine ounces in weight. The price for making them—that is, the Russia hat—was ninety-two cents, or five shillings six pence, Yankee currency.

"1824.—Among the manufacturers of this period were Isaac H. Seelye, White & Keeler, Hatch & Gregory, Joseph Taylor, Hugh Starr, and Taylor & Dibble.

"1825.—Fry, Gregory & Co. conducted at this time an extensive trade, working up $80,000 worth of stock per annum; capital invested, $50,000; hands employed at making, 30; trimming, 10. This firm also had a store (now occupied by Mr. Osborne) in West Street, where the hands employed traded, receiving orders instead of cash for their work.

"In 1833, Fry, Gregory & Co. sold out their make-shop to William Montgomery, who had commenced hatting in 1832 with Edward S. Brockett. Mr. Montgomery made the hats for Fry, Gregory & Co., who, having finished and trimmed them, sent them to their store in Charleston for sale. Mr. Montgomery carried on the fur-hat trade until 1853, when, building a large factory in connection with the buildings already on the ground, he entered into the manufacture of wool hats in company with Charles Benedict and Jarvis P. Hull. Mr. Hull soon withdrew from the firm, and it is now that of Benedict & Montgomery.

"From an old bill dated New York, June 5, 1825, we find that Joel Taylor bought of E. & H. Raymond one hundred Spanish wool bodies at thirty-four cents apiece.

"1835.—Mr. Alvin Hurd, having learned the art of making silk hats from two Englishmen in the city of New York, returned here and set up the business in the shop of Starr Nichols, manufacturing for the firm of Swift & Nichols, with five men employed, thus introducing into Danbury the art of making silk hats. This branch of the trade increased so that in fact it became the most popular one of the day, and in the years intervening between 1840 and 1850 was carried on almost exclusively, Messrs. Tweedy & White, William Montgomery, N. H. Wildman, and others being engaged in it. After 1850 it gradually decreased, and now nothing is done here at this branch, the soft hat taking its place.

"During 1835 and several following years Messrs. Fry & Gregory, together with Samuel Sproulls, kept in operation a large wholesale establishment in New York City.

"1840.—Hoyt, Tweedy & Co. had a factory at the north end of Main Street, and were also connected with the hat-store established at Charleston by the Hoyts in 1816. Since 1840, under Edgar S. Tweedy, John R. Hoyt, F. T. Fanning, Lucius Hoyt, A. E. Tweedy, William R. White, and others, the firm has been known successively as that of Hoyt, Tweedy &

Co., Tweedy, Hoyt & Co., Tweedy & Hoyt, A. E. Tweedy & Co., Tweedy & White, and now (since 1857) Tweedy, White & Co.

"1841.—After the napped hats had gone out of fashion, Messrs. Niram Wildman and John Fry went to Roxbury for the purpose of getting information concerning the wool-hatting. They called on Col. Lathrop, in that place, who was then considered the best manufacturer of wool hats in this section of the country. Having obtained the necessary information, Messrs. Wildman & Fry returned and commenced the manufacture of wool hats in the old building some time since removed from the grounds of Mr. Fry, employing five men as makers and two women as trimmers, turning off from eight to ten dozen per day, the bodies being formed in the 'old factory.' Wildman & Fry subsequently sold out to Charles Fry and David Wildman (the latter now deceased), who continued the manufacture in a building in Main Street, since removed.

"1846.—Nathaniel H. Wildman was at this time manufacturing fur hats. He kept up the manufacture until a few years since, and is now engaged in a hat-store at Augusta, Ga. Truman Trowbridge employed a number of hands, also Frederick Nichols.

"1849.—Mr. Nathan Benedict came from New York with one of the fur-hat forming machines. When it was rumored that such a machine was to be brought here it created considerable excitement among the mechanics in the trade, and when it actually did arrive a majority of hatters were opposed to it. It was put up by Mr. Benedict in the old Huribut factory as an experiment, under the patronage of A. E. Tweedy & Co. But very little was done the first year, and the enterprise progressed slowly; but as the public confidence in it was strengthened the old prejudice died out, and its popularity increased.

"1852.—S. A. Brower & Co. started the business of paper-box making in Danbury. Until the soft hat came into use hats were packed in wooden cases alone. Now one dozen hats are placed in a paper box, and these, to the number of six, are placed in a wooden case. This mode of packing hats for transportation is a little more expensive than the former, but it is at the same time more safe, neat, and convenient.

"Mr. E. S. Davis, who bought out Brower & Co. in 1852, now carries on the business quite extensively. At first the demand was very small, but as the manufacture of soft hats increased so did that of paper boxes. Mr. Davis now occupies the whole of the new building seventy by thirty and three stories high (near Tweedy Brothers). Capital invested, $7000; sales per annum, $25,000; paid out to hands per month, $200; hands employed, 11. Boards or straw paper used per annum, 125 tons; number of paper boxes of all sizes made per annum, 216,000. The 'boards' are manufactured in the neighboring towns of Brookfield, Newtown, and New Milford.

"1853.—James S. Taylor, of this town, patented his machines for felting or sizing hats, to which their originality and perfect operation has been satisfactorily applied. These machines have been introduced into general use among the best and most extensive wool-hat manufacturers in the United States. It is a fact worthy of notice that these machines have been invented, perfected, and brought into general use in less time than perhaps ever before recorded of any other invention of the same relative value in the mechanic arts in this or any other country, and it is owing to this invention of Mr. Taylor's that our wool-hat manufacturers have been enabled to supply the increasing demand for the finer qualities of that article.

"The Taylor's Patent Hat-Felting Company have about three hundred of these machines in use in various parts of the United States, felting at least six dozen hats per day on each machine, equal to 1800 dozen per day for the three hundred machines, or 540,000 dozen, on an average, per year, being 6,480,000 hats!" They have secured the patent on the machine in various European countries, and now have machines in constant operation in several of the largest establishments in England, where an agency is about being established. 'The largest single day's work performed by these machines was, probably, in the shop of Wildman & Crosby, in 1856, they having sized on two sets of machines fifty-four dozen hats in one day, the machines being operated by four men, working only ten hours.' A Frenchman, J. Baptiste Lacille by name, and many others, have invented machines for sizing hats and sold their patents for large sums, but the machines failed, not having been brought to perfection, and the Taylor machines have taken the place of all.

"1855.—Abijah Abbott commenced the manufacture of band-boxes for Messrs. Benedict & Montgomery. Mr. Abbott now employs four hands, making thirty thousand large paper boxes per year and consuming fifty tons of boards per annum. His sales amount to five thousand dollars per annum.

"The making of wooden cases is a large item, and three firms, George Starr, George Stevens & Co., and Raymond & Ambler, are constantly employed.

"In 1860 there were but eight manufacturers of fur and wool hats in Danbury. We have now twelve, and the largest of these is twice as large as any at that date. There have been many changes in the firms since then,—many new firms started and failed. These we have endeavored to look up and obtain reliable information about them.

"In 1860 there were two firms of the Tweedys,—Tweedy, White & Co., and Tweedy Brothers. In 1864 the first firm was changed to T. E. & E. Tweedy, and the second was changed to William H. Tweedy in 1861. In 1867 both these firms were merged into one under the name of Tweedy & Co., and after four years of business a stock company was formed under the name of the Tweedy Manufacturing Company, which is its present designation.

"Giles M. Hoyt's factory in 1860 was in Grassy Plain, which was then a part of Danbury. In 1874, Mr. Hoyt removed to the shop on White Street now occupied by Nichols & Hine. It had then just been vacated by Lacey & Downs. In 1878 he moved again to his present location, in the old laundry-building near the Danbury and Norwalk Railway.

"A. T. Peck was in the winter of 1863 engaged in hatting with his brother-in-law, Anson Taylor, in the old comb-factory which stood on the site of Beckerle and Co.'s new factories. Mr. Taylor had just received a patent for combining pieces of waste silk with fur, and they were manufacturing hats under this patent. It was said that a hat, after being 'jacked up,' was made to look like a silk hat, and at a much less cost. They were made in all styles. Mr. Taylor died soon after the manufacture began, and Mr. Peck then went out of business.

"In 1864, Shethar & Lacey built a small shop near the Phoenix factory, and ran it for a few years.

"The Union Hat Company, composed of W. H. Youngs, H. C. Ely, Kellogg Nichols, and Cyrus Raymond, started in that building in 1869. In 1872 they discontinued business. It was occupied between this time and 1875 by Casper Zeigler, and in that year William Beckerle took it. He remained here one year, and in 1876, after taking into partnership C. H. Piex, T. F. Fay, and J. H. Shuddice, he removed to the old comb-shop near Pahquioque Avenue. This shop soon proved too small for the firm, and from time to time they added to its capacity by building on numerous additions and erecting small buildings for make-shops, colorings-shop, etc. In December, 1879, the establishment was totally destroyed by fire. Work was immediately resumed, and now the new factories, exceeded by but one establishment in town, are nearly complete.

"In 1865, J. G. Meeker began business as a hatter in a factory on Canal Street. This building, for a few months previous to this, had been used by journeymen hatters, who took out work from our larger firms for manipulation in one branch only. They were not what might be called manufacturing hatters, and for that reason we have not secured their names. In 1877 this factory was completely destroyed, and the next year the present commodious and enlarged building was completed and occupied by D. W. Meeker, a brother of the first named. He still carries on business there.

"As early as 1844, Ransom Brothwell, father of Theodore Brothwell, had a shop in Mill Plain. He started it earlier than this, but this is the first we can find of him. It was situated on the present farm of Oliver Burchard, and some time after (in 1848) he removed to a factory on the site of the present blacksmith-shop.

"The next we find of hatting in that hamlet is a shop run by P. A. Sutton. This changed hands many times, being owned successively by A. Solomon, now of Norwalk, Harry Jennings & Son, and Stone & Downs. The latter were burned out in 1867, and Mr. Downs then retired. Benjamin Stone then built the shop now occupied by H. M. Senior & Son, ran it for about nine months, and then went to New Jersey. C. B. Prindle occupied it next for about six months, and Senior bought it in 1871. John Harvey was a partner of Senior for one year. In 1878 the present firm was formed.

"In 1866, C. B. Prindle and Edward Gage took out work to size. The original shop stood just west of the present building. In 1869, Mr. Gage went out, and Mr. Prindle took it. 'Prindle & Co.' soon after became the title of the firm, and they finished hats complete. In December, 1877, the Mill Plain Manufacturing Company, a joint-stock corporation, took the factory now standing, which was built in 1871. In 1879, Mr. Prindle went it alone, and is now doing business there.

"It is related that at the time of Mr. Brothwell they were making what was known as the 'coney' hat. These hats were always worth just a dollar. If no money was forthcoming on pay-day, the men were given as many hats as there were dollars due them. These they spent at the stores the same as cash, and the storekeepers sent them to New York to sell. Mr. Brothwell never used the neat packing-cases of to-day, but used to go out and knock boards off the fences and make cases.

"In 1860 the old firm of Crofut, Bates & Wildman was Henry Crofut. From that time to now there have been four different partners besides Mr. Crofut. First, Rollo Nichols was admitted, under the firm-name of H. Crofut & Co. Then George K. Nichols was admitted, then Joseph H. White, the firm still retaining the old name. The present firm is Crofut, White & Peabody, the Messrs. Nichols being both dead. Mr. Peabody was admitted in 1878.

"The firm once occupied the factory on West Street, which was burned in 1864, in addition to the 'Pah-quoque' shop.

"The firm of E. A. Mallory & Co. in 1860 was formed of Mallory and P. A. Sutton. In 1864, Mr. Mallory associated with him his brother, Samuel Mallory, and this firm continued till 1866. Samuel Mallory then retired, and until 1872 E. A. Mallory was again alone. In that year he took in his son, Charles H. Mallory, and this comprises the present firm.

"In 1862, Mr. S. C. Holley began the manufacture of wool hats in the shop then standing at the Main Street bridge, which had before that been used by Crosby & Wildman. For a short time J. H. Cesner was his partner. In 1865, Mr. A. N. Wildman connected himself publicly with the firm, and the 'Co.' was added to Mr. Holley's name. In 1868 the factory was burned. The same year they built the factory on River Street now occupied by them. Mr. A. B. Holley became a member of the firm in January, 1876, though the firm-name was not changed.

"Shethar & Lacey was the name of a new firm which purchased the Montgomery factory, on White Street, in 1855. For one year they continued business, and then admission to the firm was given to Henry Starr and Thomas Lawrence, under the firm-name of Shethar, Lacey & Co. One more year passed and this firm dissolved, and in its place was the firm of Lacey, Hoyt & Co., composed of W. F. Lacey, Theodore Hoyt, Moses Collier, Ives Bushnell, and George Downs. In 1872 the firm went out of business. Lacey, Downs & Co., the company being C. H. White, then formed a copartnership and manufactured hats for a time. Lacey & Downs were before this time associated in the fur-cutting business in the Phoenix factory, recently destroyed by fire. Their hatting experience continued but a short time.

"Elijah Sturdevant continued the business at the factory in Beaver Brook District until Aug. 31, 1873. On that date the building was totally destroyed by fire at a loss of sixty thousand dollars. For four years the ruins lay about as the fire left them, and it was in 1877 that the place was rebuilt. James S. Taylor then took the factory, and from that time to this a desultory trade has been carried on there, a young firm running through one trade and then succeeded by another, which was in turn run out by another. None of them seemed to have had much success. In 1879, D. E. Leowe & Co. took it, but in 1880 they dissolved. Mr. Taylor has always occupied part of the factory as a forming-shop.

"Nichols & Hine were burned out in Bethel in the spring of 1878. In the fall of the same year they came to Danbury, and took the old Lacey, Downs & Co. factory on White Street, where they still remain, having been eminently successful.

"We now have given the hat-manufacturers since 1860, so far as we can trace them. Next in order come the fur-cutters. The firm of W. A. & A. M. White, which was the principal one in the trade at that time, is still running. Their factory was totally destroyed by fire in 1874. It was immediately rebuilt with brick, and is probably one of the most conveniently arranged establishments in the country. The firm-name remains the same, though new blood has been added to it in the persons of the sons of the original Whites, who bear the same names.

"W. F. Lacey and George Downs went into partnership with Stephen Hurlbut in 1862 under the name of Hurlbut & Co. In 1864, Mr. Hurlbut left the firm and started in business in Peck's comb-shop, where Beckerle & Co.'s factories now stand. He continued business until 1869, when he was killed by a runaway team.

"Peter Robinson, in 1863, began the fur-cutting business in a shop belonging to the Tweedys. In 1867 he purchased a building at Beaver Brook, and admitted to partnership Mr. John Tweedy. In 1870 the business was so extensive that greater accommodations were made necessary, and the firm purchased the factory of Benedict & Montgomery, on West Street. This shop was burned down in 1874, and in the same year they went to their present quarters in the Hull & Belden Co.'s factory, on Canal Street. Mr. Tweedy had in the mean time retired from the firm, and John Starr was taken in in 1871. Mr. Starr died in 1876, and O. de Comeau took his place. He remained a member of the firm one year, and, in 1877, Mr. Robinson's oldest son, E. T. Robinson, was taken into the firm and sent to England, where they established a branch office. The manufacture of hat-cases is also an important factor in the business. In 1860, Mr. George Starr was the only person engaged in the business in Danbury. Besides cases, he made blocks, tools, etc. In 1876 his brother, Daniel Starr, purchased the business and still continues it. The Danbury and Bethel Hat-Case Company began to manufacture cases only in 1876, and still continue.

"Through the kindness of one of our oldest residents we have been enabled to trace some of the old hatters.

"1787.—William Babcock, who was employed by Burr & White in this year, died in New Haven.

"1803.—Samuel H. Phillips lived opposite the Danbury Savings Bank, where Meyers' store now stands, and died there. George Benedict was a son of Eliakim, and lived and died in Danbury. David Wood lived and died opposite the Capt. Ryder place, or on the site of the old Church of England, on the corner of Main and South streets. Ezra Wildman, who was a great-uncle of Samuel C. Wildman, moved to Clarksville, Ohio, and died there. Ebenezer and John D. Nichols died in the South. The firm of Boughton & Starr we cannot trace. Mr. Boughton is believed to have been Elias Boughton, who lived on the site of George C. White's residence.

"1805.—The firm of Clark & Benedict should have read Benedict & Clark. Sallue P. Clark lived down town, near the old Carrington place. He was an uncle of Starr Clark, who spends his summers in Danbury. Benedict was the son of Peter Benedict, who lived in Mountainville, on the place now owned by E. S. Benedict. Gersham Nichols was the father of Starr Nichols and the great-grandfather of John Nichols, of the firm of Nichols & Hine.

"1807.—Noah Rockwell died in Danbury. Hoyt Gregory died here, and we believe has no descendants.

"1812.—James Benedict, of Tweedy & Benedict, retired from business to a farm on the Hudson River, and died there.

"1816.—David H. Boughton was a son of Elias Boughton, and died South. His remains were brought home and interred in the burying-ground up-town. David M. Benedict lived later in life in the house now owned by Lucius P. Hoyt, and died there. He was also buried in the up-town burying-ground. Ezra M. Starr lived and died in the house now occupied by Ira Morse, on South Street. Mrs. Morse was his niece.

"1818.—Capt. John Foote lived near the present residence of Harmon Knapp, Main Street. Abel Hoyt was father of Giles M. Hoyt, and died in Bethel.

"1820.—Ephraim Gregory was a son of Elijah Gregory, a blacksmith, who lived where L. S. Benedict now lives. His shop stood on the site of St. James' Church.

"Mr. John Fry is still living, a hale and hearty old man, in the house where his first shop stood, on New Street.

"Alvin Hurd, who was a partner of Mr. Fry in 1818, died in August, 1869.

"Benedict & Montgomery consisted of Charles Benedict and William Montgomery. The firm closed business in 1861. Mr. Benedict is still living in Danbury, on Deer Hill Avenue. William Montgomery moved to Baltimore some years ago, and is still in business there.

"Joel Taylor lived for many years in Great Plain. He was father of Mr. James S. Taylor. He died in 1870.

"Nathaniel H. Wildman was in the southern trade in Charleston. He closed up his business in 1861. He lived and died in the old house yet standing in rear of Wildman's Block, on Main Street. He was the father of Alexander Wildman. His death occurred in 1877.

"Charles Fry and Truman Trowbridge are still living and working at the trade.

"The firm of R. & E. T. Hoyt doing business in 1816, was Russell and Eli T. Hoyt. The former died in 1868. The latter still lives in the homestead on Main Street, a man ripe in years, still preserving good health, and one looked up to by all men as an example of what an industrious, useful, honest life can do.

"John R. Hoyt, who was one of the sons of Russell Hoyt, succeeded the old firm. He was a brother of Lucius P. and T. Granville Hoyt. He died in 1848. This old firm of Hoyt Brothers eventually consolidated with the Tweedy family. The firm of Hoyt, Tweedy & Co. was the consolidation of the two.

"A. E. Tweedy died in February, 1864. His cousin, Samuel Tweedy, died in 1868. It is told of Mr. A. E. Tweedy that his funeral was the largest ever held in Danbury. Niram Wildman, who was a partner of John Fry, was grandfather of A. N. and John Wildman. He lived where the latter lives now.

"Frederick Nichols is brother-in-law of Giles M. Hoyt. He now lives in New York.

"The White Brothers, mentioned in 1814, were Judson and Russell White. Russell died in 1838, and Judson a few years later. Russell White was the father of Mr. William R. White.

"Edward S. Brackett, who was in business in 1832 with William Montgomery, died in Norwalk in 1872. He was for many years the trying-justice of Danbury, and his reputation extended into the whole country.

"Isaac H. Seeley is mentioned in 1824. Mr. Seeley died in January, 1880, a man full of honor and ripe in years. White & Keeler were Col. E. Moss White, who was the father of the late Col. N. L. White. He died in 1863. His partner was Timothy B. Keeler. Mr. Keeler died somewhere between 1835 and 1840. Joseph Taylor was a manufacturer in Wildeat, Bethel, now known as Elmwood. He was succeeded in business by his sons, Reuben and Stephen. Reuben Taylor still carries on hatting in a small shop in Elmwood, where he makes the now popular napped hat, which is a revival of the old style when his father was in business. Joseph Taylor died in 1874. The Taylor & Dibble mentioned were Elias Taylor and Scott Dibble. Their shop was where John Johnson's barn now stands. They died many years ago, leaving no direct descendants in Bethel.

"Mr. M. H. Griffing was a prominent hatter in 1846. His factory was in what is now known as Mountainville, on a site just south of where Mrs. Betsey Crofut now lives. He continued in business for ten years, and then sold out to Henry T. Robinson. Mr. Robinson did not succeed, and soon abandoned the enterprise. Mr. Griffing learned his trade in 1843 with Elijah Patch, on Great Plain. Mr. Patch's shop stood near the present residence of Mrs. Fanny Wood.

"George A. Andrews was another hatter, who carried on business in Great Plain a few years ago. He lives now in Bethel.

"Wolfpits, in Bethel, was also for many years—1824 to 1850—the scene of a flourishing hat-trade. Among the manufacturers then we find Eli Morgan, Abel Hoyt, Leazer Taylor & Son, Charles and Roderick Dart, and Hugh Starr. In Elmwood we find David Sherman and Beers Crofut.

"A summary of the amount of work done in 1859 by all the factories is as follows:

Number of hands employed.....	1,291
Hats made (dozens).....	123,870
Pay-roll.....	$329,000

"Now the statement is as follows:

Number of hands employed.....	1,800
Hats made (dozens).....	190,000
Pay-roll.....	$1,000,000

OTHER MANUFACTURES.

Some time before 1800, Ephraim Washburn and brother built a mill for making paper on or near the site of the old Sturdevant factory. This mill afterwards passed into the hands of two brothers named Ward, and they sold it to Daniel and Seth Comstock. The latter was father of the late Philander Comstock. They continued business there for some years, when the mill was burned. The exact date of this destruction we cannot learn, but it was some sixty or more years ago. Among the employees of Comstock was "Uncle" Jerry Wilson, father-in-law of Capt. Edwards, who died two or three years ago. Mr. Wilson enlisted in 1812, and Seth Comstock, being a major, was allowed a servant. He made Mr. Wilson his servant and kept him in the shop, but he got a pension and bounty. After this shop was burned Deacon Oliver Stone purchased the site and built a hat-shop, which he sold to Elijah Sturdevant.

In 1852, Nelson Flint, Calvin S. Bulkeley, and Anzi Wheeler started a mill for air-dried straw-board in Beaver Brook. The firm dissolved after a short time, and Mr. Flint continued alone. In 1867, George McArthur, with his three brothers, Robert, John, and William, purchased the mill and continued the manufacture of straw-board. The original building was a small one, thirty by thirty feet, and was built for a woolen-mill by Samuel Morris. He was not successful, and gave up woolen for hatting and then comb-making. In 1870, McArthur Brothers built an addition to the first building and, gradually giving up straw-board, made straw wrapping-paper. In 1872 a second addition was built, and in 1875 hardware and wrapping-paper were made. Last year more machinery was added, and manilla paper was manufactured.

The first paper-mill, however, was one which stood on the stream back of the homestead of the late E. S. Hull. It was long before the present oldest inhabitant can remember, but we learn from one gentleman who remembers his parents telling of the mill that it was run by a man named Washburn.

The manufacture of boots and shoes was another industry which once occupied a prominent position in Danbury. It was of recent birth. In 1839, C. H. Merritt built and occupied as a boot- and shoe-factory the brick building now standing at the north end of Main Street. The same year he took into partnership Lucius R. Sprague. In 1870, Mr. Sprague retired, and Mr. Richard W. Cone went into the firm. This firm remained in the business until the latter part of March, 1880, when they closed up, sold their machinery, and the factory will soon be occupied in hatting. The firm in its busiest seasons employed nearly two hundred hands.

As far as we can trace back we find an oil-mill on the south side of what is now known as Crofut's Pond, or Oil Mill Pond. In 1812, Friend Starr, father of Mr. C. H. Starr, used to make linseed oil from the flax raised in this section. It was quite a prosperous business at this time. The mill was pulled down many years ago,—so many, in fact, that none of our old citizens remember it. Many of them have indistinct recollections of this building in their early youth, but the date of its destruction is lost.

On the north side of the dam stood a saw-mill owned by Friend Starr and Benjamin and Fairchild Ambler. The former was the father and the latter the uncle of Rev. E. C. Ambler. Mr. Ambler remembers going to the mill to carry his father's dinner, and help about the work at times. He also relates an anecdote of Mr. Starr which we think worth republishing. Mr. Starr was an Episcopalian, but for some reasons he was temporarily offended with the church, and used to go to hear Rev. Mr. Trumbull, the Baptist pastor. One Sunday, after Mr. Starr had come in, Mr. Trumbull arose and gave his text: "Friend, friend, how earnest thou hither not having a wedding-garment?" Mr. Starr at first thought this rather personal and manifested his disapprobation plainly. But, the minister proceeding, he saw that the text was not intended for him, and he became calm.

The manufacture of sewing-machines was another industry for which Danbury was once well known. It was a machine patented by Walker B. Bartram. The first manufacturers were the Bartram & Fanton Sewing-Machine Company. They started in the old shirt-factory on Ives Street in 1865. The next year they purchased the brick building on Canal Street now occupied by P. Robinson & Son, and moved there. The company continued running with varied success until 1872, when it was reorganized, and many of our people, poor and rich alike, took stock therein. In two years more (1874) the company failed, and the stockholders mourned for the faded dreams of fortune.

In the summer of 1815 (the cold summer) Eli Seger lived in the red house on the Mill Plain road, now owned by the Terry family, which stands on the corner of the old road leading to the fair-ground entrance, across Fish-Weir bridge. The lower part of this house Seger used for manufacturing nails, living in the upper part. Seger was grandfather to Rev. E. C. Ambler. Soon after this date he moved to Ohio, where he died.

Comb-making was another industry which was once extensively carried on here, and which is now extinct. In 1810, Nathaniel Bishop started a comb-factory on the site or just back of Peck & Wildman's store. He kept a large number of hands at work for twenty-five years.

Foote & Barnum began in 1814, in a shop that stood near the corner of Main and Centre Streets. Otis & Whiting had a shop just this side of St. James' Church, West Street. Alfred Gregory, Peck & Gillett, and several others had small shops scattered about town. The comb business—the value of the goods and the number of hands employed—exceeded that of hatting from 1826 to 1831, and continued about equal till about 1837.

In 1847, T. T. Peck occupied the woolen-mill on West Street, near Beaver Street, and was burned out. The shop was rebuilt and the business carried on till 1852, when it was removed to A. T. Peck's old shop, where Beckerle & Co.'s factories now are.

Barnum & Green was another firm who carried on business in 1812, on the corner where Hon. F. S. Wildman's garden now stands.

Daniel Taylor, it is claimed, was the first man to make combs in Danbury. His factory was in the then Wildcat District, Bethel. In the same locality there were at one time seven shops in operation,—Azrael and Charles Smith, Daniel Taylor, E. Hull Barnum, T. T. Dibble, S. B. Peck, and Ammon Taylor; in Bethel Village and Grassy Plain, Daniel Barnum, George Clapp, Ammon Benedict, and several others. In 1820, and from then to 1837, there were many small shops scattered along the road from Beaver Brook to Newtown, and from Newtown to Danbury by the Bethel road. In 1852 the business died out, mainly because the comb-makers in Massachusetts combined their capital and skilled labor and killed off the small manufacturers in other parts of the country.

The present manufacturing establishments are as follows:

THE EXECUTION OF ANTHONY.

"There have been two executions in Danbury. Both of these occurred within a period of twenty years, and both were of negroes convicted of rape. The first was a man named Anthony, a free negro, living in Greenwich. He perhaps had no other name, as 'Anthony' is alone used in the indictment and the warrant for execution. His crime was committed on the 7th of March, 1798, and he was hung in November following.

"The following is the copy of the indictment from the grand jury, for copy of which and of the warrant that follows we are indebted to Mr. A. B. Hull:

"The Grand Jurors for the body of said County of Fairfield, on their oaths present and say that at Greenwich, in said County, on the night next succeeding the 7th day of March, A. D., 1798, Anthony a Free negro, then residing in said Greenwich with force and arms wilfully wicked and feloniously did make an assault in and upon the body of Mary Knapp of said Greenwich, a maid under the age of nineteen years, then and there in the Peace of God and of this State, . . . being against the Peace and contrary to the form, force and effect of the laws of this State, entitled "An Act for the Punishment of Rape." On this indictment the said Anthony was arraigned before the Bar of this Court, and on such his arraignment was put to plead. Pleaded not guilty and for trial put himself on God and the Country. The issue with the evidence was committed to the Jury, duly impaneled and called upon to pass between the State of Connecticut and the said Anthony the Prisoner at the Bar, which Jurors on their oath do say that said Anthony, the prisoner at the bar, is guilty of the crime charged against him in the said indictment whereupon it is considered by the court and this court do join sentence and against the said Anthony, the Prisoner at the Bar, that he go from hence to the Goal from whence he came and from thence to some open and convenient place for execution then to be hanged between the Heavens and the earth until he shall be dead."

"This was at Danbury, Aug. 10, 1798. Anthony remained in the jail here until November 8th, when he was called forth for execution. The following is the warrant for the sheriff:

"To the Sheriff of the county of Fairfield in the State of Connecticut, Greeting:

"Whereas one Anthony a free Negro Man residing in Greenwich in said county Before the Supreme Court holden at Danbury within the said County of Fairfield on the second Tuesday of August 1798 was legally convicted of the crime of a Rape Committed on the Body of Mary Knapp of Greenwich aforesaid a maid under the age of nineteen years. And thereupon he the said Anthony was by the consideration of said Supreme Court adjudged and sentenced to be Hanged by his neck between the Heaven and the Earth on the Eighth Day of November next between the hours of Ten o'clock in the forenoon and three o'clock in the afternoon of said Day until he should be Dead. All of which by the records of said Supreme Court appears. And Execution thereof remains to be done. These are therefore in the name and by the Authority of the State of Connecticut to Will & Command you that on the Eight day of November next ensuing some time between the hours of Ten o'clock in the forenoon & Three o'clock in the afternoon of said Day you have him the said Anthony forth of the Common Goal in said Fairfield County where he now remains in Custody unto some open & convenient place for execution and him said Anthony then & there Cause to be Hunged up by his neck between the Heavens and the Earth until he shall be Dead. For which purpose this shall be your Legal & sufficient warrant hereof you may in no wise fail & make due return with such your doings thereon Endorsed.

"Dated at Windham the 18th day of September, A.D. 1798 & in the 23d year of the Independence of the United States of America."

"There is no record of the return from the sheriff called for in the closing paragraph, and there are those who dispute that Anthony was hung here at the time.

"But the execution took place in Danbury on that day. We have the evidence of an eye-witness, and the sermon preached on the occasion.

"At ten o'clock of that morning, November 8th, Anthony was removed from the jail and taken to the Congregational church, late the concert-hall building. The church was crowded to overflowing with spectators, as, despite the tragic character of the event, the town assumed a holiday appearance. Anthony was placed at the front, under the pulpit, during the preaching of the sermon. Rev. Timothy Langdon was the pastor, and delivered the discourse.

"Upon the close of this he personally addressed the prisoner. He said,—

"Anthony, it is by your request that I speak on this occasion, and this is the last address which I shall ever make to you. From the sentence pronounced upon you by the court, and from the preparations with which you are surrounded, you must see that you have but a very, very short time to live. Your situation is truly deplorable. Whatever your crimes may have been against God and human society, yet, seeing your present condition, I pity you as a man, I pray for you as a Christian, and am now to address you as a minister of the gospel. I must therefore be faithful, and use great plainness of speech."

"Then followed a description of the enormity of his sin, committed in the light of knowledge, and after that an earnest exhortation to the sinner to repent, to look to Christ, to die 'in a Christian temper.' We judge from these words that Anthony was in an impenitent frame of mind, and that he was doggedly meeting his wretched fate.

"On the close of the sermon the civil authorities carried the prisoner to the place set apart for his execution. This was at the head of Elm Street, near the pond. The gallows was erected on land belonging to Samuel Dibble, and from the fact of this execution the place took the name of 'Gallows Hill.' There was a great crowd present, of course, as it was a public execution, and the first ever had here. People from quite a distance were in attendance, and nearly all the town-folks were present. Sheriff Dimon, of Fairfield, was the county sheriff and he officiated.

"The gallows consisted of two uprights set in the earth, some seven inches square, hewn from our native forests, with a cross-timber on the top, and a platform hinged to one of the uprights at a height to make about six feet fall. Suitable steps were provided to pass on to the platform from the ground. Ropes attached to the platform passed over the cross-piece and were secured at the foot of one of the posts. Benjamin Griffen, the father of the late E. G. Griffen, seemed to have charge of this department.

"The prisoner was asked if he wished to say anything, and shook his head. The usual order from the Governor of the State (required in every case where life is taken), called the death-warrant, was then read. An appropriate prayer was offered by a clergyman of the Methodist Church from the vicinity where the crime was committed, he having been Adams' spiritual adviser. He was a good out-door speaker, and was plainly heard, it was said, on the post-office steps on Main Street, near De Klyn's bakery.

"Every condition and requirement of the law having been complied with, the prisoner was assisted up the steps and on to the platform by the deputies. His eyes were covered with his cap, and the rope, previously prepared for the prisoner and worn through the day on his neck, was connected with another suspended from the cross-piece.

"The next was a thrilling scene. The hangman had placed a prop under the platform to steady it. It appeared to be a fence rail, or about that size, and his duty now was to remove it. He found some difficulty in doing so, and when he did the victim shuddered and gave a shrug which was felt and involuntarily repeated by a large part of the spectators, even on the other side of the river, on the west. At this instant the voice of the sheriff was heard, 'Deputies, do your duty!' whereupon their swords were seen waving over their heads, the ropes were severed, the drop fell, and the victim, suspended in mid-air, died without any apparent struggle.

"Soon the hangman climbed the upright, and, sitting on the plate, so adjusted the ropes that the body was gently lowered into his coffin and buried on the ground near by, a grave being previously prepared. It was only about eighteen inches deep. The next morning it was found to have been opened, and the body was gone, leaving the box in the ground. A fresh wagon-track on the road was traced out through White Street towards New Haven. It was said our authorities were privy to this arrangement.*

TRIAL AND EXECUTION OF AMOS ADAMS.*

An execution of another negro for the same crime as that for which Anthony was executed, took place in Danbury on the 13th day of November, 1817. These two are the only judicial executions that have ever taken place within the limits of Fairfield County, with the exception of that of Hoyt, hanged in Bridgeport in the summer of 1880. There have been three military executions in the county,—two at Redding and one at Newtown.

At a court holden at Danbury within and for the county of Fairfield, on the third Tuesday of September, 1817, before Chief Justice Hon. Zepheniah Swift, and Associate Justices Hon. Calvin Goddard and Hon. James Gould, came on trial Amos Adams, a black man, charged with having committed a rape on the body of Lelea Thorp, of Weston, in said county.

On Wednesday, the second day of the term, the grand jury, consisting of the following persons, was summoned by the sheriff pursuant to an order of court, and the oath administered in the usual form: Thomas Tucker, Foreman, Eliakim Benediet, Russel White, Elijah Gregory, Samuel H. Phillips, Samuel Tweedy, Jr., Moss White, Ezra Wildman, Elias Starr, Darius Starr, Elijah Sanford, David Foote, Comfort Hoyt, Andrew Beers, John Rider, Abel B. Blackman, Horace Bull, Amos Hoyt. His Honor the Chief Justice then charged the jury in a somewhat lengthy address, in which he portrayed in forcible language "the dreadful effects of this detestable crime," and closed with the usual instructions to the grand jury as to the manner in which their proceedings were to be conducted. The grand jury retired, and after a short absence brought into court a bill of indictment.

On Thursday, the 18th day of September, the prisoner was arraigned, and to this indictment plead "Not guilty." He was then informed by the court that if he desired counsel he could have any gentleman of the bar assigned for that purpose. He answered that he wished to have Moses Hatch, Esq. Mr. Hatch then observed to the court that the prisoner was ready for his trial, and requested that Asa Chapman, Esq., be associated with him. The court immediately assigned him. The attorney for the State requested that R. M. Sherman, Esq., might be appointed to assist him on the part of the State, which was accordingly done.

Two of the panel were challenged by the prisoner, when the following jurors were sworn: Seth Sherwood, Foreman, Billy Comstock, Samuel Stebbins, Clark Gregory, Abel Smith, Noah T. Ferry, Ebenezer

Nearing, David Osborne, Thaddeus Abbott, Sherwood Fanton, Isaac Wilson, Robert Platt.

Samuel B. Sherwood, Esq., attorney for the State, then proceeded to the examination of the witnesses in behalf of the State.

The trial was short. There being but little defense for his counsel to offer, they confined themselves to asking a few questions of the witnesses, and the case was submitted to the jury without argument. The jury retired, and after a few minutes brought in a verdict of "Guilty."

On Thursday, the 25th of September, the prisoner was brought into court and sentenced to be hanged on the 13th day of November.

On the day appointed for his execution he was brought from the jail, guarded by the military, and taken to the Congregational church (afterwards Concert Hall), where a sermon was preached for the occasion, by Rev. Mr. Andrews, from the text, "One sinner destroyeth much good." After the services at the church were concluded he was again placed in charge of the military and conducted to the gallows, which had been erected at the junction of what are now called Elm and Beaver Streets, on the slight elevation of ground on the west side of the last-named street.

After the requirements of the law had been fulfilled the body was buried in a shallow grave at the foot of the gallows. The morning after the execution it was noticed that the grave had been disturbed, and investigation showed that the body had been dragged out of the coffin and taken away. But little effort was made to discover the resurrectionists, and the excitement soon abated. It is said that the skeleton is now in the medical college at New Haven. A few years since, as workmen were digging for the cellars of tenement-houses on this ground, small portions of the coffin were found.

In this connection it may be proper to state that, several years after, another negro was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged for the same offense in Danbury, but by an act of the Legislature changing the law he escaped execution.

DANBURY IN THE REBELLION.

The following excellent history of Danbury in the war of the Rebellion is an address which was delivered by J. M. Bailey, of the Danbury News, at the unveiling of the Soldiers' Monument, May 27, 1880:

"Danbury was very quiet through the winter that preceded the war. There was a talk of war, to be sure, but four-fifths of those who talked it did not believe in its possibility. It was simply New England's sequence arriving at a burst in the pipe. There was an impression, I remember, that every State would secede excepting those which formed New England, and this would naturally bring the war prospect down to a very narrow compass; and then, again, there were those here who were sure Connecticut alone would remain in the Union, while every other State would go out. This made many of us confident there was to be no war at all, and left us untrammelled in determining the number of the enemy we could slay in battle.

"These matters were thoroughly and ably discussed when the weather was sufficiently mild to permit with safety the occupation of the depot and Concert Hall steps.

"It was a gloomy winter, however,—gloomy because business was interrupted by the uncertainty of the immediate future. The summer and fall preceding had been seasons of prosperity. Our staple industry, hating, was at full tide. Every shop was crowded with orders. Large prices were paid for help, and large profits were made. I came to Danbury that year, and I remember the surprise I felt in seeing so many people indulging in watermelons and sweet potatoes. It seemed as if a millennium had set in, to which there never was to come an adjournment. Strangers were moving into town, and in every part of the village buildings were going up at a lively rate.

"After the November election all this changed. Progress came to a stand-still as abruptly as if it had been mounted with an air-brake. Hating went under, and dragged with it, as is its custom, every other branch of industry. Men had little to do but to stand around and talk. And the result was as sure as taxes. Dyspepsia set in, and gloom followed. Danbury's liver was full of gall, and Danbury's blood crawled sluggishly through its veins. Sumter was the blue pill for the occasion, and most thoroughly did it do its work.

"It was three o'clock on the afternoon of Saturday, April 13, 1861, when Danbury received the news of the fall of Sumter and the first victory for the secessionists. All that day anxious men entered the telegraph-office in search of the intelligence they dreaded to meet. When it came there was a shock. It was as if the batteries that played against the doomed fortress had been galvanic, with their wires running through our hearts' very centre.

"The next forty-eight hours were full of compressed life. They were mental yeast-cakes. No excitement equaled it since that April day nearly a century dead when the face of a foreign foe was turned our way and the tramp of an enemy's feet pressed our borders.

"Now we knew there was to be a war. Even the most sanguine of a bloodless ending to the trouble gave up the hope of peace, but not the determination to win it. In that first flush of indignant shame party lines went under, and only the fact of the outrage and the desire to avenge it appeared above the sea of patriotic passion that swept over Danbury.

"You all know how thronged Main Street is on a Saturday evening. We have a sort of national reputation in this particular. But, as compared with that Saturday night nineteen years ago, the one of the present is as barren of life as a law library.

"There was but little sleep in Danbury that Saturday night; there was none whatever the next day, although there were eight churches here. St. Peter gave way to saltpetre in the theology of the hour.

"Danbury showed its colors promptly on the reception of the news from Sumter. The first flag appeared from the residence of Hon. Roger Averill, and others immediately followed,—in such numbers, too, that the village looked like an army with banners. An interesting incident occurred with the unfolding of Governor Averill's flag. Many present distinctly remember the venerable Col. Moss White. Several years before the war he was stricken with paralysis, and never recovered from the shock. He moved about with great difficulty, and lost all control of verbal expression except two words, in the form of an injunction, which were, 'Come all!' On seeing the flag he smote his breast with both hands and cried aloud again and again, 'Come all! Come all!' And the record shows that the able-bodied men of his native town almost literally responded to the cry.

"On the Monday following the eventful Saturday, President Lincoln issued a call for seventy-five thousand troops to march to the defense of the government. On Wednesday, Governor Buckingham's call for Connecticut's quota of this number was received in Danbury, and on Friday—only forty-eight hours later—our dear old mother had a company of her sons, nearly all armed and equipped, on their way to the State rendezvous, ready for action. These were the Wooster Guards, the first company to leave Danbury, and the first in the State to report for duty. Is not this something to be proud of? Glorious as is the name the dead Wooster left us, it received new brightness from the lustre of this act.

"The day the Wooster Guards departed for New Haven was an eventful one in the history of our town. It might have been called both Good and Black Friday.—Good because of the devotion to principle thus manifested, Black because of the gloom in the hearts of those whose trying mission was to stay at home and wait.

"It was only for three months that this devoted company were to be gone, but the eye of affection saw every bitter possibility crowded within that brief space, and hearts stood still at the sight.

"You may rest assured that a hearty gospel accompanied Danbury's first offering upon the nation's altar. People were suffering under a mighty tension of excitement, and any escape that presented itself was promptly used. And so when this first company went away there was a parade, and the touching off of powder, and the waving of hats, and a shouting and yelling as if every man had a telephone of his own and wanted a doctor.

"The town's military hall was then on the top floor of D. P. Nichols' building, corner of Main and White Streets. There the Guards assembled and received recruits, and prepared for the advance. But it was in Concert Hall, on the spot where to-day was unveiled the monument, that the brave band were consecrated to the holy cause of national life, and the God of battles was invoked to watch over them. It was a triumphant march to the hall, and a triumphant march from there to the railway-station, and all along the route the way was hedged in with sympathetic and effervescent humanity. At the station itself the currents became an ocean into which the Guards were absorbed as completely as if they had gone down into a real ocean. Every man in that company was a hero in the eyes of the multitude, and every manifestation of approval was showered upon them. It was a wonder to us how the train ever got away from the station with its precious freight without crushing scores of humans in its moving. But it did move away free from all obstacle, and the Guards went out from among us with hearts so full of purpose that grief found no entrance therein.

"Capt. L. E. Wildman was in command; Jesse D. Stevens was first lieutenant; John W. Bussing was second lieutenant. These three men are still with us. I am going to read to you the muster-roll of that band who took their lives in their hands to go out upon an untried enterprise. I would like to repeat from this platform the name of every volunteer from our town, but time will not permit it. The chief interest centres about this company because it was the first. This is the list:

"Sergeants, Andrew Knox, Milo Dickens, William Moegling, Samuel M. Pettit.

"Corporals, George B. Allen, E. S. Davis, Alexander Kallman, Nathan Couch.

"Musicians, Edward H. Dunn, Grandison D. Foote.

"Privates, John Allen, Harris Anderson, C. H. Anderson, John Bogardus, Charles A. Boraman, James Blizzard, William H. Blizzard, Thomas T. Bussing, James Bradley, Theodore B. Benedict, A. H. Byington, George W. Banker, Charles A. Bengier, Niram Blackman, Thomas B. Brown, Henry E. Buckingham, William K. Cowan, Leonard B. Clark, William R. Doune, Josiah L. Day, Ed. H. Day, Joseph L. Dunning, Ezekiel Eaton, C. Fieldstone, Denis Geliven, Christopher Grimm, Charles A. Gordon, H. W. Gibbs, Carl W. Hillbrand, William O. Hoyt, W. P. Hoyt, David B. Hoyt, Alfred H. Holdinott, Thomas Hooton, Otto Hagemont, James Howath, Jesse L. James, Earnest T. Jennings, Isaac N. Jennings, George D. Keeler, Morris A. Krazyusky, William J. Murphy, Emil C. Margrad, James Martin, Andrew B. Nichols, Horace Purdy, Francis W. Platt, Joseph W. Raymond, James Reed, James R. Ross, Timothy Rose, George L. Smith, Alson J. Smith, Benjamin F. Skinner, David Sloane, Grandison Scott, Louis Shack, Eli D. Seelye, Augustus Staples, George Sears, James H. Taylor, Joseph Tammany, Dennis A. Veats, Edgar L. Wildman, Howard W. Wheeler, John Waters.

"The papers of New Haven spoke highly of the appearance of the company, and lauded the promptness with which it responded to the nation's cry for help. It is a great deal to be the first in an enterprise fraught with danger, because the danger itself is untried and all the more formidable. It was a brave thing for the families of these men to give up their own, but both those who went and those who sent them had no lack of the spirit which constitutes heroism.

"There are two incidents recorded in the New Haven Journal of that time which vividly show how bright and clear burned the fire of patriotism on the altar set up in Danbury. I quote from the Journal:

"The men are in the best of spirits, and are determined to vindicate the untarnished honor of old Connecticut. One of them received a letter from his wife, Saturday evening, saying, 'I do wish, Robert, you could return; but if it is not consistent with honor and duty, go! Good-by, and remember always to be faithful to our country, and to fight manfully for our glorious flag.' Said the brave fellow, trying hard to repress a tear as he perused the precious missive, 'Who couldn't fight when such a wife commanded it?' Another member of the company was met by his father on the green, who said, as he handed him a wallet containing some thirty dollars in gold, 'My son, take your father's blessing and this slim purse. It is all I can give you. Do your duty. It is hard for your aged mother and me to part with you, but God bless you, go! If you fall, give your dying blessing to your comrades. Good-by.'"

"These are specimens of the men who went in that first company from Danbury, and of those who gave them up. Of the material that composed this band the larger part reappeared to credit in subsequent organizations. Some of them reached distinction as officers. Many of them are with us to-day. Many have passed through the Valley of the Shadow. One who marched in the ranks on the departure from Danbury does not appear in this list. He was objected to on account of age, and although he tried in various ways to be mustered in was not successful. This was Nelson L. White, afterwards lieutenant-colonel of the First Connecticut Heavy Artillery, and now gone to his eternal rest.

"Another prominent name is that of William Moegling, who entered the Eleventh Regiment as captain of one of the companies, became the lieutenant-colonel, was twice wounded, came home disabled, and died here on the 26th of October, 1864.

"The encampment of the First Regiment, to which this company was assigned, was, while in the State, a rather pleasant affair, something in the line of a picnic. This was the experience of all the regiments. The food was good, every man had a plate, knife, and fork, the tents were clean, beds were furnished to sleep upon, passes were frequent, the uniforms were new, and there were plenty of admirers. After leaving the State and getting into the field another and an entirely different order of things developed, and the progress to it was somewhat like falling down stairs. There was but very little appearance in the field, and scarcely any cologne, while the man who had a knife and fork was looked upon with considerable suspicion. Straw ticks gave way to bare ground, and shoe blucking to stone bruises, and if a man had a whole crown to his hat he flattered himself that he was doing very handsomely by the government. When the news reached the Seventeenth Connecticut, reclining in the frozen mud of Chantilly, Va., of the complaint of a newly-organized regiment at home that only one bundle of straw was given to each man, very heavy gloom settled upon Chantilly, and may be there yet. All the misery of war is not confined to the battle-field, although that appears to be the generally received impression outside the army.

"The First Connecticut left New Haven for Washington on the 9th of May. Gen. Scott's comment upon it was brief but to the point. He said, 'Thank God, there is one regiment on hand ready for service!'

"Early in the morning of July 21st the regiment went to the front, and Danbury received its baptism of fire in the war of the Union. All that day the regiment was marched and countermarched in the multitude of changes in position, and much of the time it was subject to a severe fire from the enemy, but came out of that dreadful disaster with scarcely a mark. The only loss the Danbury company sustained was the capture of two of its members, Alfred B. Hoddinott and Isaac N. Jennings.

"The regiment was mustered out of the service on the 31st of July, and the Wooster Guards were given a picnic reception in James Nichols' woods, in Great Plain District, on Saturday, August 3d, at which there was great rejoicing and an unlimited supply of sandwiches, in connection with music, poetry, and pies.

"Within ten days from the departure of the Wooster Guards for New Haven a second company for three months' service was formed and ready to depart. This was on the 29th of April. The organization was called the Danbury Rifle Company, and was commanded by the gallant and hunted James E. Moore. His first lieutenant was Samuel G. Bailey, and his second lieutenant Charles H. Hoyt. Lieut. Hoyt resigned six weeks later and F. W. Jackson, a sergeant, was promoted to the vacancy. The company was mustered into the United States service as Company C of the Third Regiment, and numbered seventy-seven men. The departure of this body of citizen-soldiers was signalized by a general outpouring of the people of Danbury. The company was escorted through the village by a spirited cavalcade, and at the railway-station there were elaborate preparations for an enthusiastic send-off. A platform was erected, which was mounted by the clergy, who fired the hearts of the volunteers and others with new zeal, and a band of music added to the electricity. The company departed amid a volley of cheers and a burst of music, while the air was white with the waving of handkerchiefs moist with tears.

"Ah, it is something to have lived in those days of delirium!

"The company was mustered into the service on the 14th of May, at Hartford, and on the 25th of that month left the State for Washington.

"The Danbury Rifles took an active part in the tragedy of Bull Run. The regiment was exposed to a severe fire, and acquitted itself most creditably. From its ranks Danbury offered her first living sacrifice. This was John R. Marsh, fourth sergeant of the company, a name that heads Danbury's list of martyrs in the war for the Union. He was struck and killed by a piece of flying shell. Private A. E. Bronson was made a prisoner.

"Of the Rifles several afterwards rendered distinguished service in other commands. Chief was the gallant captain who crowned his unselfish devotion by yielding up his life at the head of his company on the blood-saturated field of Gettysburg. There also Bronson gave up his life, dying by the side of his leader. Corp. Milton Daniels and Private Henry Quisen became captains of the Danbury company in the Seventeenth.

"The Rifles returned to Danbury on Wednesday evening, the 14th of August. On Saturday, the 17th, they were entertained by a grove dining at Old Mill, and by speeches and music in Concert Hall.

"I have said that there was considerable demonstration when the Rifles went away. In the escort on that day was a company of young men whose very hot blood found some expression in the impulsively suggestive title of Zouaves. The Zouaves numbered sixty members on that day, and they averaged nearly six feet in stature. They were in some respects the most remarkable body of men sent to the war from Danbury. The larger portion of them were the full-blooded and high-spirited boys of the period, full of life and dash, and a credit to the east side of Main Street any afternoon or evening.

The Zouaves became Company A of the Fifth Regiment, and were the first company of three-years' men to go out from Danbury. I think the author of that rather vigorous poem, 'Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching,' must have been a member of the gallant Fifth. Nowhere else could he have got more inspiration. Colt's factory was to have furnished the regiment with revolving arms. Nature gave them their revolving legs, and never before or since was Nature more generous. No body of men from Danbury equaled this company in the extent of service. This is a distinction indeed among a number of bodies no one of whom brought discredit upon our dear old town, and most of whom were subject to severe tests of physical endurance and courage.

"The Zouaves were commanded by Capt. Henry B. Stone, the lieutenants were James A. Betts, first, and William A. Daniels, second. They left Danbury for Hartford on the 16th of May. The demonstration made over their departure exceeded that made on either of the preceding occasions. Nearly all the Zouaves were well known and well liked in this community, and they had a large following of friends. It was the biggest day Danbury witnessed in that volume of big days. Many of you remember it. There were several local organizations in the line of march through the village. One of them was the Home Guards, another was the Union Cadets, a third the Anderson Guards, which was composed of Irish citizens. In addition to these were the fire companies. Most of the Zouaves had 'run with the machine,' and ran with it enthusiastically, too, you may be sure, and so the fire-hds were out in force. Then there were the village brass band and a long line of horsemen. Twenty years ago Danbury didn't think it could parade with any decency whatever unless it was astraddle of a horse. There were the ringing of the bells, the discharge of cannon, the strains of music, flights of oratory, and cheers that made the cheerers hoarse for a week after. What added a deep significance to the affair was the prospect that the parting was to be for a much longer period than three months, and to the hearts of those left behind, shivering in the very glory of the parade, three months looked long enough, looking forward to it. Well for those poor souls bravely fighting down their pain that they could look no farther into the future than they did!

"The company was originally designed to apply to the three months quota, but before its muster-roll was completed the quota was full, and it was then a choice with them whether they would enroll for three years or stay at home. You will readily comprehend how severe a test to their zeal was this choice. But they were equal to it, as they proved themselves to be equal to every test the military genius of friend or foe subjected them to.

"The Fifth left Hartford on the 20th of June for the seat of war, or rather for the war-path, for it was a regiment that saw but previous few opportunities for sitting down. In the years of its service the regiment marched over fifteen hundred miles, at one time being on the move for nineteen consecutive days, and marching in one day the unusual distance of forty-five miles. It took in more scenery than any other regiment from Connecticut. It began in Virginia and brought up in North Carolina, by way of Tennessee and Georgia. The only reason why it did not see the Yosemite Valley was because there happened to be no fighting there. It fought eleven battles, among them being Cedar Mountain,—where it met its heaviest loss,—Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg. Six of the Zouaves were killed outright or were fatally wounded, and nineteen of them otherwise wounded. Of the original company only three died in the service from disease, which shows the superior physical condition of the men. Perhaps no company from Danbury witnessed so many changes in its officers as did the Zouaves.

"Its first commander, Henry B. Stone, was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel. He was wounded at the battle of Cedar Mountain, and died on the 20th of January, 1862, from the effects of that wound. His bravery was without a flaw. First Lieut. Betts was also promoted to be lieutenant-colonel. Second Lieut. Daniels was made first lieutenant, and was mustered out of the service because of disability. First Sergt. Theodore Dibble was made a captain, Second Sergt. Lewis K. Curley, who recently died, became the quartermaster of the regiment, and made a model officer in that difficult and very important department. Third Sergt. George N. Raymond was made a first lieutenant. Fourth Sergt. James Stewart reached a captaincy. Corp. Edgar A. Stratton was promoted to be first lieutenant, and Corp. A. M. Whitlock, to be second lieutenant. Two privates, W. H. Botsford and E. A. Sage, were promoted to be first lieutenants. The first assistant surgeon of the regiment was Dr. W. C. Bennett, who became a brigade surgeon. The company largely re-enlisted at the close of the three years' term, and served until the close of the war. It received fifty-nine recruits, making its total strength one hundred and sixty-five men.

"After the departure of the Zouaves from Danbury there came a lull in military operations here. There was no pressing demand for troops, and no organization was forming. We had done our share of the work, and were now waiting to see how things were going to turn out. Perhaps what we had done would be sufficient. At any rate, there was nothing more to do but to wait and look and speculate. An army had gathered in Virginia, the coming battle-ground, and the hosts of friends and foes were on the eve of what the greater portion of us believed would be the decisive battle of the war. Those were days of eager watching, but the feeling was of that intense nature that found little outward expression.

"At last it came. There was an awful crash, and then a shock,—such a dreadful shock! The battle of Bull Run was fought, and—lost. Our splendid army was shamefully beaten and driven back in defeat and dismay.

"The waiting was over, the watching at an end, and the strong, faithful heart of our sturdy town smothered its grief and went bravely to work to build anew.

"Military Hall again blazed with light and sounded with the tramp of volunteer feet, and the drum and life awakened the echoes of our streets. Benjamin F. Skinner and William Moegling, fresh from the disastrous battle-field, received authority from Governor Buckingham to recruit a company for the then forming Sixth Regiment, and fell to work at once to execute the commission.

"On the night of August 19th a large, enthusiastic public meeting was held in Concert Hall with a view to stimulating enlistments in the new company. Thirty names had already been enrolled, and fourteen more were added that night. Within a week the company was completed, and on the 28th of August it departed for New Haven. Although recruited for the Sixth, it was assigned to the Seventh Regiment, and became Company D in that organization. B. F. Skinner was chosen captain, Joseph Dunning first lieutenant, and Thomas Hooten second lieutenant. These three were members of the first company of three months' men. Three weeks later, September 18th, the regiment left the State for the front.

"The Seventh served the greater part of its time in the far South. It was the first to land on the soil of South Carolina, and its flag was the first national color unfurled in that State since the beginning of the war. Governor Buckingham promulgated the fact in a special order, and it was read to every Connecticut regiment in the field. This alone was glory enough, but the Seventh did grand service throughout the war. It saw more fighting than any other regiment in which Danbury had a company, taking part in nineteen engagements, chief among which were the battles of Morris Island and Fort Wagner, and those about Bermuda Hundred. The Seventh was a fighting regiment in the fullest sense of the term. The Danbury company bore its full share of the work, as the casualties show, its loss in killed and wounded being greater than the average of the companies. The company had none of its commissioned officers on its return, and yet there were but two promotions from the ranks. Capt. Skinner resigned in February, 1861, First Lieut. Dunning left the service in the first year, and Second Lieut. Hooten lost his brave life in battle on the 14th of June, 1862. First Sergt. Theodore C. Wildman was promoted to be first lieutenant, and Private William W. Newman reached the same office. In view of the service of the company, the changes in position were remarkably few. Most of the company re-enlisted on the expiration of its three years' term, and served until the close of the war. Its losses exceeded those of any company Danbury sent to the war. Eleven of its members were killed outright, twenty-seven were wounded, of whom six died from the effects of wounds and twenty-one died with disease, of which number six died in the Andersonville prison. The company entered the army with one hundred and five men and received sixty-three recruits.

"On the 24th of August another company was formed. There has always been much that was mysterious surrounding this organization. It has no record, and not even its officers are fully known. No trace of the company is in the possession of the State authorities. It participated in but one battle, but suffered severely. Like a gourd it grew up and went down in one day. It disbanded with considerable ostentation. In fact, the disbandment covered more ground than all its service. But one dark spot dims its glory. The scars of the wounds received in that battle are delicately concealed from sight, and are only visible to the public when the survivors are discovered in swimming. The battle of Charcoal Run took place on the 24th of August, 1861.

"Immediately following this tragedy came the inception of the fifth company in Danbury's contribution to the army. In spite of the rather inauspicious fact that the organizer was an enterprising undertaker, the formation of the company went rapidly forward, and under almost as great a strain of excitement as signaled the former enrollment.

"On the 26th of September the company left Danbury for Hartford, where it remained until the 16th of December following, when it went to the front as Company A of the Eleventh Regiment. It was commanded by Capt. George A. Southmayd. His first lieutenant was Samuel G. Bailey, and the second lieutenant Charles H. White. The company was called the Averill Rifles, the name being adopted in honor of Hon. Roger Averill. It left Danbury to go to Hartford on a national fast-day, September 26th, and returned here on Thanksgiving Day, November 28th, for the purpose of receiving a stand of colors, a gift from Governor Averill. The exercises took place in Concert Hall, where the monument now stands, and there are those here this evening who vividly remember all its details and will look back upon that November evening with peculiar sensations.

"As a part of the Eleventh Regiment the Averill Rifles participated in ten serious engagements. Chief among these were Antietam, Fredericksburg, Drury's Bluff, and before Petersburg. Its losses were ten killed or died from wounds and twenty-two wounded. Sixteen of the members died with disease, three of them while prisoners of war at Andersonville. The company was the largest from Danbury in the service. It was originally one hundred and one strong, and during its term it received one hundred and six recruits, making the total two hundred and seven. It re-enlisted in 1864, and was mustered out in December, 1865. It met with many changes. Capt. Southmayd resigned in the summer of 1862. First Lieut. Bailey was promoted to the vacancy, and right after resigned. Second Lieut. White was promoted to his place, and resigned. The company lost these three officers within the space of two weeks. First Sergt. Henry J. McDonald became major, Second Sergt. D. B. Mansfield was made a second lieutenant, Fourth Sergt. Nathan Cornwall and Corp. George Cassidy first lieutenants. From the ranks David A. Hoag rose to be captain, John H. Saffin to be first lieutenant, Peter W. Ambler, Christian Quien, and Sylvester C. Platt second lieutenants. Charles Parker, a recruit, was appointed a quartermaster.

"A company of German citizens in this regiment was commanded by Capt. William Moegling, who was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel, and was twice wounded. From the effects of these wounds he was obliged to return home, and here he died on the 26th of October, 1864, one of the bravest of Danbury's volunteers. There were seven Danbury citizens in Capt. Moegling's company.

"The Eleventh was one of the crack regiments of Connecticut. It was always to be depended upon, and won the hearty approbation of its brigade commanders. When it appeared in New York city on its way to the front it had quite a reception, and its soldierly bearing won the praise of the city press.

"The five companies whose histories I have briefly sketched comprise the number of organizations that Danbury furnished to maintain the nation's life in that first year of the war.

"In the regiment of cavalry raised that summer there were a score of Danbury men. In fact, our town was represented in every company in the troop. There were also recruits from here in every regiment but the Second that went out of the State that year.

"On the 3d of December, 1861, Andrew Knox, of Danbury, received authority from Governor Buckingham to raise recruits for the service. He immediately began the work, and in a very short time had secured forty-five volunteers. With these he reported at Hartford for duty. They were assigned to Company B of the First Heavy Artillery, which had then emerged from the Fourth Infantry. Nelson L. White was the lieutenant-colonel of this admirable regiment. Knox was made second lieutenant of the company, and was promoted shortly after to be first lieutenant. When I have occasion to write his obituary I will speak more particularly of him.

"Danbury is not considered to be specially connected with this regiment, and yet there were fifty-five residents of our town in Lieut. Knox's company, or more than there were in any company organized here with the single exception of Company K, Twenty-third Regiment. I do not include in the count those who belonged to the quota of the town and enlisted here, but simply those who had residence in Danbury.

"I cannot close this record of the year's work without a word for the newspapers of the day. There is a mournful pleasure in looking over them and pondering on their magnificent opportunities for snubbing truth. They contain full accounts of all the battles, and one in reading the figures in the list of casualties cannot help admiring the resources of the South, whatever he may think of its policy. I dare say there were as many Southerners killed in that first year of the war as we had men fighting in all the years. I recall one case where it stated that a Union man killed thirty-five secessionists at one shot. It led me to believe that the rebels fought in holes like you sometimes see codfish in a grocery, and I couldn't help shuddering when I thought how thin their bodies must be. At the same time I wished that I owned that gun. Really, our government did not need one-tenth the troops it raised.

The second year of the war, 1862, passed half away without witnessing any organizing action in Danbury. That winter will ever be known as having originated the balmy condition of affairs along the course of the Potomac. All that time the announcement of 'All quiet along the Potomac' was new and fresh, and gave quite a charm to current literature.

Occasionally there was a descent upon the village of some recruiting-agent with his dazzling prospectus. People were getting used to the war and all that pertained to it possible for them to know, and even the Danbury horse patiently submitted to banners and drums.

In the summer of 1862 there was a call for three hundred thousand more troops, to serve for three years, and Danbury again bestirred herself to gather her sons and send them forth to the fight. There was a public meeting in Concert Hall one July evening. It was a notable gathering in that it had a live Governor to address it, and a live lieutenant-governor to preside over it. Governor Buckingham, the noble hero, was here that night, and Lieut.-Gov. Averill was called to the chair. Both of them made addresses which were appeals that stirred the ardor of Danbury as it had not been stirred since the Bull Run disaster.

It was a tremendous meeting,—the biggest yet held. A large number could not gain admittance to the hall. The building was full. It is said there were over a thousand persons in there that night. You who remember the old hall will agree with me that the ushers must have had years of experience in boxing sardines. When the speaking was over there was a call for volunteers. A tall man went forward. He had the typical military figure,—tall, slim, straight. He wrote his name on the paper presented. It was the first name, and was read to the audience. It was that of James E. Moore. The announcement of this name was received with a storm of applause. Little did he who wrote it, or those who cheered it, anticipate the tragedy that a year later was to quench his life. Other names rapidly followed, and the first step for the formation of the Wildman Guards was taken. The name was adopted in honor of our fellow-citizen, Frederick S. Wildman. The command thus started soon became a full company, and took the designation of 'C' in the Seventeenth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers, then being raised by this county, and the only distinctively Fairfield County regiment recruited. Its headquarters were at Bridgeport. On the 28th of August it was mustered into the United States service, and on the 3d of September it left the State for the front.

Capt. James E. Moore was the commander of this company. The first lieutenant was Wilton H. Daniels. The second lieutenant was Henry Quisen. The company numbered one hundred and two on leaving the State. During its term of service it received seven recruits making its total number one hundred and nine. Its battles were not many, but its record shows that it made the most of its opportunities. The regiment was assigned to the Army of the Potomac, where it served until after the battle of Gettysburg, when it was transferred to the Department of the South and did duty before Charleston and in Florida. The Danbury company first came under fire at Chancellorsville, where it had one member fatally wounded and two less seriously. Its second engagement was Gettysburg. Here its experience was most bitter. Its loss in that fight was the most serious sustained by any Danbury company in any one engagement fought. It I recollect aright, the company went into the battle with forty-four members. Of these eleven were killed outright or died shortly from the effects of wounds. Eleven were otherwise wounded and eleven were captured, leaving eleven survivors. On that field the brave captain gave up his life, and three of his sergeants perished with him. The company's casualties during its three years of service were twelve killed outright or fatally wounded, twelve otherwise wounded, and seven died of disease. There were but few promotions. Both lieutenants, Daniels and Quisen, became captain of the company, the former resigning in March, 1864. Sergt. William L. Daniels was made first lieutenant.

The adjutant-general of the State, in his report of the services of the Connecticut troops, speaks in the following distinctive terms of the Seventeenth.

"Thus ended the honorable service of a regiment the superior of which in intelligence, morale, courage, and endurance was not found in the army. The commonwealth of Connecticut will ever cherish the memory of its dead and honor its living."

The Fifteenth Regiment went into the service at the same time with the Seventeenth. The late Dr. E. F. Hendrick was an assistant surgeon in this regiment, which had fifteen of our citizens. One of these was Charles S. Gray, who entered the service as a sergeant and was promoted to be second lieutenant.

In September, 1862, Danbury completed her last organizations for the war. These were two companies enlisted for a term of nine months. Both companies were recruited for the Twenty-third Regiment. Each contained eighty-three members. The first was Company B. Its captain was James H. Jenkins. The first lieutenant was the lamented Frederick Starr, who was fatally wounded in the battle of La Fourche, La. The second lieutenant was William B. Betts, who was promoted to be first lieutenant on the death of Starr. Sergt. Henry I. Smith became second lieutenant. The company's loss in the service were two from wounds and three from disease.

The second company was mustered in as Company K. It was commanded by Capt. Samuel G. Bailey. The first lieutenant was Edwin H. Neating, and the second George Quisen. The Quisens may be called a family of officers. All its available force, three sons, went into the service, and all were officers. The casualties of Company K were the capture of Capt. Bailey and the deaths from disease of four members.

The regiment served in Louisiana and faithfully discharged the duties assigned to it. Samuel Gregory was the adjutant and Eli Ferry the sergeant-major of the regiment.

I have here prepared a table which shows the strength and the loss of Danbury in the war for the Union. Although our village had organizations in but seven of the thirty regiments from the State, it had representatives in nearly all of them. In this table is given the strength of the Danbury companies and the number of Danburians in other companies of the same regiments:

"This shows that Danbury had six companies in the army whose total membership was 950. In other companies were 390 of her citizens, making a grand total of 1340, or nearly one-sixth of her population. Of these 56 were killed, 91 were wounded, and 89 died of disease, the total of casualties being one-sixth of the contribution.

This is the record over which Danbury exults while it mourns. In all the towns of this suffering, enduring, brave little State there is none that presents a grander record than this. From the hour when the shame put on Sumter thrilled her loyal heart, she never faltered in the way once set before her. There can no one now or in the future yet to come, however distant it may grow, lay the finger of reproach upon our dear old mother, or say that in aught pertaining to the welfare of her own or of the land she so dearly loves her loyalty had lacking.

"From out the tears that fall for those who in the shock of battle went the royal road to death she looks with grateful pride upon the work so bravely, so nobly wrought, and lays thereon her earnest benediction."

* Sergt. S. L. White was made captain of Company D. He died of wounds.

† All deserted.

THE SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

This granite shaft, commemorative of the patriot dead of Danbury, stands on the plot of ground made vacant by the removal of the First Congregational church, at the intersection of West with Main Street, and was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies June 27, 1880. It is of Westery granite, and stands, completed, thirty-two feet high. It is a circular column resting upon six pieces consisting of lower base, plinth, mould, die, cap, and column mould. These several parts make a combined height of ten feet. The column is twelve feet high, with a diameter of twenty-six inches; the cap surmounting the column is two feet, and upon this rests the figure of a soldier bearing a flag in his right hand, while against his left side rests a cavalry sword. The figure is five feet eight inches high, and the staff of the flag is two feet higher. On the die on the side facing Main Street is the inscription:

TO OUR BROTHERS,
BELOVED, HONORED, BRAVE, WHO DIED THAT OUR COUNTRY MIGHT LIVE.

On the West Street face is

THE DEFENDERS OF THE UNION.

The other two sides are blank.

The shaft or column is encircled with a band, on which are engraved the names of prominent battles, as follows: Bull Run, Wilderness, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Chancellorsville, Appomattox, Petersburg, Port Hudson.

The whole, except the figure, is of granite. The figure is of Italian marble and was carved in Italy. The price of the whole was four thousand dollars, but the committee secured it for three thousand five hundred dollars, the builders donating five hundred dollars towards the cost. In a western town is a monument nearly like it, which cost seven thousand dollars, and engravings of it show it to be not half so handsome. The people of Danbury are to be congratulated on securing this handsome work of art as a memorial to her noble dead.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN W. BACON.

John W. Bacon, born in Hartford, June 9, 1827; graduated at Trinity College in 1846, taking the first appointment in his class. Soon after his graduation he became principal of an academy in Essex, Conn., which position he resigned to commence the study of law in the office of Hon. Isaac Toucey, in Hartford, remaining with him till the spring of 1848, when he adopted the profession of civil engineering. In this capacity he was employed on the first surveys of the present New York and New England Railroad from Hartford to Willimantic, remaining during the building of that part of the road, taking charge, among other important work, of the present Union Depot and Connecticut River Bridge, at Hartford, and of the heavy rock-cut at Bolton Notch.

After the completion of this work he spent two years on the surveys and construction of the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad, and was then recalled to Hartford to assume the position of superintendent of the Hartford, Providence and Fishkill Railroad, between Providence and Waterbury, also a part of the present New York and New England road. Five years were spent in this capacity, when he went to Western Virginia to take charge of the operation and development of extensive coal-mines and salt-works at West Columbia, on the Ohio River. Here he remained about two years, when he returned to Danbury to become in July, 1859, superintendent and chief engineer of the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad, continuing in the position until Jan. 1, 1877. In the fall of that year he was appointed by Governor Hubbard one of the board of railroad commissioners, which office he still holds.

During his residence in Danbury, Mr. Bacon has been active in the promotion of desirable public improvements. The present water-works were originated and engineered by him in 1860, as is testified to by the inscription on the stone slab at the lower reservoir. At the completion of the works he became one of the board of water commissioners, continuing as such till 1876, since which time he has been secretary of the board. Until quite recent years the borough was without a public hall, and, to supply this long-felt and growing necessity, Mr. Bacon, in 1860, organized a joint-stock company called the "Danbury Public Hall Company," which purchased the old Congregational church, standing where the soldiers' monument now stands, and fitted it up with a pleasant and commodious hall, which well served the public demands until the building of the present opera-house, in 1873.

In 1871 the agricultural society of the town seemed likely to cease to exist, and the organization of the company composing the present Danbury Agricultural Society is due to the efforts of John W. Bacon. Under his direction a stock company was formed, of which he is now president, which has so conducted the affairs of the society as to lead to most conspicuous prosperity and success. Its annual fairs are attended by crowds so immense as to totally eclipse in point of number the attendance at all similar exhibitions, not excepting even that of the State Fair. This unprecedented prosperity, it is believed, is mainly attributable to the inflexible enforcement of the rules excluding the sale of intoxicants, to the exclusion of wheel pools or other gambling devices too often permitted at such exhibitions to absorb the money of the unwary, and to the faithful performance of all that is advertised.

Mr. Bacon has been a director of the savings bank of Danbury since 1863, and for many years a member of the Board of Education.

Dec. 20, 1852, he was married to Miss Caroline E., daughter of Dr. Russel B. Botsford, for many years a leading physician in Danbury. Miss Botsford was granddaughter of Matthew B. Whittlesey, formerly a leading lawyer of the place. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Bacon are Sarah W., Eliza W.,—married May 14, 1879, to G. Mortimer Rundle, son of Samuel H. Rundle, of the firm of Rundle & White,—and John Russel Bacon.

Mr. Bacon is still in vigorous health and in the full possession of matured faculties trained and disciplined by a most varied experience. In him is exemplified the aphorism, "The shallows murmur while the depths are dumb." Quiet and unassuming, one receives the impression that beneath that quiet exterior there is force, energy, and a resolute determination which overcomes all obstacles, and on his countenance is stamped the impress of truthfulness and fidelity. With urbanity of manner is combined great force of character and unyielding determination in the face of difficulties, and a gentleness of manner which shows that great force of will is not inconsistent with kindness and consideration for the feelings of others. Long may he be spared to Danbury to the enjoyment of the love and respect he has so deservedly won!

CHARLES HULL.

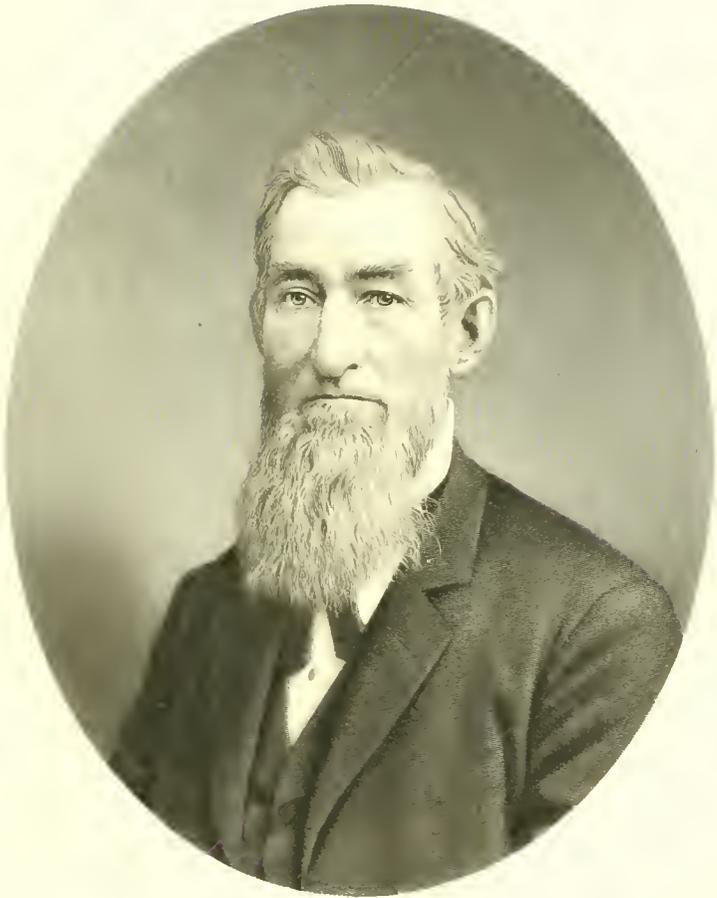

Charles Hull, one of Danbury's most successful merchants and business men, traces his descent through a long line of ancestry from George Hull, a settler in Dorchester, Mass., in 1630.

His paternal grandfather, Chapman Hull, was a farmer in Redding; married Esther Buckley, and had three children,—Morris, Henry C., and George.

The father of the subject of this sketch, Morris Hull, was a man of more than ordinary ability, and at the time of his death, on the threshold of manhood, had already laid the foundation of a prosperous career. His advantages for an early education were limited to the common schools of the vicinity of his boyhood home, but his eager desire for intellectual improvement induced him to devote many of his evenings and much of his intervals of leisure to the acquirement of knowledge, and when yet a very young man was found qualified and engaged to teach school in Danbury.

He began his career as a merchant in Redding, removing thence to Huntington, where he remained two years, and then removed to Manlius Square, in the central part of the State of New York, and was the pioneer merchant of that place. Near this place he built a warehouse on the Erie Canal, and the place was called Hull's Landing after him, which name it still retains. He saw opening before him a bright career as a merchant in the rapidly-growing country, but was permitted to enjoy the prospect but a short time. Going to New York City to replenish his stock of goods, on his way home he visited his grandmother, in Redding, at whose house lay his eldest son stricken with fever. Watching at the bedside of his prostrate son he contracted the malady, malignant typhoid, of which he died, at the age of thirty-two, leaving a widow and six small children dependent almost entirely upon their own exertions for their support. The business and effects of the father and husband in the new country were disposed of, and the following spring the family returned to Redding.

At the age of seven Charles was "put out to work" with a farmer, remaining four years, and as evidence that they were not years of unmixed pleasure or of pampered, nurturing ease, and as indicative of the character of the man whose protégé he was, one incident will suffice: Charles was very fond of the Sunday-school. The one most accessible to him was held at the church, three miles away by road, and more than two miles across lots through the woods. This school he was desirous of attending, and was permitted to do so on condition that he would carry his shoes in his hand until he came to a certain stone wall close by the church, when he might put them on, wear them through school hours and to the stone wall on his return, taking them off at this point and carrying them in his hand home. Charles accepted, performed the conditions, and attended Sunday-school. Four years later, at the age of eleven, he left this home, going to Redding Ridge. Here he found employment with the builder of the Episcopal church (yet standing), placing the stones in the trenches upon which the foundation of that edifice rests, and to receive as compensation the munificent sum of twenty-five cents per day. This Charles supposed was inclusive of board, but upon this point he was anything but agreeably enlightened, while at supper on the day his task was finished, by a conversation between his employer and wife, during which it transpired that he was to be charged for board. By a simple and not unreasonable computation it was estimated that a fine healthy boy would eat twenty-five cents' worth per day, especially as he worked hard, and as his wages amounted to just that amount the account was easily balanced. But the wife—a mother mayhap—the woman always tenderer than man, thought “the boy ought to have something,” and “the boy” was given twenty-five cents. Twenty-five cents for performing all the labor attendant upon the laying of the entire sub-foundation of a church, together with what coarse food he ate while doing the work, was his entire compensation. But we doubt if Napoleon ever received with prouder triumph the crown from conquered potentate than was experienced by Charles when these his first earnings were placed in his hand. This was young Hull's first experience, and the lesson taught was not lost, for in his next engagement, in which his services were given for his board, clothes, and schooling, each item of compensation was fully stipulated in the agreement.

At the age of sixteen Charles went to Norwalk to learn the trade of tinsmith, which he spent four years in acquiring. During these years his evenings, instead of being devoted to recreation and pleasure, as were the evenings of most of the apprentices associated with him, were spent in hard work, attending to customers and in mastering the business, and so proficient did he become that during the last years of his apprenticeship he was given almost entire charge of his employer's business. The concern in which he was employed failed during the great depression of 1836-37, and with but twelve cents in his pocket he turned his steps from New Haven, whither he had gone in pursuit of employment, to Danbury, thirty-six miles distant, which he reached by the way of Redding, the home of his grandmother, having walked the entire distance, forty-three miles. In Danbury he found work at his trade, as foreman in the shop of Mr. A. Rogers.

In the spring of 1843, with a thorough knowledge of his trade, with little capital, but with invincible courage and untiring industry and energy, he began, in a small way, business for himself. For thirty-seven years he has conducted the business of tin-, iron-, and copper-ware manufacturer in Danbury, and kept in connection therewith one of the largest general furnishing stores in the State, and in his career as a business man presents a useful lesson to the poor, struggling but ambitious boy, starting as he did with nothing but willing hands, a stout heart, and a determination to succeed, and by industry, foresight, and economy accumulating a fortune and independent position among men.

While Mr. Hull's business interests have always been large, varied, and engrossing, he has yet found much time to devote to the public. During the war a portion of the time he was selected as agent to look after the interests of his town; he was a director in the Danbury Bank when it was a State institution, and one of the originators of the Paluquoque Bank, of which he has always been a director. He is also director in several of the large manufacturing corporations of Danbury; has been selectman, and for several years past has been town agent.

We relate an incident in Mr. Hull's life which, if it neither “points a moral” nor “adorns a tale,” is at least illustrative of the vicissitudes, the ups and downs, of life. While the subject of this memoir was yet a young barefooted boy working among the farmers of his native town, he one afternoon strolled into Danbury. He had often heard of the palatial residence and aristocratic family of the late Seth Comstock, Esq., and as he sauntered up the main street his attention was attracted by an imposing array of carriages before the mansion. The occasion was the marriage of Mr. Comstock's son, a broker in New York, and was being conducted with much pomp and ceremony. One of the features was a carpet laid from the door to the carriages for the guests to walk on. Charles had never seen anything of the kind before, and it made an impression upon his young mind, and led to indulgence in mental speculations. What those speculations were does not transpire; visionary enough they seemed to him, no doubt, but how they appear viewed retrospectively we leave to be inferred, affording to the reader these data: To-day Mr. Hull owns the ground whereon that mansion stood, together with the fine block of buildings covering it, built by himself.

Mr. Hull was married Nov. 18, 1849, to Miss Hannah E., daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth Ambler, of Danbury. Their children are Harriet E., now Mrs. Alexander McNie, of Winona, Minn., Mary E., now Mrs. Granville W. Hoyt, of Danbury, Frederick A., Thomas A., and Sarah M.

ROGER AVERILL.

Roger Averill was born in Salisbury, in Litchfield Co., Conn., on the 14th day of August, 1809. His father, Nathaniel P. Averill, and his mother, Mary Whittlesey, were natives of Washington, in the same county, and were worthy representatives of the best type of the New England character.

Mr. Averill received his early training on the farm, and was thoroughly impressed with a sense of the value of time and of the importance of personal effort to achieve success. Habits of industry were formed in youth, and continued in practice in after-life. Every facility which the best common schools could furnish was placed within his reach for the acquisition of knowledge and mental improvement; and fortunately for him his native town had within its limits two valuable public libraries, to which he had free access. These proved to be of inestimable advantage in supplying him with the means of acquiring knowledge from books. They were often consulted and much read, and greatly contributed to the proper unfolding and moulding of his character and shaping his subsequent life.

At the age of eighteen years Mr. Averill commenced teaching a common school, and at the same time he began the study of the Latin without the aid of an instructor. Self-reliant and ambitious, he made considerable progress in preparatory studies before he fully decided to take a college course, and his friends had no knowledge of his wishes or his intentions in regard to an education. His older brother, Chester Averill, then a graduate of and a professor in Union College, New York, learning that some progress had been made in preparatory studies, favored his continuance in them, with a view to a full course, and furnished the necessary and appropriate books. Thus encouraged and strengthened, he at once decided to go to college, and applied himself vigorously and wholly to the work of preparation.

In 1828 he became a member of the freshman class in Union College, and graduated with honor and distinction in 1832. He remained at college a resident graduate for a few months, and then returned to Salisbury and opened a select school, which proved to be a complete success. The number of applications for admission was greater than could be accommodated. The people of the town took measures to erect immediately a suitable permanent academy to meet the public wants. Mr. Averill continued as principal of this school for one year, and when it was in a full tide of prosperity he abandoned school-teaching and commenced the study of law.

He entered the office of the Hon. Samuel Church, then a judge of the Supreme Court, who afterwards became chief justice of the State of Connecticut. He was admitted to the bar of Litchfield County in 1836, and at once opened an office for the practice of law in Salisbury. He had immediately his full share of the law business of that and the neighboring towns in that part of the county, and had the confidence and support of his fellow-citizens, who conferred upon him many official trusts and responsibilities.

He represented the town of Salisbury in the General Assembly in 1843. He removed to Danbury in 1849, where he now resides. Since his removal he has held various public and responsible offices. Two years he was judge of the Court of Probate for the district of Danbury, twelve years a trustee of the State Normal School at New Britain, and a member of the State Board of Education for three years. Four years, from 1862 to 1866, he was Lieutenant-Governor of the State of Connecticut. For many years he has been and now is a director in the Danbury National Bank and a trustee of the savings bank of Danbury; also a director and treasurer of the Danbury Mutual Fire Insurance Company from the time of its organization in 1851.

In 1868 he represented the town of Danbury in the Legislature of this State.

He has been twice married. His first wife was Miss Maria D. White, of Danbury, who died in February, 1861, leaving four children,—two daughters and two sons, the latter being members of the legal profession in practice in this State. His present wife was Miss Mary A. Perry, of Southport, Conn.

EDWARD SMITH DAVIS.

Edward Smith Davis comes of Welsh ancestry, who settled in Hartford as early as 1640. His grandfather was captured during the Revolution as one of the prominent citizens of Bloomfield and released on parole. His father, Caleb Smith Davis, was a farmer in Bloomfield, N. J. He served in the war of 1812-14. The sword worn by him as major is still in the possession of his son. His children were Louisa J., Charles M., Joseph H., Edward S., and Mary W., all of whom are living and all save one have families. It is a remarkable fact, worthy of record, that there has been but one death in this family in fifty-eight years. E. S. Davis remained with his father until his twentieth year, receiving academical educational advantages. At this age he went to Boston to engage in the manufacture of paper boxes, the business being at this time in its infancy. He took charge of business already established by his brother-in-law, S. A. Brower, the pioneer paper-box maker in this country, who is still living at an advanced age. The business was in charge of an agent, whom young Davis soon discovered to be conducting it dishonestly, much to Mr. Brower's loss.

In 1852, Mr. Davis came to Danbury, borrowing six dollars to defray the expenses of the journey. He came to engage in his present business of box-making, with Mr. Brower as silent partner. This copartnership lasted one and a half years, at the end of which time Mr. Davis bought Mr. Brower's interest, and has since conducted the business alone.

May, 1855, Mr. Davis was married to Jane H., daughter of Bracy and Hannah Seofield, of Danbury. Their children were Samuel A., Robert W., and Edward S., Jr. Mrs. Davis died in September, 1874. In November, 1875, Mr. Davis married Hannah, daughter of Elijah Gregory, of Danbury. Their children are Herbert R. and Anna L.

Mr. Davis has been elected to the office of Burgess for two terms, and four times to the position of warden of the borough. In 1878 he represented his town in the State Legislature, and again the following year. He has been appointed assignee in the failure of several firms and is trustee and guardian for minor children, holding considerable sums of money in trust.

In 1861 he was a member of the Wooster Guards, which played a prominent part in the late war. At the call of the President the company was called together by its captain, and a vote was taken as to whether they should offer their services to the general government. To their honor be it said, every man in the company voted affirmatively. This decision was at once telegraphed to the Governor, and theirs is the proud record of having been the first company in Connecticut to thus offer their services. They became part of the First Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, and did duty around Washington and participated in the first Bull Run battle. Mr. Davis served during the term for which his company enlisted, and was honorably discharged.

For three years he has been Commander of James E. Moore Post, Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. Davis has done something for the improvement of his adopted town. He built the factory now occupied by him, also the Montgomery factory, besides many other buildings. His own elegant residence he erected on one of the most—in fact, on the most—commanding sites in the town, overlooking, as it does, the entire borough of Danbury, besides extensive prospects in every direction.

JOHN F. BEARD.

John F. Beard was born March 6, 1803, in Trumbull, Fairfield Co., Conn. His grandfather, James Beard, a native of Derby, New Haven Co., Conn., was a lawyer by profession, and for many years a judge of the County Court. He was married to Miss Hollbrook, of Derby, and became the father of seven children, among whom was Dr. Daniel Beard, father of the subject of this memoir. He, also, was a native of Derby; was educated to the medical profession, and practiced during his lifetime both as a physician and surgeon. He was appointed military surgeon of the troops stationed at Bridgeport under command of Gen. Foote, and served during the war of 1812-14. He was an enthusiast in his profession, a too close application to which terminated his career Oct. 26, 1815, when but forty-eight. He was married early in life to Miss Betsey, daughter of Dr. Spencer and Betsey (Frink) Fields, of Oakham, Mass., and their children were: Spencer F., Algernon E., John F., Elizabeth F., Catherine J., Isabella M., William O., and Mary A.

At his father's death John was but eleven years old, and, the family being poor, he was obliged to rely almost wholly upon his own abilities for his support. For the first two and a half years he found a home with an uncle, whom he assisted in the management of his farm, receiving as pay for his services his board and clothing. From this time until his marriage, at the age of twenty-three, he worked at different kinds of labor, principally farming, laying up but little in the way of money, but adding much in the way of experience to the little stock of knowledge which he had managed to acquire during a few years of desultory attendance at the district school. For two years after his marriage he labored as a farm-hand, leaving it to engage in hat-manufacturing, which he followed for about seven years, when he moved on the farm, then known as "Hearthstone Hill," where he has ever since resided. His wife was Miss Lois A., daughter of Hiram Wildman, of Danbury, and their children were: Edwin W. (deceased), William S. (deceased), Martha M. (now Mrs. Somers, living in Galesburg, Ill.), John P. (resident of Danbury), Mary A. (now Mrs. S. C. Holley, Danbury), and James B. (resident of Council Bluffs, Iowa).

Mr. Beard's principal business has been that of farming, but he has always taken an active interest in public matters of his town, and has often been called to the position of selectman and several times elected justice of the peace.

When the Danbury and Norwalk Railroad was projected, to further the enterprise Mr. Beard took the contract to build it entire. Owing to the immense amount of work of various kinds involved in the construction of a railroad, he found it necessary to take partners, in order that responsible heads might push the different departments of the work—bridge-building, cutting, filling, etc.—at one and the same time, and although, financially, the enterprise was a losing one, which it is but justice to Mr. Beard to say was attributed to the want of integrity on the part of those he formed connections with to further the work, yet he had the satisfaction of handing over to the company the road in complete running order to the driving of the last bolt. This road has given communication with the outer world to Danbury, which before its construction was an isolated inland town, and perhaps no one thing has contributed more to the development of the place. Mr. Beard was one of the originators of the Danbury Agricultural Society, the most prosperous society of the kind in the State, and for nine years its president. He was for two years a member of the State Board of Agriculture. In 1834 he joined the First Congregational Church of Danbury, and the year following was made a deacon in the same, in which capacity he has acted till the present time, and for ten consecutive years was superintendent of its Sabbath-school. His wife and daughters, also, are members of the same church.

In politics, Mr. Beard has been a Whig, and since the formation of the Republican party has affiliated with it.

JAMES WHITE NICHOLS.

James White Nichols, son of Ebenezer Nichols and descendant of Samuel Nichols, a resident of Woodbury in 1660, was born Oct. 15, 1809, in Danbury, in the room in which he died Sept. 17, 1875.

His father was a farmer on the old Nichols farm, occupying the house in which his son lived his entire lifetime about the time of his first marriage. The Nichols family were extensive landholders in the early days of Danbury.

James W. Nichols was not a liberally educated man, although well up in the English branches, and when a young man taught school several terms in Danbury. He had no other occupation than farming. The delicate state of his health, however, permitting him to perform only the lighter work of his calling, he devoted much of his time to writing and other literary pursuits, for which he had a decided predilection. He was married July 6, 1845, to Miss Phebe Hawley, of Danbury, who died Jan. 26, 1869. Mr. Nichols was married the second time to Miss Henrietta S., daughter of Daniel B. and Zemiah (Hays) Burton, of Woodbury. The issue of this union was a son, James H., born March 27, 1871.

From an article from the pen of H. B. Wildman, schoolmate of deceased, published soon after Mr. Nichols' death, we make the following extracts: . . . "Mr. Nichols was a rare man, highly esteemed by his friends and neighbors, who often bestowed upon him offices of honor and trust. He had always a genial smile and kindly word for everybody. He was both poet and artist, and his song was like the rippling of a summer stream or like the murmur of the evening zephyrs that fanned through the shades of his beloved 'Oak Cottage' home. Contented in his situation, he lived and breathed an atmosphere purely his own. He cared not for the ambitious world around him, nor for the literary aspirants quarreling and toiling for fame and glory." Mr. Nichols wrote some of the sweetest poetry that ever emanated from unpretentious bard, and it is matter of regret to us that we are not in timely receipt of specimens promised for this sketch, that they might become inscribed upon the page of enduring history.

"He was a faithful member of the Methodist Church, a devout worshiper and a true Christian, and was ready and willing to go when the summons came. His patience and fortitude during his severe and painful illness was most conspicuous; during all that trying time he was never known to make the slightest murmur of uneasiness or impatience." . . .

CHAPTER XXV.

DARIEN.

Geographical—Topographical—Names of Pioneers—Revolutionary Incident—The Capture of the Rev. Dr. Mather—Poetical Narrative—Old Documents—A Distribution Bill of 1724, etc.—Pioneer Merchants—The First Grist-Mill—The Pioneer Post-office.

DARIEN is located in the southwestern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by New Canaan; on the east by Norwalk; on the south by Long Island Sound; on the west by Stamford. The soil of the town is a rich, gravelly loam. The surface is undulating.

The town was settled contemporaneously with Stamford, of which it originally formed a part. The following is believed to be a list of the pioneers who located in this town, taken from Huntington's "History of Stamford:"

Aaron Andrews, or Andreas, bought land here in 1657, with Garret Rivis. He is called a Dutchman. The name Andrews and Andrus occurs often, and also interchangeably. Jeremiah Andrews is said to be of Bedford after 1687.

John Austin was one of the eleven Greenwich men who in 1656 acknowledged allegiance to the New Haven jurisdiction, to constitute part of the Stamford colony. The name is usually spelled Astin and Asten on the records. A son of his, Samuel, died here in 1657, the year, also, of his own death. His inventory, taken by Richard Law and Angell Husted, Sept. 5, 1657, was presented in court in Stamford by his widow "Katherine Astine," May 13, 1658. It amounted to £78 8s. 1d. Several of this name are reported on the land records during the first century of the town.

Francis Brown was here early. Savage tells us that he had been a servant of Henry Wolcott, of Windsor, and bought out the rest of his time in 1649 and was a small trader in 1651, and that he bought and sold lands in Farmington in 1656. He seems to have been a pertinacious stickler for the largest liberty to the individual. In 1662 he headed a petition to the General Court at New Haven respecting the franchise of all the citizens, respecting equalizing the rates of the several colonies then under the jurisdiction of New Haven, and respecting the colony school. The court rather curtly gave him to understand that "whatever liberties or privileges our laws do allow them, that they should have." He then desires a special court in Stamford for the settlement of these questions. In 1663 he is sworn a constable for the town of Stamford in the General Court of Connecticut, and in 1665, 1667, and 1669 he represented the town in the General Assembly. He married, here, Martha, widow of John Chapman, and had one son, Joseph, to whom he gave land in 1683. In 1686 he is reported in a gift of land to his son Joseph as now of Rye.

John Dibble died in 1646, and his widow married, the next year, William Graves, of Stamford. The two sons, Samuel and Zachariah Dibble, probably came with their father. Zachariah married, May 10, 1666, Sarah Waterbury, and had a son, Zachary, born in 1667. His wife obtained a divorce in 1672, and afterwards married Nicholas Webster.

John Green, who lost his wife Mary here in 1657. He was declared freeman of the Connecticut colony in 1662, and represented the town in 1669. Joseph Green mortgaged lands here, in 1651, to Thomas Morehouse, and William Green appears on the records as landholder in 1650. His land was next to Daniel Scofield.

William Hill was here in 1650.

Francis Holmes was a resident here 1618, as appears from the testimony against Robert Penoyer. His will, on record at Fairfield, dated Sept. 6, 1671, makes mention of his wife, Ann, and his children, Stephen, John, Richard, and Ann, wife of Samuel Dean. Stephen Holmes has lands assigned him by the town in 1667. Richard Holmes witnesses here June 17, 1658, the will of Henry Akerley. The name of John Holmes is on the land records often before 1660.

Cornelius Jones was evidently here in 1657. He married the widow of Thomas Hyat, or Hyatt, as is evident from the receipts which three of Thomas Hoyt's children gave him. On Dec. 17, 1657, there is a record made of the age of his children, probably by a former wife. There are six of them, aged, respectively, eleven, ten, eight, six, and three years, but the margin on which the names are written is gone. His will, found at Fairfield, is dated June 2, 1690, and mentions his son Joseph and his grandchild Ruth "Hyat," explaining also why he does not make bequeaths to his daughter, Mary Hyat.

Nicholas Knapp had land here in 1619, as appears from the land-records. His wife, Eleanor, died Aug. 16, 1658. Savage thinks he may have come in the fleet with Winthrop and Saltonstall in 1630. His children were Jonathan, born Dec. 27, 1631; Timothy, Dec. 14, 1632; Joshua, Jan. 5, 1635; Caleb, Jan. 20, 1637; Sarah, Jan. 5, 1639; Ruth, Jan. 6, 1641; Hannah, March 6, 1643. After coming to Stamford he had probably Moses and Lydia. After the death of his wife, Eleanor, he married, March 9, 1659, Unity, widow of Peter Brown, who had also been the widow of Clement Buxton. He died in April, 1670, and his will, now in the Probate records of Fairfield, dated the 15th of that month, names the children in the following order: Moses, Timothy, Caleb, Sarah Disbrow, Hannah, Lidea, Ruth, and Sarah and Unica Buxton, daughters of Clement.

Edmund Lockwood, Oct. 14, 1650, sold all his right and title in Stamford to Ann Akerley. How long he had been here at that date does not appear. He was probably a son of Edmund, of Cambridge. His children were: John, Daniel, Edmund, Mary, and Abigail. Under date of March 24, 1698-99, the town grants the children of Edmund Lockwood, deceased, liberty to take up as much land for their father's estate in the second "lotment" at Runkinheig as he had in the first division there, "his lotment in the first division being not to be found." He died here Jan. 31, 1692, as appears from inventory of his estate now on record (book 1st, page 119), amounting to three hundred and five pounds. This name has been numerous and prominent here to the present day. It now stands next to the Scofield name in numbers.

Jonathan Lockwood was here in 1659, as appears from his testimony in court, at Fairfield, February 24th of that year. He is reported as then twenty-four or twenty-five years of age. This corresponds with the presumption that he was son of Robert Lockwood, of Fairfield, and that he is the son born in Watertown, Sept. 10, 1634. His children were Jonathan, Robert, Gershom, Joseph, and John. He sold his estate here in 1665, and was afterwards a prominent citizen of Greenwich, representing that town in the State Legislature for four years.

Joseph Lockwood went, in 1644, to Poundridge, where he had sons,—Joseph, James, Solomon, Israel, Reuben, and Nathaniel. His wife was Hannah, daughter of Solomon Close. His oldest son, Joseph, had two sons,—Major Ebenezer, of Poundridge, who lived until 1821 and was the father of the Hon. Ezra and Horatio Lockwood; and Joseph had also sons, among whose descendants are the Hon. Albert, of Sing Sing, N. Y., and Gen. Munson Lockwood, of White Plains.

Thomas Lyon was here as landholder in 1650, as appears from land-records of Daniel Scofield.

Joseph Mead, of Stamford, sells his house and land to John and Daniel Weed. From his testimony given in court at New Haven in 1660 it appears that he was born in 1630. He went to Greenwich, which town he represented in the Connecticut Legislature from 1669 to 1671.

Jonathan Mead sells land in 1650, and in 1659 also sells land to Henry Smith.

Obadiah Seeley was early a resident here, as several entries in the records show. In 1651 he acknowledged payment of a debt due him from John Larson. He died in 1667, and his inventory, taken in 1665 by William Newman and Robert Usher, mentions his widow, Mary, and his sons, Obadiah, Cornelius, and Jonas. His widow, Mary, had been the widow also of John Miller, of Stamford. He was probably a son of Robert Seeley, of Watertown, who settled afterwards in Wethersfield and became quite famous as a lieutenant in the Pequot war, and still later of the New Haven force under Sedgwick and Leverett against the New Netherlands. This name has been well represented in all its generations in the town.

Thomas Stevens died here in 1658. He had been a landholder as early as 1649, as appears from the land-records. His will and inventory of estate are on record, dated Nov. 30, 1658. His property was bequeathed to his wife for the children; but if she should marry, she was to have her third and the rest to be divided,—the oldest son, if deserving and of godly carriage, to have a double portion; if not, to share equally with the rest.

John Waterbury came here soon after the settlement, and had land recorded to him in 1650. He died in 1658. He had lands here as early as 1650, as appears from assignment of lands of that date. His inventory bears date in April, 1659, amounting to £185 12s. His sons were John, Jonathan, and David, and possibly still others. Those three make over to their father-in-law, Joseph Garnsey, in 1674, a parcel of land then in possession of John Miller. His widow had married Joseph Garnsey, in May, 1661, when she attested his will. This is one of the most numerous, as well as respectable of the Stamford names, down to the present day.

Richard Webb probably came to Stamford from Norwalk about 1654. The "Mill" in Norwalk was that year abandoned as worthless, and we find Mr. Webb here, soon after, engaged in the Stamford "Mill." He was probably a son of Richard, of Norwalk, though he is not mentioned in his father's will, of date 1655. Mr. Webb was a man of some estate and note, representing the town in the Connecticut General Court as early as 1667. The will of Richard Webb, Sen., of Stamford, is on record in Fairfield, having date 7, 1, 1675-76, and the death of Richard Webb is on our town records as occurring March 15, 1675-76, eight days after the will. The inventory of his estate bears date April 29, 1676. His legatees were his wife, Margery; Joseph, who took the mill in Stamford, but who was to run it jointly with the widow; Richard, who had the uplands at Wescott's; Joshua, who took lands in Newfield, and the tools, which were in Huntington, L. I.; Caleb and Samuel, whose legacy was to be in the care of their mother; and Sarah. In a deposition of Richard Webb, made Nov. 22, 1667, he is said to be "aged forty-four years or thereabout." Joseph Webb died here in 1684, leaving children,—Joseph, Mary, Hannah, Sarah, and Margery. His inventory, dated March 8, 1684, makes his wife's name Hannah. This name is among the most numerous and reputable names on the Stamford list.

REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENT.

During the Revolution a large number of the inhabitants of this district were Tories. Dr. Moses Mather was preaching in the Congregational church on Sunday, July 22, 1781, when a party of Tories completely surrounded the church and took most of the people prisoners, only a few young men escaping through the windows. Two shots were fired at these; but they dared fire no more, as three guns was the well-known signal of alarm in this part of the country. All the males were then tied two and two and led out of the church, with the venerable Dr. Mather at their head. The Tories also carried off some forty horses belonging to the congregation which had assembled, and marched the prisoners to the Sound shore, where they were embarked for Lloyd's Neck, on Long Island. From thence they were taken to New York and confined in the Provost prison, where they underwent the most severe treatment. The following contains a portion of a poem entitled

"A Poetical Relation of the Capture of the Congregation at Middlesex, with an Account of their Sufferings, &c., while in captivity; by Peter St. John.

"Now to relate 'tis my intent
A sad and tragical event.
On what I write you may rely,
As I've the history lying by.
July the twenty-second day,
Where Christians meet to sing and pray,
In seventeen hundred and eighty-one,
An horrid action was begun.
While to the Lord they sing and pray,
The Tories, who in ambush lay,
Beset the house with brazen face;
At Middlesex it was the place.
A guard was placed the house before,
Likewise behind and at each door.
Then, void of shame, those men of sin
The sacred temple entered in.
The Rev. Mather closed his book:
How did the congregation look?
The reverend priest, the man of God,
Severely felt the smarting rod,—
Not by a whip do I pretend,
But by abuses from those friends.
How must he feel to see his sheep
Thus worried, whilst they silence keep!
Those demons plundered what they could,
Either in silver or in gold.
The silver buckles, which we use
Both at the knees and on the shoes,
These caitiffs took them; in their rage
Had no respect for sex or age.
And as they all were searching round,
They several silver watches found.
They who were placed as guards without,
Like raging devils ranged about,
Took forty horses to the shore,—
Not many either less or more,—
With bridles, saddles, pillions, on:
In a few minutes all was done.
The men which hence they took away,
Upon this sacred awful day,
Was forty-eight, besides two more
They chanced to find upon the shore.
When to the shore they were conveyed,
The orders given they obeyed.
On board the shipping they were sent,
But greatly feared the sad event,

As well they might, because they knew
 Their captors were the Devil's crew,
 They hoisted sail, the Sound they cross'd,
 And near Lloyd's Neck they anchored first.
 Then every man must tell his name;
 A list they took, and kept the same.
 Now twenty-four of fifty men
 Were ordered home again;
 The twenty-six who stay'd behind,
 Most cruelly were they confined;
 On board the brig were ordered quick,
 And were confined beneath the deck.—
 A nasty hole, with filth besmear'd,—
 But 'twas no more than what they fear'd.

* * * * *
 But to return whence I left off,
 They at our misery made a scoff,—
 Like raging devils tore about,
 Swearing they'd tear our vitals out;
 That they'd no quarter ever give,
 Nor let a cursed rebel live;
 But would their joints in pieces cut;
 Then round the deck like devils strut.
 Oh, human nature, how deprav'd!
 Can any mortal e'er be sav'd,
 So void of good, so full of evil,
 And wholly bent to serve the Devil?
 July the four and twentieth day,
 We all were sent to Oyster Bay.

* * * * *
 We to the ferry came at last,
 View'd by spectators as we past:
 The gazing rabble, Tory throng,
 Would curse us as we passed along.
 Ten thousand curses round us ring;
 But some would laugh, and some would sneer,
 And some would grin, and some would leer.
 A mixed mob, a medley crew,
 I guess, as e'er the Devil knew.
 To the provost we then were haul'd,
 Though we of war were prisoners call'd;
 Our irons now were ordered off,—
 The standers-by would swear and scoff.
 But oh, what company we found!
 With great surprise we looked around!
 I must conclude that in this place
 We found the worst of Adam's race;
 Thieves, murderers, and pickpockets too,
 And everything that's bad they do.
 One of our men found, to his cost,
 Three pounds of York money he had lost,—
 His pockets picked, I guess, before
 We had been there one single hour.

* * * * *
 Full eighteen days, or something more,
 We fairly were exchange'd before;
 Of the exchange they let us know,
 Or from that place of bondage go,
 That of the number twenty-five,
 But just nineteen were left alive;
 Four days before December's gone.
 In seventeen hundred eighty-one."

EARLY MERCHANTS, Etc.

The first stores in this town were kept at " Ring's End," and among the first merchants are mentioned the names of Nathaniel Clock, Bell & Waterbury, and Jones & Jarvis.

The first merchant at Darien was Rufus Scofield. The first merchant at Nosota was one Gorham,

The first grist-mill was built by Richard Scofield, and occupied the site of the mill now owned by Benjamin Fitch.

The first postmaster was Rufus Bell, in 1814. There was but one post-office in the town, and that was located in a building which stood nearly opposite the present parsonage of the Congregational church.

Among the first physicians were Warren Percival and Dr. Richmond. The present physicians are Samuel Sands and R. L. Bohannan.

CHAPTER XXVI.

DARIEN (Continued).

ECCLESIASTICAL, CIVIL, AND MILITARY HISTORY.

Congregational Church—Presbyterian Church—St. Luke's Church—Methodist Episcopal Church—Incorporation of the Parish—Organization of the town—Selectmen from 1820 to 1881—List of Town Clerks—Representatives from 1820 to 1880—Darien in the War of the Rebellion—List of Soldiers.

How early separate religious services were held in this town no existing records show. Probably for years before Dr. Mather was settled here, in 1744, there had been preaching, with more or less regularity.

At a society meeting, held in the first society of Stamford, Dec. 20, 1733, by vote "the society agree that those particular persons that pay to the minister at Five-Mile River shall be discharged from paying their proportion of Mr. Wright's rate during the term of three months, provided they bring sufficient proof to the society's committee that they pay as much to the minister there as their proportion to Mr. Wright for the time above said."

In 1734 forty-six planters on the west side of Norwalk River petition for a new society. The next notice taken of this project, as far as records show, was simultaneously in Stamford and at the May session of the Legislature, in 1736. Sixty-nine petitions, representing eighty families, and a list of five thousand eight hundred and eighty pounds, made a formal request to be incorporated as an ecclesiastical society by themselves. The petition was negatived, only to be renewed in October of the same year by fifty-six men. The urgency of the petitioners led to the appointment of a special committee to examine their claims. In May, 1737, the committee report favorably, assigning as proper boundaries of the society the Five-Mile River on the east and the Noroton on the west. In October of this year the act of incorporation was passed. It is curious to note upon what frail boundaries they relied. The moment they leave the rivers, which they might presume to be permanent, they fix upon the most perishable objects, in the most indeterminate of localities, to answer as permanent bounds for the society. On the west side of the parish, to separate it from the older society of Stamford, they define, as the westernmost limits of Middlesex, "an old chimney about two and a half miles east of the Stamford meeting-house," and "so to run a strait line midway between Stephen Bishop's house and David Dibble's house," and thence to where the Noroton crosses the Canaan line. But this separation was not to be a peaceable one. Though no blood seems to have been shed in the struggle, there were many earnest and clamorous appeals and remonstrances between the parishes themselves and between the parishes and the Legislature; so that the peaceful settlement of the Middlesex seceders was not accomplished before the summer of 1741, about a dozen years after the need of such a society was felt and its incorporation demanded.

Eleven somewhat lengthy documents now on file in the State library at Hartford testify to the great interest shown in both the old and the new parishes in the proposed division. These papers indicate the most obstinate determination on the part of the first society not to allow any further alienation of any part of their ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Assuming a sort of indefeasible right to the territory, the society, by a unanimous vote of all excepting the seceding portion, declared that they would "not grant to the people at the east end of the town the liberty of a society apart." They also appointed Capt. Jonathan Hoyt and Mr. Jonathan Maltby as special agents to the Legislature to report the reasons of the town against forming the new society. But the seceders at length prevailed.

The names of the petitioners to the "Five-Mile river petition," dated the second Thursday of October, 1736, are Thomas Reed, Edmond Waring, Jonathan Cristy, Jonathan Bates, Robert Mills, John Reed, Joshua Scofield, Isaac Bishop, Jonathan Bell, Joshua Morehouse, John Bates, Jonathan Petit, David Selleck, Nathaniel Bates, Edmond Waring, Jr., Joseph Pengban, Thomas Reed, Jr., John Petit, Joseph Whiting, John Reed, Jr., James Slason, Jr., David Bates, Elias Reed, John Raymond, Nathaniel Selleck, David Scofield, Samuel Richards, Joseph Waterbury, Jonas Weed, Deliverance Slason, Charles Weed, Theophilus Bishop, John Andrus, Nathaniel How, John Dean, David Waterbury, Ebenezer Bishop, Zachariah Dibble, Thomas Bishop, Samuel Bryan, Nathan Sturgis, Benjamin Dibble, David Slason, David Dibble, Nathan Selleck, Nathan Waring, Samuel Brinswade, Ebenezer Green, John Bolt, Jacob Waring, John Waring, Daniel Reed, Abraham Raymond, Comfort Raymond, Isaac Wood, and Samuel Reed.

The first record of a society's meeting in Middlesex bears date June 15, 1789. Ensign Nathan Bell was its moderator, and Joshua Morehouse was appointed society's clerk. The meeting was held at the house of John Bates. At an adjourned meeting held June 21st, Thomas Reed, Jonathan Bates, Daniel Reed, Isaac Bishop, Jonathan Selleck, Samuel Reed, and Ensign Jonathan Bell were appointed a committee to "caryon" the building of the "metting-hous." They were instructed to make the house fifty feet long, thirty feet wide, and twenty feet post.

They then voted a tax to meet the expenses of the building, and to pay Mr. Buckingham "for His preaching the time agreed." Jonathan Weed was appointed collector. The society records from this date to that of the organization of the church show that the following ministers labored here either simply as supplies or as candidates: Rev. Mr. Birdseye, Gideon Mills, Ebenezer Mills, David Judson, Mr. Ells, and Mather. At a meeting held Dec. 11, 1741, the society voted, by a large majority,—forty-two to four,—to settle Mr. Judson. But to give every man in the society an opportunity to vote, Mr. Morehouse, the clerk, was ordered to carry a paper with the vote "about and read the same to those persons that belong to said society which were not at said meeting that they might have opportunity to subscribe to the same."

At their meeting Sept. 1, 1742, while Mr. Mather was still preaching as a candidate for settlement, we find this vote: "Ye Society by major vote granted to ye Rev. Mr. Right (Wright) to preach in any part of Middlesex parish on any needful occasion as often as he shall see fit."

A record of the doings of this society in 1747 respecting the seating of the meeting-house explains more fully the process of this custom than any record now existing of any other parish in town, and is worth preserving as a curiosity of the times. Besides, it indicates some of the principal men of that day in this part of the town.

By the first vote the society decided to seat the meeting by a committee.

"2. pr vote ye society a lowed ye first pew to be ye hiest in Dignity.

"3. pr vote the 2 pew to be 2 hiest in Dignity.

"4. pr vote, the fore seat allowed to be the 3 hiest in Dignity.

"14. pr vote Mr. David Tuttle, Mr. Thos. Reed, Cpn. John Raiment, Mr. Edmann Wearing, Mr. Jona. Bates, Mr. Nathan Selbeck, Mr. James Slason, and Mr. Jona. Bell all to set in ye fore pew.

"15. and Decon Bishop also by ye vote of ye society to set in his seat be fore ye pulpit.

"16. pr vote, the Society Impowored the comety to seat ye remainder of ye house a cordin to their own discretion."

The above record is of date Aug. 9, 1747, and the next meeting of the society was held "gonewary ye 28th, 1747—48." A record of this meeting is also so characteristic of the times as to justify insertion:

"Voted yt Mr. Jona Bell or any other man a greed up on to sing or tune ye salm in his absence in times of puldickt worship may tune it in ye old way or new which suits you best. vote yt Elijah Jones shall tuen ye salms in times of worship in Mr. Bell's absence. Vote yt Left. Jona. Selbeck shall Reed the salms in Mr. Bell's absence."

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

This new organization was made Nov. 4, 1863. The following list of members were from the First Congregational Church in Stamford: Isaac Weed, Benjamin Weed, Rufus Weed, Mrs. Sally Weed, Mrs. Mary Weed, Mrs. Phebe Weed, Mrs. Hannah Weed, Miss Mary Weed, Miss Rebecca Weed, Mrs. Sarah W. Crissey, Mrs. Abigail W. Bishop. The following were from the First Presbyterian Church in Stamford: William A. Cummings and his wife, Louisa Cummings. Mrs. Anna E. Ballard and Mrs. Martha Harris, from First Presbyterian Church, New York City, Lewis E. Clock and his wife Eliza, Miss Eliza Clock, and Mrs. Hannah Waterbury, from the Congregational Church of Darien; and Miss Fanny Kennedy, from the Methodist Episcopal Church of Stamford.

This church commenced worshiping in the chapel which had been built here a quarter of a century ago as a union chapel for all evangelical denominations. The present church edifice was dedicated May 31, 1866. James William Coleman was pastor in 1868, and since he left there has been no settled pastor.

ST. LUKES CHURCH.

Services of the Episcopal Church were held here in 1854 by the Rev. W. H. C. Robertson, an English gentleman.

The parish was organized in August, 1855, with James E. Johnson senior warden, and N. A. Scofield junior warden. The vestry was composed of John W. Waterbury, E. A. Weed, and Isaac H. Clock.

The corner-stone of the church edifice was laid Aug. 11, 1855, by Rev. Mr. T. Todd, of Stamford, and the church was consecrated by Bishop Williams, March 27, 1863.

The rectors of the church have been as follows: W. H. C. Robertson, George D. Johnson, and Louis H. French.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Meetings were held by this denomination as early as 1788, as evidenced by the certificates of that date which Samuel Quinton Talbot gave to Joseph Waring, Jr., Gershom Raymond, and Edward Raymond. Jesse Waring and Ezra Slason also received similar certificates in the same year from Cornelius Cook. These certificates were to the effect that the above-named were "members of the Methodist Congregation." During the next six years the following ministers issued similar certificates to relieve the bearers from paying their ministerial rates to the Congregational Church: Jesse Lee, Daniel Smith, and John Clark. The number of certificates issued were nine.

The pastors of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as far back as we can secure information, have been George L. Fuller, C. E. Miller, Linsley Parker, E. — Walt, G. B. Stillman, G. B. Dusenberric, J. T. Lauglois, present pastor.

THE FRIENDS.

This sect at one time held services in this town, and in 1811 erected a house of worship. The church has, however, long since been abandoned.

FITCH'S HOME FOR SOLDIERS.

This institution was chartered in 1864 to provide for the disabled soldiers of the Twelfth Senatorial District of the State. It takes its name from its founder, Benjamin Fitch, Esq., of Darien, who contributed towards its endowment and support about one hundred thousand dollars. It was found that it was not needed for disabled soldiers, and in February, 1865, the trustees — Hon. Morgan Morgans, Joseph B. Hoyt, and Charles Starr, of Stamford; William A. Cummings and Charles Brown, of Darien; E. C. Bissel, of Norwalk; Stephen Hoyt, of New Canaan; M. B. Pardee, M.D., of South Norwalk; Charles Marvin, of Wilton; and P. Button, of Greenwich — decided to open here a home and school for the orphan and destitute children of fallen or disabled soldiers. Mr. Fitch, in addition to the building used for the ordinary purposes of such an institution, gave to the home a fine brick building for a library, and a gallery of paintings and statuary.

When no longer needed for the soldiers or soldiers' children of the Twelfth Senatorial District of the State, the funds of the home are devoted, by the charter, "to the support of aged and infirm persons of said district, and to the support and education of orphan children of said district." The charter expired in 1878.

SELECTMEN FROM 1820-1881.

The following is a list of selectmen from the organization of the town to the present time:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

HON. CHARLES BROWN.

(Charles Brown, son of Dr. and Elizabeth (Leeds) Brown, was born on the same farm in Darien, Conn., where he now resides, Dec. 26, 1809. His father died when Charles was about three years old, and he remained with his mother until he was sixteen years of age, diligently availing himself of the meagre opportunities a country lad enjoyed for acquiring an education, which were summed up in three months' attendance (or less) at the winter's term of district school during the year. When sixteen he went to New York, and was duly apprenticed, in the solemn manner of those days, to one Samuel Webster, a ship-joiner. Staying with him until he was of age, and thoroughly familiarizing himself with his trade, he shortly afterwards went into business on his own account and prospered. Continuing steadily at work, personally supervising and attending to his labor, Mr. Brown remained in New York until he was forty-five years old, when, tiring of the city, and having accumulated sufficient property to allow him to take some leisure, he retired from business, and, returning to Darien, purchased the old homestead of sixty-five acres, and has since resided there, building his present cheerful residence in 1851. He has added to the old home by purchase, and has now the satisfaction of owning a typical New England farm, where beauty, thrift, and neatness vie with each other for supremacy.

Mr. Brown is pleasant and social, and enjoys to a great extent the confidence of his fellow-townsmen. He has held various town offices, and has been selectman for ten or twelve years. He also represented Darien in the State Legislature in 1858, 1860, and 1877. Mr. Brown in his early life was what was known as a "Henry Clay" Whig, and since 1856 has acted with the Republican party, deeming liberty the inalienable right of every human being.

Mr. Brown married, Sept. 29, 1833, Miss Ann E. Conkling, of New York. She died Feb. 23, 1856. Their children were Ann A. (Mrs. Joseph E. Morehouse) and Helen A. (deceased). May 27, 1857, Mr. Brown married Miss Caroline Burt, of Orange Co., N. Y. She died Oct. 13, 1872. Their only child, Jane B., married Charles E. Vail, and now resides in Stamford. Mr. Brown was married, Oct. 16, 1868, to Ella A. Russell, of New York City. Mr. and Mrs. Morehouse reside with Mr. Brown, with their three children,—Charles W., Helen B., and Henry B.

Mr. Brown is a man of marked probity of character, intelligent and high-minded, of good executive ability, and is justly esteemed one of Darien's most progressive citizens, ever active in everything tending to elevate, improve, or educate humanity.

CHAPTER XXVII.

EASTON is located near the centre of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Redding and Newtown; on the east by Monroe and Trumbull; on the south by Fairfield; on the west by Weston and Redding. Its surface is moderately hilly, and its soil fertile.

The first settlements in this town were made in about the year 1757, by inhabitants of Fairfield. Among the early settlers were:

Samuel Staples, the founder of the free academy which bears his name, died in 1797, about four years after the founding of the school, aged seventy-seven years; Rev. REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENT.

When the British went to Danbury a small boy named Miles Merwin was discovered by them, and a young officer caught him and threatened to take him away with them. An older officer told him to let him go, and he scampered off. This was while Moses Bun, an old Tory, was yoking up Samuel Wakeman's oxen for the British to take away: they took them away. Jack, slave of Samuel Wakeman, was going to the black-smith's shop to get a horse shod and met the advanced guard, who chased him into the woods, where the darkey got away and stayed in the woods several days before he could be induced to come out.

Moses Bun's house had a trap-door in his floor, so that the Tories or regulars could drop into the cellar in case of being in danger.

Gould Dimon, who was a neutral, was looked up to make him join the army; he heard of it, and went and secreted himself in an old house, now demolished. Dr. Uriah Patrick lived there last. He was tracked by heavy frost to the house, but secreted himself between a large plate of wood and the chimney. The place was known and several balls were fired into the plate, and at last he was dragged out and taken off. The house was torn down about forty years ago, and the balls were found in the plate.

REMARKABLE PHENOMENON.

The following account of a remarkable phenomenon which occurred in this town is taken from the Connecticut Journal, under date Dec. 24, 1807:

"On Monday, the 14th inst., at about the break of day or a little after, the weather being moderate and calm, and the atmosphere somewhat cloudy and foggy, a meteor or fire-ball passing from a northern point exploded over the western part of this State with a tremendous report. At the same time several pieces of stony substance fell to the earth in Fairfield County. One mass was driven against a rock and dashed in small pieces, a peck of which remained on the spot. About three miles distant, in the town of Weston (now Easton), another large piece fell upon the earth, of which a mass of about thirty pounds' weight remains entire, and was exhibited the same day at town-meeting. A small mass has been sent to Yale College and examined by a number of gentlemen. It was immediately perceived by Professor Silliman to contain a metal, and on presenting it to a magnet a powerful attraction proved it to be iron. This is, we believe, the first instance in the United States in which the substance of this species of meteor has been found on the earth, though it has often been found in Europe. Fortunately, the facts respecting this wonderful phenomenon are capable of being ascertained and verified by precision, and an investigation will, we understand, be commenced for the purpose. We request gentlemen who may have observed it, in distant parts of the State, to favor the public with their observations. It is desirable to ascertain the course or direction of the meteor, the point of compass in which it appeared in different places, the general appearance and velocity, the manner of its explosion, and the time between the explosion and the report."

THE STAPLES ACADEMY.

This academy, which for more than three-quarters of a century has ranked among the leading educational institutions in New England, was founded by Samuel Staples in 1798. Under date of Oct. 16, 1798, the following advertisement appeared in the American Telegraph, published at Newfield (now Bridgeport):

"STAPLE'S FREE SCHOOL is now opened in WESTON (now Easton) under the care and inspection of James Burnett, A. B., A. M., GIDEON WHEELER. In this school are taught the first rudiments of the English Language, English Grammar, Writing, the Latin and Greek Languages, Oratory, Geography, Mathematics, &c. Strict attention paid to the deportment and morals of children and youth.

"Price of instruction, one dollar per quarter. The poor are instructed gratis. Board to be had in good families as cheap as in any of the neighboring towns.

"ANDREW ELLIOT,)
"JOSEPH NOYES,) Trustees.
"NATHAN WHEELER,)

"Oct. 16, 1798."

Samuel Staples lies buried in Easton, and his tombstone bears the following inscription:

"In memory of Mr. Samuel Staples, who died Feb. 21, 1787, in the 79th year of his age. He was possessed of a Plentiful Fortune, which he Devoted to Pious and Charitable Purposes, Especially The Founding of a free School for the Education of Poor Children and Youth in FAIRFIELD. Also a Considerable Sum for the Support of the Gospel in the Parish of NORTH FAIRFIELD. And a large Estate for the purpose of Supporting Poor Children at the Different Schools in WESTON. He was A Steady Attendant on the Worship of God, A Friend to the Liberties of his Country, Both Civil and Sacred, And left this Mortal Scene in Humble Hope of Eternal Bliss Through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Hon. Isaac Tucey, Governor and United States senator, received the rudiments of his education at the free academy in Easton, and offered to give five hundred dollars toward erecting a suitable monument to the memory of Mr. Staples.

RELIGIOUS.
CHRIST CHURCH.*

This church was organized as early as 1763, under the care of the London Missionary Societies, and was supplied with ministerial services by it for about twenty years. In 1784 it seems to have been reorganized by the appointment of John Nichols as clerk, Benoni Dimon, Calvin Wheeler, and Moses Burr as vestrymen, and Ezra Winton and Robert Downes as wardens. The Rev. Philo Shelton, the first Episcopal minister ordained in the United States, was then called as rector, and continued to 1818.

Among the early members were Seth Gilbert, Thaddeus Gilbert, Thomas Colyer, Jonathan Coley, Thomas Treadwell, Nathan Jackson, Alexander Platt, Hezekiah Osborn, Increase Burr, Andrew Gilbert, Nathaniel Davis, David Thorp, Daniel Coley, Gould Nichols, Eliphalet Nichols, Peter Nichols, Ephraim Nichols, Samuel Wheeler, John Wheeler, Adin Jackson, Andrew Winton, Hezekiah Thorp, Joseph Winton, Ebenezer Nichols, Joseph Treadwell, Gould Bradley, Joseph Darling, William Burr, Joseph Burr, Alexander Nichols, Andrew Gilbert, and others.

The first church edifice was erected in 1763,—a rude structure,—and was never completely finished, though it stood until about the year 1850. It was known as the North Fairfield Episcopal Church at Gilberttown. In 1873 a new chapel was built, near the academy at the centre. It has always been rather a missionary station than an independent parish.

Through the untiring efforts of Mrs. Henry Perry, of Southport, a fund has been raised as a memorial of the Rev. Philo Shelton, the first rector, who was the maternal grandfather of Mrs. Perry; this sum amounts to four thousand dollars, the income to be applied to the salary of the rector of the parish.

The following rectors have officiated for the church: The missionaries of the Church of England to the Revolutionary war; Rev. Philo Shelton, from 1784 to 1812; Rev. Eli Wheeler, during 1813; Rev. David Belden, 1813-16; Rev. Joseph D. Welton, 1816-19. Then occasional services were held by different clergymen until about 1835, when the Rev. D. G. Tomlinson took charge for four years; Rev. Dr. Darkin, 1840, for one year; Rev. Charles Todd, one year; Rev. William Atwill, 1842-44; Rev. H. V. Gardner, 1849-51; Rev. Enoch Huntington, 1851-53.

At this time the parish received from the Legislature the corporate name of Christ Church, Easton; up to this time it was known as the Episcopal Society of North Fairfield. Since that time the rectors have been Rev. Alfred Louderback, 1861-62; Rev. Henry Zell, from February to November, 1863, when death closed his ministry; Rev. William L. Bostwick, 1861-65; Rev. John N. Marvin, 1865-71; Rev. Charles W. Kelley, 1873-75; Rev. David M. Elwood, 1876-79; Rev. William H. Bulkley, 1880. Present officers: Eli Winton, William Ward, Wardens; Arthur M. Oakley, James Nichols, Vestry. Present number of members, about thirty.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.†

The Baptist Church of Weston (now Easton) was constituted April 13, 1831, and recognized as such by a council consisting of Rev. Elisha Cushman, John Cookson, J. H. Linsly, Alfred Gates, Mr. Duxborough, Mr. Roberts, and Nathan D. Benedict, who had met for the purpose of setting apart Brother Alva Gregory to the work of the gospel ministry. It consisted of sixty-seven members set off from the Baptist Church of Stratfield,—viz.: Deacon David Silliman, Sr., Stephen Jennings, Sr., Eli Adams, Stephen Jennings, Jr., Cyrus Silliman, Stephen Blackman, Remben B. Gilbert, Andrew Leavenworth, Seth Gilbert, Norman C. Sherwood, Isaac Jennings, Samuel Gregory, William Rowel, Thomas Peck, Horace Lyon, George Lyon, Alonzo Gilbert, Ezra Silliman, Josiah Platt, Harvey Rowel, Isaac Turney, Isaac Thorp, John Calvin, Ruth Beach, Lucy Gilbert, Eunice Edwards, Hannah Wildman, Charity Judson, Polly Silliman, Orra Sherwood, Deborah Silliman, Naomie Mallett, Anna Beardslee, Anna Turney, Mahala Austin, Charity Blakeman, Pamela Fayerweather, Abigail Hawley, Esther Beers, Sarah Hall, Ruth Seelye, Caroline Gilbert, Maria Silliman, Roda Hayes, Hannah Hayes, Mercy S. French, Miriam Leavenworth, Huldah Adams, Clarissa Silliman, Asenath Beardslee, Hannah Silliman, Ruth Lyon, Clarissa Rowel, Betsey Silliman, Sally Lyon, Laura Lyon, Ruth Hawley, Harriet Thorp, Clarissa Rowel (2d), Phœbe A. Peck, Jemima Jackson, Eliza Turney, Eunice Turney (2d), Abigail Leavenworth, Priscilla B. Dimon, Clarissa Silliman (2d), Eleanor Lyon.

The first officers were: David Silliman, Deacon; Eli Adams, Clerk. The first minister was Rev. Nathan Wildman; the present minister is Rev. J. M. Phillips.

Name and time employed of each minister: Nathan Wildman, three years; William Dennison, thirteen years; Jacob Gardener, two years; John Warren, twenty-one years nine months; Jabez T. Bender, two years four months; James M. Phillips, three years.

The present officers are: Morris Banks, William W. Jennings, Deacons; David Silliman, David W. Sherwood, Trustees; M. W. Silliman, Clerk. The membership at present numbers one hundred and thirty-two. The first church edifice was erected in 1830, the second in 1849, and the third in 1874. There was expended on the second edifice for repairs, $2775.50; on the third, $1607.93.

Legacies amounting to $1275 have been left this church by the following: Naomie Bennett, for land used as the parsonage, seven acres, $500; Mrs. Gregory, for a Sabbath-school fund, $175; Miss Julia

* Contributed by Mr. Eli Winton.

† Contributed by M. W. Silliman.

Seeley, $500, and Miss Abba Leavenworth, $100, for the use of the church. Rev. Russell Jennings has paid nearly one-fourth of the pastor's salary for several years past.

The following have been licensed to preach from this church: Edmund Turney, Hawley Gilbert, Hervey Silliman, Sherwood Lyon, John S. Mallette, John Summis.

For two or three years after the organization of the church an extensive revival of religion visited it, materially strengthening the church, and encouraging the new field of labor, which proved timely, for soon some of the number were dismissed to form a Baptist church at White Hills. The church, now enjoying the indefatigable labors of its pastor, Rev. Wm. Dennison, had many additions.

The church was soon again called to part with about seventy-five of its number to constitute the Baptist church of Stepney, in 1848. Since that year we have been visited with many precious seasons of refreshing by the Holy Spirit, leading many to walk the narrow way with us, and, ere we were expecting, many were called to the better land. During the stay of each pastor we have witnessed the fruit of his labors by the ingathering of many; so that none can say, "I labored with the Easton Baptist Church in vain;" for which we sincerely thank the Great Head of the Church.

THE CENTRE METHODIST EPISCOPAL SOCIETY of Easton was organized in the winter of 1843-44. The first officers were Eli Wakeman, Clerk; Ranson Lyon, Daniel C. Salmon, and Ira Sturges, Building Committee; Ranson Lyon, Emery Sherwood, Daniel C. Salmon, Harry Fanton, Bradley Williams, William Cogswell, Thomas Goodsell, Trustees; Ranson Lyon, Treasurer; William Cogswell, Collector. The first minister was William H. Bangs. The church building was erected in 1844.

The present officers are as follows: Iverson C. Fanton, Clerk; D. S. Fanton, Treasurer; B. F. Banks, D. S. Fanton, William F. Lockwood, A. C. Lyon, William Cogswell, I. C. Fanton, Trustees; B. F. Banks, W. F. Lockwood, M. W. Salmon, Society's Committee. Number of present members, one hundred and four. The church was repaired and remodeled in 1871.

This church and Lee Chapel church form one parish, Lee Chapel church being much the oldest.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

FAIRFIELD.

Geographical—Topographical—The Pequots—Driven to the Swamp—The Battle—Roger Ludlow—The First Settlements—Indian Treaties—Indian Deeds—The Fairfield Patent—The Departure of Ludlow—The Revolution—The Burning of Fairfield—Incidents.

THE town of Fairfield is located in the southern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: On the north by Easton and Weston; on the east by Bridgeport; on the south by Long Island Sound; on the west by Westport and Weston. The surface of the town is undulating, and the soil is very fertile and generally free from stone.

THE PEQUOTS.—THE DISCOVERY.

To the renowned Indian-fighter, John Mason, and the intrepid and talented Roger Ludlow and the soldiers who accompanied them on the expedition against the warlike Pequots, is due the honor of having discovered this section. These were the first white men who set foot upon the soil of Fairfield.

The Pequots, after the disastrous conflagration at Mistick, fled westward and secreted themselves in a swamp near the present village of Southport, in this town, where they awaited the certain attack of the English. And they had not long to wait. Mason and Ludlow had resolved to utterly exterminate this tribe, whose ferocity at that time stood without a parallel in the history of Indian nations. With that determination which knows no failure, the little band of soldiers followed hard upon the retreating form of the red brother. Their location in the dismal, miry swamp was in some respects an advantageous one. It served as a sort of ambush, and the miry nature of the place rendered it almost impossible for the English to approach. In this dismal place were secreted about eighty Pequot warriors, with their women and children and about two hundred other Indians, including the Fairfield Indians. The Hon. Gideon H. Hollister says,—

"Dangerous as it was, Lieut. Davenport rushed into it with his men, eager to encounter the Pequots. The sharp arrows of the enemy flew from places that hid the archers, wounding the soldiers, who, in their haste to retreat, only sunk deeper in the mire. The Indians, made bold by this adventure, pressed hard upon them, and would have carried off their scalps had it not been for the timely aid of some other Englishmen who waded into the swamp, sword in hand, drove back the Pequots, and drew their disabled friends from the mud that had threatened to swallow them up.

"The swamp was now surrounded, and a skirmish followed that proved so destructive to the savages that the Fairfield Indians begged for quarter. They said—what was probably true—that they were there only by accident and had never done the English any harm, and that they only wished for the privilege of withdrawing from the swamp and leaving the Pequots to fight it out.

"Thomas Stanton, who knew their language, was sent into the swamp with instructions to offer life to all the Indians who had shed no English blood.

"When the sachem of the Fairfield Indians learned the terms proposed by Stanton, he came out of the swamp, followed by little parties of men, women, and children. He and his Indians, he said, had shed no English blood. But the Pequot warriors, made up of choice men, and burning with rage against the enemy who had destroyed their tribe and driven them from their old haunts, fought with such desperate bravery that the English were glad to confine themselves to the border of the swamp.

"There now sprung up a controversy among the officers as to the best mode of annihilating the little handful of Pequots. Some advised that they should plunge into the swamp and there fight them. But the experiment of Davenport discouraged others from so foolhardy a course. Others suggested that they should cut down the swamp with the hatchets they had brought with them; others, that they should surround it with palisades. Neither of these propositions was adopted. They finally hit upon a plan that was more easily executed. They cut down the bushes that grew upon a little neck of firm upland that almost divided the swamp into two parts. In this way they so lessened the area occupied by the Pequots that by stationing men twelve feet apart it could all be surrounded by the troops. This was done and the sentinels all stationed before nightfall. Thus keeping watch on the borders of the morass, wet, cold, and weary, the soldiers passed the night under arms. Just before day a dense fog more than shrouded them in almost total darkness. A friendly mist it proved to the Pequots, for it doubtless saved the lives of many of them. At a favorable moment they rushed upon the English. Capt. Patrick's quarters were first attacked, but he drove them back more than once. Their yells, more terrible from the darkness that engulfed the scene of the conflict, were so unearthly and appalling, the attack was so sudden and so well sustained, that, but for the timely interference of a party sent by Mason to relieve him, Patrick would doubtless have been driven from his station or cut in pieces.

"The siege had by this time given place to a hand-to-hand fight. As Mason was himself marching up to aid Patrick, the Pequots rushed upon him from the thickets. He drove them back with severe loss. They did not resume the attack upon the man who had recently given them such fearful proofs of his prowess, but turned upon Patrick, broke through his ranks, and fled. About sixty of the Pequot warriors escaped; twenty lay dead upon the field, one hundred and eighty were taken prisoners. Most of the property that this fugitive remnant of the tribe had attempted to carry with them fell into the hands of the English. Hatchets of stone, beautiful wampum-belts, polished bows, and feathered arrows, with the utensils employed by the women in their rude labors, became at once, as did the women themselves, the property of the conquerors. The captives and the booty were divided between Massachusetts and Connecticut. Some were sent by Massachusetts to the West Indies, and there, as slaves, dragged out a wretched yet brief existence. Among the captives taken in this battle was the wife of Mononotto and her children. With much dignity, she begged them to save her honor inviolate and to spare her life and that of her offspring. She had been kind to the girls who had been taken from Wethersfield, and for this she and her little ones were recommended—not in vain—to the mercy of the Governor of Massachusetts."

Thus ended the Pequot war, this being the last stand made by the tribe against the allied powers of Massachusetts and Connecticut.

The advent of Roger Ludlow was an important epoch in the history of this town. He saw with that intuitive glance characteristic of the man the natural advantages of this section, and, comparatively speaking, the war-whoop of the conquered Pequots had scarcely died away ere the great lawyer and statesman had bade adieu to the comforts and conveniences of his home at Windsor, and with a few pioneers was threading his way through the wilderness, anxious to rear civil division of Connecticut. Ludlow settled on the premises now occupied by Mrs. John Gould.

their homes on the fertile lands at Unqowa.* These were soon after joined by a number from Watertown, Mass., and not much time elapsed ere, under the wise guidance of Ludlow, the little plantation grew into a large town, and has ever since remained an important and ten years later, June 24, 1649, a second treaty was made for lands extending from the southwest bounds of Stratford, six miles along the sea-coast, to the Saseo fields, and six miles north into the country. The quitclaim deed to these lands was given March 16, 1656, and February 11, 1661, the Saseo Indians gave a quitclaim deed to the Saseo lands. The boundaries of these lands were "from the southwest bounds of the land called Unqowa to the northeast bounds of the land called Maximus (Bankside), and straight up into the country six miles."

The deed to these lands were given in consideration of "thirty coats, 2 yards apiece of cloth, and the same in wampum." This was signed by Ponocamus, Minckoe, and James, and witnessed by Wenans and Manachem. In deeding these lands the Indians always reserved "the liberty of fishing, hunting, and fowling in any river or stream within the town bounds, only they were not to set traps to the injury of the cattle." The Fairfield planter always pursued a humane and equitable course in dealing with the Indians, and it was agreed that "the Indians should have a certain amount of land within the English bounds set apart to them to plant on for their livelihood."

In 1668 a tract of land lying along the northern portion of the town was purchased. This was called Northfield. Soon after, a number of small lots were laid out along the coast; extending across the town north of these were a tier of pasture lots; north of the pasture lots a half-mile common, and north of the common were laid out the long lots reaching as far north as the present Redding Centre. These "long lots" were about eleven miles in length and a few rods in width. Six hundred and fifty acres were reserved for church purposes, and three hundred and twenty-five as school land.

In 1680 a quitclaim deed was executed by the Indians to all the lands which had been purchased, of which a fac simile is given on page 279.

THE FAIRFIELD PATENT.

The following is a copy of the patent granted May 25, 1685:

"The General Court of Connecticut have formerly granted to the proprietors of the inhabitants of the town of Fairfield all these lands, both meadow and upland, within those abutments upon the sea towards the south, about seven miles in breadth, and in length from the sea into the wilderness twelve miles, and upon Stratford bounds on the east, and the wilderness north, and on Norwalk bounds on the west, only a parcel of land between these bounds and Saugatuck River, that is likewise granted to the said Fairfield; provided the said Saugatuck do not exceed two miles from the bounds of the said Fairfield, the said lands having been by purchase or otherwise lawfully obtained of the Indian natives, proprietors; and whereas the proprietors, the foresaid inhabitants of Fairfield, in the colony of Connecticut, have made application to the Governor and company of the said colony of Connecticut assembled in court, May 25, 1685, that they may have a patent for confirmation of the aforesaid land, so purchased and granted to them, as aforesaid, and which they have, and stood seized, and quietly possessed of for many years last past, without interruption; now for a more full confirmation of the aforesaid tract of land, as it is butted and bounded as aforesaid, unto the present proprietors of the said Township of Fairfield, in the possession and enjoyment of the premises, know ye that the said Governor and company assembled in General Court according to the commission granted to us by His Majesty in our charter, have given, granted, and by these presents do give, grant, ratify, and confirm unto Major Mather Gold, Mr. Samuel Wakeman, Mr. John Burr, Mr. John Burr, Mr. Thomas Staples, Mr. John Green, Mr. Joseph Lucknow, Mr. John Wheeler, Mr. Richard Huddell, Mr. George Spuler, and Mr. Isaac Wheeler, and the rest of the present proprietors of the Township of Fairfield, their heirs, successors, and assigns forever, according to the terms of East Greenwich in Kent, in free and common passage, and not in capite, nor by knight's service; they to make improvements of the same as they are capable according to the custom of the country, yielding, rendering, and paying therefore to the Sovereign Lord the King, his heirs and successors, his due according to charter.

"In witness whereof we have caused the seal of the colony to be hereunto affixed the 26th of May, 1685, in the first year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord James the Second of England, Scotland, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c.

"By order of the General Court of Connecticut.

"ROBERT TREAT, Gov.,
"JOHN ALLEN, Sec."

THE DEPARTURE OF LUDLOW.

Through the wise guidance of Mr. Ludlow the little plantation increased in importance, and nothing of any particular consequence occurred until 1665, when the border settlements were thrown into a state of excitement caused by the belligerent attitude of the Dutch and Indians.

"Fairfield having demanded protection from the government of New Haven, and receiving none, held a town-meeting, and unanimously resolved to send troops and carry on the war themselves independently. This action of the inhabitants seems to have incurred the displeasure of the government. Their conduct was treated as reprehensible and seditious, and Robert Bassette and John Chapman were charged with "fomenting insurrections and were treated as the leaders of the project. Ludlow must have known that these accusations were aimed at him, as he was the principal man of the town. He felt that he had, without any moral guilt, incurred the displeasure of the colony, and that, unless he should make some humiliating concessions, his behavior would not be likely to escape public censure. It was quite evident that his popularity had already reached its meridian. Proud and sensitive to a high degree, he brooded over the change that had taken place in his prospects, as well for promotion as for usefulness, and at last came to the conclusion, not without many keen regrets, to leave the colony where he had held so conspicuous a place for nineteen eventful years. On the 26th of April, 1654, he embarked at New Haven with his family and effects for Virginia, where he passed in obscurity the remainder of his days."

THE REVOLUTION.—THE BURNING OF FAIRFIELD.

The first reference to the war of the Revolution is under date Dec. 29, 1774, as follows:

"Recorded pr. Nathan Bulkley, Town Clerk, Dec. 19th, 1774."

"On Saturday evening, the 31 day of July, the British fleet weighed anchor of the port of Whitestone, eleven miles east of New York. During the spring it had made a destructive raid upon Virginia, and returned in time to aid Gen. Clinton in his successful assault upon Verplanck's and Stony Point on the 1st of June.

"The New York Sons of Liberty had been informed of preparations for a fresh departure, and sent couriers to New London to warn that city of the coming invader.

"Sunday, the 4th of July, was a warm, calm day. Our people were in their churches, and the vessels could scarcely have appeared in view before the night came on. The light breeze had no power to move them swiftly on their course. There were two large men-of-war, the 'Canilla' and 'Scorpion,' and forty-eight row-galleys, tenders, and transports. Sir George Collier commanded the fleet and Gen. Tryon the land forces, about 2600 in number. Brig-Gen. Garth had special charge of the Hessian regiments, the Landgraves and Yuegers. The English forces consisted of two bodies of Fusiliers, the Guards, the Fifty-fourth regiment of foot and the King's American regiment refugees enlisted in the British army. Early on Monday morning the squadron came to anchor near New Haven, where, on that day and Tuesday, the troops pursued their desolating work. On the evening of Tuesday the fleet left New Haven, and during that night was moving toward Fairfield. About four o'clock of Wednesday a gun from the fort on Grover's Hill announced its approach, but it seemed to be passing by, and about seven o'clock the people who were anxiously watching it were rejoiced to see that it was steering westward, proceeding, as they thought, to New York. Soon after a very thick fog came on, during which the vessels were obscured from view, but when this dispersed, between nine and ten o'clock, it was seen with consternation that the whole fleet was under our western shore, where they came to anchor at the Pines, which have since disappeared, a little to the east of McKenzie's Point. From Gen. Tryon's report it appears that he, with the main portion of the troops, landed there, and that the Hessians, under Gen. Garth, made their disembarkation at the water front of Sasco Hill, over which they marched to take possession of the western section of the town.

"Tryon, with the troops immediately under his command, marched along the beach and turned up the Beach Lane, somewhat galled by the guns of Grover's Hill. They pursued their way to this point where we are now assembled, and where, on the site of our town-hall, the court-house was then standing.

"The British general was guided by George Hoyt, who was brother-in-law of Mr. Benjamin Bulkley.

"His house, since demolished, stood on the ground where Mr. John Grover has his home, and Gen. Tryon made his headquarters while here. With this, the dwellings of Capt. Matthee, Justin Holart, and Nathan and Peter Bulkley were saved from the fire. These are now in the possession of Edmund Holart, Miss Hannah Holart, and the Denison estate.

"The line of the conflagration extended from Mrs. Gould's house to Mill River, in the vicinity of Perry's Mill, including both the streets and their immediate neighborhood, and extended westward through the lower road at Green's Farms.

"To silence the guns at the fort where Lieut. Isaac Jarvis had a garrison of twenty-three men, a galley had been dispatched, but although there was constant firing throughout the night of Wednesday, and several detachments of troops tried to take the fort by assault, it was gallantly defended and held out to the end.

"As the troops marched up toward the centre of the town young Sam. Rowland, then ten years of age, saw them from the steeple at the Episcopal church, but he was soon sent home from his dangerous position, and his grand-children to-day repeat the story they heard in their childhood from his lips. Mrs. Gen. Silliman, from the home of her temporary widowhood on Holland Hill, heard the first guns of the conflict and set out for a safe asylum in Trumbull, where a few weeks later her second son, the distinguished Yale professor, was born.

"Before the landing was effected, Mrs. Esther Jennings, the young wife of Peter Burr, went early to the pasture fields near McKenzie's Point and drove the cattle there feeding to a safe refuge on Greenfield Hill. Thither and to Fairfield Woods many of the little children, with much furniture, were removed in carts and chaises, while some of the women remained to guard the dwellings. The company who had charge of a field-piece wheeled it to a good position on Burr's highway. The men in the village and farm-houses grasped their muskets and ammunition, and rallied under command of Col. Whiting at the rendezvous on Round Hill.

"Tryon's march to the green was the signal of their resistance, and a small company, under Capt. Thomas Nash, made a brilliant attack upon the English troops, firing from behind the fences, and killing a few who were laid in shallow graves by their comrades on the meeting-house grounds. These afterwards were removed to permanent rest in our ancient cemetery.

"About this time it would appear that the first house was fired, the one belonging to Isaac Jennings, on whose site Mrs. Esther Huntington now lives. Then came the flag from Gen. Tryon and the reading of that address of which I have spoken. Col. Whiting sent back this spirited reply:

"Connecticut having nobly dared to take up arms against the cruel despotism of Britain, and as the flames have now preceded the answer to your flag, they will persist to oppose to the utmost that power exerted against injured innocence."

"In resistance of an organized army who held possession of the town, it was impossible for the militia to concentrate an effectual force. The night was coming on,—that Wednesday night of the 7th, which witnessed scenes of detachment and cruelty such as Fairfield has never known at any other period of her history. The Hessian general held the western portion of the town, and his regiment of Yaegers are described as skulking and yelling like the wild savages of the forest. The detachments broke up into small squads, and some of the governor's guards engaged in a dance in the Sun Tavern on the green. Most of the soldiers were passing in little companies from house to house, pillaging and wanting provisions, breaking up glass, earthenware, and furniture, stealing the watches, jewelry, and shoe-buckles from the persons of women, taking from them even their aprons and handkerchiefs, and with oaths and ribaldry grossly insulting them. Many soldiers were drunk with liquor or strong cider they had stolen. Tryon reports that they lay on their arms during the night, and Dr. Dwight, who was not an eye-witness to those scenes, describes in eloquent language a terrific thunder-storm. Enough it is for us to hear the guns thundering through all its dark hours in the defense and attack of the little fort, and to see one after another of the pillaged houses fall before the flames which the British general's troops had kindled. The burning cinders that fell that night, wet with the tears of women then made homeless, must ever in the record of history blacken Tryon's name.

"The militia did all they were able to accomplish, keeping up a running fire, and more were on their way to join them. So the signal of retreat was sounded early on Thursday, and in the course of that morning of the 8th of July the squadron was off for Huntington, only to cross the Sound again, and on the subsequent Sunday repeat their terrible work at Norwalk. It was on the morning of the 8th that the remaining private edifices and all the public buildings were consumed. More destruction would doubtless have been effected but for the wholesome fear of the ambush of the watchful militia.

"The enemy crested the stone walls, fences, and shrubbery. On this account the old mill of Peter Perry, which had ground the corn of the people for a hundred years, was still left to do its work. Through the exertions of the women who kept watch some fires that had been kindled were put out. This was done four times by Mrs. Lucretia Redfield during that Wednesday night, and the house she then saved stands to-day a pleasant abode occupied by some of the same name. The Nichols family, always proverbial for not a le housewifery, employed large banks of yarn then soaking in preparation for the dye, and with it extinguished the flames that had begun to consume their home.

"There were burned a court house and jail, three churches, two school-houses, ninety-seven dwellings, sixty-seven barns, forty-eight stores and shops—in all, two hundred and eighteen buildings. The gathered labors of the field, the books, papers, pictures, the well-preserved products of the spinning-wheel and needle, the precious heirlooms, tokens of love and memorials of friendship, how were these brought into destruction as in a moment!

"The sparks, cinders, and half-burned feathers floating in the summer air,—what sickness must they have brought to many hearts!

"Some things had been removed to safe places beyond the reach of the fire. Isaac Burr, the jeweler, hid the watches left for repair at his shop within the stone fissures of his well, and placed his Bible and some of his own precious goods with them.

"President Phillips, servant of Judge Sturges, took the wet linen from the wash-tub and hid it among the currant bushes. Pewter dishes, kept bright by constant scouring, were thrown into the bottom of wells, to be recovered when the danger was past. One looking-glass is still as reflecting as ever. It was hidden in an uncracked rye-field, and when, a few days later, a black man cut the swath that revealed it standing there upright, he saw his own figure in the sunshine, and mistaking it for Satan, whom he feared, he threw down his sickle in terror and ran away.

"The sadness had by that time been mollified, the people had begun again to provide means for living. They made new homes, some in warehouses or out-buildings that had been spared, some rearing them again upon the old foundations. The large grant of State lands (on this account called the burnt lands) in Ohio tempted a few to find new homes in the West. Some of our own people thus changed their place of residence, and their descendants are there abiding to this day, adorning their ancestral teachings by lives of honor and usefulness; and of the stock transplanted in this manner from our neighboring town of Norwalk sprung the two brothers Sherman, one presiding to-day over our nation's treasury, and the other commanding its army.

"The life of Fairfield was not extinguished in its burning, nor did the energy of the town expire. Its source of strength was too deep to be reached by the kindled brands, too high to be fatally affected by the ascending flames. The town rose from its ashes, and has had an honorable history down to the present day. From the fire that consumed Mr. Eliot's dwelling one book was rescued, the church record, running back to 1634. In his clear handwriting he inscribed within it a brief account of the events which, after the lapse of a century, we now recall.

"As in concluding this address I repeat his words, they may convey to us the spirit of submission unto God and trust in Him which strengthened this people to pass through the furnace of calamity. In subsequent times of prosperity and safety these sentiments have not been wholly lost. May they always prevail, and may the intelligence, soberness, and industry of our people render them fit dwellers in those pleasant places chosen more than two hundred and forty years ago by the founders of our beautiful town. By maintaining those principles in peace and purity, and through a wise and constant exercise of that public spirit which characterized our fathers, we will show how greatly we prize this rich inheritance, made more precious by the refining fire.

"A List of the Persons who suffered by the enemy in burning the town of Fairfield, on the 7th and 8th days of July, 1779, and had their taxes abated by the Committee appointed by the General Assembly for that purpose.

" Alated by the Assembly the sum of £1088.12 in the year 1781. The sum of £1088.12 to be apportioned to the sufferers of said town."

The following highly interesting account of the burning of Fairfield is from the pen of Rev. Andrew Eliot, being a copy of a letter written to his brother, Rev. John Eliot, of Boston. Rev. Mr. Eliot at that time was pastor of the Fairfield church:

" FAIRFIELD, July 15, 1779.

" DEAR BROTHER,—I sit down to write to you some account of the sad and awful scenes which have been exhibited in this once pleasant and delightful town, now, alas! a heap of ruins,—a sad spectacle of desolation and woe.

" It was in the beginning of wheat-harvest, a season of extraordinary labor and festivity,—a season which promised the greatest plenty that has been known for many years, if within the memory of man. Never did our fields bear so ponderous a load, never were our prospects with regard to sustenance so bright.

" The British fleet and army, with the American refugees that had possessed and plundered New Haven, set sail from that distressed place on the 6th instant. About four o'clock the next morning the approach of the fleet was announced by the firing of a gun from a small fort we have on Grover's Hill, contiguous to the Sound. They seemed, however, to be passing by, and about seven o'clock we with pleasure beheld them all to the westward of us, steering, as we thought, to New York. A very thick fog came on, which entirely deprived us of the sight of them till between the hours of nine and ten, when, the mist clearing away, we beheld the whole fleet under our western shore, and some of them close in Kensie's Point. They presently came to anchor, and lay till about four in the afternoon, when they began to land their troops a little to the east of Kensie's Point, at a place called the Pines. From thence the troops marched along the beach until they came to a lane opposite the centre of the town, through which they proceeded, and in about an hour paraded in their divisions on the green, between the meeting-house and court-house. From thence they detached their guards, and, dividing into small parties, began their infernal business. Their commanding officers were Sir George Collier by sea, Gens. Tryon and Garth by land.

" The approach of the fleet was so sudden that but few men could be collected, though the alarm-guns were fired immediately on the dissipation of the fog. There was no thought of opposing their landing, as our force was nothing to theirs. Our little party, however, posted themselves so as to annoy them to the best advantage, expecting they would land at the Point. When our people found them landing on the left, and marching in the rear to take possession of the town, they immediately retreated to the court-house; and, as the enemy advanced from the beach lane, they gave them such a warm reception with a field-piece, which threw both round and grape-shot, and with their musketry, as quite disconcerted them for some time. The column, however, quickly recovered its solidity, and, advancing rapidly, forced our small body to retreat to the heights back of the town, where they were joined by numbers coming in from the country. The enemy were likewise galled very much, as they turned from the beach to the land, by the cannon which played from Grover's Hill.

" The town was almost cleared of inhabitants. A few women, some of whom were of the most respectable families and characters, hurried with a view of saving their property. They imagined their sex and character would avail to such a purpose. They put some confidence in the generosity of an enemy who were once famed for generosity and politeness, and thought that kind treatment and submissive behavior would secure them against harsh treatment and rough usage. Alas! they were miserably mistaken, and bitterly repented their confidence and presumption.

" The Hessians were first let loose for rapine and plunder. They entered the houses, attacked the persons of Whig and Tory indiscriminately; breaking open desks, trunks, closets, and taking away everything of value. They robbed women of their buckles, rings, bonnets, aprons, and handkerchiefs. They abused them with the foulest and most profane language, threatened their lives without the least regard to the most earnest cries and entreaties. Looking-glasses, china, and all kinds of furniture were soon dashed to pieces.

" Another party that came on were the American refugees, who, in revenge for their confiscated estates, carried on the same direful business. They were not, however, so abusive to the women as the former, but appeared very furious against the town and country. The Britons, by what I could learn, were the least inveterate; some of the officers seemed to pity the misfortunes of the country, but in excuse said that they had no other way to gain their authority over us. Individuals among the British troops were, however, exceedingly abusive, especially to women. Some were forced to submit to the most indecicate and rough treatment in defence of their virtue, and now bear the bruises of horrid conflict.

" About an hour before sunset the conflagration began at the house of Mr. Isaac Jennings, which was consumed, with the neighboring buildings. In the evening the house of Elijah Abel, Esq., sheriff of the county, was consumed with a few others. In the night several buildings in the main street. Gen. Tryon was in various parts of the town-plat, with the good women begging and entreating him to spare their houses. Mr. Sayre, the Church-of-England missionary, a gentleman firmly and zealously engaged in the British interest, and who has suffered considerably in their cause, joined with them in these entreaties; he begged the general to spare the town, but was denied. He then begged that some few houses might be spared as a shelter for those who could provide habitations nowhere else; this was denied also. At length Mr. Tryon consented to save the buildings of Mr. Burit and the writer of this epistle. Both had been plundered ere this. He said, likewise, that the houses for public worship should be spared. He was far from being in good temper during the whole affair. Gen. Garth, at the other end of the town, treated the inhabitants with as much humanity as his errand would admit.

" At sunrise some considerable part of the town was standing, but in about two hours the flames became general. The burning-parties carried on their business with horrible alacrity, headed by one or two persons who were born and bred in the neighboring towns. All the town, from the bridge by Col. Gold's to the Mill River, a few houses excepted, was a heap of ruins.

§ The house on this site was the first rebuilt, and is occupied by Mrs. E. L. Huntington.

† The house occupying this site is known to-day (1880) as the Benson House.

‡ The home of O. W. Jones Esq., occupies that of "About eight o'clock the enemy sounded a retreat. We had some satisfaction, amidst our sorrow and distress, to see that the meeting-house and a few other buildings remained. But the rear-guard, consisting of a Landitti the vilest that was ever let loose among men, set fire to everything which Gen. Tryon had left,—the large and elegant meeting-house, the minister's houses, Mr. Burr's and several other houses which had received protection. They tore the protection to pieces, damned Tryon, abused the women most shamefully, and then ran off in a most disgraceful manner. Happily, our people came in and extinguished the flames in several houses, so that we are not entirely destitute.

"The rear-guard, which behaved in so scandalous a manner, were chiefly German troops, called Yaegers. They carry a small rifle-gun and fight in a skulking manner, like our Indians. They may be properly called sons of plunder and devastation.

"Our people on the heights back of the town were joined by numbers, but not equal to the numbers of the enemy. They were skirmishing all the evening, part of the night, and the next morning. The enemy were several times disconcerted and driven from their outposts. Had they continued longer in the town it must have been fatal to them, for the militia were collecting from all parts.

"Our fort* yet stands. The enemy sent a row-galley to silence it, and there was constant firing between them all night. One or two attempts were made to take it by parties of troops, but it was most bravely and obstinately defended by Lieut. Isaac Jarvis,† of this town, who had but twenty-three men besides himself.

"The militia followed these bloody incendiaries to the place of embarkation, and galled them considerably. The embarkation took place about twelve o'clock, and they set sail for Long Island about two or three in the afternoon.

"Many were killed on both sides. The numbers cannot be ascertained. They carried off some prisoners, but no person of distinction.

"One particular I would mention. After Tryon had begun to burn, he sent out the proclamation which you have in the Hartford paper. In the midst of hostilities, while the flames were raging and bullets flying, who should come out with the flag but Mr. Sayre! A spirited answer was sent in, and the people were so enraged that hostilities should be going on in the time of negotiation, and that Mr. Sayre should be the bearer of such an insulting proclamation and at such a time, that the said gentleman was obliged to quit the town when the enemy left it. His whole family were obliged to go with him, leaving the greatest part of their substance behind, which became fuel for the flames indiscriminately scattered by the rear-guard. The reply which Gen. Tryon made to Mr. Sayre when he asked to go with him was, 'You may go on board the ships, sir, but I cannot promise you any help or assistance.'

According to their tombstones, they must have returned to and resided in Fairfield, as in the old burying-ground are the following:

FAIRFIELD (Continued).

Witchcraft—Goodwife Knapp—Her Trial—Her Execution—The Last Person Condemned for Witchcraft in Connecticut—Mary Disbrow Tried at Fairfield in 1692—Sentenced to Death—Pardoned—"Aunt Nab," the Witch.

IN the confession of Goody Basset, of Stratford, she spoke vaguely of others who "held their heads full high," but who were in truth equally guilty with herself. This was thought to have reference to a woman in the neighboring village of Fairfield, who thenceforward became the subject of suspicion, and in October, 1653, about two years and a half after the death of Mrs. Basset, was arraigned for trial. Her case caused great excitement throughout that portion of the colony, and Mr. Ludlow, with three other Uriah Bulkley (see "Colonial 18") married Jane Sayre, one of this family, and they were the parents of eleven children.

‡ This stood by Mr. Henry Rowland's.

Mr. Jonathan S. Burr, of Brooklyn, states of his grandfather (Rev. Andrew Eliot) that "directly after the conflagration he removed with his family to Holland Hill, where he taught school and remained a considerable length of time. The house where he lived stood almost directly opposite the dwelling of Mrs. Mary Bibbins."

magistrates, was desired by the General Court to go down to Fairfield to officiate at the trial, and to "execute justice" there as cause might require. The Mr. Ludlow named in this order was the distinguished Roger Ludlow, who served at different times as Deputy Governor of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and whose name is still held in respect in the latter State as the first resident member of the legal profession, and the framer of its earliest code of laws. His home was in Fairfield, so that he was well acquainted with all the actors in this melancholy tragedy, and it is in part to events growing out of it that his subsequent removal to Virginia may be attributed. A full account of the affair is afforded by a number of depositions which are given at length in the New Haven Colonial Records. From these we gather that the trial of the accused, who is designated simply as Knapp's wife, or Goodwife Knapp, took place in the autumn of 1653, before a jury and several "godly magistrates," probably the same named in the order of the General Court. The trial lasted several days, and there were many witnesses, but the most convincing evidence against the accused was given by Mrs. Lucy Pell and Goody Odell, the midwife, who, by direction of the court, had examined the body of the prisoner, and testified to finding upon it certain witchmarks which were regarded as proof positive of diabolical dealings. Present also at this examination was Mrs. Jones, wife of the Fairfield minister, though whether as one of the committee or as a simple spectator is not clearly stated.

The result of the trial was a verdict of guilty of witchcraft against Goodwife Knapp, and sentence of death was passed upon her. In the interval between her condemnation and execution she was visited by numbers of the townspeople, some of whom pressed her to own herself a witch and to reveal the names of her supposed accomplices, considerably reminding her that, while there might have been some reason for her silence during her trial, since a confession then would have prejudiced her case, there could now be none, as she was sure to die in any event. The pains of perdition were held up as her certain portion in case of refusal.

Upon one of these occasions, the minister and a number of the townfolks being present, the poor woman replied to her tormentors that she "must not say anything that was not true, she must not wrong anybody," but that in case she had anything to say before going out of the world she would reveal it to the minister, or to Mr. Ludlow, at the gallows. Elizabeth Brewster, a bystander, roughly answered, "If you keep it till you come to the ladder the devil will have you quick, if you reveal it not till then."

"Take care," was the indignant reply of the prisoner, "that the devil have not you, for you cannot tell how soon you may be my companion. The truth is," added she, "you would have me say that Goodwife Staples is a witch, but I have sins enough to answer for already, and I hope I shall not add to my condemnation. I know nothing against Goodwife Staples, and I hope she is an honest woman."

On being rebuked for these words by Richard Lyon, one of her keepers, on the ground that their tendency was to create discord between neighbors after she was gone, she replied, "Goodman Lyon, hold your tongue! You know not what I know: I have been fished withal in private more than you are aware of. I apprehend that Goodwife Staples hath done me some wrong in her testimony, but I must not return evil for evil."

When further urged and reminded that she was "now to die, and therefore should deal truly," this convicted witch burst into tears and implored her persecutors to cease, saying, in words that lingered long in the memory of those who stood by, and can hardly be read even now without emotion, "Never, never poor creature was tempted as I am tempted; pray, pray for me!" Under such a pressure it is not surprising that her fortitude sometimes wavered, and that a frivolous confession, afterwards recanted, was made by her, implicating Mrs. Staples.

A clue to the spot where Goody Knapp was executed is furnished by a remark of one of the witnesses in the depositions already alluded to, who describes it as being between the house of one Michael Fry and the mill. Fry's property was near the eastern border of the settlement, hence the locality referred to must have been between the present sites of Bridgeport and Fairfield.

On the way thither the Rev. Mr. Jones, who walked by the prisoner's side in the procession, again exhorted her to confess her guilt, but was reproved by her companion, Mrs. Staples, who cried, "Why bid her confess what she is not? I make no doubt but that if she were a witch she would confess," and also intimated that for her own part she had been troubled with doubts as to whether there really was any such creature as a witch.

Beneath the gibbet the heart of Goody Knapp again failed her, and after all was in readiness she was allowed to descend the ladder and repeat a confession in the ear of Mr. Ludlow, similar to that already referred to. If her expectation was to obtain a reprieve she was disappointed, for the executioner shortly did his work, and her body hung suspended until life was extinct. It was then cut down and laid upon the green turf beside the open grave, while a number of her own sex clustered around, some waiting to take a last look at the face of their unfortunate neighbor, but the greater part intent only upon satisfying their base curiosity respecting the witchmarks of which the witnesses had spoken. Kneeling beside the corpse was Mrs. Staples, who, to borrow the language of one who was present, "wringing her hands, and taking y^e Lord's name in her mouth," called upon all within hearing to listen to her solemn protestation of the innocence of the murdered woman.

Pointing to the supposed witchmarks, she declared that they were naught but such as she herself or any woman might have. "Ay, and be hanged for them, too," was the rejoinder of one of the older women present.

The question of the guilt or innocence of the deceased continued to be discussed with acrimony for a long time. Mr. Ludlow saw fit to repeat the story told him by the dying woman, and to add, upon his own responsibility, that Thomas Staples' wife was not only in all probability a witch, but also "made a trade of lying." On this Staples brought suit against Ludlow for defamation of his wife's character, and after listening to the evidence a New Haven court had the good sense to allow the plaintiff damages in the sum of fifteen pounds. Had similar spirit been shown at a later period in Massachusetts, much suffering might have been averted.

The last person condemned to death for witchcraft in Connecticut was a woman named Mercy Disbrow, who was tried in Fairfield in 1692, Governor Robert Treat, Secretary Allyn, and other eminent personages being present and assisting in the proceedings. With her were indicted three others,—the widow Elizabeth Staples and Goodwives Miller and Clawson. In the indictment of Mercy Disbrow she was charged with "familiarity with Satan, the grand enemy of God and man," and with "conspiring to injure in a preternatural way the bodies and estates of divers of his majesty's subjects."

From the testimony it appears that all the sickness and every accident occurring in the neighborhood for months previous were laid to the charge of these unfortunate women. They were believed to have the power of the evil eye, to torment their victims, whether by throwing them into convulsions and by pricking them with pins, or by appearing to them at midnight and dancing in fantastic guise at the foot of their bed. Their power was also thought to extend to animals.

In the end all were acquitted except Mercy Disbrow, who was sentenced to death by the Governor. A petition for her pardon was, however, extensively signed, and must have been granted, since a number of years afterwards she was still living in Westport. The real reason for her escape was doubtless the general revulsion of feeling following the Salem tragedies, which occurred about the same time.

"AUNT NAB," THE WITCH.*

When a small boy, the writer has often had pointed out to him a small building a few miles north of Greenfield Hill, where it was said that "Aunt Nab," a noted old witch, once resided. She had such a reputation for practicing the "black art" that the community for miles around was afraid of offending her. It was said that there would some casualty surely happen to any person so unfortunate as to make her angry. All sorts of incredible stories were told of her revengeful acts towards her enemies, and all mysterious happenings in the neighborhood were ascribed to her wonderful powers.

Tradition relates that she at one time, for some unaccountable reason, did not exercise the diabolical power attributed to her. A number of persons with carts loaded with hay were going from Redding to the seaboard and stopped at the brook near her house to water their oxen. When leaving, one wheel of Uncle John H.'s cart came off, and the hay had to be thrown off and loaded again. While thus engaged "Aunt Nab" came out and ridiculed them. Uncle John told her to go into the house, but she continued the derision and laughed all the more. At last, the patience of Uncle John being completely exhausted, he gave her a severe cart-whipping. The neighbors looked on with amazement at what they conceived to be an act which would lead to a fearful retribution, and told the old man that something terrible would befall him before his return; but he, with an oath, declared that if he had any further trouble about it he would surely kill the old witch. As nothing unusual happened to him, she was either unable or afraid to do him an injury.

We remember to have listened with breathless silence to stories told of her by one of her contemporaries. The following, which was believed to be true, we distinctly recollect: In the immediate vicinity of this notable personage resided an old gentleman of sterling character and worth, enough of a Presbyterian to defy witches or devils, and of muscular power and courage "to grapple with foes material or ghostly." Our hero was a farmer by profession, and after he had forced the rugged soil to yield its scanty crop, and the grain was safely garnered, he frequently missed quantities from his bins. He watched the witch in vain. She eluded his grasp, and vanished into air whenever he discovered her in the darkness of night. These petty depredations continuing, he, becoming impatient, at last constructed an ingenious trap in his granary, and, lo! the next morning, when he went to his barn, there stood witchcraft embodied and visible to human eyes. It appeared to be the veritable "Aunt Nab." The lord of the manor passed her without saying a word or apparently noticing her. After doing his "chores" he was quietly leaving, when the ghost in the trap called out, "Uncle Thomas, for God's sake let me go!" Uncle Thomas was, however, deaf and blind just then, and after breakfast went out to interview his game. The old woman made a full confession, and promised reformation. She was released with the solemn warning of Paul to the Ephesians: "Let him that stole steal no more."

After a few months a daughter of Uncle Thomas, who was a prepossessing young lady of fifteen summers, was awakened from her quiet slumber at midnight. A fiendish form stood beside her couch, and in an instant seized her by the lower limbs and with superhuman effort hurled her bodily through the door into her father's apartment. The family, being thus unduly alarmed, sought the cause. But the daughter was insensible, and the witch invisible. The girl suffered intensely for weeks, and gradually drew her knees to her chest, and was in that condition for years, helpless and a burden to her friends, but intelligent and skillful with needle and pen. Years after "Aunt Nab" "shook off the mortal coil" the bonds were loosened from the afflicted girl, and she became straight and strong. She confirmed the above statement, and fully believed "Aunt Nab" was her tormenter.

FAIRFIELD (Continued).

COLONIAL HOUSES.*

THE houses which are at present standing that were built in the old colonial times, and were spared from the conflagration of July 8, 1779, are:

1. The old house nearly opposite the old burying-ground in the rear of town-hall. It has not yet been ascertained who built it nor when it was built. The first ownership was of the Bulkeley's; probably it was Thomas Bulkeley (second son of the Rev. Peter Bulkeley, of Concord, Mass.), who came with his father-in-law, the Rev. John Jones, first minister in the Prime Ancient Church (Congregational), in 1644, and died in 1656. The Bulkeley's deserve more than passing notice, as through them our history has been greatly augmented.

The Rev. Peter Bulkeley, B.D., was of honorable descent. He was of the tenth generation from Robert Bulkeley, Esq., one of the English barons, who in the reign of King John (who died in 1216) was lord of the manor of Bulkeley, in the county-palatine of Chester. The names of the lineal descendants from Robert, furnished by Charles Bulkeley, Esq., of New London, a grandson of Gershom, gathered from a sketch on the names and titles of nobility, were: 1, William; 2, Robert; 3, Peter, who married Nicholas Bird, of Hampton; 4, John, who married Andryne, daughter and heir to John Colley, of Ward, and died in 1450; 5, Hugh, who married Hellen Wilbriham, of Woodley; 6, Humphrey, who married Cyle, daughter and heir of John Matten; 7, William, who married Beatryce, daughter and heir to William of Bulansdale; 8, Thomas, who married Elizabeth, daughter of Randelle Grovenor; 9, Edward, D.D., of Woodhill, who married Olive Isby, of Lincolnshire; 10, Peter, of Concord. He (Peter) was born at Woodhill, in Bedfordshire, Jan. 31, 1583. His father, the Rev. Edward Bulkeley, D.D., was a faithful minister of the gospel, under whose direction his son received a learned and religious education suited to his distinguished rank. About the age of sixteen he was admitted a member of St. John's College at Cambridge, of which he was afterwards chosen fellow, and from which he received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He succeeded his father in the ministry in his native town, and enjoyed his rich benefice and estate, where he was a zealous preacher of evangelical truth about twenty years, and for the most part of the time lived an unmolested nonconformist.

At length, his preaching meeting with distinguished success, and his church being very much increased, complaints were entered against him by Archbishop Laud, and he was silenced for his nonconformity to the requirements of the English Church. This circumstance induced him to emigrate to New England, where he might enjoy liberty of conscience. He arrived in Cambridge in 1634 or 1635, and was the leader of resolute and self-denying Christians who settled with him at Concord, where he expended most of his property for the good of his people, and there he died March 9, 1659, aged seventy-six. He was twice married: (1) To Jane Allen, daughter of Thomas Allen, of Goldington, whose nephew was lord mayor of London. This marriage resulted in ten sons and two daughters. (2) To Grace Chetwood; they had four children.

By the first marriage their eldest son, Edward, was born in England. He was a highly educated minister, and was the father of four children, of whom Hon. Peter Bulkeley (appointed to offices of great distinction) had a son Joseph, who married the widow Rebecca Minot, daughter of John Jones, and Thomas, brother of the Rev. Edward Bulkeley, married Sarah, another daughter of Rev. John Jones. They had five children, four of whom are on the Fairfield (Connecticut) records. The Bulkeley property was quite extensive, occupying the place of the present John Glover and the two houses known as the Denison property.

Jonathan,† the eightieth descendant of the first Bulkeley settler in America, born Sept. 21, 1731, married Hannah Hoyt, daughter of James Hoyt, of Norwalk, Conn., June, 1762. They occupied the old building which was on the site of John Glover's house, an illustration and description of which are found in Barber's "Collection of Connecticut Reminiscences."

On the 7th of July, 1776, Governor Tryon, with his army, sailed from New Haven to Fairfield, and the next morning disembarked upon the beach. The Hessians who accompanied Tryon were his incendiaries. To them he intrusted the wielding of the torch, and faithfully they obeyed their master. When the people fled from the town, not suspecting that their homes would be burned, they left most of their furniture behind. The distress was, consequently, great, for many lost every earthly possession. Among the buildings saved was that of Mr. Bulkeley. Tryon made it his headquarters. The naval officer who had charge of the British ships, piloted them to Fairfield, was Mrs. Bulkeley's brother (George Hoyt), and he had requested Tryon to spare the house of his sister. Tryon acquiesced, and, feeling his indebtedness to her brother, the general informed Mrs. Bulkeley that if there was any other house she wished to save she should be gratified. After the enemy left the enraged militia, under Capt. Sturges, placed a field-piece in front of the dwelling, and then sent Mrs. Bulkeley word that she might have two hours to clear the house and leave it, or they would blow her to atoms. She found means to communicate a notice of her situation to Gen. Silliman (see "Colonial," No. 45), who was about two miles distant. He immediately went to town and found one hundred and fifty men at the common. By threats and persuasions he induced them to withdraw. The next day Col. Benjamin Talmadge, with his regiment, arrived from White Plains, and, encamping on the smoking ruins, made Tryon's quarters his own. Mrs. Bulkeley was not a friend of the enemy. According to her testimony under oath, she was badly treated by the soldiery, notwithstanding she had a protection from Gen. Garth, the second in command. They plundered her house, stripped the buckles from her shoes, tore a ring from her finger, and fired the house five times before leaving it. The four houses on the opposite side of the street now standing were saved through her intercession.

The occupant of this house, opposite the cemetery, in 1779, was Peter Bulkeley (see Dr. Rankin's "Historical Discourse," July 8, 1879). The houses built at the colonial period embrace two styles of architecture,—the one long and one short roof, and the gambrel or hip roof. This Bulkeley house has the one long roof, and has never been remodeled. This antiquated structure has been the shelter for the ancestors of the numerous Bulkeley families in Southport and adjoining towns. Passing out of the family, it has been used as a tenement-house for years. It may be interesting to know that two thousand or more people can trace their ancestry to the Thomas Bulkeley who settled in one of the two (the one which was Tryon's headquarters, or No. 1, colonial) houses already mentioned.

No. 2. This was also built at an early date on the Bulkeley domains, and was owned by members of the family for several consecutive generations. At the time of the burning of Fairfield it belonged to Nathan Bulkeley, son of Joseph and Esther Bulkeley, born Jan. 16, 1718. He married Sarah, daughter of Joseph Perry, Sr. (see "Colonial," No. 9). He was active in Church and State and a prominent man, as he was deacon in the Prime Ancient Church and was town clerk for thirty-two consecutive years. His daughter Esther married David Judson. She inherited these two (houses 1 and 2) from her father. In 1786, Nathan Bulkeley resigned his deaconship, owing to ill health, and David Judson was chosen in his place. He was also town clerk from 1791 to 1794. He was a prominent man, as may be inferred from the incident of his conferring with Dr. David Hull and Hon. R. M. Sherman on the question as to whom there was in Fairfield to care for the interests of the church, the academy, and the library, which they had close to their hearts, when their declining years forbade them bearing their part of the enterprise.

Mrs. Esther Judson willed this property to the second wife of the late Dr. Jeremiah T. Denison, an excellent and worthy physician of the homeopathic school. He died in this house in 1879 in the seventy-fourth year of his age, mourned both by the professional and social circles, where he was extensively known and universally respected. He was born in 1806, and was a son of Capt. Henry Denison, who for twenty years was the honored president of the New Haven Bank. Dr. Denison graduated from Yale College in 1824. Immediately after he proceeded to Europe, and in Paris and London devoted himself to medical and surgical science. Having familiarized himself with the methods in vogue at the principal scientific institutions in Europe, he returned to his native city to complete his curriculum at his own Alma Mater under the preceptorship of the late Prof. Knight, with whom he was an especial favorite, and into whose family he afterwards married. In 1827 he took his degree in medicine, and commenced the practice of his profession at Warehouse Point, Conn., from whence, after two years of successful practice, he returned to New Haven, and became professionally associated with his old preceptor. Being thoroughly qualified by theory and practice, he availed himself of a favorable opening for a permanent location in Fairfield, Conn., where for nearly forty years he was known as a successful physician and an honorable and honored citizen.

About twenty-five years before his death the principles of homeopathy were pressed upon his attention, and his earnest and rigid investigation resulted in his adoption of Hahnemann's system of science, for which he underwent relentless persecution. He was one of the founders of the Connecticut Homeopathic Society, and was elected its first president in 1851. His respect for the conscientious convictions of others was most exemplary, never allowing difference of opinion and belief to mar personal friendship. He was a genial gentleman, and underwent many afflictions, which he bore with Christian resignation, and his loss was sincerely mourned by the community in which he lived, where his virtues were so conspicuous. See Republican Standard, Bridgeport, Conn., May, 1879.

Dr. Denison was also judge of Probate in this town, and was a person of fine aesthetic tastes. He remodeleled and newly covered the house, adding the veranda, and so modernized it that it has the appearance of a more recent structure.

House No. 1 has belonged to this estate for several years. Dr. Denison willed both of these houses to his relatives, who are awaiting a disposal of the same. No. 2 has been occupied for several months by Dr. J. Dobson, who was elected to occupy the professor's chair of physiology in the United States Medical College, in New York City, to the regret of those citizens in Fairfield who enjoyed the benefit of his skill as a physician and the pleasure of his acquaintance as a scholar and gentleman.

No. 3 was built by Justin Hobart in 1765. He was a native of Hingham, Mass., and son of Rev. Nehemiah Hobart, who died when Justin was eight years old, and a brother, Rev. Noah Hobart, adopted him, and on being called to accept the pastorate of the Prime Ancient Church, brought him hither.

An account of the calling is given in the church record, which is here given:

"At a meeting of ye Brothron ye communicants of ye Church in ye Prime Society in Fairfield, on Wednesday, ye 5th day of Jan'y, A.D. 1732, Deacon William Hill chosen Moderator,* Eben^s Silliman chosen Scribe,† put to vot at s^d meeting whether ye church make choice of ye Rev^d Mr. Noah Hobart for ye head & pastor. In ye affirmative nom. con.

"Put to vot at s^d meeting whether ye Ordination of ye Rev^d Mr. Hobart be attended on Wednesday, ye 7th Day of February next; & in ye affirmative nom^s Cont^e. At s^d meeting also And^s Burr, Esq^r, Deacon Lothrop Lewis, & Mr. Eben^s Silliman were chosen a com^{tee} to call a council to Ordain ye s^d Rev^d Mr. Hobart on s^d Day.

"The Consociation of the county of Fairfield sat at Fairfield Feb. 6th & 7th, 1732, at the Desire of the Church of the Prime Society in said Place to ordain a pastor over them."

The members of the council given, it is further stated that,—

"The committee of the society produced in council the doings of said Society, by which it appeared that Mr. Noah Hobart, a candidate for the ministry, who for some time had been laboring among them, has a unanimous call of ye s^d Society to the work of the ministry in s^d Place. A copy of the doings of the church of s^d Society was their call to ye s^d Mr. Hobart to be their pastor.

"Mr. Hobart produced a certificate under the hands of Sundry ministers, who, from their personal acquaintance with the said Mr. Hobart, do signify his being one of a virtuous conversation, in full communion with their churches, and of desirable ministerial accomplishments. The Council, after a serious and impartial examination, are well satisfied with Mr. Hobart, both in respect to orthodoxy and ministerial qualifications, and do heartily concur with the s^d society and church in respect to their motion."

The ordination was conducted according to the motions, and Mr. Hobart labored with them from that time till his death.

The recorder wrote in the record,—

"The Rev^d Mr. Noah Hobart died in this Town on Monday, December 6th, 1773, at half-past 4 o'clock. He was born at Hingham, in the Massachusetts, Jan'y 2d, 1705-6, old stile, and was ordained to the pastoral charge of this church Feb'y 7th, 1732. There were baptized during his ministry 909 persons."

His body rests under the slab in the old burying-ground containing the following inscription:

"In Memory
of
The Rev. Noah Hobart,
A. M.,
Ordained Pastor of the first Church of Christ in Fairfield,
February 7th, 1732,
In which station
He served God & his Generation with Fidelity and Usefulness until December 6th, 1773,
When he was taken
From the approaching trouble
To receive
The mercy of God thro' Christ.

"Remember them who have spoken unto you the word of God, whose faith follow."

As Rev. Noah Hobart was minister in this place and introduced the Hobart family here, his history was worthy of a space.

It is related that Justin Hobart was brought up to mind the strict letter of the law, which in those days contained such regulations as these:

"No one shall run on the Sabbath-day, or walk in his garden or elsewhere, except reverently to and from meeting."

"No one shall travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep house, cut hair, or shave on the Sabbath-day."

A neighboring minister was to officiate in Fairfield that Sunday, and in entering the town it seems that his horse had assumed an unlawful gait. Mr. Hobart stopped him, telling him that he would better accompany him home, which the minister did. After a while meeting was called. Mr. Hobart asked him if he would attend church. The minister thought he would, so they walked on together into church, when Mr. Hobart turned to seat his comrade; but what was Mr. Hobart's surprise to see the minister pass on and ascend into the pulpit and commence services, which was the first intimation he received of the mission of his professional friend. Mr. Hobart's feelings may be better imagined than described.

This was one of the houses saved through the intercession of Mrs. Jonathan Bulkeley.

The court-house, shops, barns, most of the dwellings, and the churches being burnt, services were held in various houses till some place of worship could be rebuilt. The court-house was first built in 1720, burnt in the general conflagration in 1779, and rebuilt in 1794. Divine services were held in Mr. Hobart's house for some time, and then in the house used for courts till the church was rebuilt, which was in 1785.

Justin Hobart and his wife, Hannah Penfield Hobart, both died in 1809, having lived beyond their "threescore years and ten;" and Justin Hobart, Jr., and his wife, Desire Burr, became the owners of the property. He was town clerk for one year, from 1813 to 1814. That generation having passed away, their daughter Hannah is the present owner and occupant.

* See Colonial, No. 37.

† See Colonial, No. 41.

No. 4. This house was built in 1766 by Isaac Tucker, who sold it to Capt. Jonathan Maltbie. The latter was owner and occupant during the Revolutionary times. Mr. Henry Rowland, in writing some reminiscences, states that his "Grandfather Maltbie's was reserved for a 'cook-house.' After the conflagration the inhabitants of the town returned, when the British had gone on board their ships. A number of the British soldiers were killed, and buried where they fell. Father used to tell about the hands and feet appearing just above ground in front of the meeting-house, which proved to be a British officer buried in his regimentals (not far from 'Colonial' No. 4). Grandfather Maltbie, on returning to his house (he was a sea-captain in the East India trade), found all their valuable china scooped off the shelves on to the floor and broken into pieces, and everything upside down. In the kitchen, in the fireplace, hung a large brass kettle filled with their hams, but they dare not eat them, fearing they were poisoned;" so they started anew with provisions.

Mr. Rowland, in his pleasant narrative,—which in this case relates to human nature (which was about the same sixty years ago as it is now) and the slave system, as well as to the owner of No. 4,—says, "About as soon as I could handle a broom my mother used to hire me to sweep the grass around the house with a stub whisk-broom. It in vacation-time, I made a short job as I could. If school-time, between the sessions,—my pay was a fourpence ha'penny (6½ cents),—it took me several days, and I thought I was making money. I began work as soon as the spring grass needed it. Old Kitt (colored man) would lend a hand sometimes and take his pay in a drink of cider. He was brought from Guinea, a slave, by Grandfather Maltbie, who gave him to mother, and when she married, father bought him of her for a piece of land in the field, and he (father) gave him his freedom; and he afterwards was employed on our place till he got so old he could no longer work, and died, as near as we could reckon his age, about one hundred years old. His wife was Dinah, who had, I think, seventeen children, all dead now except one. He was looked upon as one of our family, and was clever to us boys. We had a care for him as long as he lived.

Capt. Jonathan Maltbie's son inherited this place and sold it to Justin Hobart, Jr. (See No. 3.) His son, Edmund Hobart, is the present owner and occupant. He has filled the offices of judge of Probate, town treasurer, and postmaster.

No. 5. No records of the building of this house have been found. Henry Rowland settled in Fairfield in 1669. His son Samuel (1st) was born 1679, and died 1748. Samuel (1st) left a son Samuel (2d), born 1703, died 1782. The latter Samuel left a son Andrew, born 1737 and died 1802. Whether it was built for a Rowland is unknown, but Andrew Rowland was the possessor and occupant in 1779. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Governor Fitch, of Norwalk, where his monument is, which contains this inscription:

"The Hon'ble Thomas Fitch, Esqr., Govr. of the Colony of Connecticut. Eminent and distinguished among mortals for great abilities, large acquirements and a virtuous character; a clear, strong, sedate mind; an accurate, extensive acquaintance with law and civil government; a happy talent of presiding; close application and strict fidelity in the discharge of important truths; no less than for his employments, by the voice of the people, in the chief offices of state, and at the head of the colony. Having served his generation, by the will of God fell asleep, July 18th, Ann Domini 1774, in the 75th year of his age."*

Mr. Henry Rowland—who has a handsome residence contiguous to the grounds where the Episcopal Church† stood in 1779, and on which site a spacious hotel of great reputation was burnt some years later, and which is known now as the "hotel lot"—narrates the following: "My father (born in 1769, therefore ten years old at the burning of the town) in our boy-days used to interest and amuse us in stories about the Revolutionary war, caused by excessive taxation and a colonial representation, which led the country into a revolt. The town of Fairfield was much larger than it now is (1880) before it was burnt. There was a large Episcopal church standing in the 'hotel lot,' fronting the street leading to the depot. In the steeple of this church father went to the top to have a good view of the landing of the British on the beach. While father was enjoying the sight a townsman appeared up there to watch the movements of the enemy, who, surprised to find a boy there with no anxious concern (the troops were marching up Beach Lane), said to him, 'Unless you make your escape, you'll be killed. Make haste, you young rascal, and get away.' Father went down into the street in hot haste, and saw great commotion among the people. He mounted his old white mare and put for out of the village double quick. Up the street he went, turned the corner at the meeting-house, and pushed on as fast as the old mare could carry him towards Capt. Jennings',‡ with the bullets whizzing by his head without hitting. The troops had now reached the green. He turned Capt. Jennings' corner, put for Smith's Hill,—now Deacon Joseph Lockwood's,—where Capt. Smith had a six-pounder on wheels,

* See Barber's Connecticut Historical Collections.

† This was the second Episcopal church in Fairfield, the first having been located on the grounds on Mill Plain now owned by Mr. Frederic Sturges, nearly opposite his mother's, Mrs. Mary Sturges, and near the house occupied by Mrs. Burr Clemons. This church changed its site every time a new one was built, as the third one was located on the green on Mill Plain, the fourth was in Southport. The present one in Fairfield is a new organization, being St. Paul's; the other four bore the name of Trinity, which was founded by

"Mr. Abraham Adams, who died Aug. ye 20th, 1729, in ye 80th year of his age,
Having been a worthy Founder and liberal Benefactor to Trinity Church."

His body was buried in the burying-ground in the rear of the first Episcopal church, under the above inscription.

banging away, hit or miss, at the British assembled on the green. Father was gone three days among the cedars, living upon apples. On his return he found the church from which he made his exit and the town all burnt, except a few houses, and the smoking remains and live coals in the cellars. His father's house (now Benjamin Betts') was among the saved. Grandmother Rowland remained in the house; the other inmates fled. A British officer with his men went to fire it, when she told them of a favor she had done years before to a British officer, and in consequence her house was spared. She was a heroic woman, to stand alone at her post in danger. Her husband and children, she knew not where they were nor in what condition, but he (Andrew Rowland) lived till 1802, and his wife till 1825."

This heroine rests not far from the gate in the old burying-ground, under this slab:

"Elizabeth Rowland,
the widow of Andrew Rowland, Esq., and daughter of the late Governor Fitch, of this State, died March 29th, 1825,
in her 87th year."

Andrew Rowland (1737 to 1802) was educated at Yale College, and was a lawyer, State attorney and judge of Probate, and justice of peace. He left a famous will, which is recorded in the Probate Records. An extract from the preamble reads:

"I order my executors to inter my body in a Christian manner, that there be no funeral sermon nor pall-bearers. I order there be no presents given on the occasion, and desire there be no eulogium or panegyric from pulpit or otherwise at any time whatever; in my opinion, they do no good. I direct an inscription on my grave-stone, to contain the month and day and year of my death, and the year of my age."

Among the items of distribution is mention of "a large landed estate lying south of Lake Erie, and conveyed by grant by the General Assembly to me and others, of one half-million acres of land." There are also items by which a valuable property is conveyed, but space forbids a full copy.

His son Samuel (third of that name), 1769 to 1837, was prepared for college by the celebrated Dr. Dwight at Greenfield Hill. He graduated from Yale. He was a lawyer and turnpike surveyor from Fairfield to the New York line. He was town clerk from 1794 to 1813, and from 1814 to 1837.

His son, Mr. Henry Rowland, is a prominent flour-merchant in New York City, though he spends several months yearly in Fairfield. He is a public-spirited man, and is much attached to his native town. He has three sons: Henry Edwards Rowland, who graduated at Princeton College in 1872; Samuel Rowland, who is active in Church and State, full of the spirit of his fathers; Amory Edwards Rowland, who graduated at the scientific school at Yale College in 1873.

Mr. Andrew Rowland disposed of this "Colonial No. 5" to Gershom Sturges, who in time transferred it to Andrew Joy (now of Bridgeport). He sold it to Miss Sarah White, who in her younger days "kept school," "where," as Mr. Rowland says, "the elements of life were taught, including sewing and knitting, to the boys as well as girls. In those days the juvenile duties were great. Many a child broke down under its burden, and resorted to a corner of the school-room, where an old quilt and pillow were used for naps to such as could not keep their eyes open."

Miss White was a very methodical person, as her journal for fifty years shows. It has proved of value to the citizens for reference. For several years she wove in personal matter; after that it was but a narration of general facts,—the wind and the weather. Her system of keeping accounts might be advantageous to all who would adopt it. All money received or paid out was entered, with the date of the transaction. One time she was called upon to renew her insurance. She had done so, but, for some cause, the policy had not been forwarded. A reference to her books caused her lawyer to state that her method of doing business would stand a legal test and was of as much value as a receipt from the firm or company. A fisherman's bill was not paid over the second time for the same reason.

Some of these journals are in the possession of Mrs. Jane Kippen, daughter of Samuel A. Nichols (see "Colonial," No. 18). Miss White lived in this house several years, when she was gathered to her fathers in a ripe old age, but not till she had willed her possessions to two Misses Wakeman, from whom this property was purchased by Mr. Benjamin Betts, being near his store and also contiguous to his father's (Mr. Moses Betts) premises. Mr. Moses Betts was town clerk from 1863 to 1867, and held offices of trust in Church and State for many years. He was engaged in mercantile business most of his years, which numbered at their close seventy-six. His wife also died the same year (1880). (See No. 13.)

No. 6. Here a little prefatory history is necessary, to appreciate the subsequent matter: William Redfin, or Redfield,* was, in 1639, the owner of a house and four acres of land on the south side of Charles River, about six miles from Boston. In 1646 he disposed of that property, and shortly after is supposed to have removed to Pequot, the present site of New London, with a party of settlers, under the leadership of Johnathan Brewster, son of Elder William Brewster, of the Plymouth Colony. The name of William Redfyn reappears, at least in this new settlement, in 1653, in connection with the transfer of certain lands to said Redfyn; and here the name appears to have become changed, inasmuch as in the New London records the forms are used interchangeably in the same deed or document. William Redfin died in 1662. His son James was apprenticed to a tanner (bound to him for five years), but does not appear fully to have acquired the trade, on account of his employer, Hugh Roberts, breaking up his business. We find James afterwards exercising the vocation of a weaver. He resided (1) at New London; (2) near the fort in Saybrook; and (3) at New Haven. Also he appears to have been an inhabitant of Martha's Vineyard for a year (1671). He had three sisters, one of whom (Lydia) married Thomas Bayley, who was slain in the disastrous Indian ambush at Bloody Brook, Mass., Sept. 18, 1675, under command of Capt. Lothrop, in King Philip's war. James Redfield, the first (born 1646), came to Fairfield about 1693. Here he married, for his second wife, Deborah, daughter of John Sturges, who was a freeman of Fairfield as early as 1660, and a prominent man in the community. He had a son James (2d) baptized in Fairfield in 1696. He made over his Fairfield property to his son James (2d) during his life, and is said to have resided near Hyde's Pond, which was entirely drained and filled up by Mr. Frederic Sturges in 1879.

James (2d) was the father of James (3d) and John. The latter son married, in 1758, Mary (Hull) Jennings, widow of Dr. Seth Jennings, whose daughter, Esther Jennings, married Peter Burr, of Fairfield.

Probably this house was built by John Redfield. At all events, his family occupied it in 1779, and were among the sufferers from the brutalities of the British soldiers under the infamous Tryon. Mr. Redfield was away from home, but in the house were his aged step-mother, his wife, Lucretia, and a child. A party of the enemy, with three officers, came to the house and ordered it to be fired, alleging that one of their men had just before been taken prisoner in that vicinity. Mrs. Redfield by exertions succeeded in extinguishing the fire, although the burning was four times attempted.

During the night the British soldiers roamed through the village without the slightest control from their officers, and three of them entered the house of Mrs. Redfield, where they destroyed the furniture, ransacked and plundered the house, and rifled the pockets of the inmates. Even the gray hairs of Mr. Redfield's widowed mother did not protect her from plunder and gross insult, and his wife was saved from shameful violence by the opportune entrance of two men, one of whom stated that he had been a prisoner in that town, and had experienced civility and kindness from its inhabitants. These men remained and protected the family through the remainder of the night.

The committee which was afterwards appointed to estimate the losses sustained by the inhabitants of Fairfield by conflagration and plunder on this occasion reported the loss of John Redfield, £38 2s. 4d.; Widow Sarah Redfield, £31 15s. 6d.; Mrs. Lucretia Redfield, £28 3s. 4d.*

The widow of Capt. John Redfield married Henry Marquand; he probably died here, and was buried in the old burying-ground. His tombstone in the old ground bears the following:

"In memory of
Henry Marquand,
Born July 8th, 1737, on the Island of Guernsey, and died July the 12, 1772, after a residence of eleven years in America.
This Stone

Æ 80.

In memory of Gurdon Seymour Marquand,
son of
Isaac & Mabel Marquand,
Born September, 1801, and died 15 May, 1865."

Isaac Marquand married Mabel Perry. ("Colonial," No. 9.) An old journal written by one of Capt. Edwin Sherwood's ancestors says that Henry Marquand was a Frenchman and came from the West Indies to the United States and married Widow Redfield. Their son was a jeweler, and married Mabel Perry. They were the parents of Henry, Josiah, Frederic, etc.

The widow, Mrs. Marquand, must have sold this place to Joseph Perry, as the late Samuel Perry stated that he went there to live when only five years old, and he would be eighty-eight if living. He married a Redfield descendant, and his daughter married a Redfield, as the following shows: Sarah Redfield (probably reared here) married William Bulkeley, of Southport, son of William and Elizabeth Burr Bulkeley. The last named was one of the largest property-holders of the borough of Southport. He built the house (see "Colonial," 50) in which Miss Emily Mecker resides, and owned all the land on the east side of the bridge, including the woods to the water's edge, also the land where Mr. George Bulkeley now resides, the Congregational church, the railroad station, and all the land east of it to the main road. He died in 1787, aged forty-one.† His son William (who married Sarah Redfield), born in 1768, inherited the paternal homestead, which was not burned during the Revolutionary war. He built the store, now improved, occupied by W. B. Mecker, keeping a country supply-store and sending market-boats to New York City. Upon a business visit to the city he was taken ill with the yellow fever, brought home, and died in 1808, aged forty. Mrs. Sarah Redfield Bulkeley died in 1842, aged seventy-six. They had seven children, one of whom, Henrietta, born 1797, married Samuel Perry, of Fairfield, a cabinet-maker and undertaker. They were the owners and occupants for several decades of "Colonial No. 6," both of them attaining a life of not far from four-score years. They left two daughters,—Emily, who married George Ryder, Esq., of Danbury, and Sarah, who married Daniel Marsh Redfield, of Portchester. He is the son of the late Mr.

Isaac B. Redfield, and grandson of Daniel Marsh, of Litchfield, Conn. The latter couple resided with Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Perry till their decease, when they became the owners, and have continued their residence here since.

It is peculiar in structure, being a double house, having but one stairway to reach the second story, and that accessible only through the kitchen. The piazza is supported by Ionian pillars. The whole house has been well preserved, and bids fair to stand another hundred years.

No. 7. This house was built by a Nathan Beers, who died in 1813, in his seventy-ninth year; his wife, Abigail, lived to be ninety. This property has been in the Beers family for generations.

As this part of the town was where they originated, a few words for the race will appropriately come in here. They were noted for their longevity, judging from their tombstones. Nathan Beers, son of the above Nathan, died 1835, in his seventy-ninth year; his wife, Mehetable, died in "1824, aged seventy-one years one month and thirteen days." Another of the Beers family is thus epitaphed:

"In this spot are deposited the remains of
"William Pitt Beers
(Late of Albany, in the State of New York).
Called to the Tomb
in the meridian of life and of usefulness, his memory will be cherished in the affections of a bereaved family and a numerous circle of relatives and friends.
He died 13th Sept., 1819,
Aged 44 years."

Captain David Beers died 1826, aged eighty-one. One stone in the old burying-ground contains,—

"Here lies the body of Lieutenant James Beers, died 1772, aged 79."

This house (No. 7) is owned by Mr. Abraham Gould and Mrs. Eliza Beers, relict of James Beers, and occupied by the same parties.

Mr. Samuel Beers was once high-sheriff in the town. His grandson, Mr. W. A. Beers, yields the pen gracefully as contributing editor of the Southport Times, which has the following history: "The first paper published in Fairfield was issued as the Southport Advertiser, published by Messrs. J. H. Wood, J. F. Jennings, and Thomas Bradley for one year, after which the name was changed to Southport Chronicle, with the same proprietors excepting George Baker, the present editor of the Stamford Advocate. Two years later the original partners withdrew and Mr. Baker associated with him Mr. Benjamin F. Bulkeley. Three years later the Chronicle Association was organized, C. M. Gilman, Esq., editor, with a capital of three thousand dollars. It is now an independent conservative paper, having for editor Rev. Henry A. Van Dalsem, of Southport. Contributing editors, William A. Beers, of Fairfield; William H. Smith, of Mill Plain; Chas. H. Gray, of Greenfield. (See "Colonial," No. 50.)

By the efforts of W. A. Beers the Times has acquired its popularity, and his articles are frequently copied in the New York papers as works of much merit.

No. 8. This "colonial" was built by David Osborn, where he brought his wife Mary Beers (see "Colonial," No. 7) Osborn. Here were their three sons—Hezekiah, Daniel Beers, and David—born, whom their parents saw make a beginning in life. Hezekiah built him a house, occupied now by Mrs. Burr Clemons (belonging to Mr. Frederic Sturges), and there he brought his wife, Nancy, daughter of Peter and Sarah Bradley Perry. (See "Colonial," No. 9.) Hezekiah followed the sea and was captain of a vessel. He moved to Black Rock; from thence they accompanied their children to Verona, N. Y., where they died. She was nearly one hundred years old. The sons went to Kansas, and were there located at latest reports. Daniel, born May 5, 1779, took the house built for Hezekiah, and brought his wife, Sally Wakeman, a near descendant of the Rev. Samuel Wakeman, ancestor of most of the Wakemans in town, of whom Andrew P. Wakeman is at present a prominent and efficient town officer. Here were born Mrs. Eben Burr,* of Fairfield, and Mrs. Lyman Wilcox, of Illinois. David married Rebecca Sturges, daughter of Benjamin Sturges, to whom the grant was given on Mill River for a fulling-mill. He (David Osborn) built the house occupied by Miss Rebecca S. Carew, and, in company with his father, David kept a country store on the corner opposite the new graded school-house and Miss Carew's. There was also a shoemaker's shop attached to the store. The father died in 1813, aged seventy, with the typhus fever, which was then an epidemic. Two bachelors, Jonathan and Aaron Beers, were afraid to pass a house where there was a victim of the disease, but they both took it and died with it. The son David died in 1815.

The store was moved to the premises now owned by Mr. Charles Smith, son of Master Elnathan Smith, who was aide-de-camp to Gen. Washington. He afterwards taught a select school on Mill Plain. There is one lady living (Mrs. Elizabeth Meggs, now seventy-nine, who was born on the spot where St. Thomas' church (Catholic) now stands, since it was removed) who attended his school, and who relates that he would in his last years go to sleep, and the children would tickle his nose. While the store stood on the Smith premises it was occupied by Maj. Samuel Beers (brother of Mrs. Mary Beers Osborn and father of Mr. Henry J. Beers), who was deputy sheriff of the county and kept the jail, and there he died.

This store was then moved to the premises of Mr.

* See "Special Houses," No. 2.

Samuel Perry (see "Colonial," 6), who used it in his cabinet business or as a shop. It was moved again on the highway above Mr. Ebenezer Burr's and converted into a dwelling, owned at present by James Flanagan.

From the family of David and Mary Osborn have descended four generations, which constitute a goodly portion of Fairfield and form a worthy line.

In 1876 a centennial party was held here, which proved to be a family gathering, as many of the grandchildren and great-grandchildren formed a large share of the company. Dresses were there that probably were worn in the same house one hundred years before, and had figured at balls and parties at that date. The oldest dresses worn originally belonged to Miss Abigail Burr, sister of Gen. Gershom Burr. "Hats and cloaks that had ridden on horseback with their owners five or ten miles to hear some famous divine expound the doctrines of Christianity were present; also ancient wedding-dresses were displayed, looking as well as when they decked the brides for whom they were made, all of whom have long been sleeping the peaceful sleep that knows no waking."⁸ These garments are stored away carefully for future use,—fitting habiliments to wear in these old houses once in a hundred years.

The Osborns have been very numerous in Fairfield. Among the stones in the old graveyard one reads,—

"Here lyes Buried
the Body of Capt John Osborn,
who departed this life
Oct 13th, A. D. 1769, in ye
78th year of his age."

The name has undergone changes, as the following is found:

"Here lyes ye Body of Mrs. Abigail Osborn, wife to Mr. Samuel Osborn, Aged about 44 years. Dec^d August ye 5th, 1 7 2 4."

A new stone-cutter or improvement in spelling is shown on her husband's stone:

"Here Lyes Buried
the Body of Mr
Samuel Osborn,
who departed this
Life April 2nd, Anno Domi
1792, Aged 72 Years."

The next stone underwent more changes, as that was to

"Benjamin Osborn,
who departed this Life
July ye 22, 1770.
Aged 47 Years."

Longevity was a feature among the Osborns.

Deacon Daniel Osborn died in 1804, aged seventy-nine years. He was the politest of husbands. In those days it was the custom for milkmaids or housewives to do the milking, so he used to drive up the cow, hand Mrs. Osborn the pail, and brush away the flies while she milked. Mr. Howes Osborn died 1807, aged eighty-five. Mrs. Howes Osborn died 1812, aged eighty-one. (See "Colonial," No. 48.) Hon. Thomas Osborn was member of Congress, and served two terms in the House of Representatives. His residence was that occupied at present by Mr. Henry J. Beers, of Fairfield. Hon. Thomas Osborn was a lawyer. He and Deacons Charles Bennitt and Samuel A. Nichols were executors on Hon. Roger M. Sherman's estate. Mr. Osborn's son, Arthur D., is a lawyer and clerk of the courts in New Haven, Conn.

This colonial property fell by purchase or otherwise to Capt. J. Wakeman Davis, who had five children born here, of whom one son, William, died from eating stramonium-berries. The next day there was no more stramonium on the place, as a scythe cropped every plant of the species.

Capt. Davis made repairs on the place, which afterwards came into the possession of Mr. Walter Jennings, now a resident of Green's Farms. He was an extensive landholder in Mill Plain, owning the premises of Aaron Gould and property in possession of Charles Smith, also a portion of Andrew Thorpe's property. The name of Jennings is associated with real estate in the same district to some extent to this day, the principal representative being Horace Jennings, who has been engaged in the grocery business, but, suffering greatly by three fires, has turned his attention to agriculture.

Mr. Walter Jennings sold this colonial to Andrew Thorpe (son of Capt. Sturges Thorpe), who went to New York in his youth, learned a branch of cabinet-making, and became a member of the firm and amassed a handsome fortune. He built a fine country-seat on the site of his father's (Capt. Sturges Thorpe) house, facing the green on Mill Plain, which he occupied till his death, which occurred July 4, 1877. His property remains undivided.

Mr. Thorpe wished to improve his property by extending his lawns, so he exchanged this colonial with Mrs. Charlotte Burr and her sons, David and Charles Bulkeley, for their home contiguous to his grounds. He removed their house and fences, while they moved into the colonial, which they occupied for some twenty years, when Burr Perry purchased it and newly covered it and made a square two-story house of it by raising the long roof side and changing the chimney. It is now used for a tenement-house.

No. 9. What remains of the old house on the Perry homestead has the following history: It, with the mill-property, belonged to Richard Ogden, and is recorded in 1680. In 1705 the mill was burnt; it then stood on what is now called Laurel Brook. Some of the oak-timbers which helped form the dam reputed as the first in Fairfield are yet on the original foundation. Proofs are given of a dam's being there, as the old deeds are given of land lying in the old mill-pond. Mr. Ogden was too poor to rebuild the mill, so the town bought back the site.

It was next purchased from the town by Joseph Perry (1st), son of Nathaniel and Hester Lyon Perry, and grandson of Richard, the first Perry settler, who received "May ye 18th, 1649," a grant from the town of "one common lott, containyng two acres and ten rods, more or less," etc. "Also one parcel of land in the Newfield" (now Bridgeport). "Also one parcel of meadows in ye meadows before ye town," etc. "Also one parcel of meadow by the harbor."

In Book B, Town Records, page 120, it is found that May 16, 1704, "the town grants liberty to Joseph Perry to erect a grist-mill on ye Mill River att such a place and upon such conditions as ye committee hereafter named shall agree to. Ye committee are as follows, viz.: Capt. John Wakeman, Mr. Peter Burr, John Edwards, John Sturgis, and John Wheeler." Page 133, Book B, states "Joseph Perry proposeth for liberty to erect a grist-mill or mills upon ye Main River near ye place where his present mill stands. Ye town, having considered his proposal, do grant unto him, ye said Perry, liberty to erect a grist-mill or mills on ye main stream or river where he shall think fitt, near ye place where his present mill stand, and only upon ye same terms and conditions as are expressed between him and ye town in ye late covenant about the present mill." Joseph Perry made purchases in 1705, and in 1709 obtained a permit to transfer the building of the mill to Mill River. Tradition states that the mill, on its original site, was protected by a fort from devastation by the Indians, and that one man, while acting as sentinel thereon, was killed by an Indian. It is also stated that a band of Indians set out to destroy it, but a few of the colonists at work in a cornfield, concealed by the high corn, apprehending their danger, made a great noise, which caused the foe to beat a hasty retreat, fearing they were greatly outnumbered.

In 1705, Joseph Perry also bought the Ogden homestead, contiguous to the mill, and in all probability moved thither. Joseph married three times: (1) Sarah, daughter of John Bulkeley; (2) Deborah, daughter of Daniel Burr (1st); (3) Mary, daughter of Michael Clugstone, and granddaughter of Rev. Samuel Wakeman. Joseph was the father of twelve children. It is not known whether they were all born in this house. The original deeds granted him from the town from 1705 till 1751 of the "common and undivided lands" are in possession of Messrs. David Beers and Burr Perry. He (Joseph 1st) lies in the old burying-ground under the simple inscription, all in capitals:

"Here lyes Buried
the Body of Mr
Joseph Perry,
who departed this life August yr 9th, 1 7 5 3,
in the 77th Year
of His Age."*

* His inventory amounted to seven thousand five hundred pounds, and includes a negro wench and a negro girl, but does not include the mill,

His son Joseph, Jr., married Sarah, daughter of Peter Bulkeley (2d), of Fairfield. They had four children. He died eleven days later than his father, leaving a widow and three children.† The eldest, Peter, was born Jan. 24, 1739 (O. S.), and married Sarah Bradley in 1763. They were the parents of fifteen children. Betsey, the last of them, married Samuel Sherwood, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and died in 1878. She was the last of four generations interred in the old burying-ground, whose record (of the four) extends back two hundred and one years. Peter's sister married David Hubbell. (See "Colonial," 21.) His (Peter's) children were baptized Fall, Miah, Pol, and Job. His father intended that the name of the latter should be Jo, but the clergyman, not understanding, baptized him Job. He repaired the house, and, judging from his account-book, he must have remodeled it, as the work of repairs began in 1760 and extended to 1763, at an expense of £159 14s.

This is considered the oldest house in town. It must have been newly sided with cedar shingles, which are yet on two sides of the building, though in some cases holes are worn entirely through them. Everything was probably fitted up in fine style for the times in which he lived. The beaufet, with its circular shelves and rounded-top sash-door, with its curious pane of glass, the cranes, and trammels, yet remains. The tiles about the fireplace have been taken for old-time relics.

Among the one hundred and fifteen items of expense on the house are:

In the old church record kept at Deacon Joseph Lockwood's, written in the beautiful handwriting of Rev. Andrew Eliot, is the following:

"Mary, daughter of James and Elizabeth Bulkeley.

"Jonathan, son of Walter and Ruth Buddington, baptized at the house of Peter Perry, Aug. 15, 1779, the church having been consumed by fire July 8, 1779."

After Peter Perry's death his son Job bought the homestead of the heirs, and placed his son Alfred thereon in 1811, and he in 1815 brought hither his wife, Ann Dimon (see "Colonial," No. 10), who died in 1850. In 1854 he married Mary Godfrey, widow of Walter Andrews, of Easton. She is the last survivor of that generation of Job's family, either of husbands or of wives. In 1835, Alfred built the which had been sold previously to his son Joseph. It also includes a quantity of silver. It is dated Sept. 19, 1753.

† Joseph Perry, Jr.'s inventory amounted to six thousand two hundred pounds, including some silver. Both father and son were wealthy for the times.

present dwelling, occupied by Burr Perry, who married (1) Laura H. Gildersleeve, daughter of Dr. Thomas Gildersleeve, of New York, in 1866. She died in 1869. (2) Kate E. Peet, in 1870, a descendant of Capt. Thomas Nash (see "Colonial," No. 13) and Col. John Burr, both of Fairfield, and also of Thaddens Peet, one of the first settlers of New Milford, Conn.

Alfred moved the old dwelling to the northwest a few feet, and removed a portion of the house; the rest has been devoted to various purposes. An upper room is now used for an industrial and Sunday-school, with some thirty-five pupils in attendance. The frame bids fair to stand another century. It has been in the Perry family to the seventh generation.

The cradle in which Peter Perry's fifteen children were rocked, and the clock, made by John Whitear in 1763, which told the hour of their birth, are preserved on the grounds of the first purchaser.

The mill being built in 1709, in 1760 Peter Perry repaired it at a considerable expense, building a water-wheel, repairing the dam, etc. In 1811, Job Perry tore down the old mill and built a new one, when he introduced Oliver Evan's* machine "for elevating grain and meal, and conveying the same from one part of the mill to another, and for cooling the meal and attending the bolting-hoppers," for which he paid a license of twenty-five dollars, but which proved a fraud.

There was no change in the mill till 1849, when Alfred Perry added a burr-stone at the cost of seventy-one dollars in New York. In 1850 he imported two more run from France, for one hundred and one dollars and fifty cents. In 1866 his nephew, Burr Perry, had possession, and in 1868 raised the mill several feet, put in entirely new machinery, and added the turbine-wheels at the expense of two thousand dollars. The first toll-dish used in the first mill in this section still hangs in Perry's mill, having been in existence about two hundred years.

Peter Perry built a malt-house in 1762, from which he sold malt at four English shillings per bushel. The greatest number of entries in his account-book was for meslin (a mixture of wheat and rye used for bread-making). The prices seemed to fluctuate same as at present.

Peter Perry was a business man, and amassed a goodly estate. He was a miller, merchant, and owner of vessels, an extensive land-owner, and an excellent financier. Having preserved all his papers and account-books,—which also are journals of events, interlarded daily,—much light is thrown on the doings of a century ago. He held several offices in the district, but his aspirations were not in that direction. He was industrious, energetic, able, and pious, and brought up his family in like manner, and, like most of his descendants, felt that a "simple steadfast life alone is glorious."

Peter Perry's sons, Job and Walter, married sisters,—Sarah and Elizabeth Sturges, daughters of Joseph Sturges (who married Sarah, daughter of Ebenezer Dimon), who was taken prisoner by the British and died of the smallpox on one of their prison ships.

As several from Fairfield died on the prison ships, the following is given: One of the prison ships was the "Jersey," anchored on the present site of Brooklyn Navy-yard. This ship was of sixty-four guns, dismantled, and moored about twenty rods from shore. Her port-holes were closed up, and two tiers of holes, twenty inches square, barred with iron, were cut in her sides. For a long time the average number of prisoners on board was one thousand. Their allowance of rations was two-thirds the quantity issued to British seamen, but with no fresh vegetables of any kind. The rations were mostly cooked in an immense boiler called "the great copper," the meat being boiled in sea-water, which corroded the copper and rendered the food poisonous. There was some relief for those of the prisoners who happened to possess any money. An old woman known as "Dame Grant" came alongside on alternate days, in a boat rowed by two boys, and sold fresh bread, vegetables, etc., prudently requiring that the cash be placed in her hands before the goods were delivered.

The prisoners had no means of washing their linen except by dipping it in sea-water and then laying it on the deck and treading on it. No light or fire was furnished, and every night there was a struggle for the places nearest to the small grated openings.

The prisoners lost almost every feeling of humanity for one another, and the principal anxiety of the volunteer nurses seemed to be to claim their perquisites by robbing the dead and dying of their clothing. One captain, a new prisoner, finding there were several cases of smallpox on board, inoculated himself, using a common brass pin for a lancet. There were eleven thousand five hundred deaths on these prison ships. An armed guard was necessary in the well-room to compel the prisoners to work the pumps enough to keep the hulk from sinking. The highest privilege that was granted a prisoner was to go ashore as one of a burying-party.†

The Sturges line is as follows: John Sturges, born about 1624 or 1625, died in 1700. He married Deborah Barlow. They had at least seven children, one of whom was Joseph, born about 1653 or 1654, and died May 12, 1728. He married (1) Sarah Judson; (2) Mary Sherwood. He had at least twelve children, of whom Solomon, one of the elder ones, baptized May 15, 1698, died July 9, 1779, married, March 8, 1725, Abigail Bradley. They had three sons—Hezekiah, Joseph and Judson—and seven daughters.

This family stood in excellent repute. The house in which Solomon lived stood over the cellar in Miss Mary Nichols' field, near the large elm-tree by the street. When he heard the British had landed, he called for his horse, which was brought, when he mounted the same and started for his cattle, which were down near the beach, with the hopes of rescuing them from plunder; but, the British spying him, one of their soldiers leveled a gun at him, and the shot wounded him, so that he was unable to reach home. He crawled under a tree, unable, from his wound, to go farther, when another British soldier ran him through with a bayonet, so that he died. He is the Solomon Sturges referred to in Rev. Andrew Eliot's letter preserved in Vol. III. of Massachusetts Historical Collections.

Solomon's son Hezekiah and family struck for safety. They were farmers of goodly estate, with plenty of excellent provisions. A Tory passed by, and, seeing a light, peeped in the window, where the enemy had a tempting supper set of baked pig, turkey, chicken, ham, etc. There was also a quantity of wine in the cellar, brought there by a privateersman. The enemy partook of this freely, and after they gratified their physical wants they gave way to fiendish deeds, and burnt all that was not otherwise plundered and destroyed.

In the winter, when snow came, Hezekiah Sturges drew timbers on the sled and built anew. He put up the frame for a large house, and finished as means and time would permit. The kitchen ran the length of the house; over this was a chamber of like dimensions, which was seated and used by the Episcopalians for public worship till they could erect a church, which they did; and this was the third Episcopal church in Fairfield. A descendant of his (Mary Nichols) still owns the premises.

Among his posterity were Capt. Solomon, who died at sea; Edward, who lived where George Chapman now does; Samuel Sturges, who resided on the premises of Mrs. Morris Wakeman; Capt. Eben Sturges, who died at Jamaica, West Indies, with the small-pox; and Dimon Sturges, whose sister married Capt. B. Lothrop Sturges, from another branch of the Sturges family. The latter was a son of the celebrated Judge Jonathan Sturges, who resided opposite the Catholic church, where Jerry Toomy lives, and was father of the late Jonathan Sturges. (See "Special Houses," No. 5.) In Dimon Sturges' family, Solomon and Eben were bankers in Ohio, and were also large real-estate owners and men of unlimited influence.

Walter Perry, who married Elizabeth Sturges, lived in Southport, on the premises now owned by Mr. Oliver H. Perry, who has the deed of the premises conveyed to his grandfather, Peter Perry, from John Cannon in the last century. Miah Perry and his wife, Elizabeth Dimon, married in 1787, lived where Nehemiah Jennings' meat-market now is. These two brothers were engaged in the mercantile trade and shipping. Job Perry, who married Sarah Sturges, was a merchant and miller in Weston. Seth Perry was a merchant in Black Rock. David Perry was a merchant in North Carolina.

Of Peter Perry's daughters, "Sall" married David Ogden (see "Colonial," H); Nancy married Hezekiah Osborne (see "Colonial," 8); Mabel married Isaac Marquand. They were the parents of Henry Marquand, the banker in New York, and Frederic, best known as the founder of Marquand Chapel, at Yale College, also a very large donor to the same institution. Pol married Henry L. Penfield, and Betsey married Samuel W. Sherwood, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

Of Peter Perry's grandchildren, Francis D., son of Miah Perry, is president of Southport National Bank; Oliver H., son of Walter, is a leading official in the Southport Savings Bank, and has been prominent in Church and State affairs. His sister Narcissa married Judge Samuel Hitchcock, of New Haven; Emily married Dr. Chandler Smith, of Danbury. Job and Sarah Sturges Perry's children were all born in Weston, Conn., and were all millers or merchants. Alfred was a miller, and occupied the old Perry homestead; Munson was a miller and merchant, moved to Somers, N. Y., and was the father of ten children, — Talman, a miller, afterwards a lumber-dealer in Bridgeport; Burr, a merchant at Black Rock; Orando, miller in Weston; David, a merchant in Bridgeport, engaged in the whale-fisheries, and owning shares in various vessels; Emeline, who married Ephraim Gregory, a hatter in Danbury. These are all dead, but their descendants are numerous and prosperous.

Of Peter Perry's great-grandchildren, John Hoyt, son of Oliver H., is a lawyer of the firm of Woodward & Perry, of Norwalk. He is a graduate of Yale, a director in the Southport National Bank, also of the savings bank, and is an ex-member of the Legislature. Winthrop H., brother of John Perry, is also a graduate of Yale, a thorough scholar, with bright prospects for a successful professional career. Henry, another brother, graduated from the Yale Scientific School. Rev. Talman Perry (Presbyterian) is located in La Prairie, Canada; Thomas Perry is a civil engineer in Illinois; Frederic M. Perry is the well-known hatter in Bridgeport; Miah Perry, of Weston, is an ex-member of the Connecticut Legislature.

No. 10. This house was built by Daniel Dimon about 1755. Building was his business; his reputation as an architect (carpenter in those days) was excellent. He was the builder of the house owned by Mr. O. W. Jones, also of the Fourth Congregational Church, built 1785. This was taken down in 1849 to give place to a more modern structure. Mrs. Sophia Edwards, of Brooklyn, daughter of O. W. Jones, wrote in 1850 the following, suggested by the occasion of tearing down this place of worship:

LINES ON LEAVING THE OLD CHURCH

Farewell, old temple of our sires!
Gone is thy ancient form;
No more around thy spire will play
The sunshine and the storm.

Thy venerated walls have stood
Through sixty-five long years,
While fathers sleep who planted thee
With mingled hopes and fears.

Farewell, each dear, familiar thing!
Thy ever-faithful vane,
Thy lofty pulpit, large square pews,
We ne'er shall see again!
A stranger has usurped thy place
And stolen thy old bell,
And we must bid thy sacred courts
A final, sad farewell.

Here have we met each Sabbath day
To hear God's holy word;
Together here have joined our hearts
To supplicate the Lord;
And here, in grateful songs of praise,
Our voices oft to blend,
To Him from whom all blessings come,
Ours and our fathers' Friend.

The Spirit oft, we trust, has been Within this hallowed place,—
Revived the Christian's faith and love
With gentle dews of grace;
And many souls have tasted here
The joy of sins forgiven,
To whom this earthly house has been
The very gate of heaven.

And must Time's rapid, senseless course
Blight all things with decay?
The dearest relics of the past
Forever fade away?
Must all the mighty works of man
But share this common doom,
And he in beauty, youth, and strength
Go to the silent tomb?

Oh, could this temple of our sires
Its thrilling story tell,
Of most who've trod its well-worn aisles
And loved its courts so well,
Whate'er their woe, whate'er their woe,
It would this truth reveal,—
That they repose where nevermore
Life's changes they can feel.

And is there, then, no brighter world
Beyond this vale of tears,
Where Time can never steal away
The objects love endears?
"Yes," sweetly whispers heavenly Hope,
"A home of sacred rest,
Where all who are the friends of Christ
Shall be forever blest."

Now, dear old temple of our sires,
As we thy ruins see,
With cheerful spirits we will give
Our last farewell to thee;
For while our temples perish here,
In faith we'll raise our eyes
To that fair house, not made with hands,
Eternal in the skies.

Feb. 11, 1850.

In Revolutionary times Daniel Dimon was an officer, and was away on duty, while his wife, a delicate woman, was left to care for her family the best she could.

Bradley Dimon occupied this house for several years, but after his decease the name became detached from the property. Ann, reared here, daughter of Daniel Dimon, married Alfred Perry. (See "Colonial," No. 9.)

The Dimons bore an old and respected name in town. An old stone in the old ground commemorates one thus: "Capt. John Dimon, died in 1764;" another thus: "Capt. Moses Dimon, died in 1748."

As the Dimons were people of good repute in town, the following may be interesting to various families. This is found in the West burying-ground:

"Jesse Dimon,
died in Augusta, Ga.,
Nov. 1, 1822
Aged 52.

Robert Dimon,
son of
Jesse & Bethia Dimon,
died in Augusta, Ga.,
Aug. 21, 1823.
Aged 23 y'rs & 7 mos.

John Dimon,
son of
Jesse & Bethia Dimon,
died in Brooklyn, L. I.,
Nov. 20, 1835.
Aged 31.

Elizabeth Dimon,
daughter of
Jesse & Bethia Dimon,
wife of Samuel S. Adams, died in Eaton Rapids, Mich.,
Sept. 17, 1861.
Aged 63."

Mr. Marvin Hull purchased this estate, and in 1874 built a new house, the old one being removed to the westward. The Hulls are of an old family; the first entry on the records of the Prime Ancient is: "Theophilus Hull, and Mary his wife, renewed covenant, Aug. 26, 1694." (See "Special Houses.")

A stone on Greenfield Hill commemorates the name thus:

"E. H.
In Memory of Doctr Eliphalet Hull,
born April the 8th, 1738,
And died Novem^r 18th, 1799,
in the 62^d year of his age, Universally lamented by all who knew him.
May he sleep in Jesus and awake in glory."

No. 11. This was built by Jonathan Ogden, who had three sons—Sturges, Abel, and David—who settled near him. Sturges married Zoa Thorpe, probably a descendant of Stephen Thorpe, who had his dwelling burnt during the conflagration of Fairfield, and who afterwards purchased Chancellor Kent's place in Westport, now owned by Mrs. Mary Burr Hedenberg. Sturges Ogden built the house on the corner, at the entrance to Oak Lawn Cemetery.

David Ogden married Peter Perry's "Sall," and built the house on the opposite side of the street. Their daughter Betsey married Samuel Morehouse (see "Colonial," No. 39), whose father owned the property known as Phipp's, where he built the first sloop or schooner in these parts, which he sold for three thousand dollars,—a large fortune in those days. His grandson, Deacon Samuel Morehouse, now owns this Ogden property, which has been occupied some years by Francis Louis. Mr. Morehouse is principal of a ward school in New York,—a position he has held for years.

Ebenezer Burr and his son, a lawyer, clerk of the County Court and ex-member of the Legislature, were descendants of this family of Ogdens, who occupied several houses on Mill Plain.

George Ogden lived by the railroad, crossing where Mr. Dickinson resides, and his father, Maj. Abel Ogden, lived next to the Redfield house; the latter built in 1795. He was a carpenter, and had just married at the time he raised his house. He and his lady were out one evening, when some one came in and announced a fire was on the Plain. The major coolly remarked, "It makes good work for the joiners." The historian fails to state his speech on finding the fire consumed his future home.

In the Fairfield west ground is an Ogden monument, containing on the face:

"Abel Ogden, died Jan. 14, 1851,
Et. 80.

Betsy, his wife,

Died May 17, 1854, aet. 74.

Ann Elizabeth, his wife, departed the fifth day of July, MDCCCLII.

Edward Nash, his son, departed the ninth day of October, MDCCCLIII.

Elizabeth Ogden departed Jan. III, MDCCCLVIII, aged 31. Jesus

On the back is this:

"Lucretia S. Ogden, Died Oct. 31, 1860, aet. 52."

Jonathan Ogden's daughter Mary married Eleazer (son of James and Elizabeth Whitehead Bulkeley) in 1785. He was born in 1763, but in 1776 he enlisted to go aboard the "Defense," an armed vessel in the country's service, which he did duty on for thirteen months, and for which he received a pension. Again he went on board a vessel as a privateersman, which he followed for two years. In 1779 he enlisted in a guard, which was stationed on Kinsey's Point. Standing alone on the place now occupied by Oliver Perry, Esq., he saw two hundred British land, who at once commenced to burn Fairfield. After this he followed the sea through various vicissitudes. He and Miah Perry owned a vessel for a time, when he bought out Mr. Perry's part and continued in the coasting-trade, increasing this business according to his means, and as his sons grew up placed them in business with himself under the shipping-firm of E. Bulkeley & Sons, of New York, from 1788 till the present. (See Bulkeley Genealogy.) He took a lively interest in the perpetuity and welfare of his country, and after the war he was engaged in commercial business till he died.

Eleazer was the sixteen hundred and fifty-sixth descendant from Peter Bulkeley, and was the father of six sons: (1) Jonathan, born in 1786, married Miranda Thorp (of a numerous and active family line as a whole in Fairfield, and who has intermarried in all the old families), and was active in all public matters. He served in the war in 1812 and received a pension. He was several times a member of the State Legislature, and was one of the committee for superintending government works in Southport Harbor. (2) Andrew, born in 1789, married Sally Dimon; also was a member of the State Legislature three times, and had a lively interest in his town, State, and country. (3) Lot, born 1794, married Emeline Jennings. (4) Moses, born 1796; married Catharine Bulkeley. He was a sea-captain of very high repute both on sea and land, and had a worthy position in the commerce of our country. (5) George, born 1800; married Elizabeth Andrews. He lived in New York, and had the principal management of the business of the firm. He now resides in Southport. (6) Charles, born 1804; married Elizabeth Beers, daughter of Capt. Abel Beers, of Mill Plain. (There are but two left of this large Beers family, David and Abigail, who reside on Mill Plain.) All of these sons were captains and engaged in the firm of E. Bulkeley & Sons, which amassed for each a large property and was a distinguished business association.

Of Eleazer's sons, Moses occupied this "colonial," where his sons Oliver and Frederic were born; the latter dying, Mr. Oliver Bulkeley is the owner of this property, which he repaired and painted about five years since. This is his farm-house now occupied by William Price. Mr. Oliver Bulkeley married Amelia Gilbert, of New Haven, and has a handsome residence in Southport. He is not engaged in any active business, but is a patron of art and literature, and is the benefactor of many in a very quiet and inconspicuous way.

This house was occupied some years by Walter Bulkeley, who married Betsy Smith, sister of Charles Smith (1880), of Mill Plain, whose history is sorrowful. She was the mother of several children, three of whom—Theodore, John Henry, and Edgar—were lost at sea on a passage from Bordeaux, France, to New Orleans. One other son, Horatio, died in Matanzas, Cuba. The other of her children all died, also her husband and her adopted ones and a brother; and yet her days were not shortened by all these bereavements, for she dwelt more than fourscore years in the land (she died 1877), and many can rise and bless her good works, especially the sick whom she soothed and comforted. Her own physical sufferings were not small, but her Christian fortitude sustained her.

No. 12. This is known as the Silliman place, situated at the entrance to Oak Lawn Cemetery. It was built a few rods from the road, with a large barn in front. Tradition locates the first Perrys on this ground. It is authentic that it was in the Ogden family for many years. One of the daughters, Ellen, daughter of Sturges Ogden, was the sole heir to the estate. She married a sea-captain, Ebenezer Silliman. They left no issue, but he willed four thousand dollars to the Stratfield church. His journal, which he kept for years, was indicative of his occupation. It mattered not what occurred, the direction of the wind was given. They are reported as living entirely by themselves, and as free from work as possible.

Everybody used wood for fuel in those days, so when the winter supply was provided they saved all the large chips, which they used as plates. One side becoming soiled, they were reversed, and, that side becoming likewise, they were consigned to the fire, thus obviating dish-washing. This was related to the writer by various parties. In the winter season eight loaves of bread—the capacity of the great brick oven—was their usual baking, which did not recur often.

Dr. Jeremiah T. Denison ("Colonial," No. 2) related that when he began practice in Fairfield, some forty years since, he was called there, a distance of some two miles. After attending the patient he was asked what was the charge. The doctor stated twenty-five cents (half-price, as he thought, from appearances, they were poor people), which they paid him daily till his patient recovered. The doctor found in a day or so he had been deceived by appearances, as they were quite wealthy for the times, but studied to avoid care and labor.

The widow survived the captain several years. At her decease the property, most of which was sold to different owners, was divided among numerous relatives. The present owner is Mr. Henry Banks,* who has made it comfortable by repairing with new window-casings and sash. The old shingle siding yet remains, weatherbeaten and gray.

No. 13. This house was built by Dr. Rogers, a physician of considerable celebrity. His wife was a Miss Tennant, sister to Rev. William Tennant, who preached on Greenfield Hill from 1772 to 1781, then removed to Philadelphia, leaving his silver door-plate behind. Dr. Rogers had one son, who went to Savannah to purchase slaves. While out riding, his horses ran away, upsetting and injuring him fatally.

Dr. Wm. B. Nash, who studied under Dr. David Hull, also occupied this house. He was a son of Capt. Thomas Nash (3d), of Westport, who married Mary, daughter of William Burr, of Fairfield. This Thomas Nash gave the site to the Congregational Society where the church now stands in Green's Farms. He was born in 1743, and died in 1815. He was a man of influence, courage, and energy. He was chosen deacon in 1768 in the same church in which his father and grandfather had served in that office, and was captain probably of the same company.

It is related that when Fairfield was burned, in the time of the Revolution, Col. Whiting, the commandant, having withdrawn the Americans to the Round Hill, north of the village, called for a captain and thirty men to volunteer for the purpose of reconnoitring the enemy; that Capt. Thomas Nash immediately stepped forth, followed by more than one hundred men. The colonel would allow only thirty to go. However, more fell in after they left the hill. Capt. Nash advanced to the fence north of the street, near where the meeting-house now stands, and ordered his men to lie behind the fence in the tall vegetation until the enemy were near the centre of the street, when, as he gave the word, they were to rise and fire, load and fire, and then run. This they did with such effect, and so unexpectedly, that none of his party were injured until they began to ascend the rising ground towards the north, where one was killed. Afterwards, when a squad of the enemy approached to burn his house at Green's Farms, he alone, or with but little help, dragged the company field-piece to a rising ground near the house, loaded it with grape, and fired upon them. They, suspecting he had a company to sustain him in so daring an act, retreated, and this house was saved, and is yet standing (near Green's Farms church), with its large veranda and railing above it.

At another time, being on a scout in the night, with only three men, he discovered a whaleboat secreted on the shore, which he thought indicated an enemy near. He therefore stove in the boat and searched for the foe. Perceiving a faint light from the window of a cabin in a cornfield, he ordered his army of three to pass rapidly round the cabin, making all the noise they could with their muskets against the building, by which the inmates deemed themselves surrounded by a real force. Capt. Nash then approached the window and told them to hand out their arms and he would spare their lives. They complied, and handed out sixteen muskets, which he secured, and told them to lie down until morning, when it appeared that he and his three men had surrounded and taken fifteen Tories and one British soldier.

Thomas Nash (3d) inherited a fine estate, but, owing to many losses sustained by the Revolution and investments in Continental currency, he spent his last days in straitened pecuniary circumstances. His father, Thomas Nash (2d), born in 1708, married Rebecca Hull, of Fairfield, in 1731. He inherited an ample estate.

An inventory is given on the Fairfield records of 1748 of his property, amounting to £9372 15s. He kept well what he inherited, and was a highly respectable and influential man. His father, the first Thomas Nash in Fairfield, was admitted to the Prime Ancient Church under Rev. Joseph Webb, Jan. 4, 1712, and had three children—Joseph, Thomas, and Sarah—baptized there the same day. Shortly after this (1715), when another child was baptized—and no more recorded after it—it is inferred that the new society was organized.* Thomas Nash was the first deacon of that church, and probably continued through life in the office, also held by son and grandson. The ancestor of these Nashes died in New Haven in 1658.

In the records it is stated :

"It is ordered that Thomas Nash shall keep the Towne Muskitts in his hands, and look to them well, that they be always in good order fitt for service, and the Towne to allow him what is Just for his care and pains."

Thomas Nash's name appears as a land-owner in Fairfield in 1701. His body lies in the burying-ground on Green's Farms, near Talcott Wakeman's, and his resting-place is marked thus :

"Here lyes buried ye body of Capt. Thomas Nash,
Deacon of Fairfield West Parish, who departed this life June ye 8th,
Anno Domⁱ 1748, in ye
69th year of his age."

Thomas Nash, Jr., has this tribute :

"In memory of
Capt. Thomas Nash, Junr,
Deacon of ye Church of Christ in this place, who died
Aug. 2nd, A. D. 1767, aged
61 years wanting 12 days.

Here appears the Place of Bones,
Of gashful souls and monumental Stones,
Inscribed with grinning Deaths on rural Throns.
But stop the Hearse; this is the destined Place
Where lies his Ancient Body in the Dust.
Thou yawning Grave profound, receive thy prey,
And feed thy Worms with this delicious clay.
Throw on the Earth, how piercing is the Sound!
Weep on dear friends and ease the Wound.
This kind relief the Social Passions crave:
Jesus himself wept at a good man's Grave."

Dr. William Burr Nash studied with Dr. David Hull till he attained his majority (1807), when he was licensed to practice, and settled in Greenfield (in this colonial).† After a residence of ten years in Greenfield, he removed to Fairfield, and entered into a partnership with Dr. Hull, where for nine years he continued to reside, with a large and increasing practice. He lived in the house occupied by Arthur Bennett, and in 1825, real estate being so low through the country, he (Dr. Nash) could hardly give it away. At this date he removed to Bridgeport, and for a time resided in a house situated on the corner of Main and Bank Streets, where the city bakery now stands. At that time there were but one or two other physicians in the city, and his practice soon became very large, not only here, but in the surrounding towns, and his travels were very extensive and laborious.

Dr. Nash's son, David Hull Nash, born in 1811, graduated as an M.D. at Yale College in 1834. His medical studies were under the supervision of his father. He married Susan E. Sterling, and commenced practice with his father. He is now the oldest practitioner in Bridgeport. Few men have been engaged so many years as the late doctor, who during his long life was very successful.‡

At the period in which Dr. W. B. Nash entered professional life applicants to practice medicine were examined and licensed by a committee of physicians, and the degree of M.D. was not worn by them. Yet in later years it was conferred on him by Yale College. He accidentally fell, in his eighty-seventh year, and fractured the thigh-bone, which resulted in his death, 1872.

The records of the Nash family were collected by Rev. Sylvester Nash, A.M., rector of St. John's Church, Essex, Conn., in 1853, when there were three thousand three hundred of the Nashes named. The compiler wished very much to have a portrait of Dr. W. B. Nash for a frontispiece, but, with his characteristic modesty, he could not be induced to comply.

As the descendants of Thomas Nash (1st) remained undispersed in and about Fairfield for more than a hundred years, they are known as the Fairfield branch. At present the only descendants left in Fairfield are Jennings, Perrys, Bibbins, and Bennett.

Capt. Burr Nash, son of Thomas Nash (4th), lived in Greenfield, then on Mill Plain, afterwards in Bridgeport, and from thence he removed to New York. He built, with others, the steamboat "Marion," which he commanded. Afterwards he returned to New York, then removed to New Haven, where he carried on, until his death (1848), the same business (blacksmith) that his ancestors wrought at in the same place two hundred years before.

After Dr. Nash left Greenfield, Buckingham Sherwood was the owner. In time Moses Betts (see "Colonial," No. 5) purchased it, and kept a country store there. He disposed of it to Col. Murray (of the New York militia), whose daughter, Agnes Murray, is the occupant.

No. 14. The house on the premises, with the store and post-office, was originally built and owned by Samuel Bradley, grandson of Francis Bradley, who settled in Southport, west of the tide-mill, in 1664. The first Francis Bradley had a son Francis, who moved to Greenfield. He had a son Samuel, who was called "Marchant Bradley." He lived where William Lobdell now does. Tradition says he commenced life with a "jug of rum and a fiddle," that he bought beef and pork as far back in the country as Litchfield County. This he shipped to Boston, where he would be gone six weeks to attend to his cargo. He died in 1771, aged seventy. This Samuel Bradley seems to have taken up nearly all the hill, and the land known as the "mile of commons."

Samuel's grandson, Walter, moved into this house, which was the custom-house for the port of Fairfield. (The commission given him by the powers in office is in possession of Dr. M. V. B. Dunham, a popular allopathic physician, who occupied this house when he first began practice, in 1870, in Greenfield, and his son was born there.) Walter Bradley also kept store. His daughter, Priscilla, married William Burr.

William Bradley, brother of Priscilla, bought out the heirs, and in time his widow sold the house to Barzilla B. Banks, present owner. No one would ever mistrust its age, it is in such excellent repair.

No. 15. The house nearly opposite, of the Tomlinsons' estate, was built by the Rev. Seth Pomeroy. His tombstone in the Greenfield ground contains the following history :

"Here lies buried
the Body of the Rev^d Mr. Seth Pomeroy, obtained to the work of ye ministry
In this Parish Decer ye 8th, 1757,
Who departed this life
July the 1st, 1770, in the 37th year of his age."

It is thought this house was built prior to 1765. At Mr. Pomeroy's decease Capt. David Hubbell bought it and built a store there. The Rev. William Belden purchased it in 1812 or thereabouts, and occupied it till 1821. He was the last teacher of any note in the academy, which was built for Dr. Dwight in 1785 or 1786.

Mr. Belden sold the house to Walter Perry (see "Colonial," 9), of Southport. The next owner was Joseph Nichols, who transferred it to George Wilson. It came to his wife, Ellen Bradley Wilson, who sold it to Mr. Sinclair, of the New York Tribune. He sold it to Mrs. Sophia Bulkeley, widow of Hezekiah R. Bulkeley, who has occupied it since 1863.

No. 16. Samuel Bradley (1st) had a son Hezekiah, who built the large gambrel-roofed house standing at the southwest corner of the green or parade-ground in 1755. He had a large farm, bred horses, and had more than twenty slaves. The second owner was Hezekiah Bradley, Jr., the third was Rufus Hoyt, who married a daughter of Capt. David Hubbell, neither of whom lived over a few months.

The next owner was Mr. Charles Nichols, who purchased the house in 1822. He married Polly, daughter of Jonathan and Molly Wakeman Banks. (See "Colonial," 32.) The Nichols are an old family in Fairfield. The first settler of that name was William. He married Abigail Ward, and died young. She was the owner of one of the "long lots." Their bodies (are supposed to) lie in Fairfield old ground. His (William's) only child was Ignations, born 1665; married Abigail Staples. They were the parents of Nathan, Ignations, Jr., Ephraim, Abigail, and Hester.

Ignations, Jr., is buried in Greenfield, under this inscription :

"Here lies buried
the body of Mr
Ignations Nickolle;
who departed this life
De^c ye 17, 1738, in 73 year of his age."

Ephraim Nichols was born in Greenfield, Conn., and married Rebecca, daughter of Onesimus Gould.* They were the parents of Ebenezer, Hezekiah, David, Peter, John, Jesse, and Ephraim, besides five daughters. Ephraim died in 1782. His son, Ephraim, Jr., has a history on his tombstone in Greenfield burying-ground :

"To the memory of Ephraim Nichols, who died
January 23, A.D. 1852, aged 94 years 9 months and 8 days.

In his youth he took part in the toils and struggles of the American Revolution.
Many noble qualities of mind and heart adorned his life and endeared him to his family and friends.
He died in the Christian Faith, and in the hope of a blessed Immortality.

I am a stranger with thee and a sojourner,
As all my fathers were. Psalm xxxix. 12."

One Ebenezer lies in Greenfield, with this tribute :

"In Memory of Ebenezer Nichols, who left this world
Aug. 10, 1810,
In the 69th year
of his age."

One of his grandsons, Rev. George W. Nichols, A.M., in his "Fragments from the Study of a Pastor," states that his grandfather "enlisted as a common soldier at the early age of nineteen years, and, joining the Continental army, proceeded to the city of New York, and was there at the memorable time of the declaration of independence. He was present when the soldiers demolished the statue of King George that stood in the Bowling Green, near the Battery, on Broadway. He was present also when the battle was fought at Flatbush, L. I., and saw the British take possession of the fortifications on Brooklyn Heights after they had been quietly abandoned by the Americans during the night of Aug. 30, 1776. He assisted, likewise, in erecting the fortifications at Red Hook, which was done during the night, that our army might, if possible, take advantage of the enemy, and while engaged in his trying duty at this period, suffering from exposure and hardship, was visited with sickness, and spent some time in the city hospital. But, though suffering much from sickness and exposure, being sometimes obliged to sleep out upon the ground, in consequence of the scarcity of beds and tents, yet did the old soldier still keep to his post of duty and sacrifice. He still continued with the army as they marched on through the county of Westchester, after the city had been evacuated by the Americans. When, shortly after, the famous battle was fought at White Plains, he was there, and stood amid the smoke of the cannon, while balls from British muskets flew on either side of him. After the occurrence of that signal defeat, he still followed on with the army, encamping with them at Tarrytown and North Castle; and then, leaving the army, he retired to his native town, arriving there on Christmas day, 1776. Afterwards he enlisted again in the service, and set out from his home once more to join the army, which had already proceeded on its way for the purpose of taking Gen. Burgoyne. On arriving at Ridgefield news was received of the capture of Burgoyne. Thereupon he retraced his way towards home. This was the last of his participation in the Revolutionary contest. He then came home, and soon after took up his abode upon a small farm of a few acres, which he purchased with the avails of his industry." Here he erected the "old homestead," where he spent his long life; here he brought his youthful bride, Miriam Bradley; here he brought up his family,—William, Samuel, Charles, and Bradley.

These Nichols were all blessed with large families. One of John's (brother to Ephraim, Jr.) daughters, Mrs. Ruamah Nichols, wife of Samuel Merwin, now eighty-nine, cooks her dinner if necessary. She remembers sixty first cousins. Mrs. Charlotte Banks, wife of Bradley Nichols, eighty-six years old, performs all her domestic duties and "runs the farm" herself. She has two daughters,—Mrs. William Bradley (see "Colonial," 17) and Mrs. Zalmon Wake-man, both of Greenfield.

Charles Nichols married in 1815 and built the house owned by Elizabeth Bulkeley, in which he lived till he purchased this "colonial." Mrs. Mary Nichols, wife of Isaac Milbank, inherited this property from her father. Mr. Milbank's father came from Essex County, England. His home there was a stone dwelling, "Panfield Hall," which has stood eight hundred years. It still retains its old coaches and its old styles.

This house ("colonial") has never been repaired; its lower roof has never been reshingled, even. The covering is shingle sides, with the large wrought nails, but is protected by an excellent coat of paint. A bay-window and a veranda have been added, and a few changes made inside; otherwise it remains as built one hundred and twenty-five years ago.

No. 17. The house opposite Mr. Milbank's was built by Samuel Bradley, Jr., somewhere between 1750 and 1760. He was a merchant, or, as they expressed it in old colonial times, "kept store;" he was also justice of the peace, and in consequence was called "Squire." He had three sons: (1) Samuel (3d), who was a privateer and died during the Revolution; (2) Zalmon, who built the house known as the "Capt. Baldwin house," now owned by Mr. A. R. T. Nichols. Zalmon also was in the commercial business, and was engaged in the West India trade with Joseph Squire, of Fairfield, dealing largely in beef and pork; (3) Walter is associated with house No. 14.

A man named Frazier broke into Squire Nichols' store, and was found guilty of theft, for which he suffered the penalty of death, as he was hung on a gibbet erected on a knoll not far from the late Capt. John Gould's. Crimes met with heavy penalties in those days.

The store on this ground was in a greater danger from a member of the family, Samuel (3d), who went into the room where no fire was allowed at any time with a lighted candle in his hand and put it in a cask on the counter, which afterwards he found contained gunpowder. He went back and took out the candle in safety, showing he had courage.

The property descended to two sisters, Huldah and Lucy Bradley, and they willed it to Maj. William Bradley, who remodeled it in 1845. His three children being married, he and his wife are the sole occupants.

No. 18. The first minister of the gospel on Greenfield Hill was the Rev. John Goodsell, whose ashes repose in the Greenfield cemetery under the slab with this simple inscription:

"Here lies buried the body of the Rev. Dr.
John Goodsell,
who departed this life
December 26th, 1763,
Aged 57 years."

The Rev. John Goodsell's son Lewis in 1772 built a house which was used as a tavern before and after the Revolutionary war. It has been a house of great resort, and became famous from its associations.

Mr. Alexander T. Nichols has kindly loaned for this work a legal abstract prepared by John H. Perry, a lawyer of note, containing the "transfers of property, whether by Deed, Will, Distribution, or by way of Mortgage, arranged for the most part in their chronological order." The historic parts are interlarded as they occurred.

(1) The premises in question were owned by Lewis Goodsell in fee simple, and unincumbered in 1772.

(2) Lewis Goodsell gave a warranty deed to Zalmon Bradley, June 15, 1778, for the consideration of seventy pounds.

(3) Zalmon Bradley gave a warranty deed to Eunice Goodsell, wife of Lewis Goodsell, June 18, 1778; consideration, seventy pounds. Eunice Goodsell died some time between June 16, 1778, and Nov. 28, 1794, leaving heirs,—Peter Goodsell, Lewis Goodsell, Jr., Sarah Lyon, wife of Joseph Lyon, and probably two others, whose names are difficult to be ascertained. There is no record of a will or of the granting of administration on her estate.

(4) Peter Goodsell quitclaimed his share to Lewis Goodsell, Jr., Nov. 28, 1794, for a consideration of four pounds and divers good causes, etc.

(5) Joseph Lyon, Sarah Lyon, and Lewis Goodsell quitclaimed their shares to Lewis Goodsell, Jr., April 23, 1796; consideration, ten pounds.

(6) Lewis Goodsell, Jr., gave a warranty deed to Joseph Bulkeley, Jr., April 23, 1796; consideration, fifteen pounds.

Joseph Bulkeley lived in this house sixteen years. According to the Bulkeley Genealogy, he lived to be over one hundred years. He was the son of Daniel and Hannah Hill Bulkeley. When he first moved into the house he probably rented it, as his son Uriah states he bought portions of the place as he could obtain them of the heirs. He said, "We all moved into the place Oct. 28, 1786, my mother riding on a bed in grandfather's cart, with my brother three weeks old, and all the furniture they had at the time. My father taught school for about two years in the district school-house, on the southeast corner of the green. His business—keeping tavern—was so good that in 1787 he raised up the front of the house, put windows up-stairs in front, made a double piazza, with stairs to the ball-room, plastered the chambers,—which had not been done before,—took down the chimney to the lower floor and rebuilt in a better manner, with freestone hearths," etc.

In another place he says: "These houses [in Greenfield] were all built on one plan, with back roofs descending to the height of the kitchen." The usual style was to have the well, with the old well-sweep, in front of the house, as was the hatchway-door. The roofs were, most of them, raised the same year except the old tavern.

In 1788, Joseph Bulkeley bought of his father-in-law, John Hubbell, the store which stood on the corner where Henry Goolsell now lives. He hired men and teams to draw it on to his premises. Mr. Uriah Bulkeley further states: "It was done with much difficulty, as the road at that time, and years after, was full of rocks. He at first left it the whole width on the green, west of the house, not connected, as there were some fruit-trees where it at last stood."

In 1791, Joseph Bulkeley went to New York and bought a small assortment of goods and began store-keeping. He succeeded pretty well, and next year went to New York and took with him his son Uriah, ten years old. He describes this trip seventy-seven years later, showing the only method of going to New York except by private conveyance at that time:

"We went to Mill River, now Southport and to New York in a small sloop. Walter Perry, master, his brother David, hand, Job Perry (these were Peter Perry's sons), my father, myself, and one female, passengers. The sloop, only twenty tons, sails and vessel old, wind fresh at S. E. When we got to Norwalk Islands it shut in so thick with snow that we could hardly see the length of the vessel, a heavy rolling sea, and every soul on board deadly sea-sick except the female. Could hardly find any one to steer, but we drifted along through the Sound to Hart Island, when it broke away, and went on to Riker's, then Hewlet's Island, and anchored. Bent down next morning, went into Burling Slip to the head, and our bowsprit lay half-way across Pearl Street, then Queen Street, at the foot of John Street, on the corner of which was Rogers & Woolsey's hardware-store, with a large gilt padlock for a sign, which was my guide back to the ship, as I lived on board.

"After about a week we started for home, wind S. E. In going through Hell-Gate, close-hauled on the wind. There was a large wood-sloop coming down before the wind with no one forward to look out. We hailed them, but could make no one hear until close to us. She just grazed our side, and her bowsprit caught in the after-leaf of our main-sail and unshipped our boom, broke the gaff in three pieces, and took the whole sail off her bowsprit, took off our boat which was in tow.

"We made out, as the tide was with us, to get up, under our jib, against Riker's Island and anchored. The sloop anchored near where the old Hussar frigate was sunk. Our boat had drifted ashore; they picked it up, and towed it back with the main-sail, and settled for the damages. Father and myself went ashore and slept. There was a tremendous gale that night.

"Next day was pleasant. Mended and bent our sail, and started for home. Arrived at the dock at daylight next morning, walked home, and commenced at Dr. Dwight's Academy to learn

"'Arma circumque cano,'"

A smart boy for ten years! The schools of to-day (1880) do no better in education than in 1792 unless Uriah Bulkeley was a grand exception as a pupil. He continues:

"The store and tavern, with its sign of a horse, which is no better than a cart-ature—did pretty good business that winter,—maybe produced some jealousy among the old storekeepers, who perhaps felt as if the store was encroaching on their rights.

"Father next spring brought a large supply of goods, but within a few weeks after his return some one (or more) broke into the store and took about one thousand dollars' worth of dry-goods and fancy articles, and left the store bare and a considerable debt due in New York. To show the sympathy of the world, next day after the loss was known, as I was driving cows, a son of my father's friend met me and said, 'Well, your dad has lost his goods! I guess you will have to come to 't now.'

"I remained at school and father paid his debts notwithstanding."

He further states:

"My father did not keep store in Greenfield after his loss, but moved the store back to connect with the house at the southwest corner of the bar-room, and moved the old bar from the northwest corner, where it remained till William Shaw moved it away. Father used it for a dining-room when he had much company."

Again he says (in 1869):

"I am pleased to see the old home of my youthful days fitted up in such good style. The old tavern has had a great many customers of the noblest of the land and foreign countries. I recollect Talleyrand, and the Spanish minister plenipotentiary (Don Onis, or a similar name) dining there. The lawyers and judges of the court at Fairfield frequently came up and spent Sunday, among whom I recollect Judges Reeve, Edmunds, Chapman, Uriah Tracy, Gideon Granger, Ephraim Kirby, Bostwick Whittlessey, Thaddeus Benedict, Pierpont Edwards, Bissel of Norwalk, Dagget, Nathan and Nathaniel Smith of New Haven, and nearly every judge and lawyer that attended the court, Rufus King, our minister to England, Joel Barlow, minister to France, Gen. Rufus Putnam, one of the first settlers in Ohio. I recollect him for his having holster and pistol and a bearskin on his saddle. I think there have been more visitors in the old house of the best class than almost any other public-house in a country place, owing, probably, in part, to the great reputation of Dr. Dwight's academy and to the beautiful scenery on the hill, which cannot be surpassed for beauty, if it is in grandeur."

In connection with the hotel and Dr. Dwight's school he is quoted further:

"These were lively times at Greenfield. The old house of 'entertainment' was full to overflowing. In the winter they would have a dance about once a month, having Moses Sturges to fiddle, wine and plum-cake. Dr. Dwight always came in, took a glass of wine and a piece of cake, told some pleasant story, and left within half an hour."

Joseph Bulkeley moved to Black Rock, and sold the tavern in 1810 or 1812. His son Uriah married Jane Sayre,* of Fairfield; she died in 1831. He died at Dobb's Ferry, N. Y., July 23, 1874, aged ninety-two. Dr. Dunham relates he saw him a few months before he died, when he stated he "did not wish to live to be an old man." He has one son, William Henry Bulkeley, a bookseller in Louisville, Ky., where he resides. He has one daughter, the wife of Henry Gordon Harrison, the architect of Garden City.

It is related of Uriah Bulkeley that when he was married everything was conducted in royal style, even the wood burnt in the fire-place was planed, and, gossip now adds, "was gilded at both ends."

(7) Joseph Bulkeley, Jr., gave a warranty deed to Medad Bradley, March 23, 1812; consideration, sixteen hundred dollars.

(8) Medad Bradley mortgaged this property to Gershom Burr to secure the sixteen hundred dollars, March 23, 1812.

(9) Gershom Burr quitclaimed to Medad Bradley, April 3, 1817; consideration, sixteen hundred dollars.

(10) Medad Bradley mortgaged to Thomas Bartram to secure twelve hundred dollars, May 7, 1825.

(11) Thomas Bartram quitclaimed to Medad Bradley, March 10, 1826; consideration, one dollar.

(12) Medad Bradley gave a warranty deed Nov. 2, 1827, to Sturges Morehouse; consideration, eight hundred and fifty dollars.

(13) Sturges Morehouse mortgaged to Isaac Banks, Oct. 27, 1838, to secure twelve hundred and seventy-five dollars. Isaac Banks, the mortgagee, died about Jan. 1, 1841, leaving a will, in which William Nichols and Horace Banks were executors.

(16) Hez. Phillips gave warranty deed to D. Burr, March 17, 1845; consideration, fifteen hundred dollars.

The property is now definitely described as "containing three acres more or less," as all transfers do after this date on this estate.

(18) Nathan Bulkeley quitclaimed to David Burr, Sept. 11, 1847; consideration, three hundred dollars.

(27) Henry B. Banks died intestate soon after the above conveyance. Administration was granted on his estate, July 26, 1854, to his widow, Maria C. B. Banks.

(28) Maria C. B. Banks gave a bargain-and-sale deed, April 26, 1855, to Peter H. Shaw and Anna M. Shaw his wife; consideration, one hundred dollars, and conveyed "the equity of redemption possessed by Henry B. Banks at the time of his decease."

(29) Maria C. B. Banks quitclaimed to Rev. Peter H. Shaw and Anna Maria Shaw, April 26, 1855; consideration, ten dollars. Anna Maria Shaw, wife of Peter H. Shaw, died Feb. 17, 1860, leaving two children,—William K. Shaw and Isabella O. Beard (wife of Ira Beard),—and probably intestate, no will or settlement of hers appearing on record.

The Rev. Samuel Nichols, D.D., died July 17, 1880, in his ninety-fourth year, at his residence on Greenfield Hill. The degree of D.D. was conferred on him by Williams College. He was probably the oldest Episcopal clergyman in the United States, and was at his ordination the three hundred and eighty-seventh of that sect ordained in America. He was born Nov. 14, 1787. He graduated from Yale in 1811, and was not only the last survivor of his class, but, with one exception, the oldest living graduate of the college. He was the oldest living presbyter of the diocese to which he belonged (that of Bishop Potter), and was believed to be the oldest one of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.†

In his early days he was associated with the Rev. Virgil Barbour in charge of the school at Fairfield, Herkimer Co., N. Y., then under the special patronage of Trinity Church, of New York. Afterwards for twenty-two years he was rector of a St. Matthew's Church at Bedford, Westchester Co., N. Y. His was a blameless life, respected by all denominations, ever charitable to the poor, and universally beloved. He left a reputation which was a testimony of his Christian character, his learning and fidelity, and his devotion to his family and friends.

He married Susan N. Warner of New York, and they were blessed with several sons and daughters, of whom are the Rev. George Warner, Effingham II., a lawyer, William, and Alexander; the latter is an ex-member of the Connecticut Legislature. These sons have amassed a goodly fortune, are men of talent and of trust, and have had a test of the confidence of men of means for many years which has never been abused. They are shrewd, excellent business-managers of great capacity and foresight, and have a well-established office in New York City. Susan W. Nichols, a sister of the above, is a skillful artist and excels in oil-painting. They are all possessed with fine æsthetic tastes, and are liberal patrons of works of culture whether of literature or of art, to which their own pens and pencils contribute.

(35) Rev. Samuel Nichols quitclaimed, July 29, 1868, to Alexander R. T. Nichols; consideration, one dollar, and other divers good causes.

(36) Rev. Samuel Nichols quitclaimed to Susan W. Nichols, July 29, 1868; consideration, one dollar.

(37) Susan W. Nichols quitclaimed to Susan N. Nichols, July 29, 1868; consideration, one dollar.

(38) Susan N. Nichols died March 22, 1872, leaving a husband, the Rev. Samuel Nichols, and several children living, and a will which is recorded in Kings County surrogate's office, in the State of New York.

(39) Phineas T. Barnum quitclaimed, Aug. 25, 1874, to Alexander R. T. Nichols and the devisees of Susan N. Nichols, being John J., Susan W., and Maria S. Nichols; consideration, one dollar, which released mortgage No. 20 above, the note secured thereby having long before been paid; so that the present owner, Alexander R. T. Nichols, at last has a clear title to a much entangled property. These transfers are given to show what changes property may pass through in one hundred years, also the variation of values on the same property.

This property is contiguous to that of the Rev. Samuel Nichols, D.D. Dr. Nichols' house was built for the Rev. Richard V. Dey, 1823-1828, who officiated during those years as pastor of Greenfield.

No. 19. The house occupied by Mr. Charles P. Bradley was built about the same time as the others in Greenfield. It was owned in 1786 by Mr. John Jennings, an old blind man, who was a blacksmith in his youth, afterwards by Josiah Jennings, who married — Heron, of Redding. William Bradley owned it in 1823. From him it came to his son, Charles T. Bradley, the present owner. This house has been so remodeled by new sidings, verandas, etc., that it misleads the uninformed as to its antiquity.

No. 20. Deacon Joseph Bradley built this house. It descended to his son Joseph, who left three heirs on this place,—Burr, Grisel, and Polly. They being deceased, it was set off to — —, the only daughter, the wife of Lloyd N. Sherwood, who are the present owners and occupants.

As near as can be ascertained, this house was built in 1746, and was honored with a centennial party of some one hundred and thirty persons dressed in costumes of 1776 early in the Centennial year. Here is to be seen an old coat-of-arms of the Bradley family.

No. 21. The Hubbell home was built by Gershom Hubbell in ——. It fell to his son Moses, and then to the late Uriah Hubbell, and is now occupied by the widow and daughter. It seems that the first Hubbell in America was named Richard. He lived in New Haven, Conn., in 1647. Having been admitted as a planter, in 1680 he settled in Fairfield, where he died in 1692.

Dr. Dwight settled in Greenfield in 1783, and kept his academy at first in Gershom Hubbell's shop, where his grandson's widow now lives. Mr. Uriah Bulkeley relates, in his "Musings of Memory," that "Gershom Hubbell was a leather-breeches maker and dresser, and his daughter made the best gloves I ever wore." The academy building was built for Dr. Dwight in 1785 or 1786. "Joseph Bulkeley, Jr., although a schoolmaster from his eighteenth year, went to Dr. Dwight's school after he was married, to study surveying and navigation. The doctor had the reputation deservedly of being a first-rate teacher, and scholars came from all parts of the world to his school. It is thought he had always an eye to the presidency of Yale College. He had a class which it was his ambition to teach superior to any graduate of Yale. Some of them were David Hill, Ezekiel Webby, Jonathan Pomeroy, Parson Bartlett, and Lemuel Sanford, from Redding; David Rogers, Abraham Davenport, of Stamford. In the next class were two Henry Livingtons, from Poughkeepsie; James Anaram, from Richmond; Dubois, from France; Joel R. Poinsett, Minister to Mexico and Secretary of War; Dexter, from Newburyport; William Williams, from Norwich; Charles Denison, of New Haven; John Hancock, from North Carolina; Charles Hobby Pond, of Milford, afterwards Lieutenant-Governor of the State; Wilson, Richard, and Philo Hubbell, of Bridgeport; two Capers, from South Carolina; Henry Baldwin, afterwards judge of the United States courts, also his brother Michael; A. Tomlinson, who wore a suit of white broadcloth. Dr. Dwight had a class of young ladies, said to be the most beautiful ever in a class together,—two of Dr. Rogers' daughters; three Miss Burrs, from Fairfield; Miss Young, of Bridgeport; Sally Nichols, of Newtown; and others."

One of the pupils never returned home, as this tomb-stone in Greenfield ground testifies.

"In Memory of
William Jordan, a Native of No.
Carolina, & Student at the Greenfield
Academy, who died July 20th, 1794.
Aged 15 years, 2 months & 11 days.

Sweet youth, alike to friends and strangers dear,
On thy green turf I'll drop the tender tear;
This last poor tribute let me daily pay,
As here I ponder o'er the unconscious clay;
As here I feel thy distant brother's pain
And see thy hapless weep in vain.

In vain thy soul was bright, thy bosom kind,—
In vain the tears of those thou leav'st behind;
Cold is thy form and dark thy lone abode,
Yet thou hast trod'st the path thy Saviour trode,
With him fond hope again behold thee rise
From transient slumbers to superior skies."

The manuscript quoted from says: "Wednesday afternoons we spoke a short speech, and after choosing sides and spelling the winners had a quarter of an hour to play before the others were let out. Wednesday evening Dr. Dwight lectured on religion, and published them in four volumes of theology."

It is related of Dr. Dwight that occasionally he would ride to New Haven to preach. When he left Greenfield, the women were milking; when he got to Fairfield, the women were milking; when he got to Newfield (now Bridgeport), the women were milking; when he got to Stratford, the women were milking; and in Milford, which is known as Sleepy Hollow. It conveyed to his mind the industry of these places, in which, in his estimation, Greenfield bore the palm.

For the benefit of the citizens of to-day a word concerning Dr. Timothy Dwight may not be amiss. He was born in Northampton, Mass., May 14, 1752, and died in New Haven, Conn., Jan. 11, 1817. It is said his mother taught him the alphabet in one lesson, and he read the Bible when he was but four years of age. Latin he studied by himself at six, and was nearly ready for college at eight. He entered Yale at thirteen, in 1765, and graduated in 1769, and for two years was a teacher in New Haven. He became a tutor in his college at nineteen. Dwight taught mathematics, rhetoric, and oratory in the college for six years. In 1777 he was licensed to preach, and became a chaplain in the army, where he labored for the spiritual interest of the soldiers, and increased their enthusiasm by such productions as "Columbia." He was a member of the Massachusetts Legislature in 1781, and his popularity would have detained him in civil life had he not deliberately preferred the ministry, the duties of which he accepted at Greenfield, Conn., in 1783, and discharged twelve years. As his salary was insufficient for his support, he established an academy, to which he devoted six hours of each day, and till such a building could be erected he used the shop above mentioned. On the death of Dr. Stiles he was chosen his successor as president of Yale, and was inaugurated in September, 1795, and held the office until his death. Besides being professor of belles-lettres, oratory, and theology, he taught a class preparing for the ministry, preaching in the college chapel twice every Sunday. "He was untiring in industry and research, of a great system and wonderful memory; as a teacher, remarkable for his skill and success; as a writer, interesting and sensible; and as a preacher, sound, strong, impressive, and at times highly eloquent."* His poem "Greenfield Hill: in Seven Parts," published in 1794, will long be cherished in that village, although the original copies are exceedingly scarce. The heads of the arguments are: "I. The Prospect; II. The Flourishing Village; III. The Burning of Fairfield; IV. The Destruction of the Pequots; V. The Clergyman's Advice to the Villagers; VI. The Farmer's Advice to the Villagers; VII. The Vision; or, Prospect of the Future Happiness of America."

No. 22. Near the northern limits of the town are the Sherwood premises. Here was a house built by Eleazer Sherwood, a son of Joseph Sherwood, the original owner of Mill Hill, a descendant of Thomas, who is the first Sherwood recorded in Fairfield, he having bought land in 1653, and from whom has come a worthy host of descendants. He came from Sherwood Forest, in Scotland. This Eleazer married Mary Squire, of Fairfield, and settled on a farm mentioned above. The old colonial house was torn down not long ago, but some of the same material was used in the present structure, which stands on the same site.

It is worthy of mention that some of the people of Fairfield, fearful that their hard-earned possessions would be destroyed, removed them to Mr. Sherwood's quarters, but the British, who were on their way to Danbury, passed along this street, destroying property without mercy. In this case, however, Mrs. Sherwood fed them to the best of her ability, and thus was favored in having her own property saved.

At Eleazer's decease Hezekiah became owner; he also built a dwelling, which stands in sight of Mr. Eli Sherwood's. He died twenty-nine years ago, aged seventy-four. Eli Sherwood (the father of Deacon L. F. Sherwood, merchant and postmaster in Southport) was the late owner.

No. 23. This house has been in the family for three generations only, and was built by Joseph Sherwood somewhere between 1750 and 1760. When the British entered this house for plunder on their Danbury route, they tore up Mrs. Sherwood's silk dresses. They shot at Joseph Sherwood himself, but hit his hat only; but they took him prisoner with the intention of taking him with them, but he was lame, having had his leg broken for some time. He complained that he was unable to march. To convince them of the cause of his impediment in traveling, he exhibited his broken (though then well) leg; whereupon they released him. This place descended to his son Joseph, Jr., and from him to Solomon or Salmon, who is the present owner and occupant.

No. 24. This was built, about 1755, by Ensign Jehiel Sherwood, who had several children, all of whom were born here. Among them was one Stephen, born in 1775, who bought out the other heirs. All his children were also born here. This dwelling is in good repair, and is owned by Miss Sarah Sherwood, who is the present occupant, and sister of Mrs. Eliza Beers, who has a life-right in "colonial" No. 7.

No. 25. Built by Samuel Whitney, who was the owner when the British passed there, this house was vacated temporarily, but no depredation was committed by the enemy further than the appropriation of the food and drink left behind in the hasty departure of its inmates. This property was afterwards owned by David Fanton, who sold it to Charles Wakeman, who repaired and uprighted it. He dying, it fell to his brother, Eli Wakeman, who uses it for a tenement-house. Frederic Thorp is present occupant.

No. 26. This is an old-fashioned, long-roofed, red farm-house, and was built by John Banks in 1755; owned next by his daughter Ellen, who married Samuel O. Banks. The third owner was Mary Banks, who sold it to Eli Sherwood (see No. 22), and he to Jonathan Banks. The next transfer was to Thomas Goodsell, the great-grandson of the Rev. John Goodsell. (See No. 18.) The next owner was William B. Sherwood. The eighth and last is Wilson Sherwood. The British made a visit to this substantial home, but were satisfied with plundering without destroying it.

No. 27. Moses Banks was the builder of this house. He left a fine farm to his son, Timothy Banks, which is now occupied by T. Minot Banks,* a man whose scholarly perceptions exceed his financial ability; and sister. In building, it was contemporary with the above houses.

No. 28. This was built by John Banks, and was next owned by Nathan Banks, born 1760, died 1847. His wife, Mabel Bradley Banks, attained the age of ninety-five. He had a farm of one hundred acres, but he was not sufficiently robust to cultivate it personally, so he taught a select school here for years. He held some rank in the army, and conducted twenty prisoners ("Red-coats") from Fairfield to Hartford, all parties walking every step of the way. In this house is the following record of his services in the Revolutionary war:

* 1st tour, to Stratford and Green's farms, under Col. Whiting, in 1776.

* 2d tour, to Fairfield, under Lieut. Nathan Seeley, in 1777.

* 3d tour, to Horseneck (now Greenwich), under Capt. St. John, in 1778.

* 4th tour, when Fairfield and Norwalk were burnt, in 1779.

* 5th tour, to Fairfield, under Capt. Isaac Jervis, in 1780.

* 6th tour, to Compo, under Ensign Jehiel Sherwood (see No. 24), in 1781."

* The first Banks in Fairfield was John, who purchased land there in 1649. From him are descended probably all the Banks. They were so numerous that two districts in their own are named for them: the North and South Banks District. Longevity, honesty, industry, and frugality are prominent traits in this line of settlers.

It is now owned by Miss Pamela Banks. Among her relics she had an old-fashioned clock, but one day, while absent, a boy on the place utilized (?) the leaden weights and pendulum to melt for bullets. She had two cannon balls—"British reminiscences"—for a long time, one of which disappeared; the other Dr. M. V. B. Dunham exhibits among his curiosities.

No. 29. The house built by Deacon Daniel Banks is considered to be one hundred and fifty years old. He died in his one hundredth year. Late in life he lived around among his children, but went home to the house he built to die. His son Lyman also died there, aged eighty-one years. His tomb in Greenfield is marked thus:

"In Memory of
Dea. Daniel Banks,
died Jan. 16, 1839,
in the 100 year
of his age."

Lyman Banks had three sons,—Lyman, Sereno, and William. Lyman was taken sick and died while a student at Yale; Sereno went to a neighbor's to assist him in removing a rock, but the lever, a large crowbar, slipped from the fulcrum and struck him (Sereno) in the pit of the stomach, which resulted in his death. The son William died not far from the age of eighty.†

This house has been repaired, and the old stone chimney replaced by a small brick one. The kitchen now awaits repair from a recent fire. The present owner of these premises is Mrs. Sarah S. Sherwood.

† In addition to the above sketch of the Banks family the following is contributed by Mr. A. B. Hull:

"BANKS.—The ancestor of all of this family-name in Fairfield County was John Banks, who married a daughter of Charles Taintor, of Wethersfield, where he was town clerk in 1643; removed soon after to Fairfield, of which town he was representative several years between 1651 and 1666; removed to Rye, N. Y., and was representative from that town 1670 to 1673. He made his will Dec. 12, 1681. In it he mentioned sons—John, Samuel, Obadiah, and Benjamin—and daughters—Susannah Sturges, Hannah, wife of Daniel Burr—and sister, Mary Taylor. He had a son, Joseph, not mentioned in this will. Obadiah died in Fairfield in February, 1691, and Benjamin the next year. Of Samuel nothing reliable is known. Both at Fairfield and Greenwich those of the name are numerous, and also at Redding, where some of Joseph's descendants settled.

"Gershom Banks was born May 1, 1712. He was married three times, and his children were Daniel, Maramah, Thomas, Jane (who died in infancy), Gershom, Joseph, Jane, Noub, Elijah, Hyatt, and Isaac. Gershom Banks, Jr., married his cousin, Ruth, daughter of Benjamin Banks, April 20, 1774. Their children were Ruth, Mary, Huldah, Noub, Gershom, Charles, Lucy, and Cynthia.

"The children of Benjamin Banks were Molly, Benjamin, Hezekiah, Mabel, Ruth, Esther, Ellen, Anna, and Jonathan.

"This family was noted for longevity. Benjamin Banks died at the age of one hundred and two years, and his oldest great-grandson, Rev. Daniel Banks, preached his funeral sermon. His oldest child, Molly, widow of Moses Ogden, lived to the age of one hundred and three. When the British marched to Danbury in 1777, Mary, daughter of Gershom Banks, Jr., was a child less than a year old, and was with others, women and children, together with such articles as could be hastily collected, conveyed in an ox-cart to a place of safety. Gershom Banks, Jr., and his brother-in-law, Jonathan Banks, were captured and taken to New York, but were soon liberated. The house was plundered of everything of value. The daughter, Mary, who had such an early experience of the horrors of warfare, married, first, Francis Bradley, Jr., and afterwards Ezra Hull, of Redding."

No. 30. This house was built by Gershom Thorpe; date not ascertained, but, from the traditions and records in families in Greenfield, its being a "colonial" is undeniable. When the British made their raid in these parts, the owner, Gershom Thorpe, hid behind the chamber-door. His wife, full of courage, met the foe at the door. They asked if there was a man or a gun in the house, to which she replied, "No." She fed them, and they passed on and took prisoner Benjamin Banks, who was driving oxen near by. They conveyed him to Danbury and to New York, where in time he was exchanged. He returned, married, settled, and multiplied.

This house is small, but large families have been brought up in it. The second owner was Eli Thorpe, son of the builder, Gershom Thorpe. The third owner was James Goodsell, grandson of the Rev. John Goodsell, first pastor in Greenfield. The fourth owner is the present occupant, Mr. Simeon Banks.

No. 31. The old house on these premises was built by Gershom Banks, who attained the age of eighty, and his widow that of ninety-seven. It has been moved from its former site to give place for a new structure, though it is to be preserved for a storage-house. A large family has also emanated from this old dwelling. It is now owned by Abraham Banks, grandson of the builder, and his wife is a daughter of James Goodsell, once the owner of "No. 30."

Jonathan Banks, brother of Benjamin Banks, above, heard the British were advancing in this direction, went into his house, seized a robin-gun, and started to alarm the neighbors. As he opened the door to this house to go to the next he met a British soldier, who asked him what he was going to do with that gun. He replied, "Shoot robins." The soldier responded, "Shoot 'Red-coats.'" He took Jonathan prisoner with him to Danbury, and then to the famous "Sugar-house" in New York, where he had the smallpox. In time he and his brother Benjamin were exchanged, and he came home to his father, who built the "colonial" No. 32.

No. 32. The first owner and builder of this house was Benjamin Banks, who was born in 1703 and died 1805. He had the two sons above, who were taken prisoners. One of them, Jonathan, was the next owner, and his wife, like himself, had a rough experience. She was Molly Wakeman, daughter of Gershom Wakeman. As soon as he heard the enemy was at Compo he mounted his horse and started in the defense of his country. A bullet struck him in the forehead, as he rode to join the forces, and he fell dead. His wife fled, leaving the children of his first wife to care for themselves. Molly, the eldest, took the rest of the children and the cow and passed up a back lane to the woods, where they spent a week, subsisting on the milk of this cow. They were terribly anxious about the animal, fearing that it might make a noise and discover to the enemy their place of secretion. After a week they returned to their home, where in time

Molly became Mrs. Banks. These were the grandparents of Mrs. Isaac Milbanks, in house "No. 17." Jonathan's daughter was the owner next; afterwards it fell to Zalmon Bradley, who is the present proprietor. It was converted into a barn some years since, and in a few years this landmark will disappear.

No. 33 is located in the northeastern part of Greenfield. It was built by Jabez Thorpe,—a name which is of considerable antiquity in England and extensively known in this section. They had more of a maritime taste or were merchants. Capt. Stephen Thorpe was left homeless through the disaster at Fairfield, July 7, 1779. He purchased after it Chancellor Kent's home in Westport. Andrew Thorpe was a merchant for many years in New York. He died suddenly at his mansion on Mill Plain in 1876.

After Jabez Thorpe, Zalmon Price had possession; later, Samuel, son of Nathan Bradley. The present owner, William Bradley, captain in the State militia, occupies the house alone; it has undergone repairs of late, so that it is quite habitable for those of hermitical inclinations.

No. 34. This is known as the "Lobdell" house, though it is very old, having been built by Samuel Bradley (1st), who died in 1771. Here his first capital was "the jug of rum and a fiddle." Rum was a common article in those days, and one of the staples of trade. As near as can be remembered without a wearisome search of records, David Downes was the next owner, and he was succeeded by Eliphalet Meeker. The Meekers belong to an old family. Many of the descendants live in the western part of Greenfield parish, and many lie in Greenfield burying-ground. One is commemorated thus:

"HERE LYES BURIED
THE BODY OF DEACON
DAVID MEEKER,
who departed this Life April ye 14th, 1754,
In the 67th year
of his age."

The present owner is William Lobdell, who was born in Westchester Co., N. Y. This house is in good repair, but its ancient style of large beams and low ceilings is preserved.

No. 35. This was an old-fashioned long-roofed house built by Hezekiah Price about 1770. He too lies in the Greenfield ground, with this slab above him:

"In Memory of Mr Hezekiah Price,
who died
April 15, 1816,
in the 73 year
of his age."

His wife's stone is separated from his by a cedar-tree. It reads:

"Died on the 29 of Nov., 1843, Emice Price, widow of Hezekiah Price,
& daughter of
David Heers.
in the 100 year
of her age.

She lived a life of piety & devotion to the service of God, and died in the hope of a glorious resurrection."

Their son Hezekiah inherited and remodeled it. His daughter, Mrs. Betsey Calligan, is the present owner and occupant.

No. 36. This house is of Bradley origin. Its present owner is William Hawley Bradley, son of Capt. Hezekiah Bradley, who was son of Maj. Medad Bradley, who was the son of Hezekiah Bradley, son of Samuel Bradley who occupied the house "No. 34," owned now by William Lobdell. It is difficult to ascertain who was the builder. It is a very old domicile, and in fact uninhabitable. The Bradleys were in the "colonials" so near of blood kin, and so numerous, and lie so thick in the Greenfield ground, that a few inscriptions are here given:

"In Memory of
Abigail Bradley, who Died Sept. 1,
1777, in her 18th Year,
Sarah Bradley, who Died Februr? 28th,
1775, in her 5th year,
and Abigail Bradley, who Died Oct.
10th, 1779, in her 1st year.
All daughters of Hezekiah &
Abigail Bradley
Stay, thou — maiden, stay;
Learn how earthly joys decay.
Here three lovely sisters sleep;
Read their fare, and, reading, weep.
Swift the hours, deceiving, fly;
Death unseen is ever nigh:
Soon the form of healthiest bloom
Think how soon may find a tomb.
Wisdom, then, and heaven to gain,
Early seek, nor read in vain."

"In memory
of Doctr Aaron Burr Bradley,
born April 22^d, 1769,
died February 18th, 1814."

This is a simple inscription. The following is as short as can be found:

"Samuel Bradley, Esq.
Obt. Aug. 29, 1804,
Æt. 70.

This Bradley house stands on Burr's Highway, and is on the estate of Eldad Gould, a sea-captain, who accumulated quite a property. William H. Bradley's daughter married George Gould, whose death was occasioned by a stone falling on his head while in a well, injuring him fatally.

No. 37. Another house on Burr's Highway, a large dwelling, was built by Eliphalet Lyon, who lived to be ninety-four. He was a weaver, and very skillful in the art. One day Dr. Dwight came to see him and brought a piece of carpet he had obtained in New Haven, and asked if he could weave like that. Mr.

Lyon, after raveling a piece, replied that he could, and stated that if he (the doctor) would go home and cut up his old clothes in strips, sew them together, and bring them to his shop, he would weave them. In a few days Dr. Dwight came in with his rags, which were woven into carpeting, which was the first carpet spread down on Greenfield Hill!

This Eliphalet Lyon had a daughter, who was married to Samuel Wilson. They were the parents of the present Samuel Wilson, the gunsmith, who is now ninety-six years old. He was born in this house ("No. 37") in November, 1784. He heard a sermon for the first time in his life when he was four years old, and that was Dr. Dwight's; he is the only man living who ever heard that celebrated divine. He related the story about old Frazier's stealing goods from Samuel Bradley's store, and said that his father went to see him hung. He also relates that Martha Harvey was a witch who lived but a short distance above Mr. Milbank's, who used to get the cows over the great girt to the barn. People were so afraid they did not venture to pass by there. He states that as he first remembers Fairfield it looked pretty shabby, as the tall black chimneys were standing, and old barns riddled with bullets. His father drew considerable of the timber for the Congregational church which replaced the one burnt during the conflagration. In his younger days there were four or five stores in Greenfield Hill which took in a great deal of flax, raised in the country about there. When he was a boy he was accustomed to avoid school by running away to the blacksmith-shop, which a Greenfield wit has said always go together in the country, and it is a question in which lies the most redeeming virtues (the school or the blacksmith-shop). From the knowledge he gained from his observation of the workers in iron, he took up the trade of gunsmith in 1812, when it took a week to make a gun. He made the first rifle-gun in the county, and the third one he completed is owned now by Eli Adams, of Easton. He must have met with some ridicule in his first work, as Darius Grant, a skilled blacksmith, examined one critically, and said it was the straightest gun he ever saw. He set up a target, which he hit every time.

Again, a neighboring woman, to test him, challenged him to hit one of her turkeys. She offered to set it up. He accepted the challenge; the second shot killed the bird, and she was, to use Mr. Wilson's words, "awful mad." His shot-guns sold at from five to ten dollars, and his rifles for thirty dollars apiece. He had more orders than he could fill, so he bought guns in New York to meet the demands of his customers. He purchased long bars of iron of Miah Perry, who was in the mercantile business opposite, where N. Jennings has his market, where Jelliff's new brick building stands. He bored out the barrels from solid iron. His tools cost him one thousand dollars. He stood in one place to file so long that he wore an oak plank floor so thin that one day when he brought his foot down to close the vise it gave way and he went through. He never was out of work. He had orders from Norwalk, Danbury, New Haven, and various places. Some of his guns went to Ireland.

In addition to his guns, of which he made entire one hundred and repaired more than five hundred, he did a great amount of iron-work. He made twelve sets of saw-mill work, except the crank. He had a fine position offered him in a paper-mill and any price for compensation and men for assistants, but, his wife being sick, and having the farm to attend to, he would not accept. He never was a military character, but was a private in the State militia. His life has been very unassuming, yet remarkable. He has been blind about six years, owing to close application to his work and much reading, of which he was very fond; otherwise he is well and hearty.

Eliphalet Lyon, the builder of this house, was great-grandfather to Mrs. E. L. Huntington, of Fairfield, widow of the Rev. Enoch Huntington, and to her brother, Mr. Morris Lyon, an eminent teacher in New York, a graduate of Yale, and a founder of the Memorial Library in 1876 in his native town (Fairfield).

Eliphalet Lyon, Jr., was the second owner of this house. He left three heirs, Mrs. Eben Hill, of Norwalk, and Horace and Ramsen Hill. The present occupant is Barlow Hill, deacon of the Congregational Church in Greenfield and grandson of Eliphalet Lyon, Jr.

No. 38. This dwelling was erected by Ebenezer Hill in 1765. He married — Sherwood, who lived near Oak Lawn Cemetery, from a house long since torn down. They were the parents of nine children. In those days there was no conveyances other than ox-carts, so that the only way of carrying children was by the extension of the saddle called the pillion. Mrs. Hill often visited her parents with one child very easily, by taking it in her arms on horseback. When the second was born she sighed, feeling that the home visits must be foregone, but she trained the first child so it would sit on the pillion, while baby No. 2 rode in arms. When baby No. 3 was added to the family, she despaired again when thinking of her youthful home, but she trained the two former so they could ride behind, while the third rode in arms. When No. 4 was added, No. 1 had become old enough to remain home, so she was permitted to always make her filial visits to the parental roof. At the time of the conflagration two of these children were very ill. One died that night, the other two or three days later. The parents, however, in their solicitude had the cart and oxen in readiness, so that if the torch should be applied to their house no time should be lost in preserving their little ones.

Of this family, Ebenezer, Jr., studied theology to please his father and Dr. Dwight; he preached but a few years, having a parish in Saratoga County, or in that section. He then devoted himself to politics, was judge of Probate, State Senator, and Congressman.

Another son, Jabez, who attained the altitude of six feet, was out in the meadow one day, when he started for home. Instead of crossing the bridge, he shortened his route by wading through the river while in profuse perspiration. The result was a speedy termination, with cholera morbus for an agent. In the Greenfield Cemetery is this tribute to him:

"In memory of Mr. Jabez Hill,
Son of Capt. Ebenezer Hill, who, after an excruciating sickness of four days, died August 24, 1807,
Aged 27 years, 1 month & 19 days.

"Another proof, Reader, that life can be ensured by nought beneath the sun. For those virtues which serve to ornament and happily domestic life in him concentrated."

"His usefulness extended its benign effects to all around and seemed to demand for him protracted years. But suddenly cut off amid prospects bright of wealth and worldly bliss, by virtue and honest industry produced, he was consigned by the unrelenting hand of Death to an early grave."

The posthumous daughter of Jabez Hill married William, who is generally known as "Postmaster Sherwood." He at one time went to England as agent for the Jennings to secure the immense wealth which is in that family-name. They are the owners and occupants of this house, which was made of excellent material. Some of the rooms up-stairs and down were wainscoted in the best manner, being free from even a diminutive knot. The thumb-pieces to the doors were after an extremely odd pattern. There was a bullet-hole in the side of the building, but when repairs were made in 1844 the mark of service was removed. The house then lost its uniformity on low roofs, and gained a conformity on being raised so that the eaves were parallel. One of the first town clerks in Fairfield was William Hill, who served to 1684.

No. 39. This house was built by Ezekiel Hull, whose memory is at present associated with but few, as nearly all of his contemporaries passed away years ago. He lies in Greenfield. A stone thus inscribed marks his resting-place:

"In Memory of Capt. Ezekiel Hull, who died Oct. 7th, 1802,
Aged 70 years."

There are not a dozen alive who knew him, and his house was found with difficulty.

John Philips was the next owner,—a zealous leader in the Methodist Church. His first wife was the grandmother of Tom Thumb. Mr. Philips sold to Azariah Cogswell, who died there. His heirs sold to John Brothwell, who is the present owner and occupant, and who posts a notice: "This place is for sale."

Ezekiel Hull had a son, Thomas, for whom he built a house nearly opposite. One of his (Thomas') daughters married — Sanford, from Redding. They occupied it for a time, then sold it to — Turner, who disposed of it to Samuel Morehouse, who sold it to another Samuel Morehouse (no relation to the former one); he died here. His son, Abel Morehouse, came into possession, and he also died there, leaving one son, John Morehouse, the present owner and occupant.

No. 40. A house in Fairfield Woods known as Abel Jennings' place was once a tavern. It is supposed it was built by his father. From some records it is known to have stood in the Revolutionary war. After Abel Jennings, of whom Nelson Jennings bought it, his sisters owned it. It met with various transfers, and was under considerable mortgage when Christian Richards purchased it. He is an intelligent German, and has been the occupant thirty years.

No. 42. This "colonial" was erected by David Jennings, in 1762. It fell to the heirs and passed out of the family in 1832, when — Turner purchased it. He disposed of it to Thomas Merwin, who is the owner and occupant.

No. 43. This is also Jennings' property. It was built by Levi Jennings, between 1760 and 1770. It descended to his son David, who died here. His widow, Mrs. Eliza Jennings, with her family, is the present occupant. It was remodeled by her son, Richard Jennings, in 1877. He states there has never been a quarrel or a family feud in that house, which fact is deserving of a place in history.

Much of this property in this section ("Jennings' Woods," properly "Jennings' Farms") was owned by Joshua Jennings, who settled in Fairfield in 1655. From Joshua Jennings, who died in 1716, have sprung the many Jennings who have done much towards populating Fairfield, extending commerce and civilization, and enacting our laws.

Joshua Jennings and his wife, Mary, left seven sons and two daughters. Some report the marriage of Joshua in 1617 in Hartford, but it has not been fully authenticated. Their numerous descendants are traced down through the Probate and church records.

The house occupied by Burr Lyon, deceased, was owned and occupied by Isaac Jennings, and was the first house burnt by Tryon. Jennings' wife was sister to Col. Abraham Gould, who was killed while defending Ridgefield. Interesting records of the family were obtained, through necessity, of each connecting with Joshua, to secure his individual share of the immense fortune reported to be left to his posterity in America.

In 1846 a preliminary meeting was held in Southport, and steps taken for a general meeting, which was held in Fairfield town-hall. A committee of five was appointed,—William Sherwood, of Fairfield; David Coley, of Westport; Gould Jennings, of Norwalk; —, of Bridgeport; and Augustus Jennings, of Southport. The last named was secretary. They were instructed to raise funds to investigate the rumors by examining records in England as well as in this country.

William Sherwood, Esq. (see No. 38), was intrusted with the duty of proceeding to England, and with the counsel of the Hon. David Hoffman, the United States Minister, and others he obtained records from the Tower of London, the British Museum, the Doctors' Commons, and church records at Acton Place, where the great millionaire, William Jennings, was buried. He obtained a mass of information concerning the English family, but did not show any connection to Joshua Jennings of 1656. The efforts made here enabled the family to interest the different branches, so that each were enabled to show their connection with one of the seven sons of the first Joshua. These records are preserved, with those obtained from England, by Judge William Sherwood. Many of the descendants of Joshua are occupying the land set to him when the long lots were laid out.

Green's Farms, which was formerly Fairfield West Parish, is composed largely of people of that name; still, there is a large number of them in the township of Fairfield. There is not a burying-ground but has its old freestone of a hundred years ago and the white marble of to-day to the memory of a Jennings, among whom were Deacon Moses Jennings (Congregationalist), who died in 1813, aged seventy-nine; Dr. Seth Jennings, who died years ago; Capt. Abraham Gould Jennings, who visited all ports and dealt in the East India trade.

Deacon O. B. Jennings and Capt. Isaac (member of the Connecticut Legislature), of Fairfield, and Mr. Augustus Jennings, of Southport, are three brothers in the Japan paper-ware business. The late Capt. Jo. Jennings, of Southport, and his sons were more or less engaged in commercial business. One, however, M. J. Fred Jennings, is a Southport druggist. The Jennings name is associated with thrift and prosperity.

No. 43. In the family Bible in this house is the record, "Daniel Willson was born July 26th, in ye year 1747, and was married to Sarah Squier in ye year 1769," when this house was built. Their son David was second owner.

David Willson, Jr., next in the genealogical line, heired it. He dying, his sister, Eliza Willson, is the owner and occupant. She is a lady of intelligence, and her mind is replete with Revolutionary reminiscences. Her mother was but six and a half years old when Fairfield was burnt, and the family escaped to the hills for safety. They lost everything, but were thankful that no one of their family was among the missing. Their house was opposite the Burr Betts place, in Fairfield, and was occupied later as a bel-lows-factory. After the conflagration the Willsons built farther back. Capt. Daniel Willson's, of Black Rock, was raised in the forenoon, and this Daniel Willson's in the afternoon, of the same day.

In this latter house may be found some rare old books. Among them are to be seen Josephus, in four volumes, printed by Shober & London for John M. Gibbons and Robert Hodge (MDCCLXXV.). On the fly-leaf is the autograph of "G. S. Silliman, 1775." The books were obtained at an auction held for the disposal of Gen. Silliman's property.

No. 44. This property is located on Holland Hill. A title was given by Robert Silliman to Ebenezer Silliman, Jan. 7, 1740.

"Daniel Silliman, the first of the name who settled in Fairfield, was understood, in the traditions of the family, to have been an emigrant from Holland." "The Sillimans of Fairfield were settled from the beginning upon an eminence about two miles from the village of that name, and called—in consequence, probably, of the reputed origin of Daniel Silliman—Holland Hill."²²

The first Daniel Silliman, who died in 1690, had three sons,—Daniel, Thomas, and Robert. The father, dying in 1690, left unincumbered an estate amounting to two hundred and one pounds. Thomas died in 1692; his brothers were his administrators. He apparently left no children. Daniel, Jr., died in 1697, leaving six children, of whom John was a merchant and had a large estate. He married Ann Burr.

Robert married Sarah Hull, probably the granddaughter of Rev. John Jones. He (Robert) died in 1748, leaving three sons—Robert, Jr., Nathaniel, and Ebenezer—and four daughters,—Ann, Sarah, Martha, and Rebecca. Ebenezer married Abigail Sellick, daughter of Abigail Sellick, in 1728. Their children were Gold Sellick, born 1732; Ebenezer, born 1734; Amelia, 1736; Hezekiah, 1739; Jonathan, 1742; Abigail, 1748; Deodate, 1749. He was called "Date."

The father of this family lies in Fairfield cemetery, and his resting-place is marked by a freestone slab containing this inscription:

"In Memory of the Hon^{ble} Ebenezer Silliman, Esq. For many years successively a member of the Council and one of the Judges of the Superior Court, in the Colony of Connecticut. Distinguished with a clear understanding, a sedate mind, and dignity of deportment, well versed in Jurisprudence, learned in the Law, and religiously upright, he sustain'd those high Trusts (and acted in other important Relations) with Honour to himself, to his Family, and to his Country.

"And having served his generation, by the will of God fell asleep, in the 68th Year of his age, on the 11th Oct^r, 1775.

"I have said ye are gods, but ye shall die like men."

His wife's resting-place is thus marked:

"In Memory of Mrs.
Abigail Silliman,
Late A noble Consort of the Honourable
Ebenezer Silliman, Esq.
She died March 16 A.D. 1772,
Aged 65 Years one month, wanting one day.
How lov'd, how valu'd once avails thee not;
To whom related or by whom begot:
A heap of dust alone remains of thee,
'Tis all thou art, and all the proud sh'ld be."

This Ebenezer Silliman was a graduate of Yale College in 1727. He was the proprietor of a large landed estate, and an influential man in public affairs. In the Congregational Church records it is found that

Mr. Ebenezer Silliman was admitted as member under Rev. Joseph Webb, Dec. 24, 1727. At a meeting held in Fairfield, "ye 5th Day of Jan'y, A.D. 1735, Ebenezer Silliman was chosen Scribe," when they voted whether a choice be made of "ye Rev^d Mr. Noah Hobart for ye head and pastor" of said church. Later we find that "in 1768 Ebenezer Silliman and Dr. John Allen were appointed a committee to take an account of the church stock," showing that he held a placé in Church as well as in State. Of his children, Gold Sellick was a graduate of Yale College in 1752.

"At a Church meeting, April 25, 1779:

"Voted, That Messrs. Deodate Silliman, Peter Hendrick, Samuel Sturges, David Allen, Peter Jennings, James Penfield, Israel Bibbins, Jeremiah Jennings, and any others of the church or society who are skilled in psalmody, be desired to sit together in the gallery on the Lord's day and lead the congregation in that part of divine worship, they to agree among themselves as to the person who is to pitch the tune."²³

Amelia's history is found on a tombstone in the Fairfield cemetery:

"This monument was erected by order of William Burr in commemoration of his honored mother, Amelia, who lived the partner and widow of Ebenezer Burr, son of Samuel and Elizabeth Burr, late of Fairfield, deceased. Also lived the partner and died the widow of Abel Gould, son of Samuel Gould, late of Fairfield, deceased. Was daughter of Ebenezer Silliman, Esq. late of Fairfield, deceased; was born in New York, 1736, and died in the year 1794, aged 58 years."

This "colonial" passed from Ebenezer Silliman to Joseph Noyes, a lawyer, known as "Squire Noyes," and stepson of Gen. Silliman's.

Mr. Noyes, in 1799, disposed of it to Daniel Wilson, who transferred it to his mother, Sarah Wilson. From her it came to a son, John S. Wilson, in 1803. Distribution was made in 1870 from the estate of John S. Wilson to William S. Wilson, who is the present owner and occupant. J. A. Wilson, the son of the latter, is principal of the Mill Plain graded school,—a position he has successfully occupied three years and has entered on his fourth.

The Wilsons, too, belong to Fairfield's early settlers, as the tombstones testify. A few inscriptions are here given:

"Here lies Buried

and daughter of
Mr. Robert Silliman, who was born February 17,

²² From Fisher's Life of Benjamin Silliman.

²³ From the Congregational Church Records, Fairfield, Conn.

"In Memory of
Mr. Daniel Willson, who was born August 6th,
1747 and departed this Life Aug. 17, 1795, aged 48 Years and 11 days.

Death is a debt to nature due,
Which I have paid; and so must you."

The age of this house is variously estimated at from one hundred and twenty-five to two hundred years. It is in good repair internally, and, with a good coat of paint, would last several generations. The fastening to the door is a peculiar contrivance which the descendants of the original owners would like to possess, as there is nothing like it in the country.

No. 45. This was built for Gen. Gold Sellick Silliman, who was born in 1732 and graduated from Yale College in 1752. He married Martha Davenport in 1754. They united with the Prime Ancient Church, Fairfield, March 3, 1754, she having before been a member of the church at East Haven. She died in August, 1774, leaving one son, William, who was taken prisoner (by the British) with his father in 1779. She was buried with the Sillimans, and this is her inscription:

"Here lies Entied the Body of Mrs Martha Silliman, Wife of G. Seleck Silliman,
Esqr, who died August first,
1774, aged 41 years 1 mon. & 23 D.
Sweet Soul, we leave thee to thy Rest;
Enjoy thy Jesus and thy God,
Till we, from Bands of Clay releast,
Spring out & Climb the Shining Road,
While the dear Dust she leaves behind
Sleeps in thy Bosom, Sacred Grave,
Or does she seek, or has she found her Babe,
Amongst the Infant Nation of the blest,
And claspt it to her Soul to Satisfie there
The Young maternal Love. Thrice happy child,
That saw the Light & turned its Eyes aside
From our dim Regions to the Eternal Sun
And led the Parents' Way to Glory.—WATTS."

Gen. Gold S. Silliman married, for his second wife, in 1775, Mrs. Mary Noyes, widow of Rev. John Noyes, of New Haven, and daughter of Rev. Joseph Fish, of Stonington, Conn. She had three sons by her first marriage,—Joseph, John, and James. Joseph was owner or occupant of "colonial" No. 41. John graduated at Yale College in September, 1779; was licensed as a preacher, October, 1783; was ordained to the work of the ministry and installed as pastor over the church in Norfield, then a parish of Fairfield, May 31, 1786. He continued his public ministrations till March, 1806, when his health failed him, so that he was unable to perform the duties of his ministry; and, seeing no prospect of speedy restoration after a lapse of more than a year, he took a dismission from his pastoral relation May 26, 1807. With much weakness he resumed pulpit labor Sept. 4, 1808. For many years he was employed in vacant societies within the county. He supplied his former charge a part of the time. At length he engaged for them without intermission from year to year, and continued so to do for about fourteen years, and then proposed to the people that they should look out for a young man to settle with them, which they did. He continued to preach occasionally for ministers and vacant congregations, but never moved his residence.*

In August, 1790, Daniel Osborn was chosen deacon in room of Gold Sellick Silliman, deceased. After he graduated from college he engaged a short time in business, and then studied law and "became a successful practitioner at the bar, as is indicated by his holding the office of prosecuting attorney for the county. He had interested himself in military affairs, and at the outbreak of the Revolutionary struggle was a colonel of cavalry in the local militia. But during the most of the war he held the rank of brigadier-general, and was charged with superintending the defense of the southwestern frontier of Connecticut, which, on account of the long occupation of the city of New York and Westchester County, as well as Long Island, by the British, was a post requiring much vigilance and efficiency. He took the field at the head of a regiment early in 1776, was in the battle on Long Island, and both in that retreat and on the retreat of the American forces from the city of New York his command was placed as the rear-guard. He bore a perilous and honorable part in the battle of White Plains, and on this, as on several other occasions, narrowly escaped the balls of the enemy. While serving in the camp of Washington, Gen. Silliman enjoyed his confidence. Gen. Silliman desisted the British fleet when approaching to land the troops for the destruction of the military stores at Danbury in 1777, and, rapidly collecting the militia, he, in connection with Gens. Arnold and Wooster, interposed a resistance to their progress, sustaining the attack of superior numbers in the conflict at Ridgefield and harassing the enemy on their way back to their vessels. The estimate that was put upon the value of his services is attested by the enterprise undertaken by the British in conjunction with the Tories, which resulted in his being detained in captivity for nearly a year."

The Silliman biographer quotes the account of the capture, as taken from some of the family papers, thus:

"My father's vigilance made him obnoxious to the Tories, and he was so much an obstacle in the way of British incursions that it became an important object to make him prisoner, especially as the British in New York were, as it now appears, about to devastate the coast of New England, plundering and burning their towns and destroying their resources; and as Connecticut, on account of its strenuous opposition to British aggression on the rights of the colonies, was, in their view, peculiarly worthy of chastisement, it was determined to make this little colony the first object of their resentment.

"A secret boat-expedition was sent by Sir Henry Clinton from New York, manned chiefly by Tories. This craft was a whale-boat; the crew were nine in number, and only two of them were foreigners. They entered Black Rock Harbor, at Fairfield, drew up their boat into the sedge, and, leaving one of their number as a guard, the remaining eight proceeded across the hills, two miles, to my father's house, which at the midnight hour was all quiet, and the family asleep.

"On May 1, 1779, between twelve and one o'clock A.M., the house was violently assaulted by large heavy stones banging against both doors with oaths, imprecations, and threats. My father, being awaked from a sound sleep, seized two loaded guns standing at his bedside, rushed to the front windows, and, by the light of the moon, seeing armed men on the stoop or portico, he thrust the muzzle of a musket through a pane of glass and pulled the trigger; but there was only a flash in the pan, and the gun did not go off. Percussion-caps were then unknown, and muskets were fired by flint and steel. Instantly the windows were dashed in, and the ruffians were upon him. The doors were opened, and he became their prisoner. William, his son, although ill with ague and fever, was aroused from his bed, and became also their captive. These ruffian men, bearing guns with fixed bayonets, followed my father into the bedroom, a terrific sight to his wife, she being in bed with her little son, Gold Sellick (Jr.), not yet eighteen months old, lying upon her arm. The invaders were soothed by my father, as if they were gentlemen soldiers, and were desired to withdraw from the presence of his wife. They silkily complied, and my father, by tossing my mother's dress over a basket containing the sacramental silver (to be used that day) of the church, of which he was deacon, thus concealed from them what would have been a rich prize. He also secured some valuable papers before he, with his son, was hurried off to the boat, leaving my mother disconsolate and almost alone."

In the mean time she retired to the house of Mr. Eliakim Beach, at North Stratford, now Trumbull, seven or eight miles distant, where "Benjamin Silliman, the most eminent of American teachers of natural science, was born." In later years, while speaking of his mother, he says: "Her cheerful courage contributed to sustain her; and I ought to be grateful to my noble mother and to my gracious God that the midnight surprise, the horror of ruffians armed for aggression, and the loss of her husband, as perhaps she might fear, by the hands of assassins, had not prevented my life or entailed upon it physical, mental, or moral infirmities."

Gen. Silliman died in 1790, ten years after the family reunion. This bereavement brought upon his wife much trouble. She was obliged to decide how her sons were to be educated; the eldest was not quite thirteen, and the other not quite eleven. There was considerable property in land, farming-implements, carts, carriages, horses, cows, oxen, sheep, and swine, but there was no income without labor. There were some slaves,—some by purchase and some by descent,—about a dozen in number. The slave-mothers served in the kitchen and the laundry; the boys and girls were waiters. The principal slave was an able man with a master, but without was bold and impudent; his wife was kind and faithful.

Gen. Silliman would have been much better off with his legal business alone than with the horde of servants, who consumed the products of the farm and were, in general, triflers, and some of them dishonest. His resting-place (in Fairfield's illustrious ground) is marked by a freestone slab:

"Gold Sellick Silliman, Esq., attorney-at-law, justice of the peace, and during the late war Colonel of Horse and Brigadier-General of militia, died July 21st, 1790, aged 58 years, having discharged these and other public offices with reputation and dignity, and in private life shown the affectionate husband, tender parent, exemplary Christian, and man of fervent piety."

Mr. Benjamin Silliman was reared in Fairfield. After a year's absence his father, mother, and two children were reunited in their home (on Holland Hill), where he prepared to enter Yale College, which he did in 1792, the youngest of his class, save one aged thirteen. He graduated in 1796. In 1798 he resumed his residence in New Haven, and engaged in the study of the law. In 1799 he was appointed a tutor in Yale College. In the same year he entered upon the duties of that office, and remained in the instruction and government of the institution until 1853, when he fully resigned, having made an overture for a resignation in 1850, which was not accepted. He gave, by invitation of the corporation and faculty of the college, lectures on chemistry, mineralogy, and geology till 1855.

A freestone slab in the Fairfield old burying-ground contains an epitaph which gives his and his brother's history:

"In memory of
Gold Sellick Silliman, Esq., who died in Brooklyn, N. Y.,
June 3, 1865, in his 91st year,
and of

Benjamin Silliman, LL.D., more than 50 years professor of Natural Science in Yale College, who died in New Haven, Conn., Nov. 21st, 1864,

in the 80th year of his age.

"Their remains are interred in the places of their decease. Eminent for honor, generosity, affection, patriotism, intellectual culture, and Christian principle, they were bound together through life by the strongest of fraternal ties.

"They were sons of Gen. Gold Sellick Silliman, who died 1790, and grandsons of the Honorable Ebenezer Silliman, deceased in 1755, son of Robert Silliman, deceased in 1748, and grandson of Daniel Silliman, deceased in 1690. All of Fairfield.

"The children add this to the records of their ancestors, A.D. 1877."

After Gen. Silliman's death an auction was held, from which many relics are in various families of Fairfield to-day. The family Bible, even, was owned by Mr. Israel Bibbins, but was afterwards restored to the family at the request of one of the Silliman descendants.

Mrs. Mary (Noyes) Silliman married, in 1804, Dr. John Dickinson, of Middletown, which became her home. She died July 2, 1818, in her eighty-third year. Her son Benjamin, in speaking of her, says:

"She was a heroic woman, and encountered with firmness the trials and terrors of the American Revolution, in which my father was largely concerned. She did not lose her self-control when, three months before my birth, the house was assailed by an armed banditti at the midnight hour, the windows demolished, and my father and elder half-brother were torn away from her, and my father detained for a year at Flatbush, L. I., as a prisoner of war. Blessed Mother! In her widowhood, after my father's death, in 1799, she struggled on in embarrassed circumstances, and gave my brother and myself a noble education, forming our minds at home to purity and piety. Whatever I have of good in me I owe, under God, mainly to her, and I look with mingled reverence and delight at her lovely picture which smiles upon me still."

The property passed out of the Silliman name not far from the beginning of the present century.

Nathan Hayes was the second owner. Then it came into possession of James Penfield (who lived and died there, a man of much respectability in Fairfield, judging from the records and tombstones. The next owner was Lydia Penfield, who sold it to Lewis Penfield, of Bridgeport, who repaired it. He disposed of it to Bradley Nichols, of Nichols' Farms, who now occupies it.

* Fisher's Life of Benjamin Silliman, vol. i, p. 275.

It has been repaired and newly covered, yet it is a historic dwelling and in an excellent condition. The school-house stands near, where the Sillimans attended school, and tradition was teaching the public that this was the identical school-house of a hundred years ago, but the inhabitants who gathered their lore from the desk against the three sides of the house, and the plank benches held by four sticks spreading at their contact with the floor, state that this is another structure, erected in 1835 on the original site.

No. 46 is a "colonial" built by a Uriah Morehouse in 1773-75. It fell to John Morehouse in 1827, and to Uriah Hill Morehouse in 1836. The present owner is John Gould Morehouse, whose claim was valid in 1814. His wife (Mrs. J. G. Morehouse) was born in "colonial" No. 44.

The first settler bearing this name was Thomas Morehouse, who was located in Wethersfield in 1640, and joined the colony at Fairfield in 1653, when he purchased a tide-mill of Henry Jackson, together with the privileges granted to said Jackson by the town in 1648.

It appears that Thomas Morehouse was deputy at the General Court at Hartford at the autumn session of 1653. He died in 1658. In his will on the Probate records in Fairfield he names four sons and several daughters. These sons are the heads of the various lines of Morehouses through the country. They were Samuel, Thomas, John, and Jonathan.

Samuel was lieutenant and county marshal from 1675 to 1687. He was the ancestor of the Morehouses now living in the town of Fairfield. His sons were Samuel, Thomas, John, Daniel, and James.

John, the son of the first Thomas, was ensign in the company of soldiers raised in Fairfield County in 1676 for the campaign against the Indians that year, and afterwards removed to Southampton, L. I. Of the next generation, Ephraim and James settled in Litchfield Co., Conn.

John Morehouse, of the fourth generation, had two sons, who survived him, —Uriah, born in 1740, and William, born in 1749. Uriah had one son, John, who was commissioned ensign in 1813, and captain in 1814, of a company of volunteers organized for local defense. William's sons were Deacon William (father of Stephen Morehouse), William B., late of Greenfield, and Mayor John B.

Of the many descendants, Gould went to Saratoga and died there; another was judge of the Supreme Court in New York.

The sea-wall and the breakwater at Black Rock were in progress in 1837-40, having for contractors Jonathan Scranton, Madison, John G., and Uriah L. Morehouse, of Fairfield. This public work, near the dwelling-house, was built by Webb and Beach Downes, of Monroe. It was continued in 1847 by John G. Morehouse as contractor, under the general superintendence of Capt. William H. Swift, United States engineer, and finished in 1849.

The oldest gravestone in the Fairfield grounds yet discovered is, from its date and initials,—“S. M. 1687,”—supposed, from its location, to be Samuel Morehouse. The people of that family-name are numerous and of stability both in Church and State affairs.

No. 47. This "colonial," in Southport, stands nearly opposite Mr. Oliver Bulkeley's mansion, and was built a long time before the Revolution. The information given in regard to it is that it originally belonged to James Bulkeley, son of Peter and Hannah (Ward) Bulkeley. He was born Aug. 3, 1729, and married Elizabeth Whitehead, Jan. 16, 1738. The next owner remembered was Darrow, who died here. Some of his family history is given on his tombstone, which is near the gate in the old (Fairfield) cemetery:

"This stone was erected by Capt. Eleazer Bulkeley to the memory of his father, Mr. James Bulkeley, who died Feb. 3, 1803, aged 73, and Mrs. Elizabeth, his mother, who died June 27, 1809, aged 71. Likewise to his sister Mary, who died 1779, age 22 years, and to his brother Andrew, who died 1788, aged 14. Also to Brother Moses, who died 1796, aged 29, and his brother James, who died at Norfolk, in Virginia, Sept. 13, 1803, aged 37."

The second Mary in this family—the first died young (the eldest and youngest of the eleven children were called Mary)—married Capt. Joab Squire. They removed to Ohio in 1817. They exchanged this "colonial" for a place near the shore with Benjamin Darrow, who died in this house, leaving three daughters, one of whom married Levi Downes, who disposed of it to Joseph Furniss, present owner and occupant.

No. 48. The house now occupied by Charles Rockwell was the old farm-house kept by John and afterwards by his son Howes Osborn, who married Mary Bulkeley, daughter of Peter and Hannah Ward Bulkeley. The old stage-route was past their door, and in the rear of — Edward's house. Gen. Washington was entertained there with others, as it was considered as a public inn.

A deed conveying a portion of said estate to John Osborn is dated on the first day of August, in the eighth year of the reign of our sovereign lord George the Second of Great Britain and King, Annoque Domini 1734. Signed, John Norris; signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of Lothrop Lewis, Andrew Burr.

A deed from Job Bartram to Howes Osborn conveying a certain negro woman, named Time, for fifty pounds, about thirty-five years old, is dated April, 1778, and witnessed by Moses Jennings, Elipha't Bartram, Jr.

A deed from Ebenezer Wakeman, Jr., to Howes

John Gould

Osborn, conveying a negro man, Fortin, for fifty pounds, is dated in Fairfield, Jan. 26, 1782.

Mr. Howes Osborn died in 1807, aged eighty-five, and his wife in 1812, aged eighty-one.

No. 49. There is an old building on the premises of Mrs. — Brown, known as the Powder-House. This stood on Jennings' property. The colony used this structure, made of stone, for a magazine. Here at one time a worthless fellow, for some misconduct, was imprisoned. Owing to a stroke of wit, however, his incarceration was short, as he drew his knife across a stone to produce a spark, which, in case it came in contact with the powder, would produce an explosion. As he continued the attempt he exclaimed, "Free toleration, or no toleration! Free toleration, or no toleration!" The officers, valuing the powder more than his head, permitted him to go free.

No. 50. It is not known who built this house. Capt. William Bulkeley, born in 1741, died in 1787, owned it and the store opposite. He disposed of it to Capt. Joshua Jennings, who sold it and went West. Wakeman B. Meeker was the purchaser; he subsequently died on these premises, and his estate has never been settled. His son carried on the store and shipping business for years under the name of W. B. Meeker & Son.

No. 51. This house, between Greenfield and Southport, was used as a tavern in Revolutionary times. In later years it was owned by Timothy Bulkeley, born in 1787; he remodeled and repaired it. After his death his widow disposed of it to Elijah Gray, the present owner. His son, Charles H. Gray, is one of the contributing editors to the Southport Times.

The reader will perceive that very little of this matter can be gathered from Probate records, or from books in general, as this has heretofore been unwritten history. The data have been carefully collected and compared. In many instances none could be given, and the only authenticity was from the circumstances connected with the subject in question.

For information concerning the "colonial houses" credit is due Miss Hannah Hobart, Miss Eliza Hull, Mr. Henry Rowland, Mrs. Jane Kippen, Miss R. S. Carew, Mrs. Isaac Milbank, Mr. A. R. T. Nichols, Mr. Henry Bradley, Mr. Samuel Wilson (the gunsmith), Mr. John G. Morehouse, Mr. T. Minot Banks, Mrs. Elizabeth Meggs, Mrs. Abigail Sturges, Mr. Oliver H. Perry, Mr. Winthrop H. Perry, Capt. Julius Pike, Mr. David Beers, Mr. J. Frederic Jennings, Mr. Augustus Jennings, Mr. Ebenezer Burr, Mrs. Ebenezer Burr, Mr. Daniel Maloney, and the various people on the colonial premises.

Manuscripts were also kindly furnished by Mr. Henry Rowland, Mr. A. R. T. Nichols (who also loaned the "Musings of Memory," written by Uriah Bulkeley in his eighty-seventh year), and Mr. J. G. Morehouse. Extracts are given from "Noyes' Letters," "Life of Benjamin Silliman," Bulkeley Genealogy, Barber's "Collections," Nash Genealogy, Burr Genealogy, and the Republican Standard for the past thirty years.

CHAPTER XXXI.

SPECIAL HOUSES.

1. The Home of the Late Hon. John Gould.—This family was connected with the earliest settlement of the State. By these first settlers for three generations the name was spelled Gohl, but for some reason portions of the family have changed to Gould; yet most of those holding that name have no connection with the Gohls.

"Maj. Nathan Gold married Martha, widow of Edward Harvey. They had one son, and daughters Sarah, who married John Thompson; Deborah, who married George Clark; Abigail, who married Jonathan Sellick.

"Maj. Nathan Gold removed from St. Edmondsbury, in South Britain, to Fairfield, Conn., in the reign of Charles II., and was one of the first settlers of the town. He was a wealthy and educated gentleman, and is often mentioned in Smith's 'History of New York.'

"In the first volume of the town records of Fairfield we find him a landholder in 1649, and in 1653 a purchaser of fifteen separate pieces of land, some of which remains in possession of his descendants to this day. He was one of the petitioners (nineteen in number) named in the charter of Connecticut, dated April 12, in the fourteenth year of the reign of Charles II., which petition was signed by no gentleman unless he had sustained a high reputation in England before he came to New England. He was an assistant or member of the council from 1657 to 1694, and 'departed this life into the mantions of Rest upon the day of Rest, on Saboth, it being the 4th day of March, 1693-94.' Inventory of his estate, £400 3s. 6d.†

There is a gun in the possession of T. S. Gold, of Cornwall, which is said to have been brought by this Nathan Gold from England.

There are "two sermons occasioned by the death of Maj. Nathan Gold, one of the pious and worthy magistrates of Connecticut Colony, who deceased at his own house in Fairfield, the fourth of March, 1693." These sermons are in the handwriting of Rev. Joseph Webb, minister of the Congregational Church in Fairfield in 1700, and one of the founders of Yale College. The manuscript was presented to Mrs. Elizabeth Gould, by the Rev. William A. Johnson, of Salisbury, Conn., Aug. 5, 1879. His body, in all probability, is interred in Fairfield's illustrious burying-ground, but at that date it was impracticable to furnish tombstones.

Along the salt meadows of Connecticut stone is scarce, and probably there was neither time to be spent in search of suitable stone, nor engravers to cut the inscription, nor means of conveyance. His son, Nathan Gold, Jr., married Hannah, born in Hartford, Dec. 8, 1663, daughter of Lieut.-Col. John Talcott and Helena Wakeman. He died Oct. 3, 1723. A low plain stone contains this simple inscription:

"Here lies the Body of the Honorable Nathan Gold, Esq, Lievt. Governor in His Majesties Colony of Connecticut, Dec^r 8th
the 31 7 2 3
Ætatis Suae 60."

In the list of town clerks prepared by Daniel Maloney is this statement:

"Nathan Gold, chosen 1684, served to 1706,—twenty-two years. He was town clerk and deputy governor, with Peter Burr for assistant; served from 1706 to 1724, a period of eighteen years."

He was also chief justice of the Supreme Court in 1712.

On the church (Congregational) record is found:

"The first volume extant; the earlier records, both of the church and town, are lost, carried to Virginia by Mr. Ludlow in 1654.* This statement was generally believed, but, the earliest town record being found in Fairfield, it is believed the early church records were burnt."

This volume was rebound in May, 1868. On the old cover was the following inscription:

"This Booke of Records belongs to the church of Christ in Fairfield, of which I am Pastor.—JOSIAH WHELAN. Bought in the year 1704; cost 6s. in money, paid for by the church."

In this record is the following: "Mrs. Sarah Gold, wife of the worshipfull Capt. Gold, admitted Feb'y 10th 1707," which for people of to-day is interpreted 1705, Old Style. She was second wife of Nathan Gold, Jr. She died Oct. 17, 1711.

Another item from same record:

"Jenny, negro girl belonging to the Honorable Nathan Gold, Esq., D. C. bapt. June 20th, 1717."

The slaves were baptized and admitted into the church, married, and were recorded right along with the rest. Their names and their families also are on the town record.

The children of Nathan Gold, Jr., were: Abigail, born 1687, married Rev. Thomas Hawley of Ridgefield; John; Nathan; Samuel; Joseph; Rev. Hezekiah, born 1694, married Mary, daughter of Rev. Mr. Ruggles, of Guilford, (they had thirteen children); Onesimus, had a daughter Rebecca, who married Ephraim Nichols (see "Colonial," 18), of Revolutionary note; David; and Martha.

As Samuel inherited the premises under description (No. 1, "Specials"), his family is here given: He married Esther Bradley. Their children were David, born in 1717; Esther, 1719; Abigail, 1724; Abell, 1727-1769; Col. Abraham, 1732-1777, who inherited the Gould homestead. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Capt. John Burr (she died 1815, aged eighty-four), and had children: Abigail, born 1754, married Isaac Jennings (whose home is now Capt. Isaac Jennings') in 1770; Hezekiah, born 1756, who in 1789 was walking on a plank from the wharf to the vessel in New York; the end of the plank dropping off from the vessel, he struck his breast and was drowned. Anna, who married — Silliman; Abraham, born in 1766; Jason, 1771; John B., died at sea in 1781; Daniel, died at sea off the coast of France in 1796; Elizabeth, married — Curtiss, of Newtown; Sarah; Deborah, married — Osborne, died 1785.

Col. Abraham Gold was killed on his horse by the British at Ridgefield in 1777, and his body was brought on horseback to Fairfield for burial.

The home-stead was inherited by Jason, who changed his name to Gould. His interest in the family is shown by the stone set up to his father and family:

"A. G.
This stone is erected by Jason Gould
in memory of his honored Father,
Col. Abraham Gould,
Who fell in defense of his Country at Ridgefield, April 27th, 1777,
aged 41 years;
and of his deceased brother,
John Burr Gould, who died at sea, 1781, aged 20;
and of Hezekiah Gould,
who was drowned at New York,
Oct. 20th, 1789, aged 30;
and of
Daniel Gould, who was drowned off the coast of France, Dec. 28, 1796, aged 29."

The sword used by Col. Abraham Gold is in the possession of his great-grandson, Abraham Gold Jennings, who resides in Brooklyn, N. Y., and his sash and coat were deposited in the Trumbull Gallery at New Haven. The sword is straight, silver-mounted, three-cornered, and at his death was found stained with the enemy's blood.

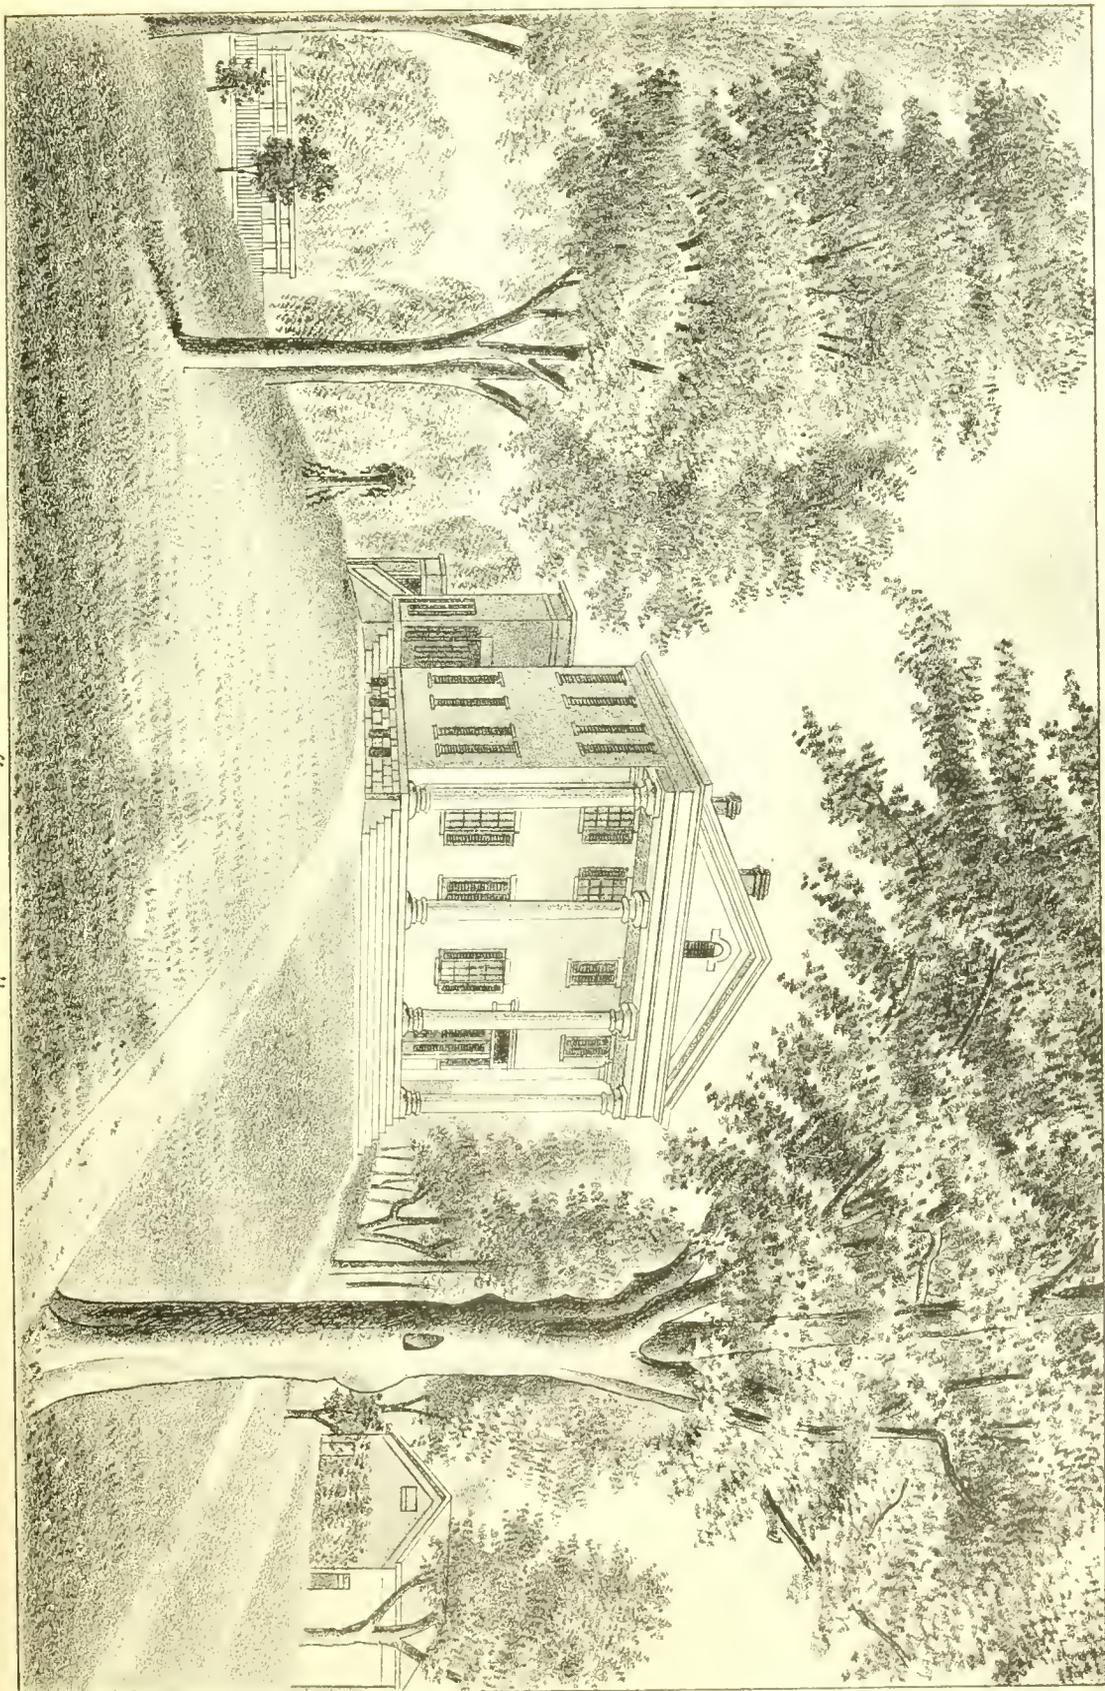

Jason had a son John, born in 1801, who possessed the ancestral acres, and died in 1871.

Hon. John Gould held many positions of public trust; was member of the House of Representatives from Fairfield for several sessions, and member of the State Senate from the Tenth District in 1847; railroad commissioner from 1854 to 1861; in 1864 appointed United States marshal for Connecticut by President Lincoln, and held the office for four years. His widow, Mary Wakeman Thorp, daughter of Capt. Walter Thorp, died in 1879. His daughters own and occupy the homestead.

At his death being announced the world did him honor in various ways. One obituary reads:

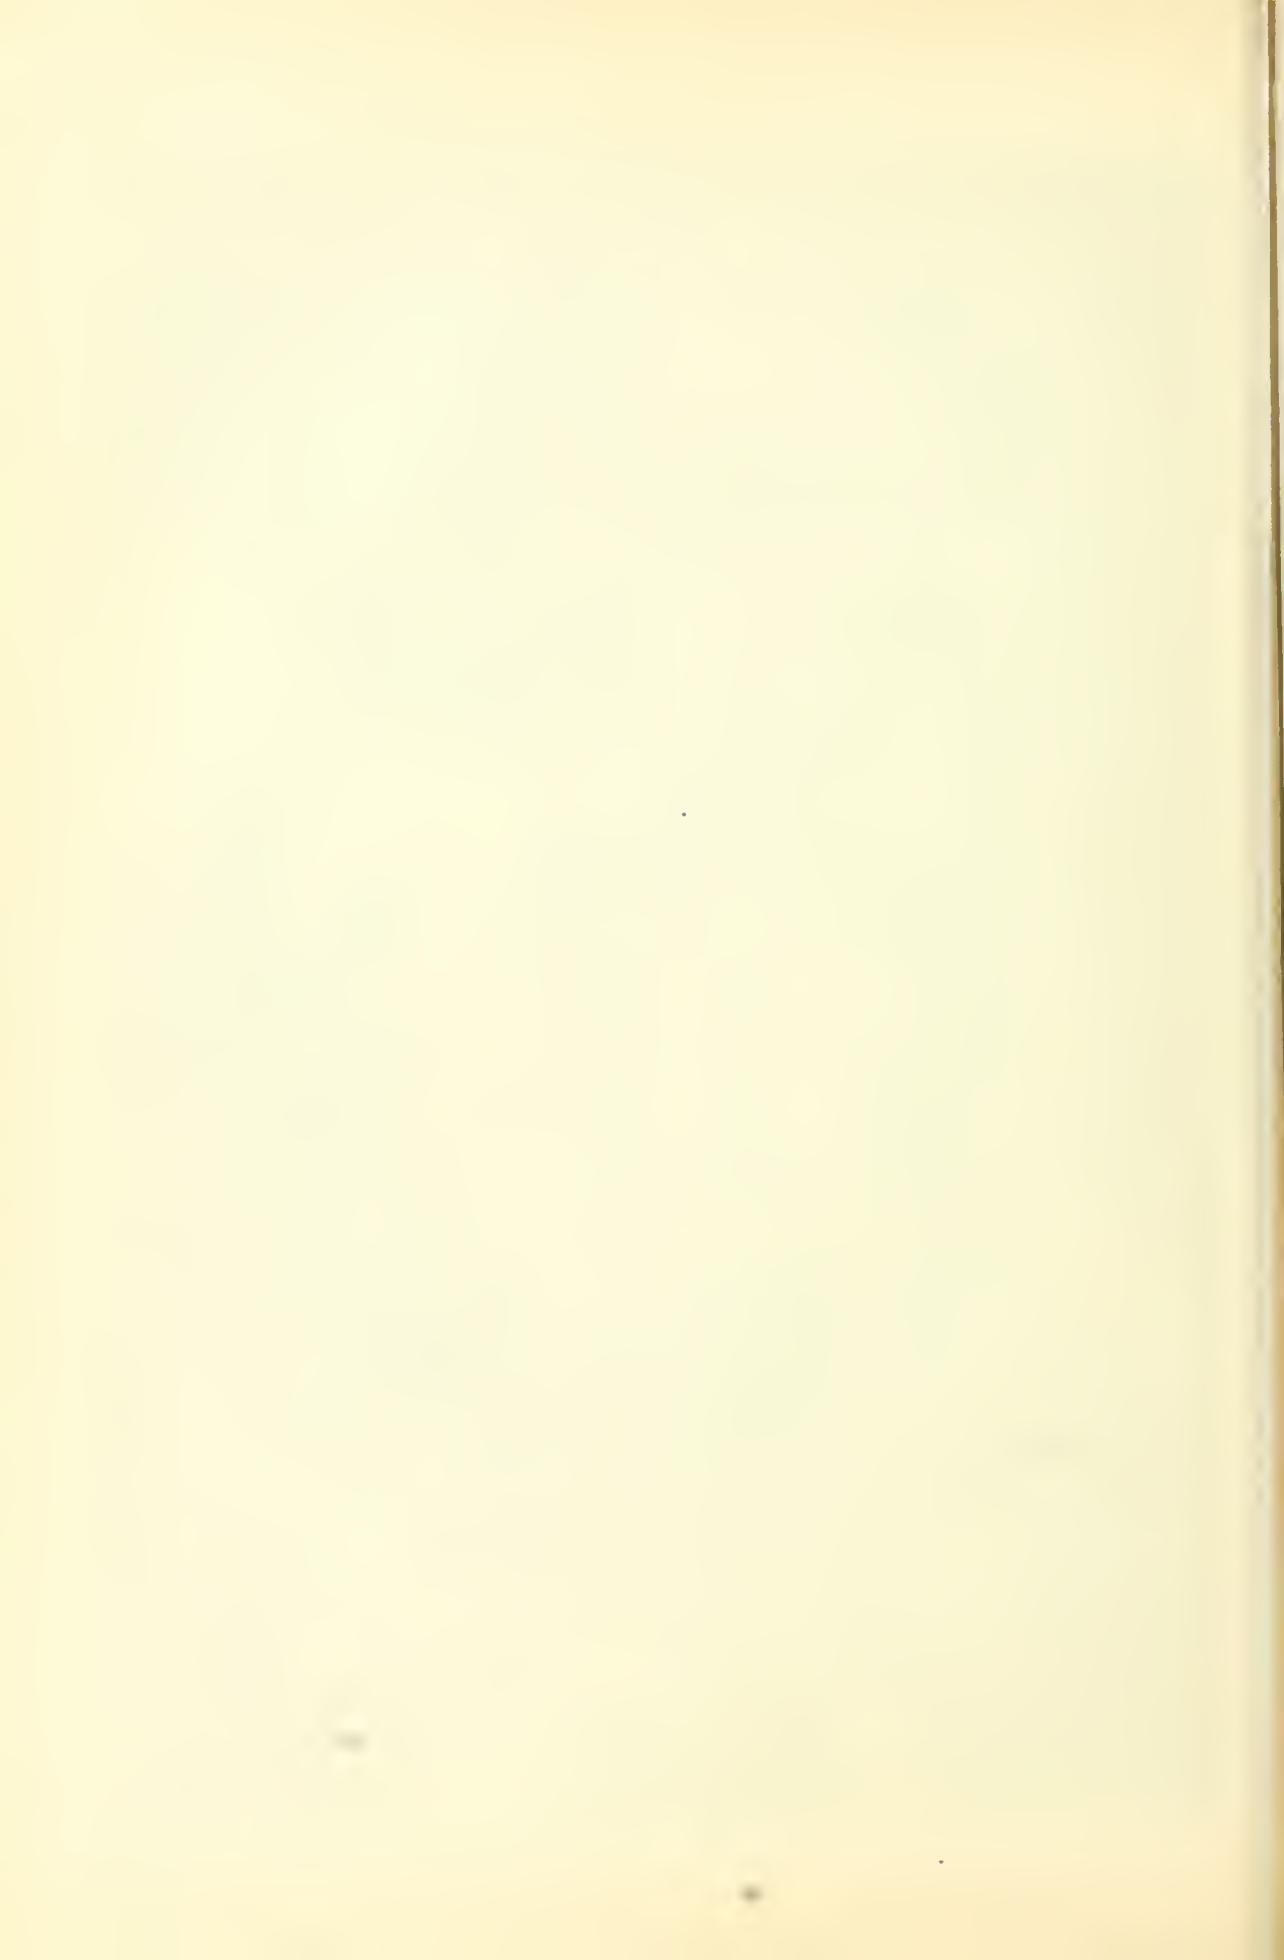

"The Hon. John Gould died of apoplexy at his residence in Fairfield, Sept. 5, 1871, aged seventy years. Capt. Gould has been for many years one of our most prominent and useful citizens. He has been intrusted by his fellow-townsmen with many important offices of trust, which he

"WILLOW LAWN"

RESIDENCE OF THE LATE HON. JOHN GOULD, FAIRFIELD, CONN.

of Roxbury, N. Y. His oldest son, John Burr, was also a prominent man, and quite a hero in the Anti-Rent war of 1846. The Fairfield colony settled on leased land; rent, twelve and a half cents per acre.

Abraham Gold had six sons and four daughters. Jay Gould, the New York banker, is one of his grandsons. Another was Daniel Gold, who studied law in Delhi, was clerk in the New York Legislature, and afterwards appointed chief clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C.

The Rev. Hezekiah Gold, of Stratford, graduated at Harvard and labored in his native town more than thirty years.

Rev. Hezekiah Gold, of Cornwall, married Abigail Sherwood, of Fairfield, for his second wife. He was a farmer as well as minister, and it is reported "that he could lay more green rail-fence in a day than any of his parishioners." His eldest son, Thomas, graduated at Yale, and was a lawyer at Pittsfield, Mass.; he acquired wealth and held an honorable position. His residence was the finest in the village. Here stood the old clock on the stairs, the subject of a poem written by H. W. Longfellow, a grandson-in-law of Mr. Gold.

Hon. Thomas R. Gold graduated from Yale in 1786; he stood at the head of the bar in Central New York. For about twenty years he represented New York in the Congress of the United States. He contributed largely to the North American Review.

Dr. Samuel W. Gold graduated at Williams College in 1814, and studied at Yale, where he in 1834 received the honorary degree of M.D. He practiced medicine from thirty to thirty-five years, and then returned to Cornwall and with his son, T. S. Gold, established Cream Hill Agricultural School, which was a success twenty-four years. He was State senator in 1847 and 1859, and Presidential elector in 1857.

T. S. Gold graduated at Yale in 1838, established the agricultural school with his father in 1845, and taught twenty-four years. He was chosen secretary of the State Board of Agriculture at its organization, in 1866.

Considering the whole family, Maj. Nathan Gold and his descendants, it is seen that from Fairfield have emanated a distinguished and honorable family, who have been devoted largely to public service, and have preserved an unsullied reputation.

Ellen Burr Gould married a Continental officer; she was twenty-eight, he seventy-three. He dying, she married another much older than herself, and, he dying, married another; so she had three Continental officers for husbands. She failed to secure a pension on account of remarrying, but Congress, through the intercession of Hon. Thomas Osborne (see "Colonial," 8), made a special act in her case, so that she secured her pension at last.

2. The Burr Mansion.—Tradition says that it was built about 1700 by Chief Justice Peter Burr, one of the earliest graduates from Harvard. He was chief justice of Connecticut, and once lacked but a few votes of becoming its Governor.

The house stood somewhat back from the main street, on a slight eminence, beneath a canopy of elms, and, with its dormer windows, its projecting gables and ivy-covered wings, presented quite the appearance of a baronial structure, the effect of which was increased by its wide hall with its heavy oaken staircase, or by its ancient chambers with their tiled fireplaces and heavy oak panelings.

At the time of the Revolution, Thaddens Burr, a grandson of Peter Burr, a gentleman of culture and ample estate, owned it. He, like many of the colonial gentry, exercised a princely hospitality. The ancient chroniclers recorded with pride that General Washington, in his journeys to and from Boston, was his frequent guest. Franklin, Lafayette, Otis, Quincy, Watson, Governor Tryon, Dr. Dwight, and the poet Barlow are on the house's dead-roll of famous guests. There Trumbull and Copley dreamed and painted, the latter doing full-length portraits of his host and hostess, which are preserved in the family. Governor Hancock was married there; Madam Hancock died there;* Aaron Burr passed many of his youthful days beneath its roof as the guest of his cousin, Thaddens Burr, and is there buried with the illustrious dead.

Burr's family was of the "bluest" blood of New England, and had been seated in Fairfield for generations. His father, the Rev. Aaron Burr, the famous Princeton scholar and divine, was a native of Fairfield. Judge Peter Burr, before mentioned, was his great-uncle; Col. Andrew Burr, who led the Connecticut regiment in the brilliant attack on Louisburg in 1745, was a cousin, and his family for generations had filled the various offices of state, from deacon in the Puritan churches to magistrates and judges of the courts. Nor can one of those who believe in the ancient traditions of the village be made to admit that Burr was any other than a bitterly-persecuted man, who suffered the fate of those who came into the world a hundred years before their time. Here is recorded the dramatic incident of which the old mansion was the theatre:

"One sunny morning in April, 1775, as Thaddens Burr, Gold, Sellick Silliman, and Jonathan Sturgis, members of the town committee of war, were engaged in earnest conversation on the porch, a horseman, breathless with haste, dashed through the town, and threw himself from his steed almost at the feet of the three committee men, with an expiring effort to thrust towards them a packet covered with broad seals, and fell back exhausted upon the steps of the porch. Silliman broke the packet, and after a glance at its contents turned with flashing eye to the eager citizens who had gathered. 'Friends,' said he, 'news from your king: hear it!' and read:

* Her stone contains: "This stone was erected by Thaddens Burr and Eunice Burr to the memory of their dear friend, Mrs. Lydia Hancock, relict of the Honourable Thomas Hancock, Esq., and daughter of Daniel Hinman, Esq., of Boston, whose remains lie here interred, having retired to this town from the calamities of War during the Blockade of her native city in 1775, just on her return to the re-employment of an ample fortune. On April 15th, 1776, she was seized with the apoplexy, and closed a life of unaffected piety, universal benevolence, and extensive charity, aged 63."

“WATERTOWN, WEDNESDAY MORNING, “Near 10 of the Clock.

“TO ALL FRIENDS OF AMERICAN LIBERTY. Be it known that this morning before break of day a brigade, consisting of about one thousand or two thousand men landed at Phipps' Farm, at Cambridge, and marched to Lexington, where they found a company of our colony militia in arms, upon whom they fired without provocation, and killed six men and wounded four others. By an express from Boston we find another brigade are now upon the march from Boston, supposed to be about one thousand. The bearer, Trail Bissell, is charged to alarm the country quite to Connecticut, and all persons are desired to furnish him with fresh horses as they may be needed. I have spoken with several who have seen the dead and wounded.

“J. PALMER,

To this mansion of historic fame, in May, 1775, came Miss Dorothy Quincy, daughter of Edmund Quincy, of Boston, who had moved for three years as the belle of the polite circles of that town, and who was now the affianced bride of Governor John Hancock. A few weeks before, she had witnessed the battle of Lexington from her chamber-window, spiritedly refusing to obey Governor Hancock's command to return to Boston. But, now that her native city had assumed the aspect of a beleaguered town, she had consented to pass the summer in Fairfield, beneath the roof of her father's old friend, Thaddeus Burr, where she spent the stirring days of that eventful summer in the ancient village, whiling away the time as best she might. She rode, she sang, she boated; she feasted with the young people at the beach; she flirted with the village youths; she wrote letters, some of which yet exist, to her friends; and every fortnight the lumbering mail-coach brought her a packet from Philadelphia addressed in the bold handwriting of John Hancock.

In the autumn the marriage of Governor John Hancock, president of the Continental Congress, and Miss Dorothy, daughter of Edmund Quincy, of Boston, occurred. Here were Governor Hancock, who accomplished such an act as led King George to set a price on his head; he rode up to the mansion-house, attended by a retinue of gentlemen, delegates, and others, returning to their homes, followed by a more glittering train, with prancing steeds and costly equipage, with coachmen and footmen in livery, and attended by gay cavaliers on horseback, the friends of the bride. There were Edmund Quincy and his friends of Boston, grave sober men and matrons of high degree, and gallant young cavaliers, attending the stately maidens, the companions of Miss Dorothy. Hartford and New Haven, which were then the seats of refined and cultured society, contributed to the train of worth and beauty; the Governor and his staff also honored the scene. There was a courtly throng, which might have graced a royal palace, and the costumes would have been presentable at the court of King George himself. The toilets were elaborate; the coiffures sprinkled with diamond-dust, the long-waisted gowns, the shimmer of silks and satins, the ribbons, laces, and ruffles, the gems that sparkled on wrists and bosoms, the glossy queues, the plum-colored coats and velvet small-clothes, the white silk stockings, the elaborate ruffles at wrist and throats, added lustre to the occasion. Here the Rev. Andrew Eliot, revered by every one of Fairfield's sons, performed the ceremony. This was the last merry-making ever held within its walls. During the four years of war which followed it was the scene of many secret councils of the patriot leaders, and in the British descent on Fairfield in 1779 was burned by order of Governor Tryon.[§]

Edmund Quincy was eminent in public life, and became judge of the Supreme Court in 1718. Sullivan pronounced John Hancock “one of the greatest men of his age.” The honor which encircled his name received added lustre from his wife. She was a leader of taste and fashion in the best circles of society. Governor Hancock came to Fairfield for safety, and was in concealment with Samuel Adams. It was not deemed safe for Mr. Hancock to return, that the marriage might take place in Boston. While in concealment their meals were privately conveyed to them, and they were kept in strict seclusion.

After a time they were permitted to sit at the dinner-table with the family, in expectation of a comfortable repast. Before they had partaken of the tempting food a farmer came in, greatly excited, requesting the host to lend him his horse and chaise to go for his wife, as “the British were coming.” This news dispersed the feasters. Adams and Hancock were hurried away to their hiding-place, and Mrs. Hancock was wont to say it was always a matter of wonder to her what became of that dinner, for none who sat down to it ever tasted it. The alarm, however, was a false report, but there was a time when the enemy's balls reached the house that sheltered them.

When her first child was two weeks old Mrs. Hancock was conveyed on a bed with it to her carriage, to travel from Boston in the winter to Philadelphia, in company with her husband, then chosen president of the first Congress. She often spoke of his reluctance, from natural modesty, to accept the office. While he hesitated one of the members clasped him around the waist, lifted him from his feet, and placed him in the chair of state.[†]

At the burning of Fairfield, “Mrs. Burr, the wife of Thaddeus Burr, Esq., high sheriff of the county, resolved to continue in the mansion-house of the family and make an attempt to save it from the conflagration. The house stood at a sufficient distance from other buildings. Mrs. Burr was adorned with all the qualities which give distinction to her sex, possessed of fine accomplishments and a dignity of character scarcely rivaled, and probably had never known what it was to be treated with disrespect, or even with inattention. She made a personal application to Governor Tryon in terms which, from a lady of her high respectability, could hardly have failed of a satisfactory answer from any person who claimed the title of a gentleman. The answer which she actually received was, however, rude and brutal, and spoke the want not only of politeness and humanity, but even of vulgar civility. The house was sentenced to the flames, and was speedily set on fire. An attempt was made, in the mean time, by some of the soldiers, to rob her of a valuable watch, with rich furniture; for Governor Tryon refused to protect her as well as to preserve the house. The watch had been already conveyed out of their reach, but the house, filled with everything which contributes either to comfort or to elegance of living, was laid in ashes.

"While the town was in flames a thunder-storm overspread the heavens just as the night came on. The conflagration of near two hundred houses illuminated the earth, the skirts of the clouds, and the waves of the Sound with a union of gloom and grandeur at once inexpressibly awful and magnificent. The sky speedily was hung with the deepest darkness wherever the clouds were not tinged by the melancholy lustre of the flames. At intervals the lightning blazed with a livid and terrible splendor. The thunder rolled above. Beneath, the roaring of the fires filled up the intervals with a deep and hollow sound which seemed to be the protracted murmur of the thunder, reverberated from one end of heaven to the other. Add to this convulsion of the elements, and these dreadful effects of vindictive and wanton devastation, the trembling of the earth, the sharp sound of muskets occasionally discharged, the groans, here and there, of the wounded and dying, and the shouts of triumph; then place before your eyes crowds of the miserable sufferers, mingled with bodies of the militia, and from the neighboring hills taking a farewell prospect of their property and their dwellings, their happiness and their hopes, and you will form a just but imperfect picture of the burning of Fairfield. It needed no great effort of imagination to believe that the final day had arrived, and that, amid this funereal darkness, the morning would speedily dawn to which no night would ever succeed, the graves yield up their inhabitants, and the trial commence at which was to be finally settled the destiny of man."*

"There was also in Fairfield pleasant society. Thaddeus Burr, Esq., was a principal inhabitant and a man of wealth, especially before his large mansion was burned and his property devastated by the British, in July, 1779. He then converted a store or warehouse into a dwelling, and it was a neat and commodious mansion. Mr. Burr was hospitable, and his wife was an accomplished lady. The place is memorable, having been a favorite resort of Dr. Dwight, afterwards president of Yale College. He was then minister of Greenfield, and gave celebrity to that hill both by the splendor of his talents and pulpit eloquence and by the academy for the instruction of the youth of both sexes, which he established and conducted for a series of years with great success.

"Dr. Dwight generally rode down two or three miles on horseback on Saturday afternoon to pass those hours of relaxation and take tea with his friends, Mr. and Mrs. Burr. His conversation was equally entertaining and instructive,—a feast for both mind and heart."†

Jehuc Burr was born in England about 1600, and died in Fairfield about 1670. He left four sons,—Jehu, John, Nathaniel, and Daniel.

Jehu married (1) Mary Ward, of Fairfield; (2) Esther, widow of Joseph Boosy, of Westchester, Conn. They had several children, of whom was Judge Peter Burr, who graduated from Harvard in 1690, having entered in 1686. He taught school in Boston for some years, then studied law, after which he settled in Fairfield to practice. In 1700 he commenced his public career, which he continued till his death. He was several times auditor of the colony. He was also deputy for Fairfield, Speaker of the House, and justice of the peace in 1701; judge of Probate Court, 1723-24; judge of County Court, 1708-24, except 1713; judge of the Superior Court, 1711-16; chief judge of the Supreme Court, 1712, 1723-24. This last year (1724) he performed the duties of auditor, assistant judge of Probate, judge of County Court, and chief judge of the Superior Court. He was major of the Fourth Regiment. In 1702 he was on a committee with Capt. Nathan Gold and others to "endeavor to arrange an amicable agreement with the government of Rhode Island respecting the settlement of the line between Connecticut and Rhode Island." He, with Capts. Gold, Curtis, Wakeman, Judson, Olmsted, and Stiles, was clothed with full powers "to consult, advise, direct, and command in all things necessary for the defense of Her Majesty's subjects, and carrying on the war against the common enemy." (See Burr Genealogy.)

From the records, Peter Burr and Nathan Gold were two very prominent officers. It would require many pages to tell of the various public enterprises they had charge of or took important part in.

In private life Judge Peter Burr was universally beloved and respected. As a public man he exerted an influence for good in the colony not exceeded, and rarely equaled, by that of any of the fathers of the Commonwealth, and in ability, attainments, and public services he was eclipsed by none. He lies in Fairfield old burying-ground. This is the last tribute to his memory:

"Here lies interred
ye Body of ye Honoble
Peter Burr, Esq,
Aged 56 years and 9 months,
who Departed this Life

Anno 1724."

He left four children, among whom was Thaddeus, who married Abigail, daughter of Jonathan Sturges, of Fairfield. They left five children; among them was Abigail, born in 1729. Her tombstone, in Fairfield old ground, contains:

"Here lies buried the Body of
Mrs. Abigail Hall,
Wife of Lyman Hall, M. A.,
Daughter of Thaddeus Burr, Esq, died July 8, 1733, aged 24 years.
Modest, yet free, with innocence adorned,
To please and win by art and nature formed,
Benevolent and wise, in virtue firm,
Constant in Friendship, in Religion warm,
A partner tender, unallected, kind,
A lovely form with a more lovely mind,—
The scene of life, tho' short, she improved so well
No charms in human forms could more excel.
Christ's life her copy, His pure life her guide,
Each part she acted, perfected, and dy'd."

Lyman Hall was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, born in Connecticut in 1725, died in Georgia in 1790. He graduated at Yale in 1747, studied medicine, and removed, in 1752, to South Carolina, and the same year to Sunbury, Ga., where he engaged in the practice of his profession. At the opening of the Revolution he was influential in inducing Georgia to join the Confederacy. In 1775 he was chosen a member of Congress, and was re-elected annually till 1780. Georgia had in the mean time fallen under the power of the British, who confiscated all his property. He was elected Governor of Georgia in 1783, and served for one term; after which he retired from public life.*

Another of their children was Thaddeus, Jr. At the age of twenty he graduated from Yale with the degree of A.M., which also was conferred by the College of New Jersey. He married Eunice Demie, and then spent ten years in scholarly and social pursuits and in the management of his large estates. His first part in public life was as deputy for Fairfield. He was also justice of the peace, and in 1779 was high sheriff of the county. In 1775 he was a member of the town committee of war. In 1788 he was a delegate, with Jonathan Sturges, from Fairfield to the State Convention at Hartford, called to ratify the new Constitution of the United States and steadily voted to adopt that instrument.

An original portrait of Thaddeus Burr, and also of his wife, by Copley, is owned by Mr. J. S. Burr, of Brooklyn. He (Thaddeus Burr) died in Fairfield in 1801, aged sixty-five, and lies among the "colonials;" his wife died in 1805, aged seventy-five. The stones are richly carved, but contain only the simple inscription found over a person in far more common walks in life.

Another of Thaddeus and Abigail Sturges Burr's children was Gershom, born in 1744, who married Priscilla Lothrop, of Plymouth, Mass. Their son, Gershom, Jr., married (1) Susannah Young, of Stratford; (2) Elizabeth, daughter of Rev. Andrew Elliot, pastor of the Prime Ancient Church in Fairfield. They had nine children.

This Gershom Burr died in New York in 1828; he was a man of prominence in the State and was brigadier-general of the militia from 1816 to 1824, when he resigned. Among his children are Jonathan Sturges Burr, born in Fairfield, but who went to New York City in 1825, when there was unwonted activity in commerce owing to the opening of the Erie Canal. Mr. Burr found employment as book-keeper with Hinton & Moore, ship-chandlers and dealers in paints and oils, which position he occupied for years, then began business on his own account. Subsequently he was a partner with two or three persons, and then his brothers Arthur, Frederick, and himself formed the firm Burr, Waterman & Co., in the manufacturing of patent blocks, which business became lucrative. Mr. J. S. Burr was head and senior member from 1844 to 1877, when he withdrew. In 1842 he removed to Williamsburgh, where he has been identified with the social, political, financial, and educational interests of the community, of which he has been a modest but conspicuous and influential member. He was elected to the Board of Finance, in which he served with ability and fidelity.

When the consolidation of Williamsburgh and Brooklyn occurred (in 1855) Mr. Burr was appointed a member of the Board of Education, of which he was one of the most useful men for twenty-three years. He is deeply interested in schools, and has devoted much time and energy to public service in this line.

When the Williamsburgh Savings-Bank was established, Mr. Burr was one of the original trustees. It now has a capital of nearly fourteen million dollars, and enjoys the confidence of its depositors. He is now, and has been for years past, one of the vice-presidents. When the Republican party was formed he was active in the councils of the local organizations, and aided very much in the prosecution of their particular objects. He has also been treasurer in the Reformed Church for more than thirty years.

The following letter is from Mr. J. S. Burr, and explains itself:

"178 SOUTH 9TH ST., BROOKLYN, E. D.
"SEPT. 1, 1880.

"MRS. BERE PERRY:

"DEAR MADAM,—It gives me pleasure to comply with your request, and accordingly proceed to furnish you with such recollections of affairs relating to the court and justicians of Fairfield as may come within the scope of your plan. I am proud to claim a birthright in whatever concerns the good name and fame of the dear old town, county, and State with which all my earliest associations in life were formed, and the memory of which has added happiness to my riper years.

"It is known that the town of Fairfield was for a long while the capital, so to speak, of the county. In it was the court-house, where the judges of various grades dispensed the justice which is the bulwark of society.

"Judges Tappan Reeve, chief, with Mitchell and Edmonds, associates, formed, I believe, the high court in my earlier boyhood. On the days the court was to be in regular session it was the custom for the judges to meet in some place assigned, and the jurors in another, on opposite sides of the green, in the centre of which stood the court-house. On the hour for opening court the bell was well rung. Then presently the high sheriff, Mr. Ebenezer Dimon,* with his staff of office, issued forth followed by the judges. Directly after came the jurymen, led by the town constable, Mr. Nathan Beers. As the procession entered the courtroom the sheriff with clear and distinct voice announced the approach of the judicial dignitaries. Silence then fell on all; not a whisper was heard until the judges and jury had been duly seated. Judge Reeve then, leaning forward over the desk, with slow and measured speech, would say, 'Mr. Clerk, open this court.' That official—Col. David Burr, a portly bald-headed man of fine presence and commanding dignity—then addressed the sheriff. 'Mr. Sheriff, make proclamation;' whereupon the sheriff discharged the duty in form and manner following. 'Oh yes! Oh yes! this Superior Court is now open. All persons having any cause or action pending will take due notice thereof.' Then came the order from the bench: 'Mr. Clerk, call the jury.' That having been done, the parties to the immediate case in hand were summoned to answer, or the calendar was followed.

"The demeanor of all concerned in the administration of the law while the courts were in session was usually grave, and even reverential. Our ancestors were not without cheerfulness, but when they met to determine justice, punish the criminal, and protect the innocent, they were earnest and serious, as befitted the business committed to them.

"Very truly yours,
"J. S. BURR."

The court must have been highly imposing, with the array of powdered hair, ruffles, long stockings, etc.

Of the Burrs mentioned so far, they have owned, or were born in, or lived on, the premises in consideration (No. 2, "Special").

A few weeks after the burning, Governor Hancock paid his friend a visit, and while they were surveying the ruins he remarked to Mr. Burr that he must rebuild, and offered to furnish the glass needed, provided he would build a house precisely like his own in Boston. Mr. Burr accepted the offer, and built a house the exact counterpart of Mr. Hancock's.†

It was stated not long since to the historian that the frame was sent to Mr. Burr from Boston by Mr. Hancock as a present, and was unloaded on the green in Fairfield. It was an exact reproduction, described a few pages back, but when Mr. O. W. Jones purchased it, about fifty years ago, he remodeled it, to the regret of all, as he destroyed the dormer-windows and gambrel roof and modernized it, so that the historic east is gone.

There would be no pardon if others of the Burr family were omitted. Parton used the name of one Burr (Aaron) for the subject of two volumes, and, as his father is a native of Fairfield, what shall we say for several others who have been valuable in State or public service?

Jehue, the first settler, was one who signed the deeds with the Indians in the colony, and seems from the first to have taken a high rank in Fairfield. He represented Fairfield at the General Court, and was also commissioner on educational matters and grand juror.

Jehue Burr, Jr., was born in England in 1625, died in Fairfield in 1692. In 1670 he was deputy from Fairfield, having John (his brother) for associate; he was also lieutenant of the Fairfield train-band, also a member of the "standing council," which is similar to the committee of war of later years. He was also commissioner for Fairfield, a patron of learning, and one of the originators of the old school system of Connecticut.

Jehue, Jr., had a brother, Col. John Burr, a man of great executive ability and prominent in the affairs of the colony. He was made freeman in 1661. Two years later he was chosen deputy, afterwards a commissioner. In 1690 he was senator and magistrate of the colony. At this period the witchcraft delusion swept over the State. Col. Burr was captain in the train-band and commissary for Fairfield County in the French-and-Indian War. He was concerned in the origin of the town of Danbury.

Nathaniel Burr had a son, also known as Col. John Burr. The limits of his farm and the site of his house, and the old Council Oak under which he bought his land of the Indians, are yet pointed out. In 1874 a great-granddaughter was living, who retained many recollections of him. He was born in 1673, and was commissary of the county in 1704. He had to see that "biskett" was provided for the soldiers, keep the war accounts, and keep a stock of supplies on hand. He was next deputy from Fairfield. In 1723 he was Speaker of the House. He was auditor, justice of the peace and Quorum, and judge of the County Court, also of Probate Court in place of Joseph Wakeman, deceased, which office he held seventeen consecutive years. He was several times commissioned in the military service of the colony. In 1710 he was major of the forces in the expedition to Nova Scotia. In 1733 he was appointed one of the judges in a court of Chancery. Col. Burr was one of the largest landholders in the State. He was one of the principal founders of the old North Church of Stratfield (now the First Congregational of Bridgeport). He died in 1750, leaving an estate of fifteen thousand two hundred and eighty-eight pounds.

Col. Andrew Burr, son of John and grandson of Maj. John Burr, was a lawyer by profession, an assistant and magistrate of the colony, several times Speaker of the House, and wielded great influence in the councils of the colony, yet his chief distinction was created by his numerous and varied military services. In 1731 he was lieutenant, then promoted to be captain, then major. In 1745 he took part in the most brilliant of the colonial wars,—the Cape Breton expedition. He was commissioned colonel in 1750. He was deputy for Fairfield, assistant of the Upper House, justice of the peace, judge of the County Court, clerk in the Lower House, Speaker also, and sheriff. He also assisted in revising the laws in 1749. His public services were so varied and numerous that the reader is referred to the Burr Genealogy, by Charles Burr Todd.

Col. Andrew Burr's life was a pleasant one. He married (1), in 1719, Sarah, daughter of Jonathan Sturges; they had thirteen children. He married (2), Sarah Stanly, of Hartford; they had one daughter. He lies in the old burying-ground. A large moss-covered stone, richly carved, marks his resting-place:

"Here lyes Buried
the Body of
Col^o Andrew Burr,
Who departed this life
Novr ye 9th, A. D. 1783, in ye
68th year of His Age."

His first wife, the mother of thirteen children, is buried near him. The stone contains:

"Here lyes Buried ye Body of M^{rs} Sarah
Burr, Wife to Col^o
Andrew Burr, who Departed this Life
Decem^r 9, Anno Domⁱ, 1745,
Aged 45 years wanting 13 D^{ys}."

Rev. Aaron Burr, son of Daniel (2d), grandson of Daniel (1st), and great-grandson of Jehue Burr, was born in 1716 in the northern part of Fairfield. In 1738 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J., and in 1748 the second president of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton), of which he was one of the principal founders. He married Esther, daughter of Jonathan Edwards, who was the third president in the same college. Their children were Sarah, who married Judge Tappan Reeve, and Aaron, Jr. His duties were very arduous; his relations as pastor to this one church continued twenty years.

In 1757 he made a trip to Stockbridge, and returned home exhausted. College and public duties were so importunate that he did not pay sufficient attention to malaria, which was threatening to prostrate him, but persisted in attending to his duties. He never recovered from this attack, the malaria running into a fever, so that he expired in 1757. Few men have been more sincerely mourned than this one of Fairfield's sons. The magnates of the land were at his funeral. Governor Livingston, of New Jersey, pronounced a glowing eulogium, and the press and the pulpit vied in honoring his virtues, talents, and beneficence.

In 1752 he published a Latin grammar, used in the college long after his death. He also published several sermons and a work,—"The Supreme Deity of our Lord Jesus Christ maintained." He was more noted as a teacher than as a writer.

His son, Aaron Burr, was one of the most notorious men of the United States, in war, politics, and law.

In the Presidential election he and Thomas Jefferson had a tie. After seven days' arguing, voting, and investigating, it was decided that Jefferson should have the Presidency and Burr should be Vice-President. There is so much to say of him it is difficult to sum him up in a line or so. His duel with Hamilton, the new government schemes in the Southwest, and his family are familiar to most people. He was truly "the Napoleon of America."

Seth Burr, son of Daniel and Ann Silliman, was born in 1761, served through the war of 1776, and was present at the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown. A few years after, being in India, he was pressed into the British service, and served under this same Lord Cornwallis.

The Burrs have always been of public service, furnishing judges, clerks, captains, colonels, legislators, and teachers. Three town clerks are of this family. —Peter (built the Smith house, opposite B. Betts), who served with Nathan Gold from 1706 to 1724; Thaddeus, from 1726 to 1755; David, from 1755 to 1759.

Samuel, son of Maj. John and grandson of Jehue Burr, graduated at Harvard College in 1697, and was one of the most famous teachers of his time. For twelve years he was master of the grammar-school in Charlestown, a preparatory school for Harvard, which had a reputation in the colonies similar to that of Eton and Rugby in England. His body was laid among the illustrious. This is his inscription:

"Here lyes the Body of M^r Samuel Burr, Master of Arts. Was born in this town of Fairfield April 2nd, in ye Year 1679; was educated at Harvard College, in Cambridge, under ye Famous M^r W^m Brattle, and There He was graduated ye first time in ye Year 1697, ye second time in ye Year 1709, at Morris est, Who after he had Served his generation by ye will of God in ye Useful Station of a Grammar School Master, at Charlestown, about Twelve Years, upon a Visit to this His Native Place, Departed this Life August 7th, in ye year 1719, aged 40 Years, 1 month, & 5 Days."

Catharine, daughter of Silas and Charity (Banks) Burr, married Morris Ketchum, a banker of New York. He (Mr. Ketchum) died 1880.*

Henry, son of Ephraim and Eunice (Sherwood) Burr, who married Mary F. Slabac, was a merchant in San Francisco, Cal., where he died in 1871. His body was brought on and interred in Fairfield. Mr. Ephraim Burr is eighty-six, hale and hearty.

Capt. David, son of Eben and Hannah (Osborne) Burr, married Ellen Magdalen, of Marseilles, France. He was a master-mariner, and was lost with the ill-fated steamer, "Evening Star," off Cape Hatteras, in October, 1866. Capt. William Knapp, whose widow and four daughters reside in Fairfield in a house that has been standing ninety-six years, was also on board.

A tombstone to his memory contains this (the Masons' emblem is above the inscription):

Which foundered on her passage from New York to New Orleans.

"His last words when bidding adieu to the officers of the ship were,
'If you survive, and I do not, tell them at home I died doing my duty.'

"'Twas the first time I mourned the dead;
It was my heaviest, my worst,
My husband, and was thine the first?"

Samuel Burr, brother of David, was lost from the barque "Palermo" in 1857. Of this family, Angelina married Deacon Samuel Morehouse (see "Colonial," No. 11); Sarah and Eliza married brothers, James and Benjamin Bulkeley (see "Colonials," 1, 2, 11, 15); Cornelia married Andrew P. Wakeman,† Mary married John Henry Jennings, of prominence in Green's Farms; and William married Catharine Sherwood. Emma and Francis reside in the paternal mansion.

In 1878, Fairfield was represented in the Legislature by Oliver Burr, of Greenfield, and Ebenezer Burr, Jr., of Mill Plain (Fairfield), who is a promising lawyer and clerk of the County Court.

The Burrs have married into about every old family in Fairfield through several generations, and, as they have never been dispersed much, there is scarcely a family but has a Burr origin.

3. The Congregational Parsonage.—This was built for Hon. Roger Minott Sherman, born at Woburn, Mass., May 22, 1773. He was the youngest of six children of Rev. Josiah Sherman, the Congregational minister of that place. His father was descended by four removes from Capt. John Sherman, of Dedham, England, who came to Watertown, Mass., in 1635. Hon. Roger M. Sherman was a nephew of the Hon. Roger Sherman, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. His (Roger M.'s) mother was Martha, daughter of the Hon. James Minott, of Concord, Mass., who was four removes in descent from George Minott, one of the first English settlers in Dorchester, Mass., where he was a ruling elder for thirty years. Rev. J. Sherman preached in Milford, Mass., Goshen, Conn., and Woodbridge, where he died, leaving six children.

In 1789, at the age of sixteen, Judge Sherman entered the sophomore class at Yale. In six weeks his father died, leaving no property; so the son's chances at college appeared of a negative character, but an uncle (Hon. Roger Sherman) came to his relief and rendered necessary aid. He taught school in New Haven through the last half of his college days, but attended regularly the duties of
